The savings between 1930 and 1932 brought about by these special types of economies makes very interesting reading. For instance, of positions drawing salaries of $5,000 or over they have abolished fifty-six. Of positions drawing salaries between $3,000 and $5,000 they have abolished forty-seven. In other words among the supervisory officers of one kind and another they have eliminated one hundred and three who were receiving from $3,000, up. They claim that the efficiency of the road will not in any way be endangered by the elimination, and that the present staff could very well look after a very much greater volume of business than the railway is doing at the present time. I have no doubt as to the truth of that assertion. This elimination in salaries over $3,000 brought about a saving, in round figures of a little over $1,000,000,—In addition; the reduction of salaries of those receiving salaries over $4,000, made a saving of over $900,000. Travelling expenses and club dues—but largely travelling expenses—were reduced by $850,000. Radio, medical services and advertising were cut by $1,250,000. Those four items alone make a total special saving of something over $4,000,000.

In addition to that however savings were made in passenger services which some years ago were thought to be necessary by all the railways on the continent. There had been growing up on this continent a very elaborate passenger service not only on the Canadian National railways but on all the other railways on the continent. In addition there was a very elaborate branch line service which, because of the popularity of motor cars, had been brought into the position of heavy losers. The lines and services throughout the country were surveyed, and between 1930 and 1932, eight million miles of passenger train services have been eliminated. It has been estimated that this elimination has brought about a saving of a dollar a mile at least, in fact I have heard it estimated that the saving is as high as $1.50. However taking it at the rate of one dollar per mile the saving amounts to $8,000,000. Many of these savings that I have mentioned are permanent.

It is true that there have been strong protests made to the railway management and to myself personally about taking off services both on the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways. There seems to be a feeling throughout our country, I am sorry to say, that economies in the abstract are all to the good, but should not be applied to our own regions. I believe that is the feeling in the constituencies most hon. members represent. I presume all of us from time to time have received strenuous protests against some economies which were proposed to be put into effect. Apparently people believe we should economize, but should not carry out those economies in their constituencies, but always elsewhere. At the same time it should be pointed out that the people can hardly expect to be given elaborate train services when they are not patronizing these services, but are using automobiles instead of the trains.

There is another matter that I might mention in passing; I referred to radio savings. There is another saving which will be brought into effect in the near future, because it is intended within the next few days that the Canadian National will sell to the Dominion Radio Commission their whole radio plant, at a figure which has been decided upon. This will eliminate another heavy drain upon the Canadian National Railways, and as the staff is being taken over by the radio commission it will not mean any further increase of unemployment.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the minister permit a question? He gave the figures of 1932 as to reduction in operating expense of around $44,000,000. What would the reduction in revenue and in operating expense be for 1931?

Mr. MANION: I looked that up a day or two ago, and while I cannot give the exact figures, there was no such saving as in 1932. The saving was in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent of the decrease in revenues from the previous year, instead of 112 per cent, as in 1932. Of course it is obvious that by no stretch of the imagination could a saving of 112 per cent of decreased revenues be made for many years. It can only be done at certain times. So that the saving between 1930 and 1931 was very much less than the saving last year. I stated earlier in my remarks that the usual saving in cases like this was 60 to 70 per cent, so it was in the neighbourhood of the usual figure.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister give the exact figures in committee?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I shall gladly do that. There have been other improvements in management in the past year or so in which I think the house will be interested. I give them, I assure the house, in no spirit of criticism of the management or of anyone; I mention them merely because they are questions that have been discussed in the house at various times. For example, there has been a great improvement in regard to switching of estimates. I remember mentioning it here a year or so ago, and my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition supported me in my attitude, that switching of estimates should not be tolerated. Up to a year ago it was possible, for example, for the Canadian National Railways to have estimates passed through this house in their budget for huge amounts to be spent for certain capital expenditures in various parts of the country, and to switch them from that part to some other part and for a totally different purpose. For example, they might, and did on one occasion, if I remember aright, pass estimates for the building of a hotel in one section of the country and switch that money to the building of a branch line in another section. That is a power that no government, whether municipal, provincial or dominion, ever has had since constitutional government came into effect in this country. The railway in that respect had a power that no government had. In fact in 1931 the Canadian National switched amounts to the total of over $8,000,000. They are not permitted to do that any longer.

Another matter in which it was seen there was opportunity for improvement is this: There had grown up up in the Canadian National Railways the practice of permitting one officer, the chief engineer of the railway, to change the specifications or classifications on contract work so that the cost of the contract to the Canadian National might be varied by hundreds of thousands of dollars. Indeed, in one case into which I looked the cost had been increased by something like $600,000. This officer had the power to make changes involving huge sums without consulting even the president or other executive officers or the directors or any other group. I do not suggest for a moment that anything was done of an irregular character in that regard, but I submit it is a greater power than should be in the hands of any one man of any corporation. I know of no other corporation, railway or otherwise, where one man had any such power. That has now been done away with. Another matter has been cleared up in which the fault I think, was due largely to the habit of architects, for example, of picking out what they think are the best lines of goods or materials and specifying those goods, irrespective of their origin, where the same type and quality of goods were being produced at an equal price in Canada. That habit had grown up in the Canadian National. In an investigation made at my request by the officers themselves, upon which they gave me a statement, it was found that forty per cent of all the specifications going out for materials for the building of hotels, terminals and so on were specifications of American goods. Without in any way thinking of criticizing American producers, I submit, and I know that members of the house will agree, that it is the duty of a Canadian institution supported by the money of the taxpayers to buy Canadian goods as far as possible.

May I, at this point, in regard to these various matters, again compliment the management and the directors who have cooperated so ably with the government in bringing about reform, which I think all hon. members of this house, of whatever party, will agree are advantageous to the Canadian National Railways.

It might be of interest to mention a few figures illustrating the decrease in traffic on all the railways on this half of the continent. Passengers carried in 1923 by the two great railway companies of this country amounted to 38,000,000, whereas in 1932 that number had decreased to less than half, about 18,000,000. Yet, during all that time both railways, and all railways on the continent, were spending huge sums in elaborate passenger services, and elaborate advertising for passenger traffic, which was the non-paying part of the railway business. I noted recently that Mr. Loree made the statement, which was widely quoted in the United States, that he thought too much money had been spent in past years on passenger traffic. That was seen by many men who were not railway men at all in this country in the last few years. During that time, when passenger traffic was decreasing so rapidly, there was a corresponding increase in the number of automobiles operating in Canada. In 1923 there were just over 500,000 automobiles of all kinds in use, and in 1931 just over 1,100,000, more than double the number, while the passengers in trains correspondingly decreased to one half.

It is well to remember that railways are absolutely necessary in a country such as Canada. With our immense distances, our huge quantities of bulk traffic, this country could hardly live without railways any more than the people of the country could live without air. We must have railways to carry our bulk traffic in such products as wheat, flour, cattle, coal, timber, and pulpwood. I mention those six products because in a recent report asked for by me I found that about two-thirds of the traffic on the Canadian National railways—and I presume it is true of the other railways in Canada—consisted of those six bulk products, products which could not possibly be handled by trucks or motor cars for our distances. So that I say the railways are an absolute necessity in the Dominion of Canada. That does not mean that it is our duty in any way to fetter the automobile progress of our country. We cannot hold back progress any more than we can hold back the tides. At the same time it is clear that the operation of money-making automobiles for private gain on public highways built out of the taxes of the people, a part of which are paid by the railways themselves, should be regulated in such manner as to provide at least fair competition to the railways. It is obvious that if we are to have fair competition for the railways without being unfair to the automobile, we should see that there is uniformity of regulation and taxation of road motor vehicles with a view to the equalization of conditions under which road and rail transport is carried on throughout the dominion. The motor cars of the country should pay at least a fair proportion of the upkeep and the interest on investment of the highways, and I feel that this can be brought about without in any way interfering with the progress of the automobile industry. The automobile can be and is now being made more complementary and supplementary to the railways than ever they have been in the past. The railways themselves have been very slow to realize the importance of utilizing automobiles to a greater extent than they have done in the past as feeders to their system. Only recently, it would seem, the railways have taken this into account. They seemed to have rested on their laurels, evidently under the impression that in the long run competition from the automobiles could not possibly handicap them, so that they ignored that competition which in the meantime has been rapidly increasing, with the result that the railways have been losing opportunities for making their business a profitable rather than a losing enterprise.

An arrangement has recently been made between Toronto on the east and Sarnia and Windsor on the west whereby the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National have undertaken the "pickup" system by means of which, at the Toronto end, hired automobiles —not purchased cars, so that there is no capital expenditure in this regard—are used to deliver goods to the trains, while at the other end automobiles are hired for the purpose of making deliveries to those to whom the goods are destined. It is an attempt, a somewhat belated attempt perhaps, on the part of the two railway companies to compete with the automobile in the carrying of traffic, and at the same time it is a very appropriate period in which to undertake a cooperative experiment, which we all trust will bring satisfactory results to the railway systems of Canada.

In this regard may I add that at the interprovincial conference held recently in this city an afternoon was devoted by the provincial and dominion representatives to a full discussion of the question of automobile competition with the railways, and it was decided on that occasion that my department should prepare a questionnaire to be sent out to the different provinces. When that questionnaire is returned with the appropriate answers from the different provinces it will be the duty of my department to endeavour so to coordinate the answers and afterwards to bring to Ottawa again the officials from the various provinces with the object of instituting more uniform taxation as well as more uniform charges and regulations with respect to motor traffic in competition with the railways. Incidentally, I may observe that within the last couple of weeks I have sent out the questionnaire, and during the discussion of the bill in the house I shall be glad to table it should anyone desire to see the document.

Another figure which is of interest with respect to our railways in Canada is the figure for coal consumption. In 1923 the two railways in Canada used $58,000,000 worth of coal, whereas in 1931 they used exactly one-half of that quantity, $29,000,000. That reduction indicates a greater operating efficiency on the part of the railways, showing that they can get more out of the coal that they are using; it shows the effects of the depression on business, and it also shows the reason why we are faced with the present difficulty of having to look after so many miners at both ends of the country.

Both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways have been making commendable economies. Naturally I am more familiar with the economies of the Canadian National Railways than with those practised by the Canadian Pacific, inasmuch as the latter system, as hon. members know, is not under the necessity of reporting either to myself or to this parliament. I do believe however that the two railways have, broadly speaking, reached rock bottom; they have not attained the extreme limit, but they have accomplished nearly the limit, with the exception of certain considerable economies which might still be made as a result of that greater cooperation between the two systems which will be brought about when the present measure becomes law. The foundations have been laid by both railways, and indeed probably by all the railways on this continent, so that they will be in a position when there is a revival of business throughout the continent and the world at large, to come back very rapidly. I believe they will profit by some of the painful experiences they have had to endure during the years of the crisis. I may add, with respect to these rather painful economies that have been made by the Canadian National Railways, that when the three trustees are appointed they should, if they show the proper courage and good judgment, be able to keep that system on the right track, if I may use an appropriate metaphor, so far as efficient and economical management is concerned. It may be added of course that unless there is that business revival which we all look for in the near future there can be no solution of our transportation difficulties throughout this continent. There is however every expectation, particularly after the events of the last week, that we shall in the near future experience that revival in business which we confidently anticipate.

Recently in the United States the bondholders of private railways in that country, who consist very largely of insurance companies, savings banks and trust companies—in other words, the repositories of the savings of the people, holding about seventy per cent of the bonds of the American railways—got together and appointed a commission on something of the basis of the royal commission which was appointed in this dominion. They appointed the late Mr. Calvin Coolidge as chairman, Mr. Alfred Smith, Mr. Baruch, and two other business men whose names escape me for the moment. These gentlemen reported after a thorough investigation of the situation that, with the economies that have been put into effect on the railways in the American republic, a twenty per cent increase in traffic would serve to bring their railways back to a good revenue position. I do not believe that twenty per cent of an increase in traffic would restore our railways to a normal condition, but I do think that fifty per cent of an increase would go a long way towards getting them out of the slough of despond into which they have sunk; I think that such an increase would bring them back to something like a hopeful position. Everyone who is reasonable feels that we may well entertain hopes for the future without smashing the whole economic machine which has served us for so many years. When a man has an automobile which has been giving good service for years, he does not, if it goes out of order, take an axe or burglar's tools if he wants to repair it; he gets someone to help him to get it back into running order. Now that should be our attitude towards the economic system under which we live. People generally realize, I believe, that the conditions under which our railways, our agriculture and the whole of our commercial enterprises are operating at the present time are world conditions. That is clearly understood, I think, for people realize that no individual nation or leader alone can restore conditions to normal. In other words, there must be international cooperation on such questions as international indebtedness, world trade barriers and primary commodity prices. These three questions particularly must be studied. If we are to get primary commodity prices back to anything like a reasonable basis, it must be the result of some international conference. The restoration of primary commodity prices to something like a reasonable level, and the stabilizing of those prices at that level, would not only lessen to a large extent the debts of individuals and nations, but would bring back that purchasing power which is necessary not only to provide business for the railways but to further business generally.

I had that well illustrated a few days ago, when I made it my endeavour to find out how shipments of wheat compared in the last year with one of the previous years considered as an outstanding period in the progress of the railways. I found that in the year 1929, 4,600,000 tons of wheat was shipped on the railways, and in 1932, 5,300,000 tons, an increase of 700,000 tons in 1932 as compared with 1929; yet the gross revenues of the Canadian National Railways were down in 1932 as compared with 1929 as by $125,000,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not on wheat alone.

Mr. MANION: No, on the total revenues. I mention this to my hon. friend because it has been the conviction of many of us—I must confess it was my own conviction—that grain traffic was the paying traffic of the railways. As a matter of fact, it was not so much the wheat and grain traffic that was the paying traffic for the railways as the fact that the people of the west were selling their products at a reasonable price and had the money with which to purchase goods from some other section of the country, thus providing return traffic; and that total traffic brought about the prosperity of the railways.

Mr. MALCOLM: Could the minister give us the earnings on the wheat traffic as well as the tonnage carried during the two years he mentioned?

Mr. MANION: I have not that information under my hand but I shall be glad to furnish it during the committee stage of the bill.

Mr. MALCOLM: I submit that the earnings would not be larger even though the tonnage was greater if the haul were shorter.

Mr. MANION: There is something in that because a larger proportion of the wheat has been going via Vancouver which is a shorter haul. However, the 700,000 tons additional in 1932 over 1929 would balance the shorter haul. It is the low purchasing power of the western farmer due to the low prices he is receiving for his grain which causes his inability to purchase the goods of the eastern producer. This in turn prevents the prosperity of the railways as well as of the industrial plants of the country. There is no purchasing power, no effective demand.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I hope that my hon. friend who says "hear, hear," does not imagine that that thought belongs only to our friends over there.

Mr. HEENAN: Does the minister intend to move to refer this bill to the railway committee?

Mr. MANION: I am coming to that point. I submit that the railways as well as the world in general can be more hopeful today than they have been for many days past or even for years, certainly for many months. The time seems opportune for a recovery of world conditions. We are all looking forward to a world economic conference from which, if matters are dealt with in a proper cooperative and international manner, it is hoped world recovery will come. When that recovery does take place, as I sincerely believe it will in the near future, then the railways as well as the other industries will come back to prosperity. I submit that the outlook for the railways is far from hopeless, provided always that the trustees to be appointed are careful to carry on the management in an economical manner and provided also that there is at the same time a revival of trade in Canada and throughout the world.

In connection with the question asked by the hon. member for Kenora (Mr. Heenan) as to whether or not it is my intention to submit this bill to the committee on railways, shipping and telegraph lines, I should like to say that it is my intention to suggest submitting it to a committee of the whole house. These matters have been dealt with very fully by the royal commission. This commission travelled from coast to coast and took evidence from all those who desired to submit evidence. They heard provincial authorities, railway officers, railway employees—public bodies and individuals—any who felt that they had some contribution to make to the solution of the question. In addition, the Senate committee heard further witnesses, most of whom had appeared before the royal commission, and it is my opinion that it is not necessary to go to the trouble and expense of hearing these witnesses over again.

In closing may I say that while the principles of this bill are supported in entirety by the government, the government has no strong feeling in regard to matters of detail. We will welcome suggestions from any part of the house with regard to contributions as to details, but at the same time we feel that the royal commission has made a most careful study of the whole question and its submissions should be given fair trial by the people of Canada. After the money and time spent upon this royal commission, if proper heed were not given to its recommendations, the people of Canada might feel that its efforts had been wasted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister mentioned the decrease in passenger traffic from 1923 to 1932 as being some 18,000,000; has he the corresponding figures for freight tonnage?

Mr. MANION: I have the gross figures under my hand but I do not wish to give them at this moment. I shall be very glad to give any information asked for when the bill is in committee.

I should like to repeat, and I do it most respectfully, that I believe this whole question is so wrapped up with the future development of this country that it should be dealt with on the high plane of strong Canadianism rather than in any sense of partyism. I trust that I have said nothing which might be considered as being unfairly critical of any body or group. In making my remarks I have endeavoured to occupy the same plane which I am suggesting hon. members should occupy in dealing with this bill.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow the minister in reviewing the financial operations of the Canadian National Railways. He has the advantage of his position in that his department can supply him with figures which are not so readily available to myself. I intend to address myself to the merits of the bill itself. May I say to the minister that as one who sits on this side of the house I can congratulate him upon the moderation of his remarks. Parliament and the country generally may be congratulated upon the optimism with which he views the future. I am afraid, however, that I cannot quite follow him when he states that a more or less mathematical miracle has been performed in the saving of 112 per cent. I used to regard 100 per cent as the limit of what could be done in anything. If the government could make the same saving in its other operations we would soon be out of the difficulties in which we find ourselves.

The minister made reference to the present condition of the Canadian National Railways and he stated that Mr. Hungerford, the present president of the road, declares that the railways are in perfect physical condition. I am glad to hear that, but would like to say, without arousing any recriminations, that admirable condition of the Canadian National Railways was not brought about in one or two years; it is the result of the good work done in years gone by.

It is gratifying that it has been possible in the last year or two to effect the great savings which the minister has mentioned to-day. However, it would not be fair to assume that such savings can be always effected in periods of prosperity. While it is true that great expenditures were made during the prosperous years of 1927 and 1928, I think it must be realized that it is not possible to effect in periods of prosperity the savings which are sometimes enforced upon us during periods such as we now have. Commercial and industrial enterprises have found it necessary to effect economies just as has been done in the case of the national railway. I do not say this by way of criticism but rather that no wrong conclusion may be drawn from the minister's observations.

As has been stated, this bill is the direct outcome of the recommendations contained in the report of the royal commission on railways and transportation, and it might be regarded as being quite in order to discuss at this time some of the features of that report. It is not my intention to do so other than to say that while I disagree emphatically with some of the opinions and inferences that are drawn in the report, I am wholly in accord with the chief purposes that the government desires to attain in the bill now before the house. I do not suppose the government anticipates or expects that this bill will cure all the evils from which the railways are suffering. If the bill carries in its present form, so much after all depends upon the good faith, ability and public spirit, if you like, of the men who will be placed in charge of those railways, that one can only say that the best results can be obtained if those people act efficiently, in a spirit of good faith and with an eye only to the good of the Canadian National Railways.

I support the second reading of the bill chiefly for four reasons. In the first place, the integrity and identity of the Canadian National Railways is preserved. I listened with a good deal of satisfaction to the assurances given by the minister that there was not in the mind of the government—and I may say I do not suspect them—any thought whatsoever that the provisions of this bill might be used for the purpose of amalgamating the Canadian National Railways with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do say this, however, that while it may be quite true there is in the bill nothing which permits amalgamation, that fact might be made just a little more clear by the insertion of a clause making it unmistakable where parliament stands in the matter. I support the bill for the second reason that the establishment of a small body of trustees of three or four, as the case may be, will promote efficiency in the conduct of the Canadian National Railways. There is a third advantageous provision in the bill if it is properly carried out, and if the government would consent perhaps to make some slight changes in the method of appointing the board of trustees, this might minimize to a very great degree the harmful influences that may be exercised in a political way. Fourth, the bill provides a plan whereby it is hoped savings may be effected; that waste that has come because of the severe competition existing between the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways may be eliminated. These advantages, in my opinion, are thoroughly worth while.

The railway situation, as has been pointed out by the minister, is assuredly sufficiently serious to be a challenge to the patriotism, if you will, and the sense of public duty and responsibility of every member of this house. The reason for the condition in which the railways find themselves, are fairly obvious to most of us, although there may be some differences of opinion. First, there is the depression which has affected all lines of business and perhaps more particularly the railways. Then there is the contraction of trade, the lack of freight to carry over the railways, the wasteful competition between the two great railway systems and the competition with which the railways have been obliged to deal so far as another method of transportation is concerned, that of the truck and automobile. I would second the wish of the minister when he says that he hopes we may approach this whole question in a spirit free of prejudice, free of partisanship, and with the single purpose of cooperation in the national duty of doing what we can to relieve the country of this burden which has been placed upon us by reason of the depression in the business of the Canadian National Railways and throughout the country generally. The Senate have shown us a very good example; they have discussed and dealt with the question on a patriotic and purely business basis, hoping to do what they can in the interests of Canada itself. I might, if I cared, refer to a few exceptions to that, but I shall refrain from doing so.

In addition to the matters mentioned, I would not forget that there are in the bill other provisions which are of some importance, but quite subordinate to the four I have enumerated. The bill provides for a continuous audit, auditors to be appointed by parliament and reports to be made by them direct to parliament. It provides for the separation of the chairmanship of the board from the presidency of the railroad, and I shall have something more to say with regard to that. It provides that all bond issues shall be made by the federal government rather than by the railway itself. It provides further that there shall be no more funding of deficits. These matters are not new and I imagine they are placed in the bill not entirely by reason of the recommendations made by the royal commission, but because our parliamentary committee on national railways and shipping in the past has made these very recommendations coupled with the further one, that we are in favour of a reduction in the number of those who are to form the board of management of the Canadian National Railways.

I should like now to discuss the three parts of the bill. The first provides for the substitution of a small board of trustees for the present cumbersome board of management of seventeen, if I may call it such without casting any reflections upon its present members. I believe, as a business principle, a small body of men will do better work than a very large body such as we have. Let me say this further: Perhaps the government will accept a suggestion that I am going to make a little later. I believe by the composition of this board, it might be possible, as I have said before, to exercise political patronage and political influence upon the conduct of the railway. I have never favoured the appointment of the former boards upon the basis of political preference, I am not criticizing any one government more than another. Quite frankly, I believe it has never been in the interests of the Canadian National Railways that in the appointment of that board of sixteen or seventeen directors, any consideration should have been given to the political persuasion or complexion of the members of the board, or to geographical considerations. If there is a small board of trustees of three, although my mind is open as regards increasing that to five, it will be possible to eliminate from the appointments the matter of allotting a member to British Columbia, or the prairie provinces, or Nova Scotia, or any other province. Appointments should be made with certain qualifications in view: first, with reference to the ability of the men who shall be appointed; second, that they shall be men of integrity—and that goes without saying; third, that they shall possess something of the spirit of public service—that is important—and finally—and this is almost of paramount importance; at least it seems of great importance to me—that the men who will be selected as the board of trustees shall be men who believe in the principle of public ownership.

I approve entirely the provision which states that the board shall be responsible to parliament; that may mean responsible to the government, because the government, after all, controls parliament. I believe also it is a good step that the president of the road, who will be the chief operating officer, should be appointed by the board of trustees and responsible to that board alone. Again, although it is perhaps not of great importance, it does not seem appropriate that the chief operating officer of the road should be designated by the name "president." It would be more appropriate and descriptive if you called him the general manager of the road, and the term "president" could be much more fittingly applied to the chairman of the board of trustees. I merely make that suggestion in passing. I believe also that if you have only three trustees, all the trustees should give their whole time to the work, and that not only the chairman but all should be well paid; and if there are only three, or even five, the majority should rule, and the chairman should not have supreme authority.

Just a word with regard to the method of appointment. The initial board which will replace the present board is to be appointed by the governor in council, by the government itself. Succeeding vacancies, no matter how caused, by the effluxion of time, by resignation, if you like, by the death of a member of the board, shall be made on an entirely different plan. These succeeding vacancies shall be filled from a panel of eight men, which panel is to be selected by a body consisting of the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, the chief of the Exchequer court and the two remaining trustees. I have no fault to find with that because if it is carried out in good faith it will be possible to give at least the impression which I hope would be based on fact that politics does not enter into the appointment of these men. But I would point out this anomaly. While these succeeding vacancies are to be filled from a panel of eight men selected as I have indicated by this group of four, the government thereby recognizing the principle of non-partisanship in the composition of that panel and in the appointment of the board of trustees, if that principle is sound in the filling of succeeding vacancies, it ought to be just as sound in the appointment of the original board of trustees. The suggestion I desire to make is this, that this first board of trustees, which appointments the government will make, shall be appointed from a panel of eight selected by the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and the chief of the Exchequer court, and two others as a result of a consultation of the members of this house, all parties included. If the government would do that, I think they would give the impression, and honestly I think, that it is their real desire to remove as far as possible from the administration of the Canadian National Railways political influence and political pull, if I may put it in that way.

We have a precedent for that. When the chief electoral officer of Canada was appointed some years ago, the then Prime Minister consulted with those then leading the opposition and an agreement was reached, and the gentleman who was chosen as a result of that consultation served in a manner that was entirely satisfactory. I just want to impress that once again on the government. If the government sincerely desires, and I do not question their motives for one moment, that the people of Canada shall be impressed with the fact that in the conduct of the Canadian National Railways politics does not enter, and it is a bad thing I will say when politics does enter into business, I think they might very readily accept the suggestion I have made or something similar which would eliminate as far as possible the suggestion of political influence in the appointment of the initial board of trustees.

With regard to part 2 of the bill, I may say that I regarded that as of relatively little importance. It seemed to me that it expresses what is sometimes spoken of as merely the pious wish that the railways should cooperate in the cutting out of useless expenditures, with a solemn injunction to them to do so. But the teeth which are in the bill to implement that pious wish are to be found in part 3.

Before leaving part 2 of the bill I want to make a reference to the matter of amalgamation. The minister assured us during the course of his address that the government had not the slightest desire that anything in this bill should be used for the purpose of merging the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I accept his word for that. But there was in the original draft of the bill that went to the Senate a clause which has since been elminated, and which reads as follows—it was subsection 2 of section 16:

> But nothing herein shall be taken to authorize any amalgamation of any National company with any Pacific company.

I have not followed throughout the proceedings of the Senate committee, but I am curious to know why that clause was cut out.

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend will permit me to answer now, I did not know that the clause had been cut out until very recently and then I made inquiries from the leader in the Senate and others and found that it was cut out because it was considered as surplus words, that there was nothing in the act leading towards amalgamation or that authorized amalgamation, and that therefore the words were not necessary.

Mr. EULER: I think I heard the Prime Minister say that it was foolish to insert that clause.

Mr. BENNETT: Surplus.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps he is quite right. But I would read to him the statement made by a rather prominent barrister in the city of Toronto. I shall not read the whole of his statement, but he said in part:

Under the act as it now stands, it is possible to legally disembowel, dismantle and ruin the Canadian National Railways unless a plain, unambiguous clause or section is inserted and made part of the act, preventing and prohibiting any amalgamation, merger or transfer of any of the funds, revenues, business, properties and assets of the Canadian National Railways to or with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

I bring that up merely for the purpose of ensuring that there can be no doubt whatsoever with regard to it. There are some people—I believe there are some on this side of the house as well as throughout the country —who do have the fear that under this bill it may be possible by certain action to effect amalgamation of the Canadian National with the Canadian Pacific, and I would ask the minister, the Prime Minister, and the government whether it would not be worth while, in order to remove the fears of these people, to reinsert this clause that was deleted. If it does not do any good, it can certainly do no harm. I leave that for the consideration of the ministry.

I would certainly say that if ever amalgamation does come, and it may come some day, it should not be possible for this board of trustees to consummate such an amalgamation. Parliament should deal with the question, and perhaps it might even be advisable to submit it to the people of Canada in a general election.

Lastly I come to part 3 of the bill. Part 3 which deals with what is sometimes called the compulsory cooperation of the two railway systems. It is intended to eliminate wasteful competition and to save money for both railway companies I suppose, but primarily for the Canadian National Railways. I may say in passing, Mr. Speaker, that I think it is the duty of this parliament, when endeavouring to do something for the Canadian National Railways, to do no injustice to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Ordinarily I do not believe a great deal in compulsion, and when I first read the recommendation of the commission in that respect, and first saw the bill as introduced into the Senate, I had no great confidence that this compulsory cooperation would be very successful or that the clause would be very valuable. I am not sure that I have changed my mind. Compulsion and cooperation do not go very well together. Cooperation implies voluntary action, not compulsion. But it may be that in the public interest compulsion sometimes becomes necessary. If it does become necessary, and the results one hopes to attain through compulsion can be obtained in no other way and are for the general good of the Canadian people as well as for the good of the Canadian Pacific Railway, then I believe I might strain a point and support even that.

One further word wth regard to amalgamation: The minister referred to the term to-day, and I have mentioned it myself. It is idle at this time to argue concerning amalgamation. For the time being at least I think it is set aside, and I would not bring it up now were it not for the intensive campaign or propaganda that is being carried on by certain people who advocate the merging of the Canadian National with the Canadian Pacific railways. The president of the Canadian Pacific Railway—and I do not blame him for his activity, because he is acting in the interests of his shareholders—is of the opinion that the only solution to the railway problem of Canada lies in the amalgamation of the two roads and, of course, by preference, amalgamation under private ownership. At the risk of being tedious and saying something I have said in the house before, may I repeat that so long as ten years ago I suggested to the then government that it might be advisable to canvass the whole railway situation with a view to possible amalgamation. I believe everybody recognized at that time that there was a great deal of waste and duplication of services, and some of the difficulties mentioned by the minister this afternoon.

I made the statement then, and had it on very good authority, that at least $75,000,000 a year could be saved by a merging of the two roads. My suggestion was not acted upon at the time. I made it again last year, and the year before. Now we have Mr. Beatty of the Canadian Pacific Railway making the same claim—although it is contradicted by the president of the Canadian National Railways—to the effect that $75,000,000 a year could be saved by amalgamation. If that had been true, and if action had been taken ten years ago, by this time we would have saved an amount equal to about one-third of the national debt. I agree with Mr. Beatty that we could effect a tremendously greater saving by amalgamation than by any such plan as provided in part III of the bill. I realize it is impossible to do anything in that connection at this time, and I know further, the arguments that are levelled constantly against amalgamation. May I say, lest I embarrass hon. members on this side of the house, that on this point I speak for myself and for nobody else, knowing full well that many hon. members who sit about me disagree with me at times.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is a wise thing to do.

Mr. HOWARD: That's playing safe.

Mr. EULER: I speak entirely for myself, and for no one else. I should like to answer the argument which is brought constantly and which, so far as I am concerned, has no force, namely that in all cases monopoly is bad. I say without fear of successful contradiction that there is a world of difference between privately and publicly owned monopolies. The objectives in the two systems are entirely different. In private monopoly the motive is profit; in a public monopoly the motive is the best of service at cost. In a public monopoly no good can be done by any one trying to take advantage of the public, because the public itself is the owner of the monopoly.

The suggestion of an amalgamation is not particularly new, and at the moment I am not urging it. But even in France, in view of the fact that privately owned roads are losing millions and scores of millions of dollars, we find the Minister of Public Works making a suggestion that the state take over the railways. In Italy the roads are owned by the state. Those roads some years ago were handed over on a leasehold to a private railway concern. The result was that there was constant bickering; the railway company was constantly complaining that it could not get the money necessary to carry out capital expenditures to put the roads in condition. The government and the people complained about the service, and finally the state took the railways back under state control. There is state control in Germany and Australia, and at the present time there is a movement in the United States whereby the multitudinous number of roads in that country are gradually being combined under four great systems. Possible amalgamation may take place later on.

I know that at the moment there is no use arguing in favour of amalgamation, because at this time I do not believe the people of Canada desire it. I do say, however, that if amalgamation does come the people of Canada will not stand for a private monopoly of the railway business. If we are to have amalgamation it must be publicly owned.

There are just two other points I should like to mention in connection with the campaign which has been carried on by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He has stated in his speeches that in the last few years the country has suffered a loss of about $85,000,000 a year on Canadian National Railways account. While in a sense true, that statement is misleading because it includes the $35,000,000 interest on the debt which was created, very largely before the roads were taken over. It includes the advances that were made by the Dominion government to those railways which now comprise the Canadian National railway system, an amount of money which in my opinion should have been written off long ago, an amount which if written off would not save the Canadian people from the payment of interest, but at least would put the principle of public ownership on a basis where it could fairly be compared with a system under private ownership.

When the suggestion is made that the Canadian National Railways should merge with the Canadian Pacific Railway I believe the impression is conveyed, whether intentionally or not, that we would then be rid of the tremendous loss which we suffer in connection with the Canadian National system. When that is suggested I believe the Canadian people would do well to turn to the words of Mr. Beatty, as they appear at page 914 of the proceedings of the royal commission. They are as follows:

> I also dismiss the possibility of a change involving the transfer of the government lines, subject to their existing obligations, to a private company. No private corporation could assume the enormous obligations which the government railways are under. If it did, the project could never be made to yield a profit and the company would find itself unable to finance the undertaking.

In other words, if we did hand the Canadian National Railways over to the Canadian Pacific Railway we would still have to pay the interest on a large part of our obligations because, as Mr. Beatty said, the Canadian Pacific Railway would not assume them. We would be in the position that the Canadian Pacific Railway would probably have a profitable enterprise and the Canadian people would still be paying the shot by way of interest on liabilities.

To the relief of the house I am about to discontinue my remarks in connection with amalgamation, and shall consider part III of the bill. The purpose of part III, as the minister has said, is a worthy one. It provides for the elimination of wasteful competition, covering joint use of terminals, running rights, joint use of tracks, new line and duplication of old lines, abandonment of lines, and the pooling of freight and passenger traffic. If one road makes a suggestion that the other road agree to eliminate a service which appears to be extravagant and wasteful, and the other road refuses to accede to the wishes of the first road, there is provision for the appointment of an arbitral tribunal. A tribunal is appointed for each separate dispute. The point I would like to make in connection with these tribunals, apart from the extreme degree of authority given to the chairman of the tribunal, is that the railways alone can initiate the arbitral tribunal—I think I am correct—that no one else, no matter how far the public interests were prejudiced, can initiate an arbitral tribunal. The chairman always is the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and there is one representative of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and one of the Canadian National. The chairman is supreme, because decisions cannot be made without his consent. Naturally each representative of the railway would adhere to his own view, the chairman gives the decision, so that in effect the chairman is the one who makes the decision. His decision is final; there is no appeal from it.

My criticisms in connection with the arbitral tribunal plan are these: first too much power in the hands of one man; second—this criticism is made by others and I do not place so much stress upon it, but it is made by the Canadian Pacific Railway—compulsion is unfair to the Canadian Pacific; and third that the public is not protected; and that is the strongest criticism that I have to make. It should be possible for the public to initiate an arbitral tribunal. I make the suggestion for the consideration of the government and the house, that so far as the one man power is concerned, that could be avoided if additional powers, such as are given now to the arbitral tribunal, were vested in the present Board of Railway Commissioners, and that a majority there should decide. With regard to the matter of compulsion I might make this suggestion for what it is worth, that you would get rid of that factor if these disputes were referred to a body similar to that which acts under the Industrial Disputes Act. Their decisions are not compulsory, but usually, if they are fair, and I think ordinarily they are, public opinion would see that they were brought into force.

In conclusion I would say that, after all, the working out of the provisions of this bill will succeed exactly in the degree that it is done in good faith. If a good board is appointed, a capable board, non-political, a board that is not concerned with anything but the good of the railways, and that believes in the principle of public ownership, I think good may result. If I thought for one moment—I do not—that it is the intention of the government or anyone else that this bill shall lend itself to the amalgamation of the roads without the consent of this house or the people of Canada, I certainly should oppose the second reading of the bill. I prefer to believe that the government, that parliament, that the trustees to be appointed, are sincere in an effort to do what can be done to relieve the people of Canada of the burden now oppressing both railways. I shall therefore vote for the second reading of the bill, reserving always the right to make such suggestions or amendments as may seem desirable when the bill goes into committee of the whole house.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): The discussion on this bill falls within rather narrow limits. The remarks of the hon. gentleman who moved the second reading (Mr. Manion), as well as of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) who has just spoken, show that the bill will have substantial support from both sides of the house. I do not think any useful purpose can be served by retelling the long story which brought about the investigation and the findings which underlie this bill. My hon. friend from North Waterloo is an ardent and consistent believer in public ownership. He could not therefore refrain from inviting the government to select for trustees under the act adherents of his own economic theory. He is hopeful that men who believe in the principle of public ownership shall be selected for these very important offices. That probably is a natural suggestion from one who entertains his views. But he surely does not expect those who entertain contrary views to be very much moved by the suggestion. He has told us that railroads are publicly owned in other parts of the world; he mentioned Germany, where I think public ownership was adopted for military purposes. He mentioned France, where the roads are with some exceptions publicly owned, to the great dismay of the population and the disarray of their finances. In Australia the railroads are publicly owned. Almost every possible plan of administration has been tried, and the railroads continue to be, as with us, the principal burden and item in public expenditures. My hon. friend from North Waterloo wishes that politics, which he considers a baneful influence in the administration of railways, should be banished therefrom.

I think many of us share that wish, but after all when ownership resides in the public I think that the owner, expressing his views through the politician, his mandatory and spokesman, will inevitably and always find a voice. The hon. member for North Waterloo warned the house that he was speaking for himself alone, I too can say that as far as I am concerned I am not sure that if public ownership is to prevail it will not bring fewer evils in its train, if administered honestly and openly, as the other public undertakings of this country. We have got into serious trouble with our railways largely because, being publicly owned and subject to political influence, we have endeavoured to shield them and ourselves from reality by putting them under what is called independent administration. I do not believe it is possible to have administration which is entirely free from the influence of ownership. So long as we have public ownership of railways, public men are bound to exercise a certain influence over their administration no matter what safeguards surround it. I will ask the house, taking it for granted that a tremendous debt has been placed upon the country as a result of the public ownership and administration of the railways, whether this debt would have been as large, whether our position would have been as perilous if these roads had been administered—with all the ills and evils of partisanship and politics—by a responsible minister of the crown who was subject to the curiosity, to the criticism and control of a vigilant parliamentary opposition. I doubt it very much indeed.

Be that as it may, my task is to discuss very briefly the three or four salient aspects of this legislation. The train of events leading up to the legislation is well known to the house. We have invested in railways $2,600,000,000 and, roughly, half of that amount is owing to the public. The interest on the amount that is owing to the public is about $60,000,000 a year. To find the money necessary to refund and retire maturing obligations; to find the money necessary for capital expenditure, for interest on obligations, and latterly for income deficits, we have borrowed. We have borrowed continuously and consistently until, as I said a moment ago, the amount now owing to the public by the railways is about $1,300,000,000. A very substantial portion of this amount is guaranteed by the government of Canada. About two or three hundred millions are not contractually guaranteed by the government but are effectually guaranteed inasmuch as the debt is a lien upon the entirety of the enterprise which is operated as a whole.

[Mr. Hackett.]

The full cost of railway transportation must be paid by the classes served, by the taxpayers of the time, or charged to the future with compound interest. To spread this cost over a long period in the name of constructive benevolence is the course which we have followed until now. We are told that our borrowing power is exhausted; in fact, there is in the bill a provision which makes it illegal to borrow for the purpose of paying income deficits. The royal commission was appointed to find a solution for this problem. It was appointed to examine the whole transportation problem and if possible to find a way out which would relieve the country and in particular the taxpayer. After considering the problem in all its aspects it brushed aside the possibility of amalgamation either by purchase or by lease. The reason given was that amalgamation was inopportune at the moment. Another reason given was that it would be unwise to formulate in a moment of stress a definite policy which might be unsuited to more normal times. That leads one inevitably to the conclusion that this proposal embodied in the report of the commission and reproduced in the bill is but a temporary expedient and does not contain any final disposition of the railway problem.

The bill aims at bringing some relief to the Canadian taxpayer and it finds that the only way that it can do this is by reducing the cost of operation. It cannot reduce the debt; it cannot increase the earning power; so that the only method left is to reduce the cost of operating of the roads. It proposes to do this in a hitherto untried way. Had amalgamation taken place either under private or public ownership, the owner would then have reduced the railway system to the size, needs and capacity to pay of the Canadian people. This bill, while maintaining the identity of ownership of both the privately and publicly owned roads, attempts to bring about this elimination of unnecessary equipment, mileage and service, by a method which, so far as my investigation has carried me, has never been tried before. The method is euphemistically called cooperation, but it is a type of cooperation which is to be coerced if it is not voluntarily entered into. I cannot see how either party mentioned in the bill can be expected voluntarily to lop off large portions of its system. It is admitted that we have too much mileage; it is admitted that we have too many trains, and it is admitted as a consequence we have too many men in the employ of the railroad companies and that, therefore, it is necessary to reduce the mileage in operation and to eliminate the service and equipment which duplicates in any form that given by the other line. The tribunal will have not only the right but the duty of determining where this elimination can most properly take place. Naturally the Canadian National will not be disturbed very much by the exercise of these arbitrary powers; it is owned by the people of Canada and indirectly administered by the government of Canada and the creation of a tribunal by parliament will subject the Canadian National to no new control or master. But it is not so with the Canadian Pacific; that road will find itself subjected to the rulings of a tribunal which will have the right to say: this portion of your road you shall no longer use; this station shall be invaded by your erstwhile rivals, or this ticket office shall be closed. In other words, the government will be actually controlling private enterprise and stating how far it may exercise the rights which up until now have been limited only by the statute of its incorporation and by the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. This is a new principle applied to the business life of our country, and whether or not it will be applied tomorrow to the operators of cotton mills, to the growers of wheat or to other branches of our financial, industrial and economic life remains to be seen. It may even contain the germ of the new order toward which all eyes are turned. However, it is an experiment and an experiment which cannot be looked upon with equanimity by both parties affected by the bill. The one will remain under the control of its owners, the other passes under the control of an alien power.

Can this legislation remedy the railway ills of the country? By cooperation, voluntary or coercive, by the elimination of duplication and the loss and waste incident to competition, can we hope that the revenues from the Canadian National Railways will be equal to the carrying charges of the debt which now weighs upon the Canadian National Railways and their owners, the people of Canada? The minister has told us of the great effort which has been made by the officers of the Canadian National to reduce the expenses of that road. I am not in a mood to criticize or to carp, but if the expenses could be reduced by 112 per cent, the road must have been generous if not lavish in its expenditures in better days.

Even though this bill bring all the relief that its most ardent adherents hope for, the railway problem will not be solved. Let no one be lulled into the belief that the passage of this bill will extricate us from the difficulties incident to the ownership and administration of this vast transportation system. Before we have disposed of the problem not only will highway traffic have to be brought under control, as suggested this afternoon by the minister, but a closer investigation will have to be conducted into the competition offered by our canals. We have spent millions, yes hundreds of millions upon our canal system. We permit foreign boats to leave the port of Vancouver, let us say, go through the Panama canal where they pay tolls, come up the St. Lawrence river and through our canals, which are toll free, and penetrate 2,000 miles inland in competition with our railways. I submit that that is a type of competition rather difficult to justify, especially in these days when the Canadian taxpayer is under such a heavy burden.

There is another aspect of the railway situation which the royal commission seems to have overlooked, that is the relationship between the railroads and the railway employees. I am aware that the railway employees are highly organized, that they are a very valuable element of our population, intelligent, industrious and law abiding; but the fact remains that the scale of wages and the operating rules under which they ply their trade are unusual and exceptional. If members of certain branches of the running trades drive an engine a hundred miles in a couple of hours they have done a day's work. If a crew is called out for a short time, again it is treated as if it had done a full day's work. I am not anxious to take away from the Canadian railway employee anything to which he is fairly entitled, but if this problem is as serious as we are told on all sides and as we have been told by the royal commission itself that it is, it seems to me that we shall have to scrutinize more closely the conditions of labour as well as those of the pay of that vast army of railway employees.

There are aspects of the bill which do not greatly appeal to me. The centralized power in a board of three trustees has elements of strength; it also has elements of peril. In a moment of stress and of emergency it may well be that a small and highly concentrated board of this type can render useful service. But one of the great ills of the years just passed has been the tendency to merge, centralize and concentrate, with the result that the outlying districts have been neglected for the big centres, the cities, with the consequence that the strong have become too strong and the weak have become weaker.

I fear that in this highly centralized organization there are possibilities of trouble which, in other times at least, should be avoided.

The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) made some reference to the fact that the president was supreme in the arbitral tribunal. I suggest to him that if he reads carefully clause 23 of the bill, he will see that it is only in certain cases that the assent of the presiding officer is necessary and, furthermore, that the criticism which he levelled at the president of the tribunal is not wholly justified, because it is stated in the next section to that to which he referred, that a majority of the tribunal shall determine its decisions.

But if there are some features of this bill which are not attractive to me, I feel impelled to support it for several reasons. In the first place, it embodies the result of an investigation by men who were eminently qualified to undertake it. True, it is an experiment; true, it invades or seems to invade private property and makes one wonder whether this is not the introduction of a system of state control which, if carried to extremes, might arouse severe controversy throughout the country. But it is a studied and serious attempt to meet the situation; it is an attempt by a government which is confronted by a multitude of problems, to meet the most serious of our financial difficulties. These are times when I believe a government should be upheld, steadied and supported, almost at any cost. I cannot foretell that the administration of this act will be unfair. Furthermore, this measure is put forward as a temporary means of meeting an emergency, and as such I shall support it, not gleefully, not cheerfully, not even hopefully, but under the dictates of duty, praying that it may do something to arrest the growth of debt resulting from the public ownership of our railways, and something to cure this running sore which has sapped our national life for the last ten years.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, there are a few observations I desire to make upon the second reading of this bill. I wish, however, to approach the question from a somewhat different angle than that from which it has been approached this afternoon. I have no desire whatever to go into the relative merits of public or private ownership. We find in those countries where the railways are entirely under private ownership they are in exactly the same, if not in a worse position than are our own. I have only to cite the condition of the railways in the United States and Great Britain to show that my statement in regard to public ownership is correct.

I am in agreement with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hackett) who has preceded me has said in regard to the canals of this country. According to a report recently submitted to the house, if we allow a certain amount for interest on capital expenditure on our canal systems, it will be found that the annual interest charges will amount to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $14,000,000, while the return for that expenditure is extremely limited.

The previous speaker has made a sort of veiled attack upon the situation of the men employed on our railways. The condition of most of those employees entitles them to a good deal of our sympathy and consideration. When it is realized that on the railroads of this country including the railway shops only from ten to sixteen days per month is being worked, and that the average wage of all men employed on our railroads from the top right down to the bottom is from 55 to 60 cents per hour, the hon. gentleman who preceded me will get some idea of the conditions at the present time amongst the men employed on the railway systems of this country.

With what the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) said in the house this afternoon I am happy to find myself largely in accord. I wish I could say the same regarding the address of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). I listened very attentively and with appreciation to the very able presentation he made of his case and to his very frank statement. There are just one or two observations I wish to make with reference to some of his statements, and first of all with regard to the character of the men who were appointed to the Duff commission to investigate the railway situation in this country.

The commission was composed of seven gentlemen, no doubt all very estimable in their own way. I find amongst them a lawyer, a doctor, a professor, a bank president, a financier, a gentleman from the United States and a gentleman from Great Britain. The Minister of Railways very frankly stated this afternoon that the appointments from Great Britain and the United States to that commission were made for the purpose of giving protection or representation to the investors in bonds and railway security holders residing in Great Britain and in the United States. Well, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to solve our problems in this country, as naturally I want to see them solved, I believe that we have sufficient intelligence within our own dominion to solve our problems without importing people from outside. In that respect I happen to be a very high protectionist; I believe in a Canada first policy.

But we have in this country a very large element which is also deeply interested in the railway problem. I refer to that vast element which is commonly called the labouring element, the men who work on our railways to the number of 175,000, and many others outside the direct employment of the railways, who received absolutely no representation on this commission. I feel that if the investors in the United States and Great Britain were entitled to representation on the commission because of the money interest, the human element, our own Canadian people, were just as much entitled to representation as were investors in railway securities in other parts of the world. While most of the commissioners did not consider the railway problem from what might be termed a party bias, I am satisfied that many of them did have a certain bias in a certain direction when considering this problem, and I believe that their bias was more in favour of the investors, bondholders and stockholders than in favour of the welfare and well-being of the people of this dominion. I remember meeting one of the commissioners for the first time in my life after the report had been made, and discussing it with him. I put this question to him. "You have considered this railway problem and made your recommendations, and no doubt as this process of cooperation goes on between the two railways large numbers of the employees will be eliminated from the services. What consideration I asked, did the commission give to that aspect of the question?" The answer was very simple. He said that they gave no consideration to that aspect of the question. When I pointed out that these men had given a great deal of service and endured sacrifices in helping to build up the railways of this country and asked what he was going to do with regard to the men who would be so unfortunate as to lose their positions, the only answer I could get from this gentleman who investigated the problem was that it was of course a most unfortunate situation, but nothing could be done.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I claim that the present situation in which our railways find themselves is due not directly to the policies of the government, present or past, but rather to the economic conditions prevailing throughout this country, and we are now proposing to pass emergency legislation in order to create a prosperous railway situation in this dominion amidst the present distressful economic conditions. Personally I do not think it is possible even with the economies that may be effected under this bill, to bring about a condition of affairs where the two great railways in Canada will be placed in what might be termed a prosperous condition.

The Minister of Railways claimed that the railway problem was the most important problem that we have to face at this particular time. I do not agree. I think that the greatest problem in this dominion that we have got to face at this time is the unemployment problem that is now before parliament. But assume for the sake of argument that in some way we even partially solved the railway problem; at what expense are we going to solve it? We could partially solve that problem only by adding to the vast numbers of those who are already unemployed in this dominion.

Mr. POULIOT: Both problems are connected.

Mr. HEAPS: I am quite ready to admit that there is a connection between the two, but if we are going to solve, or partially solve, the railway problem by intensifying the unemployment problem, our national problems would still be in relatively the same position as at present. Until we get down to a more fundamental basis and deal with the whole of our national life and solve our unemployment problem before we attempt to solve the railway problem, I can see no hope of our solving the railway problem. If the government is going to legislate in the interests of the railways to help them solve their problems, I have a right to ask the government that they should help to solve other national problems, and the first problem to which I would direct their attention is the unemployment problem.

Secondly, I would suggest that they do something to solve the farm problem, which is an extremely serious one in this country. I think that point was stressed by the Minister of Railways himself this afternoon when he pointed out that unless we have a prosperous farming community, particularly in the three prairie provinces, there is no hope practically of our national economic life being readjusted.

Furthermore, I think that when discussing these financial questions and other problems that we are asked to consider, our first consideration should not be the dollars and cents; but first consideration ought to be given to the human element which is the very backbone of this dominion. If the basis of cooperation suggested under this legislation is carried out by the railways of Canada, it is bound to mean abandoned rails and bridges, and a certain amount of abandoned equipment, but on all that abandoned equipment we shall have to continue to pay interest charges even though it may never be used again. On the other hand, I would point out that it will involve putting out on the streets, and adding to the number of those already unemployed, men who have worked on our railways during the best years of their lives, which they have given to building up the railways of this country. I point that out to show how differently we treat the owners of capital and the human element, our own people here in this dominion.

It was pointed out by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway that about 83 per cent of the securities of that railway are owned outside of this dominion. I do not know just what the proportion is in the case of the Canadian National, but if I am asked to choose between the interests of the men employed on the railways and the interests of the foreign bondholders, I am going to choose the interests of the men employed on the railways, and that is the difference between my attitude and that of those who have preceded me in considering the question that is now before the house.

Mr. POULIOT: This is a sound policy of Canada first.

Mr. HEAPS: A few weeks ago the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, speaking in the city of Winnipeg, made the following reference to those whom he represented. This was his statement, as it appears in a little pamphlet which I presume most hon. members have received and read:

> We cannot agree to turning over to an arbitrary body the conduct of our enterprise and the shaping of our policies, when, in the nature of things, the consequences must be borne by the shareholders. The views of those charged with the responsibility of protecting the enormous investment in the Canadian Pacific would not, in these circumstances, prevail. This is not regulation; it is the assumption of complete powers of administration without financial responsibility.

I am attempting to point out that the president of this large railway organization says, in effect, that in reality he is representing the security holders of that corporation. From my place in this house I prefer to represent the Canadian people as a whole who have no doubt a much larger interest in the Dominion of Canada than have any of the bond or policyholders of either of the two great Canadian railways.

In this bill, to a very large extent, we are being asked to cut down on services and personnel for the purpose of protecting the foreign security holders of our railways. That, in reality, is what the measure amounts to. I have no desire in any way to prevent people who have invested in this country from receiving the protection to which no doubt they are entitled. I believe however that I owe a duty to the people I represent in this house. Therefore unless there is some provision made in the bill which in some way will give protection to the men who may be affected by the proposals contained in the bill, I cannot say that I shall be disposed to support it.

I know there have been many economies effected in the administration of both railways. I realize fully that many of the men employed have been discharged, although some of those employees had been in the service of the railways for terms running up to twenty years. They have received no remuneration or consideration for the services they have rendered either to the railways or to the dominion. In connection with the bill however we find ourselves in a somewhat different position. By the legislation before us we would be putting into effect certain economies which would mean the displacing of large numbers of employees, and depriving them of positions which had previously enabled them to earn their livelihood. If this legislation is going to have the effect I have described, then I believe we ought also to see that they receive exactly the same protection as the bond and security holders. If we dismantle part of our railway system, the people who own the bonds of the dismantled parts will receive their interest charges on the debt guaranteed by the dominion. Why should not a human being be in as happy a position as a man who owns $2,000 worth of bonds. Yet by this legislation we may put thousands of men on the streets, men who have no prospect of being reabsorbed into industry.

I should like to suggest that if as a result of the legislation before us large economies are going to be effected on the railways, I feel a fairly large part of the moneys saved should be placed in a reserve fund. That fund could be augmented by a contribution from the state, and could be utilized to give relief to those men who have been displaced until such time as they can again be absorbed into industry. If such action were taken, I believe to a very large extent the hardship which would result from the legislation before us would be mitigated. I make that suggestion because with the legislation before us I believe we are in a position different from that in which we were previously. If no such legislation had been placed before the house by the government I have no doubt that the men affected by changes would be in the same position as men whose services had been dispensed with previously. Those men would be placed in the army of the unemployed. But now that the government is taking a hand in the situation I feel the first thing we ought to do is to make provision for the men who, as a result of the legislation, will no doubt in the very near future find themselves without the means of subsistence.

I feel that perhaps we are emerging into a new period in the history of our economic life. We see evidence of that around us every day. I do not have to point out what is taking place in Canada; we learn of what is taking place across the border line. If we are to solve the problems with which we are confronted, I do not believe we can solve one problem by creating another of greater magnitude. So in connection with the railways, we will not solve the railway problem if in doing so we create another army of unemployed. In the speech he made at Toronto Mr. Beatty pointed out that if all the railways were amalgamated they could get along with about seventy-five per cent of the present personnel. I know there is no talk about amalgamation; it is not proposed in the bill. However, I must say that at times the dividing line between cooperation and amalgamation is so very thin that distinction between the two is almost impossible. Of course, actually in the one instance there are two companies, and in the other only one. However, as far as the men employed are concerned the difference is not very great. It makes no difference whether a man on a railway loses his job through cooperation or amalgamation, he loses it just the same. So, if the prospects are that in the immediate future as a result of cooperation between the two railways 20,000 men will be let out, with no opportunity whatsoever of absorption into the economic life of the country, I think one of the first duties of parliament is to see that we take action which will prevent those people from becoming a burden not only upon themselves but upon the country as a whole.

Therefore in the observations I have made this afternoon, in the interests of our own Canadian people I express the hope that parliament will consider the possibility of additions to our unemployed army because, as I have previously stated, we will not solve our railway problem by simply adding to the great number of unemployed in our dominion.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations at this time, because I consider the measure before us the most important problem with which parliament will have to deal at this session. Because the railway position in Canada has reached such stupendous proportions and its effect on the body politic is so great, and because it bears so heavily upon the welfare of our country, I believe all who have studied the problem ought to give the very best consideration to the bill before the house.

In opening may I congratulate the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) on the very reasoned statement he has given to parliament and to the country. While I am no flatterer I think I can honestly say that the hon. gentleman has enhanced his reputation on the floor of this house by the deliverance which he made to-day. With practically all the statements that he has made we find ourselves in agreement. With the remarks of my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) I find myself also in agreement on nearly every point, the saving exception being his statement, as a strong believer in the principle of public ownership, that only believers in that principle should be found on the trustee board. I do not think that it would be the reasoned opinion of this country that only those should be appointed to this proposed board who have demonstrated that they are believers in that principle alone. May I say that many of the best businessmen in this country are not believers in the principle of public ownership, and if the position of the hon. member were maintained in that regard I think he would find that the limits within which to choose a trustee body would be very narrow indeed.

Mr. EULER: Oh no, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am only expressing my own opinion, as I assume he was. While we all know that he has been at all times a very earnest and consistent advocate of the principle of public ownership, yet he will give to those of us who do not agree with that principle the same liberty of private judgment which he claims for himself.

Before I proceed further with the discussion, and lest I forget it, I should like to congratulate the Senate upon having inserted in the bill a provision that is of very great importance to that portion of this dominion from which I come, namely the Atlantic coast; asking parliament once more to embody in the legislation of this country a requirement for which we from the Atlantic coast ports have been contending for many, many years, namely, that freight originating in Canada for export, when not otherwise stipulated by the shipper, should be routed through Canadian ports. That is a provision which if my memory serves me right is embodied in the National Transcontinental Railway Act, but which has been consistently ignored from that time almost to the present. If the embodiment of this principle will have the effect of satisfying the aspirations of our people in the ports of Saint John and Halifax, it will be an additional reason why I, at all events, will vote for this bill.

There is another thing which the Senate has done for which I commend it. I think, to the utter astonishment of every member of this house and, I believe, of a great many of the people of Canada, there was in the original bill a provision that no member of the House of Commons and no member of the Senate, speaking generally, would be eligible for the position of trustee. As far as I am concerned I never could understand for a moment why the Duff commission put that provision in their report.

Mr. EULER: An insult!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am not going to use that term, to say it was an insult to members of the House of Commons and the Senate, but I will say that, having been a member of this body for twelve years, and having met many men from different parts of the country, I believe there have been members of the House of Commons and of the Senate, and that there are members of the House of Commons and the Senate, who are quite as capable of performing the duties of trustee of this national railway as any of the business men of this country. When I say that I have not in mind any single individual, I am making the general statement, which I believe is founded on truth, that there are members of this house who are quite as capable of filling these positions as worthily as any citizens of this country.

Mr. JACOBS: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that perhaps the reason was that they did not want to lose the benefit of the outstanding abilities of the members of both houses of parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thank the hon. gentleman for the suggestion. But it is fashionable in Canada to invite outstanding citizens to become candidates for the House of Commons, men are sought for their ability, their standing in the communities in which they live, and then after they are elected they are sneered at as politicians. I resent that.

Mr. GRAY: Will the hon. member permit a question? How do you reconcile that with the legislation respecting the tariff board?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not in mind at the moment the legislation that the hon. member refers to, and I do not wish to be diverted from the line of thought I am trying to develop. I commend the Senate for what they have done in that regard.

This Duff commission was directly set up by the government of this country as a result of the report of the 1931 select standing committee on railways and shipping. I well recall the day when Sir Henry Thornton made the statement which he did in the spring of 1931 to that committee, of which I was then and had been for some years a member.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 41, to incorporate the Sarnia-Port Huron Vehicular Tunnel Company—Mr. Gray.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Manion for the second reading of Bill No. 37 respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just before the house rose for the dinner recess I was referring to that section of the original draft of the bill which has been deleted by the Senate, namely, the section containing the prohibition against the appointment of members of parliament, either of this house or of the Senate, as members of the board of trustees. I am glad that the Senate took that course, which has met with such universal approval at the hands of the members of this house.

Just before the dinner recess I was alluding to the birth of the Duff commission. In the session of 1931 Sir Henry Thornton made his recommendation to the special railway committee and brought down the suggestion of a commission to examine into the railway situation in Canada. I must confess that my first reaction at that time was that it was a vision of despair, on Sir Henry's part, of being able to deal adequately with the situation as it then presented itself; but as it was a constructive suggestion it met with the universal support of the members of the committee. and I believe the unanimous approval of the members of the house when the report was finally presented.

Now what is the underlying principle of the Duff report? The underlying conception of the report is that the utmost economy should be exercised in the management of this railway, and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this country, that that is the principle which the special railway committee dilated upon for two sessions and brought to the attention of the house and of the country; and if you will read the report of the special railway committee submitted in 1931 and again in 1932 you will observe that by unanimous consent of the committee and later by unanimous consent of the house that very principle was stressed. Yet, if you examine the Duff report from cover to cover, you will find not the slightest reference to the work of that committee, though I consider that the committee did very valuable work for the people of this country in laying the foundation and the basis of the Duff report. I am not peeved at that but I should like the country to know that as a direct result of the action of the special committee on railways, canals and shipping owned by Canada, and in consequence of the recommendations that were made, the directors of this company, given the proper cue and mandate from the House of Commons, have done valuable work in the direction of this very principle of economy in administration and in particular with respect to the principle of exercising economy in the management itself.

The Minister of Railways this afternoon gave some very interesting figures with regard to the elimination of surplus officers. I say that the mandate for that work was given by that special committee in 1931 and 1932. As to the personnel of the commission, as has been well pointed out, they were men of very high character. We heard some criticism this afternoon that a particular class in the country had not been represented. I do not think there is any basis for any charge to be laid against the commission in that respect. The members of the commission were selected for their ability and outstanding position in the country, and in my opinion the government was fortunate in getting men of such high character and ability, who were unselfish enough to devote their valuable time and attention to the consideration of this great problem. I happen to know some of these gentlemen personally. I know the gentleman who was appointed from the eastern provinces and I can assure the house that his greatest ambition in life is to render public service—and he is not looking for any emoluments or rewards or titles. He is a professional man and I believe he brought to bear upon the consideration of the problems that faced the commission ability of the highest character. I had the pleasure of an interview with him in very recent weeks and I am glad to be able to inform the house and the country that, as he tells me, in respect of no single recommendation made by them were the commission influenced, nor was it suggested to them, to make any particular recommendation on behalf of the administration or of any public men in this country. The report is solely the report of the commission, based on their observations and on the evidence adduced before them. We may take it for granted therefore, I think, that the report is representative of the very best judgment of which the men who composed the commission were capable, men who were representative of the best element in the community.

Some criticism has been made with regard to the appointment of a gentleman from Great Britain and another from the United States to serve on the commission. I have not the honour of the acquaintance of either of these gentlemen, but we do know that Lord Ashfield is a man of worldwide reputation in transportation matters, and Mr. Loree was one of the most outstanding railway representatives in the neighbouring republic. I say therefore without fear of successful contradiction that no commission of this kind would have been complete had it not included experts in the transportation business. It has been said that Lord Ashfield was named on the commission because of the large quantity of Canadian Pacific securities held on the other side. That may well be; but I suggest that the underlying reason for his appointment was the fact that he was an expert in transportation, and it is on that basis and because of that fact that we ought to give the utmost consideration to any recommendations which he had to make at that time, and not because he represents any particular class.

With the exceptions I have noted, the bill as drafted follows very largely the report of the commission. Aside from stressing the principle of economy, I think the most outstanding feature of the report is the recommendation made in explicit terms that there shall be no amalgamation of the two great national railways. With that recommendation I am in wholehearted accord. I do not say that amalgamation will never come; if economic conditions continue as they are it is just possible that we may be forced into that position, but I say to the government and to the members of this house that the people of this country are fearful of monopoly of any kind, and particularly of a railway monopoly. It must be remembered that we have only two lines of railways and the people will not accept amalgamation unless such a course is needed to save the credit of the country itself. I congratulate the commission upon this outstanding recommendation in its report and I believe the members of this house will support that recommendation almost one hundred per cent.

I read with a great deal of interest the recent speech made by Mr. Beatty, for whom I have the greatest respect. I do not know him at all intimately, but I have read his utterances from time to time and they have always appealed to me as the utterances of a sound Canadian, one who believes in Canada and above all in the future success and prosperity of his own company. However, I must say that the impression left upon my mind by Mr. Beatty's last address was that it was the utterance of a defeatist. I hope that that is not the case; I hope that Mr. Beatty still has the courage which characterized him as a young man when he took over the position of chairman of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

An hon. MEMBER: And his predecessors.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, and his predecessors, who were all great Canadians. I trust he will go on even though he may think that he is being hampered to a degree in the administration and control of his own company. I hope he will go on and make of the Canadian Pacific the great success which its past history warrants. I have always felt in the past that the standing and credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway was the standing and credit of Canada in the eyes of the nations of the world, and I should be sorry to see anything done by this parliament which would impair that standing in any degree. It must be apparent to those who have read the report of the commission, to those who have studied the evidence and to those who have made the observations possible to be made in the years immediately past, that the Canadian Pacific has not been above criticism with respect to the capital expenditures it has made from time to time. I do not intend to particularize or to allocate any blame; it may well be that, as has been said, they were forced into this position because of the very keen competition of the Canadian National Railway. I do not see that any useful purpose is to be gained by threshing old straw. We are confronted with a serious situation and we should give to the problems now confronting us our very best thought, irrespective of the past and irrespective of where the blame may lie.

Part I of the bill deals with the setting up of a new system of control. This has been likened to a receivership, but in my humble opinion as a legal man, the analogy is not exact. There can be no such thing as a legal receivership in connection with the Canadian National Railways, having regard to the fact that the country has guaranteed the securities of that company. In my opinion, the new setup means a new system of directorship. In so far as it reduces the number of directors from the large number which now obtains and has obtained ever since the company was formed, I think the new proposal will be an advantage. Heretofore the directors have been appointed upon geographical grounds. We are a country necessarily provincial in character; if anyone does not believe that all he has to do is to look at the map of Canada which shows an area three thousand miles long by three hundred miles wide. The interests of one section of the country cannot coincide with the interests of another. The history of the past ten years has taught us that we should, as far as possible, avoid sectionalism, but when we come to apply the principle of sectional representation to the administration of a great business such as the Canadian National Railways, I am afraid we will have to admit that while a great deal depends upon the character and calibre of the men appointed as directors, the principle itself is not sound. I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) who on more than one occasion has expressed himself along these lines.

I want it understood that I am expressing my own opinion when I say I doubt very much if a board of three directors will prove to be sufficient, considering the huge problems of finance and of administration which have to be dealt with, not to speak of the problems of operation which will have to be concentrated around the executive officers of the company. Such a board must consider the huge ramifications of the company and its many subsidiaries, and I suggest that a board of five would come nearer to meeting the needs. Again I say I want it understood that this is my own personal opinion. I do not think these men can be selected because of geographical reasons. For the first year I venture to say that their daily burden will be excessive and that they will have to bring to bear all the ability at their command in order to obtain an adequate working knowledge of the many problems confronting the company. I venture to say that it will take at least twelve months for this new board to learn the ramifications of the company and its subsidiaries. I know that the present board of directors were in office at least twelve months before they were able to perform any useful functions in connection with the administration of the road. Once they felt their feet under them, once they had obtained an adequate working knowledge of the problems confronting them, in my humble judgment they did excellent work for the people of Canada. Much of the economy to which the Minister of Railways referred this afternoon has been the result of hard, diligent work on the part of the present board.

Another feature of the bill is the provision in part II that the president shall be the supreme authority, or, as some people have termed it, shall be a dictator. To say the least, that is not democracy. Under the provisions of this part the president of the board is to have supreme authority. It may work out all right—much would depend upon the character, calibre, integrity and ability of the chairman. Personally I do not just know where such a superman is going to be found, though it may be possible.

Mr. SANDERSON: There is only one superman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, he is a superman; let the hon. member make no mistake about that. I understand the allusion of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), and the Canadian people ought to thank God that in these days of stress we have a superman. I venture to suggest that after what happened in the United States last week and what is happening now, the people of that country are thankful that they have a superman. I quite understand the jibe that lies under the remark of the hon. member, and I make this observation in all seriousness and with the best of good faith, that the people of Canada are to be congratulated that there is a superman in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Ecce homo!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): with respect to the principle of amalgamation, some reference has been made by the hon. member for North Waterloo to the deletion of a clause or phrase in one of the sections, I think it is section 16, subsection 2, as regards the amalgamation of certain Canadian National railway companies. If I understand the report correctly, it expressly negatived the doctrine of amalgamation; the references in the bill as originally drawn were to the amalgamation of subsidiary service companies of the Canadian National railways, and on the principle of a thing not being negatived in an act of parliament until there is a positive assertion of a right or principle and to clarify the position, that clause was stricken out. If, however, we are wrong in our construction of the statute as drafted, by all means let us put the clause back, because I believe the Canadian people want that in the bill if there is any danger that there ever should be amalgamation under this or any other act. While I am speaking of amalgamation, let me say that the party on this side of the Speaker are committed right up to the hilt against a policy of amalgamation and I stand for my party's policy. Unless conditions become so bad that there is no alternative course, I believe we still adhere and should adhere to that principle, for the reasons I have attempted to adduce.

Part II of the bill deals with the principle of cooperation as suggested in the Duff report. Someone has described that as the expression of a pious wish. I think it is something more than that, because we all know that unless there is cooperation between these two railways and a cessation of the expensive competition that has prevailed for a number of years past, the condition cannot continue. Someone has said that you cannot kiss and fight at the same time. That is a true statement of fact, but there must be a cessation of fighting and that is what I think the commission had in mind when they made those recommendations of coordination. There cannot be coordination of these railways without someone being hurt. I certainly do not view with any great complacency the closing down of lines of railway in my community, and I do not suppose any other hon. member views with any degree of complacency that sort of thing in his; but where there are competitive lines, surely something can be done in that regard with respect to trackage and mileage. I do not, however, think that is what the commission had particularly in mind. They had in mind the coordination of the use of terminals. I am thinking of a little town in New Brunswick where three separate railways are functioning; the National system, the Pacific system and a little branch line called the Temiscouata in Edmundston. They maintain three separate stations, three separate freight houses, three separate terminals, and there is not a stone's throw between the Pacific railway station and that of the Temiscouata. Yet there is a multiplicity of officials and services there.

Mr. VENIOT: And the town is interlaced with level crossings.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, and the town is interlaced with level crossings so that human life is always in danger at that point. It is the elimination of that sort of thing that the Duff commission had in mind when they made their report.

There is no doubt the bill gives authority to the board, in the case of arbitration, to deal with many different matters. If hon. members will refer to subsection 3 of section 17, they will notice that, without restriction of the terms previously used, a large number of specific matters are set out which may be the subject of arbitration in case of disagreement between the two systems. They are: joint use of terminals; running rights and joint use of tracks; control and prohibition in respect of the construction of new lines; joint use of facilities; abandonment of lines, services or facilities, and the pooling of any part or parts of freight traffic or of passenger traffic. It will, I think, be of the utmost value in solving the financial aspect of the problem if full use is made of the authority given by this bill, and because of that particular object in the bill I intend to vote for its second reading.

One would think—and this brings me to the third part of the bill—that sensible men, without any coercion or compusion, would see the necessity of coordination and cooperation in view of declining revenues and the failure to earn fixed charges. I had hoped and I still believe if the officers of these two railways were left alone, they would work out a very large measure of cooperation, but just because human nature is so frail and some of us are beset with vanity, it may be that they would not do what they ought to do. So the commission decided that there had to be compulsion.

Mr. POWER: May I ask the hon. member a question just to get his viewpoint? Is be aware of the fact that the bill provides for compulsion only when there is a dispute?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite agree.

Mr. POWER: In my view, there are not enough teeth in the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have given a good deal of thought to this particular phase of the bill. It has been argued, and in fact moved in another house, that the application of this principle of compulsion should be suspended in order to give the two groups of officers an opportunity to function along these lines. I am afraid we shall have to adopt the principle of compulsion, because the end in view is so absolutely necessary that there will have to be a board of arbitration in case of dispute to have it settled.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the hon. member think you can have cooperation and compulsion at the same time?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think you can have cooperation and compulsion over the same subject matter, but this is a case where voluntary cooperation fails and there still exists the necessity of doing something.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Supposing the voluntary compulsion fails, and then they go before this arbitral board which gives a decision against one of the companies. Will that company ever go before that board again?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have heard that argument before. If the necessity arises, of course they will go before the board. A man resorts to litigation once and gets licked but that does not cure him or stop him from going to litigation again. If it did, God help the lawyers! I do not agree with the contention of my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Beaubien). The worst feature about part III of the bill, or the strongest argument that has been made against it, is that it is an interference with the private rights of property, and unquestionably there is a great deal of force in that contention. But because the Duff commission investigated the matter so thoroughly; because the other house investigated it so thoroughly and heard evidence on that point, and because the arguments adduced in support of the position taken in this bill were so strong, I do not think there is any alternative for us but to adopt it.

To my mind the question resolves itself to this: Is the instrument set up in this bill a proper instrument? I am bound to tell this house that at first I had every sympathy with those who sought to have the Board of Railway Commissioners substituted for the arbitral board here proposed. But with all the information that I have been able to obtain, this is the conclusion I have come to—and may I say that I am speaking for myself alone: With the railway commission as it is at present constituted, and with the tendency to delegate to it from time to time new authority, new powers, and new functions, I am afraid that we are going to build up in this country something similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States. Anybody who has studied the history of the Interstate Commerce Commission will have noted that while it started from small beginnings, to-day it is clothed with functions which hamstring the administration of the railways in the United States, and I do not desire, so far as my vote is concerned, to substitute any such body as that for dealing with disputes between the two railway companies such as are visualized in this bill. That is my considered judgment on the subject. I would ask hon. members who have other views to study the history of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if they do, and get a true picture, I think they will come to pretty nearly the same conclusion as that which I have reached—that we do not want to set up in this country a dictatorship covering a multiplicity of subject matters such as is covered by the statutes of the United States relating to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Finally, will the present bill be a cure-all for the railway ills of this country? I do not think it will. This bill is simply another stage in the railway history of this country. It is like prohibition or government control of the liquor traffic, which is not by any means the final word in liquor legislation. Nor is this the final word in railway legislation in this country. But because we are confronted with a situation, because this house gave authority to the government to delegate to a commission of high standing and high character the investigation of this subject, and because that commission studied the question and the very best brains of the country were brought to bear upon the problem with all the information that was at their command, I believe we ought, and I think the country will expect us, to give effect to the major principles underlying the report of that commission. It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that I intend to vote for the second reading of the bill.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) will pardon me if I do not follow him in all the remarks he has made this evening, but a little later I shall refer to one or two specific matters which were mentioned by the hon. member.

I should like to join with other members who have taken part in this discussion in congratulating the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) on the very interesting and able speech he made to the house this afternoon. I know he will pardon me when I say to him that there were times during his speech when we hardly recognized him, especially when he referred to the effect on the revenues caused by the existing trade barriers which had been erected. I could almost, but not quite visualize the return of the prodigal son.

Mr. MANION: I said world trade barriers.

Mr. GRAY: I feel sure also that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) will pardon me when I say I cannot follow him in his suggestion that we should slavishly support the government at all costs, and that therefore we must support this bill. And in certain of the remarks I am about to make I cannot follow my esteemed friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). Be that as it may, I feel it is the duty of everyone who has given some consideration to this bill to speak his mind upon it and to present his views to the house.

The bill, as has been stated, is the outcome of the recommendations of the Duff commission which was appointed by this government. The hon. Minister of Railways, as have other hon. members, referred at some length to that report. I intend to touch upon one feature of it, and to say to the house that I would have had a great deal more confidence in the report of the Duff commission had I not read under section 187 its finding with reference to the effect of waterways upon railway transportation in this country. The commission state as follows:

> Water-borne traffic will continue to be a factor of major importance in Canadian transportation both on the inland waterways and coastwise through the Panama canal, but rail traffic has in the main been adjusted to the conditions now existing and it does not seem probable that the developments now under way and in contemplation in connection with the Hudson's Bay route, and the deepening of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes canals, will seriously prejudice the position of the railways in the future.

I wish entirely to dissociate myself from that view, because I believe that the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterways will seriously affect the railway situation in this country.

With the main features of Bill A now before the house I entirely agree. One cannot but commend the effort to effect economies in every way possible at this time. Having said that, it is necessary to examine this bill from other points of view in order to see just how these economies are proposed to be made effective.

It has been stated in another place that the first three lines of the bill reading, "An act respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes," constitute the preamble of the bill, and that having adopted the preamble it means that we have stated openly and publicly that we are against amalgamation of the two systems, or to put it another way, against unified management. I submit, Mr. Speaker, and I shall attempt to show to this house, that the separate identity of these two roads is one in name only.

I have said that anyone giving consideration to the railway situation must be impressed with the need for economies. But are these economies to be effected not only at the expense of the roads but with a total disregard of the humane interests in the roads and in the public service of this country? For several months now we have been deluged with propaganda emanating from the Canadian Pacific Railway, from the president of the road down, pressing upon the Canadian people the thought of amalgamation. I say in all sincerity that I believe the Canadian people would have been much better satisfied had the speech which the Minister of Railways made this afternoon, in which he commended the work of that railway system, been made a few months ago. It is unfortunate that the minister reserved this speech until the bill is about to be enacted into law. The statements he made to-day would have had a settling effect upon the minds of the committee and the people of Canada generally, had they been made a few months ago.

The condition in which we find ourselves with respect to railway financing, and transportation finances generally, is not a new one. At the very outset of the regime of my respected leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he took office in 1922 following the general election of 1921, he found a somewhat similar situation. In the very first speech from the throne of his term of office, in the session of 1922, we find these words:

> The transportation system weighs heavily upon our national finances.

And it does to-day. Then he went on to say:

> But public ownership will be given a fair trial.

Is there anyone here to-night who will deny that public ownership was given a fair trial from 1921 to 1930 during the years of the King administration.

Mr. McGIBBON: It was not.

Mr. GRAY: Is there anyone who will deny that during that period there was built up in this country a marvellous railway system of which the Canadian people may justly be proud? During that period large capital expenditures were made. The preservation of the identity of the system has been pledged not only by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) but by the leader of the opposition.

An hon. MEMBER: Keep politics out of it.

Mr. GRAY: When I hear hon. members opposite say we must keep politics out of the discussion, I am reminded that since we last met in this house hon. members opposite have gone up and down this country hurling a tirade of abuse at the administration of the Canadian National Railways. I shall present for their edification, if for that of no one else, some of the statements of hon. members opposite who, under normal conditions, took a saner view of the situation. In that connection I shall refer to a speech made by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in the budget debate of 1929. At page 743 of Hansard of that year he is reported as follows:

> In respect, however, to the national railway we on this side of the house are all optimists. We look upon that railway as practically our own infant and our own creature.

Then at page 745 we find the following:

> Now, when this wonderful Canadian National railway system has more than justified itself, now, that it is rapidly becoming in the nature of a great national asset, now that we may look forward to a day, not perhaps in my lifetime, but in the lifetime of some here, when this system will start repaying the government of Canada part at least of the money it owes to the treasury, to the day when it will have a clean sheet, as it ultimately will have, in regard to its bonded indebtedness to the public; now that the system is in this, a thoroughly prosperous condition, this government desires to treat it as its own creature.

When the Minister of Justice referred to "this government" he referred to the government of my right hon. leader. The minister continues:

> Whereas in 1919 it tried to cast it out as base-born now it wants to consider it as its legitimate offspring, and to profit by its success. Let me say, in concluding my remarks on this phase of the subject, that the national railway system in this country constitutes a lasting monument—

I know hon. gentlemen opposite will applaud this statement.

> —a lasting monument to the ability and statesmanship and determination of a single man, a member of a former Conservative government, and subsequently Prime Minister of that government. It is to his ability and foresight, to his statesmanship and determination that the people of Canada are indebted for this wonderful system of national railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He was chief pallbearer.

Mr. GRAY: The same right hon. gentleman to whom the minister referred, the leader of the government in another place, takes the child now full grown and leads it gently to a courtship with another, while this government looks about it for the dictator who will tie the knot.

As has been said, the bill is divided into three parts. Part I deals with the reorganization of the national railways, part II with authorization of and direction for cooperation; and part III provides for the tribunal which is to be set up to compel cooperation. I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury that it is hard to reconcile the terms "compulsory" and "cooperation." Much has been said about part III of the bill. In the debate which took place in another place I believe the main opposition was directed against that part. Here again I may differ from some of my colleagues when I venture the opinion that parts I and II, and not part III, constitute the dangerous elements in the bill.

In effect, part I makes five changes. First, there is provision for the reduction in the board of directors from seventeen to three. Here again I shall follow the hon. member for York-Sunbury when I state that in my view the directorate should not consist of three but of five full time men, one of whom should represent labour. The second provision is for a continuous audit by independent auditors; third, that the president of the road shall no longer be chairman of the board of directors; fourth, that the bond issue, which has been mentioned, will now be made direct by parliament instead of by the railways themselves, and guaranteed by parliament. The fifth provision is for the absolute dissociation of the government from any control whatsoever over the road.

As to the general principles in Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 I have no complaint. As has been mentioned to-night, all these matters were discussed by the special committee on railways and shipping, and while not all of the conditions I have outlined were brought in as recommendations of that committee, some at least were brought in and the others were approved in committee. We did not need an expensive commission to bring in these recommendations; that could have been done simply by amending the Canadian National Railways Act. I believe the hon. member for York-Sunbury has said that there is no mention whatever of the work of the committee. I find, however, that that is not the case. The criticism is made that the special committee on railways and shipping is not a necessity and should not again be set up.

I shall deal now with the provision that the board of directors be reduced from seventeen to three. I have said that in my view it should be reduced to only five, but I shall be content to discuss the bill as it appears before me. Only the chairman is full time and in him, as has been stated, is vested virtually the power of a dictator. Why do I say that? Because under section 11 (2) of the bill we find that:

> The trustees may decide or act at meetings only by unanimous vote or by majority which includes the chairman.

We have heard this afternoon some suggestions as to what a chairman should be. There are those who say: We must trust the chairman; we must feel and know that he will have the interests of the road and of the country at heart; therefore we should not take any other stand with respect to that matter. We are now discussing not a recommendation of the commission, but the adoption of the cold legal phraseology of this bill. It is not what we may think should happen, it is what is permitted under this bill that I propose to discuss. Others will say: But surely the Minister of Railways or his successor will have something to say with respect to the administration? I say not. This is a government road, the people of Canada are the shareholders, and a cabinet has been elected to represent the shareholders. Under the act as far as I can see the Minister of Railways is mentioned only once. Section 15 states that the annual reports of the trustees and the auditors respectively shall be submitted to parliament through the Minister of Railways. He becomes a mere messenger of the Canadian National board of trustees, to place upon the table of this house the annual report of these trustees and of the auditors for the time being. From the point of view of economy that may be all right; we can close the minister's office to-morrow when this bill is enacted and save the people $15,000 a year. That may be economy, but it is not responsible government. I will refer to that again.

But before leaving this part let me refer to the manner in which the government proposes to fill vacancies created in this office. The first three directors are appointed by order in council. Any vacancies that may occur are to be filled from a panel of eight, and those picking the panel consist of the president of the exchequer court, the chief commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the remaining trustee. I hope I may be pardoned when I say that in my opinion this government, having created this board, are seeking to perpetuate their nominees thereon. Why do I say that? I say it because, as I have shown, two of the trustees appointed for seven years form part of this selecting committee, and the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, an appointee of this government, is one; and I say that this government, knowing that it is going to be in office for only a year, or a short time at best, seeks to perpetuate their appointees upon the people of Canada.

Having set up this machinery, what is proposed by part II of the bill? Let us look at section 16 and see what is possible under it. The hon. member for York-Sunbury and others have said: "No amalgamation." But what I want to point out is that under the powers given to this board, perhaps not amalgamation in the sense of one line being taken over holus-bolus by the other, but under that section piecemeal, this can be accomplished. Section 16 of part II says that the national company—defining it—and the Pacific company——are, for the purposes of effecting economies and providing for more remunerative operation, directed to attempt forthwith to agree and continuously to endeavour to agree, and they respectively are, for and on behalf as aforesaid, authorized to agree, upon such cooperative measures, plans and arrangements as are fair and reasonable and best adapted (with due regard to equitable distribution of burden and advantage as between them) to effect such purposes.

That is a general clause. Then subsection 2 says:

Without restricting the generality of the foregoing, any such measures, plans or arrangements may include and be effected by means of—

(a) new companies controlled by stock ownership. . . .

I submit that under that clause if the board of trustees deemed it necessary they could set up a holding company absolutely separate and apart from these two separate identities—

Mr. McGIBBON: That would be betrayal of trust.

Mr. GRAY: Perhaps so, but I am reading the bill as I see it. Subsection 2 says further:

(b) leases, entrusting agreements, or licences, or agreements for the pooling and division of earnings arising from the joint operation of any part or parts of freight or passenger traffic. . . .

(c) joint trackage, running rights, joint ownership, or joint operating agreements, depending upon the nature of the property or services included in any cooperative plan.

Let me read (c) putting my own interpretation upon the powers given to this trustee board. Not joint, but "amalgamated" trackage, "amalgamated" running rights, "amalgamated" joint ownership, or "amalgamated" operating agreements—

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend puts in the word "amalgamated." I think he should make it clear that it is not in the act.

Mr. GRAY: I did, I said that is my own interpretation. And then they could at the end of a year bring in an annual report saying that for the purpose of effecting economies we have deemed it advisable to amalgamate this and that.

Then let me point out that under subsection 3—

All or any of such measures, plans and arrangements may, if agreed to by the parties, be made terminable at will, or on or after stated notice, or for a fixed period or periods or any combination thereof. . . .

In other words, if they think it desirable they can do exactly what president Beatty has been urging this country to do, lease to the Canadian Pacific such portions of the road as they deem advisable for a period of ninety-nine years, and the Minister of Railways as I see it cannot do a thing about it. That to my mind is one of the main dangers of this bill.

Let us contrast for a moment the powers given under the Canadian National Railways Act with respect to the same matters. I will be very brief; I do not even intend to read the section. Under the Canadian National Railways Act of 1927, chapter 172, revised statutes of Canada, 1927, the side note of section 23 is:

Power to abandon line, and dismantle or dispose thereof by consent.

And the section reads:

With the approval of the governor in council, and upon the recommendation of the Board of Railway Commissioners, the company may abandon the operation of any lines or parts of lines.

And section 24:

With the approval of the governor in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Railways and Canals . . .

Agreements may be entered into. Before I close I intend to submit a point in connection with that.

Mr. HEENAN: What about section 6?

Mr. GRAY: I admit that abuses have crept in; they are bound to creep in. But it was not with respect to matters over which we are now giving power to this dictator or this board that the abuses crept in. If we as a people are to have government ownership, then let the government of the day take responsibility. If the time has come that we must have one man operation or a dictator of this road, then I am going to take the responsibility of saying that as far as I personally am concerned, I am ready to take the Minister of Railways right now instead of some outside man whom we do not know. I refuse to take that leap in the dark and to give to someone outside these powers over which we as members of parliament or the Minister of Railways cannot have control.

These trustees, may I say, can be removed not by the governor in council but under section 7 only for cause. Section 7 says:

No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

How much control has this parliament or the government of the day over this dictator that you are about to appoint?

Before I turn for a moment to part III I wish to discuss briefly one section in particular, and I know that in doing so I shall be treading on the toes of some hon. gentlemen from the maritime provinces. Nevertheless I think it should be pointed out at this time to the government and to the people that in subsection 2 of section 14 of this bill there is—to my mind at any rate—an absolute political sop to the maritimes. I note that the hon. member for York-Sunbury is all for the bill on the ground of economy; he hails it as a great measure because it will effect large economies in the conduct of the railways. But immediately he turns round and commends the government for having in the bill the following provision:

The trustees shall so direct, provide and procure that all freight destined for export by sea which is consigned within Canada for carriage to national railways either at point of origin or between that and the sea shall, unless it has been by its shippers specifically routed otherwise, be exported through Canadian seaports.

That subsection is placed in the section dealing with the annual report to parliament. It has no relation whatsoever to the preceding part of the section but is put in there in the hope that it will not be noticed and will slip through. Let us see what will be the operation of economies in respect of that section. The distance from Montreal to Halifax—I am using this illustration because the freight rate is exactly the same—is eight hundred miles, whereas the distance from Montreal to Portland is two hundred and ninety-six miles, though as I say the freight rate is exactly the same in both cases. But unless the shipper, who does not care which route is followed inasmuch as the rates are the same, specifically directs to the contrary, we must under this bill, this economy measure, ship the long haul down to Halifax; and I have been informed by the railways that the operating costs are approximately proportionate to the mileage. When therefore hon. gentlemen are protesting against talking politics I think it behooves them to read subsection 2 of section 14 of the bill.

As regards part III, I have simply this to say. I doubt very much that it will ever come into effect, but if it does then I say that it must give the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) rather a jolt to find that his resolution with respect to the commonwealth federation has now become a government measure in the form of a bill which permits the confiscation of private property. I imagine that this house little thought that such a proposal would be introduced by the Minister of Railways. I have said that it may never operate, but if it does one finds this thought uppermost—we found it before and it is not new—namely, the placing in the hands of one man of the power of absolute control. Why do I say that? I say that for this reason: Ostensibly there are three, one to be chosen from the Canadian Pacific and another from the Canadian National; but who will give the deciding judgment of the board? Another superman. As someone has said in this house, there is certainly no room for three supermen in this country, and if we are to have an arbitrary board then I submit that we should have a board of railway commissioners, as suggested by my hon. friend from North Waterloo, a board tried in matters pertaining to railways and with precedents to follow; but certainly I am not in favour of placing this matter in the hands of one man.

In conclusion I would ask the house this question: Are the Canadian National Railways protected by this proposed legislation? I think I have shown that while there are advantages they are far outweighed by the disadvantages, especially when we could bring about these advantages that have been mentioned by simply amending the Canadian National Railway Act. In my opinion this bill which is now before us is a far cry from the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in Winnipeg in 1930. What did the right hon. gentleman say, speaking in Winnipeg at the time he introduced his campaign? These were his words:

Here this night, speaking as I am to more than a million of my fellow-countrymen, I say to you that no man in this country rejoices more in the strength and progress of the Canadian National enterprise than I—made possible as it was in the first instance by the genius of our own statesmen and by the passing of legislation by our own party. But, more, more, every effort of mine after July 28 will be for one purpose: That purpose is to preserve not only the identity of the Canadian National Railways as a publicly owned competitor of a private enterprise, but to see that it serves even better and more effectively the Canadian people, who are so proud of it.

And more, I say that if you see any attempt on my part at any time to violate that pledge I give you here and now, then ask for my resignation—insist upon it—for I love my country and what it has done, and one of its greatest achievements has been the development of this great national transportation system of which I believe every Canadian is proud.

Amalgamation? Never. Competition? Ever. That is the policy for which I stand.

Will the government through their minister now undertake that when this bill reaches committee of the whole they will incorporate in it not simply a section such as was read this afternoon with respect to amalgamation, but a real section with teeth in it making certain that that will not be effective? Will they give an assurance that they will not dissociate themselves absolutely from some form of governmental control under this particular measure? If they will do that and accept some measure of responsibility then I am prepared to support them; if not, then with great reluctance I must vote against the second reading of this bill.

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): I am sure the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) will pardon me if I do not follow him in the address which he has just delivered. Frankly, I prefer to follow the example set by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and attempt to discuss the bill before the house in an entirely non-political attitude.

First, may I congratulate the minister on the very able address which he delivered this afternoon, indicating the most careful preparation and consideration to the end that the house might fully view this great problem which faces Canada to-day. May I say to the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gray) that while I do not believe that this bill is perfect, I still think that if it receives the approval of the house the excerpts which he read from the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in 1930 will be just as true as they were at that time. If I thought for one moment that this bill had for its object the amalgamation, merger or unification of the Canadian National with the Canadian Pacific, I would at once oppose it. However, I do not think that this is the intention of the bill. One feels almost like apologizing to the house for speaking upon this bill after hearing the very able addresses which have been delivered and which cover the subject so thoroughly; nevertheless there are one or two features to which I would like to direct the attention of hon. members, more particularly with the intention of explaining my viewpoint with respect to part III which deals with compulsory cooperation. Perhaps I shall be pardoned if I refer briefly to the earlier history of the railroads in this country.

The Duff report has covered quite thoroughly the history of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, and hon. members are so familiar with the subject that I hesitate going into details. There seems to be a feeling that the Canadian National Railways is a failure in public ownership. I am not an apostle of public ownership, but I think hon. members will agree with me when I say that the Canadian National railway system as we have it in Canada cannot be considered as a true test of public ownership.

An hon. MEMBER: I hope not.

Mr. BOWMAN: Quite true. If one looks back at the early history of railways in this country it will be remembered that in the early twenties a conglomeration of systems which had either failed or become insolvent were taken over by the government for the purpose of saving the credit of the country. According to the Duff report, the Canadian National railway system owns and operates 23,880 miles of railway, while the Canadian Pacific owns and operates 16,886 miles. If the mileage of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental, totalling approximately 5,000, is deducted from the total mileage of the Canadian National, the mileage of the two great railway systems will be found to be about the same. It must be borne in mind that the third transcontinental system which was built was bankrupt and insolvent from the very beginning. In western Canada it paralleled the old Canadian National, while in eastern Canada it went through a great deal of country which never has proved to be profitable from a railroad standpoint. The Intercolonial was built not as a money making proposition but to fulfil one of the pledges of confederation. These different links were taken over not as money making propositions but for the purposes just mentioned.

A great deal has been said and continues to be said with respect to the expenditures made on the Canadian National railway system. Far be it from me to say that a great deal of this expenditure has not been wasteful and extravagant, but I should like hon. members to remember that when these different systems were taken over most of them were in a bankrupt condition. The Grand Trunk Pacific—National Transcontinental paralleled for hundreds of miles the transcontinental system which was made up of the old Canadian Northern in the west and the Grand Trunk in the east. This system had a dearth of branch lines and immense sums of money had to be spent to bring the road up to standard. Equipment had to be furnished, terminals had to be looked after, heavier steel had to be purchased, grading had to be attended to and bridges had to be built; a great many expenditures had to be made if these railroads which had been taken over were to be developed into one great system.

The history of the Canadian Pacific is entirely different. This company started out as a private concern and entered into business for the purpose of making money. It started out with large land grants, and at no time in its career has it been a system which was competing with its own lines. When one considers the past history of these two systems, it must be borne in mind that the Canadian Pacific has always been a single, unified and compact system. I make this reference to the two railway systems in order to meet the attitude adopted by Mr. Beatty in the addresses he made at Winnipeg and Toronto as well in the statement made before the Duff commission. At that time he is reported as follows:

> I am not criticizing them (Canadian National Railways) . . . we met it (the competition) as best we could. I do not think we overdid it, we tried not to.

On page 33 of the proceedings of the Senate committee, Mr. Beatty is reported as having said:

> The course pursued by the Canadian Pacific was defensive and not aggressive and throughout the period it used every effort to discourage and limit unnecessary expenditures for competitive purposes.

In other words, Mr. Beatty represented that the Canadian National system was responsible for the extravagant and wasteful expenditures of the Canadian Pacific. With all due respect to Mr. Beatty, I think he is overstating the facts to a very considerable degree. Large expenditures were necessary by the Canadian National for the building up of its system, and the Canadian Pacific, seeing that they had real opposition, seeing that real money was being spent by its competitor, embarked upon extravagant expenditures in order to keep just one step ahead of their competitor. As a matter of fact, the whole history of the Canadian Pacific right down from the early days of the Grand Trunk in the east and the Canadian Northern in the west has been that of keeping just one step ahead of their competitors. After all, that is sound business if you do not carry it too far. This competition, which began to reach a very serious stage probably in 1926 and 1927, was continued to great lengths by the establishment of super de luxe passenger service, speed passenger trains, speed freight and competition of a similar nature throughout the whole of Canada, by the building of hotels, by the construction of playgrounds and similar expenditures. But I would have the house bear this in mind, that the Canadian Pacific Railway did not lag behind the Canadian National; in fact, in many instances it embarked upon more extravagant expenditures than did the Canadian National. At the end of December, 1931, the Canadian National had invested in hotels $31,000,000, odd; but the Canadian Pacific at that date had an investment in hotels of $71,000,000, odd. During the period from 1923 to 1931 the Canadian National had constructed and acquired 2,545 miles of branch lines, while during the same period the Canadian Pacific had constructed and acquired 2,473 miles of branch line. But that does not tell the whole story. In respect to the statement made before the committee by Mr. Beatty that they met competition as best they could and were upon the defensive, Mr. Fairweather of the Canadian National bureau of economics placed before the commission a table showing the branch line competition in western Canada from 1916 to 1930. I should like to place upon Hansard Mr. Fairweather's statement, which is as follows:

> In this period: the Canadian National built lines serving 3,570 square miles of territory.
> The Canadian Pacific built lines serving 10,375 square miles of territory.
> The Canadian National penetrated into Canadian Pacific territory, undeveloped but definitely earmarked for the Canadian Pacific railway to the extent of 100 square miles.
> The Canadian Pacific railway penetrated into Canadian National territory, undeveloped but definitely earmarked for the Canadian National, to the extent of 4,500 square miles.

This is the kind of competition which Mr. Beatty says they had to engage in, because they were compelled to do so. These, said Mr. Beatty, were expenditures which his company would not have had to make had it not been for the extravagant expenditures which had been made by the Canadian National. I do not attempt to lay any particular blame upon either railway system, because I do not wish to make invidious comparisons, but as a matter of fact if you look back to that period comprising 1926, 1927 and 1928, who can say that he was not guilty of extravagance at that time if he had the money with which to gamble or invest or make purchases? Nevertheless I would point out that the Canadian Pacific in connection with such expenditures was at least keeping up with the Canadian National, certainly not lagging very far behind.

Finally, as we all know, the bubble burst and there was a realization of what had happened. The Canadian National woke up and found that it had roughly $2,640,000,000 of indebtedness, $1,280,000,000 of which is due to the public and upon which it pays interest which during the past year amounted to $57,000,000, or something over $1,000,000 a week. The Canadian Pacific found itself in a similar position; the interest on its capital investment had piled up by millions of dollars. It found itself unable to pay even half of the dividends it had been paying for some forty odd years without calling upon the reserves, and it failed entirely to pay its last dividend.

In addition to the fact that both companies found themselves in this overcapitalized position, their gross revenues started to tumble. We find that between 1928 and 1932 the gross revenues of the Canadian National Railways fell from $304,000,000 to $161,000,000, while the gross revenues of the Canadian Pacific fell from $173,000,000 to $99,000,000. It is sometimes represented that the Canadian National has suffered to a greater extent than has the Canadian Pacific. Mile for mile, that is not the case. I refer for my authority in that connection to the monthly pamphlet issued by the Bank of Nova Scotia for November last in which it is pointed out that from 1928 to the present time the Canadian Pacific has suffered to a greater extent than has the Canadian National.

As I say, I am not endeavouring to-night to place the blame upon the directors of either railway nor upon the government. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray), who has just taken his seat, has said: Let the government take the responsibility. One of his suggestions was that instead of our adopting the bill before the house, the government should assume the responsibility of administration. A former government did take the responsibility from 1923 on, but how did it respond to the responsibility which was placed upon their shoulders? I do not want to lay any blame upon any particular government, because I submit that all parties in the house were very considerably to blame for the fact that there was not a more careful supervision and direction of affairs of the Canadian National from 1923 on. With respect to that railway under government responsibility there was the attitude of "hands off," which was not intended, I submit, to be the kind of "hands off" which developed during that period.

As a result of wasteful extravagance on the part of both railways, the Duff commission was set up for the object partly of calling a halt to such extravagances, although I do not know that it was necessary to call a halt, because the halt to such expenditures had pretty well been accomplished by that time.

I do not purpose dealing with the history of the Duff commission, because that has been set forth by two or three preceding speakers. That commission, after making a thorough investigation extending over some months, brought in certain recommendations. These were incorporated in a bill which was introduced into the Senate, where it was thoroughly overhauled and almost entirely rewritten, and is now introduced into this house as Bill A which is at present under discussion.

Part I of that bill deals with trustees, and I should say that generally speaking the object of part I is to take the national system out of the sphere of political and community pressure which is referred to in the Duff report. The hon. gentleman who just preceded me stated that, under the provisions of this bill, the minister had become nothing more than a messenger to the board of trustees. I do not think that very many members of the house will agree that that is the proper interpretation to be put upon that section. But if that were the case, surely it could not be worse in any event than the conditions that existed previous to say 1931. My hon. friend referred also to the chairman of the board of trustees as exercising the powers of a dictator. Could he be any worse than the dictator that we had in this country for a great many years, from 1923 onwards? There seems to be a difference of opinion with respect to the number of trustees and with respect to their powers, but I do not purpose at this stage to discuss that feature. I am dealing with the general provisions of the bill, reserving the right to discuss particular sections when it comes before us in committee.

The effect of part II of the bill is that the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific officials are directed to cooperate for the purpose of effecting economies. But to what extent? The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) expressed his fears upon that point, and I think that they are shared by a great many railway men throughout Canada to-day. I believe that they have some reason for their fears. When one looks over the past few years and estimates the cut that has been made in wages, in the hours of work, and in the number of railway employees at work, he must realize that the question of unemployment of railway men is a very serious problem. I have before me returns showing the number of railway employees from 1928 onwards, together with the gross savings effected on both the railways, and certain other figures a summary of which I might give to the house.

From 1928 to 1932 on the Canadian National railway system there was a gross saving in operating expenses of $94,000,000, of which $66,000,000 represented a saving in wages. In other words, two out of every three dollars of gross savings in operating expenses was made up of wages. On the Canadian Pacific during the same period, the gross saving in operation amounted to $74,000,000, of which $41,000,000 was a saving in wages. During the same period on the Canadian National the number of men in employment fell by 31,000, and on the Canadian Pacific by 26,000. So that from 1928 to 1932 there were 57,000 fewer railway men in employment on these two great transcontinental systems, representing a gross saving in wages of $107,000,000 out of a total gross saving in operating expenses of $168,000,000. So I think that the railway employees have considerable cause for apprehension as to just how far new economies are to be carried.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg said that if some of the economies which he understood had been advocated were to be carried into effect it would mean that 20,000 men would be thrown on the streets. Mr. Speaker, if I thought that would happen I would oppose this bill, but I do not believe that will be the result. Mr. Beatty in his representations to the Duff commission stated that a saving of $75,000,000 could be made by unification of the two systems, but I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the saving of $75,000,000 was predicated on his suggestion that five thousand miles of railway in Canada be torn up. I do not think that the people of Canada, or even a small proportion of them, would stand for five thousand miles of our national lines being torn up and destroyed, no matter how badly off we were financially. If these two railway systems are to be authorized, as is proposed by this bill, to cooperate, no panic measures of economy should be undertaken. Whatever measures of economy are brought into effect should be undertaken gradually until times take a turn for the better. If times do take a turn for the better, and I think all hon. members have some hopes of something like that in the near future, the economies can be progressively made without throwing many more thousands of employees out on the streets. It is easy to appreciate the effect in Canada of the loss of purchasing power amounting to $107,000,000 by the saving in wages to which I have just referred. If this bill goes into effect and this board is set up, any measures of economy that are taken must be taken with a view to doing as little harm as possible during the present troublous times to the thousands of employees who have spent the greater portion of their lives in loyal service to these two great companies.

Part III of the bill sets up an arbitral tribunal for the purpose of effecting compulsory cooperation in the event of the two railway systems failing to agree on measures of economy submitted by one or the other. Mr. Beatty has stated again and again that as the president of a privately owned company he is against that provision in the bill, and in his speech before the Winnipeg board of trade, to which I have already referred, he quite frankly sets out the policy of his company. At page 9 of his address he says:

> I am unqualifiedly in favour of unification of these properties for the purpose of administration.

I do not think it is necessary for me to submit to this house detailed reasons why the people of Canada pretty much as a unit object to amalgamation. In 1930 the present prime minister said: "Amalgamation never; competition ever," and I think that pretty well represents the feeling of the vast majority of the taxpayers of Canada. I am satisfied that amalgamation, merger, unification or whatever you wish to call it is politically impossible in Canada. I am convinced it is impossible to sell or lease the national railways on satisfactory terms to the state. In my view it is questionable if any greater saving would be accomplished by amalgamation, and I do not believe consolidation or unification would relieve the estate of any portion of its capital debt or of the present annual charges. I am convinced that consolidation into one system would result in a decline in the energy, initiative and enthusiasm of employees, the excellent morale at present existing among them having been developed by competition, and competition alone will maintain it. Amalgamation would result in a monopoly of rail transportation which by virtue of that very fact, would work to the disadvantage of business and of the public. People generally place a high value upon competitive railway service and would be reluctant to dispense with such competition. Moreover a monopoly would be placed in the hands of a very few, a tremendous power which might be unwisely exercised. I am convinced that amalgamation would result in an unwieldy system which could not be efficiently managed. Amalagamation must necessarily be permanent in effect. Mr. Beatty, in his presentation to the Duff commission, pointed out that a long lease would be necessary—almost a lease in perpetuity. It is not necessary to point out to the house the trouble there would be in unscrambling the two systems after their being for years under one control. I believe that amalgamation must necessarily be permanent in effect and does not envision a brighter future with more business and a greater population, and consequently better times for our railroads.

For the reasons I have set out I submit that amalgamation or unification of the systems is not only undesirable but impossible. Mr. Beatty objects to the arbitral tribunal because he claims that it overides the contract his company made with the government at the time of its incorporation, and states further that the company were guaranteed certain privileges and rights which were to continue in effect during their term of incorporation. However while Mr. Beatty objects to restraint upon the operations of the Canadian Pacific Railway he is in favour of restraining the operations of the Canadian National Railways. Throughout his speeches he has complained of extravagance on the part of the government railways as being responsible for large expenditures of his own company.

I say that if the Canadian National system is to be under restraint, and the Canadian Pacific is not, there would be a policy of hands off the C.P.R. and hands on the C.N.R. After all, the board which is to be set up is to settle disputes—that is all, and no more. While in the initial stages I perhaps had some doubts as to whether or not I was in favour of compulsory cooperation, the remarks made by Mr. Beatty before the commission finally determined my attitude. When discussing the proposition before the Duff commission that there be unification of the two systems for purposes of administration Mr. Leman made the following statement:

> That is where we want enlightenment.

Mr. Beatty replied:

> Well, if you can find a way to eliminate the government in the interim we will be taking a long step in the right direction. I am as convinced as I am sitting here that if three years from now there was an upturn in business which was, say, substantial, we would meet the same kind of competition and competitive extravagances that we have faced in the last eight years, and while we think we have learned the lesson and won't be extravagant, I do not believe we will realize that hope.

So Mr. Beatty states that if conditions were to improve, at the end of three years there would be just as many extravagances on the part of the publicly owned system as there have been in the past. Consequently he advocates restraint of some kind upon that system. I say if there is to be restraint upon the government railways there should be a like restraint upon the Canadian Pacific Railway and for the reason he sets out, if for nothing else, I should be in favour of the arbitral boards or tribunals which under the provisions of the bill are to be set up.

I feel that section 23, which refers to the powers of tribunals, will have to be amended in certain respects. The effect of that section as at present drafted goes, I believe, much farther than either the Senate or the government intended it should go. Section 23 is as follows:

> Where the execution of an order, or the carrying out of a decision of a tribunal, involves the doing of any act which by any statute requires, but for the provisions of this act, the leave, sanction, assent or approval of the board of railway commissioners, or where in the opinion of the presiding officer the public interests involved are of sufficient importance to warrant it, no order made by a tribunal shall be operative without the concurrence of the presiding officer and his formal written assent.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the first part of the paragraph provides that the chairman of the tribunal, who is chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, shall give his assent in respect of measures which are within the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. With that I agree.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. BOWMAN: May I finish the sentence? But with respect to the second part of the paragraph, with regard to all other matters which the chairman believes involve an important public interest, any matter of major importance or one which might be dealt with by five members of the board instead of three, he must in that case, too, give his assent to any order which may be made. In other words his decision has the effect of five, not one. For those reasons I submit paragraph 23 requires amendment, and will doubtless receive the attention of the house when in committee.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, rising to speak at this time may I say that I realize why the hon. member who has preceded me (Mr. Bowman) has so spoken. There are some features of the bill on which I believe the house is absolutely in agreement, one of which is the necessity of cooperation, cooperation that is full and practical. Surely the railroads and the country as a whole must have learned in the school of bitter experience that cooperation is necessary under present conditions. Experience in recent years surely has taught us that lesson for many years to come.

As far as economies are concerned I believe it has been well expressed and emphasized this afternoon and evening that the human factor cannot be forgotten or neglected. Service must also be maintained in some sections of the country. That has always been recognized in the past, and with a new country like Canada even during the present time of stress we must keep up certain capital expenditures and services. And this applies particularly as far as maintenance of service is concerned. As has been so well said by previous speakers, surely the two railways when considering measures of economy cannot any longer place the whole burden upon the working men or the train crews. I share the view expressed a little while ago that of every three dollars the railway companies have saved in recent years two dollars have been saved by curtailing wages and the number of men employed, which is not fair to that class of people. We can go too far in that respect. It is my duty to deal at length with a very important matter, important for my section of the country. The misgiving I feel in that regard is not that I must take the time of the house, but that I may be unable with my limited ability to put as forcibly as I should like the matters relating to our railway systems as they affect our section of the country and the whole of Canada. So I shall concentrate my remarks particularly on that section of the Canadian National railway system which is known as the National Transcontinental.

For the last six years, since I have had the honour of representing the riding of North Timiskaming in this house I have made it my duty to consider this all-important problem and speak of it in this house every year. Outside of our local papers I am sorry to state that so far the result has been disappointing, in that I have never received any support from the press of the large centres of population, never a single line from the daily papers of Toronto or Montreal. The only support came, I think, from the maritime provinces, the Winnipeg Free Press and some of the western papers. I feel that my arguments are worthy of attention and should receive consideration. Being fully seized of the fairness of my case I am going to avail myself of every opportunity that is afforded me to impress this house and the country with its importance, and I feel confident that I shall receive more support than I have in the past.

I am going to divide my argument into three parts; first, a brief analysis of the Duff report itself, and the personnel of the commission; second the National Transcontinental question; and third, the present proposals. On account of the limited time that a member has at his disposal I am going to deal first with the all-important question of the National Transcontinental.

When on July 30, 1903, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, launching the project in parliament, introduced the bill for the construction of the National Transcontinental, he used these words:

> This new railway will be another link in that chain of union. It will not only open territory hitherto idle and unprofitable; it will not only force Canadian trade into Canadian channels; it will not only promote citizenship between old Canada and new Canada, but it will secure us our commercial independence, and will forever make us free from the bondage of the bonding privilege.

These were the statements of a man of vision; indeed they were almost a prophecy. If that great departed statesman could travel in our section of the country to-day he would see that prophecy coming into fulfilment during the present generation. He would see new centres of population, starting from Quebec city to Harvey Junction, and sweeping along the St. Maurice valley, rich in timber and hydro developments, up to the height of land in northern Quebec, which is part of the clay belt abounding in natural resources, and a most promising mining field that will astound the world during the next twenty years; on to northern Ontario with its clay belt and mining and industrial districts where a new town like Kapuskasing has given during normal times in freight and passenger earnings for that section from $150,000 to $300,000 per month. You have in that route the most direct and easiest gradient from the prairies to the St. Lawrence. That section of the line was never intended for local traffic, that was not its purpose. The initial purpose was to give the most direct communication between east and west. When that section was constructed there was practically no population through there, but we have now nearly 200,000 souls. The main reason, in fact the only reason why the connecting link was built out of the public treasury, was to give better communication between east and west. However, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to make a speech on that subject; my purpose is to have the house and the country realize that if to-day we have a larger deficit than we should on the Canadian National railway system it is partly due to the fact that the original ideas that prompted the construction of that railway have not been carried out. I would not be working so strenuously or speaking so often on this subject if our wheat and our cattle were moving through Canadian channels. I regret to say that nearly forty per cent of our wheat and heavy freight from the west finds its way out through American ports. I maintain that a large proportion of the national railway deficit would be removed if our freight travelled by its proper routing, the line of least resistance. Again I say I do not pretend to make a speech, but I desire to place before this parliament and the country a brief showing why the national transcontinental was built and asking why it has not been properly used.

I hold in my hand a circular issued I believe, by the port commissioners of Halifax and Saint John, entitled, Is Canada for the Canadians? I am going to read some parts of it so that the house will be seized of the situation as it actually exists:

A Ruinous Drain

The fundamental trade policy of Canada is the east-and-west policy. This policy was embedded in the conception of confederation, and all through the years it has been recognized as the only true Canadian policy.

Many hundreds of millions of dollars of Canadian public money have been spent to perpetuate this policy and to ensure its success. The greatest single effort for the projection of the east-and-west policy was the construction of the transcontinental railway at an ultimate cost to the Canadian people of $330,000,000.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must not read articles written by others—

Mr. BRADETTE: I am anxious to follow your ruling, but surely all this afternoon and evening, hon. members who preceded me have been reading articles by Mr. Beatty and others.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am responsible only for myself. Hon. members should express their own ideas, not those of people outside. Everyone here can read.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Other statements have been quoted by hon. members, and this article does not reflect on the proceedings of this parliament.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): This is a subject that no one can deal with without reading articles of outstanding writers and views expressed by those who have spoken throughout the country on the question. I submit that we should be allowed to quote such opinions and statements.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Hon. members are allowed to give quotations as to facts, but the rule is clear that they may not give outside opinions on the policy of the government or the opposition. Hon. members are here to give their own ideas to enlighten the house and the country. Otherwise members might spend their entire time quoting articles from one writer or another.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the opinion of Mr. Beatty as set out in the article which the hon. member is seeking to quote is absolutely pertinent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I quote the rule, Mr. Speaker:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

I submit that neither the speech delivered by Mr. Beatty in Toronto nor that which he gave in Winnipeg can be construed as having had any reference to proceedings now before the house, so that those speeches cannot come within the scope of this rule.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The rule is clear that hon. members may not quote other people's opinions but must give their own. If they have no personal opinions they need not speak.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am giving my own opinions, Mr. Speaker, and I do not see why you should apply the rule and make a special ruling applicable to my humble person, notwithstanding that all afternoon those who preceded me were allowed to give quotations.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member is not fair to me; I am not giving any special ruling with respect to him.

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I submit that the ruling does apply to myself particularly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I was not in the chamber this afternoon.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There should be uniformity of procedure.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member can appeal, but that is my ruling.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Do you not think, your honour, that the hon. member is within the rule in quoting from a speech of Mr. Beatty's delivered prior to the present proceedings?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member may quote facts, but neither Mr. Beatty's nor anyone else's opinion has anything to do with it, and the hon. gentleman has just said that what he is quoting is Mr. Beatty's opinion. Whether it be the opinion of Mr. Beatty or of Sir Henry Thornton it makes no difference.

Mr. HEENAN: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, it is the last thought in anyone's mind to appeal from your ruling, but surely we ought to have some semblance of fair play.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member's implication is fair. I do not think I can be challenged with unfairness in the course of this debate. An hon. member can refer to any opinion expressed outside but he cannot read those opinions in this house when they relate to proceedings now before the house.

Mr. HEENAN: Will you allow me to state my point, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The point of order has been decided, and unless the hon. member is raising another point of order I rule that he has not the floor. I must ask the hon. member to take his seat.

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I point out to you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HEENAN: I have the floor.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) has the floor.

Mr. HEENAN: I have the floor on a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: What is the hon. member's point of order?

Mr. HEENAN: My point is that when the minister made his motion this afternoon he quoted from Mr. Hungerford and Mr. Beaty and—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

Mr. HEENAN: Then, Mr. Speaker, I must appeal from your ruling.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think this fact has been brought to your attention, Mr. Speaker. The rule states:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

There were no proceedings in the house when Mr. Beatty made the speech in question, nor had the bill been in the house.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The rule refers to speeches outside commenting on proceedings in the house.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But the speech in question was delivered long prior to this debate.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I cite this precedent, Mr. Speaker. You yourself, speaking the other day as a private member of the house, read a lengthy extract from some journal printed in Paris, and that quotation was in connection with a debate that was in progress at that time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member is entirely wrong. I did not read an article commenting on any debate in the house; I quoted facts concerning the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am the last one who would wish to appeal against your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I entirely agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in what he has just said with respect to the rule and as to its bearing on the quotation which it is sought to make at the moment. I wish Your Honour would give further consideration to what has been said on that point; otherwise we shall be constrained to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If I gave further consideration to the point I should be deciding against the decision of the Speaker the other day and contrary to my own ruling.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That was a wrong decision.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The ruling the other day was with respect to a quotation which was held to have reference to proceedings then taking place in the house.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The suggestion is, Mr. Speaker, that this particular incident does not come within the scope of the ruling given by the Speaker the other day.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): That is the point.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I cannot hear the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was merely suggesting that permission to the hon. member to give the quotation which he wishes to read would not conflict with the former ruling because it does not come within the scope of the ruling. This particular article does not fall under the ruling. The statements which are being quoted having been made long before this debate, they could not possibly have any reference to the present proceedings.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I will not stand on pride, and inasmuch as the house is apparently unanimous against my view, I have no objection to the hon. member proceeding.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am glad of Your Honour's ruling, because although I credit most hon. members of the house with a good deal of grey matter, at the same time I think that it is just as well for any member to give adequate preparation and study to any speech he is going to make. I am one of the last men to read speeches in this house; I do no want to read my speeches—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I did not suggest that the hon. member was reading his speech.

Mr. BRADETTE: In view of Your Honour's ruling, I will proceed with the quotation:

In the calendar year 1931, 62,902,865 bushels of Canadian grain went through United States Atlantic ports, while those same ports were getting only 15,984,659 bushels of United States grain,—and Halifax was getting the "magnificent" total of 162,100 bushels.

In the first seven months of the 1931-1932 crop year, Canadian wheat exports to the United Kingdom were as under:

Via:	Bushels
Canadian Atlantic ports..	11,028,272
Canadian Pacific ports..	18,418,677
United States ports..	37,258,371

Or, of 48,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat moving eastward for export to the United Kingdom in that period, not less than 37,000,000 bushels went through United States channels!

These are astounding figures, showing in what enormous quantities Canada has permitted the diversion of its own traffic from its own channels.

This ruinous drain upon Canada's economic vitality must cease.

It continues in the same vein until we come to the last paragraph:

The chairman of the Halifax harbour commission has stated his belief that the port of Halifax has just about reached the limit of its development unless an adequate share of the Canadian grain traffic can be secured, for, manifestly, it is going to be difficult, if not impossible, to develop any turn-around movement of liner tonnage under existing conditions.

In these circumstances, so vital not to this port and province alone, but to the dominion, as a national matter, we respectfully urge an early hearing of the appeal in the transcontinental grain rates case, and a favourable decision in the interests of our own transportation channels.

The maritime provinces have cooperated with us in this all-important matter.

I am going to give hon. members the situation as it actually exists. When the road was completed in 1916 it was able to quote a rate of six cents per bushel on wheat from Armstrong, a station in the Thunder Bay district just north of lake Nipigon and almost due north of Fort William and Port Arthur, down to Quebec city, a distance of 959 miles. But then a mysterious thing happened, the reason for which I have never been able to discover—hardly had the rate been announced than the Conservative government almost quadrupled it. If the railroad was making money with a six cent rate, why was that traffic taken away from us? The increased rate proved to be not only discriminatory but almost prohibitive, because I believe that after 1924 not a single bushel of wheat or a single carload of cattle has been routed from Winnipeg over the National Transcontinental. The expected volume of traffic never developed. There is some local traffic, but, as I said before, this section of the road was never intended for local traffic. When the road was built this section of the country was considered to be a wilderness. I can remember when the government of the province of Quebec granted certain timber, mineral and mining rights to a Belgian company, at that time northern Quebec and northern Ontario were considered as being practically wildernesses. We have developed quite a large population and a considerable local traffic, but the original idea in building the National Transcontinental was to take care of through freight and passenger traffic from ocean to ocean.

In 1921 the Quebec harbour commission made representations to the board of railway commissioners in connection with the 20.7 cents per bushel rate then in force on the Armstrong-Quebec division. A sitting of the board was held in Quebec city with the late Hon. Frank Carvell presiding. We expected that we would receive fair treatment from the railway commissioners, but here is what happened. An extraordinary argument was used by the chief commissioner that if the rate was reduced, it would mean ruin for other railways. Mr. Carvell said:

> If my conception of the National Transcontinental was right, when it was started and when it was being built, I think freight can be transported over that line at a figure which would mean the absolute ruination of other railways in Canada. If not, we were all wrong and we were not justified in building it.

There was justification in building that section of the road but there is no justification in leaving it idle at the present time. These high rates are hurting the maritimes, northern Quebec and northern Ontario and the whole of Canada. I believe they have an adverse effect upon the western provinces as well. If the western provinces would study this question I believe they would find that the natural routing for their wheat, at least during the winter months, is from Winnipeg to Quebec and down to Halifax and Saint John. At the present time from forty to forty-five per cent of our wheat goes through American seaports. This matter vitally affects the maritime provinces because with the grain being routed as it is at the present time, an unreasonable amount finds an outlet through Buffalo and Montreal to Boston and Portland and other American ports. Were this traffic routed over the transcontinental to Quebec it could be profitably moved after the close of navigation on the St. Lawrence from the ancient capital via the old Intercolonial road to Halifax and Saint John. The present rate on wheat over the 959 miles stretch from Armstrong to Quebec is 20·7 cents per bushel, while the rate from Port Arthur to Edmonton, a distance of 1,305 miles, is only 15·6 cents per bushel. The rate per mile through northern Ontario to Quebec is about double what it is on the prairies. If an eleven cent rate were made effective to Quebec, it would immediately create a maximum rate upon the great lakes. The Canadian Pacific rate from Goderich to Halifax, a distance of 1,305 miles, is 12¼ cents per bushel, a rate considerably less than that prevailing from prairie points to the head of the lakes. The rate from Fort William to Halifax, a distance of 1,753 miles, is 21·3 cents per bushel while the rate from Armstrong to Quebec, a distance of only 959 miles, is 20·7 cents a bushel. A moment ago I quoted from a circular dealing with this all important question. I was glad to note that at the late imperial conference it was decided that grain being shipped to Great Britain should follow an all Canadian route. I hope that no loopholes will be found in this regulation because this route is the logical route for grain shipments, especially during the winter months.

Grain is not the only thing which this transcontinental road can deliver most expeditiously. On a trial shipment of 600 steers, the running time of the train between Winnipeg and Quebec was eighteen hours less than it would have been from Winnipeg to Montreal. Two feedings only were sufficient whereas three are normally required. This fact, coupled with the lessened shrinkage in the shipment, represented a saving of not less than $5 per head, or, roughly, $3,000 upon the whole consignment. This experiment was carried on for one winter only and I cannot understand why it was not continued. Is it because we have not sufficient population in these sections to command a certain number of votes? I believe the only way that this situation can be remedied is by bringing forward the facts as forcibly as possible. If it was a parochial or local matter I would not bring it to the attention of the house, but I believe it is more than that. If hon. members from the maritimes, the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario and the three western provinces would study this situation I believe they would find a reduced rate would be beneficial to the country as a whole.

We are in the pioneering sections of Canada and I cannot understand why the older sections of the country do not realize the true position. At times we contend, and perhaps rightly so, that the larger centres of population in Ontario and Quebec are against us. If the traffic which goes from the head of the lakes through American ports was kept in Canada, there would not be so much criticism, but this is not the case, as I have shown, a large percentage of it is entirely lost to Canadian traffic. In 1921 Commissioner Rutherford made a statement in response to a request for lower rates, so when I have another occasion to speak on some of the features of this bill I am going to refer to what a former commissioner had to say as to what happened in our section of the country. This is Commissioner Rutherford's statement:

> This is something that has to be general in a very careful way. When we consider the elevator system at Fort William and Port Arthur, the tremendous machinery created for the movement of that grain crop, to introduce a revolutionary method like the making of a special rate on any one road would mean disturbing the whole movement of grain, such a disturbance as would bring about economic disaster for the time being.

We do not want any special favours or any special rate in our section of the country; we desire only equalization of rates, the same rate as exists in other sections. When we apply to the Board of Railway Commissioners, we do not go there as mendicants; we want to receive the same attention as the rest of Canada is getting, and fair play, that is all. The commission did not make any difficulty about giving its reasons why the rates should be made high: If the road carried grain as cheaply as it could, in view of its superior construction and low grades, other roads, less favourably circumstanced, could not compete, and therefore it must not be allowed to make low rates. This is certainly not a statement from a national point of view, not a statement worthy of a commissioner. Every section of the country should receive the same treatment. I do not like to make this observation, but in our section of the country we feel that because of our small population we are not receiving the treatment to which we are entitled. But without trying to prophesy, I believe, that within the next twenty years instead of 200,000 we shall have a population of at least half a million, and then perhaps we shall be treated more favourably than we are at the present time. I have, however, enough confidence in the fair-mindedness and justice of the present Minister of Railways to believe that, although the particular locality in which he resides may be adversely affected, he will use his influence to see to it that the Canadian National system in our section receives from the railway commission the just treatment it deserves.

A ruling has been made in regard to reading certain extracts. I believe that I shall be in order now in reading a memorial presented by the Cochrane board of trade and, I believe, distributed to all members of parliament ten or twelve months ago. It deals with the matter in a very thorough manner and I am going to read it to the house. It states:

The National Transcontinental railway from Quebec to Winnipeg was conceived and built for the most direct and economical transportation of passengers and freight between eastern and western Canada, and for this purpose it was constructed with a minimum of grades and curves. In the early years of its operation, it was shown that grain could be hauled from western Canada to eastern seaports in greater quantities and at a cheaper rate per train than over any other Canadian railway.

But since this demonstration, it appears that the National Transcontinental railway has been discriminated against by the increase in the freight rate on wheat to help its competitor thereby defeating the very purpose for which it was built and diverting much of our wheat haulage to American territory and to American ships.

I believe, in thus mentioning the anomaly, it is stating the case properly.

The possibilities of this railway do not seem to be known and appreciated as they should be by the people of Canada, by the members of parliament or even by the administrative heads of our railway systems.

No doubt this was an allusion to the railway commissioners, because after a great deal of expenditure and much travelling, we could not get a proper judgment from that commission.

Recently the Canadian National trains 1 and 2 between Montreal and Vancouver, which have been running through Cochrane for fifteen years, have been rerouted via Capreol, thereby missing 400 miles of what is perhaps the most prosperous mining, timber, agricultural and tourist district in Canada, namely: between North Bay and Hearst.

Therefore, the Cochrane Board of Trade humbly requests the royal commission and the president of the Canadian National Railways to consider its claims for a restoration of proper passenger and freight service between Winnipeg, Quebec, Halifax, Montreal and Toronto by Cochrane over the National Transcontinental railway of the Canadian National lines for the following amongst other reasons:

(A) Re: Passenger Service

1. A glance at a map of Canada shows the National Transcontinental line as the most direct link between Quebec and Winnipeg.

2. This line was constructed with a minimum of grades and curves, permitting fast travel and heavy haulage.

3. It passes through the prosperous agricultural, mining, timber and tourist districts of Northern Quebec and Northern Ontario.

4. It is linked at Herve junction with Montreal; at Taschereau with Rouyn and Kirkland Lake; at Cochrane with Montreal, Toronto, Cobalt silver camp, Kirkland Lake and Timmins gold camps, the lower and upper clay belts of Northern Ontario, and the James Bay basin; at Hearst with the Algoma Central railway from Sault Ste. Marie; at Nakina, with Sudbury and Port Arthur districts, at Sioux Lookout with Fort William districts.

5. The possibilities of increase in population and thus in passenger traffic are greater in the territory traversed by it, than along any other transcontinental line in Ontario and Quebec, owing to the agricultural, mining and timber resources that it taps.

6. There are greater attractions and interest for cross-country passengers in the territory served by the National Transcontinental railway than along the other railroads.

7. The mining camps of Tashota, Red Lake, Manitoba and the Peace River were mostly opened up and developed by prospectors and mining men from the Cobalt, Kirkland Lake and Porcupine camps of Northern Ontario and the National Transcontinental railway is the logical means of communication between them.

8. The southern part of Northern Ontario, could be served by the Canadian Pacific railway and the northern part can be better served by the National Transcontinental railway, which crosses the only territory in Northern Ontario capable of greater agricultural, mining and industrial development.

9. Although there is duplication between the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian National railway in other parts of Ontario and Quebec, there is no duplication of the Quebec to Winnipeg railway line.

10. A fast, complete and economical passenger service between Winnipeg and Toronto, Montreal, Quebec and Halifax could be maintained by routing the Toronto-Vancouver trains over the old Grand Trunk railway via North Bay, joining there with the Montreal trains, and proceeding over the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway to Cochrane where connections with the Quebec trains can also be made.

11. Towns were built up along the National Transcontinental railway and industries developed with the expectation of continued main line traffic and at present passenger service is practically cancelled from Hearst westwards to Nakina along this line.

(B) Re: Freight Service

1. The straight line between Quebec and Winnipeg, with an excellent road-bed and minimum of curves and grades favours rapid and economical haulage of heavy freight trains.

2. The junctions at Sioux Lookout, Nakina, Hearst, Cochrane, Taschereau, and Herve also support the contention that the National Transcontinental railway should be put to greater use in cross country freight haulage.

3. During the war, a huge quantity of freight was hauled over this line at a lower tonnage cost than any other transcontinental railroad.

4. The winter haulage of grain to Canadian Atlantic seaports can be accomplished more economically over this road.

5. The rapidity of development of Northern Quebec and of Northern Ontario is an assurance of increasing incoming and outgoing freight.

6. By using the old Grand Trunk line between Toronto and North Bay, and the Ontario government owned Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway between North Bay and Cochrane, the National Transcontinental railway can handle the Toronto-Winnipeg freight to greater advantage.

7. The diversion of Canadian grain to American ships, railroads and elevators with resulting loss of wages to Canadian workmen should be prevented and the National Transcontinental railway restored to its proper object of hauling western grain to Canadian Atlantic seaports and carrying eastern products and imports westwards.

8. Of the three transcontinental lines crossing Ontario; Canadian Pacific, Canadian Northern and National Transcontinental, the last is the more suitable for rapid and economical haulage and crosses the most populated, prosperous and promising agricultural, mining and timber districts, suitable for the establishment of one million more Canadian citizens.

I believe I have built up a case for the National Transcontinental, and it is up to parliament in this new legislation to ensure that our section of the country receives the treatment it deserves. Why should the people of Canada spend $170,000,000 for the mere pleasure of building a road, through what was then a wilderness, over which freight could be forbidden to flow? Certainly that was not the intention of those who constructed the transcontinental system.

As I stated at the outset, it was never the intention to build that section of road purely for local traffic. It is true that up to three or four years ago, only with local traffic, that section of the road was self-supporting, and I believe it is self-supporting at the present time, but it was not intended for local traffic alone. We never, however, received the quota of through traffic we were entitled to get. This applies more particularly to grain and also to cattle. It may surprise hon. members to hear that, although we have the most direct route, for instance from Halifax to Winnipeg and Vancouver, we have never had a single sack of European mail going over our section of the road. It was always moved the other way. It may surprise hon. members also to hear that if I buy a carload of feed or flour to be delivered in the town of Cochrane from Winnipeg, instead of coming in the most direct way from Winnipeg to Cochrane, that carload is billed to Fort William or Port Arthur, from there routed over the Canadian Pacific up to North Bay, and then from North Bay to Cochrane, providing almost double the amount of traffic it should.

I have spoken on this subject on several occasions, Mr. Speaker, and no matter how much the members of this parliament may resent the fact of my speaking about it so often, I intend to bring it up as often as possible until I get the ear of parliament and of the press, and the country realizes the anomaly in the present situation. We maintain that if we had the traffic to which we are entitled the Canadian nation would not lose any traffic, and that is without prejudice to the Canadian Pacific. It would simply be throwing into Canadian channels the traffic that is passing through foreign channels. I believe in the policy of Canada first to the greatest possible extent.

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the house for more than a few minutes to deal with one particular phase of the bill which is before us. But before doing that, I should like to make some brief reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray).

I was grateful to hear what the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) had to say about Canadian trade going through Canadian ports, because I gathered that he is entirely in favour of it provided the traffic goes over the National Transcontinental. The hon. member for West Lambton, however, seemed to think that such a slogan and such a policy were inimical to the best interests of this country. I know the hon. member is a lawyer by profession, and I see him now almost within the precincts of the house. I should like to put to him two questions. The first question which I put to him as a lawyer is this: Has he read his constitutional history and the history of the development of confederation in this country? The second question is: Does he know what constitutes a law, what essential elements are necessary? He seemed to take exception to section 14, subsection 2 of the bill, which provides that the trustees shall route through Canadian ports Canadian shipments unless the shipper otherwise directs. If he has read his constitutional history, he knows that it was part of the basis of confederation, part of the pact under which the maritime provinces entered confederation, that the maritime ports were to be the winter ports of the other provinces of Canada. And if he is a lawyer he knows what it means to break a contract, and that was part of the contract. I ask him the further question: Does he believe in breaking a contract?

Mr. YOUNG: Where do you find that in the contract?

Mr. ERNST: In the discussions preceding confederation, which apparently the hon. gentleman has not read.

Mr. YOUNG: I am talking about the law.

Mr. ERNST: I am talking of what induced the maritime provinces to enter confederation. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) is smiling. I would ask him, does he favour Canadian trade going through Canadian ports?

Mr. RALSTON: May I ask if it is not permissible to smile in this house?

Mr. ERNST: That is not an answer. I ask him again, does he favour Canadian trade with Canadian ports?

Mr. RALSTON: I certainly do.

Mr. ERNST: I would ask my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) if he favours Canadian trade with Canadian ports.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this a cross-examination? If so, I may say that I intend to speak in the debate.

[Mr. Ernst.]

Mr. ERNST: Then I would ask the hon. member to answer the question. At any rate, the Liberal party as usual is hopelessly divided.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are not rubber stamps like the Tories.

Mr. ERNST: I know the hon. member for Vancouver balks. I ask the hon. member for West Lambton further, does he know the essentials of a law?

Mr. YOUNG: Economic law?

Mr. ERNST: No, the law. Economic laws are inexorable. I am talking about man-made laws. It consists of a declaration and a sanction, the declaration being the words and the sanction the penalty. The only complaint I have against section 14, subsection 2, is that it is a pious declaration that the trade of Canada shall go through Canadian ports, and no penalty is provided in case it does not. What happens if it is not routed through Canadian ports? Is there a penalty? If so, what? What does the act prescribe? My complaint is that the penalty is entirely lacking. It should be made compulsory.

Having said that I want to make one further reference to the speech of the hon. member for West Lambton.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was a good speech.

Mr. ERNST: I am sorry to see that my hon. friend is so vicious a politician. I credited him with something better because the speech of the hon. member for West Lambton was the first that degraded the tone of this debate. I can liken it to nothing quite so much as the first gas attack, because the Minister of Railways had initiated and others continued the discussion on a very high plane indeed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this the counter attack?

Mr. ERNST: The Minister of Railways refrained entirely from any political accusation, and not one member of the house can point to one thing he said that savoured of politics. He appealed to the house to be dispassionate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Follow your leader.

Mr. ERNST: My leader has said nothing on the question that I know of.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Minister of Railways.

Mr. ERNST: I shall disagree with him later, but I wish I had always the ability and the courage to follow him on as high a plane as his speech to-day, and I wish this house had.

The hon. member for West Lambton, in tones of great fervour, said that this house endorsed public ownership, and he pleaded eloquently for it, and then in the next breath he complained bitterly because the arbitral tribunal to be appointed under this bill may confiscate what he calls the property of a private corporation. Where does he stand? What does he want? He wants to blow hot and blow cold. He wants to appeal to public ownership sentiment in this country, and to appeal also to the Canadian Pacific Railway workers in his own constituency—nothing more or less. I do not intend further to deal with the hon. gentleman's speech.

As to the speech of the hon. member for North Timiskaming, I do not think that my hon. friend spoke very much about the bill before the house, but may I say that it is one of the fervent desires of my own province that some day Canada may see fit to use the National Transcontinental for the purposes for which it was intended.

I pass now to the subject which brought me to my feet, and that is part I and part I only, of the bill, which relates entirely to the management of the Canadian National Railways. As you will remember, Mr. Speaker, it was brought out by previous speakers and by the minister when he moved the second reading this afternoon, that part I provides for three trustees to administer the affairs of the Canadian National Railways, a chairman and two others. The chairman under the bill has the power of veto. He can initiate nothing without a majority vote, but he can veto anything.

It was further stated that the three trustees must be so located that they would be available immediately for consultation, the chairman being a full time man and the other two trustees being immediately available whenever required. I think that that must mean, Mr. Speaker, that all three trustees must live in the immediate vicinity of Montreal. The two who are to be part time men must almost be residents of the district in the immediate vicinity of Montreal.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: They should all be full time.

Mr. ERNST: Certainly they should all be full time, and they should not all come from the immediate vicinity of Montreal. I listened to the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) this afternoon when he objected to any trustee being chosen for geographical reasons. With all due deference I am going to advance a contrary argument. I ask the house to remember that in this bill we are dealing with two railway systems but with two systems which are essentially different in structure. One, the Canadian Pacific, was built deliberately and purposely as a system. If mistakes were made they were errors of judgment; but it was built, as one might say, from the inside out. The other, sir, was simply an aggregation of bankrupt railways which were picked up, placed under a common management and an effort made to consolidate them into a system. It was not built scientifically. With all due deference I submit that it cannot ever be managed on a hardheaded business basis, as could the other corporation, without grave danger to the structure of the country. I know that that is an unpopular statement to make, but let me elaborate.

We have within the system a large number of branch lines, part of the old Transcontinental lines, and the old Intercolonial railway. Some of them have never paid and may never pay—although perhaps that is too broad a statement. Let me, however, take the Intercolonial as a starting point. I wish to give one or two illustrations. The Intercolonial—and this time I believe the hon. member for West Lambton will find corroboration for my statement in the British North America Act, section 133—the Intercolonial was, one may say, the quid pro quo for the entrance of the maritime provinces into confederation.

Mr. YOUNG: How many quid pro quos did you get?

Mr. ERNST: I do not know, but certainly we deserved more than we ever got. The Intercolonial was the quid pro quo, because through it our products were to flow to central Canada, and the products of central Canada were to flow to us, our ports being used for export to the markets of the world. We have surrendered a good deal, so far as the Intercolonial railway is concerned. We surrendered what I believe to be part of our constitutional rights when the Intercolonial became part of the Canadian National railway system. I did not disapprove of the change, but I say that the railway was not built as a commercial enterprise; it was built primarily as a military enterprise, and followed almost the longest possible route in an effort as far as possible to get away from the United States border. I am fearful that if such a railway is placed under the control of a purely business administration, which will not have at heart the history of Canada, damage may be done to the structure of confederation. As a member from the maritime provinces I should like to be sure that those provinces will have representation on the board of trustees in order that the integrity of the old Intercolonial may in some measure be preserved. I do not ask for control—although judging from what we have given to the rest of Canada we might also ask for that—but I do ask that we have some representative whose voice may be heard urging our problems, when they arise, before a decision is given.

I am fearful that on a basis of pure dollars and cents irreparable injury may be done. I ask the hon. member for Vancouver Centre whether he has not the same fears for the Pacific slope, although he has not the bond of the British North America Act to help him out. I am in sympathy with him.

Let me give another illustration. I shall take a branch line such as that running through my constituency. This branch line is supposed to be losing money. Under a board of three trustees from one centre, what will happen? They are charged with making the railway pay, if it is humanly possible, and I have no doubt they will try to do their duty. If they do, what happens? They will look at a report from this branch line and take note that traffic on this particular line is light. They will decide that they can handle the traffic with less trains per week than are now running. Possibly where there are twelve trains per week they would attempt to give the service with six or seven. The interests of the trustees would be purely financial, those of the Canadian National railways and nothing else. They know nothing about the national considerations or the vision which prompted the building of many of these lines. They know that dividends have to be paid in dollars and cents, and for that reason they will say: "We will handle that traffic with so many trains a week."

Mr. YOUNG: Quite right.

Mr. ERNST: What happens? I will give the hon. member an illustration, because obviously he lives on the main line.

Mr. YOUNG: No, I do not.

Mr. ERNST: I shall give an illustration. We will take a fish firm which caters to the fresh fish trade of Canada, and employs between three and four hundred men. In order to continue business that firm must be able to make express shipments instantly. Restrict train service, and that firm might become bankrupt and the men would have to walk out on the street. Nothing else could happen. What is true of that firm is true of many others. I have no doubt the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth knows of many more firms in his constituency which would be in the some position. If we run the branch lines on a pure dollars and cents basis without taking into consideration the national interest, we will put a good many men on the street who are now earning decent livings.

As I have said, the Canadian National railways were not built as a railway system, but were built by those who had vision and who had faith in the future of the country. Let me give one further illustration in connection with the same branch line. Obviously if those who sit at the head, with the blue pencil, are interested only in the production of dividends, those who manage the affairs on the main line will try to make a good showing, even at the expense of the branch lines. The whole Atlantic region is under one management. What has been happening? Branch lines are saddled with every possible expense which can be piled on to them, so that the burdens of the main lines may be lightened. In December three locomotives were sent from the main lines to this particular branch line. When they got down there they wheezed, whistled and died and had to be sent back to the main line for repairs. Those repairs were charged to the branch line. The main line saved the expense. Its shops were credited with the repairs. If that happens now, what will happen if there is nobody on the board of trustees who has knowledge of local conditions? I put that question to hon. members, and speak feelingly, because after the damage has been done it will be too late.

I now come to the point I have been trying to illustrate, namely that the board of trustees should consist of five members, and I am prepared to support an amendment to that effect. I believe that all five members should be full time members—all of them. I believe the west should have representation, not in order that there might be political or geographical pull, but in order that these peculiar conditions of which I speak might be brought to the notice of the board before it took responsibility for making a decision. I am afraid of the decision that will be made by men sitting in Montreal who perhaps do not know a single thing about the region concerning which they are making the decision.

Mr. POULIOT: About the branch lines.

Mr. ERNST: No, more than the branch lines. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that if the legislation goes through as the bill now stands many members will come back here at the next session regretting having so voted.

There are other features of the bill of which I do not entirely approve, but which I am prepared to support. I realize the need for every possible economy consistent with the national interest. But my point is that I believe there is an interest greater than the interest of the dollar, and that is the interest of the Canadian people as a whole. I welcome the announcement of the Minister of Railways this afternoon that minor amendments will be considered on their merits, and that the government is willing to accept them if they are in the interests of Canada. I implore the government either to move or to accept an amendment making the board of trustees five and assuring the country that every part will have representation thereon.

I do not speak as a defeatist with relation to the Canadian National. I realize that the problem is acute, but after all it is not much more acute than the problem every one of us has to face to-day. I am confident that we have turned the corner; we are facing prosperity, all we have to do is to go towards it. I speak only as a private member; my opinion may be worth nothing, and I hope it gives offence to none, but I regard the collapse of the financial structure of the great republic to the south of us as the first herald of the dawn. I cannot help but regard it so; for I have always thought, and have stated publicly—not because I have any dislike for the United States; I have two brothers earning their living there—my earnest conviction that the United States has been chiefly responsible for the world collapse. I have always predicted that before we can recover they would have to go through torture and pain. I hope the pain will become no greater, but I am satisfied that from what has happened will result the turn towards a stable international monetary basis, which is the first prerequisite for recovery. When we do that I am satisfied it is going to be on the basis of inflation in the United States; that our dollar, being shackled to the American dollar, will be inflated; that commodity prices will rise, the revenues of the railways will increase, our governmental revenues will go up, our private revenues will go up, and our troubles will be over.

On motion of Mr. Heenan the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

RADIO-TELEGRAPH CONFERENCE

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to lay upon the table of the house the report of the telegraph and radio-telegraph conference held at Madrid, Spain, last year. If I may be permitted I should like to say a few words of explanation.

The report consists of a general review of the accomplishments of the conference and of annexes comprising the conventions, protocols, regulations, etc., and also the radio-telegraphic regulations. The report has been signed by all the countries represented, some signing it in full and others in part only. The report itself has been prepared in both languages and the translation of the annexes will be tabled within a short time. The conference was convened in Madrid at the invitation of the Spanish government, the first sitting being held on September 3 and the last on December 9. The opening session was presided over by Mr. Manuel Azania, Prime Minister of Spain, who welcomed the delegates in the name of the Spanish government. The closing session was presided over by His Excellency, the President of the Spanish Republic, Mr. Niceto Alcala Zamora, who made a very eloquent address, stressing more particularly the accomplishments of the conference towards what he termed the founding of "universal harmony among all the nations of the world." Seventy-three nations were represented by over five hundred delegates. The deliberations while lengthy were very cordial and the best spirit existed at all times among the delegates.

I need hardly say that the Canadian delegates took great interest in the deliberations of the conference, paying close attention to those matters which were of the utmost importance to Canada. For instance, I might mention the discussions on the requirements of ship to shore communication. As a result of the deliberations, the general regulations adopted at the Washington conference of 1927 were maintained intact while additional frequencies were provided for the use of radio beacons. Other matters were followed very closely by the Canadian delegates. One of the outstanding achievements of the conference was the fusion of the telegraph and telephone conference with the radiotelegraph conference. Heretofore these conferences have been held separately, the telegraph and telephone conference being held every four years while the radio-telegraph conference was held every five years. We came to the conclusion that a fusion of these two conferences was possible and they will now meet under the name of International Conference of Telecommunications. The next meeting will be held at Cairo, Egypt, five years from September last. The representatives of Egypt extended the invitation to the conference to meet in Cairo at that time. I wish to say a word of appreciation of and to pay tribute to the splendid and most effective cooperation I have received from my colleagues of the delegation, Colonel Steele, who is now, as the house knows, a member of the Dominion Radio Commission, and Mr. Jean Désy, the distinguished adviser to the Canadian legation in Paris. The same tribute applies to the technical advisers who accompanied the Canadian delegation to the Madrid conference. In company with Colonel Steele, who is an expert of the highest rank in radio matters, they played a very prominent part in the work of the conference. At the main conference, in the committees and subcommittees they always took a very prominent part, and I am proud to say that they have rendered very useful service to Canada and they have won for her, in that international gathering, a place well in keeping with her aspirations and her ever-increasing prestige abroad.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): May I ask the minister whether the question of copyright of works performed over the radio was raised during the conference?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the question was raised, and if my hon. friend looks up the annexes, he will find something about it.

1. How many unemployed receive assistance at the camp established in the city of Quebec?
2. Does the provincial government contribute to the upkeep of this camp?

Mr. MANION (for Mr. Gordon):

1. The camp operated by the Department of National Defence as a relief measure contained 417 men as at February 28, 1933.
2. No.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—QUEBEC ROAD CONSTRUCTION

Mr. DUGUAY:

Has the Quebec government made a proposal to the federal government that they jointly undertake road construction to help the unemployed?

Mr. MANION (for Mr. Gordon): Under the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, and the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, the Dominion government contributed to various road works which were carried out by the province and municipalities as set forth in reports respecting those acts which have been tabled. Under The Relief Act, 1932, the Dominion government is contributing to the direct relief expenditures of the province and the municipalities, and it has been provided by provincial regulation that those in receipt of relief should do work in return for same. This work, it is understood, is in many cases road construction.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—UNMARRIED MEN

Mr. DUGUAY:

1. Has the federal government made an agreement with the provinces whereby the former will provide for unmarried unemployed men?
2. What provinces have made representations to the government in this regard?

Mr. MANION (for Mr. Gordon): 1 and 2. This was dealt with very fully by the Minister of Labour on February 24, see Hansard of that date.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

DEPARTMENTAL TRANSLATORS

Mr. GOBEIL:

1. How many translators are there in each department of the government?
2. What are their names and salaries?
3. When were they appointed?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CAP DES ROSIERS, QUEBEC WHARF

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all reports, paysheets, vouchers covering expenditures, and other documents, in respect of repairs to the wharf at Cap des Rosiers, in the years 1931 and 1932.

CONTRACTS UNDER PREVIOUS GOVERNMENTS

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of all contracts granted by the preceding administration that were revoked or modified by the present administration since taking office to date.

Mr. BENNETT: As I mentioned when this motion was called last time, it involves a tremendous amount of what I would conceive to be useless work, inasmuch as to prepare a copy of all the contracts in which, for instance, small extras were paid or any matters of that kind arose, means a great deal of time and labour, and the employment of many people to very little purpose. To say "revoked or modified by the present administration" involves every contract regarding which even an extra five or ten dollars were paid, because this means a modification of the original contract. If he would be willing to amend his motion by providing to have it read:

Revoked and a statement of any modifications that were made in existing contracts

It would be more in keeping with what is required, save time and expense, and secure the return a little more quickly than otherwise.

Mr. BOULANGER: In regard to this motion, I may say that the information I was seeking has already been given by the Prime Minister,—on Monday and just now—by his statement that almost every contract has received some slight modification, by all governments. That is a principle I wanted to have recognized, and I hope the Prime Minister will find a way to modify also the contract for printing currency bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped?

Mr. BOULANGER: Yes.

CURRENCY NOTES AND BONDS—PROPOSAL FOR STAMPING OR PRINTING IN BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. BOULANGER:

For copies of the debentures and bonds of the treasury of the Dominion of Canada printed under chapter 71 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, printed and published in pursuance of section 133 of the British North America Act and section 10, chapter 2 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to me that this resolution is not sufficiently explicit. As it is worded, it would require a copy of every bond or debenture printed under the authority of chapter 71 of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1927, and this would be an impossible task. I would suggest that the hon. member redraft his motion.

Mr. BOULANGER: I want just one specimen.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member revise his motion? In the meantime it will be withdrawn from the order paper.

CANADIAN COINAGE

Mr. BOULANGER:

For specimens of Canadian gold, silver, nickel and bronze coins minted under the authority of chapter 40 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, printed and published in pursuance of section 133 of the British North America Act, and section 10, chapter 2 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

Mr. SPEAKER: This resolution entails a charge upon the people, involves the expenditure of public money and so could only be proposed by a minister of the crown on the recommendation of the Governor General, under standing order 60; and would have to be referred to a committee of the whole house after notice before the house could vote on it. The resolution is not in order when introduced by a private member and will have to be dropped from the order paper.

Motion dropped.

DOMINION NOTES

Mr. BOULANGER:

For copies of Dominion notes issued and printed under chapter 41 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, printed and published in pursuance of section 133 of the British North America Act and section 10, chapter 2 of the Revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

Mr. SPEAKER: The same objection applies to this motion as to the one in regard to treasury debentures and bonds; it is not sufficiently explicit. As it is worded now, it would require a copy of each dominion note so issued. I would ask the hon. member to amend this motion.

Motion dropped.

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of the contract granted by the government of the Dominion of Canada for the printing of Dominion notes issued under chapter 41 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, printed and published pursuant to section 133 of the British North America Act and section 10, chapter 2 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be obvious that this is not a motion the hon. member expects to have met in any way. The return asked for is one that involves statements that may or may not be of fact; it involves questions of conclusions of law that may or may not be good. If he asks for a copy of the last contract granted by the Dominion of Canada for the printing of dominion notes, that should be sufficient.

Mr. BOULANGER: That is sufficient. I may add that all these motions have been inspired by an interview which was granted to the press some time ago by the Postmaster General—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order!

Mr. BOULANGER: —in which he stated that he would move to have laid on the table copies of bills and bonds made in accordance with the requirements of the constitution.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will amend this motion.

Motion dropped.

BILINGUAL COINAGE AND CURRENCY

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of all correspondence or petitions forwarded to the government or any member of the ministry, by any person or association, requesting the coinage of dominion metallic currency and the printing of dominion notes in the two official languages of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be obvious that at least some limitation should be placed on this motion. It began in 1867, and it would be rather a difficult task. I would ask the hon. gentleman to put at least some time limit upon his motion.

Mr. BOULANGER: From August 7, 1913.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think as a matter of privilege it is due to the reputation of this house that I should read two telegrams which have been received by me with respect to observations made by an hon. member of this house regarding persons outside who obviously have no means of making reply except in this way. One is in answer to the telegram that I sent immediately after leaving the chamber and obtaining a copy of Hansard to quote the exact language used by the hon. gentleman. The telegram is from Mr. McClay:

Referring your telegram even date, am prepared to give affidavit that I have never spoken to Mr. Reid in the Chateau Laurier and absolutely deny his allegation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, namely that the Prime Minister is not in order in reading any message emanating from persons outside this house, that reflects on what has been said by hon. members of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): See rule 306.

Mr. BENNETT: Rule 306 does not touch this. I shall deal with the question of order which has been raised. If it is not competent for this parliament in the exercise of its privileges to protect itself from statements such as were made, then I have no appreciation of what the privileges of this house are. The rule does not deal with them. There are 245 members of this house, and they have a right in debate to influence the judgment of the members of this tribunal. But with respect to a matter that was under debate, in introducing the opinions of someone else outside of this house, the hon. member is adding to the numbers of this house, making the membership 246, which is contrary to all the rules of all parliaments so far as I know, especially in Great Britain and under our rule 306, whether it is introducing newspaper opinions or individual opinions because it is introducing another member into the house who is not here for that purpose.

It has long been the privilege, not of an individual member, but of parliament itself, as the right hon. gentleman has so frequently reminded me since I have had to occupy this post, that whoever for the moment is leading the government is leader of the house and should be jealous of its privileges, and one of the privileges of this house is to see that when attacks are made on those outside of the house who may not answer in the house, at least the opportunity should be afforded to them, either by telegram or letter, since they cannot bring an action in courts of law, to state that there has been a misunderstanding or that the statements made were unwarranted. If it is the view of this house or of any part of this house that that high privilege of parliament should be disregarded in this instance I am content, but I feel that it is my duty, and I put it on no higher ground than that, to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that when a member of this house makes a statement with respect to a person who is not in the house but which does touch and impinge upon the honour of a member of this house and a member of this government as well, the privileges of parliament must accord to the government of the day an opportunity to place before this tribunal the statement of the person whose honour is thus impugned. That is the position I desire to take, but if this house desires to prevent the reading of the telegrams on a question of order, which I do not think applies, I am content.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister is free to make any statement which he deems necessary to protect himself, the government or this house, and nobody can take exception to his so doing. The exception that is being taken at the moment is to my right hon. friend reading a telegram from someone who is not a member of this house reflecting on the proceedings of this house, upon words that have been uttered in this house and commenting upon them. It is that feature to which we take exception, and not to the Prime Minister doing all in his power to protect himself or anyone else by making any statement he himself wishes to make. But he must not bring into this house and read documents from persons outside which reflect upon what has been said by hon. members of this house.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not in disagreement with what the right hon. gentleman has said. I think on more than one occasion I have expressed in different terms the same view that he has expressed, that it is not competent for any person outside of this house by the use of telegrams to engage in debate with members within the house, with members who must carry on their debates with one another, and not with persons outside the house. But what I was endeavouring to say was that where the honour of a member of the house is impugned, if he is a member of the government, it is my duty as I conceive it, and I have looked slightly into the matter and have been reminded of it frequently, to endeavour to make clear to the house what the facts are. But if there is objection to the reading of telegrams on that ground, I shall content myself by merely stating that the government has been advised by Mr. McClay and by the Fraser River Elevator Company Limited that the statements must have been made under a misapprehension of the facts and—I will put it as strongly as this—that there is no foundation for them in the form in which they appear.

I am now considering the question whether the matter should not be referred to the committee on privileges and elections for the purpose of protecting those without from attacks from those within to which they cannot reply.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I repeat the statement I made the other day, and which I made on the word of a member of parliament, that the words in question were said to me by Mr. McClay. If I was outside the house I would make precisely the same statement as I made in the house. I repeat that the words were said to me. I have a vivid recollection of them, and I simply stated in the house what was stated to me by Mr. McClay.

NEW WESTMINSTER PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): On Monday the sixth instant my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) asked me a question with regard to conditions in the New Westminster penitentiary. He said that a communication had reached him with regard to some trouble in the New Westminster penitentiary, and I replied on Monday the sixth that no word of it had come to my knowledge. I just wish to inform my hon. friend that a slight disturbance did occur in the penitentiary yesterday, not on Monday. It was not a very large affair, and I am glad to say that it was promptly quelled.

Mr. REID. I hope the minister is not implying that I had advance knowledge of the trouble that occurred yesterday.

PRIVILEGE—MR. STEVENS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I am entitled as a question of privilege to refer to the observations twice repeated by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) which I took occasion promptly and immediately to deny the other day. I think I have a right also to claim from this house, after some twenty-three years here, the same courtesy and assurance from the house that is usually granted in such cases, that it will accept my word. The hon. member in his remarks alleges that someone outside the house stated that he was in a certain position looking after my personal interests. I emphatically denied it at the time, and I again deliberately and emphatically deny it now, and hurl it back into the face of anyone who makes it. I ask this house to accept my word on that point.

Mr. RALSTON: We believe you both, that the hon. member for New Westminster reported what was said to him, and your denial.

Mr. STEVENS: There is something more than a joke in this.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not joking.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend must be joking.

Mr. RALSTON: But I am not.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit you cannot accept both. Either the statement was true or it was not. I assert it was not true, and most emphatically deny it.

Mr. RALSTON: He said he was told it.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Someone told him; he met a strange man on the street.

SEED RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, last fall in parts of Manitoba grasshoppers ravaged the crops, especially oats and barley. As a result farmers find themselves without seed for the spring. May I ask the government if they have received a request from the province of Manitoba to assist in providing seed, and if they have not received such a request will they give favourable consideration to the matter?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the treasurer of the province of Manitoba has been in the city for the last few days and has discussed with the government, fully, the financial position of that province.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, on February 23, an order of the house was passed requesting the Minister of Fisheries to bring down a certain return dealing with a little naval engagement in which some of our fishermen were fired on. I should like to know when the minister will be able to let me have that information.

CURRENCY NOTES AND BONDS

PROPOSAL FOR STAMPING OR PRINTING IN BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to give to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) some information which apparently was overlooked when the discussion was taking place in the house with respect to the printing of bonds in the French language. I give the information in consequence of one of the questions he asked to-day. The following memorandum which has been prepared by the comptroller of currency I should like to read:

Bonds in French text were issued in the various denominations both fully registered and coupon in the issues of the 1917 victory loan maturing 1922, 1927 and 1937; the 1918 victory loan maturing 1923 and 1933 and the 1919 victory loan maturing 1924 and 1934. The demand for these bonds was so small, however, that when the 1922 renewal loan was issued maturing 1927 and 1932 bonds of French text were issued in the $50 denomination only and in the 1923 refunding loan maturing 1928 and 1943 fully registered bonds were issued in the denomination of $500 and coupon bonds in the denomination of $100.

Of the bonds of French text of the 1943 maturity only 268 coupon bonds of $100 each and 66 fully registered bonds of $500 each have been issued since the loan was floated, almost ten years ago.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 7, consideration of the motion of Hon. R. J. Manion for the second reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, this is one occasion when I regret very much the forty minute limit, because the matter before us is so gigantic and important that forty minutes is but sufficient to touch the fringe of it. I shall, however, spend one moment of my time to plead with the government or the minister to refer this bill to the committee on railways and canals. A large body of Canadian citizens are desirous of presenting their views before the House of Commons previous to the passing of this measure. It is not sufficient, as the minister said yesterday, to say that a Senate committee met many citizens and heard statements from them. This bill is now before the House of Commons, not before the Senate; citizens wish to present their views to this house. I know I am speaking for a large body of people in Canada, when I state to the minister they will not be satisfied until they have an opportunity of appearing before a committee of the house.

Before discussing the principle of the bill I direct the minister's attention to section 179 of the Railway Act, which reads as follows:

> The company shall not, at any time, make any change, alteration or deviation in the railway, or any portion thereof, until the provisions of the last preceding section are fully complied with, nor remove, close, or abandon any station, a divisional point nor create a new divisional point which would involve the removal of employees, without leave of the board; and where any such change is made the company shall compensate its employees as the board deems proper for any financial loss caused to them by change of residence necessitated thereby.

If the minister will compare this section of the Railway Act with section 2 of the bill he will find that the privileges and provisions contained in the Railway Act are covered only in part by the bill now before us. Section 2 of the measure under consideration is as follows:

> 2. The provisions of this act shall bind His Majesty and shall prevail over all inconsistent provisions of all other acts.

Then the section goes on to make the exception concerning that part of section 179 of the Railway Act, which relates to compensation of employees for financial loss caused to them by removal, closing or abandonment of any railway station or divisional point. In other words the provision for compensation is there, but the provision which permits the town councils or municipal bodies to appear before the railway commission is entirely eliminated from the section.

I ask the minister to also look at section 7 of the bill before us. It reads as follows:

> No trustee shall be removed from office nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

I do not find that recommendation in the report of the Duff commission and I am wondering where it came from. When did the Senate of Canada receive the right to control the financial interests of Canada? As I understand it the trustees, after their appointment for seven years, cannot be dismissed, and their salaries cannot be reduced except upon an address by the Senate and House of Commons. They can spend all they like or do anything they wish, yet the Senate has to express disapproval before they can be dismissed.

Mr. MANION: They can spend only what money they can get.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, and they can do what they like with the property in those seven years. The proposal to put men in office for seven years and leave them as arbitrators or dictators, with power to deal with the Canadian National Railways as they will, and no matter what they spend the parliament of Canada having no say as to whether or not they should be dismissed, is a principle which I cannot support. I would like the minister to take that into consideration before the final vote is taken upon this motion for second reading, because while I wish to cooperate in every way possible with the government in the exercise of economy, I cannot stultify myself by voting away the principles of democratic government and handing control over to a dictator appointed by the government of Canada.

We have this bill before us for second reading. It is upon the second reading of a measure that we pronounce upon the principle it embodies. To my mind the principle contained in this measure is the amalgamation of the operation of the railroads of Canada, no more and no less. It is of no use to pretend that we are against amalgamation of the properties, while we have in this bill, by means of the arbitral tribunal, provision for the amalgamation of the operation of these railroads. Some one may say no. I see the minister looking askance at that statement. Let me read again what jurisdiction the arbitral tribunal has:

(a) joint use of terminals;
(b) running rights and joint use of tracks where there are actual or functional duplications, or where such may be avoided;
(c) control and prohibition in respect of the construction of new lines and provision of facilities and additional services where no essential need of the public is involved, or where the result would be in the main the division of traffic already adequately provided for;
(d) joint use of facilities where this would promote economy or permit the elimination of duplication or unremunerative services or facilities;
(e) abandonment of lines, services or facilities;
(f) pooling of any part or parts of freight traffic or of passenger traffic; and
(g) things necessarily incidental to the above enumerated matters.

If that is not a direction for amalgamation of the operation of railroad services in Canada then I do not know in what language you could describe it. Reading part III of the bill, and knowing something about railroad matters—too little it is true, but still a little—I look at the possibilities it contains. First the bill directs voluntary cooperation between the two managements. Secondly it provides for forcible cooperation. In my opinion there is no such animal. The moment you attempt by force to make people agree is the very time you make them disagree. Lawyers say: Oh well, we have courts of law; two litigants go to the courts and state their respective cases; a decision is rendered, and that is all there is to it. But the analogy does not hold. The difference is that in the court case either one litigant is satisfied or both are dissatisfied, and they may never see or do business with each other again. Here, on the other hand, the two railway managements are going to sit down together again the next day, probably both disappointed, or one gloating over his conquest over the other. Cooperation in such circumstances is impossible. This I regard as a coercive measure. I can imagine the management of the Canadian Pacific going to the management of the Canadian National and saying: We want you to abandon this service, to merge some other service, to abandon some branch line or main line. If the management of the Canadian National says: No, that would not be in our interest, then the Canadian Pacific will say: We will place the matter before the arbitral tribunal and take our chance there. Is that the way we want to run the railroads of Canada? But that is what we are providing for in this measure as it is before us at the present time.

I can imagine, in fact I have reason to believe and I do believe, that the effect of this measure would be much more far-reaching than we can anticipate at the moment. I have reason to believe this for instance; In the city of Montreal we have two back shops; in the city of Winnipeg we have two back shops; in the city of Calgary we have two back shops, and also in the city of Vancouver. Those points I know. And I believe as certainly as I am standing here that it is contemplated to close one of the shops at each of those points and have one shop do the work for both roads. By that one action between 8,000 and 10,000 men would be thrown out on the streets and their dependents left without means of subsistence. Yet the principle enunciated in this bill provides for that very thing, and I am asked to vote on the second reading endorsing that principle. If that occurs, what provision have we made for these men? Surely if we are going to save, as some say, millions of dollars, yes, billions over a given time, surely we can find ways and means of compensating these people either by pensions, or by putting them into other positions as remunerative as those they have at present. Surely we should not always disregard human rights in the interests of dollars.

I have in mind another condition which I firmly believe will be brought about by the passage of this measure. It has been said that it would be proper to abandon many hundreds of miles of railway line between Winnipeg and the east. If that were done, what would be the effect upon the people in that part of the country who in good faith settled along these railway lines? What effect would it have on the business men who in good faith located in the small towns along that railroad. What effect would it have on the industries that have been located along those lines in good faith? I say in good faith, because the railroads and the branch lines that exist at the present time were built under the authority of this parliament, consequently, having been established in that manner, the people along those lines had the right to believe that the parliament of Canada and the people of Canada would deal fairly with them. I have also in mind the fact that several towns along one of those lines are railroad terminals, with populations consisting chiefly of railroad employees. We built and developed our railroads, as I say, by authority of the parliament of Canada.

Young men left the farms and other occupations and entered the railroad service; they were sent out to these isolated places in order to serve the people of Canada. They got married, built their little homes, their churches, schools and community halls, and now with one stroke of the pen it is intended, as I regard it, to throw these people with their wives and children and dependents into the discard.

Mr. MANION: May I offer a suggestion to my hon. friend, with all respect? He is making a lot of positive statements about what is going to happen under the bill, regarding which no one knows the outcome in the end at all. I doubt if it is wise to throw the fear of that sort of thing into a lot of people at least until there is more cause than there is at present.

Mr. HEENAN: If the Minister of Railways will here and now give me the assurance of the government that this will not be done, I will support the second reading of this measure.

Mr. MANION: I could not give any such assurance.

Mr. HEENAN: Of course you could not.

Mr. MANION: But I say I do not think it is wise for any hon. member to stand in his place and say that this is going to happen when there is no assurance that it will be so.

Mr. HEENAN: I would remind the minister that the member for Kenora-Rainy River is making this speech.

Mr. MANION: I do not think it is a very good one.

Mr. HEENAN: Perhaps not, but I want to tell the Minister of Railways that he and his government dare not go to the country on this measure.

Mr. MANION: We will go to the country on this and other measures when the proper time comes.

Mr. HEENAN: Why do we propose to throw these people into the discard? It is in order to pay interest to those who hold the bonds of those railways. It is about time we began to consider the human beings in this country rather than the payment of the full interest on bonded indebtedness and that sort of thing. Why should the labouring men be sacrificed all the time in order that dividends and interest may be paid? If we have to make sacrifices let them be equal; let those who hold the bonds of these railways make a sacrifice as well. Let us for a start cut their interest in half, and if necesary we can cut it again in order to make their sacrifice equal to that which is required of the labour men of Canada.

I cannot support a measure, Mr. Speaker, that contemplates the sacrifice of human beings in this country in order that money lenders may exact their last pound of flesh. Who suffer first and most in all these matters of economy? Who but the labour men of this country? Who suffer most in connection with the economies made on our railways? In 1931 the railway men were paid $74,000,000 less in wages than they received in 1929. I have not all the figures for this year, but I am satisfied that they will receive in wages $125,000,000 less than they were paid in 1929, and that does not take into consideration the thousands of men who have been thrown on the streets and who are receiving direct relief because of the policies of this government. By means of this measure thousands of others will be discarded and placed among the ranks of the unemployed.

I cannot support such a measure, Mr. Speaker. This bill is based on the findings and recommendations of a body known as the Duff commission, on which there was no labour representative. No consideration was given the human factor in the appointment of this commission. They have said that we have too many miles of railway for our present needs. Of course we have. If this government maintains its present trade policies very much longer we will need only a few airplanes to do the business of this country. Did the Duff commission look at nothing but our present needs? Is that all this government look at? Do they think we are not going to develop and spread out? Are we to tear up the rails and abandon branch lines, terminals and stations just because we are passing through a period of depression at the moment? I say the people of Canada will not stand for such a thing. Then the Duff commission said there had been too much competition, and that it must cease. The railways have had to act as other businesses have acted; they have believed that competition was the life of trade. They have been encouraged to compete, but during a time such as this we change about and tell them they must compete no longer, that they must cooperate and that they are to be condemned for a competition carried on in the past.

The commission also say there have been extravagant expenditures. When you are dealing with millions and billions of dollars that is the easiest thing in the world to say. I have no doubt some expenditures have been made in connection with our railroads, as in connection with any large corporations, that were not warranted. I have no doubt a hotel or a steamship could be picked out here or there which we could have done very well without, but when the Duff commission just say in a general way that the managements of the railroads have been guilty of extravagant expenditures I think it shows that they were paying more attention to theory than to facts. They entirely forgot the services demanded of our railroads by the people. They forgot the speed that was required. They forgot that the Canadian National system was a group of practically bankrupt railroads, and I have sufficient knowledge of railroads to be able to say that when a road is near bankruptcy it is not maintained in very good condition. Sir Henry Thornton had to take those roads out of the mud, and he made them the envy of the railways of the North American continent. Of course great expenditures were required. Money had to be spent for efficiency, so that the people might be conveyed in safety. Larger locomotives had to be built in order to haul greater tonnage and thereby provide greater efficiency. Larger and heavier bridges had to be built in order to carry those larger locomotives, and a more substantial roadbed had to be maintained in order to ensure the safety of the public and the employees of the roads. This all took money.

Yesterday the Minister of Railways spoke on this matter and he referred to the savings that have been effected, especially those made last year. I want to tell the minister—and I do not wish to be unkind—that neither the government nor the present management of the Canadian National could have effected those savings had it not been for the position in which the roads were left by Sir Henry Thornton and his colleagues. I want to ask hon. members to consider one other point when they are considering the question of dollars and cents. Would the people of Canada be satisfied to have in this country the same proportion of people maimed and killed on our railways that goes on in the country to the south? I say they would not, and if the expenditure of money safeguards the lives of the people of this country I think whatever money was spent was well spent. I repeat that had it not been for the previous expenditures made in order to take these bankrupt roads out of the mud and weld them into a first class railway, neither the Minister of Railways, the government nor the present management could have effected the saving that was made last year.

Mr. McGIBBON: Could the hon. member tell us where the savings were made?

Mr. HEENAN: I should like to take a leaf from the book of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), and prescribe only when I am called in. My hon. friend and his party can take all the credit they like for the savings that have been effected, but if it had not been for the efficiency of the management and employees of the Canadian National Railways in maintaining the lines and equipment in good condition, those savings could not have been made. The Canadian railroads are efficiently managed. They are referred to throughout the world as being the most efficiently managed railways there are. Our roads were constructed on a basis entirely different from the roads in Europe; they were constructed upon the same basis as the American roads. The European railroads were constructed and equipped to haul small loads short distances while our railroads were constructed and equipped to haul large loads long distances. We have brought our railroads to such a point of efficiency that to-day we are able to move 12,000 tons of freight per man per mile more than the railroads in the United States. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) referred to the wage structure and the working conditions, and for his information I would say that we move this extra tonnage for approximately seven per cent less wages.

Mr. McGIBBON: Putting more men out of jobs.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. McGIBBON: I quite believe that.

Mr. HEENAN: There is no more need for this bill than there is for the man in the moon. Our railroads should be permitted to cope with this depression. The head of the Canadian National Railways is an experienced railroad man and if a check is needed upon him it can be had through the Minister of Railways or the government of the day or the House of Commons. Does the house think that the head of the Canadian Pacific Railway is free to build more hotels, more steamships or more branch and main lines? He is under the check of his shareholders and directors and in addition, as I understand it, he could not do these things without the authority of this parliament. We ought to give these men credit for having some business sense.

This bill could be introduced only at a time of depression and then only under the cloak of a financial burden. No party in this country, whether it be the Liberal party, the Conservative party or the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would dare to introduce a measure for the amalgamation of the operations of our railroads and expect to get the endorsation of the electors of this country. This bill practically provides for a dictatorship from first to last. There are to be three trustees but the chairman shall have a veto over the other two. The trustees are to be appointed for seven years and they cannot be dismissed or have their salaries reduced other than by an address of the Senate and the House of Commons. There is to be an arbitral tribunal and there is no appeal from the decisions of the chairman of this tribunal. Unless some statement is made before the vote is taken as to what the government proposes to do in committee, I shall vote against the second reading of this measure.

What is needed to solve the railroad problem of Canada is greater tonnage and this could be provided by an additional flow of trade in and out of Canada. The records of 1926 will show that the railroads paid over and above their operative expenses. This surplus amounted to from $20,000,000 to $50,000,000, in one year being as high as $54,000,000. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) shakes his head, but I want him to realize that I am speaking about the earnings over and above the operating expenses; I am not speaking about the financial structure and the interest upon bonds. We ought not to be in despair over this problem. Compared with 1928 and 1929 we have lost more than half of our trade, so is it any wonder we have a railroad problem? Should we take advantage of this situation to create a dictatorship to run our railroads without any control by parliament? We should not. I contend that this is a breach of faith with the electors of Canada who were promised emphatically that there would be amalgamation never and competition ever. While this bill may not provide for the complete amalgamation of the two systems, it does provide for the amalgamation of operations and in my opinion that is the thin end of the wedge of final amalgamation of the two railroads.

References were made last evening by the hon. member for Stanstead to the wage structure and the conditions of employment of the railwaymen of Canada. It was quite evident that the hon. member was dealing with something about which he knew very little.

Mr. HACKETT: That is a custom well established in the house.

Mr. HEENAN: I think a lot of the hon. member, but last night he showed that he could make a speech with his tongue in his cheek.

Mr. HACKETT: Last year I was called to order for making that utterance.

Mr. HEENAN: I felt sorry for the hon. member when he concluded his remarks by saying that in these days a man should support the government at all costs. I do not intend to support this or any government at the cost of a principle. The principle of this bill is the amalgamation of the operations of our railroads as well as the provision for a dictatorship and the establishment of an arbitral tribunal. As one who is interested in his fellowmen I shall be forced to vote against the second reading of this bill unless the government makes some pronouncement in connection with some of the objections raised.

The wage structure of our railroads has been built up from negotiations extending back over a period of fifty years. These negotiations were carried on by men who knew their business better than the hon. member or myself. They were men who were interested in the financial structure of our railroads and in the paying of dividends while on the other side of the table sat men who were interested in the welfare of the worker. It is not enough to make a sweeping statement that this structure needs investigation. If we are going to investigate wage structures, we ought to investigate the salaries and fees paid to professional men. I would be quite prepared to go right down the line and investigate the salaries and fees paid to professional men and to those employed by the financial institutions who have fleeced the public in an effort to pay large dividends upon their stocks. I would be quite prepared to investigate all these matters and I am quite satisfied that the wage structure of the railroad men would stand up one hundred per cent against any of them. The hon. member referred to the fact that when a man ran one hundred miles he received one day's pay. The fact is that a one hundred mile run is considered to be a day's pay because it is the minimum that can be paid for the man's work. The hon. member referred to the case where a man might be called out, then sent home again and yet receive his day's pay. That shows that the matter is complicated. These are men who do not get pay when they are not called out; they are not on salary or wages; they are paid only for the time they are called out. In all these cases where seemingly a man gets something for nothing, it will be found that he has to give something for nothing at the other end. For instance, a man is called out; he goes over a division in eight or ten hours and he gets paid so much a mile for his work. He has to remain at the other end of that division, whether it be ten, twelve or twenty hours, without pay, on duty ready to take his turn out again when the railroad company requires his services. Consequently the matter is compensated. The whole question is one that ought not to be discussed lightly, and I am prepared to discuss it at any place or time with any hon. member. But I say that these are matters that have been investigated and considered by boards and boards and boards of conciliation and investigation, and not in a single case has the wage structure that has been built upon our railroads or the condition of employment ever been interfered with.

I see my time is about up. There are two or three matters I have pointed out that in my opinion require that this government should permit the bill to go to a committee, so that those who are vitally interested in the question may present their views to the House of Commons. I have also pointed out two or three matters in regard to which the approval of the House of Commons should not be asked. I would request the minister to take note of them and if, before the debate is concluded, he is prepared to make any pronouncement satisfactory to the house, I shall support the measure on the second reading, reserving to myself the right to offer amendments in committee. If, however, there is no answer from the government with respect to those matters, then I regret that I shall have to vote against the principle of this measure.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I remember on one occasion sitting in the gallery of the local legislature in Toronto and after a gentleman had made a very vitriolic attack on the late Hon. G. W. Ross, who was then premier, the latter rose and said: "Now that everything and everybody has been damned, let us get down to business." After listening to the speech of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan), and reflecting upon the little he contributed to the solution of the problems now before the house and the country, I could not help thinking of the futility of the debates in this chamber. Parliament to-day is confronted with the greatest problem with which, since the war, this country has ever had to deal. If we exclude the casualty lists, the problems with which we are attempting to deal are the greatest that have ever come before the House of Commons and the Senate of this dominion. This bill is a challenge to democracy in a responsible institution. We have to decide here to-day, or before this bill passes, how much parliament can salvage from the wreckage of the railway systems of this country, in which the people have a sum invested of no less than $2,600,000,000, and where they have had for some time in the past, and in my opinion will have for many years to come, a tax ranging from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year. In addition to that there are in the offing the jobs of possibly 150,000 or 175,000 men in this country. That is the problem which this bill is attempting to solve; it is the problem before this house and before the people of Canada to-day, and to my mind it is one of the greatest problems with which we have ever had to deal.

I do hope this bill may solve it. I recognize the fact that on the authority of this house we appointed a committee of eminent railway, business and legal men who gave freely of their time and talent, and embodied their conclusions in a report which they presented to the house. Based upon that report is the bill which we are now considering. To that committee, which gave so freely of its time and talent to solve problems which are ours, we owe at least the courtesy of putting its conclusions into practice for at any rate a short time. I hope this bill may solve the question, but I have given the matter a great deal of thought for the last ten years and intensive thought for the last two years, and I must say I feel this bill will fail to give this country the redress it needs. I say that reluctantly, but it is my firm conviction that we have to do something more drastic. We are simply scarifying the surface, beneath which lies a fulminating, malignant condition that is weighing heavily in the form of taxation upon the people of Canada. I hope this bill will do the work; I hope in the years to come we may report such increased earnings and savings that the taxation on an already heavily burdened people will be lessened, but I believe we shall have to go deeper to find the remedy.

It is not for me to resurrect the dead, to place flowers upon sepulchres or to say a requiem mass, so to speak, upon the departed; but when I heard the hon. member from West Lambton (Mr. Gray) try yesterday to accuse the party upon your right, sir, as being responsible for the problems with which we have to deal to-day, I thought in justice to myself, to the party I represent and to the vote that I gave in 1919 to take over those roads, I must justify my action then in the light of history and of the measure which we now have before us. This is the second time that the party on this side of the house has had to step in and straighten out the railway situation of this country.

Mr. YOUNG: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member for Weyburn doubt that?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well, let me tell him that when his party guaranteed the bonds of the old Canadian Northern from Fort William east, and when they started the Grand Trunk Pacific, they placed upon the necks of the people of Canada the railway problem we have had ever since.

What was the condition in 1919 when this question loomed large upon the political horizon of this country? Let me remind the house through you, Mr. Speaker, that during the war the Grand Trunk and other railways in this country with which the government was involved held up the government of the day for money out of the federal treasury while the company went on paying dividends to its stockholders in England. The railways were supported at that time in order to maintain the service. I remember well looking into the obligations of the country at that time in connection with the railways, and I found that by guarantees and loans this country was committed to $331,000,000 of obligations, and in addition the provinces were committed to some $96,000,000 of obligations, making a total of some $425,000,000 which this country stood to lose. There were negotiations at that time for the absorption of the Canadian Northern by the Canadian Pacific, negotiations to get control of the stock of the Canadian Northern which were only stopped by the action of the then government.

In addition to that $425,000,000 of obligations, we had on our hands the Moncton to Winnipeg line and the Intercolonial, in which we had invested something over $400,000,000. If we had let the national railway slip out of our hands at that time these railways would have been largely useless. They had not terminals of their own and traffic-gathering facilities, and the country would have been confronted with some $800,000,000 of loss, and practically no assets on the other side of the ledger.

What did we do on that occasion? We took over all these railways and we thereby contracted another $800,000,000 of obligations. But that was very little more than we would have lost had we done what many advocated —allowed the roads to go into bankruptcy. It is on that ground, sir, that I have always justified my vote in the past for the government ownership of these railways to the extent to which this country is already committed. It was a necessity. It was not our child, but it was on our doorstep. It was a situation with which we had to deal, and we passed the necessary legislation for consolidating all these railways into one national system. It is true that the consolidation had not taken place before we went out of office, but the legislation had been passed, everything was prepared, and the roads were the property of the Dominion of Canada.

I say without fear of successful contradiction that had the management of that day been left in charge we would not have had the mess we have to-day. If you look at the returns you will find that the greatest improvement ever made by the Canadian National Railways was made in the year 1922. But what have we to-day? Instead of the obligations I have mentioned we have a debt upon this country on account of these roads of $2,600,000,000. That is the amount to which it has grown since this government went out of office in 1921. That is the colossal amount to which the debt had multiplied and magnified when we returned to power in 1930 and had to deal with this question.

In answer to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) who has just left the chamber I should like to mention a few of the ways in which that great debt has been multiplied. First let me mention the most important thing connected with the management of a railway, the operating ratio. The operating ratio of the Canadian National Railways in 1923 stood at 91·8, and in 1931, at the end of that reckless piracy—shall I say?—which took place, it stood at 99·8. Yet the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River says that the roads were economically and wisely run! During that same period the Canadian Pacific Railway reduced its operating ratio from 80·3 to 80. In other words, while the operating ratio of the Canadian National increased from 91 to practically 100, the operating ratio of the Canadian Pacific dropped from about 81 to 80.

There was about the same difference in branch line construction. In 1923 the cost per mile of branch line construction on the Canadian National was $40,000 odd, and in 1931 that had grown to $51,000 odd. In the meantime the Canadian Pacific had reduced their cost per mile of branch line construction from $35,000 to $30,000. The difference in that per mileage cost meant an increased $800 of taxes per mile upon the whole of our national system which was constructed in that way.

I could also take you into the hotel system. During that same period there was a deficit of over $2,000,000 odd in the operation of the hotels of the Canadian National system, while the Canadian Pacific had a profit on the operation of their hotels of $7,000,000.

I could take you into the steamships on the western coast, or into the cost of the construction of the different hotels that were built by the Canadian National system. For instance, in Saskatoon, a hotel was built with 260 rooms at a cost of $14,000 per room. If hon. gentlemen will read the evidence that was given by Mr. Fairweather and Mr. Ruel, officials of the Canadian National Railways, they will see that these gentlemen said that these hotels should never have been opened because it was impossible for them to pay. In Vancouver, for instance, an hotel costing $11,000,000 was built on the pretext that there was an agreement with the old Canadian National. I put myself on record a year ago that the agreement signed by the late Doctor Reid, when he was Minister of Railways, had been cancelled some fourteen years ago. Yet on a pretext of that sort the Canadian National went into the hotel business in Vancouver.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who passed the order in council for the construction of the hotel in Vancouver?

Mr. MANION: The Conservative party, for the construction of a hotel costing three and a half millions, not eleven millions.

Mr. McGIBBON: My point is that there was no obligation to build a hotel at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes there was. You are wrong.

Mr. McGIBBON: I dispute that. It took me a month to get the facts from the Railway department, and I put them on record. If the hon. member will read Mr. Hanna's evidence before the Senate committee he will see that it confirms my statement.

Again, what did Mr. Ruel say when Sir Joseph Flavelle pressed him for an answer regarding the Saskatoon hotel, as to who had demanded it? He replied that he would rather not answer. You know who it was. The same sort of thing took place in Halifax. I say that it is the reckless extravagance that characterized the management of the Canadian National Railways from 1923 to 1931 that has brought the railways into the position they are in to-day. What are we going to do about it? There has been some criticism about having three trustees. I must say that were I in charge of the appointment there would be only one. Napoleon once said he would rather have one second-class general than two firsts. There has to be finality; there has to be a man who can make a decision, make it at once and carry it out. If there is not that decision we always find that as a result a country or a business reaches a crisis.

I do not know where they will get such a man; I fear in that connection there may be some difficulty. However if they do get him it will mean the salvation of the roads—if they can be saved. Of that I am very doubtful. However I am in favour of three rather than five trustees, and should prefer one to three. I believe a provision for only one would add to the efficiency of the management. Although I do not agree with hon. members opposite on many occasions, I agree that this is a negation of responsible government. The fact that I agree with hon. members opposite makes me think that probably I am wrong. I am glad hon. members applaud my remarks. However before they become too enthusiastic I should like them to turn their minds to what I have been saying in the last five or ten minutes. If they read the report of the commission from one end to the other they will find it is permeated with the fear of political influence. I believe the provision for three trustees was put there deliberately to prevent any future parliament or government from doing what was done from 1923 to 1931.

Mr. HANBURY: Why not include 1933?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Bring it up to date.

Mr. McGIBBON: I can bring it up to date, if you like; the nearer we bring it, the worse it becomes.

Let me tell hon. members opposite that in the years from 1923 to 1931 the national railways failed by $168,000,000 to meet the deficits on the interest they owed the public, to say nothing about the amounts owed the government. Just think of it—$168,000,000. They failed by that amount to meet the interest owing to the public and the deficits on the road. Are hon. members opposite proud of those eight years of administration?

Mr. RALSTON: Did the hon. member ever expect the railways to meet the interest due the public?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, they should have met the interest due to the public, and they would have, had they not piled up so much debt. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the worst side of the picture—not by any means. There has never been a day nor an hour for which depreciation on the Canadian National railways has been allowed. Just think of the rolling stock extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific which stands out under the heavens twenty-four hours each day. Is that rolling stock not depreciating? Do you not think that some day the railways will have to come to parliament and ask for hundreds of millions of dollars for replacements? Had there been proper depreciation allowances, even at the rate of only two per cent, and charged only on the money owed the public, there would have been a fund of $24,000,000 for depreciation. We will have to meet that depreciation some day. Why try to fool ourselves?

Let us for a few moments find out what sort of asset we have in the Canadian National Railways. I have supported the railways ever since the government took them over. However I do not like to fool myself or my people, and I do not like to see the country fooled. At a meeting about a year ago the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) asked Sir Henry Thornton what would be the correct valuation of the road. The hon. member stated that, as a going concern, the Canadian Pacific Railway was valued at $70,000 per mile, and asked Sir Henry if $60,000 per mile would be a fair valuation for the Canadian National system? Sir Henry replied that he thought it would. Sixty thousand dollars a mile means what? It makes a total sum of about $1,300,000,000, or just about the amount owed the public. I say that the people of Canada have not only lost $1,300,000,000 but that to-day they have not a dollar of assets in the Canadian National Railways. On the contrary they have a liability that for some years has cost Canada $100,000,000 per year.

Much as I would like to, I cannot see any daylight in the future. I cannot see where the present difficulty is going to be remedied. I wish it could be. I had hopes that some solution could be found; I had hoped that when the Duff commission made its report we would have a solution for the greatest problem with which we are faced to-day. But, sir, the solution is not here. To my mind the suggestions offered will not solve the problem. We can close a ticket office here or a ticket office somewhere else, but I suggest that by that means we cannot pull down a yearly deficit of $100,000,000. We cannot do it that way.

Let us analyze the position a little farther. If we read the Duff report we will find the startling statement made that forty-two per cent of the mileage of Canadian railways carries less than five per cent of the ton miles. Just think of that. I ask the business men throughout the length and breadth of Canada if that is not the cause of our railway difficulties. To my mind it is. When we have forty-two per cent of our railway mileage doing less than five per cent of the business, I believe we have reached the root of the trouble.

Mr. NEILL: Would you quote your authority for that?

Mr. McGIBBON: It is right in the Duff report, if you would read it. The information is prepared by Mr. Loree. On the other hand ten per cent of the mileage did fifty per cent of the business.

When we get down and dissect the trouble, the way doctors have to dissect the human body to ascertain the nature of a disease, I think we will find that our difficulty lies where I have just indicated, and that is the problem which the country must solve. The question is: How are we to solve it? I had hoped that we would have a solution. I know that Canada will not stand for an amalgamation of railroads. In my present frame of mind, and so long as I have a vote, I would not vote to take over the Canadian Pacific railway. I believe the president of that line flashed the red light signal of danger on every sideline from Halifax to Vancouver. In all his speeches he has sounded the Macedonian cry for help, and I do not blame him. He is looking after his own property, and I think also that probably he is patriotic enough to help out in connection with other problems of our country. However, as I have stated, I have had enough of public ownership of railways. I would not be a party to selling the Canadian National system to the Canadian Pacific, because we are not building for an hour or a day. It is like an army conquering a country, you are not doing it for ten, twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty years, but for centuries to come. If we can find some way to tide these railways over this depression until we are again on the road to prosperity I think they may both prove very useful and remunerative undertakings.

But what is the solution? I confess honestly that the only one that I can see is joint operation for the present. We had Mr. Ruel on the one hand, a patriotic official, I believe, of the Canadian National, saying that $30,000,000 can be saved, and Mr. Beatty saying that $75,000,000 can be saved, per year. I do not know Mr. Beatty, I never saw him, I do not know any official of the Canadian Pacific and I never owned a share of Canadian Pacific stock in my life. But when I heard some statements in his speeches contradicted I wrote to him and asked him what he meant. I said: The people of this country will not stand for amalgamation in any shape or form. His reply was that what he meant was simply joint management for operating purposes.

You will remember that he said in Winnipeg that he would appoint a joint treasurer and would pay part of the receipts to one company and part to the other. I have gone up and down this country a good deal, I have talked with men in trains and hotels and other places, and what the average man on the street says is: If you can save $75,000,000 by economies it should be saved rather than ask me to pay it out of my pocket. I believe, sir, that for the present, if it is practical, joint operating management offers the best solution, the greatest means of economy that we have before us. I know the house will not agree with that, the press will not agree, probably the public will not agree with me, but I believe they will inside of three years if this depression continues. After all is not that what is going on all over the country? Isn't it going on in business? I have here the report of the Coolidge committee that investigated the railroads in the United States, that is what they advocate. It is what is done in business, it is the commonsense thing to do.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not advocate amalgamation of all roads.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well, nearly all. I know there is opposition to it, I know the newspapers will criticize me to-morrow, but I want to go on record because I think it is the duty of members of parliament to lead the people of the country not where they want to go but where they ought to go. That is the reason I am making this speech this afternoon. I believe that public opinion is turning rapidly to joint operation as a temporary solution. I think I have made myself clear that I am not for amalgamation. I have said before on the public platforms of Ontario that if you amalgamated these roads you would be moving your capital from Ottawa to Montreal. I am not for that.

One last thought that I want to utter; it is in the interest of labour. Labour I know is fearful of displacement of men. If these two roads could be put upon a better financial operating basis I think the labouring man would be much more certain of steady work than he is to-day. And I am not convinced that that cannot be done. Mr. Beatty says it can. At any rate an attempt should be made. I think the solution probably was suggested the other day in the railway committee of the Senate when these men who are out of jobs said; If you will reduce the running miles per month to 2,000 it will take up all the slack and we will all have a job. I think that should be done during this temporary depression.

In conclusion I would like to say that I am not very much impressed with the objections taken to part III by the head of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If you read the evidence it is plain that six or seven years ago he would have been glad to have a commission of that kind, to have a tribunal to which to appeal to stop the extravagance not only of his road but of the Canadian National. That is in the evidence and it is so plain in the report that you cannot get away from it. If it would have been a good thing in years gone by it may be a good thing in the future. At any rate I think he would stand higher in the estimation of the public if he had said: I will accept this plan even though I do not like it, and we will do the best we can under it for the time being. I think that would have been a better spirit, and probably would have been reflected in a changed attitude on the part of the public, so that in the future he would have found it easier perhaps to get what he wanted.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): Mr. Speaker, this bill respecting the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways is of extremely great importance. Our railway problem is very serious. Having listened to the speech of the Minister of Railways yesterday afternoon, however, it would seem that the Canadian National is even now getting in better shape financially and has ameliorated the situation during the past two years. The Canadian Pacific Railway is evidently in sound health. By part II of the bill cooperation is to be resorted to, so to speak, as a transfusion of blood. Thus it is thought possible to ameliorate the situation of the railways in Canada. The Canadian Pacific Railway is a private corporation, incorporated by a special act of this parliament. It is not and was not obliged to take part in such a project, to respond to such an invitation. The Duff report has recommended cooperation and the Canadian Pacific seems to have lent itself to the idea, although not very enthusiastically. The evidence taken before the railway committee of the Senate, and the discussion in the Senate when the bill came up for third reading, shows how the Canadian National Railways were created by a law passed by our friends to your right, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian National is their adopted son. I remember a few years ago the Liberal party succeeded one year in dressing it up in a very charming way, and when the report was brought to the house our good friend the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said: It is our child, look how it has improved; it is really by our efforts that the railroad came into existence. I do not know whether he and hon. gentlemen to your right have the same idea to-day. From 1922 to 1930 the Liberal party took great care of that child and did its best to bring it up properly, but they admit that it was a very difficult child to bring up. To-day, due to the depression, that child has gone back to his family, and now the Conservative government which is directing the affairs of the country says that child must be put under a triple interdiction, that it must be provided with three trustees to administer its property. The surprising thing, however, is that these trustees will have no responsibility to the government or to parliament. This is very extraordinary. We admit, with the public in general, that something should be done in the interests of the Canadian National Railways, but do we find a real remedy for the evils of the moment in the bill now before us? If I were to speak frankly I should say that I do not believe we do, but as a member of parliament I will say that I doubt it until further evidence is shown. I am still open to conviction; I am praying for light.

I listened to the Minister of Railways yesterday, and in a way he promised the house that no amalgamation of the two railways is in prospect. I take his word as a responsible minister of the crown. Time will tell, but I hope that if ever the question of amalgamation does come forward again it will be dealt with by means of a bill which will be brought before both houses of parliament for consideration. Reading the present bill very carefully I do not see any words indicating that amalgamation will be brought about, but in some of the sections I am afraid I see a nigger in the woodpile. The trustees may say, "Well, we have done our best to help the road but we have had no success." Then if one of the trustees says amalgamation must come, the chairman—the czar—may say, "Let us vote for amalgamation," and that body, having no responsibility to the government or to parliament, may make the deal of their own volition. Then the question will come before this house only if some readjustment is necessary, while any questions of law and jurisdiction will go to the Supreme Court of Canada.

If there is to be no amalgamation—and I take the word of a minister of the crown in this regard—it seems to me that the government has listened to public opinion on that point, and I think the bill will pass this house. Amalgamation was the great fear not only of the railway employees but of the public at large; for the moment this anxiety is dissipated, and we hope it will remain so in the best interests of the national railways and of the public generally, because we must admit that amalgamation is never a good thing. I should prefer to have five railways doing business in Canada rather than the two present roads combined under one management. It was through diversity of industry that industry prospered; through diversified industries the citizens of Canada derived profit.

I will not dwell on the past administration of the Canadian National; I do not see that it has any bearing on the question now before the house, but I think we all admit that decreased tonnage has been the great trouble with our railways. Does anyone think that if tonnage had continued to increase throughout Canada during the period of the depression the railways would have been in their present condition? Sufficient money would have been collected not only to maintain the railway in good shape but to build up a reserve as well, and the railway system would have been our biggest asset. Now we must face the facts and prepare not only for this but for future generations.

I have listened with interest to hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate; I think almost all the important points of this bill have been dealt with.

I have not been convinced that this bill will provide a solution of our railway problem even though it does provide for the forced cooperation of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to section 4, which reads:

> The governor in council may vacate all nominations heretofore made to the board of directors of the national company pursuant to section 3 of the national act, and may appoint in the place and stead of and in succession to the incorporators of that company three trustees, whose powers, rights, privileges, immunities, duties, responsibilities and restrictions shall be as in and by this act provided.

Under that section the governor in council may appoint three trustees to act in the interests of the national railways. I do not think that such an appointment will be acceptable because the trustees will not be responsible to parliament. It will not be for the benefit of the people of Canada as a whole.

It may be said that I am speaking for the people in my own constituency of St. Henri, and I am. There are three thousand railway men in my constituency, employed by both the large railroads. Many of these men are now out of work. In the past they were able to earn good salaries, but because of the depression and decreased savings they have been forced to leave the better wards and come to live in St. Henri, which is a workingman's ward. In their interests I think the trustees should number five instead of three. These trustees will have great responsibility, and three men could hardly be expected to have the necessary insight into the various conditions in Canada. I do not want my fellow members to think that I am contending that I can solve this great problem, I am only making a sincere effort to help. I was glad to hear the minister say that this is a non-partisan measure, and if that is true it is quite possible that useful suggestions will be made from all parts of the house.

I think there should be one trustee appointed to represent the maritime provinces. Those provinces have their own privileges and rights; they have their own Intercolonial railway to take care of. I think if that railway was put under separate administration it would be in the best interests of that part of the country. Another trustee should be appointed from the western provinces. This man would have a special knowledge of the problems of wheat transportation. If additional markets had been found for our wheat, our railways would have been in much better condition to-day. There should be two trustees appointed from the central provinces to represent industry, agriculture and the centres of colonization. A fifth trustee should be appointed to represent the employees of the railroads. If the house should agree to this suggestion, not because it is made by the hon. member for St. Henri but because it has been suggested by many of my colleagues, I think it would be of great benefit to Canada. With only three trustees, one representing the Canadian National Railways, the other the Canadian Pacific Railway and the third as chairman, we can see what will happen. The chairman is bound to incline either to the Canadian National or to the Canadian Pacific. One trustee cannot come from the nine provinces, he must have been born in one province and educated in one city and his experience will be confined to one part of Canada. It would be practically impossible to find a man with sufficient mentality to deal with the problems arising all over Canada. If one trustee is appointed to represent the maritimes, one to represent the western provinces, two to represent the central provinces and one to represent labour, I think it would be shown that all parts of the country had been considered. By giving representation to our railway employees, the government will satisfy them. In any industry there are two parties, employers and employees, and when they are working together in cooperation, success follows. The employees of both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific have always worked in the interest of those railways, and to-day, on account of circumstances many who have served those companies for twenty-two years are out of work. That is not their fault; it is not the fault of the companies; it is due to circumstances, the hard times through which Canada is passing. Nevertheless those employees are waiting for better times to take back their trains, to return to work. They are respectable, peaceable unemployed men, respecting Canadian law, and they are only waiting to be represented on the board of trustees such as is suggested in this bill. The personnel of the board should be five instead of three, because, if there are only three, I say sincerely that I see no hope for a labour man or a railway employee, a man from the bottom of the ladder, knowing something about railway work, to be appointed to such a board. Such an appointment would put hope into the unemployed railroaders; it would put them later on in a position, should any dispute arise, of being better understood and of having their grievances properly judged by a man who knows them, who understands their work and who is practical enough to show them all the consideration they deserve. Such an appointee would have their respect even should a decision be rendered against them.

We suggest that part III of this bill, headed "Arbitration in case of disagreement," section 17, on page 10, is also not acceptable. It does not give satisfaction even to the Canadian National. Moreover it is an imposition of tribunals and procedures to be followed, upon the Canadian Pacific, in regard to the settlement of disputes that may arise between the two railways, when a decision is rendered in favour of one party, the other resisting, and also when a common effort between the two railways is required. I would suggest that the tribunal be the one now actually existing in Canada, the Board of Railway Commissioners. This board has been established for a long time; it has had much experience; it has a good standing in the land, and its work is appreciated even by foreign countries. An amendment to that effect should be substituted in part III, section 17, of this bill.

After having read this bill again and again, let me say frankly that it offers little encouragement not only as regards economies in the Canadian National, but for the future. As to the individual prosperity of our railroads, the principle of compulsory cooperation implied in the bill is very dangerous. I cooperate with a friend to establish a business, and if profit and success come, that follows in the course of things. But if I force somebody to cooperate with me, will he work very strongly to make a success of the enterprise? Not at all. The Canadian Pacific apparently is not willing to enter the proposed scheme; it is forced into it by this bill. It is often said that a corporation has no soul; but corporations have interests; they are interested in earning profits not only for salaries, but for dividends for those who invest money in big companies. The Canadian Pacific is a great company which has always fulfilled its pledges and by its transactions has done honour to Canada. I am not a Canadian Pacific man; I have no interest whatever in that company, but I admire that institution and I also admire the Canadian National Railways, the property of the state. I am proud of our national railways; I am also proud of the Canadian Pacific as a private company. The Canadian Pacific has too much of its own interests in view to cooperate to make a success of the proposed measure; it is a private corporation; it is in business for private gain, and in such a case how is that business cared for? What happens in small businesses in the ordinary affairs of life will also occur in big enterprises. The Canadian Pacific is not obliged at its own expense to cooperate with another railway, and if it does so, that will be at the expense of the Canadian National Railways. This is my sincere conviction. I think it would be more profitable for the Canadian people to obtain a complete reorganization of the Canadian National Railways under the control of the Canadian parliament. We have been elected for some purpose. The Canadian National Railways are our inheritance to-day, and if we care for the property of the state, we must preserve it intact. We have no right by camouflaged means to give it away.

Yesterday the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), when addressing the house, offered congratulations to the temporary president, officers and directors of the Canadian National Railways for the success they have achieved in recent months. Then why not continue to follow along the present lines, which according to the Minister of Railways will lead us into paradise? It will be for the good not only of the Canadian National Railways but of the Canadian Pacific Railway as well. The Canadian Pacific is a privately owned company, with its own lines and its own administration, and it has no immediate interest in being dragged into the scheme proposed under this bill. It has its own business to conduct, and is not peering into the affairs of its neighbour or looking for amalgamation. It has a big enough load of its own to carry just now.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, while I am not a railway man, I have read the bill and I have talked with the electors of my constituency and have obtained some slight knowledge in that way of railway matters. Some of them have suffered very much by reason of the condition on the railways. I know that they do not want the amalgamation of these two railways.

I hope that many other members of this house will take part in this debate and will bring light not only to myself but to other members. I am looking to the government as a beacon of light, though it is not giving forth much light at the present time.

There is one feature which I would emphasize and that is that the trustees and the boards to be appointed under this act will be responsible neither to the government nor to parliament. We are really pawning our railways and receiving in exchange a ticket, and when we try to get them back we shall find that the time limit has expired and the railways have gone. I shall listen to hon. members to try to learn more about this bill with the hope that later on I shall be in a position to vote in the best interests not only of the Canadian National Railways, which is our own property, but of the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house involves a consideration of the principles of the bill which was so ably and so lucidly presented to the house by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). The debate thus far, with the exception perhaps of a slight excursion into the realm of politics by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) and some of those incorrigibles who approved his stand, has proceeded upon the high plane which was set by the minister, and I propose briefly to discuss the bill in that spirit.

The bill proceeds upon three principles: First, the naming of trustees in the place and stead of the incorporators of the Canadian National Railways; second, the laying of a statutory duty to cooperate upon the two railways; and third, the providing of a sanction for the performance of that duty. Generally speaking, I find that these principles commend themselves to the house. It is true that some members have somewhat doubtfully given their adherence to them, but I have not been able to find myself sharing in the least in the doubt that has been expressed as to this bill. In the first place the bill comes to us as the result of a prolonged and careful study of the whole railway transportation problem in the Dominion of Canada by a body of men highly qualified in that regard; and secondly, it comes to us after a searching and critical study by the other house, where it received unanimous approval.

The more I hear of and study the provisions of this bill, the more convinced I am that we should adopt it here. It is not to be expected that we can find an immediate and complete cure for the railway ills of this country. It is hardly to be hoped that by some Midas-like touch we can put the railways in the category of paying institutions. But what this bill does provide is a pathway along which these two great railway systems can progress to a position as favourable as can be under conditions as they exist in this country.

The only alternative which has been seriously suggested is that of amalgamation, and fears have been expressed that the deletion of a certain clause from the bill in another place rather favours the possibility of amalgamation. The Duff commission has found in terms against amalgamation, and with that finding of the commission I wholeheartedly agree. Having declared against amalgamation, the commission proceeded to set out certain measures which should be carried into the bill, which measures were designed to effect a cure so far as possible of the problem to which the commission's attention was directed. Then the draftsman, so I take it, having seen in the commission's report the repudiation of amalgamation, and desiring in all probability to embody in his draft bill all the recommendations of the report, saw fit to insert a clause providing against amalgamation. In my humble opinion that was entirely unnecessary. The whole bill proceeds upon the assumption that the two railway companies shall continue as separate entities operating in this country. If that clause was designed to prevent parliament at some future time from discussing amalgamation, the clause was inoperative. On the other hand, if it was designed to prevent the trustees named in the bill from carrying into effect amalgamation under the provisions of the bill, then obviously it was unnecessary. It does not seem to me to be a matter about which we need concern ourselves very greatly at the moment. If it is bad draftsmanship, as I think it is, to insert in a bill clauses or even words which are unnecessary, still I am quite content to abide by the opinion of the law officers of the crown; if they believe such a provision is useful or necessary I have no doubt that the government will offer no objection to the inclusion of such a provision. Certainly in his presentation it has been made amply clear by the minister that this bill is not in any way designed to afford an opportunity for the amalgamation of the two roads. In my view it would be a very serious situation for this country to find itself with a railway monopoly, public or private. I cannot contemplate such a situation with equanimity, though if there had to be one my preference would not be a private but a public monopoly. But with any monopoly competition would not exist, and competition is the spur and the incentive to efficiency and economy. Without it any railway would soon sink to a low level of service. And besides, a railway monopoly in this country would establish a tremendous force that could not but be dangerous to the good of the country.

There are two criticisms directed against the bill, one that it lends itself to amalgamation and the other that too much power is given to certain officials. May I deal with them categorically. As to the first I think probably I need add nothing to what I have said, because my criticism as to the clause concerning amalgamation carries with it my answer to the first of the objections I have mentioned. But concerning the allegation that the powers placed in the hands of certain officials are too great, I should like to direct the attention of the house to certain clauses in the bill. Section 9, subsection 1, provides:

> When the governor in council shall proclaim in the Canada Gazette that he has vacated all nominations to the board of directors of the National company and has appointed trustees as by section 4 of this act provided the said board shall cease to exist and, by force of this act and without more, the direction and control of the National company and its undertakings shall be vested, subject to the provisions of this act, in the trustees.

There is nothing extraordinary in that provision. If a government is to carry on the operation of a railway system, a transportation system on the streets or an electric system it certainly should not attempt to do so by the day to day vote of members of parliament, but rather by placing control and operation in the hands of a commission appointed for that purpose. Subsection 2 states:

> The trustees shall—subject to the provisions of this act, have and exercise all the powers —and be subject to all the duties—which now appertain to the board of directors of the National company.

Except in one or two particulars to which reference has already been made, nominally these trustees have no greater powers than have the incorporators, or, as they are called, the directors of the Canadian National Railways. They succeed to the same powers.

Then, in part II the real crux of the situation, which has been debated in this house, appears. I believe we have the meat of that part relating to cooperation when we turn to the part of section 16 appearing at the top of page 9 in the bill which states that the provisions as to the railway companies are—

For the purposes of effecting economies and providing for more remunerative operation. . . .

That is the sum and substance of the purpose behind part II of the bill. For the purpose of effecting economies and providing for more remunerative operation of the railway lines certain action is to be taken. The railways are directed forthwith to cooperate, and to use every possible means to settle their disputes. But if in the course of attempting to cooperate there rises a dispute, then and then only does part III of the bill come into effect and the arbitral tribunal have jurisdiction. If we turn to the interpretation clause of the bill we will find that in clause 3 subsection (b) the word "dispute" is defined as the failure to agree concerning any measure in connection with which under part II of the bill they are authorized to agree. Therefore when we hear the complaint that too much power is vested in the tribunal under the bill, one must remember that the whole jurisdiction is confined to disputes as defined in the interpretation clause of the bill, and as further elaborated in part II.

I believe it was the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) who a few days ago suggested that part III had not enough teeth in it. I am inclined to agree that it is not by any manner of means a drastic provision. What does it provide? The most ordinary thing in the world. It provides that if two individuals—in this case two railway systems—fail to agree there shall be an arbitration. I venture to say that both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways have time and again settled their disputes by arbitration, and always on the basis described in part III. That is, each party to the arbitration would nominate an arbitrator, and the two parties or a court would nominate the umpire or the third arbitrator. And so the decision almost invariably in these matters resides in the third arbitrator.

In the present instance all we have done is to provide that the third arbitrator shall be a fixed person, and shall be the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners. We have had good chairmen of that commission, and with the added responsibility of the position I do not believe any government would contemplate appointing to the position any person who would not meet with the honest approval of all parts of the community. The job that is being created is a big one, one of the greatest in Canada. I see no difference between the sort of arbitration described in the bill and the arbitration into which on their own accord the railways have entered on many former occasions. There is of course this marked difference in initiative, the reference to arbitration here is compulsory.

It will be observed, further, that in part III there is no original jurisdiction in the chairman of the railway board. That follows from what I said to the effect that his jurisdiction is confined to disputes arising in part II. That is, he cannot take upon himself the duty of settling any matter which he deems should be settled in the interests of the companies or the country. He must wait until the two railways have failed to agree. The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Mercier, St. Henri), has indicated that in his view companies which are compelled to cooperate will not do so successfully. I agree that in order to work out the present difficulties to the best advantage there must be good will and good intention. But, more than that, in this particular instance we are not confined to good will or good intentions. The whole necessity of the railway companies, both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, lies in some sort of cooperation. They must make ends meet, and they must discontinue wasteful competition and the maintenance of services which are not paying.

Having that impelling force behind them I venture to say that they will seize on the provisions contained in this bill, and will do their best to cooperate. If one feels that it is advancing a proposition to which the other should but does not agree, it will then, and then only, appeal to the arbitral tribunal. At the moment there come to my mind two or three instances which may indicate more clearly my meaning. Let us consider the Toronto and Montreal terminals. In connection with the Toronto terminal the railway companies managed to agree, with the result that there was a tremendous saving in expense. On the other hand in Montreal the railways could not agree, although all hon. members know that attempts were made to effect an agreement. However, either for good reason or through stubbornness—I am not suggesting which—the fact is that they failed to agree. There was a situation which could have been cured to the advantage of the whole country if we had had some sort of jurisdiction to provide a settlement of the dispute.

My hon. friend the member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) submits the proposition that this large power should not be entrusted to a tribunal, arbitral as it is called, but that we should in some way run it by a department of the government. Can anyone really think that that would be a proper thing to do—that we expose this vast enterprise to all sorts of political interference and "community pressure," I think were the words used in the Duff report? We have had experience of it, in this very debate we have heard the plea of one part of the country against the other.

Certainly in the carrying out of this scheme there will be hurt to someone. Neither company can have its own way entirely. But if there is one thing that the people of the country have seized on and taken into their serious consideration it is what we call the railway problem, the tremendous amount of money that we are losing in the conduct of railways. I am only surprised that with that heavy drain on our resources the credit of this country has stood up as well as it has; it is a tribute to the soundness of the country that we have been able to carry such a load so well. But the people are interested in this thing more than in any other concrete fact of public affairs to-day. We must have some action in the matter, we cannot allow to go on the cut-throat and profitless competition that is in part at least responsible for the state in which we find ourselves to-day. It seems to me we would be failing in our duty as representatives if we did not take hold of this thing with a firm hand; and with the consideration that has been given to this particular plan in the other house, the prolonged and careful study to which I referred, and commending itself as it does also to our good judgment, we should be derelict in our duty if we did not grasp this opportunity to effect a remedy which I feel fully convinced will in time cure our difficulties in regard to railways.

So it seems to me this bill is deserving of support. There will be minor matters to be dealt with in committee, such as the number of trustees and other matters that have been brought up, but these are incidental to the principle. But I do hope there will be no question about the bill getting second reading. My own hope is that this bill will pass very much in the form in which it is at the moment, and I believe that experience will fulfil its promise.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MANION: There is still fifteen minutes. I do not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend but I am afraid it is a little early. The Prime Minister expects the discussion to go on a little longer. Something may be said as to the business to-morrow. Therefore I should like the hon. member to go on a few minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I will speak of some features of the labour viewpoint concerning the passage of this measure. I listened with keen attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) and I hope he does not adopt the same attitude at the bedside of his patients as he adopted towards what might happen in Canada in the near future. At the introduction of the measure yesterday I was pleased by the position taken by the Minister of Railways. I was glad to hear him make the observation that while the government were in agreement on the principles of the bill they would consider minor amendments to it. It is my intention, if it is not done in other sections of the house, to move some minor amendments when the bill reaches the committee stage.

The minister said that conditions existing in this country were world wide and that it would require world wide action to deal with them. I cannot entirely agree. I believe we will have to move on a national basis first to meet some of the serious problems arising out of conditions in this country. I think the President of the United States put it well in his inaugural address when he said:

> Our international trade relations, though vastly important, are in point of time and necessity secondary to the establishment of a sound national economy. I favour as a practical policy the putting of first things first. I shall spare no effort to restore world trade by international economic readjustment, but the emergency at home cannot wait on that accomplishment.

The driving force that brought into being the commission responsible, through the Senate, for this bill was in my judgment produced largely by national conditions. I think the railway problem is just a small part of a much larger problem, and I believe that the solution of the railway problem will come when you get men and women to work again in industry, and the prices of agricultural products on a fair and equitable basis in conformity with the debt obligations of the various governments of the country and those that have to be met in a private way by the agriculturists themselves. I believe this problem arises from our failure to weld production and consumption together. I believe that we have got to work out a technique whereby we can put a suit of clothes on a man who is out of work by putting him to work so that he can earn it. In my judgment there is not the faintest chance of any upturn until that very practical problem is solved. Of course that in effect means that you have got to stop deflation.

I would direct attention to the implications of this bill as to policies in existence now and the effect they have had on railroad workers in the running and mechanical trades. I was unable to get up-to-date figures, but up to 1931 I find there had been a reduction of approximately 33,000 in the number of men employed by the railroads of this country. I think it is fair to say that this number might be doubled. I believe the desire for cooperation, or rationalization, which is the correct word for it, has increased to such an extent that the number laid off has grown considerably since 1931, when these figures were compiled. In that connection I should like to point out a very simple thing which affects the economy of this country. Every railroad worker represents a fraction of the market of the agriculturist. When he is working he eats more, wears more and spends more, and by these functions he puts at work more men in other industries and creates a market in the community.

That is one of the things we are apt to forget; we often overlook the human aspect of this question. We are apt to forget that these men have made the greatest contribution to the transportation industry of this country that it is possible to make; they have given their lives to that industry. I believe that should be a prior consideration in meeting the transportation problem; I think it should take precedence even over the payment of interest on the bonds of the two railway corporations in Canada. It is hard for us to realize the position in which these men are placed after twenty or thirty years of service with the railroads. When a man reaches the age of forty-five after spending his life in one line of work it becomes increasingly difficult for him to adjust himself to another walk of life. I have often said, and I believe the observation can be made with some measure of truth, that very few men and women over the age of forty will ever enter industry again. When you take into consideration the enormous waiting list of boys and girls looking for their first opportunity to be gainfully employed, to settle down and take their place in the normal life of this country you will see the truth in that statement.

These men, I say, have given their all to the transportation industry of this country. That is something which cannot be lightly dismissed either by men in professions, in business or—and I say this to be ready for any criticism which may be offered—in agriculture. I am a tradesman. I came straight from the workshop to the House of Commons, and I suppose that is where I will go when I am through here. There is this to be said about it, however, taking the large view: The agriculturist has some stability of tenure. I am not unmindful of the problems with which he is confronted. I am not unmindful of the very real relationship of the problems facing the men and women engaged in industry and those facing the men and women engaged in agriculture. I make these few observations because this house— and I say this in a kindly way—is largely made up of professional and business men and those engaged in agriculture.

We have heard a great deal about the hilarious days of 1928 and 1929. I appreciate the fact that possibly at that time the railroads were being built for millionaires instead of average human beings, but I would also say that I do not think any of that responsibility can be placed on the shoulders of those railroad workers or of the men and women engaged in industry. They were not responsible for the debacle that took place in 1929 and which has lasted to this day; they were not consulted about it. I think if you look up the figures you will find that the average wage earned in industry during that prosperous period was about $1,200. I do not think the average wage paid in the railroad industry was a great deal more. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) said it was $1,400, and I must pay that hon. gentleman the compliment of knowing perhaps more about the railroad industry than any man in this house, from his practical experience. His knowledge may not touch the legal point of view so much, but the men and women in this dominon are not greatly concerned about legal definitions or interpretations. These railroad men are most concerned about an opportunity to earn a living, to protect their homes, to educate their children and take their place in the transportation life of this country, the only calling in which they have any practical experience.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 9, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. GORDON: I desire to lay on the table two orders in council passed pursuant to the relief legislation.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*NEW WESTMINSTER ELEVATOR

Mr. REID:

1. What firm or company has been granted a lease of the New Westminster harbour elevator on the Fraser river?

2. Is Mr. Sam McClay, chairman of the Vancouver harbour commissioners, financially interested or connected with the firm or company who have been given lease of this elevator?

3. What is the amount or amounts to be paid under any agreement or arrangement by those operating the elevator for the use of the elevator: (a) how and when are the payments to be made; and (b) for how long a term is the agreement made?

4. Have any cash, bonds or cheques been paid up to date by those now operating the elevator, and if so, what amounts either in cash, bonds or cheques have been paid up to date?

5. What amount of wheat has been placed in the elevator, and what has been the total amount of wheat shipped out of the elevator since it was leased?

Mr. BENNETT: As regards this question, this government is not in a position any more than any member of the house to ascertain the information asked for in the second part of this question:

Is Mr. Sam McClay, chairman of the Vancouver harbour commissioners, financially interested or connected with the firm or company who have been given lease of this elevator?

There are also certain other questions over which this government obviously has no more control than has any private member of the house or any citizen of the country. I would ask that the question be drawn in such form that the government can deal with it.

Mr. SPEAKER: This question will be withdrawn for amendment.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

RELIEF FOR DISTRICT 18, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): On February 16 last an order of the house was passed in connection with a question asked respecting the steps taken by the government to relieve distress in the coal mining area known as district 18. When will the return be tabled?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Recently so many returns, some of which are very voluminous, have been asked for, that they will just have to take their turn. They will be completed as quickly as possible. Every department is taxed to the uttermost.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Hon. R. J. Manion for the second reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, during the course of my remarks of yesterday in connection with the bill before the house, I pointed out that from 1929 to 1931 there had been a reduction of approximately 33,000 in the employees of the railroads of this country. This is not the only sacrifice that the transportation workers have made in connection with the present depression and the cooperative efforts that have already taken place on the part of the two railroads. We find that those employees have also accepted a considerable reduction in their hours and days of labour, and further, that they have taken a reduction in wages. This bill will, of course, further intensify the laying off and the possibility of a further reduction in the working days and hours of the men involved. We have come to the conclusion through a very practical experience that the individuals who go to make up the national life of this country are more important as consumers than as producers. It is not so very long ago that the whole drive was towards greater production. The cry was: Produce more and our problems will disappear. I think it will be agreed in view of the conditions in which we now find ourselves that that analysis was directly opposed to the forces at work in connection with the enormous productive capacity of the nation.

Rationalization both in the railways and in industry generally, unless its direct effect is to produce more employment opportunities for the men and women of this country, is not sound and should not take place in the economic structure and government of industry, where some people think it rightly belongs. In view of the very optimistic statements that were made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in introducing this measure, more particularly that prosperity was in the offing, I am of the opinion that the tendencies towards consolidation should be slowed up. We should pause a while in the consolidation of our railway system lest we create a more intensified unemployment problem.

Coming to the question of amalgamation, I believe that there is still a great body of opinion in this country that thinks the real intent of this bill is amalgamation. I was glad to hear the minister say that such was not the case, but I was sorry to hear him and also the Prime Minister say that it was surplus language to include the section which was deleted from the original bill in the Senate reading:

> But nothing herein shall be taken to authorize any amalgamation of any National company with any Pacific company.

I think we have found that the laws of this country and possibly of every other country do not always work out as they were intended to, that the interpretation placed upon the legal phraseology after the passing of a law is quite often in direct conflict with the original intent of the lawmakers. I believe it would be well, Mr. Speaker, if that section were reintroduced into the bill so that the people of this country would have absolute confidence in the sincerity of the desire of hon. members of this house that this bill has absolutely no intent at this time, at all events of amalgamating the railroads of this country. I believe that it would allay the uneasiness in the public mind and definitely show the intent of this bill in regard to that question.

Coming to the board of trustees, the bill provides that a board of three shall be appointed. I should like to quote briefly from the observations contained in the memorandum of comments and recommendations on behalf of the railroad employees representing 200,000 workers:

> We are particularly concerned about the problems involving the human element of the Canadian National and consider that at least one member of the new board of trustees, regardless of its size, should be especially qualified to counsel in respect to these problems because of his experience and the confidence imposed in him by the railway employees. This policy was recognized in the make-up of the present board of directors of the Canadian National, and also on other important public boards and committees. To this arrangement must be attributed much of the loyalty and enthusiasm, as well as good relations between management and men on the Canadian National of which the royal commission took special cognizance. In the opinion of railway labour it would be a grave mistake to ignore the wholesome lesson taught by this experience and in the face of it now deny labour the opportunity to continue to help in the administration of the government-owned railway system.

I agree with the contention of many hon. members who have spoken before me that it would be in the best interests of the Canadian National Railways if the board of trustees were increased to five. In view of the large reduction in the number of directors of the road, it must be conceded that the experiment we are making is revolutionary. I know of no example in this country either in business or in transportation where the executive driving force has been reduced to so few in number. I believe it would be just as logical for the board of the Canadian National Railways to have a board of the same size as that of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because in that way you get the benefit of the various contacts and the various points of view, and I suppose that the directors are largely appointed for that reason. Of course, I am primarily concerned with the continuance of labour representation on the directorate of the Canadian National Railways. I agree with the Minister of Railways that without that loyal cooperation between the directors and employees and the magnificent esprit de corps displayed it would be practically impossible to run a large enterprise of this character successfully. The time has long since passed when labour should be expected to work merely for a daily wage. The logical course of events, and I believe it is the sound line to pursue, is that the best interests not only of the Canadian National Railways but of the Canadian Pacific Railway as well will be served only when the human point of view of the men and women engaged in that particular industry is reflected in the executive decisions that are made by the directorate. If such representation is not granted to labour on the board, Canadian railway labour will view it as a retrograde step. They anxiously look forward to the government of this country recognizing the soundness of their position, that no break should be made in the precedent which was established by a previous government in giving to the men and women engaged in the railway transportation business of this country representation on the board of directors.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that I have lost faith in big men. We have heard a lot recently about big men, the so-called supermen in this country. There is one thing for which the working people cannot be blamed; they cannot be blamed for present conditions because they were not consulted. I hope when the board is appointed better discretion will be used by the government than has been used in the appointment of other commissions. I agree with the viewpoint of the hon. member for South Waterloo.

Mr. EULER: North Waterloo.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member will not lose caste by accepting South Waterloo; however I thank him for the correction. In my view the board should be imbued with the spirit of service and a sympathetic inclination toward the soundness of public ownership.

Now I come to the arbitral tribunal. I believe that in this body too much power is reposed in the hands of a single man, and I am convinced the objections taken are sound. Frankly I do not believe that the tribunal will be used to as great an extent as some people imagine. I recognize the fact that some tribunal is necessary to act as a cushion between the conflicting viewpoints which might arise in connection with the cooperation which, in effect, is the principle behind the bill. I believe it is very necessary that some tribunal should exist to which the directors and management of the Canadian National Railways may go, and to which may be referred those matters upon which there have been expressions of public opinion. I am convinced however that the present Board of Railway Commissioners would have been a more satisfactory tribunal for that purpose, because they have as a background a wealth of information and experience in railroad matters. Further, they would be able to hear the evidence of parties who have not been heard in connection with this bill. The viewpoint of all communities affected should be heard. In fact, if necessary the viewpoint of the working men involved should be heard. For those reasons I believe the tribunal suggested in the bill is unnecessary, and would mean only further expense. I am convinced the work could be more expeditiously carried out by the railway commission, and that that body would be in a position to bring to bear more intelligent and practical opinions upon railway problems.

In conclusion I should like to express my views concerning the Canadian National Railways. I know that in certain sections of the press, and by some of the people of our country there is a tendency to look upon the national railways as the bad boy of public ownership. In this debate I believe it would be well to repeat that the Canadian National Railways were not the result of a deliberate policy of public ownership, but were the outcome of our mad rush to develop Canada. At the same time they offered a profitable investment for railroad promoters. Notwithstanding contrary opinions it is my view that the consolidation of the many roads under the control of the Canadian National Railways represents great progress, and is a monument to the genius for organization of Sir Henry Thornton. I predict I shall live to see the day when he will receive the credit he deserves in connection with this enormous undertaking. After all is said and done, the problems which confront our railroads are the problems confronting every industry and undertaking,—the problem of the elastic dollar. That problem is reflected in the fall in price levels, and in our inability to adjust our debt structure or to cope with the trade situation.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

I am not unmindful of the great contributions the railroads have made to the development of Canada. That development is amply proven by statistics. We find that between the years 1900 and 1929 the mileage increased by 133 per cent, the gross earnings increased by 656 per cent and, incidentally, the external trade of Canada increased by 645 per cent. We cannot predict the future; this bill is based on the experience of the past. I believe that mighty tides are in the making which will carry this civilization either backwards or forwards. I hope we will have sense enough to let our imagination catch the flood of progress. Our railroads have been the arteries of our material development; we should see that our present conditions are only temporary.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, rising to say a few words concerning the bill before us, I find myself in a position very much similar to that described by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon). I cannot say I am supporting the bill because I have not any too much faith in what may arise from it. I do believe however, that if the trustees appointed under the bill are the type of men I should like to see appointed, in a very short time they will find themselves faced with a task so utterly impossible of solution that they will come back to parliament and recommend what parliament should have done when the railroads were consolidated in the first instance.

I do not intend to make more than a passing reference to what took place when the group of railroads which was found on the doorstep of Canada in the years 1916, 1917 and 1918 were brought into one common organization. But in view of statements which have been made concerning public ownership, what it has accomplished, what it may accomplish and all that sort of thing, and particularly in view of statements which have been made that the condition in which Canada has found herself during the last fifteen years with regard to railroads is due to the failure of private ownership, and to the building of railroads for the purpose, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, of providing profitable investments for promoters, I should like to make a very brief statement. The question of public ownership, as it could be applied to the Canadian National Railways, was never held out as an argument either for or against the principle of public ownership. Between the years 1900 and 1910 the parliament of Canada created a railroad situation—the parliament of Canada, not private owners, in any sense. It was the private owners who undertook to develop the railway lines in Canada, induced to do so by the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The owners of the Grand Trunk Railway made an effort to project their line into western Canada and practically came to an arrangement with the Canadian Northern interests by which the Grand Trunk in the east and the Canadian Northern in the west would comprise a transcontinental road. Then a transcontinental road was projected from Moncton to Prince Rupert and no arrangements were made to link up with the Grand Trunk. In this way a vast expenditure was loaded upon the transportation system of this country and the Canadian people are now in the position where they are called upon to carry that load.

In 1918 and 1919 parliament found it necessary to do something for these roads. At that time Canada had a total investment in these railroads of $1,106,237,629.72. There was a large surplus of mileage and if the problem had been taken hold of as it should have been taken hold of, this surplus would have been eliminated and the unnecessary capital which was wasted in the construction of the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific would have been written out of the picture and the railroads given a chance to carry on. But that was not done. The expenditure of $300,000,000 would have brought these lines up to the standard of class one railroads, and anyone who wishes to read the debates which took place in the House of Commons during 1918, 1919 and 1920 will find the statements set out quite clearly. Any railroad man looking over the situation as it was then and as it is now will agree with that estimate of the amount required to bring these railroads up to class one condition. If the proper course had been followed that amount would have been sufficient. In the meantime, what have we done? We have raised our total liabilities from $1,100,000,000 to $2,600,000,000 and that is a burden the Canadian people have to bear to-day. People will say: What are you going to do, are you going to scrap portions of these roads after having paid for their construction? They will ask what is to be done with the territories through which they run. I say without hesitation that until the people of Canada acting through this parliament decide to abandon the surplus duplicating lines of the Canadian National Railway and, in many cases, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the railroad problem of this country will never be solved. I believe that if the right type of trustees are appointed they will find the task so utterly hopeless even with cooperation that they will come back to this house and recommend to be done what we ourselves should have done long ago.

I should like to refer to some of the statements made with regard to the situation that has developed from 1920 on. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan), with whom I agree in some of the positions he has taken, stated yesterday that in 1923 Sir Henry Thornton found these railroads in the mud but had brought them up to the level of first class roads and only because of that was it possible to make the economies which have been made in operating expenses during the past year or two. When we look into what Sir Henry Thornton did say with regard to that I think it will be found that he agreed with the statement I made a few moments ago, that the cost of bringing these railroads up to class one standard was not $1,000,000,000 but $300,000,000. In 1922 Sir Henry Thornton made a statement to the Minister of Railways which appears on page 10 of the annual report of that year. After dealing with the general condition of the property, he said:

> On behalf of the board, I would like to state that after inspection of the main arteries of the system, we find that the work undertaken has been well performed, and that the expenditures have been well applied. While the demands for capital expenditure on a system of such extent in a growing country, as the former board stated, are never ending, yet it may now be said that the three groups of lines, until recently the Canadian National Railways, enter the consolidation in excellent physical condition and operating at a high mark of efficiency as regards actual performance or movement of traffic and other factors controllable by management. Apart from certain well known cases of duplication the lines are well located and in exceptional position to successfully perform the transportation demands of the country. The problem as far as the lines covered by the report is concerned, is how sufficient traffic may be developed to carry the overhead and maintenance expenses. As far as transportation costs go, an economical performance is being made. Under these circumstances the margin for improvement with the present light volume of traffic is largely dependent on circumstances beyond the control of the management.
> On some of the older sections there are still improvements that should be undertaken, but in the main the lines are modern in character and were built or have been brought up to standards which are ahead of actual traffic requirements, except under stress of seasonal movements.

That was the statement made in 1922 by Sir Henry Thornton when he took over control of the property. It has been stated this afternoon as well as previously that some day a monument will be erected to Sir Henry Thornton. It is not my intention to find fault with Sir Henry, but rather to point out the actual facts. After finding these lines in that condition, what happened? According to the reports, there was spent upon the roads not $300,000,000 but $467,000,000, I presume in improvements, and the total indebtedness put upon the Canadian people in that period was more than $900,000,000. To-day the interest charges, including interest to the public, interest upon the money advanced by the government of Canada and upon which the people of Canada will pay for all time and the interest on account of the Canadian National Steamships, runs to substantially over $100,000,000 a year. Does anyone who knows anything about transportation systems imagine that there is any plan which any group of men can bring about which will enable the Canadian National Railways to pay that $100,000,000 in addition to the operating expenses?

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario put his finger upon the pulse of the whole situation when he pointed out yesterday what the Duff commission had learned. Ten per cent of the mileage of these railways earns fifty per cent of the gross earning; forty-two per cent earns five per cent of the gross earning, while the remainder earns forty-five per cent. We are faced with this situation: roughly speaking, we have 16,000 miles of railroad being operated and which earn five per cent of the gross revenue; we have four thousand miles earning fifty per cent of the gross revenue and twenty thousand miles earning forty-five per cent of the revenue. If anyone will suggest that any business whatever can be carried on under a handicap of that kind I say to him at once that it is utterly impossible.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should like to ask one question for information. Is the hon. member taking into account in this summing up the contribution made by all the various branch lines to the earnings of the terminals of the system and a small part of the main lines themselves, which could not exist and earn anything without the branch lines?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was just coming to that. If you analyze the situation in relation to the Canadian National Railways or any other railway system you will find that the branch lines are given credit for the earnings which they contribute to the main line.

Mr. ERNST: Perhaps.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: They should be.

Mr. NICHOLSON: And they are, and in the analysis that has been made by the Duff commission you will find that this is how it is carried out. Each branch line is credited with the earnings originating on that branch line and also with the earnings originating on the main lines and projected to the branch lines. Everyone who knows anything about this country knows that in many cases branch lines have been projected ahead of their time, so to speak, but it is the duplication of main lines, of terminals and of services of every known kind that a railway must maintain if it is to operate which provides the difficulty.

I am sorry my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River has left the chamber; I wanted him to hear one or two things I have to say, because I am both in agreement and in disagreement with him. The hon. member referred to the consolidation of terminals and shops and so on and spoke of the effect this would have on the employment of labour. He particularly referred to what are known as back shops. Back shops, Mr. Speaker, are the shops where locomotives are taken when they receive what is known as a general repair, as contrasted to the ordinary running repairs from day to day which are looked after in the roundhouses. If you close the Angus shops of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Montreal and repair all the locomotives of both lines in the Point St. Charles shops of the Canadian National Railways, or vice versa, that will not necessarily mean that the mechanics who repair these locomotives will be dismissed. Not at all. A substantial saving will be made in fuel and in electric power and there will be some saving in supervision, but when these locomotives go in for a class A, a class B or a class C repair it takes the same number of mechanics to repair them in the Point St. Charles shops as it would take if the repairs were made in the Angus shops. The same thing, of course, applies to carshops. Certainly there will be some reduction in staffs, but in the main that reduction will not be in what are called mechanics but rather in the supervisory staffs of both companies. The same thing will apply in the yard service. You cannot switch a thousand cars with the same number of switchmen and switch engines as you can switch five hundred cars, I do not care whether you do it in one yard or in two.

This is the point, Mr. Speaker: Can the taxpayers of this country continue to carry this load, which is always increasing? The interest charge this very year will be increased by $2,500,000 or $3,000,000 by reason of the advances the country must make to cover the deficit and interest charges for 1932, and so on all along the line.

One other point raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was in relation to compensation. "What will you do," he said, "with the people located along these lines and with the railroad men who have gone into the terminals and built homes?" I fully agree with him that the country must compensate these men. At the same time I say to him that I can point out a thousand miles of railroad line in the province of Ontario where the rails could be taken up—and the roadbed turned into highways if you like—and every living soul on these lines evacuated, paid their expenses and put into some profitable employment somewhere else, and it will not cost this country more than an amount equal to the cost of maintaining the line for three years, without taking into account the operating cost. Certainly that is what we will have to face. The country must face it sooner or later, and my hon. friend is perfectly right when he says that compensation must be given. If this bill involves the abandonment of terminals or anything of that kind that brings hardship to individuals and groups who have gone there honestly or have been induced to go there, I say at once that the country should compensate them without question.

There is just one other matter to which I wish to refer; that is what my hon. friend said with regard to statements that have been made in relation to the rates of pay and so on received by the running trades on the railways. My hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) referred to that point in his speech, I understand, although I did not hear it. There is a very considerable discussion going on throughout the country among men who do not understand, I think, what is the real situation with regard to the excess earnings of the running trades in railway service. These running trades, and the conditions under which they are employed, are frequently held up as the reason why the railroads are creating deficits instead of earning surpluses, as they should.

Mr. HACKETT: Only one of the reasons.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Well, as one of the reasons. I submit, Mr. Speaker, and I believe I can show, that there is a very great misconception in the minds of a large number of people with regard to the basis upon which these men are employed. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was perfectly right when he said yesterday that these rates have not been fixed arbitrarily; they have been the subject of negotiation. It is true that the standard of living for railway employees has been materially raised during this century; it began to be raised about 1890, in relation to other classes of working men. But this is the situation, and I will take 1928 as the basis for what I have to say, and I will refer to just one class of men employed in the running trades, the locomotive engineers, the highest paid class. In 1928 the basic rate of the locomotive engineer was not as high as the basic rate of a bricklayer, a plasterer, a plumber, an electrician or a carpenter in any city of this country. I challenge anyone to investigate the situation and find this out for himself. It is true, perhaps, that these men earn a day's pay in a few hours, but I am going to suggest this to anyone who has never tried it: Let any hon. member of this house get a pass from the Canadian Pacific Railway to-night—and a pass will be readily made available to him—and get on board one of those 2,300 class locomotives that pulls train number 5 out of here on the main line. Let him get into the most comfortable position that he can find in the cab of that locomotive and ride from here to Chalk River. When he gets there let him say whether he would like to turn right around and come back. I venture to say that he would want to go to bed and stay there all day to-morrow, and I know whereof I speak.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there is no class of labour in this country that is faced with greater responsibility and strain on their nervous and physical systems than the men employed in the running trades on our railroads. They are in control of machines that in themselves are so complicated that if a man had nothing else in the world to do but watch the variety of gauges with which he is faced in order to see that the train is kept moving along safely it would be enough to keep him busy, but that is not all the engineer has to do. I had hoped to have a standard rule book with me here. I should like to submit it to a group of lawyers in this house and find out how long it would take them to understand the rules and see what the man in charge of a train is faced with if he is to keep the passengers and the public safe. I venture to say it would take any man in the house a year thoroughly to understand those rules. It takes those men on the railroads much longer; they are apprenticed in the first place and gradually work up. What are they faced with then? There are all types and forms of signals, and complicated train orders are put into the hands of these men one or two minutes, never longer than that, before the train pulls out; and when a train is running at forty miles an hour we can well imagine what the possibilities are in the way of danger at one of the terminals with a myriad of lights flashing in the faces of the trainmen. If there is the slightest mistake on their part they are apt to run into the rear end of a passenger train and kill many people. One mistake and the doors of the penitentiary are open waiting for these men, and this because of the laws of the country. Let me give you one illustration. Less than a year ago a fast train of the Canadian Pacific, running between Smiths Falls and Trenton, and travelling at a speed of not less than seventy miles an hour, equipped with a series of lights in front of the locomotive, and an electric headlight, met with an accident through the detachment of this electric headlight. This occurred as the train approached the crossing. The engineer blew the whistle and did everything else he could think of, but an automobile was hit and a man killed. The engineer was arrested and thrown into prison. He was haled before the magistrate and committed for trial and put back into gaol, but his friends bailed him out and after a long period he was acquitted. I mention this to show the conditions with which these men are faced, and I say to you again that in relation to other classes of mechanics their basic rate of pay is no higher than those of bricklayers, plasterers, stonemasons, electricians and plumbers, and in many cases not so high. I make this statement because in my opinion the country should know that what has been said with regard to the trainmen is absolutely without foundation.

One other point I wish to deal with for a moment is the division of mileage. My hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario referred to it yesterday and indicated what certainly would take place. There is a misapprehension with regard to the division of mileage. I heard in the railway committee statements which were substantially exaggerated. Every man with a heart in his breast sympathizes with the men who are out of employment, but I know that the senior men who are being so much criticized have made very considerable voluntary reductions in the mileage they are taking. Let me refer for example to the shop men. They are entitled to work fifty-four hours a week and to receive pay for fifty-four hours, and voluntarily step by step they have reduced their hours, four hours now, four hours later on, and so on, until they are down to thirty hours a week, and they have done this in order to obviate the necessity of their fellow men being left without any work at all. And let me say that I am speaking in this regard with respect to lines which I know about. I cannot tell you what is taking place throughout the country but I know of many terminals where the mileage rates have been brought down considerably, though not to as low a point as some would suggest as being necessary to afford employment to all. It is however a mistaken conception of what the men are doing to suggest that they are arbitrarily taking all that they can get, their pound of flesh, so to speak, and leaving all the other men out in the cold.

I will conclude as I started. I am supporting this bill, not because of anything I hope will result from it in its present form, but because I believe it is a step in the direction of showing the people of Canada what they are actually faced with, and proposing the only way by which they can get out of the difficulties they are in.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): On the second reading of a bill the house either approves or disapproves of its underlying principle. In an effort to ascertain what the underlying principle of the present measure is one may well have regard for the title itself, and the words of the minister in introducing the bill; but most of all it is essential that one should read very carefully the actual provisions of the bill as submitted; for it is in the text of the bill that its principle must be found. On the bill before us, the title reads:

> An act respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system and for other purposes.

So far as the title is concerned, there is one phase which is quite clear, namely, that the measure is intended to provide for cooperation between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific railway system. As regards that object, I am sure that all hon. members in this house will be of one mind: If it is possible in any way to effect economies and to avoid wasteful competition as between these two great railway systems, and if it can be done by act of parliament, I venture to say that to that object there will not be a dissenting voice in the house. However, that is not the whole of the bill. There remains the provision of the bill referred to in the words "respecting the Canadian National Railways" and referred to in the words "for other purposes" which also appear. It is necessary in this connection to examine closely the provisions of this measure that alter those of the original act, and to judge therefrom just what other purposes it is intended to further.

As I have said, the second step in ascertaining exactly the principle underlying the different provisions is to take the statement made by the minister himself. If I followed the hon. Minister of Railways correctly, he stated that the bill in the main was divided into three parts: that the first relates to the Canadian National Railways; the second has relation to the subject of cooperation between the two systems; and that the third proposes the establishment of an arbitral tribunal. In referring to the first part, which relates to the Canadian National Railways, the minister indicated that the main purpose of the measure was to substitute for the present board of directors of the Canadian National railway system three trustees, and to give to those trustees all the powers which under the old legislation are assigned to the board of directors. I do not know that there will be very much difference between us in this house as to the question of substituting trustees for directors. The question as to how many trustees there should be is, I think, a matter that might well be discussed in debate, but it is a detail. There is too, the method of appointment to be considered. In so far as the bill simply transfers to a board of trustees the powers which the former board of directors had, there will, I imagine, not be much if anything in the way of difference between us. However, it may be necessary to examine very closely whether the present legislation goes further than the previous legislation in the powers it confers upon the trustees, and if so, whither these provisions in all likelihood will lead. The minister I think made it clear that the reason this legislation has been introduced is that the previous legislation, as he thought had given the old board of directors too free a hand, and that they were in a position where they could do just as they pleased with this property, which belongs to the people. If that is the reason for the legislation we shall have to examine carefully to see and to ask ourselves whether the powers that are given the trustees do not go very much further in that direction than did the old legislation.

I must confess that reading the act, I am inclined to think that the powers given to the trustees do go very much further, and that powers are given this board of trustees, in dealing with this property, which far transcend anything that is given the board of directors under the existing legislation. In that regard, may I say that the object of seeking to free the Canadian National railway system from political influence is again one on which we on this side are all in accord, assuming of course that we adequately maintain the extent to which parliament itself must at all times have some say with respect to properties which belong to the people of this country, a responsibility for which parliament as the trustee of the nation itself must have regard. I shall not more than touch upon what I have in mind in that regard until we come to the discussion of the bill in committee.

The point I wish to make at the moment is that, in seeking to remedy one abuse, we must be very careful not to open the door to a possible worse abuse which while not intended, may nevertheless result from the legislation in the form in which it is drafted. I remember in early discussions on the railway situation when the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding was Minister of Finance, in his public addresses he used to emphasize very strongly the fact that as long as the government owned anything and had to supply the wherewithal for the maintenance of that possession, it was impossible for parliament to divest itself of a very considerable measure of political control. In seeking to prevent what I imagine we all desire to prevent, namely, the kind of pressure that comes from local and sectional influence as against that larger control which parliament itself is supposed to exercise with respect to all national affairs, we have to be careful not wholly to abrogate the functions of parliament and its duty. I am not so sure that the bill as drafted does not deprive parliament almost entirely of some of its fundamental rights. I may be wrong in that, and no doubt that point will be made clear in discussion; but if in an effort to avoid political pressure of a local and sectional character upon those who may have to do with the direction and control of the affairs of the national railways, this House of Commons should hand over to an individual or to three individuals all say with regard to a great national property such as the Canadian National Railways is, I would feel that parliament was utterly abrogating its duty.

After all, while business considerations must at all times be uppermost in matters of administration, and never more so with respect to a great government-owned system, than at a time like the present, there are vast national considerations of which account must also be taken, and parliament is here to safeguard them. I was much impressed with what I heard said by an hon. gentleman on the other side, as well as by more than one on this, when he was speaking with respect to the desirability of enlarging the board of trustees so as to have the board include at least one member from the eastern part of Canada, and one from the extreme west. Seeing that Canada is a very large country and that this board is to be located in the city of Montreal where there is pretty strong atmosphere of a character all its own, with respect to financial and railway matters, I believe it would be advisable to have the board enlarged somewhat so as to ensure the point of view of and considerations affecting those more remote parts of the dominion being constantly before the board in its discussions of matters of policy. In that connection something was said about the rights of the maritimes, about the obligation that was entered into at the time of confederation, the ground upon which the maritime provinces came in. As we all know, the railway situation was then an all-important factor, and I think our friends of the maritime provinces have a perfect right to say that what is provided for in the British North America Act with respect to the railway service which the maritimes shall have, must, in the nature of things, be carefully guarded by this parliament. If we were turning over to three gentlemen or rather to two the power to dispense, may I say, altogether with the Intercolonial railway, without any possible say on the part of this parliament, I would think that would be a very serious and grave mistake, and I am not at all sure that this legislation as drafted would not give to them that power. Similarly, in regard to western Canada, it might well be that the trustees might entertain the view that the Hudson Bay railway was a system that should be discontinued for reasons of economy or other cause, and that question might come to the fore. If a question of that kind, which is of great national significance, should come up for discussion, this House of Commons should have some say before steps could be taken that would violate fundamental policy. I may be wrong, but I am inclined to believe this board of three, of which a majority, if the chairman be one, control, has been given powers wide enough to enable it to cease to operate the whole Hudson Bay railway system—and that is only one example; to cease operations on all the branch lines that have been constructed for purposes of development might be cited as another example; and to do both without even the approval of the governor in council, or parliament having any say whatever.

Much has been said about the legislation following the recommendations of the Duff report. May I say that I have made a comparative examination and I find in this bill two or three important provisions which are not part of the recommendations of the Duff report and that go very much further than does that report. As a matter of fact, where the Duff report has, at least to some extent, safeguarded the rights of parliament, I am inclined to think this bill in more particulars than one has taken away the power of control which the governor in council should have in certain matters, and the power which parliament as a whole should always have. To the extent that such may be the case, I would not wish to support the measure. Therefore I say that in determining the principle of the measure, we must go beyond merely the statement which we have from the minister as to the object of the legislation, or the wording of the title which appears on the bill itself; we must examine its provisions in detail. In other words, may I distinguish between the object which the bill is intended to serve, as formally stated by the minister, and the principle underlying the measure as determined by the provisions of the enactment itself, because the latter, once the measure becomes law, will be the only real test After the legislation is passed, it will not help matters any to discover that while we believed we were voting for something that would lead to more effective co-operation between the two railway systems and to much needed economies, we had, as a matter of fact, voted for the principle of amalgamation of the two systems and what would make that possible. Nor would it help matters any to find that we had voted to take away from the governor in council and from parliament powers which at all times ought to be reserved to those bodies, or that we had taken away from the House of Commons or denied to it, the control it should at all times have over expenditure and taxation which constitutes a primary duty of this body. So I repeat that, looking at the measure, we must be careful to discover whether above all else the fundamental principles of responsible government have been safeguarded.

With regard then to the first part which deals with the powers of the board of trustees, as I have already said, once agreement is had on the underlying principle, details can best be discussed in committee. Without differing from hon. gentlemen opposite as to a board of trustees as against the old system of a board of directors, there may as I have said be a natural difference of view which can well be discussed pretty fully as to whether the board of trustees should be composed of three members only, or of five or even a larger number. Let me further mention in that connection a consideration that I have not heard mentioned in the course of this discussion. The Canadian Pacific Railway has not three or five directors, but eighteen, and the reason why the Canadian Pacific has eighteen directors is that the directors are chosen largely because of what is believed to be their ability in different directions to help further the interests of the road. Gentlemen are placed on the board of directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway amongst other reasons because of their important business and financial connections, as instruments to help in obtaining business for the road. When the old board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, which is in existence still, was appointed, the government of the day had in view with respect to its numbers the fact that it was desirable from a business point of view to have a comparatively large directorate in order that opportunities in all parts of the country for increased business might be made known, and full advantage taken of them. I do not think we ought to assume that just because we are cutting down the numbers, we are necessarily thereby going to increase the opportunities for business which the national railways have heretofore had. It will mean that they will have to rely for their business entirely on chance and on freight solicitors, in other words on those whose duty it is to go out after business.

I think, too, it is all-important in discussing the question of the board of trustees and its size to consider very carefully also its composition or complexion. I have already stated in this house that I feel very strongly that there is more to be considered with respect to railways and all other industrial enterprises than simply the capital invested. Broadly speaking, any great industrial enterprise is in the main a partnership between capital and labour, or at least should be regarded as a partnership. In every partnership those who contribute ought to have some voice in the determination of policy. Speaking the other day I said that while the investor of capital may invest his savings, he does not after all invest to the degree that the man does who works year in and year out on the railroad in one capacity or another, for such an one invests his life itself, even to the risk of losing it. The man who invests his life in a great enterprise ought to have some say with respect to the policies which shall govern.

I know that there is a feeling on the part of those who object to labour's representation on a board of directors that at this time railroad wages are relatively high, and that it may be difficult to have wages reduced if on the board there should be labour representation as well as representation of capital May I say that I think Labour will be much more likely to accept what is a fair and reasonable reduction, if that be necessary, by being consulted as a partner in a business than it will be if it is to be excluded from an intimate knowledge of the affairs of the company and has to compel cessation of work altogether, in order to have its views effectively heard.

May I point out further that as respects the Canadian National Railways we have recognized up to the present time the right of Labour to be represented on the board of directors, and I venture to say that if anyone were to inquire how the representative of Labour on the late board of directors played his part, he would be told that he was as helpful in every way to the management and the president of the company as any other director on the board. I do not think that we ought to take a step backward at this time in that all-important matter, and I urge it more particularly for a reason, which associates itself with the subject we were discussing the other day when I spoke of substituting joint-control for single control of industrial policy.

We are living in times of great transitions, in times when Labour is determined, and rightly so, to have its voice increasingly heard with respect to those matters which affect its life as a whole. It is important that if possible the transition should be made in a natural way, along voluntary lines that will appeal to the sense of fair play and justice in the minds of the people generally. I believe that by giving representation on a council board or on a board of trustees to those who in such large numbers are required to carry on the undertaking itself, the government of this country will be taking a step which with regard to industry generally will help to make for progress in the end. That is the aspect of it that appeals most strongly to me. It is not simply a question of what the wage schedule at any particular time or place is going to be. It is the larger question of the evolution of industry in our times, and I am perfectly certain that unless private industries and public industries voluntarily give that opportunity to the great industrial classes of the country, the opportunity will be taken in the long run and by means that will be infinitely more costly, and no one knows of how serious a nature to the community as a whole. To give representation to Labour on the board, to substitute, in the determination of industrial policy, joint control for single control, is a wise step; it is a prudent step, and it should be regarded in that light. If it is necessary to enlarge the board of trustees to include a representative of Labour on the board, then I think it should be enlarged, but if there are to be only three trustees I submit that at least one of them should be a representative of Labour.

I come now to the second part of the bill which relates to cooperation between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. There, as I have said, I believe all hon. members on this side are at one with hon. gentlemen opposite in a desire to effect economies by avoiding wasteful competition, and are also desirous of furthering cooperation along right lines as much as possible. But we on this side have a very decided view on the question of amalgamation. We feel that the Canadian National Railways should be maintained in their integrity as a publicly owned and publicly controlled service, and that no legislation should be permitted to pass this parliament at this time which will have the effect of causing the integrity of the national system to be destroyed, its identity to be lost, or the system itself to be amalgamated with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I wish to say that many hon. members on this side have a fear that the legislation as drafted will have that result, that there is through the powers that are being given to the trustees, and particularly to the chairman, the possibility under this legislation, unless some additional safeguards are provided, that the chairman and the board through their action may effectively bring about amalgamation, or at least do those things which will so reduce the standing of the Canadian National Railways in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway that, out of a mood of desperation, there might come later on a further demand for amalgamation. I do not wish to suggest that anyone is going to attempt to do anything other than what is wholly honourable, but we have to look on all sides of this question. As the trustees of the people in the matter of this institution—because we are the real board of trustees of the nation's affairs in all its departments—we have to ask ourselves: Is there not the possibility of the government withdrawing its control too completely, and that parliament may be permitted no say; is there not a possibility, before either the government or parliament can be consulted, of the board taking action, which, in the end, may be fatal to the success of the national system and which, in that indirect way, may force amalgamation?

In passing I should like to draw the attention of the house to section 9 subsection (6) which is as follows:

> No order, regulation, by-law, act, decision or proceeding of the trustees shall require the approval of His Majesty or that of any other shareholder of any company to which this section applies.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I do not believe there will be found anywhere in the Duff commission's report a recommendation which goes that far. The provision is equivalent to saying that any act performed by the person appointed to be chairman of the board will be considered a right act, and that it must not, even, be submitted for approval to the governor in council, to say nothing of parliament. I think the house will agree that I at least have not been a very strong advocate of powers to be given the governor in council, in connection with many matters, as those powers have been exercised by the present government. I do submit however that even this government should retain at least some say with respect to what the board of trustees may or may not do in regard to the great national railway system. In the event of the trustees parting with or dismembering the system, it will not be a defence for us, the people's representatives in parliament, to say that in an endeavour to free the system from political control we gave a free hand to the trustees to the extent of relieving ourselves of all supervision and responsibility.

Just let us see what powers are given to the trustees without any reference to the governor in council or to parliament. Subsection (2) of section 16, which relates to cooperative measures, plans and arrangements, is as follows:

> Without restricting the generality of the foregoing, any such measures, plans or arrangements may include and be effected by means of—

And then follows a list. These are things which this one man—it comes down to one man, we find, when we study the measure—things which this one man can do without even the sanction of the governor in council, and with no say on the part of this parliament, or any part except to be obliged to meet deficits which may arise from his action. The list includes—

> (a) New companies controlled by stock ownership, equitably apportioned between the companies;
> (b) leases, entrusting agreements, or licences, or agreements for the pooling and division of earnings arising from the joint operation of any part or parts of freight or passenger traffic, or express, telegraph, or other operating activities or services;
> (c) joint trackage, running rights, joint ownership, or joint operating agreements, depending upon the nature of the property or services included in any cooperative plan; and
> (d) joint or individual highway services, or highway and railway services combined, in any form.

These are some of the measures which the board of trustees, on their own initiative and without consultation or approval may take for the purpose of effecting cooperation. Some of these measures I believe are admirable; if rightly planned, all may be admirable. However, I ask this House of Commons whether any one individual residing in Montreal, with only two assistant trustees at his side, who may be called in occasionally, will be in a position to decide, with respect to all these particular matters, the best course to pursue. Is it not right, in the interests of the country as a whole, and having regard to the general needs of Canada which the railways are intended to serve, that at least the governor in council, if not parliament itself, should give his approval of some of these steps before they are taken.

A ministry cannot divest itself of all responsibility. If government ownership and operation means that it cannot be carried on without the ministry divesting itself of all responsibility therefor, then we had better pass a resolution to that effect, and get rid of government ownership altogether.

Mr. HACKETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite say, "hear, hear;" that may be their view. It is a subject for debate. It may be that in our day government ownership and operation is impossible. I do not believe it is. I believe that due control on the part of parliament, sympathetic control, would help to make government ownership and operation go very far. But so long as the government of the country owns a great national railway system, just so long must the ministry of the day take responsibility with respect to the essential features of that system. In my view that is the fundamental consideration; the ministry cannot possibly divest itself wholly of responsibility.

If the attitude is taken that the ministry should divest itself of all responsibility, what would it mean? It would mean that the ministry of the day is, to all intents and purposes, making a present to one man of the railway system of the country. He is to have entire control. It means you hand over the system to private control, because anyone who could do as he pleased with property would, to all intents and purposes, be in the same position as the owner of that property. We would be getting rid of government ownership and control if by legislation we said, "We will divest ourselves of all say and all control; we will not allow the people's representatives in parliament to have a word in regard to the matter, but we will give to one individual power to do as he pleases with respect to the whole system." That is the danger which I confess many hon. members on this side have seen in the legislation before us. It is a danger we wish to guard against. If by its provisions this bill really means that we are preparing the way for amalgamation, that such is the intention behind it, and further that we are freeing entirely both the executive and parliament from any control over this great national railway system, then we must be absolutely opposed to it. We would be opposed to that principle.

From the debate which has thus far taken place, the position of hon. members on this side of the house, has already been made fairly evident. We are all one with respect to doing everything we can to effect economies on the national railways. We are all one in regard to legislation which will further effective cooperation with the Canadian Pacific Railway, but which will maintain the integrity and identity of the Canadian National Railways as a government owned and controlled system. But we are unalterably opposed to an amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we are unalterably opposed to divesting this parliament of its supreme rights in anything and in everything, and of taking away from this House of Commons its duty with respect to the control of expenditures of public moneys, which involve taxation.

There is the one further main division of the bill, namely that relating to the arbitral tribunal whose duty it is to settle disputes which may arise between the two companies, in the working out of a more effective cooperation. In connection with this part of the bill may I say I do not believe our views will be greatly different from those held by hon. members opposite, except as to the best form the tribunal can take. We recognize that there must be some tribunal to settle disputes, and that the establishment of the tribunal mentioned in the bill would probably serve a very useful purpose. Whether or not the tribunal suggested in the measure before us in the best one, is a matter open to debate. However, that may best be discussed when we reach the committee stage of the bill.

There are many who feel that, with its wide knowledge of railway matters, and the staff and equipment available to supply necessary information, the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners along with representatives of the companies could best act as an arbitral board. On the other hand there are some who do not hold that view. Again, this is a matter which can best be discussed in committee of the whole.

It seems to me that one real difficulty is that which presents itself where there is compulsion with respect to something concerning which there may be a wish to bring about effective cooperation.

The principle involved is very much the same as that which has to be considered with respect to disputes generally. Some years ago this House of Commons debated at considerable length the merits of compulsory arbitration as against compulsory investigation in connection with disputes between employers and employees of the great public service utilities. The legislation of such countries as Australia which had compulsory arbitration laws upon their statutes was carefully studied in relation to the alternative of compulsory investigation leaving the enforcement of the award more or less to the force of an informed public opinion. At that time this parliament came to the conclusion that a compulsory investigation law which would bring out all the essential facts of the case, not to compel acceptance of the award but leave that to the operation of public opinion, would in the long run be more serviceable in the prevention and settlement of disputes than a system of compulsory arbitration. I think the decision made at that time was a wise one, and I believe its wisdom has been borne out by the experience of many years past in connection with industrial disputes. Take the railways, for instance. It is very seldom that one finds after a dispute has been carefully investigated by a board of investigation that the award made is not accepted by one side or the other. There is one aspect of the situation where it concerns railways which seems to me to make compulsory investigation the most effective method of dealing with matters of this kind. There is no party more concerned in the justice of a decision and the enforcement of a just decision than the community itself, and where a board of investigators is charged with full power to go into the merits of a case and disclose them publicly, I cannot conceive of many instances where public opinion would not be so strong as to compel the acceptance of a wise and just decision by both sides. My own personal feeling is that it would be advisable to take this step first, and try it out. We need not do everything at once; if it does not work, well and good. Something believed to be better can then be tried. We know that at least one of the companies is very strongly opposed to this compulsory arbitral feature, and it may be that it has strong reasons for feeling as it does. Where the parties can agree upon referring a dispute it may well be left to arbitration, the finding would then have to be acceptable to both sides. But where one party is brought before a board in an unwilling frame of mind and feels that it is being coerced, that kind of thing cannot be kept up very long. I think, when we come to this phase of the matter, we ought to consider very carefully what it may be best to do.

I hope I am putting my position quite clearly. The house will appreciate that so far as we on this side are concerned, we are entirely at one with the government in the alleged objects of this bill, but I want to distinguish between principle and object. If there is any room for doubt as to the principle not being the same as the object, then we must be very careful with regard to the position we take. I want to accept the word of the minister that the principle underlying this measure is confined solely to the matter of cooperation, the effecting of economies and the improving of the system by freeing it from unnecessary and undue political control. On the other hand, I would not be true to myself, nor to hon. gentlemen on this side, nor to the people of this country, if I did not point out that before we pass the second reading of this bill there should be no doubt whatever as to the principle which we are really supporting. With the view of removing any possible doubt in that regard, I have drafted an amendment in the nature of a privileged motion which I would like to move at this time. I move this amendment in the hope that it will be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, and that it may be the means of bringing hon. members of the house into a sufficiently united frame of mind to enable us to move on immediately to the committee stage, and there debate the possible differences between us. The minister said the other day that he hoped the house would not send this bill to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines or to the special committee on railways and shipping, but that it should be considered by the committee of the whole house. If that course is to be followed, there is an additional reason why at this time we should be absolutely certain of the principle we are supporting and which should govern and guide the committee in its discussions and deliberations. There should be some direction from the house to the committee of the whole as to the principles it wishes to have kept uppermost in the consideration of this measure.

The motion before the house is that the bill be now read a second time. I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be left out in order to insert the following instead thereof: "the second reading of this bill be postponed until this house have declared that nothing therein shall be taken to authorize any amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways with the Canadian Pacific company; or to divest parliament of its rights; or to take from the House of Commons its primary duty to control expenditures of public moneys and the taxes required to meet the same; and that the provisions of said bill shall be read in the light of this declaration, and be construed so as to conform therewith, and that in so far as any of its provisions may be inconsistent therewith they shall be amended accordingly, and that the adoption of this amendment by this house shall constitute the declaration of its intention and purposes as set forth herein."

I should like to quote an authority which will help to explain the purpose I have in mind in moving this amendment. The citation from May under standing order 48, which is the order respecting privileged motions, reads,—I am reading from Beauchesnes Parliamentary Rules and Forms, paragraph 406:

The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it, or abstain from voting thereon, or to present to the house an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question.

In moving this amendment, I am not attempting to follow the second of the two courses mentioned in the rule; I am not presenting to the house an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question. What I am seeking to do is to effect such an alteration in the question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon. I have not consulted with the members of the party generally, but I think I have a true impression of how they feel. I believe I can say for hon. gentlemen sitting on this side that if my right hon. friend will accept this amendment, all of us will be prepared to support the second reading of this bill. It will be thus made clear that our opposition, if opposition is necessary, is not to the principle of effecting economies, bringing about cooperation and helping to remove the national roads from political interference but to any enactment which would compel amalgamation of the national railway system and the Canadian Pacific or which would take away from this parliament or this House of Commons the rights which they should have at all times.

I hope I have followed the example suggested by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in not attempting to make this a controversial discussion but to bring the political parties as close together as possible at this very critical time. I move this amendment in the sincere hope that it may be the means of enabling this House of Commons to take a united stand on this all important measure. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment does not involve any lengthening of the debate or any delay in getting into committee. It will rather have the opposite effect; it will shorten discussion very materially. If the amendment is carried the house will declare as a guiding principle what the minister himself has declared already is intended, and also what I cannot conceive any government being willing to other than declare with respect to the right of parliament and the duty of the House of Commons. With the house expressing its opinion in this way, we shall feel a sense of security in supporting the principle of the bill for there will then be no possibility of mistake as to what we are supporting. But if that cannot be done, I must confess that so far as I personally am concerned I should not find it possible to support the second reading of this bill, because I would find in the refusal by the government of a declaration of this kind, evidence that there must be a sinister design which is not apparent on the face of the measure itself.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the right to discuss the question whether or not the amendment is in order. In my judgment portions of it are not in order, but at the moment that is not a matter of importance.

The closing words of the right hon. gentleman opposite indicate clearly what was in his mind in the drafting of this amendment. When you speak of sinister motives or designs you can always be sure there is something of the kind behind a suggested amendment such as this. To suggest in a time like this that there are sinister motives in the introduction of the bill which is now before the house for second reading, and that these sinister motives are to be met by the introduction of the amendment just submitted is quite beyond me. However, the right hon. gentleman and his followers will have to adjust themselves to the necessary viewpoint to deal with that phase of the question.

I am going to make a very short review of the situation, Mr. Speaker, and of the legislation now before the house, and I think I can convince hon. members opposite that they are approaching this question from, shall I say, the wrong angle. The position is not, as has been suggested so frequently in this house, that these are the properties of the people of Canada. These are now the properties of the people who loaned their money to build them, and under normal conditions they would take possession of them. It does seem to me that there are a few fundamental ideas which must be kept in mind in discussing these proposals. Let us look at them.

In Canada we had the Canadian Northern railway system, the Grand Trunk system, the Grand Trunk Pacific system, the National Transcontinental system and the Intercolonial line. These roads were the property of the crown with regard to the National Transcontinental and Intercolonial lines, and of private interests with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern. These properties were built with borrowed money, and that money was obtained largely through the guarantees given by the provinces and by the dominion which enabled the securities to be sold in the money markets of the world. In the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific the Grand Trunk gave its guarantee to the securities of the affiliated enterprise, it being the parent company. In the case of the Canadian Northern there were guarantees both by the provinces and by the dominion. Guarantees were given by a Liberal government in connection with the construction of the line into Edmonton, and those who will look at the statutes of that time will find there an express condition that the road never should be amalgamated with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Guarantees were given by the province of British Columbia in regard to the construction of the old Canadian Northern from the mountains to the Pacific. We had the Canadian Northern Alberta, the Canadian Northern Saskatchewan and the Canadian Northern Ontario; we had various broken bits of line bearing the names of the provinces through which they passed, the securities of which were guaranteed by the provinces and by the dominion. The Grand Trunk railway system, which ran from Portland to Chicago, through Quebec and Ontario, combined a large number of branch lines and in fact, as is well known to those who are students of the railway question in this country, separate entities or companies still exist. For instance, there was the old Canada Atlantic, the line running from Ottawa to Parry Sound or beyond, the rails of which were carried to Coteau. These systems still exist; their securities are outstanding. They have been guaranteed in some instances by, we will say, the Grand Trunk; in others by other companies and in still others by the crown, but the fact is that the Grand Trunk system as such consisted of a large number of separate companies grouped together under one controlling management, and the very fact that they were bought at such a great cost had much to do with the subsequent financial difficulties of the Grand Trunk railway system.

It is needless for me to deal with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway to-day. It was bankrupt before it was built; it was insolvent before it was completed. It passed into receivership and then came into the hands of the crown, really, under the amalgamation known as the Canadian National railway system. The Intercolonial railway was built by the people directly and owned by the crown. The millions of dollars that were invested in that enterprise were borrowed on the credit of the Canadian people plus a guarantee that was given, it will be recalled, under the provisions of the British North America Act, to enable the money to be obtained cheaply for its construction. That road was not located having regard to the best economic conditions; for strategic and other reasons it was built where it now is rather than where it should have been. These conditions were referred to during the course of this debate, but the money invested is the money of the people of Canada and not of any private enterprise. The obligation to repay the money was a direct obligation on the people of this dominion. The National Transcontinental, which represents an investment of hundreds of millions of dollars, was built in part from the surplus in the consolidated revenue fund, obtained from taxes imposed upon the people of Canada, and in part by borrowed money. It was to cost $13,000,000; it cost several hundred millions.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I shall not do more than indicate that these bankrupt enterprises were united into one system. When the decision of the privy council was finally given—and at that time the party of my right hon. friend was in power—an order in council was passed that brought all these systems under one control. They are known now as the Canadian National Railways. As I have said, they comprise the old systems to which I have alluded, together with the new roads built by the people of Canada—the National Transcontinental, the old Intercolonial railway, as well as the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk system, and the Canadian Northern.

The immediate effect of that amalgamation, not expressly stated in terms, has been to relieve the provinces of the weight of their guarantees, and if these guarantees were made effective against British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba those provinces would all be hopelessly bankrupt. That is the railway position so far as the provinces in question are concerned.

Having been united under the conditions I have mentioned, they operated as an entity, as a system, and they carried on transportation from Portland to Chicago and in every province of Canada; and in the operating system was included the old Intercolonial railway. I wonder whether this house realizes just what the present position is. Sometimes I feel that the magnitude of the problem that confronts this parliament is little understood or appreciated. It is the greatest problem that confronts the Canadian people; it is the problem beyond all others that calls for the exercise of patience and in my judgment of much sacrifice on the part of the taxpayers. Why? Because not only have the provinces given their guarantees, but the dominion has given its guarantee with respect to the securities that are outstanding.

To what extent does the public own the securities of these systems that are now called the Canadian National Railways? Almost every hon. member knows, but I venture to repeat it. It amounts to nearly $1,300,000,000 —that is, nearly thirteen hundred millions of dollars are in the hands of the investing public in almost every country in the world, and securities representing the investment are guaranteed by the dominion or the provinces of this confederation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Altogether?

Mr. BENNETT: I am speaking of the securities that are outstanding in the hands of the investing public of the world: Canada, the United States, Great Britain, continental Europe and even in the far east. Purposely, I do not mention the numbers of railway lines that have been brought into this system for prices that are little short of a public scandal; I do not mention that because it is unnecessary—it is past history so far as the act is concerned. As regards the branch lines, they have been built by the Canadian National Railways and by the Canadian Pacific Railway both, and in some instances duplication of facilities has brought disaster to both systems. I am not giving the exact figure; I said $1,300,000,000—it is $1,280,000,000 odd. That does not include the sums of money that have been paid out by the Canadian people from the consolidated revenue of Canada, or borrowed by them and handed over to these railways.

Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, just what that sum represents? It represents nearly one thousand millions of dollars. So that the two together, the securities that are now outstanding in the hands of the investing public, representing roughly $1,300,000,000, plus the money that the Canadian people, either from surplus taxation or by direct loans made upon the sale of their own securities, have contributed, represent a total of nearly $2,300,000,000. And when I made the statement as to the investment by the crown, that is by the people, I did not include the interest upon the moneys thus invested. If I were to do so it might be almost unbelievable because the aggregate is so large.

Therefore we have this problem before us as Canadians: How can we so adjust conditions as to make possible the very lowest demand being made upon the Canadian taxpayer to provide interest to pay the annual requirements of the securities held by the public, to say nothing of the interest upon the moneys which we have directly put into these enterprises? And that eliminates, of course, interest on the Intercolonial railway system.

Now we have another railway system in this country. That system was heavily subsidized by the Canadian people in land and money and it became a very great and prosperous organization. It is known in every part of the world. It was a competitor of the combined systems, now known as the Canadian National railway system. Sometimes, if I may be pardoned for saying it, I wonder how intelligent men ever thought that it was possible to create three transcontinental systems of railways in Canada. Take the history of world transportation, take just the bald outlines of it, and ask yourselves how Canadians could ever have thought it possible to create a Grand Trunk Pacific transcontinental system, a Canadian Northern transcontinental system and a Canadian Pacific transcontinental system. It is beyond me. The other day I had brought to my attention a life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier written by a great friend of his, Senator David. In the 1905 edition, the first edition, the author opens one paragraph with the assertion that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not only a great orator but that he had clairvoyance inasmuch as he saw the future of the country when he brought forward the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Later editions of the book leave that out. I need hardly point out that there must have been something in the minds of Canadians that now makes it impossible for us to understand who could have dreamed that three transcontinental railways could be sustained by eight million people.

Mr. EULER: They thought there would be more.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course they did; but you could not project your mind into the future on any material that then existed that would warrant any such expectation, that you could maintain three transcontinental systems in this country.

Mr. McINTOSH: If you have faith in your country.

Mr. BENNETT: One does not wish to have faith in one's country to the extent of being foolish, and anyone knows that the mere suggestion that eight million or fifteen million people could sustain three transcontinental railway systems, over the territory these railways crossed, is absurd.

Now, I have been a witness to this. I saw these railways being built in western Canada. For thirty-five years I have lived there and I saw the development of transportation in that area. I remember the day the first Canadian Northern train reached Edmonton, and I remember when the Grand Trunk Pacific party came west for the purpose of considering the construction of their lines. I travelled west from Calgary to Banff with Mr. Hays and Mr. Morse and the prospective board of directors of that time, and I recall exactly what was then said. No one ever expected that there were going to be two systems then. People fully expected that the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific would be united into one system. Those who recall the dramatic moments in this house, though not in this particular chamber, when Mr. Blair left the government of that day, will remember as they recall it that he pointed out that what has happened would happen. It has happened even as he foresaw it. The point I desire to make is that we have received this as a legacy, and I think we have some right to ask hon. gentlemen opposite to give us their assistance in the solution of this difficulty. I say that for the reason that this party did not create it.

Mr. HANBURY: The people of Canada did.

Mr. BENNETT: This party did not create it.

Mr. McINTOSH: It created the trade tangle.

Mr. BENNETT: Under our constitution the measures that made possible the construction of those lines had to be initiated by the government of the day and they were initiated by the then governments of the day. This is not a question of the people of Canada; it is one of governmental action, the initiative being taken by the governments of the day for the construction of those lines. But as I have said frequently in public and made perfectly clear, I repeat in this chamber that the provinces of the west must assume an enormous responsibility with respect to the guarantees that they gave to the Canadian Northern system, without which guarantees that system would never have reached the coast. That is clear; every thoughtful man who examines the history of the matter knows that. In a period of universal depression, a period in world history the like of which has never been known before, this government has fallen heir to that condition. Having fallen heir to that condition, it had to seek as best it could some means for the solution of the difficulty that would not be wholly incompatible with the views of the Canadian people. I recognize the fact that no soft words are going to solve this problem, and no criticism of high taxation will pay the bills that result from it.

Let us see what has been done. Some hon. members may doubt the wisdom of the appointment of a royal commission; some may very properly say that the government of the day could have arrived at the same conclusions as those reached by the royal commission. But when you find the view put forward by the directing executive head of the national system and acquiesced in by the head of the Pacific system, that a royal commission was desirable in order that the problem might be studied from every angle, political considerations being eliminated, I think hon. members will agree that the government at least was warranted in taking the attitude it did. But I go further: this chamber approved that view. When the select committee made its report recommending that consideration be given to the views expressed by the railway executives, it will be recalled that the house acquiesced in that recommendation. There are those who say that the report of the royal commission does not advance the matter at all. In my judgment that commission gave more careful attention and consideration to the problem than is usually the case with public commissions. Let us for a moment examine it. The British interests, comprising practically 90 per cent of all the Canadian Pacific securities and the major part of the Canadian Northern securities that were issued prior to 1920, were represented by Lord Ashfield. My colleague, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), has pointed out to the house that in Lord Ashfield we had a man skilled in finance, an expert in the operation of transportation systems who, during one of his visits here, had to shorten it in order that he might return to deal with the complex problems arising out of the underground systems of transportation in the great city of London. He came here, dispassionate, unprejudiced, and looked carefully over the situation. He traversed this country from ocean to ocean. The same may be said of his United States colleague. It is true that the latter was not a trunk line president. Owing to conditions that obtained in the United States at that time, the securing of the services of a trunk line president was absolutely impossible, but Mr. Loree is recognized by all railroad men in the republic to the south of us as having no superior so far as the practice and theory of railroading are concerned. He saw this problem with his own eyes. Then, if you take our own Canadians, I think most hon. members will agree that the chairman of the commission is a man whose position, and reputation as a jurist not only in this country but elsewhere, entitles us to have the utmost confidence in his dispassionate and judicial weighing of evidence and in the conclusions at which he would arrive. As regards the businessmen, Mr. Leman is the general manager of a bank but he has also had wide experience as an engineer. If my memory serves me aright, he is a graduate of McGill university and has wide experience. He concentrated his mind upon the problem. Certainly Sir Joseph Flavelle will, by the common consent of all who know him, be regarded as one of the foremost businessmen this country has yet produced. In regard to the selection of a gentleman from the extreme east I cannot do more than adopt what was said by my colleague the Minister of Railways, and everyone from western Canada who knows Professor Murray, president of Saskatchewan university, will agree that in considering this problem, he brought to it a skilled, disciplined mind, without prejudice. I think I am within the judgment of the house when I say that this commission considered the railway situation without fear, favour or bias. They examined the presidents of the roads, the directors, the financial comptrollers, the operating officials and they saw the roads themselves. They understood fully the duplication not only of trackage but of facilities. They saw all that was implied and involved in the branch line programs to which effect had been given and they learned with dismay of the financial position. They made a report. This government took the view that, the report having been received, the best way to proceed was to ask that a bill be prepared containing all the recommendations that had been made, that is for discussion only, and in the early stages it was thought it might be introduced into this chamber, but after consultation with my colleagues, it was concluded that a more ample opportunity for what one might call calm, dispassionate consideration of the problem, could be given if the bill were first introduced into the Senate.

I say this to my colleagues in the House of Commons, that I believe seldom has any committee given to a problem the same careful, thoughtful, unprejudiced consideration that was given to the bill by the Senate committee on railways. I am violating no confidence when I say that Lord Ashfield said to me in December last in England that he had read with the greatest interest the reports of that committee as they had been published and that he could not conceive of better consideration and attention being given to any matter than that evidenced by the work of that committee. The bill has been changed from what it was originally; clauses have been added; clauses have been withdrawn, but in the main the principles continue to be those which the commission reported should be adopted. The government as such has in this legislation no object but one—to do what is best for the Canadian people. If constructive suggestions are offered from any corner of this house, the government will consider them on their merits, and they will be either accepted or rejected as they are considered sound or unsound. In other words, if the weight of argument would indicate that some view other than that indicated by the bill or some other clause should be adopted, the government is only too glad to avail itself of every assistance that may be offered. Why? Because the problem is not the problem of a government: it is the problem of the whole people, of this House of Commons and of parliament itself. In approaching that problem, let us see what the evidence discloses before I touch on the bill itself.

The evidence discloses not only the financial position to which I have alluded, but further that there is imposed annually upon the Canadian people a burden that amounts to many millions of dollars—roughly a minimum of one million dollars a week—to discharge the contractual obligations which the Canadian people, as taxpayers, have incurred. It is no good to say that we will repudiate those obligations. To do so is to destroy the credit of this country because the guarantees given constitute a contract to pay on the part of all the people of Canada just as though the securities were issued by the Canadian people without the medium of a railway at all. That is the difficulty of the position. Every year these moneys must be raised. Last year it is probable that some five millions of dollars may have been earned by the railways to take care of an obligation that amounted roughly, with capital expenditures, to between sixty-five and seventy million dollars. Does the true significance of that go home to the Canadian people, or even to this house? I looked the other day at the painting of Sir John Macdonald, and yet in the year that Sir John Macdonald died the entire revenues of the Dominion of Canada were not as great as the deficit of the Canadian National Railways we are now discussing, so rapidly has this country expanded and so limitless apparently have we thought our ability to provide the taxes, for in the end it becomes a matter of taxation.

Now what would happen under normal conditions if this were a private enterprise having defaulted in the payment of its obligations? What would happen would be that which took place in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific. An application would be made to the Exchequer court to appoint a receiver, the directors would pass out of existence, the receiver would take charge and would operate the system for the benefit of the bondholders or creditors of the road.

There has been introduced into this debate, as there was by others in another place, the thought that we are thinking of the financial interests as opposed to the human interests that may be concerned. Mr. Speaker, human interest centres in the employees of the system only if it continues to operate, for if it does not operate there is no employment, and unless a very, very great improvement is made in conditions the system as a whole cannot continue to operate. Every thoughtful man knows that. Everyone who has given attention to it knows that. Under normal conditions a receiver would be appointed by the courts. But there can be no receiver where you have the provinces and the dominion with their guarantees. The crown cannot default; the dominion and the provinces must pay or else their credit is done. Therefore, at the very threshold of the problem, the commission had to consider how to combine the powers of a receivership with the continued operation of a system that must if possible be maintained in operation, and so they selected three trustees. They did not call them trustee receivers, because the word would not be appropriate when dealing with the crown, because the crown does not go into a receivership. But nevertheless that was the condition with which they had to deal—default certain and positive for at least some period of time.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Under normal conditions the effect of a receivership, as every hon. gentleman knows, is that interest is no longer paid, and all the revenues are available to rehabilitate the system and bring about its reorganization. I am not going to take the time of the house this afternoon to mention more than one or two receiverships, but the great Milwaukee system went into receivership, as did Northern Pacific, the Union Pacific, the Santa Fe, the Wabash, and the Chicago and Great Western. All these roads went into the hands of receivers, and during the period of the receivership the security holders got no interest on their money. But you cannot do that in connection with our road because the provinces have given their guarantees and the dominion has given its guarantee as well. So we have the situation where this commission had to select a plan that would ensure the benefits of a receivership without in any sense restricting the operations of the system so far as that was possible from an economic standpoint. In other words, the legal necessities, together with all existing facts, made it essential that a body should be selected that would have all the powers of a receiver, together with the powers of a controlling management, to bring about that equilibrium between income and outlay that is the aim of every receiver before a reorganization takes place.

Why is the number three? It is the considered judgment of the commission, every one of them, that any number greater than three means disaster. That is their view. They do not put forward that view as politicians or as members of parliament. They put forword that view as business men because they know that in the history of enterprises in which the effort to bring about an equilibrium between income and outlay has succeeded it has been necessary to have a small management. For the most part receiverships, which in the case of the railways I have mentioned were composed of two receivers, and if my memory serves me right, in one of the greatest the number was three. But the commission is very certain that any number greater than three will bring about a difficult if not an impossible situation.

I understand the difficulties involved—does any hon. member of this house think for a minute that living as long as I have in western Canada I do not understand the difficulty that anyone is going to have in explaining why you have only three trustees and they all living in one city, Montreal? Does anyone believe that I do not appreciate that difficulty, or that I seek it lightly and happily and gladly? Of course not. But we accept it because we believe, on the balance of the arguments that are presented, that there is no answer to the fact that any number of men greater than three could not bring about what we are aiming to accomplish, the restoration of equilibrium between expenditures and income in the reorganization of the system. It is because we believe that any number greater than three means disaster, and that is based on experience that is universal. I once heard Lord Buckmaster say that Lord Macnaghten, one of the greatest jurists of the Victorian era, said that the ideal number for a court of appeal was three, and he never changed his mind with respect to that. In England the highest courts, Divisions No. 1 and No. 2 are limited to three in number because experience has taught them that three is a much better number of men with which to deal with the problems than any greater number. I am bound to say that my own experience, which is not a matter of importance, and my observation, which is a matter of greater importance, and my reading, as well as the reasons presented to me, have convinced me beyond question that we should stick to the recommendation of three trustees in this matter. I put this to the house: Suppose we make the number five; those who have to deal with the matter or come after us will say, if success does not follow, "Why did you not follow the advice of the commission; why did you not accept their advice?" If one of the three is to be selected from one group or one class, then shall we say that political, racial, religious or occupational consideration shall prevail? Must it not be that these three men are selected with the same regard for merit, and for merit only, as induces a court to select a receiver?

The high court of parliament has now been called upon to determine how many men shall constitute the trustees for this system, to bring about again equilibrium between income and expenditures, and restore this road to a position where it will earn its way. The high court of parliament is now asked to accept or reject the advice which has been given by those who went out and studied this problem more carefully than you or I can study it—and their conclusion is that three is the number which should be appointed. I share that view. Apart from the arguments which their report indicates—and in my judgment they are conclusive—the experience of the world in dealing with matters of business is that when you have a situation, such as that to which I have alluded, there should be a small body of men constantly in consultation who will be able to concentrate their minds upon the problem. And by that unity of effort which three, rather than five, can make possible, we will restore the property to the position in which we desire it. That is the fundamental recommendation with respect to administration. The directors disappear, not because the commission wanted to get rid of directors, per se; they disappear because of the financial position of this enterprise. They disappear because in a court of law, under normal conditions, they would thus disappear. And so it is that these trustees are substituted for the directors, by the high court of parliament, just as the directors would be superseded in a court of justice, as was done in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific by a statutory receivership to preserve the property and to bring about, as I have stated, the equilibrium between income and expenditure.

I believe I have satisfied—at least, I trust I have satisfied the house, that the property is not the property of the people, except to the extent to which the people own the securities which are in default. No interest has been paid upon it, and therefore it is fair to say that the Canadian people, as the holders of securities, have an interest in the enterprise. But this enterprise belongs to the investors; let us keep that in our minds.

Mr. HANBURY: How about guarantees?

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about that—the people who have put their money into it and have not had any interest paid, and investors who have bought securities, have bought them on the strength of our guarantees. There is no question about that. Under those circumstances I trust this house realizes that many of the considerations which you and I, under normal conditions, would find operative in inducing us to arrive at a conclusion, must disappear. For we are now dealing with very simple matters—securities, property in default, and security owners having a right to enforce their claims unless we, as guarantors, exercise our position and make payments. Under those circumstances I think—at least I hope—that the house will recognize just what the position is. Business men in this chamber, as they reflect upon the analogy between that and an ordinary joint stock company which is bankrupt, or as they reflect upon the history of great enterprises in this country, will realize how essential it was that the property be placed in charge of the numbers I have indicated for the purposes we and they have in view.

Some difficulty, apparently, has been experienced by hon. members opposite in the thought that there is some sinister motive in this bill to bring about an amalgamation with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I say to this house now that if that apprehension is grounded upon the fact that the section in the bill which was put in as it was originally drafted, has been taken out, is the cause of that apprehension, then we will restore it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Then we will restore it. There is no thought of any trick to bring about something which we have pledged ourselves not to do. There is no sinister design behind this measure to accomplish the amalgamation of these systems, when this parliament is opposed to that being done. In my judgment it would be impossible to bring about the amalgamation of these two systems on any terms or conditions unless the people, themselves, had an opportunity so to declare. I have given much thought to the point as to whether or not the honest and proper method to pursue is, at the next general election, to afford an opportunity by plebiscite for the people to determine whether or not it is desirous that this should happen. It is true there was a plebiscite in this country concerning prohibition. It was not held at a general election, and the result gave us prohibition as they had it in England and free trade as they had it in Maine.

At any rate, let us leave that for the moment. I desire to make it abundantly clear to the house that in my judgment no government could ever have any mandate which could be regarded as ample to warrant it in taking the step to which reference has been made, unless it proceeded from the direct authority given by the people who owned the equity of redemption. The people of this country own not the road but the equity of redemption. And so long as the government of Canada is Father Christmas and pays under the guarantee, just so long, there being no foreclosure, that equity of redemption has a right to express its views as to what shall be done. And it can only in my judgment be done in the manner I have indicated, by affording to every citizen who, in the end, owns the equity of redemption, an opportunity to express an opinion for or against amalgamation.

In order that there might be no misapprehension, in order that hon. members might be deprived of an opportunity of casting even a suspicion of bad faith upon the government—although I do hesitate to deprive hon. members opposite of an argument—at any rate in order that they might be deprived of that argument, I desire to say we will place in the bill in adequate terms words which will make it clear that there may be no amalgamation of the two systems nor destruction of their integrity under and by virtue of this measure. And I may say that when I first heard of it my colleague the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) had not learned that such a suggestion was in the mind of anybody, because I do not believe this bill is susceptible of any such construction being placed upon it.

Mr. HANBURY: But it could possibly be interpreted in that way.

Mr. BENNETT: I hardly think it is fair to say that there is any such possibility. But lest there be, I desire to remove that stumbling block from the cooperation which the right hon. gentleman desires. We will make that clear.

Now, let us proceed one step further, the desire to eliminate politics from the control and operation of the system. I am not going to dwell upon that phase of the matter. I am not even going to digress at length, beyond saying that the commissioners thought it was wise, not as an insult to members of parliament or the Senate, but as a principle which they thought should be made effective, that members of this parliament, whether in the Senate or the House of Commons, should not be eligible for appointment as trustees. They had no desire to insult any member of this parliament, whether in one house or the other, but they desired to make it abundantly clear that the whole principle was that the benefits which accrue from privately owned operation should be made available for this road. That is why they put that provision in the bill. It was struck out in the Senate because hon. gentlemen thought that there was some reflection upon their fitness. I do not so construe it and I hope it will be the will of this house to restore such a provision in order that there may be no question of that kind with respect to the measure.

Leaving aside the question of politics, leaving aside the necessity of this action being taken, we come to the methods suggested in the measure to accomplish the ends desired. As I have indicated there is, first, cooperation by agreement and, second, cooperation by direction where the parties fail to agree. If there is no amalgamation and if the object which must be always kept in mind when a property is placed under trustees or receivers is to be attained, it must be done in one of two ways. It must be done either by amalgamation with its competitor or cooperation with its competitor so as to eliminate wasteful and useless services. I warn every hon. member of this house, including myself, that we must be prepared to put up with great sacrifices to attain our end. It is no good for a member to come into this house and say: I have only a train once a week on my branch line, I should have six trains a week. It is no use to say: I must have three trains a day instead of one. It is no use to carry on political agitation and intrigue for the purpose of enforcing that upon the government. Just so long as you have a government able to control the management, just so long will you have intrigue and combinations to force upon the management the views of the government and its supporters. These are times for plain speaking, and there is no hon. member now looking me in the face who does not know that what I say is true. I know it is as as true as the fact that I am looking at hon. gentlemen opposite.

Let us face the facts. Let us realize that the reason cooperation is provided for in this bill in the terms it is is to make effective the purposes of the bill. How else are we going to do it? I will admit it is drastic but modern surgery says that if you will cure, the operation must be radical where the evil is deep-seated. This is a surgical operation and it must be a radical operation. In order to make it effective and successful we must eliminate every political consideration which would interfere with the success of the operation. This is not a pleasant thing to say. There are hon. members in this house within sound of my voice who the moment I said what I have said began to think in terms of what it was going to mean in votes in a particular locality. We are all human, but we must not forget that we have a larger obligation. Our effort must be to save not the road alone but, as I said, because of the guarantees that have been given, the credit of the guarantors themselves.

Let us go a step further and deal with cooperation by agreement. The minister gave evidence of what might be accomplished when one had the purpose and the intention to accomplish. There is no doubt that all one has to do is to take the time tables and he will see where cooperation by agreement will accomplish a great deal of saving, bring about many economies and prevent waste.

We come now to the second point with reference, to which I should like to make a few observations, cooperation by direction as the result of arbitration. Some hon. members of this house regard this measure as one that interferes with the statutory and corporate rights of the Canadian Pacific Railway. My examination of the facts so far as I have been able to look behind the scenes leads me to conclude that that clause was put in by those who were responsible for it because they thought it would be beneficial to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. There is no one who would interfere with the corporate powers granted to that road just merely for the sake of interfering. When the railway commission came into being it was clothed with powers which gave it the right to interfere here, there and elsewhere. It is true that it may be said that this provision came about by reason of agreement but leaving all aside for the moment, it must be remembered that we have always claimed the right, either by the governor in council before the railway commission or by the railway commission exercising its statutory powers, to deal with problems affecting the rights of the people with respect to the railroads that serve them. The theory is that all corporations created by this parliament are created for the purpose of serving the people and the basis of this statutory cooperation—that is what we will call it—is that it must be beneficial. There can be no arbitration under this bill unless the cooperation sought by arbitration is cooperation that will result in good to the systems affected. It must be beneficial to both systems, not only to one. The condition precedent to the exercise of the compulsory powers of arbitration, a condition which must be determined antecedently to the powers being exercised, is that as a result of the exercise of these powers, if they are exercised, benefits will result to both systems. That is the basic principle of the statute, that benefits must result to both before the arbitral powers can be exercised.

I shall not transgress too long upon the time of the house, but I want to say one word more with respect to the control of parliament. If I have not been unfair, and I do not think I have, in stating the general purposes and intentions of the measure, the house will agree with me that we must eliminate the possibilities of what I shall call interference with this extraordinary management. Even as receivers or trustees have to go to a competent court to receive their powers, their authority and their right to issue securities if the earnings are not sufficient, just so is this parliament the high court to which these trustees must always come. There is no other court to which they can go for the purpose of discharging their duties under this statute. The statute renders them independent as though they were the operators of a private system but it renders them subject to all the control to which a private system would be subject. Further, it does more; it provides—I think the right hon. gentleman must have overlooked this—that this parliament must supply the money for the deficits.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We did not overlook that.

Mr. HANBURY: And have no control otherwise.

Mr. BENNETT: If that is so, what further control can be had in anything except the control to grant or withhold supply?

Mr. HANBURY: After the money is spent.

Mr. BENNETT: Not at all; a budget has to be presented. If the hon. gentleman has not read the act I may tell him that it provides that a budget must be presented, and this parliament gives its sanction and approval in order that it may have that power and control that is essential. I put this to the house, Mr. Speaker: How would it be possible for these trustees to function and operate if they were to be subject to the governor in council? I put that problem to the house and to every individual member. What is the governor in council? The governor in council is the government of the day.

Mr. HANBURY: Responsible government.

Mr. BENNETT: I have heard it otherwise described in this house by hon. gentlemen opposite. I suppose government by order in council, which rescinded a contract for $4,000,000 for a hotel in Vancouver, substituting contracts that brought the cost to $11,000,000, is responsible government. That may be responsible government, but responsible to whom? The problem which this house and this country faces is not to be glossed over by any talk about constitutional rights or parliamentary powers such as this. Can parliament create a body with such powers as would be exercised by a private enterprise and still have control by reason of having to find the necessary money to enable them to function? I say yes. That is what is embodied in this statute. That is parliamentary control in its broadest and best sense; that is responsible government. Not a dollar can be found for this road or for these trustees; no money can be advanced to enable them to meet the obligations that have been imposed upon the roads by the guarantees alike of provinces and the dominion, unless this parliament grants it to them. That is the essential control that parliament must exercise, and if I so desired I could name many commissions both in England and in Canada in which we find the same situation.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I desire to avail myself of this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to say that if government ownership is to succeed it can only do so if it observes the same business maxims that are observed by private enterprises. It cannot succeed if those who administer it are to be dragooned on the one hand by their political friends and attacked on the other hand by their political foes. It cannot succeed if its policies are made the football of contending parties. It can only succeed if it has the same free, untrammelled opportunity under the laws of the country that is afforded private enterprise. The corporate position of these trustees must be the same as the corporate position of the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Both are under the law; both control properties; both exercise their powers to the best of their ability, with an eye singly directed to the success of the enterprise. If this parliament should be dissatisfied with their conduct action can be taken any year when it is asked to provide means and money for the operation of the system. No one will complain, I am sure, if the time ever comes when they do not have to apply to parliament for money, but if parliament in its wisdom, in the exercise of its plenary powers, is dissatisfied, it can declare that it will not give them further money unless they vacate their offices. Parliament has complete control. Anyone who knows the fundamentals of government knows this is so. This house, in its power to vote money, has complete control over that board of trustees, and parliamentary control can never be more strongly exercised than it can under these very powers.

I shall not deal longer with this phase of the matter, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to say that when subsection 6 of section 9 is referred to it must be perfectly clear that the crown is the crown as a shareholder, because as a shareholder the crown owns the Canadian National system. The words "any other shareholder" of course contemplates to the crown as a shareholder. With respect to the possibility of amalgamation being brought about by an indirect method when it could not be directly accomplished, the section that we will offer will provide against both direct and indirect means, so the house need have no fear in that respect.

Now I should like to say a word or two with respect to the amendment. I hope the right hon. gentleman will withdraw it. Perhaps my hopes are beyond my expectations, but for a moment let us look at what it contains. It asks that the second reading of this bill be postponed, and of course that means the end of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it does not.

Mr. BENNETT: Hold on a moment. Look at the rules with respect to the six months hoist and the three months hoist. The postponement of the second reading of this measure means an interference with its orderly passing in this house under the government of the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I submit that under the rules of the house this amendment can be put and, if it is carried, the house can immediately proceed with the second reading of the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think that is a point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: There can be no proceeding with the immediate passing of the second reading of this bill, for the motion is that the bill be now read a second time, while the amendment asks that all the words after "that" be struck out and something substituted therefor. If that is not the negation of the second reading I think every hon. member of this house must have difficulty in understanding the English language. What follows is this: The amendment asks that the second reading of this bill be postponed until this house has declared—and here is the manual of constitutional law that the house is to adopt. I ask the house to listen to it. First:

> . . . that nothing therein shall be taken to authorize any amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways with the Canadian Pacific company;

The appropriate place for that, of course, is in amendment to the measure itself, and not in amendment to the second reading of the measure, which is the adoption of the principle. That is the answer to that point. The next point is:

> . . . or to divest parliament of its rights;

There can be no divesting of parliament of its rights by any statute of this parliament, for the parliament that acts to-day may act to-morrow in an entirely different way. It can repeal to-day what it enacted yesterday, and it may enact to-morrow what it rejected to-day. Parliament is omnipotent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask my right hon. friend this question: If this measure were passed to-day could parliament remove the chief trustee to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In what way?

Mr. BENNETT: Just by passing a statute removing him, without repealing the whole of the measure. I do not want to be offensive, but I do say that no student would suggest that the passing of this statute will divest parliament of any of its rights. What are the rights of parliament? They are defined in the British North America Act. Are we amending that act? Can we amend it? Are we changing the constitution? Are we considering an address to change the constitution? Are we trying to take from parliament any rights which it possesses? Its plenary legislative powers exist tomorrow, after we pass this bill; they exist next week and the week after; they exist in continuity and in perpetuity until the constitution itself destroys those rights. Is there any doubt about that? Then the amendment goes on to say:

> . . . or to take from the House of Commons its primary duty to control expenditures of public moneys and the taxes required to meet the same;

This bill provides that this parliament shall itself control the public moneys that are to be made available to these trustees. Does this house expect to have the right to control the expenditures made by the company itself? The amendment says not. It contains these words:

> . . . public moneys and the taxes required to meet the same.

This bill provides that if this parliament sees fit it need not grant a single sou to the trustees. Parliament has complete control over taxes and expenditures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt the Prime Minister for a moment. I should like to direct his attention to section 7 of the bill which provides:

> No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask my right hon. friend whether that does not make this House of Commons subject to the will of the Senate with respect to the salary to be paid to the chief trustee named therein.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is the same with respect to the judges. This followed the provision with respect to the judges, that is all; it desired to place the trustees beyond the influence of political control and to give them the same position of independence as the judges enjoy. They can be removed only by a joint address of the Senate and the House of Commons. Let me go further however. If this parliament, notwithstanding that provision, saw fit to pass a statute the day after tomorrow repealing that section, it has the power to do so. Everyone knows that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Senate would have to be in agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, of course; you cannot pass any bill unless it is passed by the commons, the Senate and the crown, for those three constitute parliament; there is no parliament without that conjunction. Let me quote further:

> And that the provisions of said bill shall be read in the light of this declaration.

Well, all bills are read in the light of that declaration; there is no bill on the statute books that is not read in the light of that declaration. But, I ask, why should we adopt, as a preliminary of the second reading of the bill, a short essay on responsible government? I ask that question without offence. All bills, I say, are passed in this country in the light of that declaration, and to suggest that this bill should be singled out as one that shall be passed in the light of that declaration is to put it mildly to do violence to constitutional practice and authority. Further:

> And be construed so as to conform therewith, and that in so far as any of its provisions may be inconsistent therewith they shall be amended accordingly.

In other words, before you know what is to be done, Mr. Speaker, you are asked to adopt amendments in this house. The time for this of course is when the bill is in committee; the time for it is when amendments are under consideration in the committee; the time is when an opportunity may be offered for consideration and discussion, when we know what we are dealing with. But as regards this pious declaration that the rights of parliament are not to be taken away in the passing of this bill, and that the control of public expenditures is in the hands of the House of Commons—that is only partly true, unfortunately; they are in the hands of parliament, for the Senate sometimes rejects money bills. I wonder if it is beyond the memory of hon. members that the Senate rejected the Yukon bill by which a subsidy was provided for the construction of that road; I wonder if it is beyond the memory of the house that the Senate rejected a bill in the days of Sir John Macdonald with respect to a section of the Canadian Pacific that passes through the State of Maine. Is that beyond the memory of hon. gentlemen? The statement should be that parliament controls, for no bill that is passed by this house, not the budget bill, becomes law until it is passed by the second chamber and assented to by the crown. There are three divisions of government in this country—the legislative and executive and of course the judicial, which we leave out for the moment; and the legislative divides itself into three branches: the commons, the Senate and the crown. Now, this is a suggestion that only the commons shall be concerned in the matter before us. Let me point out however that we cannot adopt any such statement as the law of the country, not even to oblige my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)—that the commons is the only house. There is still a reformed Senate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. gentlemen laugh, but I read in a newspaper that it had been reformed by death—that was some years ago. So that it is hardly fitting that we should endeavour to insult one house of parliament by adopting a resolution to the effect that the control of expenditures of public moneys, and the taxes required to meet the same, shall not be taken away from the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Primary duty" are the words used.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, to take from the House of Commons its primary duty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what it says.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not its primary duty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is.

Mr. BENNETT: Its primary duty?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly it is.

Mr. BENNETT: That shows you, Mr. Speaker, how difficult it would be to adopt this essay as a preamble to the bill before us, because there are differences of opinion as to whether or not that is so. The primary duty of the House of Commons is not the control of expenditures of public moneys and of taxes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What else is it?

Mr. BENNETT: The primary duty of the House of Commons, as the right hon. gentleman knows, is to legislate. That is its primary duty; that is its job. And what is more, no legislation enacted by this House of Commons with respect to public expenditures or taxes is law until the other two branches of our system of government have functioned, namely, the Senate and the crown.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The right hon. gentleman knows that under the constitution of the mother country and of this country the right of the House of Commons over taxation and expenditures is fundamental.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what this amendment says. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Mackenzie) and myself will not be in disagreement as to fundamentals; the only difficulty is when you speak of the primary duty of the House of Commons. The fundamental duty of the House of Commons is, as between it and the Senate, to control expenditure of money; but the Senate has gone on record as saying that in this country that is not so. You will find that in the sessional papers of the Senate. They have the power to amend any money bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the right hon. gentleman believe in that?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the point I am discussing at the moment. The hon. gentleman's question reminds me of the stock question always put to the youthful candidate, "When will the hon. gentleman stop beating his wife?" I do not propose to answer that question. If it will be of any interest to the hon. gentleman, I may say to him frankly that I have always thought that so far as the control of expenditures is concerned the Senate had the power only to accept or to reject but not to amend. That has been my personal view.

I think I have covered the situation, and while I suppose it is not to be hoped for, I suggest that this amendment should be withdrawn. We propose to proceed with the bill and we ask the united assistance of the house in giving it the second reading and affording to every member of the house, on our own as well as on the opposite side, an opportunity to make any suggestions that may be at variance with the provisions of the bill as they now read.

It is my earnest hope and sincere desire that, realizing that the government of the day merely happens under our constitution to be the spokesman as between, the crown on the one hand, who must initiate, by message, any legislation involving money, and the house on the other, hon. members will adopt the bill after the fullest possible opportunity has been afforded for considering any amendments that may be suggested by the other side; and we will assume the responsibility for incorporating in the measure a provision that nothing therein contained shall be taken, read or construed as authorizing directly or indirectly any amalgamation of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific systems.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), in the course of his speech this afternoon, made one statement with which I agree, and that is that the government has some right to the assistance of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house in dealing with this very important railway problem. Having listened to many of the speeches that have been made in this debate and having read the ones which I did not hear, I believe they have been of such character and quality that they must have been of considerable assistance to the government in its effort to deal with this problem. That applies to the speeches not only from the other side, but from this as well. There are many respects in which most of us on this side are in agreement with the Prime Minister. Many of the statements which he made this afternoon will not meet with much disapproval from opposition members. But there are some respects in which most of us, at least on this side of the house, cannot agree with him, and I shall deal with those before I finish my remarks.

In a general way this railway problem which confronts the Canadian people admits of three possible solutions. The first is the continuation of the system which at present exists, that is of more or less unrestricted competition between the two great railway systems. There are some advocates of that course, some persons who believe we can safely leave the solution of this problem to the systems themselves. They point to the great economies which have been effected recently by the voluntary efforts of the executives of the two systems, and they consider, by a continuation of those efforts in the direction of economy, the Canadian Pacific can be put upon a dividend paying basis and the Canadian National Railways can be put upon an interest paying basis. I am, however, afraid that that view is based upon too optimistic an expectation. I fear that the return of prosperity will be so long deferred that if the country does not take some more drastic steps than a policy of laissez-faire, within a year or two it will be driven to take very drastic steps. So I do not agree with a policy of continuation of unrestricted competition between the two systems.

The second proposal, one which, I think, is propounded by some hon. members but not very many, is the one which we have come to call amalgamation. By amalgamation I do not mean the sale or transfer of the Canadian National property to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That is advocated by very few people. I mean unified management of the two systems. When we are speaking about amalgamation as a practical proposition, we mean unified management by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of all the railways in the Dominion of Canada. There are those who believe unified management under government ownership would be advantageous, but it may be dismissed from one's mind as being beyond the realm of the practical, because there is such a large volume of outstanding liabilities of the Canadian Pacific—and I mean by that their share capital as well as their bonded indebtedness —that no practical proposal has been placed before the Canadian people whereby provision can be made for a return of the investment of those who have put their money into the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. So when we are speaking of amalgamation, we mean amalgamation under the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I do not propose to argue at any great length for or against amalgamation, because to all intents and purposes it is not a live issue in this house. One has only to listen to this debate and to hear hon. members on both sides express their convictions, to realize that public sentiment is such that the Canadian people at the present time would not approve amalgamation of the two railway systems. There are many reasons for that, the strongest of which is, I suppose, that it is feared that to give the operation of 40,000 miles of railway to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would be to place too much power in the hands of one great corporation, and just as the radio committee last year, finally, by unanimous vote, rejected the proposal of Mr. Beatty that the channels of radio communication in this country be all handed over to a great private corporation, so the house and the Canadian people generally would at this time undoubtedly by a large vote reject any proposal that our channels of transportation be handed over to a great private corporation. Therefore I do not think I need spend much time in discussing amalgamation. It is quite possible that greater economies would be effected by amalgamation than by any other proposal we could adopt. Mr. Beatty's estimate of the economies that could be effected is, I think, $75,000,000. That may or may not be too large an amount. They can be brought about only by the scrapping of whole communities, the taking up of thousands of miles of rails and the displacement of an enormous number of labourers, and at present at least, serious as the situation is, the solution known as amalgamation is for all practical purposes out of the question. The benefits it would bring would be purchased at too great a price.

That brings us to the third proposal, the only other one that has been placed before the Canadian people, and that is the proposal along the lines of the recommendations of the Duff commission. It may be summed up in this: competition with cooperation, with provisions for enforcing the adoption of cooperative measures where the two systems themselves are not able to agree upon them. With that principle I am in accord. I arrive at that conclusion by the process of elimination. It seems to me to be the best of the three proposals. It has, of course, many difficulties. The very term "compulsory cooperation," which so many persons apply to that proposal, involves in one sense a contradiction in terms. But in many walks of our business and industrial life there is cooperation together with competition, and while the experiment is a very difficult one to perform successfully, still I would be prepared to support the main principles underlying part III of Bill A of the Senate which is now before the house for consideration.

Let me come now to the bill itself. To begin with, I do not agree with the Prime Minister when he would have the house adopt the view that because great care was taken in bringing together experts in the Duff commission and because those men have met with great success in their various walks of life, the house should adopt their proposals without modifications. Nor am I greatly impressed either by the very able committee of the other house of this parliament. In this House of Commons we must exercise as honestly and as fearlessly as we can our own intelligence. We are very likely to be impressed by the opinions of successful men, but often men who have made a great success of their own business do not know what is best for a government or a parliament or a legislature to do. One can look around and see instance after instance where these successful men have made most horrible mistakes in the legislative sphere because the principles which have made them successful in their own business are not the principles which should be applied to the legislation of a country. So I decline, and I think every hon. member should decline, to permit his intelligence to be dragooned into subservience to the opinion of a royal commission or of a Senate committee. We must get down to the subject ourselves, apply ourselves to it to the very best of our ability and in the right spirit, a non-partisan spirit, and attempt to work out the best solution we possibly can.

With regard to this bill, the leader of the government in the Senate appeared to think that part III was the vital and most important part. With that view I do not agree. I think that the most important part of the bill is part I, and I think that to part I there are very serious and very grave objections to which I shall refer before I conclude my remarks. But first I desire to make a few observations with regard to part III which provides for compulsory cooperation so called.

Some members of the house think that instead of a system of arbitral tribunals the Board of Railway Commissioners should deal with the disputes that arise between the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific systems. I have no very strong views one way or the other on that, but I can see that there are certain advantages in having arbitral tribunals rather than the Board of Railway Commissioners. To begin with, disputes are to be arbitrated. From the very nature of the case these are arbitrations, and the application of fixed or fundamental principles, the application of statutes, will not take place in these disputes. These might very well be left to a court. But I believe that a system of arbitration is preferable to a system of decision of disputes by the Board of Railway Commissioners, although I have not any very strong convictions one way or the other upon that.

It is possible also that giving large powers to the chairman of the tribunal has some advantages. It at least ensures some continuity of principle underlying the decisions of successive tribunals, and it may be that that is advantageous. One may think of many disadvantages as well as advantages, but as I have said before, I think that the important part of this bill is part I. If part I operates well, there may be no arbitral tribunals at all. On the other hand, if it operates badly, then the railway problem will be settled badly; it will not be solved at all. So it is rather on part I that I lay the chief stress.

Coming now to part I of the bill, what does it provide for? The Prime Minister went into it fully this afternoon and made certain statements with which I shall deal when I come to the latter part of part I.

First of all I wish to say something about the method of appointment of the trustees. I listened with care to the Prime Minister this afternoon, and he said nothing at all about the method of appointment of these trustees. But the bill provides that they are to be appointed by the governor in council, and I could not help wondering, when the Prime Minister was inveighing against political interference and political control, why he did not apply those principles to the appointment of the first trustees themselves. The trustees are to be perpetuated by a system of panels, but the first trustees are to be appointed by the government, and the trustees are to be more or less self-perpetuating because when one of them retires the two who remain are placed on the board choosing the panel which selects the other trustee. Consequently, if this bill goes through as it is, it puts it in the power of this government to say who shall be the trustees not only for seven years but for a great many years to come, probably for generations to come. With that I disagree. I think that if political interference and political influence in successive appointments is bad and should be eliminated, it certainly is bad for the first appointments, and I agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) in the argument he made in that regard.

I just want to make this statement, which may be interpreted as political. I have not as much confidence in this government in the matter of appointments as I had a year ago, and I will tell you why I say that, Mr. Speaker. In the report of the radio committee there was this paragraph:

> We desire to call attention to the extreme importance that the commission should not assume, or even be suspected of assuming, a political complexion.

And yet a Conservative organizer was appointed as one of the members of the radio commission. Therefore we on this side of the house are within our rights and have reasonable grounds when we say we fear political influence in the appointment of these first trustees, and I think some amendment to the act must be made—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And in connection with the tariff board too.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, in connection with the tariff board as well. Some amendment must be made to the act which will ensure that the first appointments as well as the successive appointments of these trustees will be taken entirely out of politics.

As to the qualifications of the trustees, I do not think I could improve upon those stated by the hon. member for North Waterloo. They should be men of ability; they should be men of integrity; they should be men who believe in public ownership; they should be men with a high sense of public service. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) thinks that they should not be men who believe in public ownership. He suggests that men who do not believe in public ownership should be put in charge of a government utility. The likely result would be that in time you would have nothing more or less than disaster.

As to the number of trustees, the Prime Minister says that they should be three, and I am not disposed to disagree with him. But in saying I agree they should be three, I mean three operating by a majority. The Prime Minister made a comparison this afternoon with courts of appeal, but I do not think anyone in this house ever heard of a court of appeal in which a majority judgment had to be concurred in by the chief justice. Did anyone ever hear of a court of appeal of that sort? No reason was given by the Prime Minister for the extraordinary provision in the bill that the decisions of these trustees must be concurred in by the chairman.

I believe also that the three trustees should be full time men. I see no reason why the chairman should be a full time man and the others work intermittently only. In passing, I may say that I do not agree with the geographical selection of these trustees. In respect possibly I am at variance with the opinion of a large number of persons in the maritime provinces from which I come, but I feel that those sections of the country which have claims to consideration based upon statutes and upon understandings in the past ought not to have to rely for fair treatment upon their voting power on this board of trustees. I think the maritime provinces would be ill advised to rely upon the vote of their member on that board of trustees for a preservation of their interests. They must rely upon the fairness of the men who constitute the board, upon the justice of their cause and upon the ability with which the cause is presented. They cannot do more than that.

While I am speaking about the maritime provinces, and since the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) mentioned the subject during the debate, let me say that as far as the maritime provinces as a unit are concerned, their rights in respects to the Canadian National Railways centre around two points, and I think two only, the first of which is the preservation of the status of the Intercolonial railway. That is provided for in the British North America Act, and cannot be reasserted too often, particularly in view of the fact that our population is dwindling, in proportion to that of the rest of Canada. The second point is the recognition of Canadian ports, which is implicit in the confederation agreement, has been recognized by statute since that time, and constitutes a moral obligation upon the whole nation. I notice the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray), my deskmate, smiles when I make that statement. With all due respect for him, I cannot agree with the argument he advanced two or three nights ago in his very brilliant speech, although there is something to be said for his contention that the insertion of the section at the particular place in which it appears in the bill is hardly in keeping.

Let me come to what I consider to be and submit is the greatest weakness in the bill before the house. I refer to the provisions with respect to control or lack of control by the government and parliament of Canada over the trustees. I am sure hon. members on both sides of the house who have read the provisions carefully, and have given them careful thought, will agree that we are going far beyond the point we should go in placing trustees in control for so long a period. To a great extent they are a self perpetuating body, and are placed entirely beyond our control. Beginning his speech to-day the Prime Minister made the statement that in view of the fact that the Canadian National Railways owes the investors or the public about $1,300,000,000, and that the system itself—and I doubt it—is not worth more than that, the Canadian National system, in his view, is no longer the people's railway and in substance belongs to the investors. It must have been apparent to every hon. member that there were two weaknesses in that argument. The first is that most of the bonds of the Canadian National system are guaranteed by the government of Canada, and that the loans on the security of those bonds were made, not on the assets, not on the security of the properties themselves, but on the credit of the people of Canada. The government of the dominion is responsible for the payment of nearly all of those bonds, and consequently if these trustees are to be regarded as receivers—and I do not admit that they are, but if they are appointed and put into possession of those properties as receivers—they are to act on behalf of and for the benefit of the people of Canada who on that very argument are, in substance and in effect, the owners as guarantors.

But later the Prime Minister made reference to the equity of redemption. I do not believe anyone can say, with assurance, that there is no value in that equity of redemption. So that the people of this country either as guarantors or as owners of the equity of redemption are the owners of this property, and those trustees or receivers whom it is proposed to put into possession of the property will receive the moneys that are receivable from the properties, and will manage them on behalf of the Dominion of Canada. And it follows that the people of Canada, whom we represent, must exercise, through us, some control over these men whom we put in charge. The Prime Minister went on, and having intimated that we had no right to control them, because they were acting for the investors and not for the public, said that it would never do to control them, because that would open up the danger of political interference. He made a vigorous argument to the effect that if the government could control the receivers or trustees, members would come forward saying they should have three trains a week instead of one, that there should be branch lines here, there and everywhere, and that such a condition would not for one moment be satisfactory.

Then, his third argument on the matter of control was that the government and parliament of Canada has absolute control over these receivers. Why? First, because parliament would have to vote the deficits and might refuse to vote them, and secondly that parliament might dismiss the trustees, despite the fact they had been appointed for seven years. In amplification of that argument he said that if the trustees did not behave, if they did not do what this parliament wanted them to do, there was nothing to prevent parliament passing an act for their dismissal. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that a set of inconsistencies such as I have outlined makes a very inconclusive argument in support of the provisions contained in part I of this bill.

It seems to me it would be fatal if trustees are appointed with the fear in their minds that if they do not behave or do not meet the wishes of the government of the day, an act of parliament is likely to be passed to relieve them of their positions after three or four years of service. If under the bill they are appointed for seven years we cannot, without a violation of all of the most generally accepted principles, do anything but leave them in their positions for the period for which they are appointed. Then, concerning the voting of deficits: Can you imagine this house declining to vote deficits, throwing the whole system into chaos, and tying up all the trains of the Canadian National railways in the Dominion of Canada? We would not do that for one moment. There is no effective control. The sanctions suggested by the Prime Minister are not effective sanctions; there is no effective control over the trustees.

His second statement—not the first or third, but the second—is the true one, namely that there is absolutely no control by this House of Commons, or the government of this country, over the trustees, once they are appointed. I realize we are confronted with a very difficult problem. It is hard to select a course which will be free from dangers and not beset with difficulties. If we can, to begin with we should get rid of political influence in appointments; in the second place we should get rid of political interference. But we must not surrender all control over the trustees. Do hon. members realize that under this bill the trustees could, if they wished, bring about the piecemeal amalgamation of the railways? Under this bill there is nothing to prevent the trustees from leasing the Intercolonial railway to the Canadian Pacific, and then coming in at the end of the year stating that they had done so. They have to present no budget to this House of Commons or to any committee of this or any other house. They can go on, completely free, and the government must sit back with its hands folded, or rather, tied, and let them do as they wish. The only control the government would have would be the refusal to vote deficits at the end of the year—which they never, never would dare to do.

The more we think of the implications of this bill, the more we see that some measure of control greater than that provided in the bill must be exercised over the trustees. There must be an amendment, and a radical amendment. Suppose trustees were appointed who made up their minds that a course of lavish expenditures was necessary to put these properties on their feet. In the past we have had gentlemen connected with the Canadian National Railways who have held such views, and we might have them again in the future, men who believe that in order to get large returns, you must spend much money. What control would we have if they embarked on a course of great extravagance? Suppose we had penny wise and pound foolish trustees who were so niggardly that the road became worse and worse and the service went down and down? The house would be powerless; the thing would go on and we would not have a word to say. These principles have been thought of in the past, and when parliaments were administering the property of the people they never surrendered all their powers as is being done under this bill. The reason given by the Prime Minister is that the commission has made this recommendation, but this is something about which the commission did not know as much as a good many members of parliament.

It is necessary to keep some control. What was the great weakness in the Canadian National Railways during the last few years? Was it the exercise of political control, or was it a slacking off in the control exercised? A bureaucracy was established; that was the great difficulty with the Canadian National Railways, and that difficulty is not guarded against by this bill. I urge that that is a weakness in the bill which should be remedied before it is enacted into law. Parliament and the country will be caused great grief in the future if we do not insert in this bill some provision to give parliament greater control over the trustees.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in discussing this extremely important measure in which is embodied many months of labour and arduous research upon the part of a royal commission and many weeks of careful consideration upon the part of the Senate and its committee, I must keep in mind, and we should all keep in mind, that under the rules of this house there are two distinct aspects under which it can be considered. While these two aspects are inseparable and interrelated, while they form two parts of the one whole, each must be discussed at its own time and upon the appropriate occasion. I intend to confine my remarks wholly to the underlying principles of this measure, leaving the discussion and consideration of the methods by which these principles shall be carried out until we are in committee of the whole.

As I see it, and I believe this is the feeling commonly held throughout the house, there are three main principles embodied in this measure. First, there is the principle, implied rather than expressed but discussed and agreed to on every side of the house, of maintaining the integrity of the two systems as separate entities. It may rightly be said, as it has been said, that this is a somewhat academic subject at the moment, that the time may come when it will become a matter of real consideration, so on that aspect I shall say only this: If and when the time does come that in the opinion of the people of this country and the parliament of Canada we should, for the well being of Canada, have one great railroad monopoly, I do not believe the people will tolerate anything other than a state monopoly. It is quite obvious, and it has been stated again and again, that there is a great difference in principle and in effect between a monopoly in the hands of the people and controlled by the state and a monopoly in the hands of a private body of citizens no matter how eminent or how desirous of doing right that body may be. Transportation is not only a business in itself, it makes possible all other business and all other enterprise. To create a private monopoly in transportation would be to create something in the nature of a giant octopus which would have the power, even though it might lack the will or intent, to strangle any industry or any community in any part of Canada. On the other hand, if a state monopoly became inevitable, it would be held by a body which represented every industry and every part of Canada and to which all of Canada could look with confidence for fair dealing and fair play. At this time I merely indicate as my own unalterable conviction, and what I believe to be the unalterable conviction of every man and woman in this country who has thought about the subject, that if the time does come that there should be an amalgamation of the two great transportation systems, that amalgamation must be a publicly owned monopoly operated by the state.

I come now to the next main principle, efficient management. Here again I find myself in accord with the measure now before us. This is a question of the transfer of management and operating responsibility from a large directorate exercising very small powers and having very vague and dubious authority, coupled with a president who exercises practically entire authority, financial as well as operative, to a small body of trustees, which would not only exercise the authority now vested in the directorate but have the financial control now exercised by the president. I did not intend at the moment to discuss the number of trustees that should be appointed. In spite of what was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in what I looked upon as a very able address, in spite of the pronouncement of the royal commission which examined into the facts, and in spite of the view of the Senate which examined into the evidence and drew their own conclusions, I am not at all certain that a somewhat larger body of trustees, possibly representative in character, would not be better and would not be more effective.

What is the underlying motive of this measure? What was it that made necessary the appointment of the commission, and what interests should we have in mind in dealing with the situation? The deduction I drew from the statement and the attitude of the Prime Minister was that the one consideration which overshadowed all others was the financial aspect. The Prime Minister pointed out something which has long been in the minds of many Canadians, namely, the gravity of the financial situation in which the Canadian National Railways now finds itself and the serious condition which as a result faces the Canadian people. They find themselves in the position of debtors, either by way of direct obligations or by way of guaranteed bonds, to the extent of something like $2,300,000,000, a tremendous sum, almost inconceivable in the magnitude of the burden it places upon the people of this country; for after all when we speak of this liability it matters little whether we have reference to guaranteed bonds held in various countries and in different parts of this country by various private bondholders, or to the thousand million dollars or so which has been advanced directly by the people of this country, the major part of which was borrowed money upon which we are still paying interest. So I agree with the Prime Minister that this must be a very great factor in our consideration of the problem. We must consider the extent to which this burden may be carried and the means by which, if possible, it may be lightened. This is something which affects every taxpayer in this country; it will affect every taxpayer for generations to come. So it becomes the personal problem of every man and woman; it becomes the mass problem of the public generally.

But, Mr. Speaker, we would be not only derelict in our duty but would fail absolutely in an appreciation of the problem itself were we to stop there and look upon that as the only interest we had to conserve and the only aspect from which we must survey this situation. Those same people are just as vitally interested in this matter from the viewpoint of users of railway service. As users of railway service, as customers of the railway if you wish to so phrase it, practically everyone in every part of Canada, every industry, every vocation and every community, is more or less dependent, but still vitally dependent, upon transportation service for its livelihood and its prosperity. It is vital to them, in respect of freight and passenger rates, that these shall be reasonable and shall bear a fair relation to the value of the goods or commodities transported, or, in respect of service, that it shall be adequate and shall provide that which is necessary for the carrying on of their business, whether in buying or in selling. Strange though it may be these two interests, conflicting at times, are still the interests of the same people and must be considered by this house when dealing with the matter. It would be just as fatal were we to sacrifice the interests of the people in respect of freight and passenger rates and transportation service upon the altar of finance as it would be were we to forget the financial side. the tremendous burden of liabilities and the plight of the taxpayer, and consider only the needs of this country by way of transportation service. So both must be kept in mind and both are of vital concern in our consideration of this problem.

Then, too, for we are all interested in this question from various angles, we cannot forget the labour problem which is involved and which has been placed before this house so ably by different hon. members, particularly those who directly represent labour. We cannot forget the men who are and have been engaged in this great undertaking on both railways. We cannot forget the service they have rendered; we cannot forget their future, their families, their lives and their prosperity. Indeed, that also has its influence upon the public mind, upon the public as a whole and upon the taxpayer, because this problem of labour must be considered not only from the point of view of those men whose positions may be threatened; it must be considered from the point of view of the taxpayer, in respect of the tremendous problem of unemployment and unemployment relief which faces us to-day and which is becoming of greater and greater magnitude.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that in examining this problem we must consider the various aspects from which it must be approached. We must not forget one of those different and sometimes conflicting interests which we must always have in mind, the interests of the men and women throughout Canada whom as a parliament we represent, and whom as individuals we represent by virtue of our individual ridings. Of that, however, I may have a word to say later. At any rate there is the second of the principles involved, the efficiency of management, and let me repeat that I believe in the principle of a relatively small body of trustees, devoting their whole time to the task and given as their responsibility the job not only of outlining the general policies and supervising the operations of the Canadian National Railways but of assuming responsibility for the financial policies of the system, the lack of which has been partly responsible for our present plight.

As to the question of the number of members of the board of trustees and the mode of appointment I shall have more to say. However, I consider this to be a matter of detail which can be well left to the time when the house is in committee, when it can be discussed with greater knowledge and greater result. In passing I will merely suggest not only that possibly a somewhat larger body of trustees might be more efficient and more representative, having in mind the various aspects to which I have already alluded, other than those financial, but that some consideration might be given the mode of appointment and particularly of reappointment, which has been said by the hon. member who immediately preceded me (Mr. Ilsley) to make the board of trustees at least partly a self-perpetuating body. I think when we reach committee of the whole some thought might be given that aspect of the question, and perhaps some definite changes might be made.

We come now to the third principle, and there again, speaking as a matter of principle only, I think there is hardly a member of the house who is not in full accord with the principle of reasonable cooperation between those two great systems. Again I am speaking of the principle of cooperation, not necessarily of the details of the machinery by means of which we seek to bring it about. This has been spoken of as a system of compulsory cooperation, and perhaps to some slight degree it might be so termed, though I should hardly call it such myself. It begins, of course, with the opportunity for and the suggestion of voluntary cooperation, the same principle which has been carried into effect during recent months, and the suggestion is that it be carried as much further as circumstances may reasonably permit. Then what? This legislation does not seek to give to any committee or to any appointed body the power to suggest and initiate cooperative policies. It really proposes to appoint a committee of arbitration, who shall deal with proposals which will be brought forward by one or other of the lines, or by both acting together, upon the details of which they fail to agree. If it were compulsory in the true sense of the word the legislation would give to that committee the power of initiating and suggesting methods of cooperation. This is rather a measure of compulsory arbitration on matters brought to the notice of the appointed board of arbitration by the railway systems themselves. I think the principle there embodied is perfectly sound. However, we must remember to differentiate very clearly and definitely between the principle and the method by which that principle is brought into effect. After all, as is the case in so many matters both public and private, the essential and vital thing is the spirit and the ability of the men who exercise those powers and who seek to put the act itself into full operation. The success of this movement, the success of any effort towards cooperation through the medium of this board of arbitration, will depend wholly not only on the mentality of the men who compose that board, but upon the spirit with which they approach their task, in which spirit may be reflected fairly closely the underlying motive and the real purpose which lies behind this measure and the entire investigation.

It will I think be recognized quite frankly and readily that all cooperation through which economies are effected must mean the reduction or the elimination of certain services. Where for example two lines are found where only one is required, and where in consequence operating costs rise far beyond the point they otherwise would reach, it is obvious that the only economy that could be brought about through cooperation would be by the abandonment or closing-down of one of these two lines. This is a case in which the arbitration board will come into play. Now we will take it that one of these lines must of necessity be a privately-owned line belonging to the Canadian Pacific and the other must be a Canadian National line belonging to or controlled by the people, and it is of the utmost importance, it is vital to the purpose of this measure, vital to the realization of our hopes and expectations, that these men shall approach their task certainly with an impartial mind, for the opportunities would be vast and numerous to throw the weight of influence and the benefit of the cooperation one way or another. We have therefore to ask this question and frankly face it: Is this economy to be for the benefit and in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer, or is it to be in the interests of vested capital? There is a matter that cannot be ignored, a matter that can be fully understood only when this measure is in operation. I am hoping that when it is in full operation at least fair play will be given both. But if there is to be a question one way or the other, if we have to balance and weigh one against the other, if we must help one to the detriment of the other, then I hope that it will be the Canadian people as a whole, the taxpayers of the country, who will receive the benefit of any doubt that may exist.

I speak of the invested capital as found in the privately-owned system, not as found in the publicly-owned system, because the bondholders of the publicly-owned system—and I still use that word owned for reasons to which I shall allude—the bondholders of the Canadian National Railways, I say, are in a preferred position in this time of depression. Theirs is not the responsibility; theirs is not the risk. In their case the interests of vested capital and the interests of the taxpayer become one and the same thing, because the taxpayer must stand behind the system, guaranteeing the returns of the vested capital itself. On the other hand however we have vested capital owned by bondholders and stockholders, and while I believe in treating them fairly may I reiterate that in the spirit of the measure, in the spirit of its enforcement, in the spirit of the arbitration which may come to pass from time to time I hope that the larger object will be kept in view and that the interests of the people as a whole will be the predominating and prevailing influence.

One or two matters have come up to which I would refer for a moment. There is for example the statement of the Prime Minister, at least the inference he drew, that the real owners of the Canadian National system, notwithstanding the opinion often expressed in different parts of this house, are not the Canadian people but the bondholders who have invested their money in those lines now forming the Canadian National railways, and the payment of whose interest on capital was guaranteed by the people of the country. I must confess that I find myself somewhat under a handicap in differing from the Prime Minister. Not only is he a man of great ability and wide experience but he is a lawyer of high repute, while I am a layman lacking his experience and, I am free to confess, his ability. But at the same time I cannot understand the position as he takes it. In the first place, and following his own argument, what do we find? We find that the bondholders have certain rights, certain vested interests in these lines. They do not own them; they are not shareholders; they have loaned money to them and have taken a mortgage, and until such time as they foreclose and throw the lines into the hands of a receivership, surely the people of this country who are now the shareholders must own the property. And until the people of this country default in their payment of interest, until they fail in their obligations, until they give notice that no longer will they be responsible, until then surely there can be no question as to who, actually speaking, are the owners of the property. When that time comes it will be a question indeed as to who may own the railways thereafter, after the receivership may have been called for; for, again, I cannot agree that the appointment of this board of trustees is in effect the appointment of a receivership to take over a ruined and bankrupt undertaking and if possible to set it on its feet, administering it in the meantime in the interests of those financially concerned. I cannot look on it in that light, because after all it is an undertaking vital to the wellbeing of Canada; it is an undertaking vital to the people not only from the point of view of finance but also from the point of view of service; it is an undertaking which under no circumstances will the people of Canada allow to stop or fail. We know that.

Now we are going to put these men in control for one purpose and one purpose only, namely, to serve the interests of the true owners of the railways, and that is the Canadian people from Halifax to Vancouver. That brings me to the point raised by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and to which exception has been taken by some others, and that is, the attributes, the point of view, the mentality which we should look for in our trustees. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), I think it was, rather objected to the idea that we should expect these trustees to be believers in the principle of public ownership, and he suggested that this was no part of their qualifications into which we should inquire. Were he speaking of the railway commission, whose functions are judicial, whose duty it is to act impartially as between public ownership on the one hand and private ownership on the other, I should be inclined to agree with him. Were he speaking of the arbitration committee which will be set up and whose duties, again, are impartial and cooperative, I might say yes. But when he is speaking of a body of trustees whose duty and responsibility it is to manage for the people of Canada a property entrusted to their care, then I take issue with him. For who are their employers? The people, all the people, and their interests must be served. But how can their interests be well served by men who do not even believe in the principle under which they are employed? How can the interests of a railway still in competition with a private road be properly served by a body of trustees who disbelieve in the principle under which the lines they control are managed and run, and who in their hearts incline towards the principles of the competitive line? To my mind it is essential that the men we employ to take over this high and arduous task should be men in whose loyalty we can have absolute confidence—in their loyalty not only to the financial interests bound up in the Canadian National, to their immediate employer, the government or parliament, or their ultimate employers, the people, but to a principle which alone gave them their opportunity of service.

Another important point has been raised, upon which there is some difference of opinion, and which becomes of even greater importance as we go further into the question. This is the matter of political interference. It has become habitual in the house and, indeed, throughout the country, to look with shuddering horror upon the slightest approach to political influence or interference in matters of business. The conviction is apparently held not only in the country, but in the house, that the moment a politician lays his blighting hand upon any enterprise, it is damned and doomed to failure. If that be true, it is a tremendous indictment not only of the individual members of the house, but of the very system which sends them here. If it be true, it means that the fact that members are elected to this house of parliament, the fact that they belong to institutions such as this, so unfits them for any other task that any business matter they approach will be managed inefficiently and is bound to fail. Leaving that aside, I believe there is an important distinction between what might be called partisan influence and interference and political influence properly so termed. I believe as firmly as does any man that in any business matter with which we have to deal we should utterly divorce ourselves from any considerations of partisan complex. Party politics, feelings and influence, as distinct from political influence, are wholly bad when applied to public business. But that surely does not mean that this government and parliament shall totally abandon and abrogate all their influence, all their responsibility, in connection with a tremendous undertaking of this nature, one belonging to and to be managed and conserved in the interests of the Canadian people, the people whom this parliament represents, parliament to which the people look for the protection of their interests. Surely there is a wide distinction between partisanship, partisan interference, and a recognition of the vital and inescapable responsibility which must rest upon the administration and upon parliament in respect of any publicly owned and operated utility. As a matter of fact, while the Prime Minister emphasized the necessity of placing this board of trustees beyond the reach of political exigencies, of parliamentary influence, in almost the same breath he admitted and laid emphasis on the fact that in any circumstances, under the very terms of our constitution, the very terms on which any board of trustees must be appointed and money must be granted, the essential and fundamental responsibility of parliament must and shall be maintained. I am in agreement with the hon. member for Hants-Kings who preceded me. I believe we should make it very clear in legislation that ultimately the responsibility, the influence, the enacting of policies in the large, not the ordinary policies of management, but generally speaking the oversight of the policies of this country in respect of transportation matters, should be held, and if necessary, exercised by parliament. For, after all, we speak of the efficiency of certain men in carrying on a business of this character, and, as I suggested before, were that efficiency directed only towards one objective, were only one interest involved; were only one point of view affected; were only one objective sought, that of making the business financially sound, I would say that perhaps three, four or five efficient, honest, experienced business men might do better than has parliament at times. But that is not the only point. Transportation is so vital to every part of Canada, to every industry, that parliament cannot evade some responsibility as regards its general policies. For transportation may make or may damn a community; it may build an industry or destroy it; it may open up new territory or cause bankruptcy in and depopulate areas already settled. It may do almost anything. Next to finance, transportation is the lifeblood that makes industry, commerce, the life of the country, possible, and to my mind almost more than any other question it is one not only in which everyone is interested and vitally concerned, but in which parliament in the ultimate analysis must have the strongest and the final voice. For parliament cannot sit by and see any industry ruined, any part of the country depopulated by a body of business men, even though, in that depopulation and in that destruction, deficits are reduced and dividends paid.

But in my opinion there is one aspect that cannot and should not be forgotten. We speak of the solution of this great railway problem; we appoint commissions and we study and consider the question. We seek through legislation to remedy existing ills and to set the system on its feet and make it financially sound. To my mind the transportation problem is caused by and inseparable from economic conditions as a whole throughout Canada, and it is no more possible to solve the transportation problem without dealing with it as part of a general policy of rehabilitation, and first removing the causes which have brought transportation into the position it now occupies, than it is to solve the problem of unemployment merely by tackling it as a problem by itself. Upon what is the problem based? There are two factors. Undoubtedly there was unwise expenditure, unnecessary competition, foolish duplication. All of those are assuredly factors. But what is the great and underlying factor? Why is it that four short years ago this house and the country acclaimed every new loan and the president of this great company, the Canadian National Railways, was looked upon as the greatest man in Canada no matter what he spent; that he was encouraged, urged to spend more money because then times were prosperous and we looked to repay and more than repay all that had been expended? Now he has dropped into the shades of oblivion; the system is frowned upon, damned and indicted. Why? Because the freight which supports and makes profitable any system, upon which any system must depend, is lacking; because tonnage is cut in half or no longer found. You can no more solve the railway problem until you have adopted policies which will bring tonnage back; you can no more make the financial structure of the Canadian National sound and profitable until the condition of the people is improved, than you can remove unemployment without rehabilitating industry. The thing is impossible. To my mind one danger is that we ourselves shall look with too great optimism towards what might be done by any form of management, however high its degree of efficiency and its practice of stringent economy—that we shall look to see miracles performed. In the second place, the danger is that we shall go to the people of this country and say: "Lo, the railway problem is solved, the legislation is passed, the foundation is laid for prosperity and future progress for our transportation system," when we know in our hearts, and should never let the people forget, that whittle where you like, manage the system as efficiently as archangels could, it will not prosper until the people of Canada are prosperous. The system is just part of one great whole; and that is the culminating thought which I should like to leave upon the mind of the house. It is a part, an important part, but only a part in this general problem of economic depression which now faces us, and the danger is, and it is a danger against which we must guard, that in this surge of enthusiasm, this determination regardless of all consequences and of every condition to make the system finnancially sound, we may do far more harm than good, we may so cut and mangle and destroy essential services that rehabilitation may be delayed or rendered impossible. I think that is one thing, Mr. Speaker, to which we must pay the greatest heed; for the saving of a few million dollars a year at the expense of deepening the depression in industry and agriculture would be a saving dearly bought, one which in the years to come might cost us fifty times the saving thereby accomplished. Reasonable economy, yes; reasonable cooperation, yes; but in our financial zeal do not let us forget that the primary function of a transportation system is to serve the communities of this country and to make possible the interchange of commodities between one industry and another. If in dealing with the relatively superficial and inconsequential we destroy the fundamental, then indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have wrought ill for this country.

May I say, in conclusion, that, endeavouring as I have to deal only with principles, I have indicated that I approve of maintaining the present integrity of the national system, that I approve of a more efficient form of management, and I believe that the trustee form will be more efficient. I approve of cooperation and arbitration, and so I shall vote for the second reading of the bill, reserving to myself without prejudice the right to discuss and oppose or support the details of the legislation when the bill is in committee, and to consider it in its final form when it comes up for third reading.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on this important question I assure you that I do not do so merely for the purpose of prolonging the debate. I would much rather see the debates cut short and that we get along with the business of the house and wind up the session and get home, but the importance of this question I believe demands the very best attention of which every member of this house is capable. In the few remarks I intend to make I may follow a somewhat different line from that which has been pursued by almost all the members who have preceded me, except perhaps the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) who has just taken his seat. I always enjoy listening to him; for even although he is not a lawyer he usually has something of a practical nature to put before the house. In the few remarks I intend to make I shall discuss the railway situation somewhat along the same lines as those followed by the hon. member for Red Deer, dealing with it more from the standpoint of transportation as a service to the country than anything else.

The bill now before the house is based upon the report of the Duff commission. Enough already has been said about the constitution of that commission, the work it did, and the report it presented; I shall therefore not occupy the time of the house by reiterating what has been said in that respect. I have given the report a great deal of study and thought, and after stripping it bare and divesting it of all the frills, I find that three outstanding facts remain and refuse to be set aside.

The first fact is that we must always have railways in Canada. Geography itself says so. Our wide open spaces, the long distances, and the heavy commodities of farm and mine and forest, which can be moved only by rail transportation, make it necessary that we always have railways in this country.

The second fact is that motor transportation has come to stay, and it must be dealt with as such.

Third, and I am free to admit the most important fact of all, is that the taxpayers of Canada cannot long continue to pay every Saturday night a deficit of a million dollars on the Canadian National Railways.

The bill that is before the house is an attempt, I take it, to coordinate and amalgamate and bring together into one scheme the three facts which I have just mentioned. Just before I left Prince Edward Island to attend the present session of parliament I was asked to address a meeting of the railway employees of the city of Charlottetown. They were gathered together in their hall, and I received very short notice. I had no knowledge of the object of the meeting, nor did I know upon what subject I was expected to address them, but as the meeting opened this piece of paper was put in my hand, from which, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall quote a brief paragraph which sets forth what I conceive to be a worthy object on the part of the railway employees:

> It is the object of this Traffic Club to unite all the employees and retired members on the island division of the Canadian National Railways, that they may work together and be of valuable assistance to the railway in its struggle to regain and retain its lost traffic from the various kinds of motor vehicles that have by means of very unfair competition made such inroads on its revenue. Transportation being the only goods we have to offer, it is our desire that we give same at a reasonable rate together with best possible service an up-to-date transportation company composed of a loyal bunch of workers can give.

[Mr. Myers.]

In other words, transportation is what we have to sell; let us go out and sell it. That was the object of the meeting of railway workers in the city of Charlottetown the day before I left home. I want to say for them, and I presume I am speaking for all railway workers throughout Canada, that they are absolutely loyal to the railways; their heart and soul is in their work, and, as is characteristic of railway men wherever you meet them, they hate the motor truck. It was their object to endeavour to secure for the railways that business which had been lost. In rising to address that meeting I prefaced my remarks by stating I had certain things to say to them with which I did not expect them to agree. I knew I was addressing railroaders, and it is my habit on every occasion to speak just exactly what is in my own mind, and not what is in the mind of somebody else.

In this connection I should like to quote one or two passages which I believe will bear out what I have said and will have to say with respect to the transportation system in Canada. At the end of paragraph 157 of the Duff report I find the following:

> Since any measures looking to a revival of trade are beyond the scope of the commission's inquiry, we pass from this topic with the observation that an increase in traffic of even twenty per cent above the figures for 1931, which would still be below the gross earnings for 1925 would result in substantial improvement in the railway position in Canada.

Hon. members will note that there is reference to a twenty per cent increase in freight handling. Then, in paragraphs 188 and 189 we find the following:

> 188. While we have refrained from making any recommendations we recognize that the question of freight tariffs and tolls is inextricably bound up with the question of transport. The position at the moment, however, is difficult and complex. It has been represented to us by many competent witnesses that any increase in tolls would only impose a further handicap on the Canadian manufacturer and producer at a time when they can least afford to shoulder additional burdens, and that the increased tolls might have the effect of so restricting traffic as to afford little, if any, relief to the railways.
> 189. It would appear that, at the moment, any adjustment of the freight tolls and tariffs would be inadvisable, but we feel it our duty before passing from this question, to express the view that even under more favourable circumstances the financial position of the railways may be such as to demand that the whole question of tariffs and tolls, in its widest sense, should be the subject of special investigation, with a view to determining whether or not the existing tariffs and tolls charged for the conveyance of freight are just and reasonable both to the railways and their customers.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, the statement is made that a twenty per cent increase in the volume of freight traffic would make a great difference to the railways. Have the railway managements up to the present time made any attempt by a modification of their cast-iron rules to secure that twenty per cent increase? I believe the house will pardon me if I relate some circumstances concerning shipping conditions under which we in the province of Prince Edward Island laboured during the last season. By reason of the high duty on potatoes going into the United States, and because the Cuban market was closed to our products, we were forced to look elsewhere for our market. That market we found in central Canada, Ontario and Quebec. When we began to look around for means to move our crop to the Canadian market we found out, due to the fact that potatoes were very cheap, and that the consumer owing to curtailed buying power was not in a position to pay a high price for our commodity, that if we were to live at all it was necessary for us to get those potatoes to the market in the very cheapest possible way. The freight rate by rail on potatoes moving from Prince Edward Island to Montreal is thirty cents per hundred pounds, thirty-three cents to Ottawa and thirty-eight cents to Toronto. But we found last fall that by using steamships we were able to move our potatoes to the market in central Canada for about twenty cents per hundred pounds. For the first time in the history of my section of the country steamers left Prince Edward Island and proceeded up the St. Lawrence river to Montreal and Toronto. I should like hon. members to know that that is neither a popular nor a profitable way of transporting potatoes. Neither would it be at all necessary for the railways to meet the waterborne freight rate. The farmer or the shipper likes very much to have a railway car pull into his siding so that he may pile in his 500 sacks or 650 bushels, which go to make up the carload of potatoes. He likes to pile them in, neatly and snugly, close the doors and send the car through to its destination. At that time of the year those potatoes will leave the car in exactly the condition in which they went in.

That is not the case with potatoes carried by steamship. In the steamship there are from 40,000 to 60,000 sacks, and hon. members will readily understand that in loading, unloading and storing a cargo of that size some damage must result. Many potatoes are bruised, and a great deal of damage takes place. In my opinion by a very slight concession or a slight reduction in the rate for the time being the railways would have had no difficulty in securing a twenty per cent increase in freight handled, and our section of the country would have been put in a much better condition.

I should like to say a word concerning the manner in which shippers and farmers are treated when they load cars. If a shipper is loading a steamer for Cuba, the railway company will allow him the use of cars for ten days. That is, cargoes may be assembled from the different railroad stations throughout the province and brought to the seaport. Under these circumstances no demurrage is charged during a ten day period. But for some reason which I cannot understand, and which I doubt whether any other hon. member can understand, when we seek to ship potatoes either to the United States or to another part of Canada, we are allowed the use of the cars for only five days. The assembling of a large cargo of potatoes consisting of 50,000 or 60,000 sacks requires a great number of cars and takes considerable time. A steamer is not like a railway train; it does not always arrive at its destination at the time expected. Storm or accident of some kind may intervene, and it may be one, two or three days late, but only five days' use of the cars is permitted. Last fall our shippers sent a delegation to the head office of the Atlantic division at Moncton to ask that they be allowed ten days' use of the cars in loading steamers, but they were met with a blank refusal. If the general manager, Mr. Appleton, had been home at the time I think their request would have been successful, because we have always found him very obliging and willing to meet our wishes. However, he was not there, and this delegation met the freight or traffic manager who gave them a blank refusal. The result was that the shippers had to unload their cars into the freight sheds, which entailed a second handling at extra expense and with additional damage to potatoes. Some of the shippers were so vexed about the matter that they moved their potatoes to the seaport by motor truck instead of using the railway.

There is just one other matter about which I should like to speak, and that is the freight classifications. The hon. member for Red Deer said that transportation is the most important factor in the life of a country. There is no denying that, but what is the use of having transportation facilities if they are not available in such a way as to be best suited to those whose business it is to use them? A short time ago I was talking to a gentleman engaged in the building supply business. He sells all kinds of lumber, brick, cement, windows, doors, and so on, and he was telling me of his shipping troubles. An owner or a contractor would come to him with a bill of material for a house he intended to build, and ask that that material be put in a car and consigned to his railway station. Because of the rigid classification this man found that he could not ship brick or cement with lumber, or windows and doors with scantling, that the shipment would have to be broken up into the different classifications. It would take nearly a whole train before the man could get what he wanted. In this connection I should like to quote from section 155, subsection 5 of the Duff report, as follows:

> Inelasticity of freight rates and railway practice generally which prevents prompt action in the meeting of falling revenues and dealing effectively with competition from other forms of transport.

The classifications may have been all right at the time for which they were made, but that time has long since gone by. We are now faced with the competition of the motor truck which knows nothing about classification of freight. It will back up to your warehouse and take brick or cement or lumber or anything you offer, and if our railways are to survive they must meet this competition upon common ground. Transportation is what we have to sell, so let us go out and sell it.

I should like to quote a few figures in support of what I have said. Looking over the carloadings, I find that the total for the year ended December 3, 1932, was 2,041,755. In 1931 the carloadings were 2,406,189 and in 1930, 2,959,597. Miscellaneous freight showed the largest decrease, 157,105 cars or 26 per cent. Merchandise declined by 85,442 cars or 11·9 per cent. These figures go to show that miscellaneous freight and merchandise are most easily affected, or shall I say, most easily offended by the classification rules now in existence on the Canadian railways.

Under the bill now before us it is proposed to set up a new board of trustees. A great deal has been said on this matter by hon. members who have preceded me. The bill calls for three trustees. Some members would like to have five, and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), who always takes a keen interest in railway matters, expressed the opinion yesterday that a board of two with one dead would be the ideal board to manage the railway. My own view in this matter is this: If it were possible, and it probably is not, I should like to see not less than nine members on the board so that every province might be represented. I am democratic and I do not believe in taxation without representation. However, this matter has been carefully considered by the Duff commission and by the upper chamber, and a board of three has been practically agreed upon. A great deal has been said as to who and what kind of man the chairman of this board should be. Some members express the opinion that he will have to be a superman. It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that whatever else he may be he must be a sensible man. The idea that seems to permeate the speeches in this house is that above all other things the chairman of the board must be able to save money. In part I agree with that. He must have the ability to save money; he must have due regard for economy on all occasions, but above that there is one other qualification which to my mind is more essential, and that is his ability to go out and get business. Transportation is the only commodity he will have to sell; let him go out and sell it, not according to any rigid, cast-iron classification rules but in the way that will be easiest and most beneficial to the patrons of the railway.

In passing I should like to say just a word with reference to the present directors, who will soon be retired. They have been in office only a short time, but I believe that during the last two years they have played a very important part in the history of Canada in regard to transportation. I think they have done wonderful work in cutting down the expenses of the railway and trying as far as humanly possible to make revenue and expenditure come close together.

The other evening my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst), speaking on this bill, expressed the fear that his branch line might be almost entirely cut off, and that the fishermen in his constituency would not be able to get their fresh fish to market. The hon. gentleman has my sincere sympathy, and I want to advance the opinion which has been very well expressed by the hon. member for Red Deer, that service is the prime factor. We must have transportation, and if any service of the kind mentioned by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg is unduly curtailed I believe it is the duty of the railway company to see to it that something is substituted. I know something about the fishing business, and I know something about the shipping of fresh fish to market. We have a number of shipping stations in my province, and rapid transportation is the one essential for those who are engaged in the fishing industry. The railway might very well study the question of putting on properly equipped motor trucks to convey the products of the fishermen to the nearest railway centre, if railway service from any point such as this is to be curtailed. The fishermen have it pretty hard. If there is one class in this world for whom I have had great sympathy during the past two years it is our fishermen. I have seen them landing the very best codfish that can be taken on the Atlantic seaboard and selling them for less than one cent a pound, and the same applies to mackerel. It is the duty of the trustees, I submit, whoever and whatever they may be, to look after the business interests of the farmers, the fishermen, the lumbermen and all others engaged in the primary industries of this country.

I should like to say just a word with regard to that old question in the maritime provinces, the Intercolonial railway, which already has been referred to by other hon. members. It is well known to every member of this house that this railway was the one inducement which prompted the maritime provinces to enter confederation. They were told that they would be linked up with the markets of Canada, in lieu of the markets they were losing along the Atlantic seaboard, by a government owned railway. Up to the present time we have been fairly well treated, and I do not believe we will receive any different treatment from the new trustees. However, I should like to throw out this hint to the Minister of Railways, and to the new board of trustees: The one thing for which we will not stand is interference with our railway rights in regard to the Intercolonial system. It is true that this line has been merged with the Canadian National Railways, but it is vital to us, and any attempt to curtail our rights in that regard might be misconstrued and might lead to trouble in the maritime provinces. I have no fear of this happening, however. I believe the new trustees will be sufficiently broadminded to take all these questions into consideration and give fair play to everyone.

I am almost finished, Mr. Speaker, but there is one other point on which I should like to touch. I can hardly believe that in a young, vigorous and growing country such as this the railway problem is absolutely hopeless. I believe that in a short time we will see a return to prosperity and good times. I cannot help but feel that way, and I believe our railways and our railway employees will be all busy again. It is quite true that when the government attempted to weld into one system the various railways now comprising the Canadian National the roads were in a run down, worn out condition. That is not so to-day. There is no doubt that to-day the Canadian National is a fine system. The roadbed is good, the rails are good, the rolling stock is good and the men are right, and I believe there are better days ahead. It may be true that, as the Duff report says, the red thread of extravagance showed up a little in the past few years, but money was plentiful then and to show for it we now have a fine railway system of which we all should be proud.

In this connection I should like to refer to the hotels owned by the Canadian National. I thought from the very outset that the idea of a railway building and owning hotels in Canada was a huge mistake. It has not been done in the United States; the railways in that country do not own hotels, and I know of no country other than Canada where this has been done. However, we have them now and it is up to us to make the best of them.

I should like to touch on just one other point in conclusion. In reading the proceedings of the Senate committee which dealt with this bill I notice a reference, by one gentleman who gave evidence, to our little hotel in the city of Charlottetown. I resent the remarks that were made on that occasion. This gentleman said we had a hotel that was out of all keeping with the province; that it was so grand and so elaborate that the natives of Prince Edward Island were afraid to enter it. Nothing is further from the truth, Mr. Speaker. In Charlottetown we have a nice little one hundred room Canadian National hotel, and from the standpoint of earnings I think it is about fourth in the system, although it has been in operation less than two years. I can assure you that hotel is well patronized by the people of Prince Edward Island and by the tourists who visit the province in the summer time. During the winter a great many citizens of Charlottetown take up residence in the hotel and they invite their friends and entertain them there so that the hotel gets the benefit of that patronage. There is scarcely a club of any note in Charlottetown that does not hold its meetings in the hotel, giving it full patronage, and a great deal of the success that has been achieved by the hotel is due to the efficient manager we have in charge. I resent therefore the slighting remarks that have been made with regard to our little hotel in the city of Charlottetown.

I have spoken at greater length than I intended to. The bill before the house has been very carefuly considered by the Senate; that body has given it a great deal of consideration and it met with the almost unanimous support of the opposition in the red chamber. I consider therefore, taking it all round, that the bill in its present form is quite satisfactory and it is my intention to vote for the second reading, reserving the right, as the bill passes through its various stages, to criticize any part of it which I think calls for criticism and to support those parts of it which in my opinion are worthy of support.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): This bill, the second reading of which we are now considering, has come to us from the other house of this parliament, and strange as it may seem it was sponsored by the leader of the government in that chamber. I listened the day before yesterday to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), when he moved the second reading of the bill, giving a detailed statement with regard to the Canadian National Railways, and I am sure we were all very much interested in what he said. If I might criticize his speech I would say that while he gave details regarding the operations of the Canadian National system and the money which had been saved during the last year or two, he failed to say very much with regard to the clauses and the parts of the bill which we are now considering. I also listened this afternoon to the speech of an hour and a half made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in reply to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). What a difference there was between the optimism of my hon. friend the junior member for Queens (Mr. Myers) and the pessimism of the Prime Minister! I could understand that either the junior member for Queens or myself might be pessimistic with regard to the present condition of that great system known as the Canadian National Railways, but it seems to me that if there is any man in Canada who should stand up in this house or in the country and make an optimistic speech, telling us of his hopes for what may be accomplished in the future so far as that railway system is concerned, that man is the Prime Minister. We listened to the lamentations of Jeremiah for an hour and a half this afternoon. Jeremiah, you remember, was a prophet of old, and in his lamentations he talked about the sins of the people. As the Prime Minister proceeded this afternoon he did not talk about the sins of the people but the inference that was to be drawn from what he said was that he was talking about his own sins and the sins of his government.

What did the Prime Minister say with regard to this great enterprise in which the people of this country have invested large sums of money? He practically said that if it were not for the fact that the government of this country was a shareholder in this great venture the business would be bankrupt. Indeed, he was not content with suggesting that the Canadian National Railways were practically bankrupt but he also went on to say that because of the advances made to the different railways in the past, the railways comprising this great system, the provinces would be almost as bankrupt as he tried to make out this country to be. Surely in spite of the fact that this country has advanced large sums of money to this railway system, we in this dominion with its great resources, and with the great possibilities which there are for business, should not belittle the enterprise and talk pessimistically about the money which it owes to bondholders scattered, as the Prime Minister said, throughout the world.

I have sat in this chamber for a number of years; if I remember rightly this is my seventeenth session.

An hon. MEMBER: Eighteenth.

Mr. DUFF: Thank you, eighteenth. I sat here from 1923 to 1930 and I looked in the faces of my good friends opposite during that time. I looked in their faces when the committee on railways brought in their report, and when the estimates for the Canadian National Railways were laid on the table of the house and discussed; and unless I am getting old and am very forgetful—though I think my memory is as good as it has ever been—I do not recall hon. gentlemen on either side getting up to object to any great extent either to money spent on capital account for the Canadian National Railways or to money voted for current account. In 1929, in 1928, in 1927 or in previous years did we come here and, like the Prime Minister, bewail the fact that the railway was in such a deplorable condition? What is the reason for the present position not only of the Canadian National Railways but also the Canadian Pacific so far as operation is concerned? The Prime Minister should be the last man in this house to say very much about it. It seems to me he should go away back and sit down after all the promises he made in 1930, when he realizes what has happened not only in connection with the railways of Canada but in connection with business generally throughout the country, as a result of the policies of the present government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friends laugh.

Mr. ROWE: What about 1925?

Mr. DUFF: In that year the Canadian National Railways earned almost enough to pay interest on bonds to the public.

Mr. ROWE: I mean the promises of 1925.

Mr. DUFF: All that is wrong with the railways of Canada at the present time, and I am speaking of both systems, is lack of business; they have not as much business as they had in the past. Give us freedom of trade; let the products of this country move back and forth over the lines of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways. Let us sell our surplus products in the markets of the world and we shall have business for the railways of Canada not only from Vancouver to Halifax but also from these points to the central and western provinces.

This afternoon the Prime Minister, in his references to these railways, endeavoured to give us their history and to tell us what had brought about the present amalgamation of the various units which comprise the Canadian National Railways. Again we had the lamentations of Jeremiah, and he bewailed the fact that there were three transcontinental systems. I can understand that the Prime Minister would have been satisfied, not only now but years ago, if there had been only one transcontinental system, but the Canadian people, realizing that this was a great and growing country, decided that there should be more than one transcontinental railway and that there should be competition in railway matters. Therefore, whether we like the situation or not, we surely must not criticize either the provinces or previous governments if they in their wisdom saw fit to guarantee the bonds of the Canadian National Railways or to advance moneys in subsidies for the building of those lines.

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member says that we should not criticize previous governments. I say: Why not?

Mr. DUFF: I am afraid my hon. friend did not catch my point.

Mr. McGIBBON: I did.

Mr. DUFF: What I say is this: The Prime Minister complained bitterly because Sir Wilfrid Laurier had built the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. If I remember my right hon. friend's words correctly, he said that he could not understand how Sir Wilfrid Laurier could have done this. I do not think it lies in the mouth of the Prime Minister to go out of his way in order to bring Sir Wilfrid Laurier's name into this discussion. To do so is absolutely unnecessary and out of place for him, but we must not forget that Sir Wilfrid Laurier held two general elections with regard to the building of the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and Conservatives and Liberals united in backing Sir Wilfrid and giving him a mandate to go ahead and build those lines. Will my hon. friends from the maritime provinces object to the construction of the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, because we had hoped that by the building of those lines a greater flow of traffic would come to maritime province ports? The Prime Minister waxed very indignant when he talked about the three transcontinental systems; he said that he could not project the mind of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in what he had done in regard to the Transcontinental railway. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had vision. Surely there was more reason for Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1904 to promulgate the building of the Transcontinental than there is for the present Prime Minister to talk about the St. Lawrence waterways. When he comes before the house this afternoon with his tongue in his cheek and talks about the terrible financial situation of the railways of this country—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think it is a proper expression for the hon. member to use to say that the Prime Minister comes before the house with his tongue in his cheek. I would ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. DUFF: If you think I am out of order, I shall be delighted to withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sure of it.

Mr. DUFF: Perhaps I can say, with his tongue in his mouth? It is rather strange for the Prime Minister to criticize either the expenditures with regard to the building of the Transcontinental railway or the moneys which were expended by the different governments on the Canadian National railways, because, when those great undertakings were projected, when the money was spent on the Canadian National railways, this country was in a very much different position from what it is to-day. Yet not only did my right hon. friend advocate the building of the St. Lawrence waterways, which means an expenditure of millions and tens of millions of dollars of public money, if this project is proceeded with, but I notice that in the famous Duff commission report those great men—and no doubt they are great men—

Mr. COTNAM: All the Duffs are.

Mr. DUFF: That is the reason I think they are. Those gentlemen, although they were appointed solely to deal with railway questions, that of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, went out of their way to say that they did not think it would affect the railways if the St. Lawrence waterways were proceeded with. I take direct issue with those gentlemen who comprised that commission, because everybody must realize that if the St. Lawrence waterway is built, and if steamers can go from either the old country or from foreign lands up the St. Lawrence river and on to the head of the lakes, surely this will interfere with the revenues of both the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways.

The Prime Minister, in discussing the great cost of the Canadian National Railways, endeavoured to infer, if I may use the word, that the Liberal party was practically to blame because this amount of money was expended on this great undertaking. It is quite true that when we came into power in 1922 we found that under a bill passed by parliament in 1919, and one which many Liberals of that day opposed, those railways had been amalgamated. How was this done? Were those railways taken over as a business man would purchase a property? Where, for instance, does the blame lie for the famous speech made in 1914 by the present Prime Minister on the subject of railways in this country, when he termed the gentleman who sponsored the bill in the Senate as "the gramophone of Mackenzie and Mann"? Were we responsible in 1914 when the Conservative government of the day voted $45,000,000 in cold cash out of the public treasury to a certain Canadian bank for a certain railway? Were we to blame in 1915 and 1916 when $15,000,000 and $10,000,000 were also given to the same company? Where is the blame when the government of my hon. friends opposite in 1917 or 1918, after Sir Henry Drayton had made a report stating that the owners of the railway had no equity, paid out of the public treasury $10,000,000 to those owners?

Mr. McGIBBON: They had to do that to keep the business going.

Mr. DUFF: Were we to blame in 1919 when the arrangement was made with the Grand Trunk Railway, when, as I said a moment ago, instead of the government of the day acting as business men and taking over the Grand Trunk at a sheriff's sale or in some other way so that we could have bought it at the smallest amount possible, they guaranteed the bonds so that hundreds of millions of dollars of the present Canadian National Railways debt is money voted and spent by the Conservative party? Was the Liberal party to blame in 1918 when the Union or Conservative government of that day—because it was really Conservative, just a camouflaged Union government—

Mr. McGIBBON: There were a few Grits in it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They soon turned Tory.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. MALCOLM: They did not remain long.

Mr. DUFF: After the war was over that government made contracts, on the pretext that it was done for war purposes, for the building of 63 ships in various shipyards throughout this country. Only one keel had been laid on Armistice day, November 11, 1918, and yet the government of my hon. friends went on and on and had all of these 63 ships built from 1918 to 1922 at a cost to the taxpayers of this country of $80,000,000, which is included in the figure which the Prime Minister gave this afternoon as owing by the people of this country. Not only is that $80,000,000 included, but as my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) knows as well as I do, that mistake of the Tory party in 1918 has cost the taxpayers of this country at least $200,000,000.

In what condition did we find these railway lines when we came into power in 1922? We had a number of great men in this country, big men in stature. We had Sir Henry Thornton for a number of years, and we had another big man who I noticed came before the Duff commission and gave evidence, a gentleman named D. B. Hanna. In his evidence he ridiculed this whole great system of the Canadian National Railways, and said that the money spent had been wasted. But what did Mr. D. B. Hanna himself do both before he was appointed general manager of the amalgamated lines of the Canadian National Railways and after? Is his record so far as earnings and economies on the Canadian National Railways are concerned as good as that of Sir Henry Thornton?—and God knows that I am not taking Sir Henry Thornton's part. Surely it does not lie in the mouth of Mr. Hanna, who made a mess of the Canadian Northern Railway, and who for nearly three years managed the amalgamated lines in the National system, and had to come to the government of the day in three successive years and ask for money to pay deficits on the road amounting to as high as $90,000,000 in one year, to criticize the management of the Canadian National. May I add that those deficits are also included in the amount which the Prime Minister said this afternoon was due to the public or in the amount of money which the public or the country loaned to the railroad.

In what condition were the national railways when Mr. Hanna resigned? Why, Mr. Speaker, they were not fit to travel on. People's lives were in danger travelling on the national railways when the Liberal government came into power and appointed Sir Henry Thornton president of the road. It was absolutely necessary, in order to safeguard life and property, to spend large sums of money on these railways. If I remember correctly, some $700,000,000 was spent during Sir Henry Thornton's regime in bringing these railways into proper condition, in buying engines, passenger and freight cars, and building up the condition of the road. My hon. friend the junior member for Queens was good enough to admit in his speech that that is the reason why we owe this large amount of money to the bondholders of the Canadian National Railways, and that is why in years past we had to vote money for deficits on this road. But again I repeat, that after the Liberal government came into power Sir Henry Thornton in a few short years built up the national railways, improved the finances of the road, and its business was increasing by leaps and bounds.

We have also heard a good deal about the moneys that have been spent for hotels and steamships and for other purposes under Sir Henry Thornton's management, and of the alleged gross extravagance under the Liberal government in connection with the Canadian National Railways. When we hear all this talk about the expenditure on hotels and steamships for the Canadian National system during the ten years the Liberal government was in power, would you believe me, Mr. Speaker, when I tell you—I am not saying this in criticism because I do not think it is our business here to criticize the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway—that in that period we spent $29,354,941 on hotels and steamboats for the national system and the Canadian Pacific spent for the same purposes $103,498,640?

Mr. McGIBBON: Give us the revenues for the same period.

Mr. DUFF: I am very sorry, but I have not those figures.

Mr. McGIBBON: Perhaps I may be allowed to give them. The Canadian Pacific hotels had a profit of $7,000,000, and the Canadian National hotels had a loss of over $2,000,000.

Mr. DUFF: I am not talking about the profits, and it must not be forgotten that most of the Canadian National railway hotels were built in the years 1929, 1930 and 1931, while the Canadian Pacific hotels had been established for years and had built up a clientele. But I am glad to hear that the Canadian Pacific Railway made $7,000,000 on their hotels. I think, however, my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario will admit that the Canadian Pacific Railway is not making a profit on its hotels to-day any more than the Canadian National.

Mr. STANLEY: Or anybody else.

Mr. DUFF: Or anybody else. There is the crux of the whole matter. Why criticize this great enterprise, the Canadian National Railways, or why criticize the Canadian Pacific Railway, when anybody who knows anything about business knows that businesses of all kinds to-day are making very little, if any, money, and a great many are losing a great deal of money? But coming back to my first point, I say that if conditions in this country to-day were what they were in 1928 and 1929 we should not hear a single word about the Canadian National Railways and we should not be considering this bill to-night.

My hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario, in his very excellent address last night, told us what some of these hotels cost. He must have given the matter a great deal of study because he had it all figured out, and he is no doubt correct, that the rooms in one or some of these hotels cost $14,000 each.

Mr. STANLEY: In Saskatoon.

Mr. DUFF: I admit that that is a very large sum of money, but if it was bad business to build hotels costing $14,000 per room, it is much worse business to rent $14,000 rooms for 89 cents per day per room. I shall not have time to go into that question much further.

In my opinion our main business in this parliament is to bring down legislation with regard to the Canadian National Railways, and if by legislation we can improve conditions on the road nobody will object; but I do object to this bill including the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is enough legislation on our statute books to-day to control that privately owned corporation. The statutes regarding the railway commission give it control over the Canadian Pacific Railway, both as regards freight rates, passenger rates, express rates, and the routing of traffic. Other legislation on the statute books at the present time prevents the Canadian Pacific Railway from building branch lines without first receiving authority from the railway commission or from parliament. I say it is a nice state of affairs when a privately owned railway or any other privately owned business must be controlled by this government and by an arbitral board appointed by the government. I say it is not right. As members of parliament we have no right and no business to interfere with the private affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway or anything else. I say that we should stick to our own business, and our own business is to look after our own investment.

I am opposed to the bill because of part I which deals with the appointment of trustees. There is no need for the legislation which has for its purpose replacing directors with trustees, because to do that all we would have to do would be to amend the present legislation on our statute books. What difference would it make whether they were called directors or trustees? I say that we could very well amend the legislation now on our statute books so as to provide for trustees and to effect economies, if such are necessary.

Part II of the bill concerns economies which should be carried out. I say that this bill will never work and, do you know, I have a sneaking idea that it was never intended to work. You know, we cannot forget our old loves, no matter how long we are married, or how long we are widowers or how many wives we may have had. We always "lean a little towards Mary." As I read the bill I do not have the same fears as has the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and his directors. I do believe, however, that part III concerning arbitral tribunals should not appear in the bill. There is only one way to have cooperation; it must be voluntary. Mr. Speaker, if you and I have a difference to settle we will certainly try to settle it to our own satisfaction before we have an arbitration or go to a court concerning it. However, if we had to go to a court, we would go only once. If this legislation passes, what does it mean? Neither this privately owned railway, the Canadian Pacific, an institution of which everyone in Canada should be proud, nor the Canadian National railways will know just where it is at.

We will suppose a dispute comes up concerning hotels. Let us assume the legislation before us passes, and that the Canadian Pacific railway shareholders get together to-night and solemnly declare that they will vote $5,000,000 to build a hotel in Ottawa. I know that is very unlikely, but I am using it merely as an illustration. The directors put the proposition before the shareholders, and the decision is reached that it would be good business. Is it fair that by legislation, arbitral tribunal or anything else we should say to the Canadian Pacific Railway, a private enterprise, "You should not spend that money"? That is what this legislation means,—that the privately owned railroad is going to be hamstrung. The value of their assets will decrease as soon as this legislation goes on the statute book. Why? Because when a dispute arises the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways each appoints an arbitrator on the arbitral tribunal, the chairman of the railway commission acting as the third. We will suppose that the chairman decides in favour of the Canadian National Railways. In that event is the Canadian Pacific Railway going to be favourably disposed towards the Canadian National Railways? Or if in another case the decision is given in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is Mr. Hungerford or are those men in charge of the national railways going to feel kindly towards the other line? We will not effect economies if we have the railways at each others throats,—and that is exactly what will happen when the arbitral tribunal is operating.

If we are to have economies we must have voluntary cooperation between the two railways. Nobody can convince me in this day and generation, after the experiences of the last few years, that this legislation is necessary, so far as economies are concerned. There is no doubt there were extravagances on the part of both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National; we all admit it and know it in our own experience and business. In his speech on Tuesday the Minister of Railways bore me out when he told us how much money was saved in the last year. If these economies were put into effect and these large sums of money were saved without the operation of a compulsory arbitral tribunal, surely Mr. Beatty and his directors and shareholders will make sure that he cooperates with the Canadian National Railways, without having to be forced to do it by legislation.

I say economies would take place more quickly and with less difficulty if the railways were left alone, on the one hand the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway watching Mr. Beatty and his directors, and on the other hand the people of Canada represented by their members in this House of Commons watching the management of the Canadian National Railways. That is the only way we will ever have proper cooperation, and because of that I say this bill is unnecessary, that it interferes with private rights and is not in the best interests either of Canada or the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway. For that reason I purpose voting against it.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, we are requested to consider a measure which, according to the hon. Minister of Railways, is based on the conclusion of the Duff commission. There is, therefore, reason to believe that the report will serve as a guide to the new management of our National railways.

The object which the royal commission, composed of seven members, appointed by the government on November 20, 1931, had in view, was to study the difficult situation in which our National railways are placed, discover the causes and find a remedy.

The work carried out by the commissioners is certainly one of the most thorough and praiseworthy which has ever been presented to parliament. They discovered the main sources of the evil and made the most commendable suggestions, that cannot be gainsaid. However, the true remedy has not been pointed out; perhaps, they thought it was better not to mention it at present, and certain recommendations made therefore, seem to be in contradiction with the principles of economic management.

Numerous factors, it is stated, have contributed to create the sad plight of our National railways; first, the extensive mileage in contrast with our population, trade depression, competition by the Canadian Pacific railway and the various other transportation facilities such as motor trucks, autobus, aeroplanes and ships; the high rates charged on freight and passenger traffic, and the high cost of labour. All the commissioners, however, agree in asserting that one of the main causes was the acquisition of railways and ancillary lines, most of them bankrupt, necessitating very large disbursements in interest and fixed charges. Additional causes were repairs to the railways which had deteriorated and had been neglected, in many instances, requiring a complete rebuilding of both the roadway and stations, so as to put them in condition to meet competition by the Canadian Pacific railway; the erection of hotels, still to meet competition, the establishment of maritime services, always with the same end in view, and finally, an overstaffed management drawing too high salaries. To remedy the first evil, the report recommends abolishing the duplication of train services, both railways to cooperate in this respect. This is an excellent recommendation, this useless war was carried on to the detriment of the two railways, moreover, the public could be given an efficient service without this duplication. By discontinuing to operate the unnecessary lines, instead of having 95 per cent of lines in use there would only be 58 per cent; the operating cost, maintenance and wear and tear would greatly be lessened; therefore, the saving would be very appreciable.

The report, moreover, recommends the merger of the telegraph and express services. This suggestion is an excellent one and a further saving would result.

The maritime coastal service of the Canadian National Railway between Vancouver, Victoria and Seattle, undertaken at a great loss, should be entirely discontinued. The extravagant hotel system should be leased, for it is out of proportion to the requirements of the population.

While recognizing the service rendered by motor trucks and autobus, a service with which the railways cannot compete, owing to its particular facilities, and which better highways has developed and will further develop, the commissioners are of the opinion that it would only be fair to fix minimum rates for the conveyance of goods by railways and motor trucks, so as to establish a workable system between these various conveyances.

This is a recommendation with which I do not entirely agree, and I do not think it is of a nature to improve the situation. First, the question relating to motor vehicles comes entirely under the jurisdiction of the provinces which issue the licences, collect the taxes and establish regulations for the safety and maintenance of their highways. This service is already highly assessed and cannot stand any further taxation, especially, in times of crisis when we are aware that the special advantages derived from this kind of transportation cannot be duplicated by railways.

This recommendation, to my mind, is unfair to the public. It would not matter were the two systems of transportation identical; however, under present circumstances, it means charging the public a higher price, equivalent to that of railways, an antiquated system of conveyance which has seen better days; it means impeding progress which modern methods demand.

The railway management—states the Duff report—should be free from political interference. These are views with which I agree to some extent, however, no more than it is necessary. In fact, as long as the railways remain public property, the people are entitled to safeguard their interests through the medium of their representatives. To my mind, the representatives of the people cannot ignore this fact entirely. Therefore although agreeing that the management of our railways should be carried on in a business way, it is impossible to entirely dissociate politics from it or the representatives of the people whose interests are at stake.

The royal commission is not opposed to the St. Lawrence deep waterways, it contends that this undertaking will not harm railway traffic. Quite the contrary, common sense tells us that the dredging of a deep water route to the head of the Great lakes will considerably decrease the railway traffic, owing to lower transportation rates although this method of conveyance is slower. Take, for instance, an ocean ship loaded at any European port, bound for Fort William, instead of Montreal, the cargo thus shipped will mean so much freight taken away from the railways between the two last mentioned points, there is no avoiding this fact. Notwithstanding the outlay of millions of dollars to construct this deep waterway, ships being exempt from taxation, this water route becomes a conveyance subsidized by the State, by those who, themselves, are endeavouring to extricate their railways from the sad plight in which it has fallen, by subsidizing a great rival to aggravate its plight—this seems most absurd.

The report further expresses the views that the wheat increase in the west—although the shipping is to the Pacific ocean and then via the Panama canal or else to Churchill—will always leave a tonnage equal to that of to-day to be shipped East, via Montreal and the Atlantic ocean. Increased wheat production, at present, is very uncertain. In fact, in normal times, such should be the case, and the western prairies could feed a greater proportion of the world's population. However, the contrary is happening at present. This wheat increase is precisely taking place in countries which in the past imported our wheat; however, as long as the world's policy remains unchanged, Canada has very little chance of exporting more wheat.

The commission suggests as a remedy, at Chapter V, Section 204, the appointment of three trustees to see that their recommendations are put into practice. A majority of the trustees should rule, but the majority's decisions would depend on the good pleasure of the chairman. For the purpose of settling disputes it suggests—Section 213—the appointment of the Chief Commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners and a representative of the two companies concerned. When decisions cannot be arrived at on important matters the exchequer court would be empowered to appoint two additional trustees. Section 213 is as follows:

> Where the execution of an order involves the doing of any act which by an existing statute requires the assent or approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners or where in the opinion of the Chief Commissioner himself the public interests involved are of sufficient importance to warrant it, no order made by the arbitral tribunal shall be operative without the concurrence of the Chief Commissioner and his formal written assent.

It is clearly shown that the members of this arbitral tribunal and trustees amount to placing the control of all railways in the hands of one man, the Chairman of the Railway Commission, which seems most arbitrary. It is an absolute dictatorship. If, in the appointment of this arbitral tribunal, there was only a question of the interests of the National Railways involved, the granting of such wide powers would certainly be a dangerous proceeding, but where it takes a more serious meaning, is when it violates the contract entered into, in 1881, between the Dominion government and the C.P.R. in which it is stipulated that the Pacific company will manage, maintain and operate its railways and properties, itself, perpetually. If we consider that 35,000 Canadians are shareholders in this company, that they have invested money well earned and savings realized by hard work, while being also taxed to maintain the C.N.R. and that they have put up their own money in purchasing this private railway, it would certainly be unjust to dispossess them to-day of their property either directly or indirectly, by placing this private enterprise under the management of this arbitral tribunal, in conjunction with the Canadian National Railway. All seem to point that the state would have the right to ruin a prosperous and indispensible company to save another from bankruptcy. The arbitral tribunal would, perhaps, be acceptable if its powers were limited to controlling the expenditure of the Canadian National Railway and regulating all unreasonable competition between the two systems.

When prosperity prevailed throughout Canada between 1896 and 1911, the future of the country appeared so promising that governments had grounds to venture into railway enterprises, either by means of subsidizing or undertaking the work themselves. They had the means at their disposal and it was but natural to first build railways to transport, afterwards, the pioneers of the country. Railways have always been the means of establishing and developing new settlements. The credit of settling the western provinces must be given to the railways. Without their initiative all these beautiful regions would still be inhabited only by the Indian tribes, scattered here and there. The transcontinental lines made confederation what it is to-day. Even then the thought of calling the western plains the granary of the empire and visions of feeding part of Europe existed. Immigration at that period increased our population without hindering anyone. Nobody foresaw this terrible war of 1914, which was in a few years to transform our country, blot out our prosperity, jeopardize our enterprises and trade, and imperil our credit. The world crisis began to spread over the land. This scourge, known as war, upset everything not only among us but throughout the world. To-day, nations impoverished seek to produce their own food. We witnessed foreign countries which in the past had sought our exports, become self-supporting and even invade our own markets. All nations vied with one another in erecting tariff barriers. Canada with its untold natural resources, with a population of hardly 10,000,000 souls is overtaxed and crippled with debts, its people are inactive although the country overflows with products. The royal commission appointed to solve one of our great problems has failed in its task; its recommendations will in no way better our lot, because the problem to be solved is far greater than that of our railways. The commissioners perhaps visualized the real remedy; however, in this period of trade stagnation and universal unemployment, they dared not make it known for fear of further jeopardizing our situation as a whole; perhaps they thought, not without cause, that their recommendations would not be welcomed by the public, seeing that 500,000 men were unemployed, and at a time when the producer cannot find a purchaser, owing to our impoverished state.

We had reason to expect that this commission, after scrutinizing and analyzing the affairs of our national railway would have visited other countries where there were also railway problems, in order to study on the spot the means adopted to solve these problems and be in a position to recommend to the government a measure differing from that now submitted to us. At all events, the legislation which we are now considering can only be at the most a temporary remedy and not a cure to our railway ills. As I have shown, this measure tends to be unjust, arbitrary and liable to aggravate a more serious problem, that of unemployment. if we examine what other countries have done for their railways we find that they have not followed our example, they have not lost their time in shifting their ills. France, which had to bear the brunt of the Great war, finding the financial situation of her railways threatened, adopted as a remedy the immediate electrification of her vast system, Paris-Lyon-Méditerranée et Orleans-Midi. The Swiss confederation electrified with success her entire railway system. Our neighbours, the United States, whose water powers are not to be compared with those of Canada, did not hesitate to electrify their Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, Butte, Anaconda, Pacific railway system and others.

Some time ago the press informed us that an Anglo-Franco-German syndicate, with a capital of $580,000,000, had been formed to electrify the railways of Poland, Rumania, Iraq and Portugal which were threatened with bankruptcy. In Canada, with a surplus of water powers—for with only 3 per cent of our railways electrified and our financial situation not in a worse state than that of those countries—the government has no better measure to offer us than this inadequate legislation. It may be contended that the cost of establishing such a system would be very high. If in other countries such a transformation has been carried out everywhere with success, under no better conditions than those prevailing here, why should Canada refuse to follow their example? Since Canada is undeniably in a more favourable situation, any opposition to such a scheme can only arise from certain groups which are interested in blocking such a progressive move. According to statements published by the Butte-Anaconda Railway, we are able to state that for one year's operations—all expenditures included—with a capital of $1,200,000, that company realized a profit of $242,000. When it is known that the Chicago-Milwaukee and St. Paul system comprising 440 miles, a distance equal to that from Ottawa to New York, which, to-day, however, extends over 600 miles, cost $12,500,000, out of this amount the actual cost of 112 locomotives transferred to other lines must be deducted, we are amazed to hear that one hesitates over a few millions of dollars to provide the country with the only system capable of competing advantageously against all other systems of conveyance. Each year, we face, without flinching, the enormous deficits of our railways, although we are aware of the great advantages of the electrified locomotive such as traction, braking power, etc., over the steam locomotive, and the small operating cost entailed compared with the steam system.

When, in 1922, I had the honour of addressing the house on the subject of the electrification of railways, the objection made was that the population of Canada was not sufficiently l rge and that the volume of its trade was not considerable enough. This objection loses much of its force, if we compare our population with that of Switzerland which is highly pleased with its new system, and not without cause, if we consider that with power houses and substations the utilization of direct current provides power for heating, lighting and industrial purposes, with an assured increase in the future if current can be supplied cheaply. When, for instance, a city like Montreal spends for heating purposes only, either in imported coal, oil or gas, not less than $25,000,000 per year; one can easily realize how quickly would be repaid the cost of installation of this new system, even with a population of only 10,000,000 souls. This objection would be of even smaller account if we proceeded to electrify our railways gradually, for instance, if the work was spread over a period of twenty years.

I do not think it necessary to emphasize that we possess water powers in sufficient quantity to carry out this electrification without expropriating, at great cost, the electric companies already in operation. I think that all will admit this fact.

How will it be possible, in these hard times, one may object, to raise the necessary capital to carry out this enterprise? On this point, I entirely agree with the views expressed by Mr. Carrel, of the Quebec Chronicle, that it would be an easy matter to find the necessary capital at 4 per cent interest. The dominion and provincial governments have but to agree to appoint commissions for that purpose and to guarantee their bonds, as Quebec did when constructing dams across rivers to help pulpwood companies, and, also for public toll bridges. The undertaking would be facilitated by the fact that the work would be spread over a period of twenty years, thus affording work to thousands of workmen and encouraging numerous industries to establish themselves in Canada, owing to the low cost of electric current supplied; the people, therefore, as a whole, would indirectly benefit.

These commissions, in order to distribute electric current at a low cost would generate it themselves, because were they to purchase it from a company obliged to pay dividends on its capital, the scheme would be impossible; this objection, however, disappears if the commissions generate their own current and distribute it without profit.

At present, the project can be undertaken without having to expropriate, at heavy cost, electric companies already in existence, not only in Quebec but throughout all the provinces of the dominion; now that the problem of high voltage current loss, when distributed at long distances, has been solved by the invention of electron tubes. If in the United States, with a water-power developing 200,000 H.P. people have built a transmission line of 100,000 volts, brought down to 3,000 volts by sub-stations, we should have no hesitation to state that in Canada this electrification is feasable with very little interference in the current supply.

This electrical transformation would affect the various railway services, it would almost absorb their entire staff. As roadways, stations, warehouses, hotels could be utilized and a large proportion of the present stock of locomotives could be distributed in non electrified sections, I think that the cost of the undertaking would be greatly reduced. Comparing the advantages of the electric locomotive over the steam locomotive, proof of which has been completely established from every possible angle, large centres, such as Montreal, have no reason to put up with the nuisance of steam locomotives, allowing them to cross streets in all directions, of being a threat to public health; fouling houses, windows and clothes, making an infernal noise day and night, disturbing the sick child in his sleep, the overtired mother or father, at the end of the day's work. I state that, like in Paris, London and New York, the steam locomotive should have disappeared long ago from our large towns. This reform has been too long delayed.

The reason of such delay is found in the carelessness, lack of initiative and incompetency of our public men. I think it proper to remind them, once awhile, that the electrification of our railways is an absolute necessity as a measure of general public welfare.

On motion of Mr. Malcolm the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 42, respecting the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Bradette.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Thursday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Hon. R. J. Manion for the second reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in resuming the debate on Bill No. 37, I should like to take this opportunity of complimenting the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) on the very fair presentation of the case which he made for the legislation being submitted. I should like also to thank the Prime Minister for the speech which he made yesterday inasmuch as it undoubtedly made clear to the minds of most of the members of the house what he considered to be the need for the legislation, based on his opinion of the situation with regard to our nationally owned railway system.

I further feel indebted to the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) for some remarks which he made in his very admirable speech last evening when he referred to some statements that had been made by the Prime Minister with regard to the very able men who had sat on the Duff commission and to the ability of the members of the Senate who had passed on this legislation. I am thoroughly in accord with the member for Hants-Kings. I do not think that any man who sat on the Duff commission, regardless of what his ability or previous experience may have been, has any more knowledge or any more conception of the railway situation as it applies in this dominion than have most of the members of this house. The Prime Minister himself, as he said in his remarks yesterday, has carefully watched the growth of the different railway systems in Canada, and I think I can say with many other members of the house that we also, just as well as any man who sat on the Duff commission, have watched the growth of these systems and have seen the moneys that were granted by parliament spent to build up private systems, and have later seen those private systems collapse and the roads taken over under state ownership. Not only that, but I consider that hon. members of this house have a better knowledge of the requirements of the Dominion of Canada and a fuller appreciation of what our railway system means to the national life of this country than any men who could possibly be appointed to any royal commission who have not been engaged in public life for the long periods of time that some members of this house have. I therefore submit quite respectfully to the Prime Minister that this legislation having been introduced by the Minister of Railways in a most non-partisan address, inviting on behalf of the government a discussion of the legislation, that it is our duty to present to the Minister of Railways and to the government the views that we hold with regard to the railway situation in Canada, and to suggest amendments which we, the members of this house representing the people of Canada who are the shareholders of this road, think are in the interests of Canada and the shareholders and to the advantage of future generations.

Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted briefly to refer to the railway situation in Canada I should like to preface my remarks by saying everyone realizes that in new countries railway construction is usually in advance of requirements. In no country has this been more true than in Canada. We have only to turn the pages of Hansard for the period following the building of the Canadian Pacific railway to find many evidences, from those of little faith at that time, that the railway could not be made a success. True, the Canadian Pacific Railway passed through many years when the earnings did not justify the faith of the original builders, but eventually that faith was justified and the Canadian Pacific railway became great and prosperous. During the years between 1896 and 1911, due to an expansive policy of immigration, Canada grew and prospered. And the men of those years had just as much faith in our dominion as had Sir John A. Macdonald and the builders of the Canadian Pacific railway.

What the Prime Minister said yesterday may be quite true; looking at events from the vantage point of 1933 it is quite justifiable to criticize what happened between 1896 and 1911. But we all admit that hindsight is much better than foresight. In fact, if our foresight was as good as our hindsight we would not have to work; we could make all our money at the race track. Between 1896 and 1911 Canada enjoyed a period of expansion, and hon. members on both sides of this House of Commons were entirely in agreement with the expansive program carried on in those years. When Sir Robert Borden took office in 1911 no man foresaw or foreshadowed in this house the disastrous events that were to occur between 1914 and 1918, or the catastrophe which in those years upset the calculations of the legislators of earlier days, and retarded the growth of Canada to an extent which no one can calculate. Therefore I say any remarks critical of previous legislators, or their plan for serving Canada with railways, are not founded upon fact. They are not fair criticisms, because the intervention of the war utterly destroyed the calculations made previous to that time.

If on this continent we had not built railways for the pioneers I doubt very much if we would be a country of 10,000,000 people. If we had not built our railways in order to take our pioneers into those vast open spaces I doubt very much if Canada would be the prosperous country it is to-day. Possibly we might write off to national expansion and promotion, and the development of Canada, some of the moneys which undoubtedly we lost on railway construction. I do not feel nearly as much alarmed as did the Prime Minister in his speech yesterday concerning the financial situation in which we find ourselves to-day. Hon. gentlemen who sat in this chamber in 1922 following the close of the war, will recall that the picture at that time was not very much better than it is to-day. We were faced with a $60,000,000 operating deficit on the Canadian National Railways, when we took into account the interest we owed to the outside bondholders. We were owners of a system which the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen had tried to co-ordinate in 1917, and which coordination was only completed in 1923. The system was run down. Without going into detail, with which the Prime Minister dealt so ably yesterday, may I say that it was a disjointed system, and it was not in good shape. The question arose in this house whether or not the system should at that time have been sold to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the sum of one dollar, to relieve the future taxpayers of Canada. However the houses of parliament decided otherwise, and a management which had before it a tremendous task was put in control of the railway. I am going to say that I believe, in future years in the light of better perspective, men will have an entirely different view concerning what Sir Henry Thornton did for the national system during the time he was president. I shall prove my statement and my opinion by utterances from hon. gentlemen opposite during the years Sir Henry Thornton held office.

What happened between the years 1922 and 1930 concerning the operation of the national railway system? No one will deny that the system was coordinated; no one will deny that the trackage was tremendously improved; no one will deny that new equipment was purchased, both rolling stock and other types of equipment,—all of which brought the railway to the forefront of railway systems on the North American continent. If one wants proof of that he has but to look up the references made with regard to the two Canadian systems by American railwaymen. Indeed, it is true that the state of efficiency into which the national system and the Canadian Pacific had got themselves by 1929 was the envy of most transportation systems on this continent. What I say with regard to the management of the Canadian National Railways, to which in a moment I shall refer, was just as true with regard to the management of the Canadian Pacific. During that time not only was the system coordinated, the trackage improved and new equipment purchased, but for the sake of the greatest industry in our country, namely the wheat industry, we restored the old Crowsnest pass freight rates, giving lower rates on grain. During the years from 1926 to 1932, as shown in the Duff report, we managed not only to pay operating expenses, but to contribute the sum of $210,000,000 towards the payment of interest to outside shareholders.

Let me say that in view of an accomplishment of that kind, I do not blame the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), who was then in opposition and speaking in the budget debate, for claiming that no party had any right to take credit for the successes prevalent at that time. I think the Minister of Justice was quite within his rights in stating that the success was due to the good offices of the management of the road, and Sir Henry Thornton and his officers and loyal staff should be given full credit. I do not think the Minister of Justice would want to retract the statement he made on that occasion. Therefore I do not believe anyone can say there was not reasonably efficient management of the national system during those years.

In the Duff report at pages 15 and 19 are given certain figures which I think hon. members should take into account when comparing the efficiency of the national system with that of the Canadian Pacific during the years of prosperity and ample tonnage. The figures showing mileage of the two systems indicate that that of the Canadian National railways was 23,880, while that of the Canadian Pacific railway was 16,886. Of the total railway mileage in Canada the national system had 58 per cent and the Canadian Pacific 42 per cent. There is a direct relationship between mileage and capital expenditures. How do they compare? The capital expenditures on the Canadian National system are given as $456,345,456, whereas those on the Canadian Pacific are only $348,776,855. Or, of the total capital expenditures on the railways from the years 1923 to 1931, inclusive, the Canadian National expenditures were 57 per cent and those of the Canadian Pacific 43 per cent. So we see how closely the capital expenditure compared with the actual mileage. On operating expenditure found at page 15 of the Duff report, that of the Canadian National in these years amounted to 58 per cent of the total railway operating revenue in Canada, and that of the Canadian Pacific to 42 per cent, exactly the same percentage as obtained in mileage. In other words these two roads ran side by side with their total mileage in capital expenditure compared with operating expenditure.

But let us come to the all important question of revenue. On page 15 of the Duff report you have the figures. The total operating revenue of the railways in Canada was divided, Canadian National 57 per cent, Canadian Pacific 43 per cent, exactly the same ratio as the capital expenditure, and only one per cent difference from the mileage. Does not that prove that during that period when tonnage was ample, when the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National both were building up power, equipment and rolling stock, and rock ballasting their roads, they ran hand in hand on expenditure; therefore, any credit or criticism applicable to one road is also applicable to the other.

My remarks in that regard are made for a certain reason. The Minister of Railways in his speech a few days ago gave the decline in the revenue of the publicly owned system as being from $304,000,000 to, I think, $162,000,000, if I remember rightly.

Mr. MANION: To $161,000,000.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would ask hon. gentlemen in this house who have been associated with business and financial enterprises if there is anything unusual about the decline that the Minister of Railways is called upon to face. Is it not just about comparable to the decline in other business on this continent? Is the railway problem in these times of international stress any more difficult to solve than the problem that faces the pulp and paper industry, the lumber industry, the coal mining industry or manufacturing industry? I think not. The problem which we as guardians of the national railway and representatives of the people who own it have to face is just the same problem which every board of directors and every manager of business is called upon to face to-day. I do not think that it is a much worse problem than faced us in 1922. In 1922 we were facing the destruction of our previous hopes caused by the great war. In 1933 we are facing the difficulties which have arisen not through any action of hon. gentlemen present, not through any action of the people of Canada, but through the breakdown of the economic system of the world. For my part I prefer to look at this national problem in the same way as I look at a business problem when I sit with my associates in business trying to solve the problems which come before us.

There was an interesting statement made by the minister with regard to the economies which have been effected. The minister said that $40,000,000 had been saved by efficient management on the Canadian National system during the past year. I want to say to the minister that for whatever part he had in that I congratulate him. I want to congratulate the management of the Canadian National system on being able to meet the conditions with which they are faced by so reducing expenditure as to save this amount of money. But in fairness I want to say to my friend the minister that he is hardly right in saying that had these economies been effected in 1928 we could have paid $40,000,000 on the interest on our obligations to the bondholders.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I did not make any such statement.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am glad the minister did not. I understood that he said if the same efficiency had obtained in 1928 as to-day that would have been the result.

Mr. MANION: I know my hon. friend does not wish to mislead. I quoted Mr. Hungerford as saying that if the same economies were in force and with the same amount of business as in 1928 it would have increased the net earnings by $19,000,000.

Mr. MALCOLM: With regard to that I want to say that the expenditures of 1928 were predicated upon the demands of the public for service. They were predicated on the demands of members of this house for branch lines. Can we not recall the brilliant speech made by a member of the Senate who was then a member of the House of Commons in which he advocated a very extensive and very expensive immigration project for the Peace River district. Opinion in this house was divided, but mostly supported the then member for North Vancouver in his desire to improve the conditions in Canada by an extensive immigration policy to fill up the Peace River country. I remember at that very time Sir Henry Thornton made the statement that we should go slowly. He said, there is a limit to what the national railway can carry, and the Peace River railway may be the last straw that will break the camel's back. Whatever we may say about the extension of branch lines in the dominion during the prosperous years up to 1929, I think it is only fair for hon. gentlemen to admit that we were all looking at things through very rosy glasses, and regardless of political affiliations we in this house were all anxious to see the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National give the very best service possible, in fact we were demanding super service, we were demanding branch lines which in the light of recent events were probably not at all justifiable, but which did look to hon. members then to be quite worthy of consideration. I do not think it is fair to criticize former parliaments for their optimism at that time. No member of this parliament who sat in the last parliament ever anticipated to the slightest extent the economic collapse which has fallen upon us in the last four years. Does anyone here recall a single speech of warning in this house in the years 1928 or 1929 by which we were told that we were going to have the greatest economic collapse that the history of the world has ever recorded? I think not. So in dealing with what we did in previous years I do not think anything is gained by crying over spilt milk. We are just in the position to-day that other business men are, we are faced with a problem and that problem must be solved. The Minister of Railways has introduced a bill to that end. Members of this house are entitled, indeed it is their duty, to express their opinions as to the best method of solution in the light of existing circumstances and not in the light of recriminations for anything that past parliaments have done.

May I say with regard to the expenditures which were made during the period of prosperity, that we are benefiting by those expenditures now to an extent of which we little dream? We could not save money to-day on the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National if we had not built our rock ballasted roadbeds up to their present fine condition. We could not save money on power if that power had not already been provided on both systems, if the equipment was not in good shape for many years to come. We are now relying on the fat that was built up during those years on both railway systems. We can now economize and benefit from the expenditures of former years, until things revive.

There has been a great deal of criticism to the publicity of both railway systems. But hon. gentlemen who have had some experience with advertising, know perfectly well that advertising has a continuous value, indeed, it has a cumulative value, and the prestige which the Canadian Pacific has built up for itself throughout the nations of the world, and so largely in Europe, is not going to pass in a day. If a man is a good advertiser, he probably has to continue it to some extent, but he can easily curtail his advertising in times of stress and reap the profits of previous publicity which brought his goods or his system into the public view. So I think the expenditures made by the old administration, Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors, are of distinct value to us at the present time in effecting economies which never could have been effected if the roadbeds had not been built up and the equipment had not been purchased.

I have read the Duff report with considerable care, Mr. Speaker, and I am disappointed in one feature of that report. It makes a most careful analysis of the financial situation of these roads; it deals with many phases of transportation, but I think it fails in one respect. It does not provide what the Minister of Railways referred to in his speech the other day; it does not give any assistance by telling the railways or telling us as trustees of the Canadian National Railways, how the railway systems in Canada are going to secure more tonnage. It is on more tonnage that the systems must rely for any future prosperity. I think perhaps hon. members are quite fed up on discussions with regard to the problem of motor car transportation as it affects the earnings of the railway system, but may I respectfully submit a thought which I think has been overlooked in this regard. The minister pointed out that from 1923 to 1932 the number of motor cars in Canada had increased from, I think he said, a half million to a million, and that during the same period the decline in passenger traffic on the railway systems was equal to the increase in motor car traffic. In other words, the passenger revenue declined by about half. Based on that statement of fact one would be inclined to say that motor car traffic injured the railways of Canada to the extent of about half their passenger traffic, but is that true? I do not think it is. When one begins to consider what the motor car industry has meant to the railways of Canada in the tremendous tonnage they have carried for the motor car industry one hesitates to say that this industry has been such a detriment to the railway systems. When one considers the tens of thousands of car-loads of road material, cement, asphalt, crushed stone and so forth that have been transported in Canada for the construction of good roads, entirely due to the advent of the motor car, one must realize the tremendous tonnage that has accrued to the railway systems of North America due to the very fact that roads had to be built for these cars to run on. I have discussed this problem with two or three very good railway economists in the United States, one of whom informed me that he did not know of a man on the North American continent who had made a satisfactory calculation to prove exactly what motor transportation had cost the railway systems if, indeed, it had meant any cost at all in total earnings.

I do submit, however, that our railways are open to some criticism. I believe the operators of all railways in North America have been so busy watching their opponents that they did not consider what might result if only they thought of themselves as transportation men rather than as railroad men. To-day they see it; to-day we have the advent of the single unit, gasoline-propelled car in Germany. It is now coming into use in the United States, and I believe two or three of these cars are being built for use in Canada. By this means a good service may be rendered on branch lines without the expensive rolling stock or the heavy operating crew needed on a steam train of three or four cars. If ten years ago the railway companies had seen, as they see to-day, the possibility of using motor transportation on their own rails I believe much of the expense of maintaining heavy services on branch lines could have been avoided. In the second place, had the railways realized that they were the transportation principals of this dominion and that anything that had to do with transportation was in their field probably ten years ago they would have done what they are now doing under necessity; namely making use of the trucking system in order to feed their terminals and division points.

I enjoyed listening to the remarks of the minister because of one particular point stressed, namely, that the decrease in railway operation had lessened the consumption in coal, I think he said, from 59,000,000 tons to 29,000,000 tons.

Mr. MANION: Dollars.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, dollars, and the minister went on to say that this had a very serious effect upon the earnings of the coal miners of Canada. That only shows, as the minister pointed out, the far reaching effect of anything that is detrimental to our transportation system. When the minister said that an additional 50 per cent tonnage would solve our problems I just wondered to myself why any man in the transportation business, a business whose very life blood is the movement of commodities, should support any policy which has to do in any way with the restriction of trade and the movement of commodities. To-day we have this situation, Mr. Speaker, that many commodities are being diverted into other channels. Recently I asked a question of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) with regard to the shipment of silk from Japan through the Panama canal. I was informed that it was cheaper for the Toronto raw silk user to buy his silk in New York rather than in Tokyo, because of some ruling with regard to exchange. There is a case in point. I know that the movement of silk from the port of Vancouver across the continent was one of the most profitable operations carried on by the railways. Silk tonnage was almost better than passenger traffic; silk trains were given precedence over passenger trains. I think everything the minister can do should be done in order to increase tonnage, because tonnage is the life blood of the railways and is the one thing that will bring them back to prosperity. Therefore I say that the success of the railways, which as the minister has pointed out affects so many other lines, is entirely tied up with the fiscal policy of this dominion. We cannot divorce the two problems. If in this house we consider the movement of tonnage over our railways when we are framing our tariffs we will do as much to relieve unemployment and lessen the financial burden of this country as we can do in any other way.

I should like to make an observation now on the principle of this bill, which is one of central control. I have been wondering during the past two or three months whether or not central control is the answer to our problem. Personally I do not think it is. Could we solve our lumber problem by creating a dictator over our lumber mills? Could we solve our wheat problem by merging our wheat growing areas in the west into collective farming areas, thereby destroying the rights and liberties of the individual by making one great productive system? I do not think we could. Could the pulp industry be rejuvenated by compelling the amalgamation of all the pulp mills in Canada? I think not. The farming industry will be rejuvenated when we have a broader market, when the nations of Europe are prepared to buy more of our wheat at better prices. The lumber business in this country will be revived when we begin to have faith that Canada is not down and out, and start some substantial construction. The pulp and paper industry will be revived when conditions improve in the United States and a better market for newsprint is found with the large United States newspapers. Nothing but increased business, Mr. Speaker, is going to revive these businesses which are not doing well to-day. I do not believe centralization of authority or the amalgamation of businesses is the answer. In fact the view is largely held by many of the best business economists in the United States that much of our trouble has come from the worship of bigness. We have thought that if a thing was big it must be good, but to-day the trend is more towards decentralization than towards further amalgamations. One must realize that there is a limit to the capacity of man's mind, and that tremendous corporations can be administered only by system. A system that is devised to operate a very large business must be predicated upon a certatin set of conditions. If it is to work it must be planned for a given set of conditions, and when, owing to a great war or owing to an economic crash such as we have had, the conditions are entirely altered, then the system fails just as completely as anything has ever failed in the history of the world. Then we have to call in the genius of some one man to set right the conditions under which the system can operate, because it failed to operate under the changed conditions.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is much to be said for decentralization. I think that one of the biggest problems that will face the Prime Minister if this legislation goes through is to find a superman who will be capable of handling the system alone. We in this house are handing over to one man complete control of a system which owes the public $1,300,000,000. It is the greatest single asset of this dominion.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There is no equity for it.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend says that there is no equity. I differ from the hon. member for Lincoln; I will tell him that there is very little equity in any business at the present time. Earning power, as my hon. friend knows very well, is after all the best basis of equity.

Mr. McGIBBON: They are in the red ink from an operating standpoint.

Mr. MALCOLM: If the railways are in the red ink from an operating standpoint they have plenty of company at the present time in other businesses.

Mr. McGIBBON: That does not make it better.

Mr. MALCOLM: Of course not; but the fact remains that the Prime Minister will be faced with considerable difficulty in finding a man big enough to administer the system; a man who will deal adequately with a system comprising over 30,000 miles of trackage and the number of employees engaged by this railroad will have to be a superman. I say without fear of contradiction from anyone in this house that there is one thing that has impressed itself on the minds of the people of the North American continent, not only the people in Canada but the people in the United States, and that is that the so-called idols of the years 1927 and 1928 have pretty well proven that they have feet of clay, and that has been particularly true throughout this financial crisis. It has been true of the management of most big companies. I for one have ceased to believe very much in supermen. I believe more in the collective wisdom of a group of men such as I have the pleasure of speaking with this afternoon.

We are planning for a board to economically administer our railway system; yet at the same time we know perfectly well that we are also planning to set up a waterway, state-owned, to compete with that road on one side, and to build highways to compete with it on the other. If we have transportation over a free waterway and transportation over free highways, it seems to me that we are very blind if we think that the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific are not faced with serious financial problems.

I cannot quite understand the Prime Minister's lack of courage in the matter of rail transportation; he is extremely alarmed about the financial position of the national railways. He said yesterday that the situation was as serious as it could well be, or words to that effect; yet the right hon. gentleman has courage enough to obligate this country, or the taxpayers of future generations, to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars in the construction of a trans-continental highway and the St. Lawrence waterway. His policies are very inconsistent, for these various means of transportation are going to be in direct competition. I do not think that the railways have failed so utterly as some people seem to think. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) said the other day that economies amounting to $40,000,000 had been effected. This is amazing; it is a very good showing. Mr. Beatty made the statement that amalgamation would save $75,000,000. I say to the Minister of Railways that he has saved more than his half already we may now expect Mr. Beatty to save the remaining $35,000,000.

There was one other remark the Prime Minister made yesterday with which I want to take exception, and it is practically the one difference I have with this legislation. The Prime Minister made the statement that this measure is virtually placing the national railways under a receivership. He said that if it were a private business it would be in liquidation—that it was practically insolvent. Possibly it is, viewed in the light of to-day's values. I do not differ a particle from my hon. friend from Lincoln when he says that to-day's value is not equal to the bonds that are outstanding. It certainly is not there viewed in the light of to-day's values.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I did not say that.

Mr. MALCOLM: Well, comparatively. I believe there is every reason to say that if the national railways were a private concern and owed $1,300,000,000 to bondholders the bondholders would feel that it was about time they were taking some action to secure their investment. But, Mr. Speaker, what is a receivership for? As every hon. gentleman knows, a receiver is appointed for one of two purposes: either to liquidate the property or to operate it until it is in a sufficiently successful position to be handed back to the shareholders. But that is not what this legislation provides. This legislation provides that the receivers, whom the Prime Minister describes as trustees in lieu of receivership, are to be appointed permanently. They are not being appointed to deal with the emergency that exists. My one objection to the legislation is the permanence of the trustees. The Prime Minister says that they are to be appointed like judges. May I point out however that they are not judges. Judges are appointed to administer the laws enacted by this parliament; these men are being appointed as business managers to spend the money of the country in the administration of the country's greatest national institution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are a law unto themselves.

Mr. MALCOLM: Can these trustees tell what conditions will be facing the world in the next twelve months? Certainly the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance would be very glad to know what those conditions will be, but there is one thing that we do know, and that is that there are going to be some very radical changes in the financial structure of North America in the next twelve months; and if there is in the United States that inflation of currency which has been predicted, then the load of the national railways in meeting its obligations in New York will be materially lightened. The whole structure may change. I am not without hope for the man who has obligations. Inflation of American currency to the extent of twenty-five per cent would make a very great difference in the problem of the Canadian National Railways in paying its commitments to New York bondholders.

One aspect of this dictatorship which I do not like. The autocratic control given to one man in this board is to me repulsive.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am sorry.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the debate proceeds further I will deal with the amendment. Mr. Manion, seconded by Mr. Stevens, moves:

That Bill No. 37 (letter A of the Senate) intituled: "An Act Respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system. and for other purposes," be read the second time.

Mr. Mackenzie King moves in amendment thereto:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be left out in order to insert the following instead thereof: "the second reading of this bill be postponed until this house have declared that nothing therein shall be taken to authorize any amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways with the Canadian Pacific company; or to divest parliament of its rights; or to take from the House of Commons its primary duty to control expenditures of public moneys and the taxes required to meet the same; and that the provisions of said bill shall be read in the light of this declaration, and be construed so as to conform therewith, and that in so far as any of its provisions may be inconsistent therewith they shall be amended accordingly, and that the adoption of this amendment by this house shall constitute the declaration of its intention and purposes as set forth herein."

There is in our journals one precedent of an amendment moved on the second reading of a bill which proposed that "further consideration of the bill be deferred until the tariff bill has been disposed of." It was a declaration of principle covering not only the second reading but also the third reading and the final adoption of the bill. It was moved as a disapproval of the measure. The present amendment is different inasmuch as it proposes a postponement of the second reading pending a definite declaration of the house. It does not purport to be adverse to the bill but it makes suggestions for adding to its provisions by amendments which can be moved only after the adoption of the second reading. May at page 390 says:

It is competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill to move as an amendment to the question a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

As this amendment has not the effect of disagreeing with the principle of the bill, it does not come within the class of amendment referred to by May. The allegation that nothing in the bill should be taken to divest parliament of its rights or to take from the house its primary duty to control expenditures is a declaration of general principles which can be moved as a reason for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill dealing with the constitutional rights of parliament, but which is beyond the scope of, and therefore irrelevant to the present bill. May says at page 391 that the principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such proposed resolution. At page 391 May says further:

> Such an amendment may not deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee.

The words "nothing therein shall be taken to authorize any amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways with the Canadian Pacific company" anticipates an amendment which may be moved in committee. The proposition that the bill shall be read in the light of certain declarations and be construed in a certain manner and that its provisions shall be amended accordingly is in the nature of an instruction to the committee which cannot be moved as an amendment to the second reading. For these reasons, the amendment is out of order.

I refer the house to May, 13th edition, page 391; Bourinot, page 509 and Redlich, volume III, page 89.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No point of order has been raised in this matter. Your Honour has taken it upon yourself to give a ruling without any hon. member having an opportunity—

Mr. BENNETT: I raised a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend did not, he said, he would reserve the question as to whether or not the amendment was out of order. The manner in which Your Honour has now given your ruling precludes us from debating the subject and the only alternative left is to challenge Your Honour's ruling. I respectfully beg, Mr. Speaker, to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I conceive it to be the duty of the Speaker to intervene without any objection being taken when he feels that any proceedings before the house are out of order. I have given this amendment very serious consideration. The ruling is that the amendment of Mr. Mackenzie King is out of order, and Mr. Mackenzie King appeals from the said ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): Speaking on the main motion, I should like to conclude the remarks I made on the amendment. At the expiration of my forty minutes when speaking on the amendment, I had just said that I did not like the legislation as presented to the house by the minister. I had endeavoured to point out to members of the house that the conditions which obtain in Canada with relation to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway are not greatly different from those which obtain in most businesses in this dominion, and that in my opinion at least those conditions have no permanence, but that better days will come when entirely different conditions will prevail in this dominion.

I am afraid that the Prime Minister and those in charge of the drafting of this legislation have set the Minister of Railways the problem of putting through legislation which is based on either one or two principles, or both of them. The legislation is based either on a desire for autocracy in administering our great national railway enterprise, or it is based on a feeling of despair that the present situation cannot be improved except by very drastic legislation and drastic control. I do not assume, as this legislation does, that the present conditions will always obtain, and that we shall always be in the financial stress which we are experiencing to-day. To assume that would be a contradiction of the Prime Minister's own faith in this country as expressed in words so many times. It would also be a contradiction of his faith in the future of this country as expressed in the agreement which he has made with the neighbouring republic for the construction of the St. Lawrence waterways. This legislation has some virtue. If it were being adopted, as methods are being adopted by private interests, to deal with an existing emergency situation, I do not believe I should have any disagreement whatever with the legislation.

Mr. MORAND: Does the hon. member think the situation is due entirely to an emergency, or is some of it permanent?

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not differ at all from those who hold that the situation is due to a set of world conditions in which probably we have played our part. If my hon. friend wants to know what I think about it, I do not mind telling him and the house, frankly. We ran into one war, a physical war, which certainly put the financial situation in the world in a complete mess. From the termination of that war until 1930 we ran into a second war when every country in the world competed in raising tariffs, causing a worse economic mess. I am not blaming the Canadian people any more than peoples in other parts of the world, but I must say that if we do not watch ourselves we will be facing a third war, a war of inflation, where nations will be trying to find out who can make money the cheapest.

If this legislation were of a compulsory nature for a period of from three to five years, I would support it. The parliaments of the future, considering the success or failure of the experiment and predicated upon the exigencies and the circumstances then obtaining, could decide whether or not they would continue this form of autocracy or whether they would give back more power to the members of this House of Commons. The Prime Minister said that the refusal to vote money was within our power. I believe he knows perfectly well, that the refusal to vote money gives us no power in this chamber at all. The only money the national system has to ask us for is the interest on the bonds due to outside bondholders. Should we refuse to pay that interest the bondholders would immediately act, and we would have to pay it. Under the present legislation, there is being taken away from the minister the slightest vestige of control he might have over the head of the system. He may spend all the revenues exactly the same as the old board did. And I am not saying the authority we granted the old board was right at all; I think it had too much authority. I submit many hon. members of the house who criticized the authority we gave that board were right in their criticism. The old board could spend every dollar for revenue, and this house of parliament had no control. Many people believe that by taking a great public enterprise out of the control of parliament and putting it under a board, the difficulties will be met. I am from the province of Ontario, and I state fearlessly that the hydro electric system of that province was efficiently administered when the administration was conducted by Sir Adam Beck. It was ably administered in those days. But it is only a few years ago that absolute control of expenditures of the hydro electric, by way of making contracts for future power commitments, put the hydro electric under obligations which I do not believe would have been incurred if the legislature of Ontario had had complete control.

I do not believe we will secure any superman who has any more brains than members of the House of Commons, and that is why I am only willing to support the legislation as an experiment. The Prime Minister has said the legislation is drastic, that it is in the form of a surgical operation, and that generally in the case of a deep-seated trouble surgery must be resorted to. In that regard I do not think the Prime Minister's simile is as apt as the similes he usually uses. My opinion is that he is not treating a patient by surgical operation, but he is putting him under perpetual treatment in some institution from which he cannot escape. After a surgical operation the good doctor cures his patient and hands him back to his family. But when we put a man under perpetual treatment, or under the care of a custodian from whom he cannot be taken, his family will never see him again. I want to say to the Minister of Railways, in all kindness, that I do not believe this legislation is fair to him or to the Dominion of Canada. To meet a temporary condition, I am in favour of a surgical operation; by way of setting up an automatic board for a given period of from three to five years. If that experiment works, if this receiver or trustee the Prime Minister speaks about—where he will get such a man, heaven knows—if this man makes a success of the system I think the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway have a right to have their system handed back to them, and the parliament and people of Canada have a right to have their system returned to them.

This legislation should not be predicated upon the assumption that troubled times are going to continue. Many of us have enjoyed the privileges of this house for varying periods, some of us may be elected again. But, in the passage of time, many of us will not be in this house ten years hence. New men will be elected. We should base our legislation not upon emergencies which arise, but upon faith in the dominion. It seems to me that when we assume we are in a national crisis and that we are not going to get out, we are giving scant leadership to the people of Canada. It is said on every hand that if only we could establish faith on the North American continent there would be a wonderful revival of business. I say to the Prime Minister and to hon. members opposite and on this side of the house, without fear of successful contradiction, that if we needed caution when we were prosperous and are now criticizing ourselves because we were not cautious, for heaven's sake let us have courage now, and not criticize ourselves five years hence for not having courage.

This system is not in the doldrums; it does not need to be put under communistic or autocratic control. The Canadian Pacific Railway system is not in the doldrums. It is facing a crisis due to lack of tonnage and transportation of all kinds. These things will right themselves. I have no brief for the Canadian Pacific, but I have a brief for the people who own it. After all, it is their system, and I do not believe this parliament should take the system of the Canadian Pacific and the system owned by the people of Canada and place them under a bureaucracy permanent in its nature, and which nothing but a complete vote of the House of Commons and the Senate can possibly alter. I say to the government and to the Minister of Railways that so far as I am concerned the principal change I want in the legislation is to change the permanence of the appointments to the board. I do not oppose an arbitral tribunal as a temporary expedient to deal with circumstances existing to-day, but I do say we are not playing fair with the Minister of Railways, we are not playing fair with the stockholders of the Canadian Pacific or with the parliament of Canada when we take these two great systems and put them under arbitrary control, making the two of them forever subservient to the decisions of one man as to what shall be done with the invested capital.

Mr. RALSTON: And self-perpetuating.

Mr. MALCOLM: The self-perpetuating feature, Mr. Speaker, is my principal objection to the legislation. I believe if the minister and the government could see their way clear to enact this legislation as an experiment, they would be much better advised.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not like to interrupt my hon. friend, because we on this side of the house always like to hear him, but I submit he was out of order in again addressing the house. The amendment, or so-called amendment, which was ruled out of order was never put to the house by you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes, it was.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If so, it was subsequently ruled out of order and became as nothing, consequently my hon. friend, I submit, had no right to speak again, though we took no objection on this side of the house.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I had the honour of consulting Mr. Speaker, and he said it was in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that under the circumstances it is necessary to give a ruling, but my recollection is that I did put the amendment to the house last evening. Whether it was subsequently ruled out of order or not, it was for the time being before the house. I understood the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) to be addressing himself to the question before the house, which was the amendment, and that having been removed it was open to him to speak to the main question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I just draw it to your attention.

Mr. MALCOLM: I did not think I was out of order, because the whip on this side informed me that the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) was quite willing that I should go on. In any event I thank the members of the house for their very courteous hearing.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): The hon. member for North Bruce will pardon me if I do not follow him through all his very strenuous effort to gloss over, shall I say, or to defend the action of the government of which he was a member. The hon. gentleman spent about thirty minutes of his first speech in defending the actions of the late government as far as the Canadian National is concerned, and spent about five minutes in attacking the financial policy of this government. Outside of that, I have not observed anything very constructive in what he said, no matter how eloquently and brilliantly his speech was delivered.

I would like to say that the people of this country at the present time are watching very closely this legislation and the action of this house. And it is perfectly right that they should. In the first place the citizens of Canada are interested in the matter as taxpayers of this country. They are the people who in the past have paid and who in the future must pay the bills or deficits of the Canadian National Railways. Then we must consider that they are also the shareholders of this railway system, and if the road succeeds they hope in the future, and I believe have reason to hope, that they will ultimately get back some return for the money which has been spent, perhaps recklessly, upon the system. There is another reason why they should be interested which I do not think has been brought forward in this house as prominently as it should be, namely that the people of Canada are the customers of both these railroads. The people of this country are entitled to value for the expenditures they make, whether for passenger service or freight service or anything else. Then another class of men interested in this legislation is the men who are at the present time employed by either of the great railroads, or those who have been for some time out of work on account of the cessation of such employment. All these should be considered in this connection.

In times of depression people are always looking around for some one or some thing to blame. In this particular case the blame has been largely placed upon the railroads. I agree entirely with the previous speaker, the hon. member for North Bruce, that our railways have not lost business in as large a proportion as many other trades. It is true our railway business has fallen from $477,000,000 per year to $260,000,000 per year in three years, but I would like to inquire what business has not fallen off more than that. Especially the external trade both of this country and every other civilized country has fallen in a much greater proportion. The previous speaker instanced the pulp and paper industry. Before the depression it was a good industry, distributed over the country at various places, and making money. Unfortunately like our railways it was exploited, we had mergers, plants were purchased by the syndicate and closed, far larger plants were built than were required at that time or than will be required for many years to come, and as a result the investing public in Canada lost hundreds of millions in that enterprise. Take the steel industry or the lumber industry, you find that in those trades there is less than 15 per cent of the business there was in the boom time, whereas the railways still have 54 per cent.

I might state, from a non-political viewpoint, the situation as it appears to me. Previous to the amalgamation of the roads in the national system, I was a member of this house. I remember well previous to the war we were forced to find scores of millions of dollars almost every year, if not every year, to keep two of the railroads afloat, I refer to the Grand Trunk and Canadian Northern. Very large amounts, my recollection is about $30,000,000 a year, were being voted by parliament as loans, never repaid, to these two roads in order to keep them afloat. This went on during the war, until as has been pointed out very ably by the Minister of Railways and the Prime Minister, these investments became larger and eventually we were forced to take over the roads. And this expenditure has gone on ever since. I am not talking politically when I say that during the last ten years very large amounts of money have been expended upon this system, which were unwisely spent, very unwisely spent. As a result the interest charges have been mounting from year to year, and you have the present situation. Personally I believe it is only a question of time, we hope a short time, until this road will be in a very different position. There is no doubt we have a good railroad, there is no doubt that even in less than normally prosperous times the road would pay, and the people of Canada instead of going into their pockets to pay deficits would have some little surplus. There is no question in my mind that that will be true in time to come.

Some people believe, and the view has been strongly urged in some sections of the press, that there should be a recapitalization of this railway. I submit that this would make practically no difference to the public. It makes no difference to us as Canadians whether the capitalization of this road is $1 or $1,000,000 or $1,000,000,000. We are the sole stockholders; the benefits, if any, and the trouble, if any, will be ours in any event. For bookkeeping purposes probably it is desirable to fix some capitalization, but it would have no effect on present circumstances.

As I said, we know that during the past years there has been extravagance, both on the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. Wages reached a very high level, salaries were high, we know that in the case of the Canadian National there were a score of men who received a greater salary than the Prime Minister of Canada, and some of them a larger salary than the President of the United States of America. Those were the circumstances. Then, as I said before, we had the hotels, the steamship lines and the large terminals which were not necessary either then or now.

Lately, Mr. Speaker, the cry has changed; both the railways and the public demand economy. I should like to point out that the first economy practised was one which was highly undesirable in many ways; it was the cutting down of railway services even before the last crash. Then we had the cutting down of wages, which was opposed by many people, and perhaps it was unfortunate that the railways should have been among the first to take that action. The next step was the dismissal of many men, and I believe that in many cases the number of employees was reduced unnecessarily. No one can convince me that two section men can do as much work as four men, or that two men can look after seven miles of track as well as four men could look after five miles. Before the reduction in staff we had four section men to every four or five miles of track, on the average. First that number was reduced to three and ultimately to two. As a result we have thousands of men out of employment and we are gradually losing the permanent effectiveness of our railways. That was what occurred during the war. We did not have enough men to keep our tracks in good shape; as a consequence the ties over whole sections of the road became rotten, and ultimately they had to be replaced at a cost of millions of dollars. The roads are alike in this regard. I should like to point out that when trade revives and traffic increases we should not expect these expenses to be kept down. Twenty trains cannot be run with ten crews. These railwaymen will be reemployed as traffic increases, and the same is true of the men who look after the maintenance of the road-beds, the men in the shops and so on. We hope the expenses of the railways will be heavier to-morrow than they are to-day and still heavier next year, because that will show that business is reviving and traffic increasing.

I think it would be very desirable to impress upon these trustees not only the necessity for making every possible saving—and no doubt a great deal can be done in that way—but also that this saving should not be made at the expense of the working men to a greater extent than is necessary, because I believe it is well to keep these men at hand.

Mr. NEILL: May I interrupt? If we pass this legislation it will be impossible to impress anything on the trustees; they will be entirely independent.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is my hon. friend's opinion, but I think probably they will be human, and if matters are represented to them in a proper way I think action will be taken.

Now I should like to say a word or two with regard to the amalgamation of these roads. In common with most hon. members who have spoken during this debate I am entirely opposed to any amalgamation. I am opposed also to unification of any kind. In my own mind I am quite satisfied that there is no demand for amalgamation by the people of Canada; on the other hand I believe they are quite opposed to it. I am even more sure that it is opposed by the employees of both railways, from the men in charge at the top down to the men who work along the tracks. I should like to read just a few words from the evidence given before the commission by Mr. Hungerford, the present head of the Canadian National Railways, who has been a railway man for over forty-five years. In reply to a question by Lord Ashfield, Mr. Hungerford said:

> . . . I think it is in the general interest, in view of the fact that these two railways exist at the present time, that they should be continued as separate institutions and allowed to compete, one with the other, with a certain measure of restriction against unreasonable development, but still maintaining the principle of competition.

Later on, speaking of the appointment of the trustees, he said:

> . . . the appointment of somebody—or at least some commission being endowed with power more or less to supervise and to prevent ridiculous developments.

Evidently he believed there had been ridiculous developments in the past. Later on he said:

> I believe a very large proportion of all the real economies that can be secured at all can be secured under separate operation; and the comparatively slight difference between the degree of economy that can be secured from separate operation as compared with that under amalgamation would be more than offset by the obvious disadvantages of amalgamation which I have referred to.

Now I should like to say a few words with regard to the question I raised in my opening remarks; I should like to speak on behalf of the customers of these roads. It is very easy for a man to get up in this house and say there are six or eight trains daily between Ottawa and Montreal and to say they are necessary because two are transcontinental trains, two are express trains and the other two stop just here and there, that they take different routes and so on. I know of a case in the province of Ontario where there was good railway service for many years, with an express and a local train each day. Now they have a train twice a week, consisting of one car attached to a way freight. I imagine this car has been in the service for from fifty to a hundred years, at least. It has no lighting system except oil lamps, just enough to let you know daylight from dark; it has no heating system but an old stove in the centre, and you have to keep your overcoat on if it is at all chilly.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it full of passengers?

Mr. ARTHURS: I guess there are some. The point is that these passengers must pay exactly the same rate for tickets that is paid by the man who travels between Ottawa and Montreal. On the one hand, however, you have the very best accommodation and the most up-to-date rolling-stock, while on the other hand the accommodation is practically non-existent. I quite agree that in some cases we have had greater service than was required, but in many cases they have gone too far in their desire for economy. You cannot blame these men if, when they have a chance to ride on a bus, they inevitably do so in preference to the railway. The same thing is true with regard to short freight hauls. I have been in business for many years. Even in the old days when we had a good way freight service it took from two to three days to get a parcel of goods from a place perhaps twenty miles away. I see no reason why the railways could not give us decent accommodation, perhaps by attaching one or two freight cars to a passenger train. In that way they would keep in with their customers and would do something at least to check the inroads of the motor trucks.

I am entirely in favour of this bill, Mr. Speaker, but I do think one or two amendments might well be made. Later on when the bill is in committee I will direct attention to one or two improvements I think might be made in the bill whereby these trustees shall not have the power either to tear up any branch or to lease any part of the Canadian National Railways for over five years without the consent of parliament. I think that is a very necessary clause to insert in the bill. We have roads right in Ontario, the old Great Western, a part of the Grand Trunk railway, which is practically owned by them under a ninety-nine year lease, and there are many other roads throughout the continent of America which are practically in the same condition, and I do not believe that any men, one, three or twenty, should have the power to sell the assets of the Dominion of Canada without the consent of parliament. There is another thing to which I would direct attention. In the case of any dispute coming before the tribunal, in which the public are interested, as manifestly they will be in some of these cases, they should have the right to appear before the tribunal and state their case.

With these two exceptions I am in favour of the bill and I will certainly vote for the second reading.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): The excellent example in moderation given this afternoon by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), and the equally excellent example set the other day by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) and, previously, by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), I will endeavour to follow in discussing the bill now before the house. I will try to be as moderate and temperate as may be consistent with bringing out the facts as I see them. I am sure the Minister of Railways will sympathize with me if I do not attain to that high eminence reached by the hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred, because it must have taken one of them—the Minister of Railways—at least an effort to reach that commendable height.

Let me say at the outset that I do not like this bill. The more I think of it the less I think of it, and that is not meant to be a paradox at all. I should like to support it though, just the same as I should like to have supported the Anglo-Canadian agreement; but I cannot do so. There is one good feature about it which I would mention, and that is the reduction of the board of directors to three—call them what you like, trustees, directors or anything else. There was never one appointed from Saskatchewan or Alberta on the old board, and I think we should be given some credit for not having made the board nineteen instead of seventeen. There was a weakness in too large a board, and there is almost as great a weakness in one that is too small. As someone put it, out of seventeen men you might find three who were all right, but it you got three dubs or violent anti-public ownership men to start with our position would be rather unenviable. If you could get one man to perform the duties of the office, a man in whom all the people of Canada had confidence, it might be better still than having three; it would be a shorter cut anyway. However, no such super-individual exists that I know of. I have no faith in all this talk about super-men; to use an old expression, there ain't no such crittur. I have no objection to three; I think it is a move in the right direction. Apart from these preliminary remarks, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that my encomiums on behalf of the bill will be very limited.

As regards the Duff commission, that was a good move; it was an evidence that both the great presidents realized that there was something ahead which they had to prepare for. Naturally Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty would know more about the financial situation of the railways than we do, and in anticipation of the worst happening they were both favourable to a commission being appointed to investigate all phases of the situation in the hope of bringing about reductions in operating costs and so on, in the light of rapidly disappearing tonnage. I think that was all right. No doubt the first object of the commission was to set forth the situation as they saw it in their report, and in the second place I do not doubt that they entertained the hope that a certain educational value would be derived from the investigation, whereby the people of Canada might be guided to an acceptance of the best possible solution and one which would justify the investigation. A commission of any kind, even if its object is only to bring out the facts with a view to guiding the people along the best path, is worth while. The people of this country, however—and I suppose the same thing is true of other countries—will not take kindly to too much guidance, and when there is cause for suspicion they refuse to be guided at all. All the pamphleteering and all the after dinner speechmaking and such like seemed to tend to some form of amalgamation or joint operation, and the people of Canada were so irrevocably opposed to amalgamation that they did not take some features of the Duff commission very seriously, although the advice and information given by the commission were well meant. If we do not travel along the direction of the Duff commission they must not think it is a reflection on them. They did good service, as they saw the railway situation, and I have no reason to doubt their bona fides. Nor is any opposition to this bill to be regarded as a reflection on the Senate. We have often disagreed with the Senate before, and it seems to have been coming to life recently. I believe there is another bill under consideration there, a bill of some nine hundred sections, and I can only express the hope that they do not throw it at us this session.

There seems to be a disposition in some quarters to make a sort of goat of Sir Henry Thornton and a martyr of the Canadian Pacific. There is no necessity for anyone taking either of these extreme positions. Some people are blaming the Canadian National Railways for almost everything; yet that railway system is in a better position relatively than most of us sitting in this chamber compared to what we were three or four years ago. I question whether the status of the Canadian National is not better relatively than that of the Canadian Pacific today. I am an admirer of the Canadian Pacific Railway; I think it is the best-managed and equipped privately operated road in the world. I never had a dollar's worth of stock in this great railway enterprise, although I have often wished I had, so that anything I might say in the way of criticism of that system should not be regarded as being prejudiced one way or the other. I have great faith in its ability to come back if there is nothing inserted in this bill to hinder it. What I object to very much, however, is the practice of singling out the Canadian National system as if it were the chief sinner and making it carry all the sins of the many. And that is what is being done. Nothing is said about there being too many cotton mills in Canada; too many paper mills; too many mines; too many motor car factories, although a great many such concerns are closed down; too many agricultural implement manufacturers, notwithstanding that many warehouses and shops are largely closed. And, by the way, no one talks about too many branch banks, a number of which have for lack of business been closed, to the great inconvenience, it is true, of those who were locally served, while some bank managers are operating two or three banks running along a line of railway. Nothing is said about all these but we hear a good deal about the Canadian National Railways having built too many hotels and branch lines. The commission even thought that it was bedevilled by local public opinion and pressure. But how are you to smother public opinion and the right of communities to be heard on railway and other matters?

Let me refer for a moment to branch lines. I do not believe that this country is overbuilt with branch lines. I am one who suffered for twenty years for the want of a branch line, and when I came to this parliament one of the first objects to which I dedicated myself was to help those who were situated as I had been for some twenty years and to try to get them the branch line service they so badly needed. I did not confine my efforts to the Canadian National. Before I entered any legislature I spent much time with my neighbours trying to prevail upon the Canadian Pacific to provide a branch line for our district. This was long before I was ever heard of outside of my own community.

I well remember that noble old railway friend, the late Sir William Whyte, the greatest railway friend the farmers of the west ever had, Whyte by name and white by nature. We went to him and placed our case before him knowing that if there were any good in it, and traffic present and prospective permitted it, he would do everything possible to meet our wishes. Are we to be denied that right? Are we going to shut up the Canadian National in a hermetically sealed box where no one can see it or appeal to it? The men who are operating this railroad should be strong enough to resist pressure not warranted by the facts or the traffic or the particular request made. We cannot put anyone or any great public service in seclusion and have it be of proper service to the country. We have to be a part of the world if we are going to be of full usefulness to it.

People are harping about too many branch lines, but I want to say that I struck out in 1882, four hundred miles ahead of any railway. There was not a foot of railway line west of Portage la Prairie when I struck out with a yoke of oxen towards the setting sun for four hundred miles. We had the main line, of course, that fall, but we had to wait twenty years before we got our branch line. How much longer should I have waited before making representations for a branch line? Should I have been so modest as not to look at a railway magnate? I found them to be quite approachable when I did become acquainted with them. That applies not only to Sir William Whyte but to many other officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I found them to be rational and reasonable men, and the same applies to the officers of the Canadian National. All this balderdash which we hear about the evil of community pressure is simply the bunkum of people who have not suffered as I and thousands of others have suffered on the prairies and elsewhere. Many of these frontier people are still waiting for branch lines. If I am spared long enough I intend to do my utmost to help the man on the frontier, the man who has blazed the trail for those who will follow. Does not all Canada, does not Australia, does not South Africa owe its development to the pathfinders and the trail blazers who went to the frontiers to build homes? These men are worthy of the very best of attention and service.

We will pass on to some other fallacies. Sir Henry Thornton's name has been mentioned as one to be honoured. The hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) said that the time would come when he would be honoured, and the hon. member for North Bruce said that doubtless he was honoured now. I do not know what others are going to say, but the way Sir Henry has been treated reminds me of Mark Antony's speech when Julius Caesar was murdered by Brutus and a few others like him. Yesterday Sir Henry was sought after by the foremost men of the land, he was welcomed in any company; to-day "there are none so poor to do him reverence." Yesterday he was sought as the guest speaker for the finest banquet of the land; to-day he and the National railway are looked upon by too many as "the old man of the sea." Yesterday the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) was wanting to claim the Canadian National as his own baby; to-day the evidence is not lacking that the government would like to get rid of the Canadian National as expeditiously as they got rid of its head.

Mr. McGIBBON: We have $922,000,000 more debt than you had.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend was quite moderate in his speech and he should let me try to be the same.

It is pretty hard to touch new ground in discussing this bill as it has been mauled around so much, and quite properly so. My conception of the Canadian National is that it is the people's railway. No less an authority than the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) says that it is the bondholders' railway, but I should like to know when the foreclosure took place. As long as the interest is paid by the government, the mortgage cannot be foreclosed. I wonder what we would call this statement of the Prime Minister if we were not trying to be moderate? I have no name to suggest and I leave it to every hon. member to think out for himself.

I do not like the idea of these two dictatorial boards. If you get into trouble with one it will be like jumping from the frying pan into the fire to go to the other for redress. The arbitral board will consist of practically one man, the chairman of the board of Railway Commissioners. He may prove to be such a biased arbitrator that those who appear before the trustee board will never appear before the arbitral board. Imagine going with a dispute to a one-man biased board! I do not know the chairman personally, all I know is that he is not necessarily a railway authority. He will have to rely upon the evidence adduced before him by the two railways, who will have the best lawyers they can possibly obtain. His decisions must be based upon the evidence. I have been a magistrate a long time and I know that decisions must be given according to the evidence and the value that can be placed upon such evidence. I pity anyone who is placed in the position of adjudicating upon a technical question about which he knows nothing. I do not know whether or not the present head of the railway commission is a practical railwayman, but if he is not there will not I think be many references made to that arbitral board.

Why do we object to the appointments to the trustee board being made by the government? With the appointment history of the party opposite we know that only such men as will carry out the will of the government will likely be appointed. That is possibly only natural. Certainly they will not be appointed to go contrary to the will of the government. What is the will of the government in connection with the Canadian National? Many hon. members present will remember the Prime Minister's first budget speech when he held forth with all the eloquence at his command upon the alleged terrible condition of the Canadian National. He grew quite red in the face, almost as red as a bubbly-jock, if the house knows what that is. He spoke with vehemence and almost with venom, and then pretended that his words were the words of a friend. I cannot imagine anyone speaking about an institution with which he was friendly and using the tone of voice the Prime Minister used at that time. Hon. members can read Hansard of that day—June 1, 1931. I do not take particular exception to the facts as recited, although it was assembled in the worst possible manner for the Canadian National Is that a friendly attitude? Not then nor since then have I heard any words from the Prime Minister which could be construed as being friendly to the Canadian National.

What about the branch line building programs for the Canadian National which the Liberal government brought down when we were sitting on the other side of the house? I draw the attention of the house particularly to the building program presented by the Hon. Mr. Dunning when he was Minister of Railways. No complaints were ever registered by the then opposition against the proposed expenditures; if there was any criticism against the programs of the Liberal government, especially during its later years, it was because we were not building more branch railway lines. It will be recalled that Mr. Dunning played a big part in controlling both railways in their attempt to build lines in Alberta and Saskatchewan which would be duplicating lines. The present government wants to absolve itself from all this responsible work by handing everything over to a board about which we do not know anything except that it will be appointees of a government in which there is little public confidence left. After these Liberal branch line railway programs were brought down and fully discussed and approved unanimously in this house, invariably in another place that we cannot name the bills were slaughtered without the slightest hesitation whatever in 1924 or 1925. I have travelled over the route of these proposed railways during the parliamentary recess and have seen them for myself. I motored for several hundreds of miles along the route of one in which I was not personally interested whatever except as a citizen of Saskatchewan, and at that time I was the only representative from Saskatchewan on the Liberal side of the house. But all that railway legislation was slaughtered in another place, and naturally that stirred my ire against that other place. It showed me not only where that other place stood but where the then leader of the opposition in this house stood, the gentleman who is now in that other place as the bull moose thereof. That is the reason, Mr. Speaker, we are afraid of this board, because the record of the Conservative party has always been against the National railways with one notable exception, and that is when they started first to take over the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific, and they left the roads with two heads and two staffs quarrelling for preference. If anyone ever performed a superhuman task it was Sir Henry Thornton in bringing the two railways out of the miry clay in which they were foundering and setting them on a solid rock foundation looking to a better day, and he did introduce a better day for the National railways until the world calamity befell the National railways like it befell everything else. Why, Sir Henry Thornton was not long enough in the saddle to warm it before the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) had his harpoon into him up to the hilt. You remember, Mr. Speaker, what he said about the Scribe hotel in Paris, which afterwards turned out to be a good investment. The present leader of the government has nothing on the then leader of the opposition for scathing denunciation of the National railways, for there was nothing left unsaid against Sir Henry Thornton and the National railways, and this in spite of the fact that the then leader of the opposition had claimed the Canadian National Railways as his own infant at the outset, but denounced it when it seemed to be under a cloud.

What further reason have I for doubting the personnel of this board of trustees? The government has thought it wise to call them trustees, because they say the condition of the roads is tantamount to being in a receivership. How is that ever going to help the market for Canadian Pacific Railway shares? See the suggestion contained in that! It is not fair to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have no interest in the Canadian Pacific Railway except that I am a great admirer of it. It is well said that a tree is known by its fruits, not by its blossoms and leaves, although both are necessary to fruition; and we must judge of the appointments that are about to be made by the government by the ones which it has made in the past. I know I am getting on delicate ground for a moderate address, and I will go easy. All I will ask the house to do is to recall some of the earlier major appointments by this government and the very last appointment. In view of those appointments, are we likely to consider that the government will set up an impartial trustee board? By their fruits ye shall know them, and we know their fruits, and we know the government, by this time, and that is the reason we are suspicious. Yes, I am suspicious. I am not so simple minded as to put all that uneviable record to one side and expect that everything is now going to be all right. It may be that we shall get a surprise when this board is appointed. Maybe it will be composed of three fair-minded, impartial men, whom all will approve, and just because there is about one chance in a thousand of that happening I am less severe at this time than I otherwise would be. I hope we shall get such a surprise. Assuming that we get such a board, the three best men available in Canada, without any prejudices at all, I do not ask that they must be predisposed towards the National railways, like some other hon. member has suggested. All I ask is that they be fair to the Canadian National Railways. But assuming that we get such a board, how much better is the situation going to be from the government's standpoint than obtains now with voluntary cooperation between the two roads?

This question of compulsory cooperation is one upon which people differ honestly. If I recollect aright, a number of the officials of the Canadian National Railways opposed strongly the idea of compulsory cooperation on the ground that it was impossible, that the two words "compulsion" and "cooperation" were antagonistic to each other. The same question arose in connection with the wheat pools, where the first question that we came up against was whether we should have a compulsory or a voluntary pool. Compulsory cooperation? Well, Mr. Speaker, I have seen decisions of judges of the western courts that there was no such animal as compulsory cooperation, and that there could not be, that compulsion was antagonistic to the conception of cooperation, that they were not in any sense complementary to each other, but that one was the very antithesis of the other. That is the position that I have taken for twenty years, and it is the position that Saskatchewan and the west generally takes to-day. Compulsory cooperation would be a very dangerous experimental step to take and might have the very opposite effects from those hoped for.

I was delighted to hear the minister express his belief in a better day coming, and then he went on to say how finely our two railroads were getting along with voluntary cooperation, and what economies were being made. He said that he did not believe that there was a road on this continent which could make a better showing than these two railway systems in Canada had done in the matter of effecting economies during the last two or three years. Well, there are times when good enough should be left alone. It is not a very good slogan, in normal times, I admit, but just now it is a good slogan. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if in your pioneer days you ever had the experience of driving oxen, or a horse and a mule, or a pony and a cow. Well, you have some manouevring to get them to go together at all, and if you finally do get them to work together satisfactorily, just leave them that way and don't be monkeying with them any more. Here are two great rivals in the railway world, and if they are cooperating voluntarily and to good purpose, my advice would be to just let them be until they show some evidence of not wanting to cooperate. Why are they cooperating? Wild horses could not keep them from cooperating now because adversity is driving them to it; their very life depends upon it; and as long as they are bringing about these economies by voluntary methods, I say it is much better to let them go along that way and wait until they show some disposition not to cooperate before we step in and try to compel them, a change that in my opinion might only be for the worse. It will not take long to find that out, but it will be quite a while before this depression is over and they cease cooperating by voluntary methods. Necessity, I repeat, will compel them to do so for several years, as well as public sentiment. Therefore I am absolutely opposed to this absurd idea of compulsory cooperation, particularly when it is admitted that no one can hope for anything better under compulsory cooperation than we are getting to-day under voluntary cooperation. Then why disturb the present relationship between the two railway systems? They are cooperating now voluntarily because it is mutually necessary and beneficial and they cannot afford to do otherwise. We find throughout Canada a replica of the same condition among our people. Men who years ago held old grudges against other men are to-day shaking hands with each other, neighbouring with each other. They are saying, "If there is anything wrong with your binder come over to my junk pile and you may have anything you can root out of it." We are doing that for each other, to save buying repairs. So far as I know, that condition runs all through society to-day. It certainly obtains among the farmers, and we see it even between our competing railways although it is not quite so much in evidence.

Therefore I am opposed to all the features of the bill to which I have referred,—both boards and that feature concerning compulsory arbitration.

Mr. MANION: Outside of that you agree with it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, outside of that I agree. I tell you right now, my major regret in connection with this bill is that I have not a thousand votes to record against it.

Mr. McGIBBON: That hardly seems enough.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I believe it will be a disturber of the peace. In respect of the people's railway we are abdicating in favour of two boards; thus betraying the trust reposed in us as the real trustees of this railway property. The whole country is being advertised as bankrupt, in order to justify this legislation, and as if this depression were to be permanent.

I have a few words to say concerning the surgical operation to which the Prime Minister referred. The hon. member for North Bruce said the Prime Minister's illustration was not very apt. According to the Prime Minister when a disease is deep seated, in order to get the cankers out by the roots the operation must be correspondingly deep. Well now, the government began its operation by taking Sir Henry's head off; what further necessity was there for sending him to a hospital. I think my own colleague's simile was a little out of line, because certainly when Sir Henry had his head off he did not need further hospital care. In my view that is the tragedy; don't make any mistake about it. If there ever was a superman on this North American continent, it was Sir Henry Thornton. I had not been in the 1921 election campaign very long before I found there were two classes of people on whom I had to keep my weather eye. I dare not discuss railway matters with either of them without getting into trouble with the other one. One was the Canadian Northern staff and the other was the Grand Trunk staff. That condition entirely disappeared long ago, thanks to the leadership and prestige of Sir Henry Thornton. If there is another man in Canada who could have done that, I don't know where he is. He did it in very short order, inside of three or four years. We make no apologies for the selection of Sir Henry Thornton; we were and still are proud of him. Why? Because he has shown the Canadian National Railways can be put on their feet; we have shown the way to do it. We responded to the demand for no political interference. In response to public appeal we exercised as little as possible interference, consistent with good business. But, do not make any mistake about it; in nearly every railway building program laid before the Liberal Minister of Railways something had to be cut out before the money was asked from parliament.

I make that statement because the Prime Minister indicated in one of his speeches—not the one he made yesterday—that there was not a capital outlay asked for by the Canadian National which was refused by the old government of that day. That is not correct. Lots of them were cut out. There were many adjustments also in regard to the program of building lines that the public knew nothing about, and some the public did know something about. Supposing we get this super-board, what will be the result? Results will depend on the attitude the board adopts. Good results could come from a super-board such as the one suggested, if they are brought about by conciliation and not by compulsory measures. However that, I repeat, depends entirely on the personnel of the board.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the house to take it from me—I don't know whether they will or not—that in matters of administration by the board of stewards there are a hundred ways of throwing favours to the one railway and against the other. Indications are at present that freight is switching from the Canadian National to the Canadian Pacific. In that connection I should like the Minister of Railways to make an investigation so that he may make a statement thereon when we are discussing his estimates. I have been making some inquiries, and although I do not like to make definite statements, because my information may not be accurate, I have learned that whereas in 1930 the freight per mile carried by the Canadian National System surpassed that carried by the Canadian Pacific, to-day the Canadian Pacific is very considerably ahead. The same applies to passenger traffic. Has that occurred by accident, or by design? That condition has arisen without a board.

Mr. MANION: If the hon. member will permit me I should like to reply that I do not believe the Canadian Pacific is ahead of the Canadian National in regard to any type of traffic. The Canadian National has been handling the greater proportion of the traffic throughout, and is still handling about the same proportion.

Mr. MANION: I will.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know business can be thrown one way or the other. Ministers and their friends and staffs can give a fair share of their personal travel to the Canadian National; that has been done. It could have been thrown the other way, if we had liked. The same applies to freight. There was one condition with which I was never quite satisfied when the late government held office, namely, the relative amount of cross-Canada mails carried by these two great transcontinental railways.

Mr. MANION: I have the figures now, if the hon. member would like to hear them.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It all depends on what time I have left to speak.

Mr. MANION: The figures bear out what I said, namely, that the Canadian National does the greater business.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like to have it on Hansard, but I do not know how much time I have left.

Mr. MANION: I shall ask the Speaker to allow the hon. member as many more minutes as he wishes to have.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have never had that offered me before, so I acquiesce gladly.

Mr. MANION: The figures I have before me show the gross operating revenues for the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways, and are as follows:

Year—	Canadian National	Canadian Pacific
1925	$244,971,203	$201,176,745
1926	266,187,825	217,359,680
1927	268,704,294	221,420,916
1928	304,591,268	251,567,043
1929	290,496,979	233,339,514
1930	250,368,998	196,211,626
1931	200,505,162	154,963,411

Unfortunately I have not the figures for the Canadian Pacific for 1932, but I am informed they are in the same proportion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thank the minister for the information he has given. However I hope he will not take exception when I state that on one hand his figures may mean a lot and on the other they may not mean very much. I think they have to be worked out on an index basis in order to get a real comparison. I was going to point out that there are so many ways of causing the Canadian National to go back and its rival to go forward, if this trustee board so desired. I think everyone will agree to that. It altogether depends upon their attitude. I am not suggesting that they should be ardent advocates of public ownership, all I suggest is that they should be fair to it, not be prejudiced against the national road nor the Canadian Pacific. Let us see what would happen. If my suspicions—they are suspicions only, if you like, but, as indicated already, mighty well founded—if my suspicions be justified, and if the national road goes back with regard to its relative passenger service or with regard to the volume of its relative freight service, it will go back and back and back until there is nothing but a decrepit emaciated skeleton of a railway left, and then no one will want it except at a song and the people of Canada in desperation may then want someone to take it off their hands on whatever terms are obtainable. I take the ground that no man and no government, much less this government, should put itself under suspicion as they have done in this bill. I used to think in my youth that I could take any course I liked, no matter how suspicious it looked, not caring for the opinion of my friends. But I have come to the conclusion that no man, especially no public man, can afford to do that. I would say to the government that no matter how great their leader—and he is a great man in many respects, except in the one respect of properly governing Canada; he is a great orator; he has the greatest power of invective I ever heard; it is good for us that we are getting thick in the skin or he would have it all off us—but I say that even he, and I feel sure he is an honourable man, cannot afford to put himself under the suspicion that he is under in my mind and in that of thousands of others in handing over our great railway property to these two unknown boards appointed by himself, to do with it practically as they please.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues have very well covered the ground from the labour standpoint. I agree with them that provision for displaced employees should be the first charge on the savings resulting from the proposed change. I would further urge that this bill should go before the committee on railways and canals; it is an important bill, the details of which should have full consideration, fuller consideration than can possibly be given by the committee of the whole. It seems to me that there is no reason why we should simply take the conclusion of the Senate committee without ourselves giving ample opportunity for the very fullest discussion.

As we all know, the roads of this country were built to serve the people. I submit that the present legislation indicates that the people from now on are destined to serve the railroads. The railroads in Canada were built in the first place to make this dominion a possibility. We could not possibly have brought into one legislative unity a territory so vast as this without having good means of communication. Further than that, in the earlier days of the settlement of the west the railroads were undoubtedly built for colonization purposes. Large communities grew up alongside of these railroads, and I submit that the settlers must not be left stranded. We are asked to think of these railroads now entirely in terms of business, whereas they were constructed in the first place to serve the needs of the people, that is for the purposes other than strictly profit making.

This problem is being considered in isolation from other problems, but we cannot possibly solve the railroad problem in Canada apart from the solution of our other economic problems. It has been stated that the railroads are strangling business, are a heavy burden on the people of the country. I would point out that it might more truly be said that business—or the lack of business—is strangling the railroads. If the government would adopt policies which would lead to a larger amount of trade I think there is no doubt that to a considerable extent the railroad problem would be solved.

In this discussion, and in the report, attention is centred on the Canadian National Railways. The minister himself asserts that the Canadian National is directly our problem. May I suggest that the Canadian Pacific Railway is equally our problem; you cannot separate the one from the other. In either case it is the public that pays. May I call attention to the enormous amount that was spent by the Dominion of Canada on the Canadian Pacific railway? In a return brought down about two years ago it was indicated that the total outlay of the dominion on the Canadian Pacific railway as far as the Department of Railways and Canals had record has been $88,822,471.70, and that in addition there is an item of $10,189,521 referred to by the bureau of statistics tabulated report for 1925 as having been paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for lines relinquished. There is also the question of land grants, stated by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to amount to 24,953,133 acres. In addition to that enormous advantages were gained by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company throughout the years in having their lands exempt from taxation, and also in the subsidies which have been given in various ways, such as mail contracts and so on, and the practical guarantee of high freight rates made possible through the Board of Railway Commissioners. In all these ways the Canadian Pacific has received huge grants and an enormous amount of assistance from the Canadian people, and it seems most unfair that we should centre attention upon the one railroad called the Canadian National.

Take the question of extravagance. The Duff report at page 21 says that there was intense rivalry between the two systems in new territory. Again it says:

> The development of this territory did not meet expectations, and the railways now find themselves with additional traffic mileage and an increased burden of capital charge.

Take the question of hotels. As at December 31, 1931, the Canadian National hotel investment was $31,828,234, whereas the Canadian Pacific hotel investment was $71,148,772, considerably over double. If there was extravagance on one road, there was also extravagance on the other, and as I have said, it is always the public that ultimately pays.

In his speech the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) eulogized the present board of directors, but he did not say why, if the board had done such excellent work, his bill should provide for the scrapping of the board and the setting up of an entirely new arrangement. He complimented the present management on the decrease in operating costs, which in 1932 amounted to $44,000,000 or 112 per cent. He took the trouble to point out where these savings had been made —in the higher salaries, in travelling expenses, club dues, radio and legal services, and advertising, a saving amounting to $4,000,000. After all, that amounts to but a very small proportion of the total saving of $44,000,000. I think it is safe to say that the greater part of that sum was saved by reductions in wages.

Mr. MANION: And reductions in traffic.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, partly through a reduction in traffic. The reduction in passenger service was estimated at $8,000,000, but I submit that in reality this means largely a reduction in wages. There is a certain saving on the amount of coal used, but I think something like 67 per cent of the entire operating expenditure is taken up by wages.

Mr. MANION: Of course that is quite right, but they cannot pay wages if there is not enough traffic to provide work for the men.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am just pointing out that to a large extent this reduction has been made by reducing wages, reducing staffs and putting men on part time work.

Mr. MANION: I was only mentioning these special economies of the higher staffs.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In his speech yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) made this entirely a financial problem. I cannot agree with that. The whole of our Canadian development has conformed to the development of railways; settlement all through the west has largely followed the extension of the railway lines into new territory. The Prime Minister suggests that it is time for plain speaking, and then he enunciates his conception of the situation. I think I am being fair to the right hon. gentlemen when I put his argument into three propositions. The first is that the road belongs to the investors, and the right hon. gentleman pointed out that these investors were scattered over Canada, the United States, Great Britain, Europe and even Asia. The Prime Minister says the people do not own the road but that at best they own only the equity of redemption. If the road is indeed bankrupt I suppose that means that since we have no assets the people own the right to pay the debts. I take it that this is practically what is involved.

The Prime Minister's second proposition is that the road is bankrupt. It is not going through any bankruptcy court; the proposals in the bill suggest a very much different line than bankruptcy proceedings. Then the third proposition is that the dominion and the provinces cannot default. The Prime Minister says this is the time for plain speaking, so in this case I should like to ask why not? Bankruptcy is a process devised so that a debtor shall not remain forever a hopeless slave. The Jews had a very good way of accomplishing this; every fifty years they declared that the debtors should go free. It is against all sense of equity that people should remain forever in slavery. I submit that although developments along national lines are very recent, we are beginning to witness a somewhat similar process being worked out with regard to national and international affairs. A few months ago there was great rejoicing when an international conference declared that reparations were practically at an end. What did that mean? It involved the repudiation of international obligations. France reduced her franc from approximately twenty cents to about four cents. What did that mean but the repudiation of a great part of her national obligation? I happened to be in Europe a little over a year ago when Great Britain went off the gold standard. In good faith I had invested a certain amount in English sovereigns, but suddenly I found myself deprived of 25 per cent of my English investment. That was a repudiation by Great Britain of her obligations to the extent of 25 per cent. In more recent years we had Great Britain notifying the United States that she could not continue to pay her war debts to that country. Again that was a repudiation of a solemn national obligation. Well, I submit that once we recognize that it is possible to repudiate international obligations such as these, we may very soon come to consider whether we must indefinitely retain the idea of the sacredness of all so-called national obligations.

An hon. MEMBER: Individual also?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not said anything about individual obligations; I was speaking of the repudiation of some of the so-called sacred national obligations. I agree with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) when he says this bill offers no permanent solution. It is a temporizing measure. We have been accustomed to think of royal commissions as being entirely impartial and above political considerations in the reports they present, but I think this report bears evidence of being political in character; that is, it brought in only such solutions as might be considered politically feasible.

Having laid down his general principles that the road belongs to the investors, that it is bankrupt and that the dominion and the provinces cannot default, the Prime Minister proceeded to outline his special device for meeting the situation. The trustees, he said, are in reality in the position of receivers. Strangely enough, however, the bondholders receive all the benefits of a solvent enterprise. That is the curious combination we have offered to us.

Mr. YOUNG: They are the receivers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, they are the receivers, if you like; they receive it all. The Prime Minister tells us we are to have all the benefits of a receivership but at the same time the road is to be kept in operation. He tried to frighten us by suggesting what would happen to the public if the road ceased to operate, and he also suggested the dire things that might happen the employees in such a contingency, but he did not say anything about what would happen to the investors if the road ceased to operate. It is impossible to think of this road ceasing operations; hence there is no use trying to frighten the public by referring to anything of that kind. In this case, as at the time the government took over the Canadian National, if this bill passes we are entering into an agreement by means of which we are trying to save a group of investors at the expense of the general public. Under a receivership, as we would deal with private debts, the investors might get fifty cents or thirty cents on the dollar, but under this arrangement we practically guarantee the investors a hundred cents on the dollar, even though it means that this parliament must give up all real control, and in addition undertake to pay all deficits. A few weeks ago a financial friend of mine suggested rather a good scheme, which I pass on for what it is worth. Why not exchange these bonds for shares, and pay dividends on the shares when the business warrants it? I do not see why one class of people should be entirely exempt from the exigencies which affect everyone else. Sooner or later we shall have to face the scaling down of the bonded indebtedness of this road, and I cannot see why at this stage we should enter into any arrangement that would reduce the people of Canada to almost perpetual slavery, slaving to pay the bondholders of the road.

Amalgamation has been proposed and it has been rejected by those responsible for the Duff report. Further than that, the Prime Minister has I take it given his guarantee that there will be inserted in this bill a clause to the effect that nothing in the measure shall be regarded as looking to amalgamation. Whether that is done or not, I do not think makes a great deal of difference. This is moving in the direction of amalgamation, and I would not condemn it for that reason because in my opinion, taking the long view, amalgamation of our roads is sooner or later inevitable. I would urge however that if and when that amalgamation comes it must be amalgamation under government and not under private ownership and control. What I fear in this bill is that the way may be opened so that possibly by degrees there may come an amalgamation under private ownership. It seems to me that when amalgamation comes it must be amalgamation not only of these two great railway systems but of all motor traffic, of all traffic by water and of all traffic by air, so that all these great systems of transportation and even of communication shall be correlated into one vast transportation organization. Sooner or later, I think, we must face some such development.

The present bill has been characterized by some as a socialist measure. There is perhaps some ground for saying that, but it is only in part socialist. It is a long step I submit towards the control of private corporations, and I do not much wonder that Mr. Beatty rather protests against a bill of this kind. Undoubtedly it is a long step in the direction of the control of private corporations. The thing I do not like about it, however, is that the kind of control proposed is not democratic. I agree with the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) and others when they say that we shall be setting up a virtual dictatorship. The appointment of this board of trustees will not be democratic; as pointed out time and again, they will be a self-perpetuating board whose removal will not be easy. Moreover, the powers of the board are very largely in the hands of one man, which means, as far as I can read the legislation, that we are setting up a virtual dictatorship.

A good deal of fault has been found with Sir Henry Thornton because he was too far removed from the control of parliament. He was probably as good a man as could have been selected, with a wide experience both in railroading and in public affairs; yet as time went on a great many hon. gentlemen in this house began to feel that he had been given too great latitude. In more recent years Sir Henry Thornton himself, with his staff, appeared before a special committee of this house to go over his estimates, and some thought that this was putting him in rather an undignified position, that he should be asked to discuss matters with parliament. But the protest came from both sides of the house in more recent years that he had altogether too free a hand, and that, I submit, has been the ground for such severe criticism of Sir Henry Thornton on the part of the present administration. Yet they are now proposing to place in the hands of one trustee power which is a great deal more autocratic than any at any time exercised by Sir Henry Thornton. I cannot see the logic of such an argument.

Since the bill is founded largely on the Duff report, we must examine the report to understand the purposes of the measures proposed. And here may I say a word with regard to the personnel. The commission itself was suggested by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and endorsed by Sir Henry Thornton, and the personnel of the commission might very well have been chosen by the former gentleman himself. The bondholders were well represented. As pointed out by my colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), however, Labour was not represented at all. It would seem that, with the large numbers of Labour men and officials who have made such a large contribution to the building up of this road, there should have been some representation on the commission from the people who actually know railroad affairs, but there was none whatever. The bondholders, I repeat, were well represented. More than that, several gentlemen on the commission were very decidedly private ownership men. One has only to read the evidence—I have not time to go into that to-day—to note the extreme bias, shall I say, of Mr. L. F. Loree, who again and again came out urging the most drastic cuts in the wages of the men and repeatedly pointing out the benefits of private ownership under which the road would not come under the review of the parliamentary authorities. And even the vice-president, Mr. Ruel, declared very definitely his belief in the advantages of private ownership. With this evidence before us I agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) that when the board of trustees is appointed there should be on that board men who are heartily in sympathy with the principle of public ownership, for only such men can be expected to make this great public ownership enterprise a success.

Let me comment briefly on the main considerations which the commissioners say they had in mind. First, they say, the identity of the two railway systems should be maintained. In my opinion this leaves the way open for further trouble. I think it was Lincoln who said, during the Civil war, that it was not possible to have a nation half slave and half free. I do not think it is possible permanently to have one half of our transportation system under private ownership and the other half under public ownership; one or the other must give way. So that this is a temporary expedient. In the second place, they say that the management of the national railways should be emancipated from political interference and community pressure. It seems to me that that is an expression of absolute despair with regard to parliamentary and democratic institutions. What is meant by the phrase "community pressure"? If it means that the people located out on the prairies fifty, one hundred or two hundred miles from a railway have no right to press their claims for railway services, then I say this is something we ought not to permit. Many of us who have lived through the pioneering days know what it is to have our friends far removed from any railway line. They were induced to go out there and year after year, sometimes decade after decade, they waited for railway services. They sacrificed the education of their children as well as their own immediate welfare in the hope that one day the railway would come. Is it meant that there must be no community pressure of that kind, no consideration given to the needs of local communities? Let me say again that in the first place these railways were constructed to serve the people and I protest against any change in policy that makes the first consideration that of providing dividends or guaranteeing profits to the bondholders.

Mr. MULLINS: Would the hon. member take away the savings of widows and orphans?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish the hon. gentleman would not bring up the widows and orphans to-day. I know he is thinking of some of the bonds held not by widows and orphans but by some other hon. gentleman. The widows and orphans always make a good smoke screen. I am as anxious as any hon. member in this house to protect the widows and orphans but I should like to ask the hon. member how he proposes under this bill to protect the widows and orphans of hundreds of thousands of railway employees.

Mr. MULLINS: By making the line a success.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What about the widows and orphans on the frontiers?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) says, what about the widows and orphans on the frontiers, and widows and orphans generally?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the house took recess I had been trying to point out that we in this corner are not opposed to labour saving devices or to economies in management or even to amalgamation, but we consider that the welfare of the workers and of the community and the rights of this parliament should be safeguarded. We believe that the care of the men displaced should be a first charge upon the savings effected, and that amalgamation, if and when it comes, should be under public ownership and should include not merely railway transportation but other transporation systems as well.

I further tried to point out that our roads were constructed in the first place to serve the people, but that under this bill, as I see it, the interests of the employees and of the public generally are to be subordinated to the interests of the bondholders. The Prime Minister explained that we should all sacrifice. Yes—all but the bondholders, who are not called upon to make any sacrifices at all. Indeed, it would seem as if the bill was primarily designed to bring about a condition under which the bondholders will receive one hundred per cent even though the road is declared by the Prime Minister to be bankrupt.

Mr. MANION: Would my hon. friend explain how he would go about dealing with the bondholders? I am a little puzzled at his remarks.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are various ways in which it could be done. As I said this afternoon, we recognize that under certain conditions, when a private concern is hopelessly insolvent some relief must be given. The concern goes through a formal process by which it passes into the hands of a receiver, and the creditors have to accept a certain percentage of their claims. But it is not proposed that this road should go through any process of that kind, even although the Prime Minister suggests that the trustees occupy the position of receivers. This afternoon, I made a concrete suggestion which I said had been given to me by a financial friend of mine, that we might possibly offer shares to the bondholders.

Mr. MANION: But they would not accept that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They might be forced to accept it, and in such a case it would mean that they would have been called upon or forced to sacrifice to the extent that the rest of the community has to sacrifice, just as they might enjoy prosperity when prosperity returns to the rest of the community.

Last summer I could not but think of the waste by duplication that has taken place in our transcontinental systems and also of some of the more remote consequences of this waste. I drove by car from Edmonton to Jasper over the right of way which has since been abandoned. The grade has been transformed in part into a highway. The steel rails are gone, the ties are gone, some of the bridges are gone, but the interest has still to be paid on these vanished bridges and ties and rails. In the construction of those roads many a man was killed, and in some instances these men were buried in the dump and their dependents got very little recompense. The workmen are gone, but the interest has still to be paid on the dynamite that killed them in their blasting work.

It seems to me that we are recognizing the claims of only one group in the community, and at that only a particular group of the creditors, the bondholders, and so arranging matters that they shall be the beneficiaries of the entire operations of the road.

I then proceeded to the report itself, and said that a study of it would give us some idea of the considerations which the commission had in view. Paragraph (II) of clause 202 of the report reads:

> The management of the national railways should be emancipated from political interference and community pressure.

It seems remarkable that nothing is said about the pressure that has been exerted in the past by promoters. Anyone who knows the history of Canadian railroads knows that there has been a great deal of that pressure upon parliament and upon governments right from the very first. There was, for instance, the old scandal in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway in the early days, and there were the scandals—I think them such—of the lobbies in connection with the old Canadian Northern. Everywhere pressure was brought to bear by private interests. In fact it is that pressure that has landed us where we are, and yet nothing whatever is said in this report about the pressure of private interests.

We are told that we must beware of political interference. Again let me say that the railroads themselves have been very glad to come to parliament in order to secure special privileges and grants and concessions, and now we are asked by these same roads—we were told that it was Mr. Beatty who had made the suggestion for the appointment of the commission, and this proposal was endorsed by Sir Henry Thornton—to place the railroads in such a position that they shall be free from what is termed political interference. It does seem to me that this clause in the report is a challenge to our parliament and to our so-called democratic institutions. If we are to adopt a dictatorship, let us do it with our eyes open; but we must remember the cost that it may impose upon the people of Canada.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

We have been witnessing a very strange development in recent years. The management of industrial and financial affairs has passed largely into the hands of a comparatively small group of people who are not in any sense responsible to the people. It would seem as if by this bill we are deliberately sanctioning that kind of thing and placing the control and management of one of our largest public utilities in the hands of a virtual dictator. Political interference! We are to take that as it stands it would seem that before very long parliament must abdicate. Already as we go over the estimates we find that a very large proportion of the expenditure comes under what is termed uncontrollable expenditure, and now we are about to erect a board which will also be entirely uncontrollable, because I take it that no machinery is set up that will give parliament any effective control over the operations of this proposed board of trustees.

Paragraph (III) says:

> Machinery should be provided for cooperation between the two systems for the elimination of duplicate services and facilities and the avoidance of extravagance.

May I say that while this sounds well, I am afraid that in practice it will not work out. As Mr. Beatty said in an address before the Canadian Club at Toronto, which has already been quoted in this house:

> If we were mistaken in our appreciation of the value of competition, or did not sufficiently realize the waste and losses it involved, and especially involved in railway competition between the government of Canada and a private company, should we perpetuate another fallacy on the assumption that we can have competition and cooperation, that we can struggle for conflicting interests and yet not conflict? Why delude ourselves into the belief that we are super-men, indifferent to the spirit that competition and contest provoke, that we can maintain our own traffic and revenues and yet divide them, that we can act like enemies and friends at the same time, and, lastly, that we can afford to do the things we cannot afford to do and perpetuate the waste we cannot afford to perpetuate.

Clause (iv) is as follows:

> The attainment of a scale of economies which will bring the burdens of the national system within reasonable dimensions and effectively check extravagant and costly operation.

Again this reads well; surely everyone is desirous of eliminating unnecessary expense. But we must read this in conjunction with the preceding section, which warns us against community pressure, which, in practice, may mean the needs of the local community. Then, section (v):

Reasonable protection for the privately-owned undertaking against arbitrary action by the publicly-owned undertaking which might unfairly prejudice the interests of the privately owned undertaking.

The whole point in the section lies in what is fair or unfair. As I said this afternoon, we here face the fundamental question whether or not it is possible for a privately owned concern to exist in the same field with a publicly owned concern. It seems to me that ultimately the privately owned concern will, by perhaps a slow process, take over the one owned by the public, or sooner or later the public concern will have to absorb the private one. I am afraid there is nothing in the provisions of this bill to safeguard the publicly owned system, and with a board and tribunal constituted as proposed it will inevitably mean that private interests will in time obtain control. With these considerations in view I cannot support the bill.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to understand how the passing of this bill could solve our railway problem. At page 53 of the Duff report we find listed the contributory causes of that problem; they are seven in number. Let us go over them briefly and endeavour, if we can, to see how the bill is designed to deal with them. Of the seven contributory causes the bill pretends to deal with only two, and in my opinion deals with them very ineffectively. The first contributory cause is given in the report as—

The over-development of railways beyond the immediate needs of the country.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the over-development of our railroads, the excess mileage, is due not to the management or mismanagement of our railroads, but to state policy. From time to time it has been the policy of this country to have railroads built. If after this depression lifts we have another boom; if once more settlers should flock into the untilled portions of Canada, the same policy will prevail. Will those settlers not demand railways? If we put the management of the national railways and that of the privately owned system beyond the reach of public influence where they cannot be persuaded to build lines they do not want to build, what will follow? The men who go in and pioneer the new parts of our country will not be deterred from demanding railway services because of any reorganization of our railway companies. New companies will be organized; new charters will be demanded, and the parliament of Canada will not refuse them.

The second contributory cause given in the Duff report is—

Aggressive and uncontrolled competition between two nation-wide railway enterprises, a competition the more disastrous in that one of the competitors was publicly owned and supported by the full resources of the dominion.

That is the one contributory cause for which this bill appears to have been designed; for that reason we shall pass it for the moment, and return to it later. The third case appearing in the report is—

The reactions of the world trade repression which began in 1929 and has progressively increased in its severity with each succeeding year.

In my opinion that is the chief contributory cause of our present railway problem.

Mr. HANBURY: Read it again.

Mr. YOUNG: I will:

The reactions of the world trade repression which began in 1929 and has progressively increased in its severity with each succeeding year.

In my opinion, as I have said, that is the chief contributory cause. There was no railway problem when there was plenty of tonnage; there was no railway problem when traffic and goods were moving. There is less traffic to-day because business is not moving to the same extent. But certain business is moving; we ship as much wheat to-day as we did four or five years ago. We ship as much as we did in 1929, and the freight rate is just as high as it was at that time. The earnings of the railway companies from that source are just as great as and greater than they ever were. But the prices we are getting are such that we cannot bring goods back. It is not within the power of this government to increase the cash price that the people of Europe will give for our wheat. But when we sell our wheat abroad, although nominally we get paid for it in money, actually we take payment in goods, and it is within the power of this parliament to let us take more goods for our wheat than we are getting to-day. It has been and still is the policy of this government to insist that when we take payment for our wheat in goods we shall take less than the people in the outside world are willing to pay us. If, for example, the people of Great Britain are willing to give us two yards of cloth in exchange for a certain quantity of wheat, and our government steps in and says, "You must not accept two yards of cloth; we will not allow you to accept more than one yard for that quantity of wheat," it naturally follows that our railways will have the job of hauling only one yard of cloth. There will not be as great a tonnage coming back. The same applies to our lumber. We are not shipping lumber out of Canada because the price the world is offering is not sufficient to pay the wages of the men who produce it. Lumber, like wheat, is paid for in goods. Our exports are paid for by our imports, and when the government of the country says to the lumbermen, "We will not allow you to bring in as many goods in exchange for your lumber as the people of the world are offering you," are they not denying the railways traffic? Are they not denying the railways the job of hauling the lumber out and hauling goods back?

Some time during the next summer we expect there will be a world economic conference. The best contribution our government could make to the solution of economic problems would be to announce that they are going to the conference firmly resolved at all costs to break down the trade barriers which have prevented the passage of goods backwards and forwards throughout the world. And, if other nations are not willing to cooperate to that end, our government should state that Canada at least will do her share to break down the barriers that are strangling her own trade.

This bill calls for cooperation between the two railway systems. A little cooperation between the government and the two railway systems towards the creation of traffic, and an effort to get goods moving, would do more to solve the railway problem than all the legislation in this bill, a dozen times over.

Then we come to the fourth contributory cause—

Competition from other forms of transport, notably road transport.

That was dealt with this afternoon by the hon. member for North Bruce. He made the very interesting suggestion, which I would like to repeat when this bill comes before the committee, that the minister be prepared to tell us how much traffic the motor and truck business has brought to the railways and how much it has taken from them. There is a growing feeling abroad that although motor trucks and automobiles have taken business from the railways they have added many millions of tons of traffic to the railways. It would be interesting for us to know what that figure is, but the bill does not make any provision for dealing with that contributory cause.

[Mr. Young.]

Then we have number 5:

Inelasticity of freight rates and railway practice generally which prevents prompt action in the meeting of falling revenues and dealing effectively with competition from other forms of transport.

Here again we have a contributory cause which is not being dealt with in the bill. Perhaps it cannot be. In my opinion that inelasticity, that rigidity in railway practice and freight rates, is due in large measure to the magnitude of the companies and perhaps those who believe in amalgamation will bear this in mind. I can illustrate it by an example. A friend of mine who once worked on a transcontinental railroad told me that the company had certain rules governing the conduct of its employees. My friend told me he was always in hot water with the officials. Why? Because when a situation arose he generally did the thing that he considered in the best interests of the company, the thing that he thought would move the traffic most expeditiously. In doing so he would break the rules, and the officials would say: "We cannot allow that. We know you did it in the interests of the company, but if we allow you to break the rules we will have to allow others to do so, and a big system like this cannot operate without rules." That weakness is inherent in such large bodies, and those who would combine our two railroad systems into one would do well to bear that in mind.

Then number 6:

Contractual arrangements with labour organizations which set up a rigid wage scale and inflexible labour practices generally.

There is nothing in the bill to deal with this very important contributory cause of our railroad problem. Not many days ago a delegation representing some 20,000 unemployed railway men came before the government to ask that these contractual agreements be set aside, at least for the time being. They said that in past years when times were more prosperous those agreements worked to their advantage, but to-day they are working to their disadvantage and rendering it impossible for many of them to make a living. There is another side to the question, that we have not heard. I would like to place some figures on Hansard in connection with our railroads for the years 1913 and 1931. I have taken 1913 as being the last pre-war year, and 1931 because it is the last year for which figures are available. This is what we find—and these figures apply not to the national system alone but to all railroads in Canada:

	1913	1931	Increase	Decrease
Investment in road and equipment..	$2,087,580,000	$3,464,380,000	$1,377,800,000

Operating expenses per unit of work..	·55	·92

* Per cent.
‡ Decrease.

A study of these figures reveals the fact that between 1913 and 1931 we spent hundreds of millions of dollars in improving our railroads —better roadbeds, heavier steel, stronger bridges, bigger cars, more powerful engines. For what purpose? To improve the efficiency of our system. And the result was what? Higher freight rates, higher operating costs. Capital investment in these railroads for betterments could have been justified only on the ground of increased efficiency, but we find that our capital investment has resulted in decreased efficiency and higher operating costs. That is not an indictment of the publicly owned or of the privately owned system; it is an indictment of the management of both systems.

The next contributory cause of our railroad problem is:

(a) Assumption, through government action, of liabilities of insolvent railway systems for reasons of national credit.

In passing let me remark that it has been said that the government has advanced to the national system something like $1,000,000,000 which is added to the railway debt of the country and on which we do not receive interest. Some people are going about this country, quoting stupendous figures of the public and private debts of this country, and frightening people into the belief that they can never be paid. Take this particular item; here is $1,000,000,000 that the people of Canada borrowed first, and it was added to the national debt; then they lent it to the railway companies and it was added to the railway debt, and these people say the debt is $2,000,000,000, but $1,000,000,000 will pay it. If these people who are so busy stampeding the people would consider the duplications and triplications, yes, multiplications, involved in the figures they quote with respect to our debts, the amount would not look so stupendous.

Then, passing over item (b) and turning to (c):

Political and community pressure on the management arising out of direct government control.

Much has been said about what the railways are costing the government. I sometimes think it would be interesting to know what the government is costing the railroads. This political pressure to which it is said here the national is exposed is also exerted on the Canadian Pacific. We are told that in the last three years the railways have spent some $25,000,000 on relief. Why did they do this? The government persuaded them to do it. The government persuaded these railways to make improvements and extensions which they did not require and could not afford. The government said: "Do this in order to relieve the unemployment situation and we will pay the interest on the money until such time as you require these improvements." The debt of $25,000,000 is hanging over the railways in the meantime. I have no quarrel with that method of dealing with unemployment; perhaps it was the most economical method possible at the time, but when we ask the railways to shoulder $25,000,000 of a government obligation in order to relieve unemployment it is hardly fair to turn around and say the railroads are millstones about our necks.

Mr. MANION: We did not ask the railways to do anything they were not going to do. They advanced their work, that is all. They did exactly what they were going to do, only they advanced it.

Mr. YOUNG: It was not at the request of the government?

Mr. MANION: I think we proposed it, but it was part of their own work.

Mr. YOUNG: I admit that the work would have been done some day, but they would not have done it at that time. They did not need it; they could not afford it but they did it to help relieve the situation which was facing the people of Canada, and in doing so they assumed an obligation of $25,000,000. It is not fair for us to say they are millstones around our necks while they are carrying that load for us.

Then I am told that in the western division alone the Canadian National Railways are compelled to pay $1,000,000 a year more for coal than is necessary, just in order that they might buy Canadian coal so that employment may be given in certain Canadian mines. If that is so in the western division how much in addition is being paid in the eastern division? I am told also that this same railway company owns a coal mine in Ohio which has been closed down so that Canadian coal can be used at this additional expense. That pressure has not been confined to the Canadian National Railways, for I understand that the Canadian Pacific was also pressed to use Canadian coal instead of coal that could be bought for less elsewhere. Is it fair to load the railways with that burden? I think it was in 1929 that Mr. Milne, who was then a member of this house, made an estimate of what the tariff policy of this country had cost the railways since confederation. Taking the total purchases of the railways during that time and the additional cost of those purchases because of the tariff, he figured that the railways had paid enough extra because of the tariff to have rebuilt and re-equipped every mile of railway in Canada.

I am sorry this bill is not going to the railway committee. I believe it would be in the public interest to have the officials of the two companies appear before that committee and tell us exactly what these insane buy in Canada policies are costing them. The other day the minister boasted that since taking office he has required the national railways to make larger purchases of Canadian made goods than they were making formerly.

Mr. MANION: Where they could get equal quality at equal prices; that is what I said.

Mr. YOUNG: I am glad the minister does not require them to pay more for Canadian goods than they would pay elsewhere, but could not the minister trust the officials of the company to do that anyway?

Mr. MANION: No, because they were specifying forty per cent of American goods, although in large part goods of equal quality could be obtained in Canada at an equal price.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister tell me why that specification was made?

Mr. MANION: I should like to know myself.

Mr. YOUNG: Did you not ask?

Mr. MANION: I corrected it, which was more important than asking why it was made.

Mr. YOUNG: It is very important from our point of view that we should know why that specification was made. I do not think the officials of the Canadian National Railways would insist on a specification of that kind without a very good reason. Evidently the minister was not concerned about that; he was concerned with putting a stop to the practice. At all events, I say it is not fair to the railway companies to make them adopt these uneconomic practices in their business and then say they are millstones around our necks. I believe the remedy is publicity. If we are going to adopt these insane policies we have a right to know what they are costing us. We should know how much in addition the railways must pay for their coal every year, as well as for other purchases, because of these insane practices.

Reference has been made to political and community pressure on the management arising out of direct government control. Look at this bill. Ostensibly it is to remove this board of trustees from direct government control, from political control but look at subsection 2 of section 14:

> The trustees shall so direct, provide and procure that all freight destined for export by sea which is consigned within Canada for carriage to national railways either at point of origin or between that and the sea shall, unless it has been by its shippers specifically routed otherwise, be exported through Canadian seaports.

Will any man justify that section on economic grounds? That is a political clause, pure and simple; no one will attempt to justify it on any other ground.

Mr. SPENCE: That is what you think.

Mr. YOUNG: I not only think it; I know it. That is a political clause. I do not say it is party politics, but it is politics; it is community pressure. This bill, designed to remove community pressure, has this thing embodied in it, and the trustees have no choice. The Canadian Pacific Railway is not bound by any such provision. That company is to be permitted to route its freight in the way that will give the best accommodation. The result of this provision will be that in time shippers will discover that they can get better service over the Canadian Pacific and they will route their freight over that line. I do not know how much money that will cost the Canadian National; I have no means of computing it. I know they will lose a tremendous sum because they will be forced to carry such freight as they get 800 miles to the seaboard instead of 300 miles. But the Canadian Pacific railway will get the cream of the business.

Now let us look at the proposal. We are to have three trustees, holding office for seven years, who cannot be removed from office, whose salaries cannot be reduced and who cannot be disciplined in any way except by an address from both houses of parliament, and these men are to have a voice in choosing their own successors. The object of the removal of this board from public control, so we are told, is to escape political pressure. I cannot agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) when he says these trustees should be men who believe in public ownership. I cannot agree on that point because in my opinion no man who really believes in public ownership would accept a seat on that board. This is the very negation of public ownership. Those advocates of public ownership who support that policy, and who say that the managers of this road should be removed from the control of parliament and the government as well as from the possibility of community pressure, by their very attitude confess that they have no faith in their own doctrine. We cannot have public ownership without public control. We might as well face facts. As a parliament we may remove this body from our own control, but we cannot escape our responsibility to the people of Canada. They will hold us responsible; they will hold the government responsible for the management or mismanagement of the system, and they will never accept it as an excuse if the road is mismanaged that you delivered the road into the hands of a body of men over which you have no control. If the people of this country have no capacity for managing a railroad that capacity will not be developed by taking the management out of their hands. If you leave the management in their hands and they show that they cannot develop the capacity to manage their own railroads, the sooner we find that out the better because in the long run our railways should be controlled by those who are best able to run them. The average citizen of this country is little concerned as to whether the title deeds to our railway rest in the government vaults in Ottawa or in the strong boxes of private individuals. What he is concerned about is this: What kind of service do we get from our railways and what is that service costing us? And if as a result of government ownership and operation we demonstrate that we can get better service at lower cost than under any other system, then in the end public ownership and operation will prevail. If on the other hand we demonstrate that we cannot run the railway, that we cannot manage our own affairs, then the sooner we find that out and transfer the ownership to those who can, the better it will be for all of us.

What is the remedy for undue community pressure? There is only one remedy that should be applied and that could be applied successfully under public ownership, and that is publicity. Let the people know; give them all the facts; let them know exactly what this policy of public pressure is costing the country. If a community is pressing for some special advantage to itself at the cost of the general system, let it be known; if a thousand communities are doing the same thing, let it be known; let it be known how far we are yielding to such pressure. If the public, with all the facts before them, and realizing that if one community is allowed to get some unfair advantage with the result that all the others are going to be allowed to do the same thing, public ownership is bound to fail—if, in spite of that knowledge, the public persists in that course, then they will have demonstrated their total incapacity to run their railways and the sooner they part with them the better.

Let us look at the bill again. I turn to part II, section 16. The two companies are instructed to cooperate. Now, the minister told us the other day that they are cooperating, and that by cooperating voluntarily they have made the very considerable saving of some $40,000,000.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman is misquoting me; he cannot read that in my statement.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister did say they were cooperating.

Mr. MANION: I do not think I discussed it the other day. I said that the bill was for the purpose of making them cooperate to a greater extent than in the past.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister spoke of voluntary cooperation.

Mr. MANION: Yes. I said that it was not going on as it ought to. That was what I said.

Mr. YOUNG: At any rate there is cooperation going on and this bill is intended to make them cooperate to a greater extent; it so instructs them.

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Mr. YOUNG: But there is no one apart from the railway companies themselves to see that they do it. The officials of the railways can put their hands in their pockets and declare that they are cooperating and neither the minister nor anyone else has any authority to compel them to do more. There is no one mentioned in the bill who can compel them to take the initiative; their instructions are that they are hereby directed to cooperate, and if in attempting to cooperate they find that there are questions of disagreement, then these questions shall be submitted to an arbitral tribunal to decide between them. The tribunal shall consist of three members, one chosen by each railway and the third one shall be the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Let us consider what sort of questions are likely to come up before the tribunal. If one railway wishes to abandon a particular service or to close down a branch line that is not paying, that is a matter between the officials of that company and the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the other company will not appear in the picture at all. There is no room for cooperation there; there is not likely to be any dispute there. Where there is likely to be dispute is where both companies render similar service in the same territory and one says to the other, "You abandon this service to us; you leave this part of the field to us and over yonder we will leave that field free to you." Without any such tribunal as is proposed, if they were voluntarily cooperating, that is what they would say, and by a process of bargaining they would reach an agreement which would probably be beneficial to both. But with an arrangement such as is provided in this bill one might say to the other, "You abandon this field to us, but we do not know whether we will abandon that other field to you; we will arbitrate the matter." And so they call for an arbitral tribunal. If the company making the application wins, then it makes an enemy of the other company and that will be the end of voluntary cooperation. Cooperation from then on will be only compulsory, and as has been pointed out several times in this debate, compulsory cooperation is unthinkable; it is impossible.

But consider for a moment the position in which this bill will place the chairman of the railway commission. Suppose a question comes before the Board of Railway Commissioners. The chairman decides one way and all the other commissioners decide the other way and they vote him down. What can the chairman do? He can ask one of the railway companies, the one he happens to be in favour of, to demand an arbitral tribunal. That tribunal will be set up. It will consist of two representatives of the railways whose votes will neutralize each other, and he will be the sole arbitrator. So that you put him in a position where he not only dominates the arbitral tribunal but can defy the railway commission itself; for though the whole railway commission might be opposed to him, he could appeal from their decision and appeal to himself. In other words, you are making him, the chairman of the railway commission, an absolute autocrat in all railway matters in Canada.

Summing up I might say that, as outlined by the Duff commission, the causes of our railway trouble are seven. The principal ones are, first, lack of trade, which this government, if it will come to its senses and reverse its trade policy, can do much to alleviate. Next there is over-investment, which this bill does not and cannot remedy. Next, political pressure, which this bill cannot remedy, though it seeks to put the entire control of the affairs of the company beyond the reach of parliament. Next, contractual agreements, with which the bill does not pretend to deal. I see therefore nothing in the bill to warrant us in supporting it, and though I have every sympathy with the effort of the government to find a solution for our railway problem, I must say that I can find no solution within the four corners of this measure.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): As I read this bill, it means that we are asked to turn over to three men an investment of some $2,300,000,000 of the people of Canada. Whether that is a good investment or not is to some extent beside the question. However, we have an investment there which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) believes is good to the extent of the bonds that are outstanding in the hands of the public, amounting to about $1,300,000,000. Parliament is asked to divest itself of practically all responsibility to the people of Canada for the administration of that investment.

I am hopeful that we shall be able to put through the necessary amendments to this bill in committee. I feel satisfied that the government itself cannot be content with the provisions of this bill as it stands now, and I am equally satisfied that the people of Canada will never tolerate the members of this parliament permitting the bill to go through in its present form.

We all know we have a railway problem in Canada. We know that no one government is responsible for the situation; we know also that no one railway company is responsible for it. Everyone I believe is convinced that most of the people in Canada, along with the railway companies themselves, have to bear their share of the responsibility. Reading the evidence that was given before the committee of the other house, it is interesting to note some of the remarks that were made by Mr. Beatty as to excessive or wasteful expenditure, as it has been called. At pages 33 and 34 of the proceedings before the Senate committee he is reported as saying:

The report makes mention of branch line construction and expenditure on hotels. In the policy of the company in these matters, competitive considerations had only a minor part. The chief factors were the interruption of railway construction during the war, and the rapid extension of settlement, particularly in the western provinces, which followed it. In Saskatchewan and Alberta alone the area under wheat increased from 6,993,000 acres in 1914 to 21,490,000 in 1930. Industry and commercial enterprises also entered new fields, and for all these, railway service was necessary, These settlements and industries owed their existence in a very large measure to the colonization and development work of the company.

And again:

The traffic returns of the new lines up to 1930 fully justified their construction, and the falling returns of subsequent years have been no more characteristic of the new lines than of other parts of the railway.

In order to give the viewpoint of the heads of both railways, I should like to quote what Mr. Hungerford had to say in giving evidence before the commission itself. He said:

Ever since the inception of railways, there has been an insistent demand on the part of communities for more and more railways with the object of opening up more tributary territory and thereby securing a larger volume of trade, and the country as a whole has generally supported large railway projects, even although they involved the building of a very large amount of mileage through almost wholly undeveloped territory.

After referring to the extensions which were made because of the insistent demands of the public, Mr. Hungerford directs attention to the fact that this railway development assisted largely in the development of industry and the external trade of the country. I quote further from his evidence:

It is significant that while railway mileage increased between 1900 and 1929 by 135 per cent—the gross earnings of railways in the same period increased 656 per cent and the external trade of the country increased by 645 per cent, from which it appears to be a fair deduction that the external trade of this country has been made possible by the developments through railways.

The railway situation now confronting Canada has been brought about not only by the building of these colonization roads but by the dearth of traffic offering to the roads. This was referred to by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), who directed attention to the fact that the restricted trade policies of this government have something to do with it. There is a dearth of traffic offering to the railroads in other countries; a railroad problem is not peculiar to Canada. The same situation exists in the United States and in Great Britain. We must not get panicky because we have to face a difficult situation. There is no doubt that there is some duplication of mileage and a decline in passenger and freight traffic attributable to other competition. The complaint has been made by the commissioners that some of our problem is attributable to the contractual relations with labour and also to the fact that our freight rates are not sufficiently high. We must not get alarmed and go to extremes in trying to solve this problem.

The Prime Minister spoke yesterday as if his party had nothing to do with the railway situation which now confronts the people of Canada. As I gathered his remarks, he was endeavouring to place upon succeeding Liberal governments the responsibility for the present position. His words were to the effect that any person might have known that we would not need the present railroad development in Canada with a population of 8,000,000 or even 15,000,000. He lamented the tremendous expenditures which had been made. I thought this was most unfair and I took the trouble to look up some of the promises he had made in connection with the development in Canada. I should like to refer to one or two statements he made during the campaign of 1930. If he knew that Canada was facing such a difficult situation with regard to her transportation system, he would hardly have used the following words:

We pledge ourselves to the improvement of the whole scheme of Canadian transportation northward by the completion of the Hudson Bay route, and the construction of such branches as may be necessary to render it most readily available to every part of Canada; to the Pacific slope by a Peace river outlet, and east and west by the development of the St. Lawrence waterways, and we pledge ourselves to aid existing traffic channels and to increase port facilities on the Great Lakes, Hudson Bay and the Atlantic and Pacific ocean and to the establishment of a national highway system.

Apparently in those days the Prime Minister did not have any fear of the tremendous investment we had in railway facilities. Speaking in Vancouver, he is reported in the Vancouver Sun as follows:

"We must look forward to the building of highways, of waterways and railways to provide work," Mr. Bennett said. He would undertake, for instance, the completion of a highway across Canada, from Cape Breton to Vancouver. . . . "Canadians do not ask for charity or doles. They want work and wages. That is why it will be my duty, if elected, to call a special session of parliament to anticipate those great undertakings to which we are pledged to enable Canadians to keep themselves and their families in comfort."

Speaking at Woodstock, he is reported in the Mail and Empire as follows:

We must pass laws at the special session that will anticipate work for our people on national highways, on great canals, that we must make for our waterways to the sea in great undertakings such as branch lines and matters of that kind, in order that we may give employment to our people.

Again speaking at Woodstock, he is reported in the Mail and Empire as follows:

Parliament has first of all to pass laws—not orders in council—that will institute great national undertakings, national highways, great canals to the sea, branch lines, and matters of that kind, improving conditions in order that we may give employment to our own people.

The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) will be interested in the next statement. Speaking at Brandon, the Prime Minister is reported in the Mail and Empire as follows:

Endorsation of the suggested Mafeking cutoff to afford Manitoba a shorter route to the Hudson Bay railway was voiced by the Conservative leader. Supporting the proposal, Mr. Bennett said that this would be a proper national undertaking to be started to relieve unemployment and he asserted such was his intention.

I think all members of this house should look at the situation that confronts us without endeavouring to blame one person or one party, because it looks to me as if most everybody in Canada is responsible for the situation with which we are faced.

Speaking of wasteful extravagance on the Canadian National Railways, I believe that there has been wasteful extravagance also on the Canadian Pacific Railway, the privately owned corporation, and I take Mr. Beatty's own words for that as given before the Senate committee. He does not attribute the situation with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway to unfair competition from the Canadian National, because his words are, "competitive considerations had only a minor part." Mr. Hungerford had this to say in connection with expenditures:

Since 1920, say the last ten or eleven years, so far as I can see, and I think I am pretty well informed with respect to the situation, the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway has pursued exactly the same policy as that of the Canadian National. I see no difference at all.

Again he says:

I can hardly believe that it was dictated in very large degree—

That is, by the policy of the Canadian National:

—from the fact that the Canadian Pacific took the initiative on many occasions in connection with the development of new enterprises. I say that in no spirit of criticism; it is simply a statement of fact.

Lord Ashfield asked this question:

So far as you know, it is equally true to say of the Canadian Pacific that during the last ten years they have not been tempted to make expenditures for services beyond what business prudence would demand on account of any policy of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Hungerford: I do not think so. I think if there had been another private company competing with the Canadian Pacific, a company that had equal resources and opportunities, the degree of competition would have been about the same.

During the past few years I have been a member of the committee known as the committee on railways and shipping. I have heard the Canadian National Railways budget discussed year after year before that committee, and my recollection is the committee brought in reports which it had unanimously approved. Expenditures were always provided for in that budget, to which no exception was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. We discussed matters fully in the committee, and sometimes there were differences of opinion. All of the members would disagree with certain policies that were proposed by the railway company, and where the committee deemed it advisable and in the interests of the railway itself and the public as well, certain reductions were made in the proposed expenditures, but throughout all the period during which that committee has had the Canadian National Railways budget before it, I have heard up until the last year or two very little criticism in that committee of the expenditures proposed.

Coming to the bill itself, I take exception in the first place to the appointment of three trustees to administer the railways. The people of Canada have sent 245 members to this house; there are 96 members of the Senate. Are we, the representatives of the people, going to shift all the responsibility on to three men who are being given apparently unlimited powers under this bill? Section 7 says:

No trustee shall be removed from office nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

Subsection 6 of section 9 says:

No order, regulation, by-law, act, decision or proceeding of the trustees shall require the approval of His Majesty or that of any other shareholder of any company to which this section applies.

And what can that committee of three do? They can agree with the Canadian Pacific Railway to enter into or help to form new companies, enter into leases, entrusting agreements or licences, or agreements for the pooling and division of earnings, also agreements covering the use of joint trackage, running rights, joint ownership, or make joint operating agreements, or agreements with respect to joint or individual highway services, or highway and railway services combined, in any form. It may be possible to get some supermen in this country to whom we should hand over this $2,300,000,000 of investment, but I as one of the representatives of the people in this house do not feel that I am doing my duty by the people whom I represent if I turn over that investment to a body of three men and give them absolute control so that they can enter into leases, entrusting agreements or licences, about which we have nothing to say.

I was rather interested in the opinion of Sir Joseph Flavelle, speaking on this very subject of supermen, when dealing with the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway controlling the whole of the railway situation in Canada. These are his words:

> The other aspect bothers me—whether any single executive body can be entrusted with the responsibility of interpreting for the community the service necessary under the diverse circumstances that we have in Canada.

Again he says, addressing Mr. Beatty:

> We have not yet discovered, so far as I know, any field of human endeavour that we can pass over to a very small group for determination of policy affecting the interests of the public.

In appointing three trustees over whom parliament has no control, as apparently this bill proposes to do, I submit that we are going away beyond what we have any right to do as members of parliament representing the people of Canada who are really the owners of this railway. Just at that point I want to interject this. We have heard about equity of redemption. To me it is ridiculous to talk about the people of Canada only holding an equity of redemption in the Canadian National Railways. True, we have outstanding bonds amounting to $1,300,000,000, but as the Prime Minister himself says, those bondholders have the guarantee of all the assets of the Dominion of Canada and of the different provinces besides. If I mortgage a piece of land and raise some money on it, and in addition to giving the mortgage on the land I turn over to the mortgagee dominion bonds in amount equivalent to that of the mortgage, and bearing the same rate of interest, I know what is going to happen if I default on my mortgage—the mortgagee is going to take the bonds I have assigned to him. And in this particular case, while the national railways owe some $1,300,000,000 in bonds, the bondholders have the additional security of all the other assets of Canada. It is foolish to talk about equity of redemption, because we know we have to pay those bonds; we are not able to default. I should like to ask the minister this question: Was not the interest paid on those bonds last year, and was it paid out of operating revenues of the railway? I suggest it will be paid again this year, and in all probability will not be paid out of operating revenues. We realize we have to pay, and we are going to do it.

I am opposed to the manner of appointment of the three trustees, and to their appointment by the government. This government has put into effect certain economies and has endeavoured to effect other economies on the railroads which I am not convinced are in the best interests of either the railroad or the country. In order to indicate what I mean I should like to place on Hansard a record of the falling off in passenger traffic on the Canadian National railways since this government took office, and to compare the passenger traffic of the national lines with that of the Canadian Pacific. Every year up until 1932 the Canadian National carried more passengers one mile than did the Canadian Pacific. In 1932, however, that position was reversed. Let me give a comparison of the figures showing passengers carried one mile by each of the railway companies. I shall not read all the figures for the years 1922 to 1932 but will give those for 1922, 1931 and 1932. The following table is taken from the statistics on steam roads:

Passengers Carried One Mile

Year—	Canadian National	Canadian Pacific
1922	1,287,308,000	1,250,197,000
1931	788,423,840	743,036,667
1932	632,465,682	644,797,144

These figures indicate that there is a decline of 156,000,000 passengers carried one mile on the Canadian National railways, and a decline of 98,000,000 on the Canadian Pacific railway between 1931 and 1932.

I should like now to give some figures concerning revenue freight ton miles. In 1932 the Canadian National carried more freight ton miles than the Canadian Pacific did. But between the years 1931 and 1932 there was a decline in revenue freight ton miles of 1,300,000,000 on the Canadian National railways, while on the Canadian Pacific railway there was a decline of only 744,600,000. Perhaps the practice of economizing is being carried too far, and not in the right direction. I believe economies have to be effected on the railroads, but we must be sure that those economies are not to their disadvantage and to the disadvantage of the Canadian people.

Another objection I have to the bill is in connection with the arbitral tribunal. So far no hon. member has explained what objection there can be to the Board of Railway Commissioners, or the necessity for setting up an entirely new board to adjust the difference between the two railroads. Over a period of years the people of Canada have had confidence in the Board of Railway Commissioners, and so far as I can see there is no necessity for the additional expense which will be incurred if the measure before us passes. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) referred to disputes which would come before these tribunals, and stated that after one dispute had been settled the railroads would not return for other settlements. If that is going to be the result we would be well advised to adopt the cheapest course open to us. It seems to me however that the Board of Railway Commissioners, a body of men who have been trained in matters pertaining to the operation of railroads, would be the most competent body to deal with this matter.

There are many other minor amendments which should be made to the bill, but in my opinion the most important one is that concerning the appointment of trustees without any governmental supervision. I do hope when the bill reaches committee the government will see to it that such an amendment is made, and that the last word will be left with the government. I would rather trust even this government than a board of three men appointed by it. For the life of me I cannot see why the government wants to divest itself of its responsibility. Surely in connection with railway development in Canada they are able to resist the importunities of their political friends; surely they can resist those importunities to the extent that they will not allow any board appointed to put into effect economies which are not in the interests of the people and of the railroads.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of the debate it may not be possible to offer anything new by way of argument. The position taken by the great majority of hon. members on this side of the house has been well and ably presented. It is not my intention therefore to speak at any great length. Perhaps it would be sufficient to say that my personal views concerning the bill were ably presented by the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). With perhaps a question mark after one statement he made, or one position he took, I agree in toto with what he said, and I believe the hon. member is to be congratulated in that he was able not only to detect the fallacies in the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), but to reply almost immediately with a complete exposure of those fallacies. Sometimes the Prime Minister by what is called the exuberance of his own verbosity sweeps his hearers off their feet. Unless one is capable of quick thinking he may for a time be carried away by the arguments of the Prime Minister, and it is only after calm deliberation by those of us who think somewhat more slowly than the hon. member for Hants-Kings, that we are able to detect those fallacies.

There were one or two statements made by the Prime Minister that I admit came to me with a distinct shock. Although the arguments against this bill have been so ably presented by the hon. member for Hants-Kings and the hon. member for North Bruce and others who have spoken, there are one or two things that I would like to say on my own behalf. I want to refer to a remark made by the hon. Minister of Railways, (Mr. Manion) speaking of the amount of wheat carried by the railroads. At page 2776 of Hansard he said:

> I found that in the year 1929, 4,600,000 tons of wheat was shipped on the railways, and in 1932, 5,300,000 tons, an increase of 700,000 tons in 1932 as compared with 1929; yet the gross revenues of the Canadian National Railways were down in 1932 as compared with 1929 by $125,000,000.

Then at the top of page 2777 he says:

> I must confess it was my own conviction that grain traffic was the paying traffic of the railways. As a matter of fact, it was not so much the wheat and grain traffic that was the paying traffic for the railways as the fact that the people of the west were selling their products at a reasonable price and had the money with which to purchase goods from some other section of the country, thus providing return traffic; and that total traffic brought about the prosperity of the railways.

I want to say to the hon. Minister of Railways that there are a lot of fish up that stream if he will follow it. I wish he would apply the principle here enunciated to traffic in general. I wish when he comes to consider the possibilities of the Hudson Bay railway, to which he pledged himself, he would emphasize, as he has done on this occasion, the necessity for two way traffic. The Hudson Bay railway can never be made to pay on one way traffic. The wheat we export will not stand the cost of operation both ways either on the railway or on the ocean. I want to say also to the members for the maritime provinces who come here insisting that traffic shall go by way of Canadian ports, that if they are to win the sympathy of the people of the west who grow the wheat that they want to go out through their ports, and if they insist that that wheat shall be carried at extra expense by a circuitous route of some 800 miles instead of 300, they must give consideration to the question of two way traffic. The railways cannot afford to take train loads of wheat around the long circuitous route of the Intercolonial and haul back empties. The necessity for two way traffic must be recognized. And I say to the people of the maritimes, not the members who represent them here, that if they want the sympathy of the people of the west in their position they must send members to this house who are opposed to measures in restriction of trade as practised by this government. They must send more members who hold the views of the hon. member who sits in front of me, the member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). That hon. member and I sometimes differ very widely in our opinions, but I agree with him wholeheartedly on the question of trade. With him freedom of trade seems to be almost an obsession, and I fully agree with him that if we want to prosper we must provide increased traffic, we must remove restrictions on trade, we must recognize the necessity of two way traffic.

In view of the frequent expressions of opinion that we have in this house and the country generally in regard to amalgamation it may not be necessary at the moment to discuss that matter at any length. But a remark made yesterday by the Prime Minister in regard to the taking of a plebiscite on the question is perhaps worthy of some attention. I wonder whether that was entirely unpremeditated or whether it meant that he was thinking of such a thing. If premeditated it indicates that there is still propaganda going on in favour of amalgamation, and it will be necessary to carry on some counter-propaganda. This therefore must be my excuse for making some reference to the question.

I lived in Manitoba, Mr. Speaker, in the days when the Liberals under the leadership of Thomas Greenway were fighting the Dominion government on the question of the disallowance of our railway charters. I remember the battle of Fort Whyte, which, though like the battle of Montgomery's farm it may not take a very high place among the decisive battles of the world, nevertheless is of great significance to the people of Canada. I remember also when the then president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Sir William Van Horne, sent a message to a farmers' convention in Winnipeg in reply to a telegram that had been sent to him with reference to the building of branch lines, to the effect that there would be no branch lines built in Manitoba until the fool killer went through Winnipeg. The attitude of the Canadian Pacific Railway at that time was arrogant and intolerant towards any person who presumed to dispute its position. I admit that after that time and for many years the relations between the farmers' organizations and the Canadian Pacific Railway were on a much more cordial basis, and we got along together very well in many respects. At the same time, remembering these things, I could not contemplate for a moment with equanimity the idea of a railway monopoly, a private railway monopoly. The dangers to which we would be exposed from such a condition would be too tremendous. There would be the possibility of the government itself being dictated to by the railway management. It might be said that such a system would be more efficient than that we have at present. That might possibly be, but it would be efficiency secured at too great a cost. I think of railway monopoly and the possibility of dictatorship in railway matters as I think of dictatorship in the state. It may be contended that dictatorship in the state would give the most efficient government, and sometimes that may be true. Perhaps we have an illustration of that in Italy to-day, and we may have another in Germany. But at the same time we would view such a situation with a great deal of alarm. I often think of a principle that was laid down by my old college professor, to this effect, that were perfection and wisdom and love combined, the perfection of government would be absolute monarchy, which is unsafe among men only because men are neither perfectly wise nor perfectly good nor perfectly loving. So in spite of the weaknesses of democracy we prefer it and will continue to prefer it to anything that savours of autocracy or absolute monarchy. A few days ago the Prime Minister made some reference to the weakness of democracy, and he said that weakness lay in the fact that results were arrived at by the counting of heads according to their number rather than according to their quality. I thought that was rather unkind of the Prime Minister; I thought it showed a great lack of gratitude on his part in view of the fact that in the opinion of many he occupies his present position by virtue of the counting of heads by number rather than by quality.

Then we come to the idea of amalgamation under public ownership. I know the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) is strongly impressed with the idea that amalgamation under public ownership might be for the good of the state, but I do not think that opinion is very generally held. I often recall a statement made to me by a former member of this house who is now Minister of Education in Manitoba, Mr. Hoey. He told me that he attended a farm convention in Kansas City, and that while there he came in contact with leading business men and railway officials who discussed with him the railway situation in Canada. Their statement was something like this: "We believe that you have in Canada the ideal railway situation, with one government owned line and one privately owned line. If your railroads were all owned privately the result would be a monopoly; if they were all owned by the public there would be no standard of comparison, and lacking that standard there would be dissatisfaction no matter how successful they were." I think, generally speaking, that would be the position taken by the people of Canada to-day.

When the Minister of Railways moved the second reading of this bill I felt that in view of his very dispassionate presentation of the case, in the appeal he made for a non-partisan discussion and his statement that amendments would be accepted by the government—

Mr. MANION: I did not say they would be accepted; I said they would be considered.

Mr. BROWN: Then we will say that amendments were to be considered. Perhaps it is well that the minister made that correction, because it confirms our opinion that consideration will be all they will receive at the hands of the government.

Mr. MANION: If there were many like the one we had yesterday probably that is all they should get.

Mr. BROWN: Well, Mr. Speaker, in view of what I believe to be the desire of the country, that we approach this matter in a non-partisan way and give it a calm and unprejudiced discussion, I felt it would be well not to oppose this bill on the second reading. I felt a desire to give the government an opportunity to demonstrate their good faith in the matter of amendments; I felt that it would be wise for us to work with the government to as great an extent as possible. I have never made any secret of the fact that I am absolutely opposed to the general fiscal policies of this government, but at the same time I do not adopt the attitude that the first duty of an opposition is to oppose.

Mr. SPENCE: You always do it.

Mr. BROWN: Generally we have good cause. I remember a statement made by Mr. Meighen some years ago when he was leading the opposition. It was that he believed it was his duty to place the government of the day before the people of the country in the worst possible light, or something to that effect.

Mr. McGIBBON: That was easily done in those days.

Mr. BROWN: I cannot agree that this is the duty of an opposition. I believe an opposition should criticize, scrutinize and offer constructive suggestions if possible, and of course there comes the time when it may be and is our duty to oppose the position taken by the government. At any rate, while that was my desire when this debate commenced I must confess that the speech made by the Prime Minister yesterday somewhat shook my determination. I think the speech of the right hon. gentleman, confirmed by the remark of the Minister of Railways just now in which he substituted consideration for acceptance in regard to amendments, made it abundantly clear that no amendments will be accepted unless perhaps they have to do with the length of the cross of the "t" or the size of the dot to be put above the "i". I think it is quite clear that any amendments we may deem advisable will not be accepted by the government.

I am not very much impressed with the willingness of the government to reinsert the section having to do with amalgamation. That does not mean very much to me, because even if that section is placed in the bill it will not prevent the board, which is entrusted with the complete management and control of the system, from pursuing a course that would inevitably force us into amalgamation. With the powers entrusted to them under the terms of this bill they may adopt a course that would make it impossible for us to avoid being driven into amalgamation. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, to me part I is the important part of the bill. With a board of trustees doing their duty in the interests of the country parts I and II would be entirely unnecessary, but if part I does not work effectively there is no power under heaven that could make parts II and III work well. I think that should be perfectly clear.

Something has been said as to the qualifications of the trustees. Naturally this must be a subject that gives us a great deal of concern. If this were a matter between two private roads we should naturally expect, and we should be justified in expecting, that the respective representatives would stand absolutely by their own interests. But how can we be perfectly sure that a board of trustees representing the publicly owned railways, representing no immediate interests of their own, would be so completely devoted to the interests of that road as to allow no other considerations to enter their minds? It is all very well to say that we must have men of integrity. Certainly we must; we must have men with high ideals of public service, men who are sympathetic to the idea of public ownership. But how are we going to apply these tests in choosing men to fill these positions?

Perhaps I might offer another suggestion that might be worth considering, although it may possibly be thought narrow on my part. Nevertheless, it is worth considering, whether men who within the last five years have had a large interest in the Canadian Pacific Railway could give to the operation of the national road that wholehearted, sympathetic management which alone can make it a success.

Referring again to the speech of the Prime Minister, although I said that at the time I did not grasp the full significance of his remarks, yet there was one thing that came to me with a distinct shock and that was his statement that we did not own a railway. The people of Canada had been congratulating themselves upon their ownership of a magnificent railway system comprising some 23,000 miles of steel rails. We were congratulating ourselves on the fact that we were the owners of one of the greatest properties in the world, and now the Prime Minister comes along and tells us it is all a delusion.

Mr. McGIBBON: How much equity have you in it?

Mr. BROWN: We have it all in one sense.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mortgaged for twice what it is worth.

Mr. BROWN: The fact of the matter is that we do own the railway, in spite of what the Prime Minister has said, and I believe the people of Canada will suffer the same shock as those of us on this side received yesterday when we were told that we did not own a railway which we thought all the time belonged to us. In common with the great majority of the Canadian people, I had been cherishing the belief that we were owners of this great railway system, and now we are told that all the interest we have in it is the privilege of paying the deficits. It is true the Prime Minister did mention later on that we had the equity of redemption, and that is an admission; but, as the hon. member for North Bruce told us this afternoon, the true value of the railway consisted in its earning power, and the very fact that we have guaranteed the bonds and so far have not defaulted indicates that we have at least some ownership in the line.

Briefly, let me state my attitude towards the bill. It probably is desirable that a board of trustees should be substituted for the large board of directors. If a board having the proper qualifications is appointed, a board with an eye single to the welfare of the national road, then perhaps all will be well. But, Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in sympathy with what has been said with regard to the method of appointment. I think it has been well said that if subsequent boards of trustees can be appointed by selection from panel, then the principle is equally good with respect to the first appointees. Considering the tremendous power with which this board is entrusted, we must ensure if possible that the board be appointed in such a way as will secure to us men of the very highest character and calibre, for the country will be satisfied with no less.

With respect to the question of government control, it has been stated quite frequently that the failure of the system, if it can be called a failure, has been the result of a lack of such control. We can all acknowledge that it is perhaps a somewhat difficult matter to maintain a proper balance, keeping that government control which is necessary in order that the government of the country may keep its hands on its own property and yet at the same time preventing that pressure from which perhaps we may say that the Intercolonial system undoubtedly suffered in the past. But it is abundantly clear that this parliament cannot resign into the hands of a self-perpetuating body of men, no matter how good they may be at the outset, that control which parliament must of necessity exercise over a system which is the property of the people of Canada.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): The bill which is at present before the house, now that it is bereft of the amendment, is, I take it from the words of the Minister of Railways the other day, as well as from the words of the Prime Minister, the crystallization of the findings of the Duff commission. Both the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) took some time to extol the qualifications of the members of that commission. So far as I am concerned, and, I believe, so far as every hon. member of this house is concerned, that eulogy was love's labour lost, for no one would doubt the qualifications of the gentlemen that comprised the commission. I would be the last one to doubt the outstanding qualifications of the very distinguished and able gentlemen who sat on the commission, and particularly the one who so admirably presided over its deliberations. But the fact that the commission was composed of such eminent men is no reason why we should conclude that the matter placed before them was a most complex and difficult one. Very often quite eminent judges are called upon to listen to and to decide some of the most unimportant and futile cases. It frequently happens that the eminent jurists who sit on the supreme court bench, and their lordships of the privy council, have to decide cases that have just barely stepped over the mark of jurisdiction of the respective courts. Very often these appeals are dismissed on the bench. Because this matter was submitted to this commission is no reason why we should say that it was very complex and complicated. Why bring that up?

As was to be expected from the high calibre of its members, the commission did its work thoroughly. It was something like Caesar's wife, above suspicion. The commission laboured long, laboured hard and laboured well. This afternoon in the parliamentary library I had under my hand the five huge volumes which compose the evidence given before the commission and the two huge volumes containing the report and the appendices. Those volumes constituted almost a monument and they looked like a mountain. Out of that mountain came this bill, out of the mountain we got this mouse. In matters of this kind the Minister of Railways is a wonderful magician, and I trust that in the performance of his duties hereafter he does not have to produce similar results. At page 6 of the proceedings of the commission I find the following words of the Minister of Railways in his opening address:

> We have a difficult situation so far as the railways are concerned,—decreasing revenues and competition from motors and from the air.

In explaining the difficult situation to the commission the minister stated that so far as the railways were concerned the difficulty consisted in decreasing revenues and competition from motors and from the air. I might say to the minister: Cura te ipsum—why do you not start by curing yourself rather than by curing others? If our trouble is decreased revenue, who is responsible for the decreased revenue? Like other financial institutions, the railways began to feel the depression around 1930. This depression was worldwide and it spread into Canada and was beyond the power of man to stop. When the present administration saw the storm in the offing it took no measures to meet it. Instead of taking precautions when it was seen that trade might languish and decrease, the present administration took measures to stop the flow of trade. Instead of attempting to blast their way into other markets, as the Prime Minister had promised in June and July of 1930, the present administration proceeded to limit markets. By limiting markets they limited trade, and by limiting trade they limited the tonnage available to our railroads. Immediately that was done it was only natural that the revenues would fall off. I should not labour this point because the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) explained it fully this afternoon. I think it would be a loss of time to attempt to cover the same ground. I would say to the genial Minister of Railways: Et voilà pourquoi, docteur, votre fille est muette! We all realize the difficulties facing the present administration but if they would take steps to extend the circle of our commercial operations there would be an immediate improvement in the railway situation.

The minister stated that our railway troubles were due to the decrease in revenue and the competition from motors and from the air. There is some reference made to these matters in the Duff report but no recommendations are made in connection therewith. But there is another type of competition which was not taken up by the Duff commission. I wonder why, but on second thought I realize that it might be because the members of the commission were limited by the terms of the order in council under which they were appointed. I have no doubt that they considered the matter but they probably found it was not within their jurisdiction. I refer to transportation by water, one of the greatest drains upon the revenue of our railways. Our canals do not charge tolls of any kind. Some years ago a very famous bill was introduced in this house and it took the attention of the house for a considerable length of time. At that time I advocated that tolls should be charged on our Canadian canals. The bill did not go through, the principal objection being that other nations did not charge tolls on their canals. I am still of the opinion that tolls should be exacted by our canals, and that opinion is strengthened by certain evidence, to which I shall refer in a few moments, that the ships plying through the Canadian canals are subsidized to the extent of two dollars per ton of freight because of the non-payment of tolls. One can realize immediately the disadvantage under which our railroads are operating when ships, Canadian and foreign, are granted an advantage of two dollars per ton in the transportation of freight. At once one can visualize how enormous the problem becomes when one thinks of that huge fleet of freighters plying through the waters from the gulf of St. Lawrence right through to the head of the lakes. But as I said, the worst feature of this unfair competition is that it is not limited only to Canadian ships but extends also to foreign shipping. There is no Canadian control at all over the rates on these foreign ships. They may transport freight at the most ridiculously low rates in our waters, and pass through our canals and deliver their cargo in American ports at rates that are simply ludicrous, thereby constituting a tremendous drainage upon the revenues of our own railways. I have been told that recently Danish ships were unloading barbed wire, steel and iron in Chicago, which of course had been brought up through the St. Lawrence, and that the rates charged were so low that nobody could even think of competing with them. On their return these tramp vessels do not go without cargo. They cannot compete with our own Canadian ships in the transportation of wheat, and so they return laden with other Canadian commodities at rates ridiculously low, which constitutes a further drain upon the revenues of our railroads.

In going through the evidence that was submitted before the Duff commission I find at page 1088 the submission of Mr. R. K. Smith, K.C., who expressed himself in these words:

> I would like now to deal with the question of water competition. Railway lines on the North American continent are exposed to water competition from all angles, with very few exceptions. The major developments which have brought about the situation are, first, the Panama canal, which materially affected the transcontinental rail rate levels; the St. Lawrence river and Great Lakes system and the Mississippi river development. These facilities have permitted the easy flow of waterborne traffic, and have been largely the result of governmental activity. After spending millions in the development of the great lakes and St. Lawrence waterway system, the Dominion government cancelled the tolls against shipping and cargo tonnage, and to-day this great waterway system is open to shipping free of charge, and the Canadian taxpayer is carrying the capital cost of the construction.
> From an estimate prepared recently it is calculated, taking into consideration interest, maintenance and operating expenses, that cargo tonnage moving on vessels on the St. Lawrence river and great lakes is indirectly subsidized to the extent of at least $2 a ton. This is in direct competition with the railway lines which have to meet this condition, not only being forced to make tolls to the public which reflect water competition, but are contributing large sums in the form of civic, provincial and federal taxes. This is a problem which requires very serious consideration, and particularly as pressure is constantly being exerted towards the enlargement of artificial waterways systems, which inevitably would increase this competition.

I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that those are words of wisdom, and they come from a gentleman who knows the water transportation situation. I trust that the suggestions he has made will be taken into consideration by the government at its very next opportunity. If the water rates were carefully looked into and foreign ships particularly had to pay tolls passing through our canals, if their rates were controlled by the Canadian parliament in some way, I believe that it would to a large extent relieve the drainage from this source on the earnings of our Canadian railroads. When I say that the railroads do feel the effect upon their revenues of this water competition, as to which no remedy is suggested in the Duff report, probably because that subject was not within their purview, I should like to submit this. I find at page 1598 of the evidence taken before the commission that Mr. H. C. Patton of the Toronto Transportation Company said:

> The increasing use of waterways, of pipe lines and diversions of traffic through the Panama canal has decreased the freight tonnage available for railways.
> The long term trend of freight tonnage carried by vessels on the great lakes has been steadily upwards.

I have not got the figures of the corresponding decrease in the transportation by rail, but if transportation by water has increased to this extent then there must be a repercussion downward in the same ratio upon the earnings of the railways.

I shall not place before the house all the figures I have here, but I shall just give a synopsis of them covering the years 1900, 1905, 1910, 1915, 1920, 1925 and 1930, giving in three columns the traffic passing through the St. Lawrence canals, the Welland canal, and the Sault Ste. Marie canal:

St. Lawrence Canals

Year—	Tonnage
1900	1,309,000
1905	1,752,000
1910	2,760,000
1915	3,409,000
1920	3,067,000
1925	6,206,000
1930	6,179,000

Those figures show that there has been a rapid and continuous increase of tonnage through the St. Lawrence canals from 1900 to 1930. Here are the figures for the Welland canal:

Welland Canal

Year—	Tonnage
1900	719,000
1905	1,092,000
1910	2,326,000
1915	3,061,000
1920	2,276,000
1925	5,640,000
1930	6,087,000

Our railways must certainly have felt the repercussion of the increase in traffic through the Welland canal. But what do we find in the case of the Sault Ste. Marie canal?

Sault Ste. Marie Canal

Year—	Tonnage
1900	25,640,000
1905	44,270,000
1910	62,363,000
1915	71,290,000
1920	79,279,000
1925	81,871,000
1930	72,897,000

One can readily conclude from those figures that the railroads must of necessity have felt a tremendous drainage on their revenues due to water competition.

Coming to the bill itself, at this late stage of the debate, Mr. Speaker, there is very little to say that has not already been said. I shall not detain the house at very great length with a consideration of the various aspects of the bill. This is the second reading, and I take it that on the second reading only the principle of the bill is under consideration. One of the first matters with which I was concerned was to learn the principle of the bill. I could not find it from the preamble, except that in that part of the bill cooperation was mentioned. The part of the bill respecting the title is short, and does not enlighten me to any great extent. There is a part of clause 2, however, which I should like to see implemented when the bill reaches committee stage. I refer to paragraph (a), in which the rights of railroad employees are supposedly safeguarded. I do not know to what extent that safeguard may be effective, but if there are to be any changes in or departures from the protection now afforded in the Railway Act to railway employees, we may as well know it right now. That Railway Act is the result of many years of experience and has been amended time and again. In so far as their protection is concerned, apparently the men are satisfied with its provisions, and I most earnestly urge that whatever may be done under the bill, any measure of protection which the railway men now enjoy under the Railway Act should in no way be molested or prejudiced.

I am rather doubtful about section 4 of the bill, which deals with the appointment of the three trustees. In my view a larger number of trustees, not exceeding five, would be much better. I am not unmindful, however, of the very strong reasons given to the contrary by the right hon. the Prime Minister, and I am content to admit there is considerable weight in what he said. Nevertheless I believe that more adequate representation would be given to the various organizations, divisions of trade and activity in Canada if there were at least five appointed. If under section 6, in order to remove any political colour or shade it is possible to appoint subsequent trustees from a certain panel, why would it not be possible to do the same thing and to use the same means in the appointment of the first three or five, as the case may be? I believe the government, if it is really sincere—and I have no reason to doubt its sincerity—and desires to remove this matter from the sphere of party politics, could arrange for the appointment of the first three or five in the same way that subsequent trustees are appointed.

Now we come to part II, which is supposed to contain the principle of the bill. In that connection I do not know whether the principle is contained in section 12, section 16 or section 17. But with the purpose of the bill as enunciated in section 16 I have no great quarrel, if it can be demonstrated that the real principle is to effect economies. I believe the Canadian people to-day desire that economies should be made. I doubt, however, the wisdom of making them in the way proposed in the measure now before us. If by this bill parliament is given power to do what it seeks to do, I wonder whether it will not proceed right down the line and investigate other private corporations. It is quite true that after all the Canadian National system is the railroad of the Canadian people. We will not quibble as to who has the equity of redemption, as to who is the bondholder or the holder of securities; the fact is that the Canadian National is the railroad of the Canadian people. It is very easy for us to investigate matters over which we have special jurisdiction, but I doubt the wisdom of investigating privately owned corporations to the extent contemplated in this measure. Why do we not investigate hydro commissions, the Bell Telephone Company, telegraph companies, grain growers' associations, banks and other financial institutions in order to force them to effect economies? The line must be drawn somewhere; but with the principle of effecting economies I am fully in accord. I doubt very much, however, whether this is a wise step in that direction.

The other day in a very able address the Minister of Railways stressed economies which had been effected in the Canadian National railways during the last year. Those economies reflected considerable improvement. But if that is true of the Canadian National I wonder if it is not true also of the Canadian Pacific. I have no means of finding out what economies, if any, have been effected by the Canadian Pacific during the past year. But surely if the Canadian National was able to economize to the extent shown by the minister, the Canadian Pacific must have done the same.

It is quite true that the Prime Minister, in order to remove any doubt in the minds of hon. members, said that there was no intention of any amalgamation, and if I understood him rightly he said the government was prepared to introduce an amendment to the bill to make it clear that there was no thought of amalgamation. Concerning amalgamation the Minister of Railways is reported at page 2770 of Hansard as follows:

> There is nothing in it—
> Referring to the bill.
> —to cause anyone to fear that it may lead to the amalgamation of the two great railway systems of Canada because the whole trend and spirit of the bill as well as every clause and letter of it points to cooperation, and cooperation means, and can only mean, the working together of the two parties to an understanding.

Here we have the minister saying that the whole trend and spirit of the bill, every clause and letter of it, points to cooperation. Well, in clause 3, outside of the definition of the term "dispute," there is no mention of cooperation at all. I have gone through the whole bill and have found that there is not a tittle of evidence of cooperation in sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15. Section 16 is the one dealing with economies. Certainly section 17 does not show any spirit of cooperation, because that is the section which sets up the tribunal which must operate in the absence of cooperation. Section 18 deals with the creation of the chairman of the arbitral tribunal, which functions when there is no cooperation. Sections 20 to 26 deal with practice in matters of routine. So that out of the whole twenty-six sections of the bill there is only one that deals with cooperation, and that is the worst one. This cooperation provided for in section 17 is compulsory cooperation. To me it seems that such a phrase as "compulsory cooperation" or "directed cooperation" or "instructed" or "forced" cooperation is bad English, because of its redundancy. I cannot imagine cooperation that is not voluntary. It is something like saying wet water or black jet or cold ice. The very spirit of forcible cooperation is contained in that section as the fruit is contained in the seed. I shall not labour the point, because the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) expressly dealt with it. But even if there were a special amendment to this bill declaring that at no time should there be amalgamation, then a most radical amendment must follow in the tenor of section 17, because it means insidious, compulsory cooperation. I think it is quite obvious that step by step, inch by inch, a little here and a little there, the tribunal may make certain orders, certain rulings, certain leases, probably not at the time openly with the view of ultimate amalgamation, but in fact producing in the final result complete amalgamation of these lines. The hon. Minister of Railways has said that there is to be no amalgamation. I will take his word that in the bill there is no explicit mention of amalgamation, and no desire to have amalgamation. The hon. gentleman is much cleverer as a physician than I am as a lawyer, but still—and I say it without offence—I am entitled to my own opinion. I do believe that in this section 17 amalgamation is just as insidiously contained as typhoid fever is in the bacilli coli. That is my impression.

This section is to impose compulsory or directed cooperation. I admit that my knowledge of the English language is most limited; my training is French, but I cannot conceive in French of anything like compulsory cooperation. In my own language that would be nonsense, and I do not think there is any difference between French common sense and English common sense or between English nonsense and French nonsense. I think any brain will react to truth in the same way, whether it be in an English or in a French cranium. To my mind I cannot see how one can dissociate the effect of amalgamation from section 17 as it now stands in the bill.

The hon. Minister of Railways said further that cooperation means and can only mean the working together of the two parties to an understanding. What does that mean? Working together means with a mind in common, therefore in harmony. There can be no compulsion, no direction, no order. I will be asked: What about the judicial decision when two parties come before a court and the judge decides so and so? The judgment must be obeyed; but is that compulsory cooperation? Not in the slightest; there is an absolute difference between the two. In the first place, suppose one company desires to close its terminal or shop and says to the other: We will use yours; then there is an arbitration and the tribunal orders that that shall be done. In case of litigation it is a question of the settlement of legal rights; one party may think he is being prejudiced by the other in the enjoyment of his right. Then the one who thinks he is suffering an injustice goes to court, the other appears, the case is heard, the decision of the tribunal is a declaration of legal rights, and both parties must accept the decision and forever after hold their peace.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is now before the house for second reading has been long awaited by the people of this country. We have in Canada a country of far flung borders, a country stretching over three thousand miles from sea to sea, and from river unto the land's end, and naturally the means of communication between one part and another are of the greatest importance. If one looks over the pages of Hansard from confederation until the present time one sees that railway matters have occupied much space. Many of the great and notable scenes in this house were inspired by railway affairs, and many important decisions on matters of railway policy have been made in days gone by. It seems to me that at this time we are about to make another important decision; we are changing the policy that has been followed regarding railways. This bill, as I see it, is intended to give guidance to railway activities during the period of depression, to give direction, as it were, during the transition period through which we are now passing. The ultimate aim and object, of course, is to lighten the intolerable burden of taxation which the railway obligations impose upon this country. The legislation has not been hastily brought before this house; the Duff commission made a pretty thorough investigation, travelled over the country, tried to see everything with their own eyes, examined many important witnesses, and we have here the net result of their deliberations. This bill, together with the report of the commission, was carefully dealt with in the Senate. In reading the discussion which took place there we are at once convinced that much thought has been given to the framing of the different clauses of the bill. But though the Duff commission considered the matter and though it has been discussed in the Senate, we in the House of Commons may view some of the sections in rather a different light. We may approach this problem from a different angle, and we cannot altogether divest ourselves of the responsibility of inquiring carefully into the objects and aims of this legislation.

Speaking yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) remarked that he expected that great changes would be made under this legislation; he pointed out that he thought economies could be effected and said that some sacrifices would have to be made by people in different parts of the country if we were to have that retrenchment which we all hope will be brought about. But no matter how those changes are made and no matter what tribunal may be set up, I feel sure that the people of Canada will hold the government of the day responsible for carrying out this work and will feel free to appeal to the government against any decisions with which they do not agree that may be made by that tribunal. The Prime Minister also intimated that in case the changes did not result in the hoped for economies, in the near future a plebiscite might be taken to determine whether or not the people of this country would be willing to amalgamate the railways either under private or public ownership. I would humbly suggest that a plebiscite on this one question alone would hardly give this government and this parliament the necessary information.

It is my submission, Mr. Speaker, that the prosperity of the railways is bound up with the prosperity of the country generally, and that we cannot expect favourable balance sheets from our railways while business in other lines is in a depressed state. Along with our railway problem we must consider the general economic situation of the country. We must consider the questions of banking, of currency, of finance and so on, because these things either make or break the ability of the people to purchase the goods which are to be transported from one part of the country to the other. I think the trade policy in particular has much to do with our railways.

They are equipped to handle great tonnage, and if we have a trade policy that restricts external trade and consequently causes poverty so that our internal trade is restricted also, we cannot have prosperous transportation systems. The Prime Minister intimated that other courses were open. If he and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) could decide upon some course of action that would give us reduced freight rates, no matter how much courage it might take, I believe more goods would be transported. If the prices of manufactured commodities such as machinery and clothing were reduced to harmonize with the prices of natural products much more buying power would be in evidence and more business would be done.

To-night I should like to mention briefly two or three factors which have to do with the railway situation. The first will be the obvious statement that the railways of this country were constructed to transport freight and passengers over long and short distances. However, since the advent of the truck and automobile the railways have been compelled more and more to retire from the short haul field and concentrate on the long hauls. They find that their most profitable sphere, in which there is the least competition, is the long haul of bulk commodities, and to a great extent this restricts their field of activities. If the railways are to succeed they must compete with trucks, automobiles, aeroplanes and other types of transportation, and if they are to do this there must be some control over their greatest competitor, the trucks. I realize that this is largely a provincial matter, but it seems to me that since the railways have built and must maintain rights of way the heavy trucks should contribute more generously towards the cost of the highways which they use and abuse to such a great extent. These trucks should submit to a tariff of rates; they should have drivers with well defined qualifications, and they should prove their ability to provide compensation for personal or property damage which may result from accidents in which they are concerned.

The second factor to which I wish to direct attention might be called the human factor in connection with the railroad. I have had the opportunity of coming in close contact with railwaymen for a number of years; I think I have learned something of their psychology and I should like to remind the Minister of Railways of something of which he no doubt is well aware. I refer to the loyalty and devotion of the officers and men of the two railway systems; I think that is something of which we might well be proud. They give wholehearted cooperation in their common interests. They are willing to sacrifice their comforts and their own desires for the benefit of the company. The senior officers, particularly of the Canadian Pacific Railway, with which I am best acquainted, make a point of speaking to and encouraging the junior officers and men. I venture to say that Mr. Grant Hall can call almost any of the older railway men by their first names. These veterans of the road, who work so faithfully for the company, regard the interests of the company as a personal matter; they delight in its successes and are cast down and discouraged by its failures. Even the younger men very soon catch this spirit. They are anxious to protect the property of the company, to get as much business as they can and to provide efficient service for their customers. Railwaymen are especially qualified for the work they undertake. Before they can obtain employment on the railways they must submit to a severe medical examination, and unless they are almost perfect physically they cannot obtain employment. Then, after they are employed, each year they must submit to eye tests and intelligence tests to satisfy the examiner that they are to the standard. Moreover, if any accident occurs or if there is any difficulty in connection with the work, any railway man can be asked to submit to a thorough examination, and if some slight difficulty is found that man's services are not very long retained.

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) the other day pointed out some of the knowledge that railway men must have, and as well as having that knowledge they are required to assume great responsibilities. The despatcher sits through long hours of the night before his key; the machinist in the shop must see that the work he turns out is perfect; the running men, conductors and engineers, are charged with heavy responsibilities; all these men have important work to perform and they must be competent, sure and trustworthy. They must think quickly and often act very promptly because they have in their hands responsibility for and control over the valuable property of the company and the much more valuable lives of passengers and crew.

These men when retired owing to the age limit are given a retiring allowance. That being so, should they not also be given a retiring allowance when they are laid off as a result of economies which may be brought about under this bill? If a railway company buys a lot of material for the purpose of perfecting its construction, it issues bonds and pays interest on that money. Why should not the human material also receive something, when it has been specially prepared for the work it has undertaken? These men are in danger so far as their own lives and limbs are concerned, and the risks they take in carrying on their work from day to day are much greater than the risks in any ordinary sphere of activity.

The final factor to which I wish to call attention is the present financial position of the roads. No industry in Canada has been so heavily subsidized throughout the years as the railway industry, and at present we find that the taxpayer's money has to be used to the extent of fifty-eight or sixty million dollars a year in order to make up the deficits of the state-owned system, the Canadian National Railways. We find that in years gone by governments gave money to the railways which now make up the national system, to the extent of a billion dollars; and, as has been said, in addition to that the governments have advanced practically another $1,300,000,000, some of which they have directly guaranteed while some of it has been secured by a first mortgage on the whole property. So that that vast sum must be paid as well as the interest on it. The deficit in the last few years has been about $58,000,000, which is a tremendous sum of money. Think of what could be accomplished socially with that sum. Much joy could be brought to the homes of the people, for with that money we could feed, clothe and shelter twice as many people as are now receiving assistance under the relief funds. We could pay pensions to every man and woman over the age of seventy throughout the dominion, and the difficulty in raising this much money and directing it to that end, to make up the deficits, is a severe strain on the very solvency of the country. It takes practically all that can be raised by personal income tax, and as the revenues are shrinking it is becoming more and more difficult to procure this money.

In conclusion, may I state that in the changes which will be made in the railway policy of Canada the human element must not be overlooked; and next to that provision must be made so that the railways can act in that sphere where they are most competent, namely, in the long hauls. After that has been accomplished, economies must be made. Perhaps the number of officials might be reduced and possibly certain savings could be effected by the joint use of terminals and tracks. Perhaps services less costly might be given certain districts. The people of Canada, the business people, the taxpayers of the country, are I believe determined that this deficit shall be cut off because they are discouraged by the heavy taxation which is involved. I quite realize that difficulties may beset the path of anyone who works in this direction. The route may be steep and rugged and courage may be required; but I believe that if this bill results in the attainment of this objective a service will have been done the people of the country and the age in which we live.

[Mr. Gershaw.]

On motion of Mr. Sanderson the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Monday, March 13, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

REPARATIONS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): As required by section 5 of chapter 5 of the statutes of 1929, I present the further report dated November 30, 1932, and the final report dated March 4, 1933, relating to reparations payments, made by Commissioner Errol M. McDougall, K.C.

In that connection with the consent of the house I should like to make the following motion:

That 500 copies in the English language and 200 copies in the French language of the further report dated November 30, 1932 and the final report dated March 4, 1933 to His Excellency the Governor General, made by Errol M. McDougall, Esquire, a commissioner appointed to investigate and report upon illegal warfare claims and reparations payable in respect thereof laid on the table of the house this day, be printed forthwith, and that standing order 64 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. GORDON: I desire to lay on the table of the house order in council P.C. 439, passed pursuant to the Relief Act of 1932.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 43 to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is simply to define the term "public charge" so as to exclude from the operation of the act those in receipt of unemployment relief.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

Hon HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 44 to amend the Exchequer Court Act (Exclusive Jurisdiction)

Mr. LAPOINTE: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill is intended to confer jurisdiction upon the Exchequer court, as a complementary measure to Bill No. 40 respecting visiting forces of His Majesty from other commonwealths of the British dominions. At the present time there is no court having jurisdiction to deal with such cases, and it is the purpose of this bill to confer that jurisdiction upon the Exchequer court.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CONTROL OF CURRENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it his intention to speak to this house concerning an article in this morning's press in which the right hon. leader of the government in the Senate is quoted as saying:

> But I do feel that we must increase the basis of currency so that an increase in currency itself may take place. We must also devise some means of getting that currency into the hands of those who are capable of effectively controlling it.

Does this expression by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Senate represent the authorized view of the government?

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I would like to ask again, in view of the fact that the disarmament conference has reached a most critical part of its work, whether Canada is represented there at the present time, and by whom?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): In consequence of the gravity of the situation the government asked the High Commissioner for Canada at London, together with the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, Doctor Skelton, who has been familiar with the matter from the very inception to date, to go to Geneva to represent the dominion with the Canadian government's advisory officer. They reached Geneva just prior to the arrival of the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. They are to-day in Geneva representing Canada in that regard.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 42 respecting the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company—Mr. Bradette.

QUESTIONS

GOLD EXPORT

Mr. COOTE:

What cause must be shown by any party desiring to export gold in order to secure a licence under the Gold Export Act?

Mr. RHODES: The Gold Export Act is administered with a view to safeguarding existing monetary gold reserves, and to mobilize current gold production, purchased at the world price, for purposes of the dominion government. Applications for export, not compatible with these objects, are not entertained.

G. N. PELLAND

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has Mr. G. N. Pelland, chief herdsman at the experimental farm of Sainte-Anne de la Pocatière, been dismissed?
2. If so, what were the nature of the complaints lodged against him, and who lodged such complaints?
3. Have these complaints been investigated?
4. If not, why?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. Yes.
2. Mr. J. A. Barrette, M.P., wrote that to his personal knowledge Mr. Pelland was guilty of active political partisanship.
3. No.
4. It has never been the custom to hold an investigation when a member of parliament states that to his personal knowledge an employee has been guilty of active political partisanship.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF REIMBURSEMENT

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Have any sums received by the provincial governments from the federal government, and to be applied to the relief and unemployment fund, not been reimbursed?
2. If so, will the federal government deduct such advances from the subsidy to be paid the provinces?

Mr. CAHAN: In duty bound I referred this question to the department interested, and they say that it is not expressed so as to give an intelligent idea of what is required by the hon. member, and that they cannot answer it in its present form. I suggest that the question be dropped and redrafted and placed on the order paper at a later date.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

*BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Is the government aware of the attempts of Mr. R. O. Sweezey and his associates acting on behalf of the Beauharnois enterprise, to sell power to United States interests?
2. Have any representations been made to the government by the Beauharnois interests or by Mr. R. O. Sweezey, for permission to export power to the United States?
3. If so, what action does the government propose to take?
4. Does the government propose to have the question of the ownership of the Beauharnois power settled by reference to the privy council?
5. Is the government aware of an offer for the Beauharnois enterprise made in September, 1931, by the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, consolidated?
6. If so, will the government table the said offer and any correspondence in connection therewith?

Mr. BENNETT: These questions are difficult to answer. As to the first, no formal request has been made to the government with respect to the sale or export of power, but Mr. Sweezey, in the course of conversations, and other people as well, I fancy connected with the enterprise, have made the statement that they thought electrical energy could be sold in the United States. Therefore to answer "yes" or "no" would be difficult.

No formal permission to export power has been given, nor has any request been made formally for permission to export power to the United States. In any event the provisions of provincial statutes preclude the possibility of it being conveyed across highways or public places. Neither this, nor any government as far as I know, is in the habit of stating policy in respect of matters before the conditions necessitating the question of jurisdiction arise.

As to the fourth question, the government does not propose at the present time to submit the question to the privy council.

To the question relating to the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, the answer is much more difficult. There were statements made from time to time, but the correspondence that was brought down at the last session clearly indicates the extent to which they assumed any definite form, as to the possibility of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company taking over the Beauharnois enterprise in September, 1931. In view of the fact that from time to time all the correspondence of importance has been tabled and that the motion that stands in the hon. gentleman's name asks that the balance of the correspondence be brought down, I do not think I can answer the question except in the manner indicated.

PATENT RECORD

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

What was the total cost of publishing the Patent Record, including printing, cost of cuts, binding, and other details, for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1931, and March 31, 1932?

Mr. CAHAN: $35,000 for each of the said fiscal years.

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT—QUEBEC

Mr. LAFLECHE:

Has any correspondence been exchanged between the government of the province of Quebec and the federal government concerning the extension of the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act to the province of Quebec.

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: A very large number of papers have been copied and the copies have been laid upon the table of the house. I assume that the hon. member making the motion does not intend that this work should be duplicated, if so it would take a very long time to complete the return.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As a matter of fact in the original draft I have the words "balance of." They should be in this.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion amended to include the words "balance of."

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Friday, March 10, consideration of the motion of Hon. R. J. Manion for the second reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks on this question I am fully conscious of the fact, after listening to the very excellent speeches which have been made by hon. members in all corners of the house, that one taking part in the debate at this time cannot very well cover any new ground and must repeat, though perhaps not in the same words, many things that have been said already. However, I believe this debate to be one of the most important that we have had in this house for some years, because it opens up the whole question of transportation facilities in this country, a question which vitally concerns every taxpayer in Canada. Therefore, with the indulgence of the house, I should like to add a few remarks to what has been said previously.

In passing I should like to commend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), as other members have done, for the tone of his address in introducing the bill now before the house. He placed the debate on a very high plane, if I may say so, and I shall endeavour to follow him in that regard.

I should like to say first, Mr. Speaker, that the history of railroad construction in this young vigorous country in some respects does not make very good reading. Undoubtedly mistakes have been made. There have been not only errors in judgment on the part of some railway promoters; there have been errors in judgment, if you like, by previous governments both Liberal and Conservative. I am not going to dwell upon that aspect of the case because I have not sufficient time at my disposal, but for a moment or two I should like to direct my remarks to the present position of our railway companies. To-day in this country we have two great railway companies. One is privately owned, well managed and well financed; it has served the people of this country in a very efficient way for a great many years. The other day the Prime Minister stated that the securities of the Canadian Pacific Railway were held not only in Canada but also in the United States, in Great Britain and in almost every country in the world, and those securities always have held a high place in the financial markets of the world. We must admit that when this great railway was being constructed it received very substantial aid from the country, not only by way of money but also by way of large grants of land. I do not take exception to that, because this was a pioneer company which did wonderful work in building this railway line from one end of this country to the other. As a matter of fact I am free to admit—though I hold no brief for the Canadian Pacific Railway—that at present, despite the fact that during the last two or three years its earnings have been depleted because of world economic conditions, it stands to-day as perhaps one of the best managed privately owned railway companies in the world, and it has done a great deal to develop Canada and to advertise this country all over the world.

Side by side with this great privately owned company we have what is known as the people's railway, the Canadian National system. I am not going back to the time when the companies which now make up the Canadian National system were taken over by the government of the day; the other day the Prime Minister went into this question very fully. But I do not want to forget, and I do not believe the people of Canada will forget, that this conglomeration of bankrupt railways, if I may so term them, which were wished on this country and which now comprise the Canadian National system, were taken over by the government at a time when a decision had to be made as to whether the country would clean the slate and take its huge losses in money which had been advanced to these roads, or would take them over and run them as a publicly owned and publicly controlled road. I am not going into that phase of the question but, Mr. Speaker, as I believe the Canadian Pacific system is one of the outstanding privately owned railways in the world so I believe that the system owned and controlled by this country stands out as one of the best managed and best organized publicly owned railways in the world, despite the fact that it is going through heavy weather at the present time.

We have, then, Mr. Speaker, these two great competing railway systems, and sometimes I think we do not realize their immensity. In round figures the Canadian Pacific Railway has in Canada some sixteen thousand miles of track, in addition to which it controls a certain mileage in the United States. The Canadian National system owns about twenty-two thousand miles of track in Canada, in round figures, and also controls some mileage in the United States. These two railway corporations control about 40,000 miles of track and have employed in normal times, the two together, about 190,000 men. In normal times they have paid out in salaries and wages to employees as large a sum as $290,000,000 a year. That will give some idea of the immensity of the business carried on by the two great railway systems of Canada. They have both been successful until the present period of depression struck this country in common with the rest of the world.

I have nothing but praise both for the Canadian Pacific Railway and for the Canadian National, except in one regard. I have always been of the opinion that the management of both railways were very slow in attempting to cope with a new form of competition that has entered the field, competition of enormous magnitude, namely, the commercial motor truck. In my opinion this motor truck competition when it first appeared could have been combated by the railways if they had put their own trucks into operation. Had they done this at the outset of this competition the earnings of both railways would have been augmented by many millions of dollars during the last twelve or fifteen years. Apart from this, however, I think that the management has been excellent in both cases.

I hold no brief for Sir Henry Thornton, and perhaps he made mistakes. But for that matter who has not made mistakes in every business, in every walk of life, during the good times we had in this country for a number of years? I will say this, however, in praise of Sir Henry Thornton. In the number of years during which he was president and general manager of the Canadian National Railways his achievements far outnumbered any mistakes he ever made. There was a time when the earnings of the Canadian National system were piling up, when that system went after business and got it, and when the morale of its thousands of employees was at its highest owing to the example set them by their chief, Sir Henry Thornton. At that time no one in this country would dare to get up and say that Sir Henry Thornton was not making a success of the Canadian National Railways; but when conditions began to get bad, when tonnage declined, when business was poor, then the criticism started. The Prime Minister himself gave Sir Henry Thornton a good deal of credit a few years ago. It will be remembered that in 1926 there was a general election in Canada. The present Prime Minister was then Minister of Finance in Mr. Meighen's government—someone says the shadow government. Be that as it may, he was Minister of Finance in that government and during that election campaign to which I have just referred he made several speeches in western Ontario. He went to the city of Stratford in the county of Perth, which is a large divisional point on the Canadian National roads. Many hundreds of railwaymen live there, there are big car shops there, and it is perhaps as important a divisional point as any other in the whole system. The then Minister of Finance in Mr. Meighen's government addressed a meeting in the city of Stratford on the evening of August 14, 1926, for the benefit of the Conservative candidate. He was addressing an audience in which there were hundreds of Canadian National railway employees on whom naturally he wanted to make a good impression, with a view if possible to winning them over for the Conservative candidate. This is what he said then in regard to the Canadian National Railways:

> Mr. Bennett denounced in scathing terms the whispering campaign about the Canadian National Railways, saying that Mr. Meighen had always fought for the road, and had no intention of interfering with its management. In that connection he said that he personally had recommended to Mr. King that Sir Henry Thornton be hired to operate the road. This he had done as a result of information from Mr. Thomas in England, he said, and indicated that he thought Sir Henry Thornton had been successful and that his work would certainly not be interfered with by Mr. Meighen.

Mr. MANION: Merely for information, may I ask the hon. member what he is quoting from.

Mr. SANDERSON: I expected that the Minister of Railways would ask that question and I am happy to be able to inform him. This is an absolutely correct report which appeared in three newspapers at the time. The meeting was held on Saturday, the 14th, and this report appeared in the Toronto Globe on August 16, 1926; in the Stratford Beacon-Herald on August 16, 1926; and—I know that this will please the Minister of Railways and he will take it for granted—in the London Free Press on August 16, 1926. So that it is official.

I find no fault with the remarks of the then Minister of Finance in Mr. Meighen's government, but I am inclined to think that he has since had a change of heart.

An hon. MEMBER: He certainly has.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Mr. SANDERSON: An hon. gentleman says he has, and I accept that. In 1926 the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister apparently not only praised Sir Henry Thornton but wished to get on the band wagon and get all the credit for himself, for he said that he really was the man who had chosen Sir Henry Thornton and had been instrumental in bringing him here. This newspaper report which I have just quoted declares that the right hon. gentleman denounced in scathing terms the whispering campaign in regard to the Canadian National Railways. Well, if there was a whispering campaign then in this country there are more than whisperings at the present time. The Prime Minister last Thursday, in the course of his speech in this debate, virtually said that the Canadian National railway system was bankrupt, and instead of joining in a whispering campaign he almost made an S.O.S. call for the undertaker to bury the whole road. I mention this to show the inconsistency between the remarks of the Prime Minister to-day and the statements which he made when he was Minister of Finance in Mr. Meighen's government, when he spoke in the election campaign of 1926.

I will refer now for a moment or two to the royal commission, the so-called Duff commission, who have laboured and brought in this report upon which is founded the bill now under discussion. The commission was composed of seven gentlemen, all very eminent in their own spheres. I have gone through the report of this commission as carefully as possible and the only conclusion I can arrive at is that after holding eighteen meetings, lasting fifty days and travelling over nearly all the main lines of both these railway systems, they have not told us anything about these railroads which we did not already know. They have told us nothing that the Minister of Railways did not know; they have told us nothing that the right hon. the Prime Minister did not know, they have told us nothing that every hon. member of this house and almost every man in the whole dominion did not know. I shall not take up the time of the house in reading the conclusions of the commission because I suppose every hon. member has read them. All through their report these gentlemen seem to be leaning towards the amalgamation of these two roads. They do not say so in so many words but that is the inference I draw from their report. I want to be fair to the members of this royal commission but as a member of this house I think I have the right to criticize their report if I so desire and my criticism is that most of the gentlemen who composed this commission were in favour of privately owned rather than publicly owned railroads. The report bears out my contention. I repeat, this commission after having gone up and down this country, have not told us anything new. They did make certain recommendations which are embodied in the bill now before us, in the discussion of which I shall take a few minutes.

The bill is divided into three parts. I am only a layman and could not go into the legal aspects of the bill, but I have endeavoured to study it with an entirely open mind. Part I of the bill deals with the substitution of three trustees or receivers, as the Prime Minister chooses to call them, for the seventeen directors and general manager who have been administering the affairs of this road for some years. These trustees are given absolute powers in the administration of the affairs of the Canadian National system. They are to be given powers which in my judgment should not be given to any three men. They will be a law unto themselves, they will not be responsible to parliament or to the taxpayers of this country who have been paying the deficits of the Canadian National road. They will be able to do just as they like for a period of seven years. It is true that they can be removed from office by an address to the House of Commons and the Senate but that course would never be taken. They will be vested with authority and responsibilities which should not be vested in any three men no matter how capable they may be, no matter what business sagacity they may possess. It is too much power to be given to any trustees or to any body of men. The Prime Minister said that they would be more receivers than trustees. I was a little puzzled at that definition and I looked up the legal meaning of a receiver. I found that a receiver is a person appointed ordinarily by a court of equitable jurisdiction to receive and hold in trust money or other property pending suit, in the case of a person incompetent to manage his own property or upon the winding up or dissolution of a partnership or corporation. A receiver is an officer of the court and the property held by him is not subject to process other than in the case itself. A receiver often obtains authority to continue to manage the business as a going concern.

These three receivers are to administer the affairs of the Canadian National system for the people of this country for at least the next seven years. As I said before, they are to be vested with authority which should not be vested in any one man or in any three men. They are to be a law unto themselves. I cannot understand why three receivers—that is what the Prime Minister calls them—should be called in at this stage to administer the affairs of this railway. It is the most peculiar receivership of which I have ever heard.

In addition to providing for the appointment of these three receivers, the bill provides for compulsory cooperation or, as the Prime Minister said the other day, directed cooperation between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National roads. What kind of amalgamation is this to be? They will not be joined in wedlock but they will be handcuffed and shackled together. The Canadian National is to be administered by three trustees and by a president who is to be the operating manager. This president is not to be responsible to the Minister of Railways, he is not to be responsible to this parliament, he is to be responsible only to the three trustees. The purport of this bill is to join these two great railroads together and, as I said, handcuff them and shackle them and keep them in that position for seven years.

A study of the history of the railroads of the United States will show that during the war the government administered the railroads, although at the moment I cannot say whether this was done under trustees, receivers or just what form of control was used. But the result of the control vested in private individuals by the government was that they made bankrupt every railroad which they were permitted to manage. That has been the history of trusteeship or receivership, if you like, in the United States. While I do not want to be pessimistic; while I do not want to make any prophecies as to the future, I am of opinion that if this bill goes into effect, one of three things will happen within the next seven years. One will be that we shall have complete amalgamation of these two railways, either the absorption of the Canadian Pacific by the publicly owned road or the absorption of the publicly owned by the privately owned road, or both roads will be so impaired, so restricted in business that this will constitute one of the biggest calamities Canada has ever experienced.

The very conclusions at which the royal commission arrived in regard to economy and cutting down of expenses have been put into effect during the last two years. This started before the royal commission began to function and it has been continuing. Some hon. members during the debate have pointed out—I think the Minister of Railways did so—that Mr. Hungerford's report was to the effect that in the administration of the Canadian National in the last two years there had been a saving of $44,000,000 a year due to cutting off trains, perhaps letting out some men and the elimination of duplication. That having already been done, this board proposes to tie these two systems together, the Canadian National under a trusteeship and the Canadian Pacific under its own board of directors. I hold no brief for Mr. Beatty, but I want to read what he said in Winnipeg on February 3. Let me read this paragraph, quoting Mr. Beatty's own words:

> I have stated on more than one occasion the objections of the Canadian Pacific to the commission's plan. We are prepared to agree to all proper measures of cooperation, but we cannot consent to our property being administered for us, but at our expense, by others. We cannot agree to turning over to an arbitrary body the conduct of our enterprise and the shaping of our policies, when, in the nature of things, the consequences must be borne by the shareholders. The views of those charged with the responsibility of protecting the enormous investment in the Canadian Pacific would not, in these circumstances, prevail. This is not regulation; it is the assumption of complete powers of administration without financial responsibility.

That is the opinion of Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but under this bill he is compelled to tie his system up with the Canadian National. In my humble opinion the cure for the situation in which the two railways find themselves is the one that could be applied to every individual in this country. The reason that these two great systems are in their present condition is that they have not tonnage; they have not business. Give them business and tonnage—and I hope before long we shall have them back—these two railways will again be serving the Canadian people in the efficient manner they did a few years ago. Further, the railways will never be back to normal tonnage until our agricultural industry is back on a footing whereby the product of the farm can be sold at a profit. When that occurs, these railways will not want for tonnage. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon),—and I welcome him to our side of the house, because I see he is here—said the other day that the Canadian National system was in red ink. There is not an individual or an industry in Canada that is not in red ink. I am of the opinion that the manufacturers of red ink are perhaps the only people who are out of it, because they must be doing a large amount of business. Everyone is in red ink. It is true that the Canadian National, this great system of which we were all so proud a few years ago, is in red ink. But I give it, only as my opinion, that the Canadian people, irrespective of politics in regard to the Canadian National, in the condition in which it is to-day, if you like, in red ink and with huge deficits, still consider that it is one of the greatest assets we have and posterity will show that they are right.

In conclusion, I say: Hands off the Canadian National Railways. Let it work out its own destiny, not tied up with the Canadian Pacific Railway, not administered by three trustees who are not responsible to anybody, who are not responsible to this parliament and who are a law unto themselves. Let the present manager of the Canadian National and his directors, if you like, who come from all sections of the country and who know the local problems, continue to function. Let them go on carefully as they are doing, keeping down expenses, and when conditions change we shall not hear very much about the woeful position of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the railway situation in the Dominion of Canada is, I am free to admit, rather serious, but not more serious than that of other industries. We are not discussing this bill and this question to-day solely because of the railway situation. We are studying it largely because of the tremendous worldwide economic depression of which Canada has experienced her full share, due partly to her own policies, partly to policies in other countries and partly to other factors. We have had in the last four years a shrinkage of about 50 per cent in world trade. The British note mailed to Washington last December referred to the depression as one of unparalleled severity. It has been called an economic blizzard and several other names indicating that most people thought it was the worst depression we ever had. The report of the committee on transportation calls attention to this as being one of the contributing factors but the railway problem is not any more serious than the agricultural, the manufacturing or the financial question or that of government, federal, provincial and municipal, with regard to deficits, and unless we can get some other commission or some other means of dealing with the depression as it affects other industries, it is not worth while dealing with this bill or trying to do anything with the railways; we are heading for disaster. Personally, I do not think we are heading towards a disaster although we have already experienced something which might be termed that. I believe that to-day and during the last few years the world has been learning lessons which will be of immense value in the future. When one studies all the troubles confronting the world, considers the position of industry generally, and the economic life of this and other countries, one feels as though all the waves and billows have gone over it.

Some of the speeches made in the house have indicated that members are under the impression that the trouble is due to extravagance. To some degree I share the views of hon. members who have spoken kindly concerning Sir Henry Thornton, and yet in my judgment in the last eight or nine years some inexcusable things have been done. There was extravagance shown by the railways in the building of hotels, in the development of steamships, and passenger services. But, Mr. Speaker, those were not the factors which made the real railway problem, if we want to discuss it as a problem distinct from all others. The railway problem in Canada was made previous to the war, and any hon. member who has doubts in the matter would do well to read the Drayton-Acworth commission report of 1917. Anyone who considers that report carefully must come to the conclusion that it was what happened previous to 1914, the excess mileage built in those years and the railways planned during that period, which is responsible for the real railway difficulties from which we suffer to-day. Among other things that report states that Canada had room for two transcontinental systems, but not for three. I believe that is the chief problem. If hon. members would examine the evidence submitted to the commission and study the report prepared by three gentlemen, one from the United States and two from the Department of Finance, they will find that the duplications set out as being unnecessary were duplications of transcontinental mileage mainly, and have nothing to do with branch lines.

There is of course another reason for our great surprise to-day. Is is that no one—railway executives, bankers, or any other people outside of a few economists—had any idea five years ago what was going to happen. They were caught as much by surprise as were the farmer and his hired man, the bricklayer or the hodcarrier. And if anything has tended to make me lose faith in supermen it is my study of this question. When I was very young I lost faith in Santa Claus. A little later in life I gave up hero-worship. To-day certainly I have lost the last vestige of faith in supermen. They are a relic of barbarism and superstition belonging to the age of tribal medicine men and witch doctors.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You have lost faith even in prime ministers?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): It applies to all supermen.

Mr. JACOBS: Would the hon. member go as far as to say that all the supermen are in the soup?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I rise particularly to deal with that section of the report prepared by Mr. Loree respecting tonnage hauled on a certain mileage of railway. In his speech the Prime Minister referred to the fact that the commission had considered what had been done during the last few years in connection with branch lines. His words are:

> They saw all that was implied and involved in the branch line programs to which effect had been given and they learned with dismay of the financial position.

Between the years 1904 and 1917 the railway mileage in Canada was doubled. During those years we completed mileages ranging from 514 miles in one year up to about 5,000 miles in another. During the years following 1923 we built a few hundred miles annually. I challenge anybody to show that the branch lines built since 1923 loaded the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway with anything which might be described as a real financial problem. The Duff report calls attention to the fact that we have less population per mile of railroad than has any other country in the world. That is only a half truth. Canada stands twenty-third in the list of countries, so far as population is concerned. China is at the top with a population of 444,000,000 and Canada comes in twenty-third along with Ethiopia and the Belgian Congo with 10,000,000. But where is Canada with respect to export trade? In 1929 the United States was at the top, with the United Kingdom running a close second, Germany third, France fourth and Canada fifth. Speaking before the royal commission, Mr. Hungerford, the acting president of the Canadian National Railways, pointed out that while between the years 1900 and 1929 the railway mileage increased by 135 per cent, the gross earnings of railways in the same period increased 656 per cent and the external trade of the country increased by 645 per cent.

We all know that Canada's railways have been laid out with the idea in mind of a vast export trade. Canada is, and has been for a number of years, leading the world in the export of wheat, and our wheat area is located farther from the sea than the area of any other country exporting wheat to the great markets of the world. It is preposterous to state that because we have less population per mile of railroad than has any other country of the world, we are over-railroaded. That is but a half truth, and before we can thoroughly appraise the whole situation it is necessary that we should understand several other factors regarding the trade of Canada, where it comes from, what it is, and its proportion in relation to the total trade of the world.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And the area of the territory.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Yes. In 1929 while we had only one-twelfth the population of the United States, our trade was one-quarter the volume of the trade of the United States. Section 102 of the report is as follows:

> Commissioner Loree, who contributed the studies involved in the preceding tables, has also supplied freight traffic density diagrams showing lines of heavy, medium and light traffic. The first category includes lines carrying annually in excess of 2,750,000 net ton miles per mile of road; the second, the lines carrying less than 2,750,000 and more than 250,000 net ton miles per annum; the third, the lines carrying annually less than 250,000 net ton miles per mile of road annually. In the United States the right to exist, when tested by economic experience, of all railway mileage in the third group is under challenge.

Then he goes on to deal with the percentages.

I wish to mention the right to exist. That statement appears to say that the branch lines built since 1923 were not justified. The Prime Minister in his reference to Mr. Loree said he was not a trunk line man, they tried to get a trunk line man but did not secure one. But Mr. Loree is supposed to be an expert in railways matters. Perhaps it is as well to read the rest of this section.

> In Canada 42 per cent of the total mileage carries less than five per cent of the total net ton miles, and falls within the third group. Medium traffic lines, comprising 48 per cent of the total mileage, carry 45 per cent of the total net ton miles, while the heavy traffic is confined to the remaining 10 per cent of the total mileage, which carries 50 per cent of the total net ton miles. The light traffic divisions constitute 42 per cent, or 17,658 of the 42,075 miles of railway in the dominion. Were it possible to abandon this economically unsound mileage, the mileage remaining and now carrying 95 per cent of the net ton miles, would be about 58 per cent of that now in existence.

In other words the right to exist of 17,000 miles of railway in Canada is challenged. If you blotted out this economically unsound mileage the remainder would be about 58 per cent. Now what about that? My point is that Mr. Loree and the commission in accepting that statement and putting it here, utterly failed to grasp the significance of branch lines. That section of the report distinctly leaves that impression. We have on pages 32 to 40 the different zones. First an illustration showing traffic density, and on page 33 the totals. In the Atlantic coast to Levis, zone 1, shown on page 34, we have 2,096 miles of medium traffic and 3,161 miles of light traffic.

On page 35, Quebec to Detroit and Sudbury, zone 2, we have more heavy traffic, the total being 1,501 miles; medium traffic, 5,810 miles and light traffic 3,899 miles.

On page 36, Detroit and Sudbury to Port Arthur, zone 3, we have 2,061 miles of medium and 144 miles of light traffic.

On page 37, Port Arthur to Calgary and Edmonton, zone 4, we have 2,391 miles of heavy traffic, 7,901 miles of medium and 7,203 of light. And on page 38, Calgary and Edmonton to the Pacific coast, zone 5, 139 miles of heavy traffic, 2,518 of medium and 3,251 of light.

Now will anyone from the Pacific coast not agree at once that the few miles of heavy traffic close to Vancouver are only heavy because of the branch line traffic back of it? Will not anyone agree that the few hundred miles of heavy traffic around Winnipeg and east to Port Arthur is due to the fanlike extension of railways west towards Calgary and Edmonton and the Peace River country? You could not have that dense traffic were it not for that fanlike extension to the west and north. Yet Mr. Loree utterly failed to grasp that. Any board of trustees appointed might accept these figures at their face value and the result would be disastrous to some communities and possibly to the whole of the railways of the Dominion of Canada.

This matter was studied before very thoroughly by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada in the western rates case. Here is what they say. You will find a reference to some heavy traffic lines as well as light ones. This is found in the western freight rates case, April 6, 1914:

> The existing railway mileage is inadequate for the needs of those engaged in farming (in Saskatchewan and Alberta). In the former province 39 per cent, and in the latter 48 per cent of the total acreage is unprovided with railway facilities within a haul of ten miles. Thus farmers living at greater distances spend more in hauling the grain to the railway than it costs to haul the grain by rail from the railway station to Fort William. The governments of these provinces are therefore justified in assisting railway construction so as to shorten the average haul for the farmers.

In dealing with the principle of pro-rating we find this at page 157 of the western rates case:

> A more striking instance of the manner in which the application of the pro-rating principle works out is shown by the Lake Superior division, which is in eastern Canada.

That is one of the heavy and medium traffic lines.

This division, running as it does in great part through a wild and practically unsettled country, accompanied with great operating difficulties, and with, of course, the lowest production of local tonnage per mile of line of any part of the Canadian Pacific railway, nevertheless is shown to make good returns. It has been called by all counsel engaged in this inquiry a bridge over which commerce is compelled to move, the simile of a bridge, of course, being employed by reason of the fact that practically no more local traffic is obtained than would be found in running over a bridge, which, of course is nothing. Yet, as a result of the manner in which the railway's accounts have been divided, and which have been adopted by counsel for the different complainants, the Lake Superior division is shown to be highly productive, the returns for example, of 1911, crediting that division with a net operating revenue of $4,731,287.44, only exceeded by that of Manitoba and Alberta, while Saskatchewan's net operating revenue is shown as $3,745,071.12, a division producing a very large proportion of western traffic. On its face, of course, these figures would show the Lake Superior division to be profitable and one on which a comparatively low local freight rate should be enjoyed, leading, of course, to an absurd conclusion.

Most of the heavy traffic lines set out by Mr. Loree as the ones that have an undoubted right to exist have their heavy traffic because, in addition to the local traffic, they are acting as a bridge for traffic that is gathered from or going out to sparsely settled areas served by the branch lines. If anyone doubts the fact that western prairie lines are profitable, where most of the branch lines have been built since 1923, I refer again to the Drayton-Acworth report, page 36. It is dealing with the Canadian Northern position in 1914. The first two paragraphs relate to the financial position. Then they say:

It will be observed that the first appeal to the government was some months before the war.

The western rates case judgment was given on April 6, 1914, just about the same time. This bears also on that statement so often made about eastern Canada financing railway construction in the west:

No doubt the stringency of the money markets of the world at the time made it more difficult than it otherwise would have been for the company to sell its securities. But that was not all. There was a further cause intrinsic to the company itself. It had gone ahead too fast and had undertaken various extensive schemes, which could not possibly carry themselves from the outset. The Canadian Northern Pacific, the Canadian Northern Ontario, and the Montreal terminal especially implied very serious commitments. And the prairie system, which was self-supporting and yielded a profit, was not sufficiently developed to carry this weight.

If we need further supporting testimony we can get it from the speech delivered in New York by Mr. Beatty on February 22, 1925, before the New York Traffic Club. I am not going to read it all; I should like to refer to only one sentence:

"If," said the speaker, "instead of turning its prairie lines into a portion of a transcontinental system, the owners had been content to make as their termini the mountains on the west, and the great lakes on the east, they would have been the wealthiest men in Canada, and Canada would not to-day be facing the railway burden it is compelled to bear."

I have here a pamphlet on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the present situation and future outlook from the viewpoint of the investor, published by Wood, Struthers and Company, dealers in tested securities, of New York, with comments and criticisms by Mr. Edward W. Beatty, chairman and president. Mr. Beatty's letter is at the end of the pamphlet, so I think this may be taken as authoritative. I quote:

The double tracking of the main line between Winnipeg and Fort William, which is the heaviest traffic division on the Canadian Pacific—

Where there is no local traffic at all.

—over which most of the wheat grown in the prairie provinces must be hauled, has been one of the most outstanding physical contributors to operating efficiency. The operating costs on this division are perhaps the lowest on the entire system.

That bears out the contention expressed by the Board of Railway Commissioners in 1914, showing that branch lines are necessary in order to have heavy traffic lines at all. You might just as well cut off the roots of a tree because they are not as big as the trunk and say, "We do not need them; they are too small and are of no use." I want to state emphatically, Mr. Speaker, and I challenge denial, that the branch lines built through the farming areas of western Canada were justified in practically every particular. Our need is not fewer but more branch lines. I say again that this portion of the report is entirely misleading, and I cannot understand why it should be presented in this light at all. The only favourable thing I can see in this connection is that in spite of the fact that commissioner Loree prepared this study of density of traffic, the commission refused to include branch lines among the list of factors making up the railway problem.

I have here the map included in the report, and I am going to refer to that part of the country with which I am most familiar. This map shows the railways of Canada and indicates those lines whose right to exist is challenged by experience in the United States

If you take the lines running north from Edmonton to serve the Peace River country, those who have been to Peace River know that for the first hundred miles north of Edmonton these lines pass through a well developed farming country. Then, for about 100 miles, there is undeveloped territory with a few sawmills here and there. Then the lines reach the real Peace River farming country, and one of the lines whose right to exist is challenged, according to this map, is the portion which produces all the traffic originating in that farming country, while one of the lines whose right is not challenged is the 100 miles through the territory where there is little local traffic, and where there would be no need of a railway if it were not for the farming district lying beyond.

I listened to the remarks of the Minister of Railways, and I may say that I agreed pretty generally with what he had to say. However, he made one statement to which I should like to refer, because I do not know whether he meant it as it stands in Hansard. He went on to explain it later, but I noticed that one of the newspapers took this portion of his remarks and dealt with it as though it were quite separate. At page 2777 of Hansard for this session the minister said:

> I must confess it was my own conviction—that grain traffic was the paying traffic of the railways. As a matter of fact, it was not so much the wheat and grain traffic that was the paying traffic for the railways as the fact that the people of the west were selling their products at a reasonable price and had the money with which to purchase goods from some other section of the country, thus providing return traffic; and that total traffic brought about the prosperity of the railways.

Some of us have argued as to the importance to the railways of the wheat traffic, and the traffic in agricultural products generally, but I submit that no one from the west who has had enough knowledge of the subject to express an opinion ever thought that the wheat traffic was sufficiently profitable to carry the railways without other traffic. This, however, does bring out the fact that the wheat crop is an originator of new wealth and new purchasing power, and unless the farmers can sell their products at a profit in the markets of the world there will be no real solution for the railway problem in this country for some years, at all events. It is remarkable how steady has been the planted wheat acreage of the west in the face of this shrinking price level, and the steadiness and dependability of the railway service throughout these years when the railway companies have been losing money has greatly contributed to the stability of the situation. I do wish that manufacturing and financial concerns could give the same stability to the development and volume of trade and sales in spite of falling world prices; then we would not have the depression as severe as it is in Canada to-day. But, Mr. Speaker, the farmers have little or no control over the price level of wheat. I think, of course, that a reduction in the wheat acreage, if it could be effected in other countries as well, would help tremendously, and I think we should investigate that possibility. But I notice that the government is not throwing its weight in that direction at the present time. I want to say that the government, through whatever control it has over financial policies, has far more to do with price levels than the farmers have, and to the extent that they acted or did not act they must accept responsibility for the present condition. Any policies that have been adopted that interfere with the purchasing power of the farmers—whether those policies be tariffs or anything else—are contributing to the railway problem of this country. I know, of course, that a great deal of our trouble is world wide; I know the government has done something with regard to prices, but I mention these facts in passing.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the most important part of this bill is the section having to do with compulsory cooperation. I read the amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and while I agree with some parts of it I cannot quite understand why it was brought forward at the time it was moved. I suppose we will have a chance to deal with these matters later on. When it comes to compulsory cooperation, however, I have been wondering if this principle was called to the attention of the hon member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson). Some years ago when we talked about a conpulsory wheat pool in western Canada we were supposed to be advocating something that was communistic; but here we have compulsory cooperation applied to the railways of Canada, the transportation business of the whole dominion, one of our major enterprises.

I have not much fear of communism or socialism or capitalism. I think the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) pointed out that what we had in Canada was a sort of mixture of cooperation and capitalism. I have not much fear of the theories which the ordinary individual has in the back of his head so long as he has common sense enough to know how far they can be applied in connection with the circumstances and affairs with which he is called upon to deal. I wish to state therefore that I intend to support this bill in a general way, although I think it is possible that there are in it some things which I should like to see changed and which I will vote to have changed.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough): The manner in which hon. gentlemen have addressed themselves to this question, which is of such importance in this particularly critical time, is a matter of satisfaction not only to the house but to the country at large. The exposition of the railway situation as given by the leader of the government is worthy of the highest commendation, and the way in which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) set forth the facts will equally commend itself to this house when we remember the high plane on which he kept the discussion. Indeed, throughout this debate, so far, all hon. gentlemen who have spoken have endeavoured to keep the discussion on that same high plane. To my mind this emphasizes the seriousness of the problem with which we are confronted.

I feel disposed to support this measure for some half a dozen reasons. First and foremost to my mind is the fact that the putting of this legislation into effect will do more to arrest the possible collapse of our transportation system than any other piece of legislation that has come before the house in the last decade. Who is there in this chamber who will say that our transportation system was not headed for collapse had we continued to follow the policy of merciless competition and expansion which has been in vogue in the last ten years. The system was bound to collapse if we had continued along that line. We have had an example of what was bound to happen in what has happened to the country to the south of us in connection with another great national necessity; I refer to the collapse of the banking system there. The financial affairs of our railways are on a par with the banking system in importance and, I repeat, we were headed for collapse if action had not been taken.

The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) said a few moments ago that nothing was being done, that nothing new has come to light in this particular Duff report. He said that the Duff commission had only brought in evidence and information that we have all known for the last five or ten years. May I remind that hon. gentleman that during the last ten years his friends have been in power. If therefore they knew all these facts throughout that time why did they not initiate some legislation to prevent the collapse that was inevitable? They had the benefit of the June 1925 report made by that impartial body the Senate. Did they take action on that report? They never did; they allowed the matter to drift. The hon. member also complained about a speech made by the present leader of the government in the city of Stratford, when the right hon. gentleman declared that if given power he would see that no harm would come to the Canadian National Railways. The Minister of Finance of that day knew, as members of the opposition to-day will no doubt recall, that the Senate had brought down a report indicating that something must be done to curb the reckless extravagance that was then taking place, and also emphasizing the importance of taking a grip on the situation and passing legislation of the kind we have before us to-day. The Senate had asked in their first recommendation that cooperation be made possible, and had we been given power at that time, instead of waiting another five years and spending another $500,000,000 of the taxpayer's money, this government would have seen to it that all that extravagance was avoided. I am satisfied that if this government had been in power a good deal of the money would have been saved and, more than that, there would have been on the statute books of the country legislation similar to this, in accordance with that Senate report of 1925.

This legislation carries out the pledges given to the Canadian people by the party now in power. It is intended to conserve this great railway asset for the Canadian people, and one other bright spot is the assurance that it will prevent the situation from becoming, whenever there is an election in this country, nothing but a political football. It will tend to reconcile the opinions held on the one hand by those who believe in private ownership and on the other the opinions of those who support public ownership, and will avoid any serious divergence in their approach to this problem. It will re-establish confidence in the industries of our country, because from ten to fifty per cent of the cost of operating an industry is made up of transportation expenses and freight costs. Those engaged in industry know now that the government is firmly behind a movement towards retrenchment so far as unnecessary railway expenditures are concerned, and this in due course will reflect itself in freight rates on those commodities with which they carry on their business. Perhaps the most important aspect of all is that the large body of workmen whose vocation is on the railways of this country will now see that the government in power is determined that neither the Canadian Pacific nor the Canadian National Railways shall fall into bankruptcy, and that these men's jobs will be assured them for some little time to come.

My hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) is concerned in this regard; he says that shops here, there and yon throughout the country will be closed down. He made the suggestion that from eight to ten thousand employees would find themselves out of work. I rather think the hon. gentleman is overdrawing the picture. He has a great love for his fellow men, and being of that Irish makeup you rather expect to find that in him. I often think however when I hear him speak in this house that he allows his love for his fellow men to be very much overshadowed by his devotion to party politics, and when he makes the statement that from eight to ten thousand men will be dismissed I rather think it occurs to him that the political effect will be of some real significance in helping the fortunes of his own party. The hon. gentleman knows, as we all know, that every year sees a turnover of at least five per cent in the personnel of railway companies. He also knows that with a decline in tonnage being hauled on the railways the work is not there, so that they cannot employ as many men as they would like to. The turnover is at least five per cent and, according to Mr. Beatty, it is as high as six per cent; it would be therefore only a matter of four years when twenty per cent of the present employees would be, if things went from bad to worse, out of service in the ordinary course of events. We do not look for that condition, rather we look for an improvement. Far be it from me to say that 20,000 out of the 150,000 are looking for some other vocation in life; the whole system will be demoralized if the 150,000 are not sure of their vocation. I think the men in the employ of these railways are satisfied that this government is going to do something to make the continuance of their jobs actually possible.

I come now to my seventh point. This legislation is the considered opinion of an impartial body which travelled this country from one end to the other in order to make a study of the problem. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) has made the statement that nothinig new is contained in the report of the Duff commission, but I cannot agree with that statement. There were also the sittings of the Senate committee, another impartial body of men trained in business and from all walks of life, where this matter was considered in an impartial manner and without political flavour. This bill now before us is the result of information which has been gathered during the past ten years. This information is to be found in the journals of the house, in the proceedings of the shipping committee, in the proceedings of the Senate committee of 1925, in the proceedings of the Duff commission and finally in the proceedings of the Senate committee of this year. All this information has been consolidated into this measure and it should receive the wholehearted support of this chamber.

I should like to make a few observations with regard to the loss of tonnage. Our primary commodities make up a large volume of the tonnage carried by our railways, but it is not always the most profitable tonnage. There is no gainsaying the fact that the low prices now offering for these commodities has retarded their movement. Because of low prices the primary producers find that in many cases it does not pay to send their goods to market. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Myers) gave an illustration the other evening when he referred to the difficulty in picking up potatoes here and there throughout Prince Edward Island in order to move them to market. He referred to the inflexibility of our railroad classification. In the past our railroads have not adapted themselves to the difficulties faced by a sparsely populated country such as Canada. There is great difficulty in making up carload lots at points of origin, and this offers a big problem to the small shippers who produce only two or three ton lots of goods. The pooling arrangements and the cooperative measures contained within the four corners of this bill will make possible the pooling and loading of carload lots with a resultant benefit to the shipper.

During the past decade the one thought in the minds of the railroad men of America has been to build larger and heavier equipment. As an example, we have our 5700 engines with their 26 wheels. I am not complaining as we will have to do the best we can with them. We have our 100,000 pounds capacity freight cars weighing 40,000 pounds dead weight. I do not consider that such equipment is economical. Apparently the only thought in the minds of our railroad men is the movement of such bulk commodities as wheat, coal, and pulpwood. Did they consider the heavier units necessary to handle this heavy tonnage? I do not think sufficient consideration was given to the cost of the heavier rails, the extra foundation and roadbed and the stronger bridges necessary to handle this type of equipment. There was also the necessity of installing heavier cranes, drills and lathes in the shops in order to handle the necessary repairs. In the past when thinking of freight we have been too prone to think only of wheat, coal, pulpwood, newsprint and similar heavier commodities; we seem to have lost sight of the fact that the real revenue producer is package freight. We are glad to have the wheat from the west which represents new wealth and all that, but is that the real revenue producer for the railroads? Is it not rather the package freight which is taken back to supply the needs of the primary producers?

I ask the house to bear with me for a moment while I discuss the industrial production in this country and its relation to freight rates. I should like to draw a line of demarcation between the type of industry which is prominently in the minds of certain economists, such as General Motors, the steel works at Sydney and Algoma and the pulp and paper mills, and those other industries which are the real backbone of the industrial life of this country. I refer to the small industries such as the shoe factories in Quebec, the textile mills in the Ottawa valley, the tanneries at Kitchener, Huntsville, Newmarket and Kingston. These are the industries which make up the profitable freight for our railway system. How much consideration has been given to them by the railroads during the past two or three decades? I see my furniture friend is in the house, and I shall include the furniture factories amongst the industries which go to make up the revenues of our railways. How much consideration has been given to these industries? Very, very little. Apparently all the people can think of is wheat, coal, newsprint and similar commodities; no consideration has been given to the smaller industries in Canada. Many of these industries consume only four or five tons of one particular commodity and the result is that the purchasing agent in need of raw material is forced to take a carload lot of the particular commodity in order to obtain a respectable rate. This is in contrast to the situation which prevails in Europe, to which the hon. member for Kenora (Mr. Heenan) referred the other day. The minimum carload lot in this country is twenty tons, while in Europe the minimum is three or four tons. The purchasing agent finds that twenty tons of a particular commodity will stock his shelves for three or four months and it is necessary to tie up his capital for that length of time in order to obtain the carload rate. A similar condition prevails in the shipment out of the finished products of these industries. Shipments are made to sparsely populated districts and a shipment to a particular point may consist of only three or four tons. The industry finds it impossible to make up a carload shipment and in practically every instance the less than carload freight rate is almost double the carload rate plus one cent per hundredweight. This creates a real hardship for these industries. There is contained within the four corners of this bill an opportunity for the railroad companies to pool shipments offered for one particular destination. This will permit a reduction in the cost of operations and in the final analysis will accrue to the benefit of the shippers.

Heavy capital and renewal costs of these giant units of transportation must stop; these units are big enough now. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, who is so solicitous with regard to railway labour, said the other day during the debate, and was rather proud to say it, that within the last ten years these railways had been able to haul per man unit an extra 12,000 tons of freight. Every time you thus increase the efficiency, you cut out the man power necessary to operate the railways. The hon. member talks about efficiency, but if the efficiency rises from, let us say, 60 per cent to 80 per cent in the conduct of our railways and 90 per cent of that efficiency lies in the elimination of man power, where in the final analysis does the benefit accrue to the people of Canada?

We have followed the United States plan; we have Americanized the conduct of our roads and we have even surpassed the United States in that regard to an unnecessary degree. We shall have to put up with this, but the time has come when we should call a halt to the extravagant expenditures of these big transportation services. We should stay where we are for a while till the population and production of Canada can catch up. In following the United States plan, we have just opened the gate, as it were, to motor truck competition; we have made it possible for motor trucks to fit into the groove where small industry was not getting any real service from the railway companies. It is true that the railway companies are now waking up to the situation and mending their ways a little, but they are rather late in doing so. The handicap which has been placed on industry through the railway companies not meeting motor truck competition is something which the latter will not get over for some little time. The railway companies have been very arbitrary in setting up their classifications and freight rate structures. They seem to have followed the plan: Whatever the traffic will bear, that will be the freight rate. Let us take a case of goods originating in one point and being shipped to another point on another line of railway. If the other end was a competitive point, switching charges were absorbed; but if it was a non-competing point, switching charges were not absorbed. Was the cost in one case greater than in the other? This is a straight example of taking advantage of the local situation. In a like manner take cartage rates, these pin-pricking items of expenditure with which anyone in business finds himself confronted each and every day he is doing business with arbitrary bodies such as at times our railway companies have been and which, I hope, this cooperative measure now before the house will eliminate. One hundred yards from a railway station the cartage is four cents per 100 pounds; half a mile from the same point on the same car, it is still four cents and two miles from the same point it is still four cents. There is no equity, no consideration in that particular regard. At the present time they will quote you a freight and add cartage here and cartage there; in like manner the other Canadian companies will do the same, yet if you have, on a competitive line a siding into your plant, they will absorb the cartage. Is the cost any greater? In the past they have been able to put through these arbitrary rate rulings, and this cooperative measure is long past due in this country to establish and help out industry.

There are in the bill a few features to which I should like to address myself and perhaps only one in regard to which I should like to sound a note of warning. I am a little sceptical about subsection 2 of section 2 where it reads:

> Parts II and III of this act shall not apply to any manufacturing, land, mining or ocean marine company, undertaking, property, work or service.

These particular units or assets of our transportation systems have in days gone by in their interlockings undoubtedly had a good deal to do with making our railway systems at some stage or another solvent. The converse of that is true that in days gone by our railway systems from their earnings have, to my mind, done a good deal towards stabilizing the solvency of some of these undertakings which the railway companies in their wisdom have seen fit to assume. During the last few years one might hazard a guess that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company has done a good deal to lessen or overcome the difficulties which the Canadian Pacific might have had in the way of loss of revenue in the operation of their line. During the last decade they have been interlocking and when the railway company was not earning any money, perhaps the mining company or the land company or the mortgage transaction or the irrigation scheme or the immigration and colonization plan was. In other words, when one cow was not milking, the other gave a little milk. Now that these are being separated, my note of warning is to see to it that in days to come traffic borne on our Canadian railways will not be penalized in any degree for the benefit of these interests outside of the jurisdiction of this measure.

But if this one feature is something to which thought should be given in the days to come, there are many features of the bill of which I express hearty approval. We are getting back now to a sound financial statement from our railways. Section 12 of the bill provides that income deficits shall not be funded. Some of the older members will remember about ten years ago the late Right Hon. Mr. Fielding said in the house: "We have a credit balance in the national affairs of this country this year, but when we have to pay the deficits of the Canadian National Railways, it makes a debit balance and adds to the national debt." Mr. Fielding was sound in his bookkeeping system as far as the Canadian National Railways were concerned, and it was a matter of regret to me when I noticed that his followers in office did not continue that sound practice of writing off deficits as they occurred instead of putting them into capital account.

A continuous audit by independent auditors, in accordance with section 13, is something really worth while, but I am glad to see the rider which follows it to the effect that:

> Their annual report shall call attention to any matters which in their opinion require consideration or remedial action.

That is very valuable. I would not be surprised if half the people of this dominion are not aware that the Canadian National Railways charge no depreciation whatever for the wear and tear of the equipment that is running on their rails to-day. This has not been done; it is not the bookkeeping practice of the system. I ask any hon. member who has had anything to do with business: Is it not sound business to have depreciation charges provided for each and every year? That practice, however, does not obtain in the bookkeeping of the Canadian National. It is too late to remedy this, yet I point it out as one instance among many others which the auditors, if they do their duty according to this measure, must bring to the attention of parliament. The auditors' report attached to the financial statement of the Canadian National Railways has in years gone by been simply that two and two make four and that they have found this to be the case, but as a real audit it has been meaningless and the rider in section 13 will be a good thing for us in that connection.

As provided for in section 14, the annual report comes back to parliament and thus the bogey raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) some days ago is immediately dismissed. Of course we had to put in the provision to the effect that goods should be carried over Canadian railways to the Canadian seaboard rather than to foreign ports. I am quite in accord with that sentiment when it is placed within the four corners of the legislation. It should satisfy the qualms of conscience experienced by the hon member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) every time he looks at anything concerning railways.

What objection could there be to part III of the bill? It provides for the joint use of terminals, running rights over and joint use of tracks, and the avoidance of duplication in the construction of new lines. Hon. members know what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) has in mind. We realize that if there were no branch lines there quite probably would be no trunk lines. There have to be branch lines to collect freight. But is there any harm in men who have the interests of the country at heart, the heads of the two railway companies, getting together and deciding on the use of one branch line rather than permitting that line to operate in opposition to another running parallel with it? Sensible men have the interests of Canada at heart, and are willing to cooperate. In his speech made at Winnipeg a few days ago Mr. Beatty indicated that willingness. Why would he not? If he is not willing, if the measure now before us does not go through this House of Commons, and if we continue the policy which has been in vogue during the last ten years, we are headed for a situation the result of which will be one of the greatest financial tragedies Canada has experienced in her economic history.

Then the bill advocates the joint use of facilities. In the city of Toronto we have an example of what joint use means. The Toronto terminals are being used jointly and to the advantage of the people and the railways. In like manner I can picture possibilities throughout the length and breadth of Canada for the joint use of facilities for the common good.

I now come to part III of the bill, which concerns the pooling of freight and passenger traffic. As I have already spoken concerning this angle of the matter I shall not enlarge upon it at the present time. The hon. members for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) seem to be greatly worried about the elimination of services. For their information I direct their attention to subsection 5, section 9 of the bill, which states as follows:

> Subject to the terms of this act, and until otherwise provided or directed under its authority, every operation and service of National Railways shall continue and be continued by all persons now concerned therewith as if this act had not been passed.

Surely that is sufficient to satisfy the minds of hon. members opposite. We are not going to dismantle the Canadian National Railways by cutting off services already enjoyed. We are not going to tear up a line here and another there, and leave without railway facilities the population who in good faith have settled in those parts. There is a clause in the bill dealing with that matter, and I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the issue has been raised by hon. members merely for the sake of having something to say.

The principle behind this bill receives my endorsation. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has asked: Why not send it to a committee? I suggest that for eight or ten years the matter has been under consideration by the railways and shipping committee. Was it not before a committee of the Senate in 1925, and was it not again only recently before a Senate committee? Have there not been hearings of expert witnesses here and there throughout the length and breadth of Canada? Have not the hearings of the eighteen sittings of the Duff commission been put into print, both in the press and in the final report? Is there not in the library of parliament volume after volume of journals of the house containing evidence concerning the railway situation? Is not that enough evidence, or does the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River want to make a little more political capital by bringing before a committee witnesses from all parts of the country? Does he want to rethresh the old straw that has been threshed many many times? I wonder if it has occurred to him that every day that this House of Commons sits it costs the country $20,000? Will he dispute the fact that if the matter were sent to a committee of the house proceedings would be prolonged by at least another week?

So far as the high plane of debate is concerned, if it goes to a committee I assure the hon. member it will be kept on that high plane. But, Mr. Speaker, some regard must be had for our friends of the fourth estate. If this house is deliberating on one problem, and a committee sitting in another place is deliberating on another, and if interests are divided, the public will not have a fair picture of what is taking place in Ottawa. If the fourth estate have nothing to do but to listen to deliberations in this chamber in committee of the whole, where the bill properly belongs, then the public will have a fair conception of what is taking place. The high plane of debate in the house is a matter which will be reported by the press, and it will tend to bring out of the chamber legislation that is really worth while. But after all, the bill would have to come back to this house, and the house would have to take the responsibility. It is quite true that the odd member here and there coming from a railroad centre would be able to hide behind a smoke screen, and say, "Oh, well, a committee of the House of Commons said so and so." But if it is considered by a committee of the whole house that condition will not prevail. I am satisfied that if the bill were referred to a committee there would be at least six or seven days' delay, which, at $20,000 a day, would add another $150,000 to the burden of the taxpayers.

Some hon. members, including the hon. member for Peace River, are worrying about compulsory cooperation. He has stated that we had the shoe on the other foot when we were talking about a compulsory wheat board. I say to him that the problems are entirely different from and foreign to one another. Anyone knows that in one instance we were dealing with 200,000 individual farmers, while in the present instance we are dealing with two corporate entities. Those two corporate entities will see to it that there is cooperation, and in my opinion when this legislation has passed and is functioning very little arbitral power will be exercised by the tribunal. Very few matters will be referred to it for decision. The men who are managing the two great railway systems want to get together and cooperate. They realize where they are heading, and that it is in the interests of Canada and of themselves that they get together and bring our transportation problem out of the maze in which it is at the present time. They are ready and willing to cooperate, and as great Canadians, I am satisfied they will do so for the general welfare of Canada. With such cooperation I can picture a condition under which the present freight rate structure and freight rate classifications will be made more flexible, thus having a tendency to obviate the possibility of cases such as those described by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Myers) where on account of freight classifications, bricks, mortar, window sash, cement and lumber cannot be loaded into one car. In the final analysis I am satisfied that the freight rate structure, which has remained at such a high level while other commodity prices have come down, will be lowered within a few years so that many primary commodities produced in this country will be able to reach the point of consumption. I have in mind now the disadvantage of high freight rates so far as their effect on the tonnage of cur railroads is concerned. Not many months ago, I saw an offering of a million pounds of goods to go to Bermondsey, London, England, and when the cost of freight was calculated it was found to be more than the value of the commodity itself. I see that five hundred tons of goods are being burnt annually under the boilers of an industry in Toronto, displacing fuel which in turn would have been freight for the railway company. I see another picture, an industry that I pass each day when I am at home in Toronto, which last year produced two millions pounds of goods that found their market in Boston. Where are those goods going to-day? The low commodity value and the high freight rate to carry them to Boston have placed that thousand tons of goods under the boilers of that industry. With what result? The freight on the goods to Boston is lost, and also the freight on coal to that industry. Boston was supplied with the same commodity by waterborne traffic from South America. During the last twenty years—I can give the facts and figures—5,000 tons per year of nitrogenous products were shipped to Baltimore, that centre of industry which supplies the cotton growers of all the southern states. Now that entire 5,000 tons a year is being burned under the boilers of a 600 horse-power plant. With what result? Five thousand tons of freight haulage is lost to the railway, and the haulage of 1,500 tons of coal is also lost, on account of freight rates. The cooperation which is behind this legislation is going to do much in the years to come to help in an adjustment of that situation.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Harris) on his very eloquent remarks. I could not help thinking during his address that perhaps he is making a bid for a position on the arbitral tribunal, or some other high office which this bill provides. As the hon. gentleman has been my pair for a number of years I should be very glad indeed to see him in that position; I am sure that with the voice he has and the knowledge he possesses about everything pertaining to freight rates and railroads generally, he would be a valuable acquisition to the board which is being created. Indeed, I could not help but think, after listening to the addresses of a number of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house, that they are also making a bid for some position more lucrative than that of a mere member of parliament. May I say I sounded some of them and they do not appear to be averse. So we have plenty of material in this chamber to justify the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) that it is an insult to the house to ignore us one and all. As I pointed out to the hon. member for York-Sunbury, however, I feel that the reason the government is not taking any action looking to the filling of these positions by hon. members is because it cannot spare our outstanding abilities at the present when the best of men are needed for legislation in this chamber.

The remarks which I have to make, Mr. Speaker, will be like my prayers, and the prayers of many hon. gentlemen, few and short.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order!

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) says order. I know that this is the Lenten season, a time for confession, so I will not expose him.

I have taken part in these debates for the last thirteen or fourteen years, since 1919, when the Grand Trunk bill, introduced, I think by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, came before the house. I have taken part in debates on various bills introduced in connection with the Canadian National Railways, and after reading this bill and listening to the debate I cannot help but think that the French proverb is quite true: Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose. My hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) asks me to translate. It means, "the more it changes, the more it is the same thing." This is a bilingual chamber, and I am surprised at my hon. friend.

I was opposed to the setting up of the Canadian National railways as a competitor of the Canadian Pacific. I thought it was bad policy, that it was not good business. It was preposterous that having created a railway like the Canadian Pacific—because after all we are the creators of that line—having given them tens of millions of acres of land and large sums of money in subventions and subsidies, and set up this remarkable property, which advertised Canada to every part of the wide world, so that people outside looked upon Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway as convertible terms; for that railway put Canada on the map—it is preposterous, I say, that having done that, we should, at a time when the Canadian Pacific had reached the stage of making large sums for their shareholders, set up in competition with it another line, the Canadian National, backed by all the resources of the Dominion of Canada. How was it possible for the Canadian Pacific to get on under those circumstances? I say it was impossible. We placed at the head of the Canadian National one of the most astute railway men in the whole country; we sought for him on both sides of the Atlantic, and finally secured him. Then the expected happened. Both lines, as was quite natural, were looking for business; both were in competition, both were seeking branch lines and other forms of development. We had the edifying spectacle every year of both companies coming before the railway committee and asking powers to do this, that and the other, all in opposition to each other. Members of parliament were lobbied by these two companies, and what I consider a shameless condition of affairs went on.

Well, unfortunately for those who were against such a system, we ran into a streak of good luck; everything was prospering, and naturally we were not disposed to criticize where we found there was no complaint. There seemed to be enough traffic for both lines, until I think one year the Canadian National showed a profit over operating expenses of something like $58,000,000. At that time we were able to pay all the money due as interest on the bonds held by outsiders, and $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 was turned over to Mr. Robb, who promptly turned it back to the railway for the deficit on other expenses which they were incurring for the coming year. The Canadian Pacific Railway very courageously stood this as long as they could. They were certainly the under dog in it all. You could not expect the government of Canada to show any particular consideration for the Canadian Pacific Railway against their own child. Now during this time of depression the Canadian Pacific finds itself in a very sorry way indeed. It is only a question of time when they will have to go into the hands of a receiver if things do not change, there is no doubt about that. I am not prepared to say how long they can continue, but everyone can see what is happening. The credit of the company is ruined. The railways are to be amalgamated—or perhaps that is not the word; I will say they are to be "coordinated"; but what is going to happen when the Canadian Pacific Railway is unable to hold up its end? They will have to throw up the sponge, and then what will we do, with one railway already on our hands? We are giving blood transfusions to it now—I do not know the exact term; perhaps the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) can tell me. We are using blood transfusions on the Canadian National; we are keeping the system alive in that way. There is transfusion to the Transcontinental, and in a very short time we are going to have the other line in exactly the same condition. Let us say that at that time they are coordinated. What will the government do with the Canadian Pacific Railway? They are entitled to their transfusion also. Why not say at once that this is amalgamation? It cannot be anything else. I am for the principle of the bill because I say it means amalgamation, if not to-day then tomorrow or the day after. It is inevitable; it cannot be otherwise.

Some hon. gentlemen on this side of the house had some doubt as to whether there was not something in the minds of the government in introducing this measure, looking towards amalgamation, and the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) assured them that no amalgamation is intended. I believe what he said was said in good faith, but with these facts before the people is there any man who believes that eventually we will not have amalgamation? I am supporting the principle of this bill because I say it is amalgamation and nothing else, and for that reason it is in the interests of the country, of the government and of the stockholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think the bill should go through, perhaps not in its present form but with various amendments which of course can be dealt with when the bill is being considered in committee of the whole.

Speaking the other day the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) paid a great tribute to the intelligence of the members of this house. He said:

> I am thoroughly in accord with the hon. member for Hants-Kings.

I did not hear the hon. member for Hants-Kings.

> I do not think that any man who sat on the Duff commission, regardless of what his ability or previous experience may have been, has any more knowledge or any more conception of the railway situation as it applies in this dominion than have most of the members of this house.

[Mr. Jacobs.]

Later he went on to say:

> Not only that, but I consider that hon. members of this house have a better knowledge of the requirements of the Dominion of Canada and a fuller appreciation of what our railway system means to the national life of this country than any men who could possibly be appointed to any royal commission who have not been engaged in public life for the long periods of time that some members of this house have.

There may be some who have that high degree of intelligence to which my hon. friend referred, but I choose rather to accept the statement made by a former minister of the crown with regard to the degree of intelligence exhibited by this house in dealing with our railway legislation. He said:

> I am sure that all hon. members—and I watched proceedings there over a period of years—will agree with me when I say that, generally speaking, the members of that house, and in some cases ministers of the crown, do not clearly understand what they are doing on these railway matters. I say it advisedly. I have been there; I have gone through the experience. I say that the parliament of Canada has not the opportunity properly to digest, consider and adjudicate upon the budgets that come before it.

An hon. MEMBER: Who said that?

Mr. JACOBS: That was said in another place by Senator Calder, and I am prepared to accept every word of it; it is perfectly true. For ten or twelve years we have been voting millions of dollars into this bottomless sink, and where are we to-day? We do not know our business. What do we know about railways? My hon. friend from Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) knows something about them because he is a business man, but what do I know about railways, or, let us say, what do the medical men in this house know about them, with the exception of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways?

Mr. MANION: The president of the Canadian Pacific Railway is a lawyer, even as my hon. friend.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes, but he is not a member of the bar. He was a lawyer once, but it is something he has "loved long since but lost a while." I would compare the position in which the railways will be placed when coordination takes place to a companionate marriage. It is not a real marriage; the ceremonies have not been performed. It is not a chance association or an irregular acquaintanceship; it is a companionate marriage.

An hon. MEMBER: A liaison.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know what it is. The only difference between this coordination and a companionate marriage is that after a companionate marriage you can go back to the old condition if you are not satisfied. If the husband is not suited to the wife or the wife is not suited to the husband they can return to their former status. There is no alimony on either side; they become as they were before.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As you were.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes, as you were, as far as that may be possible. What is the objection to an amalgamation or coordination?—and I use that word because some gentlemen here object to the word "amalgamation"; they think it has a sinister meaning. I know my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has preached this up and down the country in season and out of season until I believe he has convinced himself that he is correct. I am with him but for different reasons. I support the bill because it means amalgamation, and my hon. friend from North Waterloo and his friends support it because it does not mean amalgamation.

Mr. MANION: To avoid any misunderstanding may I say that I do not agree that it means amalgamation. I say this because I do not want it said that I sat here and agreed with my hon. friend.

Mr. JACOBS: There are many things on which we do not agree in connection with which it may turn out that the minister is wrong.

There are two particular sections of the bill to which a good deal of attention has been given by the house. One is the famous section 16, which I should like to read, because I think there never before was a section like this inserted in any bill or statute. The section reads:

> The National company . . . and the Pacific company . . . are, for the purposes of effecting economies and providing for more remunerative operation, directed to attempt forthwith to agree and continuously to endeavour to agree,—

I wonder how that would be interpreted by a court of justice.

> —and they respectively are, for and on behalf as aforesaid, authorized to agree, upon such cooperative measures, plans and arrangements as are fair and reasonable and best adapted . . . to effect such purposes.

For the purposes of effecting economies and so on they are directed to attempt to agree and continuously to agree.

Mr. POULIOT: That is the position of the ministers with the Prime Minister.

Mr. JACOBS: That is another story. I should like to have seen the sardonic smile on the face of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen when he drew up this thing: "To agree and continuously to endeavour to agree." It is a pious exclamation, a most noble sentiment; all it requires is to have a few of the beatitudes attached to it to become a first class sermon in this period of Lent. Of course, I would segregate the beatitude that refers to the meek inheriting the earth—"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." I should like to apply that to my friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) but I reserve it for the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). There are equally good beatitudes which could be found for the Minister of Railways, because he deserves well at our hands. I did not recognize him when he rose to deliver that magnificent speech last Tuesday, which as someone has said changed the whole tone of the debate. We know there are those who can roar like lions, but no lion ever roared as gently as a sucking dove as when the hon. gentleman spoke. I have great admiration and affection for the Minister of Railways. We came into the house together in 1917. We started life having, I think, the same political views, but he wandered away from the path of grace and he is now enjoying the benefits of a change of heart. He was and has been, I think, a minister of every Conservative government—not the Union government—of the time, and we cannot tell how far he is going to go before he finishes. I only hope he will remain with us for many years, and that he will cultivate that present sweet reasonableness which we welcome in him and which suits him so well.

Now I ask myself why it is that responsibility is shed by the government and placed in the hands of creatures of their own making. After all it ought to be the business of a government to govern; they should have courage. We listen to the Prime Minister when he gets up and there is courage in his remarks, and he is able to carry the entire government with him after they have listened to his blasts. Now, why is it that we have to create a body and put upon them all this responsibility? My theory is that the government do not wish to have any odium attached to themselves; if the thing goes well they will claim that this administration is the father of it; if it does not go well the odium will be borne by the scapegoat. And the scapegoats will be those receiving large salaries for their services, and I do not think they will care very much about the odium so long as they have done the best they can. But a government must appeal to the people every four or five years, and they have to come, so to speak, with a clean slate and show that they have done nothing during their entire period which indicates that they are after all mere men and not, as my hon. friend from the west said, supermen. There are some people who are supermen until they are discovered.

With this section 16, which I say seems to have been taken holus-bolus from the Sermon on the Mount, mutatis mutandis, we come to the section dealing with the arbitral tribunal—section 19 I think it is. May I tell the house what will happen if the views expressed in section 16 are carried into effect—the section wherein cooperation is suggested. We are told what the Canadian Pacific Railway will have to do: "You agree to cooperate harmoniously, and so on, but if you don't agree this is what will happen to you." Then they proceed to declare what will happen; we have it stated in part III. If they do not cooperate their property will be confiscated. The body set up under this legislation is the court of last resort, for an appeal can be taken to the supreme court only on a question of law. I have not the time to read the section but there it is.

Now, that is not law, nor has it ever been law in any civilized community. It may have been law when Julius Caesar invaded Britain two thousand years ago but it has never been law since that time, and the Canadian Pacific Railway asks that some form of compensation be given in the event of confiscation. But that is turned down and treated as of no consequence at all. We in this house however, who still believe that there is some law and equity and justice in this country, oppose that provision and intend to move amendments which will protect both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways in future when they have cooperated and coordinated as they are asked to do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And companionated.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes, and companionated; I thank my hon. friend from Quebec East; he rolls that word under his tongue like a sweet morsel. When I was a boy at school, which is a long time ago, I was compelled to read Caesar's Gallic Commentaries. He said there, if I remember the first lines—Don't ask me to repeat them in Latin: All Gaul is divided into three parts. Well, here we find all gall in part III. To-day in Russia we find the same system as is provided for in part III with respect to the arbitral tribunal. In Russia, every person, high and low, rich and poor, aristocrat and bolshevist,—they are all forced into apartment houses, tenements and so on; every person is taken care of. The aristocrat who had owned a mansion is obliged to give room in the house to his former butler and his cook and the cook's cousin. He can keep two or three rooms for himself but the others are divided up according to the number of people who are seeking tenancy; and even the piano, which the aristocrat is perhaps permitted to play, must also be given over to the use of other boarders or lodgers from time to time. The aristocrat resents that; he remembers the days when it was not thus. I fancy that the same feelings must actuate Mr. Beatty and the friends of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They resent people coming into their house and telling them how to run their business. They were a success before the Canadian National Railways was attached to them, and they think they are able to run their own business just as well and perhaps a little better than the others. But they say, "If you are going to do this, then give us something for the use of our property. Compensate us for the confiscation." I am pretty sure that the sense of justice of hon. members in this house will never permit a bill of this kind to go through with such a glaring act of injustice as is contemplated in this part III.

I would welcome and I am sure every person who had at heart the interests of this country would welcome some form of cooperation which will save to this country millions, nay tens of millions of dollars. We have it on the evidence of men who should know that we can save from $60,000,000 to $75,000,000. We will not quarrel over a paltry $5,000,000 or $10,000,000, which is a mere bagatelle in this thing. If we could secure a sort of equilibrium between the moneys which we have to pay out on account of the Canadian National and the moneys we will have to pay out subsequently on account of the Canadian Pacific, if we can make ends meet it would be a magnificent thing. I think this country might very well erect a monument in bronze to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, to the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen and to the other worthy gentlemen should they be able to bring this about. I am sure that in their wildest dreams of imagination they never thought that anything of that kind could be done. The Lord works in a mysterious way his wonders to perform. This may be brought about and some day as I take my walk around parliament hill I may gaze upon the classic features of my friend the Minister of Railways and I will say to myself, "This is the man who did something for his country, and this is the way we recognize it." At one time I did think that this could be done. Now the prophecy is fulfilled: the lion and the lamb shall lie down together and a little child—the Minister of Railways—shall lead them.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house and which has emanated from the Senate is to my mind of first legislative importance in so far as the measures which have and which will come before us are concerned. It is of such importance to the city of Winnipeg, a constituency which it is my privilege to represent, that while I do not intend to speak at any considerable length, I feel my attitude might be misinterpreted in my own constituency if I failed to express my views before the bill goes to the committee of the whole.

Fifty years ago the city of Winnipeg was no more than a hamlet; to-day it is a city of approximately a quarter of a million. Fifty years ago there were no railroads either entering or emanating from that city; to-day a view from the air would show railroads branching out in every direction. There are the two transcontinental systems running east and west and other railroads fanning out north northwest, northeast and south from the city. We have in that city railway yards and shops which will compare favourably as to size, investment and number of employees with any other railway yard on this continent. An important part of our great railway system is the Canadian National Railway, with which this bill is concerned. This railroad is of importance not only from the physical and financial aspect but from the point of view of the number of employees to whom the purpose and effect of this bill are of primary importance.

It is unfair to say, as has been said upon certain occasions, that the government is not concerned primarily in the interests of the employees. I think it is a misstatement of fact to say that the first interest is either that of finance or that of the employees. The financial and physical aspect of the railways and their financial success is so closely correlated with the plight of the employees that it is senseless to endevour to separate them and say that either one or the other is of primary importance. Unless the railway systems of Canada can be made a financial success, there can be no permanent success for the employees. On the other hand, unless the employees are taken care of in a reasonable way you cannot make a success of any railroad, and particularly of any publicly owned system.

What are the objects of this bill? To put it briefly, they are to relieve the plight in which the Canadian National Railway now finds itself. But it goes further than that; it is an attempt to relieve the plight in which all the railways of Canada now find themselves, and particularly the two transcontinental lines, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. It has been suggested, I think by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), that it might be feasible and perhaps necessary to consider, the cutting down of the interest rates or even the paring down of the capital debt with respect to the moneys borrowed from the investing public in this and other countries. It seems to me that the road to success in the life either of an individual or of a great industry does not lie over the pathway of broken pledges or repudiated covenants. The government has put the people's money into this undertaking, the government appealed to the investing public in this and other lands to advance their money for the bonds of Canada upon the agreement to repay at certain rates of interest. To my mind it is unsound to argue now that these rates of interest are too high, it is unsound from the point of view of the country's honour and credit to argue that more money was borrowed than should have been borrowed, and on that basis to suggest repudiation. We must face the fact that these moneys, in whatever amounts they stand in the ledger, are moneys advanced by people who had faith in the resources of Canada and in the honour of this country.

To repudiate repayment of either principal or interest would be a dishonourable act so far as Canada is concerned, and I cannot believe it is the serious and considered opinion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that if perchance as prime minister leading a party he were face to face with the situation, he would draw a line through Canada's bonds and undertakings and announce to the world that she repudiated her pledges. If this were done, there might be a little immediate financial benefit, but after all the immediate present is only a very short period of time. Stretching ahead of every indivdual and of Canada is the long, long future, and it is better, even if we have to live a little plainer, even if we have as a nation to dig a little more deeply into our pockets, that Canada should honour her bond as given and pay her debts, as I believe she will.

What is the plight of the Canadian National Railways? It can serve no purpose to enter into any detailed discussion. The facts have been placed on Hansard; they have been discussed on every public platform and in every newspaper throughout this country. The railways are facing a financial crisis. A description of the plight of our national railways was given by the first minister (Mr. Bennett) in his speech, concerning which statement there has been considerable comment in the house and also in the press. I refer to the observation made by the Prime Minister on the ninth of this month, when, describing the situation of the Canadian National Railways, he used words to the effect that essentially the people owned not the Canadian National Railways but merely the equity of redemption. The "equity of redemption" is essentially a legal term. To speak legally and in the narrow sense, it is true that the Canadian people do own the equity of redemption in the Canadian National Railways, but the conclusion drawn from that statement to the effect that the equity of redemption amounted to but little is incorrect.

What is the equity of redemption which the people of Canada own in the national railways? Let me explain this as simply and in as few words as possible. If I own a farm, borrow money on it and secure the loan by a mortgage, by the deed I mortgage to the person lending me the money my farm and all my rights and interest therein. If that mortgage be large and I fail to pay the interest thereon, and the interest and taxes accumulate to a degree that the amount of money owing under the mortgage is comparable, let us say, to the actual value of the land, it may be said with truth that I have little interest in that land. I have, it is true, the right to redeem it from the mortgage. That right to redeem is my equity of redemption. If all I own in this world is that farm; if it is mortgaged to the hilt and I do not pay and the mortgagee decides to realize, two courses are open to him. First, if it be the only asset I have; if my covenant be worthless; if to take a judgment against me in case of default would not realize the money, the mortgagee is driven to this position; he forecloses; he takes the farm and through legal means my equity of redemption is extinguished so that he owns the farm. It may be said that my equity of redemption from a practical point of view is worthless; but before he decides to foreclose and take over the farm, if he be a judicious man he will make inquiries to ascertain whether I have other assets available through which the amount of that mortgage may be realized. If he finds that I am competent to pay and he can make me pay, he will not foreclose the farm; he will make me pay. If I have the ability to pay and do pay, when I have paid I have my farm clear.

What is the position of Canada in respect to the national railways? The people of Canada, through the government, have mortgaged the national railways to the people who have advanced the moneys. Will those investors in Europe, the United States, Canada, foreclose and operate the road? No. What will they do? They will ask this question: Can Canada pay those mortgage bonds? I do not need to suggest the answer. Canada will pay those mortgage bonds through either the federal government or the provincial governments or both, and those bonds having been paid, the mortgage is paid and the railway belongs clear of encumbrances to the people of Canada. That is what the equity of redemption is worth in the Canadian National Railways, and it is of no small importance.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): When the house rose at six o'clock I was referring to the interpretation placed by certain hon. members of the house, as well as by certain sections of the press, upon the expression used by the Prime Minister when he referred to the interests of the Canadian people in the Canadian National Railways as an equity of redemption. I wish to recapitulate to the extent of stating that, in essence and in fact, the equity of redemption in the Canadian National Railways amounts to the Canadian National railway system free of all bonded debt—and I submit that is a very substantial interest. My reason for so stating is that behind the bonds of the Canadian National Railways in respect to borrowed moneys are the credit and the resources of the Canadian people. The Dominion of Canada cannot and will not default upon her bonded obligations, so far as moneys borrowed in connection with the Canadian National railway system is concerned.

Before leaving that subject I should like to make one further reference to some suggestions which have been made concerning repudiation of the bonded indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways, either as to principal or interest. Speaking on this subject

I believe the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) made the suggestion that it might be desirable to cut down the rate of interest on this bonded indebtedness, or even to wipe out all interest commitments—and this, Mr. Speaker, from a member of the house who at one time occupied a position as a minister of the crown, from a man who must have sat in council when many of these obligations were incurred. I submit that such a suggestion cannot come with good grace from the hon. member. Expressions of that sort, contribute nothing to the solution of the present problem. Canada will not repudiate. To the extent that such suggestions receive credence in this or any other country, to that extent instead of assisting to solve the problem they add to the difficulties we are facing by impairing the credit of Canada in the eyes of the world.

I wish now to refer to another phase of the situation which I shall term the ghost of amalgamation. The possibility of amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways with the Canadian Pacific Railway has been suggested several times during this debate; but it was not first suggested here. I lived in the city of Winnipeg prior to the entry into that city of the Canadian National railway, and I can state that almost since that time there have been suggestions and rumours to the effect that fundamentally the Conservative party is friendly to the Canadian Pacific Railway and antagonistic to the Canadian National. Is that so? I ask for the proof. Has such propaganda been set on foot, and by whom? Not only has it been set on foot, but it has been persistently kept alive for one purpose, and one only, namely for political advantage. It has been the cry of the Liberal party, and has been kept alive by that party, its servants and agents and the press supporting it. That is not a figment of my imagination, but an actual fact. We who have to fight campaigns out in the west know at election times with what persistence the cry prevails, and we know the source from which it comes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Hon. members may laugh, but they know I am stating facts.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is certainly laughable.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Not as laughable as the attitude of the hon. member. In 1930, when the present Prime Minister opened his campaign in the city of Winnipeg it was felt desirable that the propaganda to which I have referred should be given a definite and explicit denial. As hon. members know, that denial was given. On June 10, 1930, speaking in the city of Winnipeg and dealing with the question of the Canadian National Railways, the Prime Minister said, "No amalgamation." Perhaps it is too much to hope that in times of political warfare a definite statement given by such a public man who carries the respect, at least, of all Canadian citizens, would be a sufficient declaration. It has not been sufficient for those who still see in this ghost of amalgamation an instrument of political advantage.

A certain section of the press of the city of Winnipeg—I refer to it because with it I am more familiar—and of the press of other cities, has taken every opportunity to interpret any criticism of the management or operation of the Canadian National system as an attack upon that railway. But those criticisms have not been confined to the press. Despite the high plane upon which it was suggested this debate should be conducted, and despite the apparent unanimity of opinion that it should be so conducted, the same ghost of amalgamation was made to walk in this chamber. In fact it was taken for quite a ramble by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), and this afternoon, with a great deal of interest but very little conviction, I listened to remarks of a similar nature by the member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson). I heard him profess this afternoon, as he professes in nearly all his speeches, that he wanted to be fair and that he wanted to approach the subject with an open mind. I have no further comment to make than this, that if perchance an idea free from political bias ever found even temporary lodgment in the brain of the hon. member for South Perth it would find an atmosphere so inhospitable that it would come out like a bat out of hell.

I wish now to refer to the amendment introduced by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). That amendment was professedly intended to force a declaration that there is no sinister purpose behind the bill and that there was no intention to amalgamate the two railways. I ask this house: Was the right hon. leader of the opposition really concerned with that? In half apologetic terms he prefaced his remarks by a statement to the effect that while probably he should accept the declaration of the Minister of Railways and of the Prime Minister on the matter, yet to relieve fear and apprehension he had brought forward his amendment. I submit that in that action he was simply bringing up to date the old propaganda and giving new legs to the old ghost that the Conservatives intend to amalgamate the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways. I am here to-night to say, as I stated in Winnipeg at a considerable meeting of those definitely interested as employees of the Canadian National railway immediately before coming east to attend this session, that I had heard the Prime Minister declare in public against amalgamation, I had heard him so declare in private, and in caucus, and as far as I was concerned I was quite prepared to accept that declaration; but if they wanted a statement as to my stand on the matter, I was unalterably opposed to any proposal of amalgamation by this or any other government without a mandate from the people. That is my position.

What have we against this theory of amalgamation? We have the declaration of the Prime Minister in Winnipeg in June, 1930; we have the declaration of the Prime Minister in this house on the ninth of this month; we have the conviction of the rank and file not only of this party but of the party sitting opposite. It is not a question of the Conservative party being against the Canadian National Railways and the Liberal party for it, or vice versa. I submit the rank and file of all parties in this house are opposed to any proposition of amalgamation and would not tolerate it.

Mr. TOTZKE: Let us make sure of it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): The only possible amalgamation that can ever take place would be when the people of Canada themselves decide that it shall be.

I now want to refer for a moment to the compulsory provisions of the bill. Part II of the bill provides for voluntary cooperation, part III provides for what might be termed compulsory cooperation. In criticism of these provisions it has been suggested that the two terms are incompatible, that you must not have the idea of compulsion associated in any way with the idea of cooperation. I do not propose to argue that at length, but suggest this, that in all matters of cooperation there lies behind in some form or other, and intimately correlated, the idea of compulsion. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) shakes his head. Let me suggest this; in the great cooperative movement for the marketing of wheat in the west, read the contracts and tell me whether the element of compulsion is absent. In the cooperation of citizens to enforce the laws, take for example in the old land the speakers in Hyde park, why do they so seldom transgress the law? Why do they cooperate with the authorities to observe the law? Because they know and realize that behind that voluntary cooperation there is force to see that the law is carried out. And while for academic purposes the opposition of compulsion to cooperation may be of some interest, it is only as a mental exercise.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It is not sound there.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Whether it be sound there or not, to my mind it is purely an academic question and does not go to the root of the matter at all.

Now I come to the last division of the subject, that is this board of three trustees and the arbitral tribunal. It is true, as hon. members have pointed out, that the board of three trustees is vested with wide powers. I concede at once that to vest a board with such wide powers as are entrusted to this board is a matter of concern to the people of Canada and to this house, and to all who are interested in the success of the Canadian National Railways. As to the number, why three? It is open to argument; the number might be one or three or five, or seventeen as at present. But a royal commission spent considerable time investigating the whole subject, and they have recommended as best under the circumstances a board of three members. I do not suggest that because the Duff commission have recommended three, therefore it should be three. I do not suggest that they are in a much better position to decide than are members of this house. But after all, having made a thorough inquiry into the matter, having gathered such evidence as they could, the Duff commission have recommended three. And apparently that number appealed to the Minister of Railways, who was charged with the duty of introducing this bill into the house, and it appealed to the government. I have no quarrel with the number three. Had the government said five that would have been acceptable to me. But this principle I do think is sound, having regard to the purposes for which the board is being set up: that it should not be a large and unwieldy body. Seventeen is certainly too many. I would have no quarrel with five, but that does not mean that one should be opposed to three. The set-up of the board and the reason on which it is founded is financial, an executive setup—not geographic, not class representation. But with this I do agree, the principle of the statement which emanated from some hon. member opposite, that inasmuch as the Canadian National system is a publicly owned system operated for Canada and for Canadians, in the choice of that committee of three it is not a trivial matter but a matter of primary importance that the three who are appointed to that tribunal shall believe in the principle of public ownership. As a private citizen you have a business the management of which you wish to delegate to someone; being interested in the success of that business, are you going to choose as manager or managing board a person or persons who believe in some other system than the one you believe in?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I do not say that they shall be fanatics in the matter of public ownership, but it should be a board not handicapped at the beginning by lack of faith in the principle of public ownership.

As to control by parliament and by the people over this board, it has been urged that parliament is entirely divesting itself of any control. I submit that that is not correct. We have, as has been pointed out, parliamentary control by virtue of the power of parliament to withhold the grant of money. We have also this, and it should not be regarded lightly, that the same power which creates that board under this bill has power to change it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Only with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Well, the two houses of parliament.

Mr. EULER: May I ask my hon. friend a question? He has stated that parliament has control over the expenditures of the board. Where does he find that in the bill?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): They must submit their disbursements to parliament.

Mr. EULER: Not with regard to the operation of the railroad—only for deficits and capital expenditure.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Well, that is a very substantial amount.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): During the past year it amounted to somewhat around $70,000,000 and from present indications it would appear that it might be as much or more next year, perhaps $80,000,000.

Mr. McPHEE: What control does that give us?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): This control, that they cannot operate very well without money being voted. Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker, that parliament, which creates this board, can also legislate it out of existence. The hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) suggested that having appointed them for seven years parliament would not lightly disturb that arrangement. I agree that it should not do so lightly, but it must be remembered that if the board does not function as, in the opinion of parliament, it should function; if it does not work in the interests of the Canadian National Railways and of the Canadian people, I think no such consideration as a previous commitment by statute would or should stand in the way of further parliamentary enactments if such should be necessary.

I should like to conclude by referring to the rights of labour. It has been urged in this house that labour should have a representative on the board of trustees, and I may say frankly that so far as I am concerned I see no very sound argument against that being done. The employees of the railway are tremendously interested in the road and its success. Time will not permit me to enter into any detailed discussion of this question, but I wish to say here and now that I should be very happy indeed to see a representative of labour on that board.

Now Mr. Speaker, what are the chances of success? The success of the Canadian National Railways will depend upon sound management, and in my view the interests of labour will be served best if the railways can be made a financial success, thereby giving the employees both present and future assured employment instead of intermittent work. Success must be predicated upon the calibre of the board, upon their ability and their fairness in considering the rights both of labour and of capital. The success of the Canadian National Railways is predicated not only upon the material resources of this country but upon what might be called its spiritual resources as well; that is, the people themselves. We are a nation drawn from many peoples, with all that is best of all those races, and surely we can look with confidence upon that background. The Canadian people have an ancient pedigree which predicates success; in fact they have a veritable genius for success. To the Canadian people drawing upon such resources, success, while it may be delayed, cannot be permanently denied.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) will not expect me to follow his remarks at any great length. I should like to say that I think the character of the debate has indicated that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) believed, when he introduced this bill, that it was in the interests of the house and of the country that this very important matter should be discussed in as non-partisan a manner as possible. I listened with interest to my hon. friend who has just sat down, and I may say to him that with many of his arguments I entirely agree. But, while adopting the very commendable attitude taken by hon. members on both sides of the house, I desire to say that his strongest argument was not his suggestion that the people of this country could feel sure there would be no amalgamation of the two roads because in his keynote speech the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) gave the pledge that amalgamation would not take place. That, I submit, was not the most cogent evidence that it would not happen.

I entirely agree, Mr. Speaker, with my hon. friend's remark that in all probability the interests of the bondholders will be properly looked after. I must say that I do not take much stock in the great solicitude that has been expressed in this house, particularly by the Prime Minister, for these bondholders. What is their position? They hold bonds to the extent of $1,300,000,000, and to some of us that seems a very large amount of money. No doubt it is, but the Prime Minister also stated that the people of Canada have $1,000,000,000 invested in this road, money they have actually paid out, but for which they do not hold bonds. For security the bondholders have not only the assets of the road but also the guarantees and the resources of the people of Canada, and I quite agree with the statement that bondholders could have no better security than the guarantees of the various provinces and of the dominion. So I think we need not lose any sleep over the possibility of the bondholders losing money. But was the argument of the Prime Minister as to the bondholders really being the owners of this road correct? Was his analogy between these bondholders and the investors in a company whose concern has gone into liquidation a proper one? Ordinarily the company which has gone into liquidation must realize its assets. A number of hon. members were on the committee to which I had the honour to belong a year ago considering amendments to the Bankruptcy Act. The evidence brought out there disclosed the startling fact that in the previous year the claims made against bankrupts in this country amounted to over $58,000,000, while the assets realized amounted to something like $14,000,000, of which amount less than $4,000,000 in actual cash reached the creditors. I think there is not much analogy between the creditors who received $4,000,000 out of $58,000,000 and the bondholders who will be paid every dollar owed them under those bonds.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer for a moment to the statement made by my hon. friend with regard to the circulation of Liberal propaganda. I hope that if such statements have been made they are quite incorrect. But I do not agree with my hon. friend from Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), who spoke this afternoon, with regard to the wisdom of amalgamation. I do not think it is desirable. I must take an opposite attitude from that of my good friend but on exactly the same grounds.

What is the situation that has brought us into the position which the people of Canada find themselves in at the present time? I would mention a fact which I think is well known in this house, and it is this, that railway difficulties in Canada are by no means a new problem. There is not a member in this house who does not know that ever since confederation one of the great problems of the Canadian people has been the railway problem. That has been with us always, and I am glad to observe, listening to remarks made from all corners of the house since this debate began, that the members of this house are about as nearly in accord at the present time as they have ever been in the history of the country. And that should be so, because if there ever was a time when all parties in the house and in the country should endeavour to discuss problems with an eye single to the interests of the people of Canada as a whole this is the time.

Mr. POULIOT: It is impossible to discuss anything with the Prime Minister.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, he is not here at the moment—

Mr. POULIOT: He is never here; he should be here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Throughout the time that these problems have presented difficulties to the Canadian people we have always had someone who was honest and sincere in being very pessimistic about the outlook of the Canadian railways; but looking back on what has occurred I think we can all be very thankful that throughout that period there was always someone with vision and faith enough in the future of the country to take an optimistic view. Mistakes have been made, it would be impossible in a matter of this kind that mistakes should not be made; but we must not forget that one of the greatest achievements in the history of the country is the increase which there has been in the trade of Canada during the present century. I should like to give some figures, if the house will bear with me, which I submit are very important if we are to understand just why the trade of Canada became as great as it was and the prosperity of this country correspondingly great. I would refer to one branch of what I think is the greatest industry in Canada; that is, one department of one branch, the wheat growing industry, in order to show its effect on the railway problem and the effect of the railway problem on wheat-growing in the dominion. Let me put a few figures on Hansard to indicate how the railway development in this country has contributed to that great industry.

In 1901 we exported 9,000,000 bushels of wheat for which we received $6,000,000. Now, if my hon. friends will bear in mind these figures they will appreciate the extent to which wheat growing and agriculture generally have benefited in this country through railway construction. In 1911, we exported 45,000,000 bushels for which we received $45,000,000. In 1921, ten years later, we exported 129,000,000 bushels and received $310,000,000; in 1931 we exported 217,000,000 bushels for which we received $177,000,000; and in 1929, which was the largest year in our exports, we shipped out 370,000,000 bushels, for which we received $428,000,000. I will give one or two more figures before I leave that phase of the subject. In the ten years from 1901 to 1910, we exported an average of $27,000,000 a year; for the next decade $145,000,000 a year; and for the last decade, $297,000,000 a year.

These figures are, I submit, the best evidence that can be given to this house and the country with regard to the effect which railway development in Canada has had upon this branch of the great agricultural industry. In the twenty years, from 1911 to 1930 inclusive, we received for wheat exported from Canada $4,430,000,000. That is for wheat alone; and it has been due very largely to the creation of new wealth in agriculture that Canada has made such tremendous strides in the present century. To-day the best wheat and oats produced in the world are produced four hundred miles north of our southern boundary; they are produced in a region where twenty years ago it was supposed that wheat of any kind would not grow.

Recently wheat has been at its lowest price in several hundred years. The freight on low grades has been in some cases greater than the total amount received by the farmer. Out of what he received he had to pay interest, the cultivation of land, the seed, harvesting, threshing and hauling to the station. A large percentage of that wheat has been produced in western Canada, and if it had not been for the foresight and vision of the men who through good report and evil report had faith enough in this country to build lines of railway, perhaps beyond the requirements of the country, more than half of that great wheat production would not have taken place. Even in prosperous times wheat cannot be produced far from railways. Various causes, into which I will not enter to-night, have contributed to the low prices for agricultural products. As I say, I do not propose to discuss these at the present time, and I am free to admit that there is a limit to the amount of foodstuffs that can be consumed at any given time. The world to-day seems to have reached that limit. There is no doubt however that the time will come, and we hope quickly, when Canada will again be on the road to prosperity, when the demand for products of the Canadian farm, forest and mine will again be extensive outside of this country. When that time comes our railways will do a business comparable to that which they did in 1928, when my hon. friend the Minister of Justice took such great credit for the part his party had taken in the building up of the great organization known as the Canadian National railway system.

It is bad policy for any concern to determine its future by conditions as they exist either at a time of great depression or at a time of great prosperity. There is no doubt about it, we must economise; that is forced upon us. It is utter folly to talk of spending money which you have not got and which you cannot get. I think every hon. member is in agreement with that portion of the report of the commission which deals with the necessity at the present time for practising economies. However, I do not think that this is the time for the people of Canada to lose faith in their country and to begin to believe that parts of our great railroads should be scrapped or that other radical changes should take place simply because we are now suffering a depression in common with all the rest of the world.

I should like to direct the attention of the house to the fact that the position of the railways of this country is much better than the position of the country as a whole. If the railways are bankrupt then I would not like to say just what is the exact position of the whole country. I desire to give a few figures to show what the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific have done in miles of tonnage and number of passengers carried during recent years. In this respect I find that the railways have done much better than most of the branches of the government. For the twelve months ended January 31, 1930, our domestic exports were $1,160,000,000, while for the year ending January 31, 1933, they were $487,000,000, just a little over a third of what they were three years previously. Our imports were reduced in about the same proportion. The customs duties for the year ending January 31, 1930, amounted to $205,000,000, while for last year they amounted to $84,000,000. In 1930 they were about two and one-half times what they were three years later. If we are going to come to the conclusion that the Canadian National Railways are doomed, I think these figures offer the best evidence that many other institutions, including the present government, are also doomed.

I should like to deal for a few minutes with the bill which has been submitted to the house, but first of all I wish to say a word with regard to the commission. I do not think any hon. member of this house can have one word of criticism as to the eminence of the gentlemen who composed this commission. They were very capable men, but I should like to point out, as has been pointed out perhaps better than I can do it by other hon. members who have spoken already, that we have in this house the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), and many hon. gentlemen who have sat year in and year out on the railway committee, all of whom are very familiar with railway matters. Perhaps I should refer particularly to my hon. friend and former colleague, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). It must be known to every hon. member that the members of this railway committee carried out their work most diligently. Perhaps I can say this more freely because I have never been a member of that committee, although I have attended many of its sittings. I believe that these gentlemen who have been watching the railway affairs of this country, either as representatives in this house or as business men in one part of the country or another, are in a much better position to decide what is in the interests of the great masses of the Canadian people—after all that is what we are concerned with at the present time—than any commission coming from other parts of the world and looking into this question for a few months.

In connection with the recommendations of this commission, I should like to refer first of all to the appointment of the trustees, and I direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to the section dealing with this appointment. Under the provisions of section 4 of the bill the present board of directors is to be replaced by a board of three trustees which shall exercise the direction and control of the national railway and its undertakings. The thing that strikes me as remarkable is that in the appointment of the first three trustees, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways and the other members of the government seem to have faith in their ability to select good men. They do not have to ask anyone whom they shall appoint. They have the whole world from which to select anyone they like for the first board of trustees. But then they seem to lose confidence in themselves. While they are perfectly willing to appoint this board without advice from or consultation with anybody, without referring to any panel of nominations, when a vacancy occurs that same governor in council which was able to appoint the first three without any advice is not permitted to fill the vacancy except from a panel named by somebody else. Why is that? Why should they lose their confidence all at once? Has the Prime Minister recently developed an inferiority complex with regard to himself which we have never been able to detect up to the present? Or has he developed an inferiority complex with regard to his Minister of Railways, that makes him feel it is not safe to entrust to the Minister of Railways even with the advice of the rest of the cabinet, the filling of a vacancy? The Minister of Railways cannot fill any vacancy. He has exhausted himself, if I may say so, when he has appointed the first three. He cannot fill the vacancy without going and asking somebody else. I ask: Is that a sensible arrangement to put into any bill? What is the reason?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Because he will not be in office when the next one is appointed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of course, life is uncertain, and particularly political life. It seems to me that there must be some explanation which has not been given up to the present time as to why this bill should contain the remarkable provision to which I have referred. I do not intend to go out of my way to say that this is the best government we have ever had or anything like that, because I do not believe it, but I want to say to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways and the members of the government that I would much prefer to see the people of this country who are interested in this railway, and all the people are, in the hands of a board of trustees appointed by a government responsible to the people of Canada than in the hands of a board not responsible to the people of Canada.

Mr. MANION: The government makes the appointments. It is only the panel that is submitted to the government on the recommendation of the royal commission.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I quite understand that; I see that the Minister of Railways understands that also, but what I do not understand and I do not think he understands is how, since he can appoint three in the first place, he is too weak to appoint even another one without consulting someone else.

Mr. MANION: Because the royal commission recommended otherwise.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is another reason why we should take the judgment of the elected representatives of the Canadian people in this house and the government responsible to those elected representatives rather than the judgment of a commission which makes such a foolish recommendation as that.

Another matter in this bill to which I should like to refer is the power of the trustees. When I heard of three trustees being appointed by the Minister of Railways I expected that those three trustees who were to replace the whole board of directors of the national railways would be big men; that he would not hamstring or hamper or trammel them in any way, and that they would be men equal in status, redblooded men of the kind I would expect the minister to appoint. But what does he do? He appoints one man with the full status of a man, but the other two—I do not know exactly what you would call them. They seem to be a kind of sterilized trustee.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend's government, when they were in power, appointed fifteen of exactly the same kind.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is the Minister of Railways really following me? I think not. He is not as bright as he usually is, because he knows, just as well as he knows he is sitting in that seat, the difference between the powers he has given his chairman and those he has given to the other two men who will sit alongside the chairman. There is no doubt they can put nothing into effect unless the chairman is in favour of it. Will the minister say that the other fifteen of the old board of directors had a similar handicap in regard to their chairman to that under which those two are placed? He knows quite well that is not the case.

Mr. MANION: Does my hon. friend want an answer?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If the minister wishes to give an answer, I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend's government appointed fifteen who had not any control whatever. Sir Henry Thornton had the whole control.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I like to have the minister tell us what is in his mind, because it helps us in a discussion of this kind.

Mr. HANBURY: Not a bit.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Oh, yes, it does. When he speaks about Sir Henry Thornton having the whole control, I want to say to my hon. friend that during the time the former government was in power he was one of the most active men in the house in holding up his white hands in holy horror if it were suggested by anybody that anyone was doing anything to control or embarrass Sir Henry Thornton.

Mr. MANION: I should like my hon. friend to give some proof of that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It was so evident, no proof was needed. Some things are self-evident and that was always the case. If there is one thing more than another that members on the opposite side give as a sort of justification for this bill, it is the fact that they do not think enough control was kept over Sir Henry Thornton during the time that he was in control of the national railways.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to say to the minister and to the house that it will be fortunate for the people of Canada if these railways do as well with this board of one man and two half men. One man has full powers and the two other men have their legs and their hands tied so that they cannot exercise the functions of real trustees on that board. Does the minister think he will get from men in that position real service? They can do nothing until they find out that what they propose to do meets with the approval of their chairman. So much for the way in which he has appointed these men and the manner in which he has taken away from them the strength which they ought to have and which they need in a job of this kind. If I may make a suggestion to the minister—and I know he will appreciate any proposal of mine—I would suggest that the three trustees should be full time men. They should be the very best men that can be got and they should be, like the Canadian people are with those of the other members of the British commonwealth of nations, equal in status, no one inferior to any of the others.

Let me deal next with the powers of these trustees. The crucial times which we are now experiencing, will, I hope, pass away before long; we trust the change will come sooner than now seems possible, but we should do nothing at this time to hamper and trammel us in again carrying on when times get better. What is it that these trustees may do? Under section 16 they may make leases, arrangements for joint traffic and so forth, and the tribunal that is appointed, and regarding which I want to say a word before I go further, consists of the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and a representative from each of the companies, so that practically we have the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners as the functioning power in that tribunal. At the present time that board functions in regard to nearly all matters delegated to it under the Railway Act. If my memory serves me rightly, you could not, without a hearing before the Board of Railway Commissioners, settle the question of whether you were going to have gates at a particular railway crossing or any other minor question. That board has acquired a certain reputation. Since the first members of it were appointed, we have, I believe, had good men on it. It acquired the confidence of the Canadian people very early in its history. At the present time, in view of the training many who are sitting on that board have had, it is most unwise, instead of giving to the board the most important duties that can be performed, to set up this tribunal of which the chairman is the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners. What happened? Assume a matter comes before the Board of Railway Commissioners and by a majority they decide in a certain way, for instance, against the wishes of the chairman of that board. Then the matter comes before the tribunal. The chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners is the chairman of the tribunal and he can override the decision to which the whole Board of Railway Commissioners have come previously. In other words you put an appeal from the whole board to the chairman of the board. That is not good business and it does not seem to me as being at all likely to produce good results.

I want to deal just for a moment with something that, I think, is of great importance to the Canadian people. There has been much discussion about the powers of the tribunal. We find in the bill that the power and jurisdiction of the tribunal includes, among other things, disputes as to the joint use of terminals, running rights and joint use of tracks, and the abandonment of lines, services or facilities. Hon. members know that many farms have changed hands since the period of railway construction in Canada. Those who have had to purchase farms have paid higher prices for them because they were close to railway tracks and stations. We will assume, for the sake of argument, that occasionally two parallel lines will decide to run their trains over the same tracks, and to tear up the other line. In such circumstances I say the people who constitute the tribunal to make the decision whether or not that should be done should be the elected representatives in parliament, or the government who would have to report to parliament. They are in a much better position than any tribunal or board of trustees to know the difficulties people would experience by a change in railway accommodation.

There is another matter to which reference was made by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and again to-night by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy). If I heard the Prime Minister correctly the other day, and have read correctly the report of his speech as it appears in Hansard, it is his view that parliament has complete control over taxes and expenditures. I submit that the bill before us states otherwise. In section 12 we find the following words:

> The annual budget of national railways shall be under the control of the trustees. Amounts required for income deficits, for interest on obligations outstanding in the hands of the public, for capital expenditures and for refunding or retirement of maturing securities shall be submitted by the trustees to the Minister of Finance for the consideration of the governor in council prior to presentation to parliament.

So that so far as expenditures made by the trustees are concerned, apart from those necessitated through income deficits, and the other matters mentioned in the latter part of section 12, the trustees can spend without consulting parliament or directing the governor in council to submit estimates to parliament. In that connection we are getting back to the principle of taking away from parliament the control it should have over moneys expended and, after all, I believe that that is the most objectionable feature of the bill. I object to the principle of appointing a board of trustees for a period of seven years, as is provided in section 7 of the bill. Why should they be appointed for that term? If the people of Canada will derive any benefit by the change in management of the Canadian National Railways made recently, would the people not be at a distinct disadvantage, if, during the whole life of this parliament, they were unable to make any change in the authorities controlling the destiny of the railways?

After all, the government has to take the responsibility; it should have the power and should exercise it in the way it deems best. I say the provision for a seven year term is an attempt to create a sort of perpetual succession in trustees by taking the matter out of the hands of the government and placing it in the hands of two trustees, the chairman of the board of railway commissioners and the president of the exchequer court. It is wrong in principle. The fundamental principle of control by the elected representatives of the people over the expenditure of public moneys is one of the most important rights the people of any free country enjoy. This bill strikes at the very roots of that principle. This disregard of the rights of the people constitutes one of the worst features of the bill. I regret exceedingly that hon. members, the Prime Minister and the government did not make it perfectly clear that as far as they were concerned they were willing that any future government when it assumed office should have the right of control over the trustees, or whatever body was in charge of the Canadian National railways. Because, after all, the people who must take the responsibility should not come in with their hands tied.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I almost feel like apologizing for taking up the time of the house in speaking on this bill. I feel like apologizing not because I do not think the bill itself and the subject with which it deals is important, but because, in my view, in remedying any of the difficulties with which Canada is faced it will be quite ineffective. What we need is not a specific measure to deal with a specific difficulty, but a general program to deal with the whole situation. The chief fault I find with the bill, although it has many, is that in attempting to solve one problem it intensifies at least one other. It is a hopeful sign, however, when the protagonists of competition are at last compelled to see the wastefulness and folly of it. Possibly, although in a back handed way, the bill now before us represents an attempt to put into effect the last clause in the resolution we were discussing some weeks ago. The problem confronting Canada to-day is not a railway or a transportation problem; it is not an agricultural problem; it is not an unemployment or industrial problem or even a financial or monetary problem. It is a combination of all of these. Yet no attempt is being made to solve any of them, with the exception of the railway situation. And, so far as I can see, that attempt is made to protect the interests of the bondholders and shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the debenture holders of the Canadian National Railways. If I do not say anything further to-night in the interest of those bondholders, I hope the house will excuse me, because I have no doubt there will be plenty of others who will take up the cudgels on their behalf.

I was much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) to whom I listened with much pleasure. I am bound to say, however, that while I felt the voice was the voice of Jacob, the hand was that of the Canadian Pacific. To-day we are confronted with a general breakdown which cannot be rectified by the enactment of piecemeal legislation such as that now before us. The purpose of the bill is to facilitate co-operation between the two railway systems, to the end that the cost of services may be reduced. Now the cost of services as far as railways are concerned—and the same I believe is true of almost every industry—can be reduced in one of two ways; either by reduction of interest charges, which I understand in this case is said to be impossible, partly I think because there is not the will; or by reducing the amount of labour time that goes into the service given. This latter can be accomplished only in three or four ways as far as those engaged in the industry are concerned. It can be accomplished by reduction of wages; it can be accomplished by the intensifying of the labour time; it can be accomplished—and of course these two would work together—by the displacement of labour. But in whatever way it is accomplished it will add to the problem that is confronting the country at the present time, the problem of unemployment and the shortage of purchasing power. The railways, without this bill, have been trying to carry this out for the last two or three years. I find from the figures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for November, 1932, that the gross revenue of Canadian railways was $24,276,278 as compared with $31,424,404 in November, 1931. This is a decrease of over $7,000,000. Freight traffic was lighter than in November, 1931, by 22.3 per cent and passenger traffic declined by 2.3 per cent. The reduction in the payroll was over $3,000,000, and the reduction in the number of employees was 21,377. Yet despite this reduction the difference between the net operating revenue of November, 1931, and November, 1932, was almost $5,000,000. So that if we have further cooperation as a result of this bill I do not think the results will be materially different from those resulting from the cooperation carried out during the past two years.

The government in promoting this bill, the purpose of which is said to be to lighten the load on the taxpayers, puts me in mind of the Irishman who had to travel from one village to another on horseback with a sack of potatoes. He was touched with pity for the poor horse and did not like to carry the sack in front of him on the saddle, so in order to lighten the load on the horse he put the sack on his own shoulders. I would like to point out to the government that it does not make any difference whether they have to keep the unemployed in idleness or pay for their keep in the deficits of the Canadian National Railways; they have to look after them in any case.

I believe several speakers have pointed out that supposedly the original purpose of railways in this country was to promote the development of the country and increase production. The farmers used to clamour for railways in order that they could get their produce to market. I think they would be just as well off if they did not have the railways now, because their product is not of much value to them when they do get it to market. It would seem, however, from this bill and from speeches made in its support, that the only reason for the existence of railways in the dominion at present is to pay the interest on the capital invested. It is strange, and comforting to me at least, to see how many of our statements are confirmed by statements made by others in the house since the introduction of this bill. The Prime Minister informs us that the people of Canada do not own the Canadian National Railways, and we were already aware that the people of Canada do not own the Canadian Pacific Railway. As the rest of our natural resources and wealth is held and controlled in the same manner as our railways, it is a logical conclusion, one at which we arrived many years ago, that the people do not own the country, that the country belongs to the bond and debenture and mortgage holders, most of whom I believe do not live in Canada at all. I think it is a most desirable thing to know that, because when the next war comes and from what we can gather there is one in the offing now—and when they ask the people of this country to go to fight for their "king and country," they will have so very few people to conscript or get in touch with that it will materially facilitate recruiting. All they will have to do will be to call upon the bond and debenture and mortgage holders of our railways and other national wealth, and they will have the people who own the country and the only people who should be asked to fight for it.

We have also for years been saying that competition is wasteful. The government, while most vehemently denying our charge, now bring in this bill to make cooperation compulsory. Who will deny that we are making progress?

With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), who spoke on this bill the other day, I was interested in placing his speech on that occasion alongside of the one he made on the cooperative commonwealth resolution, wherein he berated us for advocating a dictatorship—which of course we did not. If I understand him aright, his own objection to the bill is that it does not go far enough in the matter of dictatorship. I do, however, find myself in general agreement with the hon. member on some points he made. I find myself in agreement with him in regard to the railway employees. One of the worst features of the bill, as I have pointed out, is that it seems only to have in mind the interest of the bondholders. It is difficult to see how it can be otherwise, as the bill is based on the report of the Duff commission, and the government, with its usual high regard for the interests of labour, saw to it that there was no labour representative on that commission. However, one of the royal commissioners was taken from the United States, Mr. L. F. Loree, president of the Delaware and Hudson railway. Mr. Loree had a quick and easy way of "putting the boat on an even keel," as he called it. I will quote some evidence taken before the commission. While Mr. S. J. Hungerford was testifying, Mr. Loree asked him:

> Who is it that is rocking the boat? Is it labour, or what is it? Take my own company: we will have earned this year above our fixed charges about $100,000; if we had the wage scale of 1913, we could declare a 20 per cent dividend.

It did not matter to Mr. Loree whether the wage scale of 1913 was a just or fair wage scale or not; all that mattered to him was that instead of making 20 per cent they were this year making a profit of only $100,000.

Mr. HANBURY: And there was an increase in freight rates during that period.

Mr. MacINNIS: No doubt. Mr. Loree belongs to that class of people, which I hope is dwindling, who believe the only function of the working class is to produce dividends for shareholders and debenture holders. It never seems to occur to these people that engineers, conductors, trainmen, trackmen and all those others who make a railway possible are just as important to the railway as the president, and that their wages and working conditions should be as little the concern of the public as the salary and working conditions of the president. To quote further:

Mr. Hungerford: Well, the wage scale of the Canadian National, Mr. Loree, is just about the wage scale of all other American railways; they are almost exactly equal.

Commissioner Loree: That balloon has been blown up to such an extent that it is liable to burst at any time.

Mr. Hungerford: Quite so. We have been apparently successful in effecting some reductions anyway.

Commissioner Loree: That is a grain of sand on the beach. If you could go back to the 1913 payroll, you would save about $94,000,000, so you would just about put your boat on an even keel.

Mr. HEAPS: He would not pay wages at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: Unfortunately even railway employees have to eat, and consequently railway owners must pay them wages. Perhaps some day we will evolve a man who will not eat; he will be the ideal employee. Then Commissioner Loree goes on:

There is a great deal of complaint about maldistribution of wealth. I wonder sometimes there is not more complaint about the maldistribution of tenor voices. We have not had any since Caruso stopped singing. When railroading started in England one hundred years ago—

He does not want to go back to 1913; he wants to go back a hundred years.

—a locomotive engineer received $5.25 a week. He had an average daily run of ninety miles between terminals; he worked about twelve hours a day, he took care of his engine, he was a mechanic in the shop when he was not running his engine on the road. The Bank of England discount rate was four per cent.

I believe that in the United States, from which Mr. Loree comes, they had about twelve million unemployed at the time this evidence was given. If they went back to the conditions of a hundred years ago and had railway men working twelve hours a day and caring for their own engines, with the same conditions prevailing in other lines of work, possibly they would have twenty-five million or fifty million unemployed in the United States, and their desire to always have the biggest thing in the world would be well satisfied. Mr. Loree goes on:

To-day our better railroad men get a little over $300 a month; they work eight hours a day. They are waited on as though they were gentlemen of the court.

I wonder why an engineer should not be waited on as though he were a gentleman of the court. In my humble opinion he is a little more useful, but of course there may be a difference of view there.

They bring their engine to the cinder pit and the hostler takes it off their hands, puts in sand and water, draws the fire and does all the rest of the work! The locomotive is inspected for them at the roundhouse; they are just riders; they get thirteen times as much wages as the locomotive engineer did a hundred years ago.

That is the type of prehistoric mind we had to import from a foreign country in order to put our railways on a proper basis.

The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) also took a rap at the wages of railway employees when he spoke on March 7. He said that if they were called out for a few hours under certain circumstances it was called a day's work, and that if they went a few miles on certain runs it also counted as a day's work. I understand that the hon. member for Stanstead is a lawyer and, if my information is correct, a corporation lawyer; as a matter of fact I believe he is a railway lawyer. I suppose he belongs to the lawyers' union: I understand they have very definite trades union rules, and I am told they even have a closed shop. I believe one of their rules is that before they take a case or do any work at all they must have a retainer, so I do not see why the hon. gentleman should object to a man doing other work getting paid when that work is done. If I understand railway conditions correctly, and I believe I do, these employees who get paid for working a few hours or for taking a short run must be on duty twenty-four hours a day, for they never know when they are going to be called out. Consequently their time is not their own, and all the time they are at the call of the company though not actually working on the job.

The hon. member for Stanstead stated that we "must scrutinize more closely the conditions of labour as well as the pay of the vast army of railway employees." I would suggest that if such scrutiny is to be made the idea should be to improve rather than lower the standard of living. Perhaps a low standard was necessary at one time, while the necessary capital was being created, but that work is now finished and if we are to make use of that capital the standard of living of the masses of the people not only must not be reduced but must be very materially raised. I have some statistics here with regard to the wages of employees on Canadian railways for 1931. The total number of railway employees then was 154,569, and of these 13,833 received less than $900 per year, or $75 per month. There were 34 who received from $900 to $1,000; 51,696 who received over $1,000 and less than $1,250, and 44,235 who received over $1,250 and less than $1,500. So it will be seen that the great majority of railway employees received less than $1,500 a year.

Mr. YOUNG: What was the average wage?

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the average wage would come to $125 a month. I will give the rating for the others. Here are the figures: 6,961 received over $1,500 and under $1,750; 16,294 received over $1,750 and under $2,000; 6,507 received over $2,000 and under $2,250; 4,968 received over $2,250 and under $2,500; 2,821 received over $2,500 and under $2,750; 3,398 received over $2,750 and under $3,000; and only 3,591 received over $3,000 a year. This includes officers as well as the others.

Mr. MANION: Where does my hon. friend get such figures? They are all wrong, the last figures.

Mr. MacINNIS: These figures were worked out from data supplied from the Bureau of Statistics by L. F. Keller, statistician of the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees, and if they are wrong they can be very easily checked up. Now, while the total payrolls decreased on the Canadian National in 1931 by 7.44 per cent and on the Canadian Pacific during the same year by 9.70, the officers' payroll increased by 6.39 per cent on the Canadian National and 2.58 per cent on the Canadian Pacific. These figures I believe are sufficient to show that if there is extravagance in the management of the railways of this country it is certainly not in the wages paid the employees of the roads.

In my opinion it is absolutely necessary that the working class in this country as well as the workers engaged on the railways should have a voice in the direction of the enterprise, and there is no provision in that regard in this bill. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), in closing his speech on the introduction of this bill last Tuesday, prophesied the return of good times in this dominion, and the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) tells us that this legislation should not be predicated on the assumption that troubled times are going to continue, but should be predicated upon faith in the country. It seems to me that as legislators we should not legislate on either faith or hope; we should not base our enactments on hope of good times returning but on an understanding of the questions that confront us. That understanding is not based on faith or hope, and only on such an understanding can we be assured that the present conditions or worse will not be with us for some time to come.

If we take into consideration the development that has taken place since the railway era began, we can see very readily how it is that we have come to the present pass. Successful railway operation, it does not matter where you take it, does not date further back than 1831; so far as the United States is concerned, it dates from 1840 and in Canada from 1851. In 1815 the population of the United States was only a little over eight million people, and our population at that time was between one and two millions. We had no railways at all. In that short period of a little over one hundred years we have seen throughout the world the construction of some 600,000 miles of steam railways. The population of the United States has increased from eight to one hundred and twenty-five millions. We have built in this dominion alone about 42,000 miles of railway and in the United States they have built about 260,000 miles. This railway construction resulted in prosperity so long as building was in progress and capital was being invested. Now, however, that capital investment is complete and there are no more North American continents to be developed, no more Dominions of Canada. There is an industrial equipment on this continent sufficient to meet the needs of the 135,000,000 million people in Canada and the United States, and indeed twice that number at least.

In face of such conditions, on what do we base our hope for a return of prosperity? Prosperity, as I see it at the moment, will come when we legislate definitely to bring it about; that is to say, when we set about making the fruits of our mechanical equipment and technical understanding of the means of production available to the mass of the people. But there is nothing in this bill that will accomplish that. As a matter of fact, every effort is in the direction of effecting economies: in other words, more and more people will be forced out of employment. The Prime Minister made this statement:

> I will admit it is drastic but modern surgery says that if you will cure, the operation must be radical where the evil is deep seated. This is a surgical operation and it must be a radical operation.

I believe that the best medical opinion to-day is coming to realize that these pathological conditions that require operations grow out of habits of life, and if the habits of life are not changed the beneficial effects of an operation will be of very short duration, and then something worse may happen the patient. I will go further than that and say that this is not an impairment of one organ in an otherwise healthy organism; it is in fact disintegration setting in because of senile decay, and there is no operation that will remedy that condition. The only thing that will meet such a condition is a rebirth and there is nothing in this bill that would show that there are any changes at all contemplated except a continuance of the economies of the past.

I am opposed to this bill because it is another palliative that does not palliate. I am opposed to it because it is undemocratic in its operation. As I said in the beginning, in trying to effect a cure for one difficulty or one part, the bill increases and intensifies that difficulty in another.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the house to deal with at least two or the references made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the address he delivered the other evening. In dealing with the railway history of this country the Prime Minister made some references which were characteristic of himself in addressing the house. He gave the appearance of candour, and he can be candid with regard to facts when he chooses, but at the same time he did not state all the facts, contenting himself more or less with insinuations and leaving an impression rather than making a positive statement as to something which might be detrimental to the party on this side. I refer particularly to two statements which the right hon. gentleman made, the first with regard to the three transcontinental railway systems and the second with regard to the amalgamation of the present Canadian National system. It is necessary for me to go back into history but I think the time has come in this debate when the facts should be put on record. I shall try to be as concise as possible and endeavour to state the facts as fully as necessary for the purpose.

In the first place, my right hon. friend found it almost impossible to dream of intelligent men being in such a condition of mind that they could contemplate three transcontinental railways. Of course, he referred to the fact that in 1904 the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific were constructed under the then Laurier government, and also to the fact that the Canadian Northern had been completed through to the Pacific coast. Let me remind him, as he has already been reminded by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), that the 1904 episode in the railway history of this country is one which has pretty well run over the dam. Two elections were subsequently fought upon that issue. The people of Canada returned Sir Wilfrid Laurier to power not only after he had announced his policy but after the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific had been practically completed. Not only that, but in 1904, the Right Hon. R. L. Borden, leading the Conservative party at that time, spoke in the House of Commons and moved an amendment which proposed a second transcontinental railway. It is quite true that that proposal was different from the one made by the Laurier administration, nevertheless it was just as clearly a project for a second transcontinental line. I have the resolution under my hand, which reads:

> The house is of the opinion that instead of ratifying the proposed agreements it would be more in the public interest that the dominion should assume the whole obligation necessary for extending across the continent the present government system of railways thereby completing a transcontinental railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific entirely owned by and under the control of people of Canada.

That was after the Canadian Pacific had already been constructed; it was to be a second transcontinental. Yet my right hon. friend finds it extremely difficult to understand how any intelligent man could have dreamed, he suggested, even of a second transcontinental line.

The completion of the Canadian Northern railway made the third transcontinental line. Nobody knows more about the history of this railway than my right hon. friend. We all know that Mackenzie and Mann had commenced the Canadian Northern as a local undertaking in Manitoba, that they had extended the line through the west, that the government of Manitoba had assisted them to some extent, that application was made to the then Liberal government for a $35,000,000 guarantee in order to connect the commercial and industrial centres in the east with the system which existed in the prairie provinces, that that guarantee was given, but that at the same time—I ask hon. gentlemen to note this—a request was made of the Liberal government of that day that assistance be given to extend the Canadian Northern to the Pacific ocean, which request was refused. As the Hon. Frank Oliver said in the house, a great many people were convinced that it would be a good idea to have a third transcontinental railway but did not regard it as a necessity at that time. The assistance was not granted, and it remained for the Conservative government which came into power in 1912 to make a grant of $6,000,000 towards the extension of the Canadian Northern railway through the Yellowhead pass to Vancouver. It remained also for the Conservative government in 1914 to guarantee $45,000,000 for the express purpose of completing a third transcontinental railway. Yet my right hon. friend wonders how intelligent people could dream of such a thing as a third transcontinental railway. That money was voted by a government which my right hon. friend supported, at a time in the history of the House of Commons with which he is extremely familiar. That was the situation with regard to the three transcontinental railways. Sir Robert Borden moved the introduction of the bill for the purpose of completing the third transcontinental, about which no intelligent man would dream. After referring to the Canadian Northern lines in connection with which it was proposed to vote $45,000,000, he is quoted on page 3660 of Hansard of 1914 as follows:

These lines however, are to-day less profitable than they otherwise would be until the system is extended, on the one hand to the Pacific coast, and on the other hand to Quebec and Montreal, so as to be in touch with the great traffic which has already developed, and which will develop in still greater measure, in the future, upon the Pacific ocean, and to bring the road into touch with the great railway systems of Ontario and Quebec, and particularly the system of government railways, and the Canadian Pacific railway system, so far as it is situated within Quebec and the maritime provinces.

I say to my right hon. friend that evidently there were quite a number of gentlemen besides Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose friends at least would claim were intelligent, who were strongly in favour of a third transcontinental. Yet my right hon. friend in the midst of what was supposed to be a candid and serious speech went out of his way to refer in a deprecating way to the memory and work of Sir Wilfrid Laurier with regard to this third transcontinental railway.

Now as to the amalgamation of the railways into the Canadian National system. As a deadly parallel I want to put on Hansard just a word or two in connection with what was said by my right hon. friend with regard to the amalgamation of the system of railways now known as the Canadian National railway system. To leave the impression that the Liberal government were wholly responsible for this combination of roads and for the country undertaking public ownership in connection with the different units which make up the present Canadian National Railways, my right hon. friend is reported on page 2854 of Hansard as follows:

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I shall not do more than indicate that these bankrupt enterprises were united into one system. When the decision of the privy council was finally given —and at that time the party of my right hon. friend was in power—an order in council was passed that brought all these systems under one control. They are known now as the Canadian National Railways. As I have said, they comprise the old systems, to which I have alluded, together with the new roads built by the people of Canada, the National Transcontinental, the old Intercolonial railway, as well as the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk system, and the Canadian Northern.

My right hon. friend said in effect: We did not do it, it was our friends on the other side who were in power when the decision of the privy council was given, they were the ones who passed the order in council. There was no attempt made in that speech to take any responsibility or credit for the unification of these roads. Let me now quote from a speech which the right hon. gentleman made in the House of Commons on June 8, 1928. He was referring to the consolidation of the roads and he stated that although the Liberal party had been in power, it was not the Liberal party that had brought it about. These are his words:

The consolidation of these roads took place first under the Union government and later under the Conservative administration. The consolidation could not be carried into effect until the judgment of the privy council was delivered, and that judgment was not delivered until after the Conservative administration had been defeated. But the consolidation as such, the framework, the skeleton and the statutes were prepared before the present government took office.

What a difference! None of that was said the other night, because at this time it is not in such good form or fashion to boast of having been such good friends of the Canadian National; at least that is the attitude of our hon. friends opposite. Let me finish the quotation:

We have now spent more than $100,000,000 upon that undertaking.

Note this.

These railroads were not roads that could compete with the Canadian Pacific system, and so we had to spend hundreds of millions of dollars upon the system to make it efficient and effective.

That was said at the same time in 1928.

What is the history of the amalgamation of those two roads? I know there are many complicated facts, but we can summarize them. The Drayton-Acworth report was brought down in 1917 recommending that the government take over the roads, particularly the Canadian Northern. The Canadian Northern got into difficulties. The government purchased the stock and under arbitration paid $10,800,000 for stock that is said not to have been worth a cent. It paid for the stock and it had to assume the bonds as well. What did the government do? Do my hon. friends from the maritimes remember what it did? It established Mr. D. B. Hanna, chairman of the Canadian Northern board, as director of the Canadian Northern Railway, and at the same time it put the Canadian Government Railways under Mr. Hanna as well and moved the headquarters of the Canadian Government Railways with the Canadian Northern Railway to Toronto. That was in 1917. We went along for a while with Mr. Hanna running from Toronto the Canadian Northern and also the Canadian Government Railways. Then the situation arose that the Grand Trunk fell down on their guarantees in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. The result was that the Grand Trunk Pacific went into receivership and the Minister of Railways was appointed receiver. In order to give Mr. Hanna a little more to do, the minister made him and his board act for the minister as receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific. So we had Mr. Hanna and his board operating the Canadian Government Railways consisting of the Intercolonial railway and the National Transcontinental railway, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk still was left out.

In 1918 and 1919 negotiations went on with the Grand Trunk; there were agreements, arbitrations and lawsuits, but finally in 1920, I think, an arrangement was completed whereby the Grand Trunk stock was acquired by the government and, as everybody knows, that stock was acquired under an arrangement whereby it would be valued at arbitration. The arbitrators finally met and with the late Chief Justice Taft dissenting, found that the stock had no value whatever. The Grand Trunk directors were still allowed to direct. In 1921, I think it was, a Canadian board was appointed by the Grand Trunk and then we had Mr. Hanna running the majority of the roads of which I have spoken and the Canadian Grand Trunk board under Sir Joseph Flavelle running the Grand Trunk Railway. In order that there might be co-ordination—and this is the first instance we have had of an arbitral tribunal—we find a committee of management appointed of which Mr. Kelley of the Grand Trunk was chairman. That committee operated for a year or more trying, if possible, to coordinate the operations of those two railways. As a matter of fact the coordination was not particularly successful. It is referred to in one of the minister's reports near the end of his regime and if I have time, I shall put it on record. The Hon. J. D. Reid was, I think, minister at the time and he makes this report:

> The system of joint management was stated by the minister to be embarrassing, inconvenient and expensive though justified as a temporary expedient and as providing for the possession which the company (the Grand Trunk) should have during the preparatory period of its case and, at the same time, by means of a committee of management, for such a measure of unification with the government railway system as might be possible.

When the Grand Trunk stock was acquired, and the control by the management committee set up, government ownership of railways was virtually accepted. In fact the Duff report says on page 13 that the government of the Dominion of Canada was projected into the railway business in 1917. It states:

> Government ownership of railways on a large scale as a national policy was not contemplated or planned by any government and was not submitted for adoption to the people of Canada. But when in 1917, the government refused to permit the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to negotiate for the majority shares of the Canadian Northern, there was practically no escape from government ownership of all the railways now comprised within the Canadian National Railway system. The consequent completion and operation of the hitherto privately owned and operated lines with the publicly owned railways followed as a matter of course. Thus by a combination of contractual obligations and parliamentary measures, the country was projected into the railway business on a large scale.

I am quoting from the Duff report at page 13. This is what it says in contrast to the offhand and rather casual reference which my hon. friend made the other night inferring that it was the government of my leader that was in power when the railway complication took place. This indicates that the time when the government bit off public ownership was 1917 and that was the legacy handed the Liberal party in 1922. I should mention also that the Canadian National Railways Act had been passed in 1919. Our hon. friends opposite had prepared for this, even though they are not now so keen about admitting the fact. This was intended to take in the Canadian Northern Railway and the Canadian Government Railways, but somehow or another, they had not quite the courage to proclaim the act and they kept those railways limping along under those two different managements with the management committee over them. Nothing had been done in regard to final and businesslike consolidation when the 1921 elections took place. In October, 1922, the board of the Canadian Northern Railway, including the Canadian Government Railways and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian board of the Grand Trunk, both resigned and Sir Henry Thornton and his board were appointed in charge of them all. The Canadian National Railways Act was proclaimed and from that time on the Liberal government was responsible for the administration of the road.

I want to remind the house that what we took over at that time was not a particularly homogeneous system of railroads. Lord Shaughnessy wrote in the Winnipeg Free Press in 1921 with regard to this very matter. I am reading from that paper of December 16, 1931:

Lord Shaughnessy in his letter to the government in 1921 pointed out that in respect to much of the new national system there was no rolling stock equipment, nor terminal yards, freight facilities, repair shops, nor other requirements commensurate to its needs and that the cost of providing them would be very great. That it would take years of effort, large expenditures of money and the courageous facing of money losses covering many years to establish the Canadian National Railways.

That is the legacy which my hon. friends opposite left in 1921. The minister has often complained, and he complained again to-night, that he had been left an unfair legacy by the late government. I want to point out the distinction between the legacy we got and the one we left. That was the condition of the roads at that time as pointed out by Lord Shaughnessy, and everyone will admit that he knew something about railroading. That condition was described by Sir Henry Thornton when he was before the committee on railways and shipping in 1929. I shall not take up time by quoting all he says, but I shall read from pages 138 and 139 of the report of the committee of railways and shipping in 1929. Sir Henry Thornton says:

Now the great problem that confronted us was to arrange to provide such facilities as would permit those discorded parts to operate as one, each part more or less in accord with the other. That involved necessarily very considerable additions to capital, as one can easily see. Take, for instance, this one question of rock ballast and heavier rail on our lines between Montreal and Chicago. We have been pursuing a consistent policy, an increasingly vigorous policy, to as rapidly as possible equip that part of the railway with stone ballast, automatic signals and heavier rail, a large part of which must necessarily go to capital.

Then he spoke concerning wooden trestles which had been renewed. Then:

I do not want this committee to go away with the idea that when the system was handed over to us we were handed a complete railway. We were handed a very discordant number of parts, a railway which was insufficient in many ways in its railways and traffic. All that involved a good deal of money to put the railway into an efficient position. And the answer as to whether that was wise or not is found in the increasing net earnings, which have increased from $3,000,000 for 1922 to over $58,000,000 last year.

Then Mr. Geary stated:

A good deal of that had been done before you came.

Sir Henry Thornton replied:

The work had commenced, and some of it had been done; and during the intervening six years we proceeded with it with greater vigour than those who preceded us had been able to pursue it. And then again the great advantage was that it was all under one administration, instead of two as it was before.

Then, going down on the page still further, Sir Henry Thornton said:

The railways, as we took them over, were like an orchestra, with each instrument playing its own tune independently of the others; and we are trying to get harmony out of the whole.

Whom do you suppose replied? The Hon. Mr. Stevens replied:

You ought to be complimented upon the way in which you have got harmony out of your organization.

That is the system we got. I should like to place on record what we did with that system, and what Sir Henry Thornton and the railway management did with it between the years 1923 and 1931. I have before me a tabulated statement showing a financial picture of the railways from 1923 to 1931, but I have not time to place that picture on record. At this point I shall attempt to summarize it so that it may be easily understood. In my figures I shall take three periods. First, I have taken the system which made up the Canadian National railways between 1919 and 1921, under the Meighen government, then I have taken the period from 1922 to 1930, during the time the Liberal party was in power and Sir Henry Thornton was president of the railways. Then there is the year 1931. I have endeavoured to get the figures for 1932, but I am informed the report is not yet published. I shall be glad to make a statement concerning that year when the bill is in committee. Let us look at the figures for the periods I have indicated.

For each of the three years from 1919 to 1921 the average annual capital expenditure was $57,000,000; for each of the nine years from 1922 to 1930 it was $45,000,000. Then there was a drop to $34,000,000 in 1931. As everyone knows, the decrease was due to two things: first, to the very extensive lopping off in all capital expenditures in government matters, and second, to the splendid condition into which the road had been put. Let us now turn to the other items which have more to do with operation. The Minister of Railways talked a good deal about the railway going into debt to the tune of a million dollars a week. Let me give him a few figures to show him the legacy we got in 1921. The average yearly amount available for interest payable to the government and to the public was as follows: From the years 1919 to 1921 there was not only not a cent available for interest, but there was an average deficit of $22,000,000 yearly. From 1922 to 1930 the average yearly amount available for interest was $24,000,000, and in 1931, the first full year the present government was in power—and I do not blame them altogether, although they will have to take some responsibility—in 1931, there was again not a cent available for interest; as a matter of fact there was a $5,000,000 deficit.

I now turn to the average annual deficit after paying interest due to the public. This is a matter which has concerned the Minister of Railways very much. He states we ought to pay the interest due to the public. I frankly admit that during the last ten years we have not done that. However let me again compare figures. From the years 1919 to 1921 the average annual deficit after paying the interest due to the public alone was $53,000,000. That is a million dollars a week. In the years from 1922 to 1930 the average annual deficit after paying interest due to the public was not $53,000,000, but $15,000,000 and in two of those years, 1926 and 1928, we actually paid the interest due the public and had surpluses totalling $5,000,000. In the year 1931, the first year of my hon. friend's administration, the deficit, after paying interest to the public, was $60,000,000.

Let us take another item, namely the average annual increase in long term debt, public borrowings, and government advances. From the years 1919 to 1921 there was an average of $111,000,000 each year. From 1922 to 1930, instead of $111,000,000 the average annual increase on long term debts was $55,000,000, and in three years, in 1922, 1926 and 1928, we reduced the debt due to the public by a total of $34,000,000. The first year hon. members opposite came into power the increase in long term debt, in public borrowings and government advances was $134,000,000.

I do not think the minister should be too greatly appalled by the million dollars each week. Let me give him a table, with which no doubt he is as familiar as I am, showing the operating results from 1919 forward. These, Mr. Speaker, are the figures after paying interest to the public.

Mr. MANION: Would the hon. member tell what he means by the expression interest to the public? There is interest to the government and interest to the investing public. I should like to have the matter cleared up.

Mr. RALSTON: I mean the interest on all obligations, except the interest due to the government. The interest "due to the public" is what is shown in the accounts right straight through. Having said that, let me indicate by the following table what the situation was in each year from 1919 forward after paying the interest to the public:

1920	66,000,000*
1921	48,000,000*
1922	33,000,000*
1923	21,000,000*
1924	23,000,000*
1925	9,000,000*
1926	2,000,000†
1927	4,000,000*
1928	3,000,000†
1929	12,000,000*
1930	35,000,000*
1931	60,000,000*

* Deficit. † Surplus.

And that included eastern lines. These figures indicate that during the thirteen years there was an accumulated deficit of $351,000,000 in connection with these railways which, combined, make up the Canadian National system. Of that $351,000,000, $219,000,000 accumulated during the four years the party opposite were in power. The balance of $132,000,000 was made up during the nine years of the Liberal administration.

No wonder the present Minister of Justice in 1929 was loud in his praises of the railway system. It is impossible to quote too often his remarks, which have already been quoted in this debate. They are as follows:

> Now, when this wonderful Canadian National railway system has more than justified itself, now that it is rapidly becoming in the nature of a great national asset, now that we may look forward to a day not perhaps in my life time, but in the life time of some here, when this system will start repaying the government of Canada part at least of the money it owes to the treasury, to the day when it will have a clean sheet as it ultimately will have, in regard to its bonded indebtedness to the public; now that the system is in this, a thoroughly prosperous condition, this government desires to treat it as its own creature. Whereas in 1919 it tried to cast it out as base-born, now it wants to consider it as its legitimate offspring, and to profit by its success.

Let me say, in concluding my remarks on this phase of the subject, that the national railway system in this country constitutes a national monument to the ability and statesmanship and determination of a single man, a member of a former Conservative government, and subsequently Prime Minister of that government. It is to his ability and foresight, to his statesmanship and determination, that the people of Canada are indebted for this wonderful system of national railways.

Mr. VENIOT: The chickens come home to roost.

Mr. RALSTON: Yet within two years we have the Prime Minister of Canada comparing this railroad to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and saying we must have a receivership for it! I say that no more unhappy or misleading or harmful expression was ever used than to talk about receivership for the Canadian National. An hon. gentleman in another chamber the other day intimated that while they were the mothers of the road they did not much like the way the foster father had treated it the last six or seven years. Well, after the record I have given I think that this road would be willing to trust itself to the tender mercies of the foster father rather than to the careless and indifferent and inconstant mother who now seems to care so little for her offspring. Receivership, my right hon friend says! He might just as well talk about the government of Canada being in receivership. We have a deficit of $200,000,000 or more; does that mean we are going into receivership? The situation is that we are paying our interest as usual; there is nothing to go into receivership about that I know of. You have a receivership when you do not pay your interest. The people of Canada are paying this interest and propose to pay it. I submit my right hon. friend used an expression extremely harmful to the Dominion of Canada. One would think, Mr. Speaker, that there was $2,300,000,000 of debt that we never had before. But when we took over these roads there was over $1,700,000,000 due on them. Let me tell you how the $2,300,000,000 is made up. It is not any new figure. The amount due the public is $1,263,000,000, including unguaranteed debt; $618,000,000 dominion government advances, and $405,000,000 for Canadian government railways; $2,286,000,000. Of that $1,700,000,000 was on the time that we took the roads over, and as far as the Canadian National is concerned we have added in capital expenditures just as much and no more in percentage to mileage as the Canadian Pacific has spent during the past ten years. So that comparatively we are in exactly the same position, as far as capital expenditure is concerned as we were in 1921. And yet a road which was spoken about in such wonderful terms in 1928, which has not done any worse, except that it has not made as much operating revenue, but which at the same time has not increased its capital expenditures any faster than the Canadian Pacific, is now talked about as going into receivership. Yet the people of Canada are in a position, and I hope always will be, to pay the interest.

What is the situation in regard to this road? That brings me to a point that it seems to me is overlooked—it may be regarded as bookkeeping, but I think it is essential if you are going to give the Canadian National system a fair chance. We are talking as if the Canadian National owed us $2,286,000,000. You might just as well say that the Post Office Department owes us $70,000,000 because the post offices and public buildings cost us that much. Do we ever expect to get interest on that? Certainly not. Do you ever expect to get interest on the cost of public works and public utilities all over this country? Certainly not. But because the roads which happen to make up the Canadian National system at some time in their career as private enterprises cost $2,286,000,000, we say this road is going to the demnition bow-wows because it does not pay interest on that amount. It was never bought to pay interest on that amount; the roads were bought as public utilities. The sooner we get these railways recapitalized so that they can be given a fair chance, the better it will be for the finances of the Dominion of Canada and the fairer for the railway itself. My friends have a perfect right to say: You were in power for nine years, why didn't you do it? I say to my hon. friends that it was repeatedly considered, and it was felt that we should have experience for a reasonable time in order to see just what this railway could do. I believe that now is the time this should be done, and particularly do I believe that it should be done when we are proposing to hand over this railway to a set of trustees who are going to run it economically and under a system to make it remunerative. That is the word used in the act. Remunerative on what? Are you going to require the trustees to run it to pay interest on $2,286,000,000? It has never done it yet. It paid interest on a portion for two years. The best estimate I can make, looking at the gross earnings year by year, is that if we get interest on perhaps $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 that would be fair to the railway and to the people of Canada. I submit we might just as well decide now that the people of Canada will cut their loss, it it is a loss, in connection with the Canadian National, and do what almost every other concern is doing, have a reorganization, cut down fixed charges and give this railway a chance to live and pay its way. I have always felt, particularly when we talked about a change in management in the system, that that would be the first thing to be done. I cannot conceive how you are going to put trustees in charge of this road and tell them to run it on the principle laid down in section 16, "remunerative operation," without fixing some decent amount of capital on which the railway is supposed to pay interest. What will they pay interest on? They certainly will not pay interest on the amount due the government. My hon. friend the then Minister of Justice, in 1928, himself called the amount due the government a "bookkeeping entry." The Minister of Railways, speaking here the other day, intimated that no member of the house expected the railway to pay interest on the amount due the government. Well, will they pay interest on the amount due the public? I think not. There was due the public and the government in 1922 something like $1,700,000,000. It cannot carry the interest due to the public, it never has except for those two years when times were particularly good. I do not believe that we should set up the capital on which the Canadian National should pay interest at any such amount. After all it is a matter of bookkeeping, but it makes all the difference between having us feel that we are losing money, that we have a child in the house which is not paying its way, not earning its keep, and feeling that we have paid for a public utility, the payment being part of the public debt just as the payment for the war or for public works or post offices or any other public facilities. I believe we should get down to that situation, and that is one of the things that should be done not last but first.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after we have done that what is the second step? My friend the Prime Minister mentioned it; he spoke about equilibrium between revenue and expenditure. That is a splendid idea. But you do not get that equilibrium by appointing a receiver, you do it by appointing a manager. That is exactly what we are trying to do here. I think the farther we get away from that figure of a receiver the more self-respecting we shall feel. The spirit of the act is that economies shall be practised and that there shall be remunerative operation. Now it is absolutely a contradiction in terms if you talk about remunerative operation with a capitalization of $2,286,000,000. There are two ways to secure economies—and I am absolutely in favour of it, let no man in this house mistake that; there is no one who believes more in the necessity of drastic economy than I do, particularly at this time in our history. There are two ways we propose to achieve it, one by forcible cooperation with the competitive railway, and the other that which has been mentioned by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) by making the railway independent not only of parliament, but of the public too. With forcible cooperation I have not time to deal except, with my honoured leader, to express my doubts as to the effect of cooperation achieved under the shadow of a stuffed club. Nevertheless I agree that there should be some arbiter, some way should be found; and it may be that this is the way, perhaps some modified form of board; some way should be found whereby needless competition between these railways and duplication of services will be eliminated.

My next point is with regard to the railway being independent of parliament and the government. I know it is not intentional, but will the house just recollect that all we are doing here is forming a new board for the Canadian National Railway Company, and that the governor in council still has the right to put a railway company under that national company or take one out from it. So you may have all this machinery, the trustees and all that sort of thing, with not a railway under the act, and that can be done by order in council. I do not think it was intended that it should be left in that way, and I imagine that when the bill is discussed in committee something will be said about it. Another thing should be noted: It is peculiar that the first trustees are to be appointed by the governor in council, and that only after that do they become self-perpetuating and are appointed by the president of the exchequer court, the chief commissioner of the board of railway commissioners and the two remaining trustees.

Now with regard to this matter of independent control: Let us remember that at the present time we have these alternatives: We can amalgamate these roads, we can sell the Canadian National, we can lease it or we can run it. By this bill we are deciding that we are going to run it, and why? Not simply because we want to make money out of it; that is perhaps the last thing to consider. We want to save as much money as we can, but we believe it is in the public interest to operate this system, and we believe it is in the interest of the community to run it similarly to the post office or any other government service.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give just one illustration of how I think this act will work out and why I believe there should be a least some protection and some safeguard in the public interest. Take the Halifax and Southwestern railway as an example. This may be parochial; some hon. members may say I am referring to my own province. That is so, and I do so because I am most familiar with that province. Under this act that railway can be abandoned, by agreement between the Canadian National railways and the Canadian Pacific railway; it can be abandoned and the bondholders, who happen to be the people of the province of Nova Scotia, can take it over. It could be abandoned at the behest of a trustee appointed by the governor in council or chosen from such a panel as I have mentioned, which panel is drawn up and the choice made by the president of the exchequer court, the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and the remaining trustees. This trustee is appointed for seven years; he is not removable except by the address of both houses, and his decision may not be reviewed by the governor in council. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a fair position in which to place these people of Nova Scotia with regard to that particular road. I am only taking that as an example. I believe every hon. member can imagine some situation in his own constituency which is comparable to the one I have mentioned.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for over forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MALCOLM: Go ahead, with the consent of the house.

Mr. RALSTON: I am very much obliged for this courtesy, and I have just one more point to make. I say this illustrates the effect of the act and the irresponsibility of the trustees, if I may put it that way, without offence, who are to be given jurisdiction over our railways. Let me point out one other matter which I hope the minister will consider when the bill is in committee. I think under this act bonds could be issued by the trustees without the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps they could, if they could sell the bonds.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: Equipment trust bonds can be issued without any guarantee of any description.

Mr. MANION: Not at the present time.

Mr. RALSTON: They have been so issued right along. Perhaps there has been a change since my hon. friend came into office, but I say that under this act bonds apparently can be issued without the approval of the governor in council at all.

I am in accord with those who have spoken with regard to the desirability of a larger number of trustees than is provided for in the bill. I believe the situation with regard to the Intercolonial railway is so vital that we should have some representation from the maritime provinces. I cannot develop this argument to-night except to say that, as everyone knows, the Intercolonial railway was built as a strategic road, two hundred miles longer than was necessary, as a bond of confederation. Further than that, it was built as a surface road. We pay more to have our goods hauled because our motive power cannot handle heavy loads because of the grade. An engine that will handle a thousand tons on the prairies will handle only perhaps six hundred tons on that line in the maritime provinces. I think under these circumstances the people of the maritimes are entitled to some consideration. I believe the trustees should have some intimate knowledge of the place and position the Intercolonial railway holds in Canadian confederation.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I go as far as any living man in divorcing the management of the railways from party influence, but I believe the provisions of this act go to extremes which are both unnecessary and unsound. I yield to no one in recognizing the necessity for economy, but if we are to retain this railway system the people of Canada who have made the investment should be entitled to something more than the questionable satisfaction of paying interest, at the same time very largely abdicating in perpetuity all practical control of the railway. I still feel that the man who pays the piper should have at least some voice in calling the tune. It has been decided to maintain this railway system as a national undertaking. I believe a vigorous and effective and, if you like, drastic policy of cooperation and retrenchment can be carried out without resorting to hysterical or unsound methods, and wtihout any such wholesale surrender of governmental authority as is contemplated in this bill.

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in spite of all that has been said I feel it my duty to express my views with regard to the bill which is now before the house, because in my opinion this is the most important measure to be considered this session. First we had what is supposed to be a very serious railway problem. The government, realizing the gravity of the situation, appointed a commission, and now we have this bill which is based upon the report of that commission. I will not go into further detail.

My first reason for opposing this bill is that it does not suggest any solution of this great railway problem. More than that, however, I fear that it does mean a consolidation of the two railway systems, probably for all time to come, through the provision concerning the leasing of part of the Canadian National system to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I come from a part of the country which is served almost equally by the two great systems, in the main by branch lines though part of the main line of the Canadian National runs through my district. I hold no brief for either system, but I am concerned over the possibility that through the consolidation of these two systems there may be more men out of work than we have at the present time. I am also fearful that this leasing I have mentioned will result in the branch lines suffering severely through whatever efforts may be made in the name of economy. I am afraid that the Canadian National system may become completely submerged in the privately owned company before many years go by, and to such an extent that it will not be able again to operate as a separate entity. Now, the opinion that the Canadian National railway system may not be able to function as a separate entity is not my opinion alone; we have the opinion of Sir Joseph Flavelle, one of the commissioners. In reply to a question asked by Mr. Beatty he used these words:

> We are legislating for the future needs of the country, and the adoption of your suggestion would mean one system of railways in this country for all time to come, unless parliament intervened and said, "It is intolerable; we will break it up." . . . I am not altogether sure of the capacity of its executive to interpret, without the whip of competition, what the public have a right to secure in the way of service. . . .

That is the opinion of Sir Joseph Flavelle with respect to this problem, and I say with him that we do indeed need the whip of competition if the people are to get that service they are entitled to. Another thing which the government seems to have lost sight of entirely is the fact that these railways were not built exclusively for the purpose of making money, but as a public utility. Nor did the railways themselves take that view, that they were operating solely for the purpose of making money for the country.

I will direct attention to the branch line problem, and I will do so as briefly as I can. I believe that railway development and progress in the direction of branch lines was largely responsibile for the fact that for a number of years our railway operation was so successful, as pointed out by the previous speaker. From 1923 to 1930 the branch lines unquestionably played a very important part in providing tonnage for the main lines. On that account it seems reasonable to me to conclude that the development of the country itself has been very materially assisted by the policy of the railways in building branch lines ahead of settlement. Had it not been for this, this country would not have attained the success it did, nor would it have made such strides during the years from 1923 to 1930. This being true, and in view of the fact that the railways themselves did not take the view that they were operating entirely for the purpose of making money, but also had regard for the welfare of the people of Canada in the extension of branch lines, I wonder why it is that the supporters of the government in this house are to-day criticizing our railways to the extent they are. Why is it that the railways are being so severely criticized, notwithstanding that practically every other utility you can mention is in just as bad a position financially as the railways?

Let me refer once more to the evidence taken before the Duff commission. In this connection I will read a few passages from the evidence of Mr. Hungerford, the acting president of the Canadian National Railways, given before the commission. He was pointing out the conditions of these railways when they became a separate entity under the management of Sir Henry Thornton, and he made this statement:

> The situation which confronted the new management of the consolidated properties was an extremely difficult one and it had a great multitude of problems to solve. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern were not entirely completed nor equipped for operation and the earlier constructed lines of the latter company were in a very poor physical condition; while the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial were badly run down as a result of war pressure and financial limitations. All of these groups were very short of rolling stock and what was owned was generally in a poor condition of repair.
> On practically all of the lines, the condition with respect to ties, rails, ballast, bridges, buildings, and other features of like character was most unsatisfactory; terminal facilities required enlargement and rearrangement to permit of satisfactory and economical operation; the coordination of the various groups so as to operate as a single system involved the construction of numerous connecting lines and rearrangement of facilities. Altogether, the physical condition was such as to preclude giving even reasonably satisfactory service.

Beyond all this, the management was faced with the following combination of conditions,—

(a) Property bankrupt by a very wide margin, i.e., capitalized far beyond its earning power.

(b) Lowest average traffic density of any large system in North America.

(c) Very low freight rates as compared with other countries.

(d) Necessity of spending large amounts of money to keep certain lines in condition to operate at all.

(e) The necessity of spending large amounts to place the property in reasonable and economically working condition.

(f) The insistent demand of the public for the construction of branch lines, grade separations, stations and hotels, and for a higher standard of service generally.

That was the condition of the railways at the time the system became a separate entity under the management of Sir Henry Thornton. From these statements, and in view of the facts which everyone in this house knows, it seems to me that it should hardly be necessary for anyone in this chamber to feel compelled, or to think it necessary, to uphold the management of the system, when we consider the progress that has been made since the time Mr. Hungerford spoke of.

In the part of the country from which I come, as, I believe, throughout Canada in 1920 or thereabouts, the Canadian National railway system was nothing short of a joke. But when the Liberal party came into power at the beginning of 1922 our leader made one promise to the people, namely, that he would give the nationally owned system a fair trial. He did this, with the result that for eight years, from that time until 1930, it was looked upon as one of our greatest assets. Let me read the opinion of the Hon. Joseph J. Eastman, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in an address he delivered on November 6 last. He said:

....Those who point to the deficits which that railroad (Canadian National Railways) is now incurring forget the fact that it is an aggregation of lines, many of them built in advance of the development of the country, which experience has proved could not be successfully operated by private enterprise. They forget the extraordinary improvements in service and earnings under a public management headed by a man, Sir Henry Thornton, conceded to be in the front rank of railroad operators, who, by the way, is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania and got his early railroad training on the Pennsylvania Railroad system. They forget, also, the general depression in railroad earnings at the present time.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

That, then, is the opinion of a railway man in the United States with regard to Sir Henry Thornton. But, more than that, even the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), as mentioned by the previous speaker, in this house in 1928 made a speech in which he referred in very glowing terms to the management of the Canadian National Railways. On that occasion he said that there was no reason to criticize the system.

I will now put on Hansard a table dealing with the Canadian National Railways, including the eastern lines and excluding the Central Vermont Railway. These figures give the gross revenue, operating expenses, net revenue and operating ratio from 1919 to 1932 inclusive. I will begin with the year 1920, but I will not give every year. In 1920 the gross revenue was $236,709,116, and operating expenses, $271,241,000, or a net deficit of $34,532,000. The net revenues for the following years are as follows:

1922	3,620,426†
1923	21,123,544†
1924	17,974,621†
1925	33,121,450†
1926	47,420,960†
1927	41,573,851†
1928	54,859,573†
1929	41,864,700†
1930	20,884,654†
1931	400,298†
1932	5,367,869†

* Deficit. † Surplus.

These figures show that between 1920 and 1928 there was a change from a deficit of almost $35,000,000 to a surplus of almost $55,000,000, a total change of nearly $90,000,000. Since we consider that we have a very serious railway problem upon our hands, the question might be asked: What is the matter with our railways to-day? Is it not just the fact that there is not sufficient shipping and that the people have not the money with which to buy railway tickets? At the same time some hon. members think that there was too much extravagance. I have no doubt that there was but this was not true only of the Canadian National system. As was shown by the evidence given before the Duff commission, the extravagance of the Canadian Pacific almost paralleled that of the Canadian National and in their hotel system I believe they spent even more. As was stated in the evidence I have quoted, we must remember that the Canadian National practically had to rebuild its system. In 1923 the Canadian Pacific was a going concern while the Canadian National was only a dilapidated system. One of the opening paragraphs of the report of the Duff commission states that large capital expenditures for the improvement of the physical condition of the national lines is one of the cardinal causes of the several disabilities of the Canadian National Railways. I wonder what those disabilities would have been had the road been left as it was in 1920, 1921 or 1922, when we were showing such large deficits? What would the present condition have been without the expenditure of large sums of money? Would we have been satisfied to have the road continue to show a deficit of $35,000,000 on operating costs from year to year?

I should like to refer to a unique situation which exists not only in my constituency but in the constituency to the north and extending into Manitoba. We have two lines of railway, the main line of the Canadian National and a branch line of the Canadian Pacific paralleling each other for approximately ninety miles. At no point in that ninety miles are the railroads more than six miles apart. I notice that President Murray said something to the effect that the fear of tyranny is deeply ingrained in our people, and while he thought that this board might protect he questioned that it would be able to protect sufficiently. That is what I am concerned about in connection with this bill. Is this tribunal, which is to be set up, practically under the control of one man, going to give justice to the people living on the branch lines? Instead of the government divesting itself of power in connection with the railways, I believe that it should take more. To the man living upon a branch line, that line is the most important line in the whole country. He has a right to that opinion because it is the only line he is able to use under present conditions. I am afraid that with the curtailment of expenditures mentioned in this bill the people living upon these branch lines will not get a fair deal. I am wondering whether or not the curtailment suggested will not make their railways of little or no use to them.

I remember reading in the Duff report something in connection with compensation being made under certain conditions. I say to the Minister of Railways that if there is any compensation to be given, it should be given to these people who have settled along some of these branch lines and now find that they have little or no train service. Some of them have already suffered from a very poor train service and if anyone is entitled to compensation, surely they are. Some of the business men in the little villages situated upon these branch lines find that their business has practically gone because their town has gone back due to the lack of railway service. What we want is not less but more government responsibility in the management of our railways. If the people in my constituency feel that they are not getting a fair deal, they look to me as their representative to do something. I want to be able to go to the government and say: These people are not getting a square deal. I do not want to have to depend upon some individual, probably in the city of Montreal, who will head this proposed tribunal and who knows nothing about local conditions.

I should like to refer to the speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on March 9. He is reported on page 2855 of Hansard as follows:

> I wonder how intelligent men ever thought that it was possible to create three transcontinental systems of railways in Canada. Take the history of world transportation, take just the bald outlines of it, and ask yourselves how Canadians could ever have thought it possible to create a Grand Trunk Pacific transcontinental system, a Canadian Northern transcontinental system and a Canadian Pacific transcontinental system. It is beyond me. The other day I had brought to my attention a Life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier written by a great friend of his, Senator David. In the 1905 edition, the first edition, the author opens one paragraph with the assertion that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not only a great orator but that he had clairvoyance inasmuch as he saw the future of the country when he brought forward the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Later editions of the book leave that out.

He continues:

> One does not wish to have faith in one's country to the extent of being foolish, and anyone knows that the mere suggestion that eight million or fifteen million people could sustain three transcontinental railway systems, over the territory these railways crossed, is absurd.

If I remember correctly, it is now some thirty years since Sir Wilfrid Laurier promoted the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. I wonder if the Prime Minister had sufficient foresight at that time to know just to what extent the motor truck and the automobile would participate in the transportation facilities of our country. If he did, I do not think anybody else did. The other day we heard the present Prime Minister attempting to ridicule Sir Wilfrid Laurier because he thought there was room for another transcontinental system. Now, when we have three transcontinental systems and they are all starving for business, the Prime Minister thinks it is a good thing for him to build the trans-Canada highway and to enter into a tentative agreement for the completion of the St. Lawrence waterway. These two will do far more to take business away from our railways than would an additional transcontinental system. Nevertheless the Prime Minister at least pretends that he is in favour of both the trans-Canada highway and the St. Lawrence waterway.

I contend that the legislation now before the house is not necessary in any sense of the word. In the first place it will not solve the problem, and as a matter of fact I have not heard an hon. member opposite, supporting the government, claim that it will do so. I believe the government at this time should let the railways continue unmolested to do as they have been doing in connection with their co-operative measures. Let them cut down their expenditures as they have been doing. In 1932 the revenue of the Canadian National Railways was down $150,000,000 as compared with 1928, and during that period they reduced their expenditures by something like $100,000,000. If the government would change their policy so as to allow goods to move freely in and out of the country, the railways would get business, but under the present system that cannot be expected. If this legislation means the further consolidation of the two railways, as I believe it will, it will at the same time mean throwing more men out of employment and I do not believe any of us at this time wants to see that happen. Because of the facts I have mentioned I am entirely opposed to this bill and for that reason I shall have to oppose it when it comes to a vote.

On motion of Mr. Veniot the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Tuesday, March 14, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. R. C. MATTHEWS (Toronto East Centre) presented the fourth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce and moved that it be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 46, to amend the criminal code (lotteries).

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The purpose of this bill is to provide that anyone who wants to institute proceedings under subsection 3 of section 236 of the criminal code must first obtain the consent of the attorney general. This has to do with sweepstakes. Persons who have received money from sweepstakes have been sued in proceedings taken by private individuals. To obviate the trouble I think it would be advisable to provide that no proceedings under that subsection shall be taken without the consent of the attorney general.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) when we may expect legislation, which according to the press he announced in Montreal on Saturday, for the purpose of giving effect to the recommendations of the Gibb report with regard to harbour boards?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I cannot say that the report which appeared in the press was absolutely accurate. But I can state to my hon. friend that we are still studying the rough draft of the bill on the national harbours of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The announcement was premature!

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not say it was premature, but I was reported as saying a bill would be introduced this week. That statement was not accurate.

CANADIAN CAR AND FOUNDRY COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): On February 16 last I had a question on the order paper asking the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) if the Canadian Car and Foundry Company applied to the government or the minister to secure a contract for the construction of two thousand freight cars to help unemployment, and whether consideration was given to the Canadian Car and Foundry Company. The minister said that such application was made and consideration was being given. May I ask if he has arrived at some decision?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The matter is still under consideration.

SOREL, QUE., WHARF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu): In view of an item I read this morning in the Montreal Gazette, repeating statements made on many occasions by persons connected with the harbour commission of Montreal regarding the port of Sorel, may I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) if it is true that the government spent $2,000,000 for building the wharf on which the present privately owned elevator is erected at Sorel, and if in fact that wharf was not in existence many years before the elevator was built?

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): As the hon. gentleman gave me no notice of this question I am not prepared to give the answer. I have not the information with me. I suggest it stand as a notice of motion.

Mr. CARDIN: Quite satisfactory.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Monday, March 13, consideration of the motion of Hon. R. J. Manion for the second reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue the debate on the motion for the second reading of the measure now before the house let me say that I do not intend to deal very extensively with the bill as it now appears. While I intend to express my opinion later on with regard to certain phases of the measure I wish to confine myself now to certain omissions on the part of the Duff commission and to a certain lack of consideration on the part of those responsible for the preparation of this bill. Before doing so, however, in common with other hon. members who have spoken so eloquently I wish to compliment the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) on the very fair manner in which he presented this bill to the house. His speech was on a very high plane; he appealed to the house to lay aside partisanship, saying that the situation was so serious that every hon. member in this house should give this bill his very best consideration. The hon. gentleman zealously avoided anything that savoured of politics or partisanship, and his appeal was immediately answered by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) whose remarks also were on a high level. The right hon. gentleman offered certain criticisms, but he expressed the hope that they would be received in good part, with the knowledge that he was endeavouring to better the measure and make it more operative.

I am glad to be able to pay this compliment to the Minister of Railways and Canals, but I very much regret that I cannot say the same thing with regard to his leader, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett), who undertook to give this house a history of railway construction in this country. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister refer to the terms under which the Intercolonial railway was built, because later on in my remarks I desire to direct the attention of the house to this question. The Prime Minister brought his history of railway construction down to 1914, and directed especial attention to the construction of the railways through western Canada, but when the right hon. gentleman came to 1914 he stopped like grandfather's clock, never to go again. He contented himself with the introduction of the political element into the discussion at that point. The right hon. gentleman said that the Liberal government had subsidized the construction of the Canadian Northern from a point in Ontario to Winnipeg and that, he said, was the beginning of our troubles. Is it possible that the hectic times through which the Prime Minister and his government are passing have shortened his memory? Why did he not give the full history of railroad construction in this country instead of stopping at 1914? Has my right hon. friend forgotten those days we witnessed in parliament in 1914 when he, as a supporter of the Conservative government of that day, derided and berated an hon. gentleman now sitting in another chamber because he introduced a measure that had for its object the construction of the Canadian Northern from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast? Has the Prime Minister forgotten that during that debate he used every condemnatory adjective in the English language? Has he forgotten that he pointed out that the measure meant the creation of a corruption fund; that it would bring about the corruption of the electorate of the Dominion of Canada? Has he forgotten what he called the disgraceful lobbying carried on by Mackenzie and Mann in the corridors of this parliament in order to corrupt the members of the House of Commons? But that measure went through, Mr. Speaker, and that was the beginning of all our troubles; it provided for the establishment of the third transcontinental railway in Canada, and from that day to this we have had troubles galore.

The Prime Minister must have had an object in view. I do not wish to impute motives, Mr. Speaker, because that is against the rules of the house, but one cannot help but suspect that the reason the Prime Minister did not give the full history of railway construction in Canada was that if he did so he would not be able to lay the blame on the Liberal party for the transportation problem facing this country to-day. The introduction of that element of politics into the discussion by the Prime Minister has thrown a shadow over this house. The right hon. gentleman should have known that we of the opposition would not allow him to throw into our faces any blame which did not belong to us. As a result of his speech we on this side of the house have been driven to recrimination; we have been forced to define our position, and as a result the debate has not remained on the high level on which it began. I hope that as the debate continues we will get back to the point of view we had in the beginning. Of all men in this country the Prime Minister should have set the example; he should have taken a leaf from the book of his Minister of Railways, but perhaps the Minister of Railways did not consult the Prime Minister and did not make known to him the position he would assume during this debate. But knowing the Prime Minister as we do on this side of the house; knowing that he always glories when he is in a position to attack, knowing that he always feels justified in using recrimination, sarcasm and invective when he is dealing with the arguments of his political opponents, we are not at all surprised that he reached such a level in the debate.

Now, having treated that part of the Prime Minister's speech, I shall refer as briefly as possible to what I consider an omission on the part of the Duff commission in dealing with the railway situation in Canada so far as it relates to the human element. And when I say human element, I am not thinking of the men who were discharged in the past, or of those who are going to be laid off in the future in the interest of economy. We are to-day faced with a situation so serious in connection with our railways that economies have become absolutely necessary. Some sacrifices will have to be made. No doubt our railway employees will find it hard when they are retired and have no longer any work on the railways but must seek employment elsewhere, perhaps at work to which they have not been accustomed. But be that as it may, be the sacrifice as great as it may, sacrifices all round have to be made and no doubt in the long run these men will understand that they too, forming an integral part of the dominion, will have to bear their fair share of the burden.

But there is another point of view from the human side of the case, and I wish now to refer to what is known as the provident or insurance fund. I speak now with reference to the Canadian National railway system. I see nothing in either this bill or the report of the commission that would in any way protect the men who have been laid off in the past or those who will necessarily be laid off in the future. Under the system now in vogue the railway employee contributing to the provident fund must put in fifteen years of service continuously, and any time he loses in that period is deducted from his fifteen years. He must serve fifteen years before he can claim any of the privileges under the fund, unless through sickness or accident, and on the proper certificate of a doctor. Men who have been fourteen years in the service are being laid off, and dismissal is in accordance with the principle of seniority; the lesser the number of years a man has in the service the sooner he is liable to be laid off under the regulations adopted by the railways and by the labour unions associated with them. If under this system a man has not completed his fifteen years and is laid off through no fault of his own, it is absolutely impossible for him to draw any benefit from the provident fund or insurance. The amount he has contributed remains in the fund for the benefit of those who are fortunate enough to be kept permanently employed.

Now I want to put this proposition to the Minister of Railways and to every member of this house. Is it fair or just that men who are retired before the time at which they can claim compensation, provided they are qualified for proper retirement under the Pension Act, should be laid aside and have nothing provided for them in the way of compensation out of the very fund to which they have been contributing for perhaps fourteen years? I want the minister to look carefully into this matter, because there is uneasiness to-day among the railway employees throughout the country. They fear that because this bill does not deal with that situation, because the Duff commission which investigated the railway problem has not seen fit to consider the question or to make any recommendations in regard to it, those who may be retired before the completion of their fifteen years will lose what they have contributed. True, under the system, ordinarily speaking, if they retired before the end of the fifteen years they would not be entitled; but that would be voluntary on their part. To-day, however, they are being laid off through no fault of their own, as a result of that regime of economy which the government feels called upon to establish in the administration of the railways. Surely these men should not be allowed to suffer to such an extent that they are unable to benefit from the amounts which they themselves have contributed to the fund.

There is another point with regard to the human element, and that is the question of seniority. I would call the attention of the minister to this point. No mention is made of the situation which will result from the recommendations of the Duff report with regard to the seniority of these men. Ordinarily under the rules, a man who is laid off for a period of more than one year—I think it is one year, but it may be eighteen months; I am subject to correction in this regard—loses his seniority. In this case if he is laid off he may not be called again to resume work on the railways for two or three years, until such time as conditions improve and they require more men; and the very moment a man is called upon to resume work he loses all seniority and has to begin at the bottom of the ladder and work his way up again. That is not fair.

Mr. MANION: I may be wrong, but I think my hon. friend is misinformed in that regard. I say this merely to have the record straightened out in case he is wrong.

Mr. VENIOT: If I am misinformed on the points I have raised I shall be perfectly satisfied to be corrected, but I wish the minister would look into this matter—

Mr. MANION: I shall.

Mr. VENIOT: —before the bill passes out of the committee stage and comes up for third reading. I should like to have him call in the railway men, representatives from the different railway unions who are familiar with the operations of the fund and with the question of seniority, so as to satisfy himself that I am either right or wrong. If I am wrong, then I shall feel that at least I have done my duty in bringing the matter to the attention of the government, so that the responsible minister will be able when the time comes to assure parliament and the people of Canada that no injustice will be done these men.

I come now to a consideration of the Intercolonial railway, to which both the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition referred in their speeches. I am not going to tire the house with a detailed history of that enterprise. The Intercolonial railway became the bond between the maritime provinces and old Canada, known at that time as Quebec and Ontario. In 1864 New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island met in conference at Charlottetown to decide whether they should link up as a union of the maritime provinces with one government or remain as three separate colonies. When Quebec and Ontario heard of this conference they sent delegates to Charlottetown to appeal to the maritime provinces not to consummate the union. They pointed out that Ontario and Quebec must obtain transportation for their products through Canadian ports to the markets across the sea. They pointed out that the manufacturers of Ontario were at the mercy of the American railways. This did not seem to convince the maritime provinces, but Quebec and Ontario went still further. They appealed to their patriotism and to their loyalty to the British crown. They pledged themselves that if the maritime provinces would forego union they on their part would agree that the Intercolonial railway would be built from a point on the St. Lawrence to the port of Halifax, with a connecting branch line to the port of Saint John. This railway was to be built not only for the accommodation of the people in Quebec and Ontario but it was promised that the commerce going through the ports of the maritimes would bring prosperity to those provinces such as they had never had before.

At that time the maritime provinces were enjoying the height of prosperity. The American markets along the New England coast were open to them and they were the most prosperous section of British North America. However, we were willing to forego that prosperity in order to uphold the greater supremacy of the British Empire. From that day to this although at times there has been uneasiness exhibited in the maritime provinces, nowhere under the British flag will you find people more loyal to the British crown than the people of the three provinces down by the sea. No matter what our differences may have been, no matter how much uneasiness has been created in past years in the maritime provinces because of a lack of fulfilment of the promises of confederation, no matter how much unwarranted ill treatment there has been of the maritime provinces by the central provinces of Canada, there are to be found in the maritime provinces people without number who are prepared to stand by confederation and do everything they can to bring about betterment in the conditions of this country.

We have sacrificed much in the maritime provinces and about ten years ago this burden became so heavy that an agitation was commenced for better terms. That agitation resulted in the appointment of the Duncan commission, and the report of that commission was laid before parliament in 1927 or 1928. The recommendations of this report were implemented to such an extent that the uneasiness gradually began to disappear, and I think I am right in saying that to-day that uneasiness has almost totally disappeared.

If under the terms of the measure now before the house the identity of the Intercolonial railway is to be lost and the government is to have no control over it, then I say the government is doing violence to the act of confederation and to the agreement arrived at at the London conference in December, 1866. It was because of the terms arrived at at that conference that the maritime provinces consented to come into confederation. I refer those who do not know the history of the maritime provinces to section 145 of the British North America Act. What will they find there? I shall not take time to read it all, but in substance this section lays down the reasons why Nova Scotia and New Brunswick came into confederation. The promise of the construction of the Intercolonial railway to link up old Canada with the maritime provinces is definitely set out in section 145 as one of the terms under which we came into confederation.

From that date down to 1912 there was no attempt made to run the old Intercolonial as a paying institution. Even though the freight rates were low there were years of surpluses in that period. Out of twenty-five years of service there were some sixteen years of surpluses and eight or nine years of very small deficits. Those who have used the argument in the past that the Intercolonial was the sink hole of our railway system did not know what they were talking about.

Let me go one step further in this respect. This bill gives absolute power to the board of trustees to lease any section of the Canadian National road. Up to the present time the government of Canada have never lost their hold upon the Intercolonial. I know it will be said that under the present system they have, but I contend that they have not. The Canadian National system was established in 1919 and the Intercolonial was not included in the bill which amended the 1919 act and extended the area of operation of the Canadian National Railways. Why? Because it was considered as a distinct bond of confederation and so stated in the British North America Act and in the agreement arrived at at the London conference. The London conference took place in December of 1866 and from that date until 1928—those who took part in the conference were all dead in 1928—only a very few knew just what were the deliberations of that conference. It was a complete secret, kept from the maritime provinces. Why? Because the London conference was not in all respects in accord with the conference held in the city of Quebec in 1865. It was only in 1928 that a supposed copy of the original was discovered in an attic in a parliament building in the maritime provinces. It was forwarded to London for verification and when the verification came back, the government of Canada in 1928 had a print made and placed in this book in the form in which it is to-day.

Further, let me say that the Intercolonial never became a partner either in fact or in practice of the Canadian National system. Under an order in council it is true that the directors of the Canadian National Railway Company were appointed to administer the Intercolonial railway, always subject to the government as the railway board of directors were subject to the government. In that way the government never lost its hold upon the Intercolonial railway. But to-day we are transferring all our rights, placing absolute power in the board of trustees; no, not the board but only one member of that board because, if he is not satisfied with the decision of his intermittent colleagues on the board, he can veto their decisions and do as he pleases. He has the power to lease. What do we in the maritimes fear under that power? For years and years the Canadian Pacific has been looking for running rights over a part of the Intercolonial and a subsidiary of it from Saint John to Halifax. The Canadian Pacific Railway in 1929 demanded from the railway commissioners under the Railway Act that all freight originating east of Moncton and destined to points in the west touched by the Canadian Pacific, should be handed over to that railway at Saint John. That case was fought out with the result that while they did not succeed in having Saint John as the point of transfer, they did succeed in having Ste. Rosalie junction as the point at which the Canadian National would have to transfer its freight destined to points in the west touched by the Canadian Pacific. You talk of undue competition on the part of the Canadian National Railways as against the Canadian Pacific. What could you call that attempt to grasp from the government railway freight that originated in its own district and at points distant hundreds of miles from the Canadian Pacific? What I fear and what many more people in the maritime provinces fear—and I think we are justified in having that fear—is that this board of trustees, having the power to lease, may be induced to lease that part of the Intercolonial from Saint John to Halifax. Then what will happen? All freight originating east of Moncton including Prince Edward Island, will be carried over the lines leased to the Canadian Pacific via Saint John and on to the west, and that part of the Intercolonial railway, the location of which was made at the demand of the home government for strategic purposes, will be nothing but a branch line from Moncton to a point known as Levis on the river St. Lawrence and perhaps further on to Ste. Rosalie junction. What will become of the pledge of confederation under which the maritime provinces entered the union? What will become of the interests of the maritime provinces? If such a change arises—and I say it can arise and there is nothing under this measure to prevent it—not only will it make of the northern section from Moncton to Levis or Ste. Rosalie junction a branch line, but it will close out every bit of the work at Moncton, a city that has become one of the finest in the Dominion of Canada, a city that has prospered and been the centre of railway repairs, construction of locomotives and so on for the last thirty or forty years. The doors of that place will be closed and hundreds upon hundreds, yes, thousands of men will be thrown out of employment because, since we shall have to look after only the northern section of the old Intercolonial, it will not be necessary to keep those machine shops going any longer.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. VENIOT: Would it be possible for the house to alow me five minutes more? I wish to submit a proposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish at this point to make a suggestion to the minister and I feel I need not plead with members from the maritimes on both sides of the house. I know they understand the situation and they will use whatever influence they have to induce the government not to allow this matter to proceed as I have shown it may. I am going to suggest to the minister the following:

Notwithstanding anything in this act contained the board of trustees shall not lease, or formulate any policy affecting the Intercolonial railway, without first submitting same to the consideration and approval of the governor general in council.

That is a rough draft, but it may be put in better shape. In order to allay the uneasiness which prevails in the maritime provinces I would ask the government to consider this proposition seriously and see if it is not possible for them, when the bill is in committee, to introduce an amendment to this effect.

I have just one or two other remarks to make and I hope the house will grant me the indulgence of listening to me although I hate to go beyond the limit of time. I have already referred to the board of trustees and their powers. I cannot support that clause in the bill; in fact, on that account I may be driven to vote against the measure on its second reading; but if I am driven to do so, nevertheless I wish it to be understood that I agree with the object of the bill in attempting to bring about such economies as will once more place the Canadian National Railways on a proper basis.

In connection with the arbitral tribunal I am irrevocably and unalterably opposed to any coercion. Coercion is not a democratic principle; it should find no place in any legislation of this house. The railways have in the last two years by voluntary cooperation saved millions of dollars. The minister has told us that the Intercolonial alone has saved us, I think, $44,000,000 in the last year or so.

Mr. MANION: That is not quite correct. It was a policy of economy amounting to $44,000,000 for the whole system.

Mr. VENIOT: For the whole system; that is what I mean.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry. I thought the hon. gentleman said the Intercolonial.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I meant $44,000,000 for the whole system, and I am glad that the minister gave me the opportunity of making that plain. How much has the Canadian Pacific Railway saved in operating expenses? That is not yet known to the public, but it is reasonable, Mr. Speaker, to suppose that the Canadian Pacific has made a corresponding saving, and if that is the case, why should we be so pessimistic? Our Canadian National Railways in one year, together with the Canadian Pacific, made a saving of from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 at a time when depression was rife throughout the whole world. The Canadian National also had to its credit in 1932 a surplus of $10,000,000. So I cannot see why we should be so pessimistic about the railway situation. The Prime Minister, however, in his speech was very pessimistic, and right on top of preaching the pessimism he did he suggested that it might be necessary in the near future to have a plebiscite on amalgamation. I hope that the Prime Minister's pessimism when he denounced the railway situation was not preparatory to placing the principle of amalgamation before the people of Canada.

Mr. E. C. ST-PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the crisis through which we are passing embraces among other economic and social disturbances which it has brought about one known as the Canadian railway dilemma. Popular clamour, protests from various important corporations and demands of boards of trade induced the government about a year ago to refer this so important question of the national railways to a royal commission. I regret that such a question should have been submitted to a commission of men who are not responsible to the government of this country, instead of being referred to a special select committee of the house.

Within the last few years it seems to be a foregone conclusion that such commissions have always a set political purpose in that they relieve the government of responsibilities incumbent on them and afford an opportunity to party politicians to burden such a commission—appointed to study or administer certain public services—with the sins of omission or commission chargeable to the government when the reckoning day arrives.

The royal commission undertook the study of a difficult problem and among the causes of our railway embarrassment it quotes the following:

> The over-development of railways beyond the immediate needs of the country.

There is no need of making a deep study of the history of Canadian railways to discover that this over-development of railways, beyond the immediate needs of the country, was never prompted by our present requirements, let us, however, recognize the fact here in the house where we have to assume responsibilities, let us wisely admit it, this over-development must be attributed to the fact that certain large companies or corporations, with no intention of helping the country while operating the railways, took up this work because of the profits they would derive or for purely financial ends; it is now incumbent on us, we from the various provinces, to foot the bill for the most pernicious of all these large undertakings.

We were told that the Canadian government of that period assumed a great burden. In order that the house may be well informed, let us remember that Quebec represented at the time—I am not playing politics—by Sir Lomer Gouin's government, had refused to endorse the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway and that to-day that province of which I am a representative, is called upon, as all other provinces are, to foot the bill of our national railways. We are in Quebec at times too reticent in expressing our views on practical matters. Notwithstanding the fact that it had refused to participate in this huge expenditure and that it is forced to-day to contribute like others to the national deficit, Quebec was always the worse treated when it was a question of railway favours. Help was long in forthcoming.

The report further states:

> Aggressive and uncontrolled competition between two nation-wide railway enterprises, a competitor the more disastrous in that one of the competitors was publicly-owned and supported by the full resources of the dominion.

I wonder whether by emphasizing the words "supported by the full resources of the Dominion," it would be possible to have this parliament adopt a bill which to my mind, would be equivalent to a merger in the near future of our Canadian railways. This uncontrolled competition between all railway companies became so evident on the other side of the line among the two hundred railways which span the country in all directions, that the United States railways themselves applied for permission from the Inter-State Commerce Commission not to merge but to be consolidated into four main railway systems which are not at present a burden to the country like ours are, but which nevertheless are a burden to the bondholders of these railway companies.

The Esch-Cummings Act allowed these railways to consolidate, however, what is most strange, is that the only trouble which arose came from Mr. Loree, president of the Delaware and Hudson Railway Company, and a member of the royal commission which the government appointed to study the problems of our railway systems. Further the report states:

> The reactions of the world trade repression which began in 1929 and has progressively increased in its severity with each succeeding year.

The commission wished to convey thereby that the international system of cooperation that we have always advocated, we the Liberal party in the house is, properly speaking, the only means of solving the present problem.

Again further the report states:

Competitions from other forms of transport, notably road transport.

Those who have studied the competition being waged between transportation companies will be very glad to learn what General Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Central had to say on this subject, on December 18, 1932. I shall read the English text so that my compatriots who are all versed in that language, will dispense with me translating it and also that my English speaking colleagues be immediately apprised of the views of General Atterbury who, as we are all aware, carries much weight.

"I believe," he said. "that the motor bus can and should be coordinated with the railroad to the mutual advantage of both and wth benefit to the public.

"Operated in a service supplementary to that of the railroad, it has a real place in the transportation of the future. It will replace unremunerative local trains, serve as a feeder of the railroads and speed up through service by making possible the elimination of numerous stops by long distance trains. Our company has already begun to put this into actual practice by taking a financial interest in bus lines and coordinating their service with our train schedules. We have found these bus lines to be paying investments.

"We are doing the same thing in trucking. Motor transportation is best adapted for short hauls, railroad transportation for long hauls. We are using trucks in place of local freight trains and already freight is being moved direct from shipper to receiver without rehandling, through the use of detachable truck bodies hauled by motor to the railroad at the point of origin and again by motor from the railroad at the point of destination.

"We can carry the loaded truck body from city to city by rail for much less than it costs the trucker to move it over the highway. If the railroads act intelligently they will give to the motor industry their terminal deliveries and the motor industry in turn will find it the part of intelligence to give to the railroads the long hauls."

As one may note, this problem of road transport competition can be solved.

Inelasticity of freight rates and railway practice generally which prevents prompt action in the meeting of falling revenues and dealing effectively with competition from other forms of transport.

As we are all aware, sir, the question of freight rates is under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission of Canada. Did the commission which held the inquiry, in pointing out this new cause of the present railway embarrassment, wish to convey to us that we should amend the Railway Commission Act?

The sixth cause mentioned in the royal commission's report reads as follows:

Contractural arrangements with labour organizations which set up a rigid wage scale and inflexible labour practices generally.

Residing in a county where a large part of the population depend for a livelihood on our railways, may I especially refer to this question. Railway employees were in the past looked upon as the aristocrats of the working classes, however, I wish to state that, within the last few years, they do not deserve this cognomen. During the present crisis, their wages were reduced and the number of those who were suspended is very considerable. First, allow me to quote from United States railway statistics. In 1926, there were in the United States 1,801,180 railway men drawing in wages $2,990,441,936, namely, an average yearly salary for each, of $1,656. In 1929, the number of employees was reduced to 1,686,789 and their total wages amounted to $2,941,000,000. In 1931, the number of employees was reduced to 1,285,000 and wages to $2,150,000,000.

At the recent Chicago conference, where American and Canadian delegates were present, another cut in wages amounting to $210,000,000 was agreed upon. With reference to Canadian railway men may I quote from statistical records which I have just received this morning from the Bureau of Statistics: the largest number of employees registered, in June, 1929, was 201,056, and the number of those at present working on our railways decreased by 90,127 in 1932.

We can therefore state that the situation of railway employees is at present more than critical.

Are we going by a systematic reduction of expenditures to throw out of employment a larger number of men whose wages contribute to the city's welfare in the various sections of Montreal as well as in other cities of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Are we going to destroy, through an exaggerated and systematic reduction of expenditures in various services in order to solve this abnormal problem, the purchasing power of our workmen?

The railway men have addressed to parliament and to each member of the house a memorandum requesting an equitable representation in all services of the Canadian National Railways and in all arbitration tribunals should this bill be enacted, a just and equitable representation of their various organizations. I approve, without restriction, of this memorandum.

I approve of it because it is couched in moderate terms and contains, in my humble opinion, fair distributive measures. One may object, that those suffering hardships in other industries are not given the same advantage to address to parliament requests which they consider just and reasonable. That is, sir, a deplorable fact. In principle, I am a unionist.

If our people insisted on having measures of distributive justice, such as various workers' organizations worthy of that name, have, heretofore, put into practice, to-day, there would be less unemployed depending on the dole.

I cannot, sir, accept or vote in favour of the bill under consideration. Part I is equivalent to the curtailment of certain constitutional rights; it also includes the privilege—more than a privilege—namely, the exclusive right of trustees not to submit to the house their budget. Our constitutional rights will only be recognized, according to this section of the bill, the day when this triumvirate acting as dictators will request parliament to foot the bill of the deficits which may result from their ignorance or poor railway management.

Part II of the bill contains the principle of co-opertion. It adds but little to the rights of the working classes. Very little consideration is given to the recommendations of labour unions and mention is hardly made of them, as we may judge by the following:

> The national company, for and on behalf of itself and/or any or all other of the companies and other elements of which National railways as defined by this act is composed, and the Pacific company, for and on behalf of itself and/or any or all other of the companies and other elements, of which Pacific railways as defined by this act is composed, are, for the purposes of effecting economies and providing for more remunerative operation, directed to attempt forthwith to agree and continuously to endeavour to agree, and they respectively are, for and on behalf as aforesaid, authorized to agree, upon such cooperative measures, plans and arrangements as are fair and reasonable and best adapted (with due regard to equitable distribution of burden and advantage as between them) to effect such purposes. They are further directed that whenever they shall so agree they shall endeavour to provide, as part of such measure, plan or arrangement or otherwise, for a fair and reasonable apportionment as between the employees of National railways and Pacific railways, respectively, of such employment as may be incident to the operation of such measure, plan or arrangement.

[Mr. St-Pere.]

I think, sir, that instead of inserting in that section the words "to strive to include" the words "shall include" should have been inserted, so as to afford our railwaymen a further guarantee that their rights of seniority would be recognized. It is useless to further emphasize this point. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) who just preceded me in this debate has fully vindicated that right.

Part III of the bill, sir, constitutes a real danger for the constituency which I represent. As this riding includes railway headquarters and terminal stations were we to adhere to the decisions of this arbitral tribunal, our workers whose rights are in no way protected, would have no voice in the decisions arrived at with reference to the management of this department of the Canadian railways. Property owners who have built houses in the neighbourhood of terminal stations and who depend largely on the wages of railwaymen to meet the payments of mortgages and municipal taxes would find themselves, under the circumstances, unable to put in claims with the Railway Commission; at present, this is the only safeguard that their rights will be protected. This phase of the situation affects not only property owners located in this part of my riding but also merchants who depend on the purchasing powers of these workmen.

This clause in connection with enforced co-operation would give our railway companies a right to the granting of which I have always been opposed in the house: namely, the use in common of the Rouen St. elevated line, as this would greatly depreciate the value of real estate in the Prefontaine ward.

When the people of Hochelaga elected me as their representative in this house, in 1921, my mandate was to use my own discretion in approving or disapproving of measures submitted to the house; however, one thing that I have not lost sight of, was that they gave me besides definite instructions to protect their private interests, when these were assailed in the house.

I shall close my remarks, sir, by this sound argument. This government can, without this act, reduce the expenditures of the National Railways by decreasing the number of directors. I have never had much confidence in the efficiency which the number of directors brought to the management of the Canadian National, ever since 1922; however, I request that the number of directors be more than three, and that the large Canadian labour organizations be represented.

I have no intention of suggesting any particular person to represent these labour organizations on the board of directors. I leave it to the discretion and wise co-operation of those who are at the head of these movements to choose their representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the second reading of this bill because I find in it no suggestion which can be formulated into a workable measure. I shall not support the measure because, as I mentioned a moment ago, the enactment of a number of its clauses would signify, for the constituency I represent and the section where I reside, a complete financial and economic disorganization.

We are sent to this parliament to legislate wisely, with a free mind. I should like to see this parliament adopt a measure allowing our railways to compete with one another, not an exaggerated but a reasonable competition. Where are we to find this superman, this Chairman of the Board of Trustees which would apply, to the management of our national railways, this practical system which would relieve the present situation? The Atterburys, Harrimans, James J. Hills, Scullys, Van Severingens and others of such administrative ability are scarce in Canada. Why not leave the management to those who are, at present, at the head of our railways, to those officials of the Canadian Pacific who have been chosen by the board of directors, to those men of experience of the National Railway who, having started at the bottom of the ladder, have, to-day, climbed to the highest posts in our railways. The Grant Halls, Hungerfords, etc., notwithstanding what may he said to the contrary, have more experience, more practical knowledge of railway matters than those supposed experts that the government might appoint to manage the national railways. Are we going to brand as incompetent those who have grown up in this railway atmosphere, and have become, to-day, presidents or vice-presidents, after having started as call boys, yard foremen, etc.? Let us discuss railways! Let us not give ourselves up to absurd notions, absolutely devoid of practical sense. Our railways must be managed by railway men. It does not behoove a lawyer, a doctor etc., without experience, even a great politician to substitute himself to those whom experience has formed and trained, who can solve the particular intricate and important problem of our Canadian railways.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What about Mr. Beatty?

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): He is an excellent man.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): He is a lawyer.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): He was trained in the school of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in railway matters.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): He has not practiced law for twenty-five years.

Mr. MERCIER (St-Henri): He will railroad you.

Mr. BEAUBIEN (Translation): He is a good lawyer because he does not practice his profession.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Mr. Thornton was also a good lawyer.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): It was Disraeli, I think, who once stated that he deplored the fact that certain statesmen inserted in debates of major import not political questions, but "petty politics." The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to whom I always closely listen, a man whose knowledge I appreciate, quite recently, in the house, fought shy of this question: he endeavoured to prove that the responsibility of the present situation could be traced to the Liberal party, he insinuated that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had shown a lack of foresight. Lack of foresight, the man who, by building the transcontinental, brought prosperity to that section of Quebec, so rich in resources that the Rouyn district is surnamed the great gold producing area, whose soil encloses all the wealth of the Pre-Cambrian epoch! Lack of foresight and vision, he who opened up to settlers part of Northern Ontario where, I am pleased to state, my compatriots are highly thought of and co-operate with their English speaking fellow citizens to spread the bonne entente and prosperity!

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Let us, at least, cease to burden one man or a few with all the responsibilities that governments must, as a whole, recognize as theirs! Let us not lower the debate to such trivial considerations, but let us place this question on a higher level, and as true Canadians, let us endeavour to solve it, by having recourse to means worthy of practical men who have to face a difficult situation.

Mr. Speaker, for the reasons just mentioned, I shall vote against the second reading of this bill.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on the railway bill now before the house. I believe this is one of the most important bills that has come before this parliament, at any rate since I came here in the fall of 1930. I am glad in view of its importance that the bill has been discussed in a non-partisan way. I am, however, surprised at the attitude of some hon. members who seem to desire to dispose of it hastily. From what I have heard in the house I believe this bill means the end of public ownership of Canadian railways and the setting up of a new system in the conduct of railway affairs in Canada. If I am correct in that view then I think the house may well give ample time to the consideration of such a measure. It is not necessary for me to cover the ground already covered as to the history of the railways, the debt, and the coming into being of the present Canadian National Railways. That has been amply covered not only in this but in previous debates when railway matters were under consideration. But in connection with the debts of the railways I think it is hardly fair just to quote figures. We must not forget that the times when these railways were built were times of prosperity. They were the days of the development of our country. Surely some credit must be given for the development of this country of ours. I am frank to state, Mr. Speaker, that had the development of Canada been left to one railway, the Canadian Pacific, many districts that now are peopled would have remained undeveloped, and Canada would not have progressed to the extent she has. In passing I should also like to say that Canada, like no other country, relies almost entirely on railways and is dependent to quite a degree upon transportation. Our great wheat fields are farther from the seaboard than those of any other country. The average haul in the Argentine is 210 miles; in Australia 218 miles; in Russia 350 miles and in India, another great country, 550 miles. In Canada our wheat fields are about 900 miles from the central provinces to the east and from 600 to 700 miles from the western coast. As Mr. Hungerford has well said, we would have had no community growth in Canada without the railways. In the Canadian railways we have one of the finest and most efficient railway services in the world, and when I say the service is efficient I am not thinking particularly of the de luxe trains. I am thinking of the fast freight and passenger services that are given, and I venture to say that if it had been left to one railway, the Canadian Pacific, we would not to-day have been able to travel across the continent in some four and a half or five days; probably it would have remained at seven days. Mr. Beatty himself admitted that this efficiency was due to the competition of the Canadian National.

[Mr. St-Pere.]

With regard to competition I should like to refer also to one remark made by Mr. Hungerford which I believe should be borne in mind. Addressing the Duff commission Mr. Hungerford said that competition in railway service in Canada affected only 25 per cent of the mileage, and that the remaining 75 per cent was non-competitive. I believe that should be taken into consideration in dealing with this question. At page 953, immediately following Mr. Beatty, Lord Ashfield said that the competition of the Canadian National Railways had the effect of providing an unexcelled system of transportation for the Canadian people. It is true that the railways are not as prosperous as they should be or as we would like to see them, but what railways or what businesses are prosperous? The people themselves are not so prosperous. I think we all agree that what the railways need to-day is trade and tonnage. The lack of freight has contributed in large measure to the deficits shown by our railways, and in passing I might mention that the daily bulletin issued yesterday by the bureau of statistics states that freight traffic is about ten per cent less than it was in 1931. I do not think there is any question, Mr. Speaker, but that the lack of freight has brought about the problem with which we are now faced. I need only refer to the Duff commission, who said very plainly:

> In so far as the position of the Canadian railways is the result of the depression in world trade, they have merely shared the general fate of most industries and of railways in other countries. In the United States of America the recession in railway earnings did not appear until 1930, but by the end of 1931 the net operating income of the Class I roads had fallen from $1,395,348,471 to $662,314,465 (more than 50 per cent), which is greater than the reduction shown by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

If we had the trade of 1928 or 1929 I doubt if the present administration would have dared to introduce the measure now under discussion. Advantage is being taken at the moment, I think—and I am only giving my own views—of the opportunity to eliminate the competition of the Canadian National, not the competition of the Canadian Pacific. As Mr. Beatty said in outlining his proposals, the only alternative to those proposals was competition, but Lord Ashfield stated that if you secure advantage through cooperation you eliminate competition. There are various kinds of competition, Mr. Speaker, and I believe the competition we have had in Canada with one privately owned and one publicly owned railway has proved to be the ideal system. It prevents a private corporation from securing a full monopoly, and that applies to the state as well. The one railway in competition with the other has been said by leading railway men throughout the world to be the ideal system for a country such as Canada.

We hear a great deal with regard to competition from trucks and ships. I would like to state in passing, Mr. Speaker, that we should take more interest in the competition from ships on canals. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in developing the canals which are used by ships from all over the world, which do not pay any toll for the use of those facilities. The trucks I realize present serious competition, but at least they contribute something to the revenues of our country. If hon. members would look up the amount of freight transported on the canals they would realize that this competition is more serious to the railways than is the competition from trucks. The other night the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) quoted the figures; he stated that the tonnage carried on the canals had increased almost in proportion to the decrease on our railways. This competition, as I say, should be noted, because it is making serious inroads on much of the traffic which could be handled by our railways. In spite of the fact that the country has spent millions of dollars in the development of the canal system these ships do not pay anything for the use of these trade routes or waterways.

In passing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to voice a little criticism of the St. Lawrence waterway proposal. I do not believe this should be proceeded with at this time, because in my opinion it would only provide more competition and less trade for the railways, and further we do not require more electrical power at present than is supplied by existing services. I believe that it would be wrong to go ahead with that project at this time, and I think the government would be well advised seriously to consider this matter. When we speak of the money that has been spent not only in constructing but also in purchasing railways it would be well for hon. members to look at the money that has been spent on the canals of this country. Many of those expenditures were just as foolish and in many cases just as tragic as some of the expenditures made on railway lines.

For a few moments now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with some of the speeches made by Mr. Beatty, not only those made before the Duff commission but also those made since the bill was introduced in the Senate. I should like to draw this to the attention of the house:

First of all, however, I would say that in my opinion the present bill is based on what I would call the Beatty and the Thornton proposals; it is almost along precisely the same lines as a bill that was presented by Mr. Ruel and Sir Henry Thornton.

With reference to Mr. Beatty, I would like to discuss for a moment his attitude towards one section of the bill, namely, with regard to the tribunal. It does seem strange to me that he should travel throughout the length and breadth of the country speaking against the setting up of this arbitral tribunal, because when he appeared before the Duff commission he seemed to be, and as a matter of fact was, I believe, in favour of it. At page 955 Lord Ashfield asked Mr. Beatty whether he thought the tribunal should deal with services and rates or whether there should be two separate tribunals. Mr. Beatty replied that it was immaterial so long as the tribunal was properly constituted. Then Sir Joseph Flavelle asked him this question: If a separate board was set up, should it be named by the government, and his answer was yes. Sir Joseph Flavelle then said—and this is very important—that Mr. Beatty's suggestion would mean one system of railways in Canada for all time to come. Now the more I think of this bill, the more I hear it discussed, and the more I delve into the proceedings of the Duff commission, the more firmly convinced I am that the bill is the beginning of one railway system in Canada for all time to come. Just what Mr. Beatty's idea was in going throughout the length and breadth of the country opposing the tribunal, after discussing it and practically approving it before the Duff commission, I am not at all sure. Personally I believe that there are one or two reasons for his doing so. For one thing, I believe that the opposing of the tribunal publicly by Mr. Beatty was just so much eyewash. He knew or believed that the government was going to set up a tribunal. It had been previously discussed, and he probably thought that if he opposed this publicly the people would think that there was some good in the tribunal and so parliament would adopt it without much opposition. The other reason, I believe, was this. He probably thought that his opposition would serve as a sort of smoke screen for something else contained in the bill.

I refer to part I of the bill, which I think is the most important part of it, because it deals with the three trustees. It deals with the setting up of the board of trustees, the powers of the men who compose the board, how they are to deal with the Canadian National Railways, and so on, and that I am convinced is the most important part of the whole arrangement with regard to the handling of the Canadian National system. I believe it was Christ who said, with reference to the ten commandments about which he had been speaking:

> On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

I would say that on this part of the bill hang all the law and the prophets, but I would spell prophets "profits." Let us examine what part I provides in regard to the trustees. Subsection 2 of section 4, under Part I, provides:

> One of such trustees shall be their chairman. He shall devote his whole time to performance of the duties of his office, and shall not be an officer of any company other than a company which is comprised in national railways, and shall not during his tenure of office as trustee become a director of any company other than a company which is comprised in national railways of which he was not a director at the time of his appointment.

That is a wise proviso, that the chairman shall not be associated with any other railway than the Canadian National system. But it is different with the other two; there is nothing in the bill to ensure the appointment of one or the remaining two trustees who, if not connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway or some other railway, might be more sympathetic to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I suggest now to the government in all seriousness that there should be a provision to the effect that no trustee shall be in any way connected with the Canadian Pacific nor shall have any stock or shares in that company, because I cannot help thinking that when men have invested a considerable sum of money in stocks and bonds one must naturally say of them, what the old book says, that where their treasure is there will their heart be also.

I realize that it is difficult at this late stage of the debate to introduce any new point, or anything that has not been already covered, but I would like to deal for a few moments with some other phases of the bill, and in this connection I would point out that the bill follows quite closely the recommendations of the Duff commission report except in one particular. I was interested to hear the Minister of Railways, in reply to an hon. member who was speaking, make the statement about something in the bill, to which reference had been made, that it was in accordance with the recommendations of the commission. Well, when they were following out the recommendations of the commission I am surprised that they did not follow them all, because one of the recommendations, with regard to the powers of the arbitral tribunal, reads, at page 66:

> The powers of the arbitral tribunal shall be capable of being invoked by either railway or by the dominion or any provincial government.

I believe that in omitting this recommendation the bill leaves out one of the most important recommendations of the commission, in fact the only remaining link between the railways and the people of Canada, through either the Dominion government or the provincial governments. I cannot help thinking that if the bill passes in its present form—and that is how we must view it at the moment—the control of the railways belonging to the people of Canada will be gone forever, and public ownership in the Canadian National Railways will then be at an end.

Let us examine, however, this recommendation carefully, and frankly, I am opposed to dictatorship in any form, whether in railways or government or business or anything else; I am absolutely opposed to the principle of a dictator. When the commission deemed it wise to insert that provision which I have just read, I suggest that the government should seriously consider putting that clause into the bill, so as to leave some power to the government, either provincial or federal. If that were done, in the event of things not working out right, or in the event of any injustice being done the people, then the people could come to the government and ask that they be heard. Almost every other suggestion made by the Duff commission has been followed; read the bill through and you will see that almost in toto the conclusions set forth in the report have been followed. You will find provisions with regard to budget, annual report to parliament, audit, cooperation between the railways, constitution of the arbitral tribunal, and so forth. Every one of them is embodied in the bill, but when you come to the suggestion that the powers of the arbitral tribunal should be capable of being invoked by either railway or by the dominion or any provincial government, you find this highly important recommendation omitted, leaving entirely to the railways the sole right of appeal.

Is there any reason at all why the people of this country should be debarred from being heard? If the bill passes in its present form there will be no use in their coming to parliament because parliament will be dissociated from railway matters entirely. In fact, I do not believe that we shall need a Minister of Railways after this bill goes through; his duties will be very much lighter than they are at the present time at any rate. His activities would be much less than they are at the present time because the three trustees would handle the operation of the entire Canadian National railway system.

How will this political tribunal work out in practice? What will happen when both railways agree to abandon, say one hundred miles of main line or other track? In case of agreement the arbitral tribunal will not of course be consulted, the abandonment will simply be put into effect. If one railway suggests to the other that a certain line of track should be cut off and the other railway does not agree, then it will come before the tribunal where it will be left to one man to decide. What of the people affected? What of the towns which will have to be abandoned? They will have no right to come to parliament and be heard if this bill passes in its present form. The most important clause of all, and the one which would enable them to be heard, has been left out, the only clause which would have provided a link or connection between the people and this parliament. I maintain that such an omission is very serious. I might state that Mr. Beatty proposed that five thousand miles of track could be abandoned while Mr. Loree thought that ten thousand miles could be abandoned.

Are hon. members fully aware that Mr. Beatty stated that an agreement had been arrived at between the officers of both companies to the effect that 1,582 miles of line should be abandoned? If hon. members will read the report they will see that such an agreement was arrived at. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways have both stated that this bill does not mean amalgamation, but if an agreement to abandon 1,582 miles of line has been arrived at, and carried into effect what else can it mean? Surely the government is not going to set up a dictatorship especially in the face of the statement by Mr. Beatty that it has been agreed to abandon 1,582 miles of line.

We have been told that we should treat this bill from a national and not from a sectional point of view. But when I see by the report that certain mileage in British Columbia is to be abandoned, and that the Port Mann shops near New Westminster need not be used and that the elevator which I discussed the other night is also going to be sidetracked, and that the city of New Westminster will also be isolated, can I be blamed for rising and protesting against this bill? After all, can we entirely dissociate sectionalism from our debate? Are we not elected on sectionalism? I believe that I was elected primarily to represent the people in the constituency of New Westminster and so must look after their interests; therefore I am taking strong exception to the bill.

For the remaining few moments I should like to deal with what may be expected to take place in British Columbia should this bill pass in its present form. In case the Minister of Railways takes exception I may assure him I cannot speak for the whole of British Columbia, but I shall speak only for my own constituency. If the recommendations of the report are carried out, my section of the country will be affected. I should like first of all to go back into the railway history of British Columbia. Before entering confederation, British Columbia was promised a railway, but it was necessary for that province to send a man to London to interview Queen Victoria before the then Dominion government would come through. The Canadian Pacific was then induced to construct a line through to British Columbia. Although a very excellent route had been chosen by the government they decided to take a shorter but more difficult route through to the coast. They constructed their line through Kicking Horse pass instead of through Yellowhead pass which is some 1,600 feet lower. After completion the Canadian Pacific adopted a very high attitude in connection with freight rates and so in 1910, the people of British Columbia having raised such an agitation against the Canadian Pacific Railway, the government of that day—I believe Sir Richard McBride was premier—decided that it would be wise to have another railroad in competition with and to hold down the Canadian Pacific, and so the Canadian Northern was constructed. Certain guarantees were given by the province which, as the Prime Minister has said, were taken over by the dominion but I believe that we lost considerably by the Dominion government taking over these guarantees. The government of British Columbia intended to use this railroad as a lever against the Canadian Pacific and as a competitor and so they enacted legislation that they the province were to have full control over the regulation of freight rates. When the railway was completed it was taken over by the Dominion government, and the provincial government lost that control and had no further powers or rights to regulate rates. Freight rates were then put under the Board of Railway Commissioners and so we were still under the domination of the Canadian Pacific. That company always argued against a reduction in freight rates and although British Columbia has protested since that time that company's rates has always been used as the yardstick in the discussion of freight rates, about which British Columbia has spent many thousands of dollars.

The Canadian Northern was built over one of the best grades in the Dominion of Canada. It runs over a low water level grade of some four-tenths of one per cent as against the grade of the Canadian Pacific which is as high as two and a half per cent in many places. In hauling wheat from the prairies to Vancouver, one engine on the Canadian Northern can draw three times as many cars as a similar engine on the Canadian Pacific. The same thing applies with trains coming east from Vancouver, either with empties or loaded cars. An engine coming from Vancouver to Edmonton via the Yellowhead pass can draw three times as many cars as an engine on the Canadian Pacific from Vancouver to Calgary via the Kicking Horse pass.

It is now proposed, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Pacific obtain the use of the best grade through the mountains, and according to the proposals made all traffic from the east shall go over their line from a point seventy-nine miles out from the city of Vancouver. Similarly, all the traffic from the orient, Great Britain or any country will use the Canadian Pacific tracks and terminals and run over the Canadian Pacific line as far as Hope and then branch over to the Canadian National. In my opinion the Canadian Pacific is having the best of it all the way through; it is a case of heads I win, tails you lose. What effect will this have on the territory to be abandoned? As I have stated, the Canadian National has a terminal at Port Mann. No doubt Senator McRae will be glad to see this terminal discarded because it must still be a thorn in his flesh since he got out of the scheme from which I am told he made a considerable amount of money.

Then there are the yards and ships where between 400 and 600 men will in all probability be let out. The city of New Westminster will have no railway connection. It is true that a little branch goes from there to the main line, but perhaps this will also be lifted. Then there is the elevator which was built and has close connection with the Canadian National Railway. In the abandonment of that seventy-nine miles of track, the cities and towns in the territory all the way down will be left stranded. All wheat and grain products coming from the prairies will first of all have to go into the city of Vancouver and then out again to the Fraser valley. This will add considerable more to the cost of production on the part of dairymen and poultrymen in that district. The situation is almost too serious to contemplate. Hon. members should go down and read the report and then I think they will agree with me that the proper stand to take is to vote against this bill on its second reading. It is all very well to say: We shall vote for the principle and then we shall make changes in committee. But what is the principle of the bill? I think it is evident to the house now that it will ultimately mean amalgamation if it does not mean that now. It is true that the Prime Minister has told us that the bill does not amalgamate the railways, but in a year or two that is I believe what will occur. The Canadian Pacific will then control all the traffic going into Vancouver from seventy-five miles out and they are going to abandon tracks throughout Canada. In going through the report I notice that the Canadian Pacific were to get the best of the deal all the way through. It was the poorly paying sections of railway that the Canadian Pacific were to abandon and all the best paying portions the Canadian Pacific are proposing to be taken over and controlled by them.

I protest very seriously against this being done. I intend to vote against the second reading of the bill and I ask all hon. members to read, as I have, the statements which were made before the Duff commission. I believe those who are interested and who have sections that are going to be abandoned will act and vote against the bill the same as I intend to do.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to thank the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) for what he said the other day, as follows:

> We will welcome suggestions from any part of the house with regard to contributions as to details.

And in order to be polite I shall also thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who said:

> If constructive suggestions are offered from any corner of this house, the government will consider them on their merits, and they will be either accepted or rejected as they are considered sound or unsound.

The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) said that the government should be supported at all costs. These are his words:

These are times when I believe a government should be upheld, steadied and supported, almost at any cost.

It is a very good thing that the hon. gentleman is not Minister of Railways and I understand the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) told him that he was sorry he should speak in that way. Our motto should be: "Salus populi suprema lex." The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) said on another occasion:

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that if the legislation goes through as the bill now stands many members will come back here at the next session regretting having so voted.

As I do not intend to have any cause for regret, I shall vote against the bill.

One has indeed a high regard for most of the commissioners, but who represented the good city of Toronto and the business men of Ontario? These are the words of the Prime Minister:

Certainly Sir Joseph Flavelle will, by the common consent of all who know him, be regarded as one of the foremost business men this country has yet produced.

He was one of the commissioners. Was he the expert who told the Prime Minister that Canada has potentialities for the production of 8,500,000 hogs by 1937, and 10,000,000 by 1942? This is the question: Was he selected to look after any possibilities of trade in hogs?

Owing to the fact that every section of the bill is to be scrutinized while we are in committee, I now intend to discuss two matters which are so closely related to the railway problem that it depends upon them for its solution. First is unemployment in its relation to the railway problem. The other day the Prime Minister said:

Human interest centres in the employees of the system only if it continues to operate, for if it does not operate there is no employment, and unless a very, very great improvement is made in conditions the system as a whole cannot continue to operate.

Later, he spoke about "default certain and positive for at least some period of time." He used the language that he used when he was leader of the opposition to paint the conditions of the country; he was painting them with a black brush. The picture is a rather gloomy one. Would it not have been apropos for him to add: "We have succeeded where others have failed." On Thursday last he said also:

I feel that the magnitude of the problem that confronts this parliament is little understood or appreciated.

This is not very complimentary to the Canadian people. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), when he spoke in this debate, said:

The Minister of Railways claimed that the railway problem was the most important problem that we have to face at this particular time. I do not agree. I think that the greatest problem in this dominion that we have got to face at this time is the unemployment problem that is now before parliament.

An hon. member interjected:

Both problems are connected.

Mr. Heaps: I am quite ready to admit that there is a connection between the two.

What has been done with regard to unemployment relief? On September 16, 1930, the Prime Minister said:

Our tariff measure is not a general revision of the tariff, but deals only with such items in the tariff as it is believed will ensure additional employment to a large number of men and women in Canada . . . . . We have very definite assurances from the producers in this country that as a result of the action we are taking they will increase the number of men and women in their mills and factories.

Such was the expectation in 1930. At that time the total number of unemployed was 107,000. To-day the total number of men, women and children on direct relief is 1,357,562. Such is the failure in 1933. An hon. member said on February 24:

Does that include all unemployed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All such questions can be properly asked in committee.

With regard to unemployment may I quote what was said by the ex-Minister of Labour as reported on page 2823 of Hansard of March 8:

I have also in mind the fact that several towns along one of those lines are railroad terminals, with populations consisting chiefly of railroad employees. We built and developed our railroads, as I say, by authority of the parliament of Canada. Young men left the farms and other occupations and entered the railroad service; they were sent out to these isolated places in order to serve the people of Canada. They got married, built their little homes, their churches, schools and community halls, and now with one stroke of the pen it is intended, as I regard it, to throw these people with their wives and children and dependents into the discard.

Mr. Manion: May I offer a suggestion to my hon. friend, with all respect? He is making a lot of positive statements about what is going to happen under the bill, regarding which no one knows the outcome in the end at all.

Note that, Mr. Speaker, "regarding which no one knows the outcome in the end at all." The minister goes on to say:

I doubt if it is wise to throw the fear of that sort of thing into a lot of people at least until there is more cause than there is at present.

Mr. Heenan: If the Minister of Railways will here and now give me the assurance of the government that this will not be done, I will support the second reading of this measure.

Mr. Manion: I could not give any such assurance.

Is not that another excellent reason for voting against this bill? Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as the government cannot give the house any assurance that no more railway employees will be thrown into the discard, I cannot vote for this bill.

The railways are the arteries through which circulates the lifeblood of the nation's trade. It can be summarized in this way—the higher the tariff, the less the trade. What is needed, as has been suggested by the previous speaker (Mr. Reid) and by many others, is greater tonnage. The ex-Minister of Labour, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan), speaking in this house on March 8 last, said:

> What is needed to solve the railroad problem of Canada is greater tonnage, and this could be provided by an additional flow of trade in and out of Canada.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) quoted from the report of the Duff commission to show that the first contributory cause of our present railway problem as found in the Duff report was this: "The reactions of the world trade depression which began in 1929 and has progressively increased in its severity with each succeeding year." The hon. member for Weyburn added:

> In my opinion that is the chief contributory cause of our present railway problem. There was no railway problem when there was plenty of tonnage; there was no railway problem when traffic and goods were moving. There is less traffic to-day because business is not moving.

The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) speaking in this house on the railway situation said:

> All that is wrong with the railways of Canada at the present time, and I am speaking of both systems, is lack of business; they have not as much business as they had in the past. Give us freedom of trade; let the products of this country move back and forth over the lines of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways. Let us sell our surplus products in the markets of the world and we shall have business for the railways of Canada not only from Vancouver to Halifax but also from these points to the central and western provinces.

The hon. Minister of Railways in his speech of last week in this house said:

> In other words, there must be international cooperation on such questions as world indebtedness, international trade barriers, and primary commodity prices.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

He also announced:

> I submit that the outlook for the railways is far from hopeless, provided always that the trustees to be appointed are careful to carry on the management in an economical manner, and provided also that there is at the same time a revival of trade in Canada and throughout the world.

There the minister himself admitted that a revival of trade in Canada was essential to the success of the railways. There was an interesting remark made by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) while the Prime Minister was speaking. The Prime Minister said:

> The point I desire to make is that we have received this as a legacy, and I think we have some right to ask hon. gentlemen opposite to give us their assistance in the solution of this difficulty. I say that for the reason that this party did not create it.
> Mr. Hanbury: The people of Canada did.
> Mr. Bennett: This party did not create it.

> Mr. McIntosh: It created the trade tangle.

I shall attempt to prove that statement, Mr. Speaker. In July, 1931, at page 3554 of Hansard, the Prime Minister admitted that at the special session of 1930 and at the session of 1931, he had altered more than one-half of the total tariff items of this country. As the Prime Minister has often repeated that he "has succeeded where others have failed," it is only fair to him that the external trade of Canada during his term of office should be compared with our external trade during the last year of the Liberal government. Here, sir, is the destructive effect of Tory dynamite on Canada's external trade from August 1, 1930, to February 28, 1933. These are official figures taken from the monthly summaries of the Department of National Revenue. Here are the imports and exports month by month, first of all for 1930, the first year in which this government was in office, followed by the figures for 1931:

	Imports	Exports

There was some more blasting in the second year this government was in office, followed by a continuous decrease in Canada's external trade, as follows:

Continuous Decrease of the Canadian External Trade During Mr. Bennett's Second Year in Office[1]

1931—	Imports	Exports
August	—$64,322,845	—$47,500,865

Then we have the Imperial conference. On October 12, 1932, the Prime Minister spoke thus:

> In brief, I proposed that we should secure tariff preferences in empire markets for our natural products, as well as wider markets for our manufactured products, by granting in the home tariff concessions to empire manufacturers. In other words we desired to secure wider empire markets for our producers of natural and manufactured products, having regard to the relative importance to them of export trade.
> How far this government succeeded, you may judge by the character of the agreements to which it is a signatory.

No, it should be judged by the trade figures. There was another formidable decrease in the third year in office of this government, and especially after the Imperial conference of last year.

Continuous Decrease of the Canadian External Trade During Mr. Bennett's Third Year in Office and after the Imperial Conference of 1932[1]

1932—	Imports	Exports
August	—$75,203,662	—$54,950,397

[1] Each month being compared with the same month of the last year of the Liberal administration (August 1, 1929, to July 31, 1930); — means less.

To sum up the annual decrease of Canadian external trade under the Bennett government since it took office is as follows:

	Imports	Exports
1st year	$ 347,951,166	$ 301,183,695
2nd year	634,558,197	485,228,243

Total decrease in 31 months		$2,588,739,904

It will be noted that figures for the last seven months are since the Imperial conference of 1932. This is after the great success, after the blasting of trade channels and the Imperial conference.

On March 9, 1933, the Prime Minister, speaking of the cost of the branch lines built by both railways, $1,280,000,000 said:

> Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, just what that sum represents? It represents nearly one thousand millions of dollars.

To apply the Prime Minister's own words at page 2855 of Hansard, about the railway debt to the total decrease of the Canadian external trade under his high tariff policy, $2,588,739,904, this figure "might be almost unbelievable because the aggregate is so large." It was $288,000,000 more than the total railway debt. What we have lost in trade during the last thirty-one months is more than the total debt of the country. Yet "we have succeeded where others have failed" the Prime Minister will say.

On March the 9th last the Prime Minister said:

> It is no good to say that we will repudiate those obligations. To do so is to destroy the credit of this country—

Did not he himself destroy the credit of the country with his increasingly high tariff policy?

Sinclair Lewis says somewhere that there are three languages in America: English, Yankee and baseball language. Let us speak Babe Ruth's slang to the Prime Minister:

Ball one: formidable increase in the tariff at the special session of 1930 and at the regular session of 1931.

Strike one: a notorious fiasco.

Ball two: The Imperial conference agreements of 1932. He tried to make a hit but fanned.

Strike two: Bennett on deck—swat the pill.

What next? After strike three—the general elections—out he goes. Will he before? Remove the cause you remove the effect. In case he does not yet realize it the Prime Minister must be told that the first thing to do now is reduce the tariff to normalcy, and unless he does it at once no successful railway legislation can be enacted. Therefore is not Bill A of the Senate premature and untimely?

I have, sir, a very strong objection to the bill being submitted to committee of the whole house, because the minister did not think it necessary to go to the trouble and expense of hearing the witnesses over again. The hon. gentleman said:

> . . . it is my opinion that it is not necessary to go to the trouble and expense of hearing these witnesses over again.

First I would say that the matter of expense is only a pretext. What was the expense of hearing witnesses in the Senate? Does the minister know? Will he tell us? Was it so much? The railway debt is $2,300,000,000 a figure which "might be almost unbelievable because the aggregate is so large" according to the Prime Minister's own words. Most ridiculous! What would be a few thousand dollars of expense compared with such a formidable figure as that of the debt of the railways? If it is true that the primary duty of the house is to legislate, every member has the unquestionable right to hear any witness in order to be familiar with the facts, and all the facts, before he passes judgment on them, even if this bill is a temporary measure. Therefore I not only oppose the bill; I also oppose the motion of the minister to refer it to the committee of the whole. I am sorry to oppose the legislation introduced by the minister, but I am sure it is not exactly his legislation; I think it has been imposed upon him.

The second reason why this bill is not referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines is the fear of the government that trouble will follow. At pages 1875 and 1898 of Hansard I find that although the press of the country reported last fall that the Canadian Pacific had bought Dominion bonds to the value of $2,000,000, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) pointed out twice on February 7 last that that company did not even indirectly subscribe to a single bond. How could that mystery be solved unless the Canadian Pacific officials and the press reporters were called as witnesses before a committee. There is much more in that. On February 7 an Italian bond issue of $51,000,000 was oversubscribed in one day, but it took weeks to subscribe the Canadian loan last fall. Why? The Canadian people have no more confidence in the leader of the government, and this is the writing on the wall. Internal trade is much less for that reason, and the railways suffer severely as a result.

I suggest that there is extravagance in the administration of the railway, Mr. Speaker. On October 17 I placed a question on Hansard, which appears at page 251. The question, which was No. 22 was struck out, so I should like to place it on record now:

1. How many superintendents are there in the Canadian National Railways?
2. How many assistant superintendents?
3. How many special cars are at the disposal of the superintendents?
4. Is each superintendent entitled to a special car for his own use?
5. How many cooks or butlers are in charge of such private cars?
6. What is the total annual salary paid to them?
7. What is the total annual cost of: (a) food; (b) delicacies; (c) cigars and cigarettes, and (d) liquors and soft drinks paid for those special cars during the last three years?
8. To what department of the railway are those expenses charged?

The same questions could be asked with regard to the Canadian Pacific railway. On October 17 the Prime Minister rose in his place and made a statement with regard to this question and another which was on the order paper at the same time. Before putting my questions on the order paper I took the precaution of communicating with the Minister of Railways, who had no objection to the questions. The Prime Minister said:

> With respect to this question and other similar questions on the order paper, notably No. 22, it will be observed that the government is being asked questions regarding the internal operation of a railway which it does not in any sense control for the purpose of offering answers to questions such as are asked. This question obviously, from the very language of it, would in any event have to stand as an order for return and the same might be said with regard to question 22. It is quite clear that to ask the government questions regarding matters that are under the control of the railways, for instance in regard to the facilities that are offered to their own servants to discharge their duties, is something that in my judgment cannot be fairly asked and the only answer that could be made would be: The government has no information. With that answer the hon. member will have to be content with respect to questions such as Nos. 19 and 22.

Then I wrote the assistant clerk of the House of Commons on October 24, as follows:

> On October 17th instant (Hansard, p. 251), the right honourable Prime Minister made the following remarks about question No. 19: "This question obviously, from the very language of it, would in any event have to stand as an order for return and the same might be said with regard to question 22."
> As those questions did not stand as orders for return, I herewith enclose motions to the same effect, in accordance with the Prime Minister's suggestion.
> I hope that the attached motions will appear in the votes and proceedings of the day.
> Please answer in writing.
> Sincerely yours,
> Jean-François Pouliot.

The answer was as follows:

In reply to your letter of the 24th instant, enclosing motions that questions 19 and 22 (Hansard, p. 275) stand as orders for return, I am instructed by His Honour the Speaker to advise you that he considers the same were disposed of in the statement of the Prime Minister on October 17, which was as follows: "the only answer that could be made would be 'The government has no information!'"

Yours faithfully,
(Signed) Thos. M. Fraser,
Clerk Assistant.

Since the Prime Minister runs both ways it is hard to follow him. The Prime Minister did not deign to answer. If hon. members look at Hansard for October 11 last, at pages 74, 75 and 76 they will find the facts with regard to the over-staffing of the Canadian National, and the same thing applies to the Canadian Pacific. One article of my railway policy is that wherever possible it is in the public interest to dispense with the services of one high salaried and useless official rather than four or more good employees. In the meantime a lot of idle officials keep their soft jobs while the heads of families are dismissed.

Before concluding my speech, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the superman idea is worn threadbare. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said:

—the Canadian people ought to thank God that in these days of stress we have a superman.

This is not flattery or adulation; it is just a slight exaggeration. The Prime Minister, who perhaps conceals an inferiority complex behind a superiority complex, probably thought of this when two days later he said:

I recognize the fact that no soft words are going to solve this problem, and no criticism of high taxation will pay the bills that result from it.

Was the Prime Minister too shy to mention high tariff? No superman should be the leader of any government; the leader of a government should be human. If the Prime Minister is a superman why has the business of the country gone from bad to worse since he took office? The primary duties of a Prime Minister are many. On March 9 of this year the Prime Minister said:

These are times for plain speaking, and there is no hon. member now looking me in the face who does not know that what I say is true. I know it is as true as the fact that I am looking at hon. gentlemen opposite.

The other afternoon there was an interesting argument with regard to the primary duty of the House of Commons, but is it not high time that we enumerated the primary and elementary duties of a Prime Minister? I conceive them to be as follows: first, not to allow anyone to burn incense under his nose and call him a superman; second, to attend the sittings of the house of which he is the leader, or to resign if he cannot do so; third, to think before any legislation, orders in council or otherwise, is passed, in order not to have to repeal it later on.

I have very little time left, Mr. Speaker, and since my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) in his eloquent speech yesterday made reference to the utterances of the Prime Minister with regard to Sir Wilfrid Laurier I will only touch on that matter in passing. The Prime Minister blamed Sir Wilfrid Laurier for our railway problem, and here is what the right hon. gentleman said in my home town, Riviere du Loup, during the last election campaign:

Mr. Bennett drew cries of "shame" from the audience when he contrasted Premier Mackenzie King with Laurier. When the United States had threatened to cut Canada off bonding privileges Laurier had declared that Canada would build two railways of her own. But when protection was asked against American imports Mr. King had said, "Hush, do not provoke the United States."

At that time Mr. King was Prime Minister and Mr. Bennett was leader of the opposition, so he had to say something disagreeable. No one has forgotten the speech delivered by the Prime Minister on November 30 last, during the course of which he invoked the memory of Laurier, the father of our country, no less than thirty times in order to excuse all the wrongs brought about by his nefarious policy of high tariff. So I think his reference to Laurier last Thursday could be described in Horace's four words, Minxerit in patrios cineres.

Thanks to the strenuous battle conducted by the Liberal party last fall the eyes of the Canadian people are open. They see the humbug of the trade agreements that were signed at the Ottawa conference, and the efforts of our party have been supported by the subsequent recommendation of the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, backed by all the banks, that the tariff should be lowered. Our case is just as good to-day as it was then. We are fighting for our principles and for the public good; if the supporters of the government do not understand this, at least it is well known to the Canadian people.

Now I have two suggestions to make, and if they are not welcomed by the government as a whole I hope at least they will be received by the Minister of Railways. My first suggestion is that we should not increase the number of unemployed, and my second suggestion is that the tariff should be lowered to a normal height. We are living in times of stress, and this is not the time for beating drums. Every man must be judged by his accomplishments, and when a man is incompetent, whether he be a prime minister or a janitor, he must get out. We must not make a farce of things. The future of the nation is at stake and I am tired of all the incense-burning and the drum-beating when the business of the country, the strength of the nation, is going to the dogs. Let us put a stop to it. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is it not possible, instead of having a union government, for all men of good will to join together to expel from any position those who are unworthy of it because of incompetence?

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): I wish to join with others in complimenting the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) on the speech he made in introducing the bill, and on his plea that the discussion should be non-partisan and without prejudice. May I say that if I myself were a minister in the government and had a bill before the house I too would make a very strong plea to all members of the opposition to be patriotic and non-partisan, and would ask them to put my bill through without too much discussion and without prejudice.

The minister says that there is in this bill nothing that is to conflict with the platform of "amalgamation never", and I think it is a fortunate thing for the country that it has the assurance of the Prime Minister that he is going to insert a special clause in the bill which will make amalgamation impossible. The whole purpose of the bill is to join together certain services, to amalgamate; and how the Prime Minister or the Minister of Railways is going to bring about amalgamation without amalgamation is something I shall be interested in watching.

Like many other members who have spoken, I am quite in agreement with the suggestion that the president of the railway should not at the same time be chairman. I am quite in agreement that there is considerable room for improvement in the method adopted in the past in financing the railway. I am also in agreement that much can be accomplished in changing the method of auditing and to carry on a continuous audit. After I have stated my agreement in these particulars I must say that, even including the economy which is supposed to be the basis of the whole measure, I am opposed to practically every other clause in the bill.

The various ramifications of the bill are stated in legal verbiage. For my own purposes I have put in the language that we employ every day, my view of it. The bill provides for the abdication of all governmental control and all governmental responsibility in connection with the railways, to be placed in the absolute control of one man to be called the chairman of trustees, with full power to do as he wills, without restraint.

The first section provides for three trustees, two of whom have no authority whatever. Although these two trustees may be and are permitted to vote, their vote, or any other action, shall be without effect. The other trustees shall be the chairman, who shall have absolute authority in all things in connection with the national railways, without responsibility to anyone or to the government.

The governor in council will make the original appointments of trustees, and subsequent vacancies may be filled from a panel submitted by a committee, in which committee the present Conservative government have full confidence. This committee is expected to submit only such names for appointment as would continue in these offices the Conservative dynasty, regardless of what political party may be in power in Canada.

The absolute authority of the chairman of trustees will permit him, without any restraint whatever from the government or anyone else, to sell, lease, amalgamate or manipulate in any way the whole or any portion of the assets of the national company.

His authority will enable him to release or discharge, without restraint, any or all of the employees of the national company.

When this bill was first brought before the house considerable credit was given the Duff commission for what it hatched out. It is unnecessary for me to refer again to the report of the committee on railways and shipping wherein this commission was suggested. The commission sat; it spent a considerable amount of the people's money going from one end of the country to the other; it drew up its report and handed it to the Minister of Railways, and we expected some originality in the report, as well as some originality from the Minister of Railways. Certainly we thought that the Prime Minister at any rate would as usual be original. We find however that as in most cases in the history of legislation on the part of the Conservative party, this bill has its precedent—the precedent to take from the people all control over that which the people own. It is a peculiar thing that the Conservative attitude of the present government is reflected in the report of the Conservative royal commission on railways and transportation in Canada; I am referring to what is known as the Drayton-Acworth report. The commissioners of that body were Mr. A. H. Smith, Mr. (now Sir Henry) Drayton, and Mr. W. M. Acworth.

I wish for a moment or two to refer to sessional papers 20(c) and 20(g) in volume 52 of 1917, giving the report of this commission, at page 52, and therein I wish to read bill A, which is before this house at the present time:

The trustees should be five in number. The first trustees should be named in the act of parliament constituting the board.

The tenure of office should be the same as that of judges of the supreme court,—

Now we know where the Prime Minister gets his fondness for supreme courts.

—with the exceptions hereafter noted. Three trustees—

I had wondered where we had come across those words before, "three trustees"; here they are.

Three trustees, one of whom should be the chairman, should, if possible, be men of railway experience. They should be required to give their whole time to their duties, and salaries should be fixed adequate to command the services of the best men. Of the two remaining trustees, we think it would be desirable that one should be selected on the ground of business and financial experience, and the other as specially possessing the confidence of railway employees.

I would direct that clause to the attention of my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and for his benefit I will repeat it:

Of the two remaining trustees, we think it would be desirable that one should be selected on the ground of business and financial experience, and the other as specially possessing the confidence of railway employees. They should not be expected to give their whole time.

Again we have repetition. The report continues:

Their maximum salary might be laid down in the act, to be adjusted later when the requirements of the position became evident. Every trustee on appointment should be required to divest himself of all interest in Canadian railway bonds or stock, and should further satisfy the appointing authority that he has no other interest that conflicts with his duties as trustee.

All appointments other than those of the original trustees should be for a fixed period of seven years,— —except that in the case of a casual vacancy, owing to death or disability or resignation, the appointee should hold office only for the remainder of the term for which the trustee whom he replaces was appointed.

Some more repetition.

Every trustee should be eligible for renomination and reappointment.

Vacancies should be filled, in the case of a railway member, by appointment by the governor general in council, on the nomination of a majority of the remaining trustees;—

That sounds rather familiar.

—and in the case of other members, by appointment from a list of three names, similarly nominated. Should the government refuse to approve a nomination, it should devolve upon the trustees to submit a new name.

That sounds familiar too.

The original trustees should vacate their positions according to the following scheme:

Then follows the scheme of retirement. The next clause states that the suggested board is to be non-political. That sounds familiar and I suggest that we should conduct this argument on a non-political basis. The next clause states that the board is to be permanent and self-perpetuating.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is nothing new under the sun.

Mr. HANBURY: Not under the Conservative party. I should like to refer to page 101 of the same report which covers the minority report by Mr. Smith. He said:

I am unable to join my colleagues in their recommendations. They propose that practically all of the railways in Canada, except the Canadian Pacific and the American lines shall be turned over to a corporation to be managed by a board of trustees appointed by government. They insist that this board is to be permanent and self-perpetuating. I do not know by what means one parliament can bind its successors to a given policy, especially in so simple a matter as changing the organization of a government board.

I am afraid that Mr. Smith did not realize what an ingenious Prime Minister we have at the present time. He continues:

My friends seem—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It should be "seek".

Mr. HANBURY: It is "seem" here. I continue:

—to avoid government ownership and operation, in fact condemn it as inadvisable, but propose a plan which contains so many elements of danger in the direction which is sought to be avoided that I am unable to join them.

Mr. Smith voices in his report many of the objections which I have to this bill. I shall now refer to the renowned Duff commission and the findings they brought in. I submit to the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon), the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) and the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), all of whom were very valuable members of the committee on railways and shipping, that if they had gone to the trouble of referring to this Drayton-Acworth report they would not have thought it advisable or necessary to recommend to the government that a new commission should be appointed. Not only would we have saved a lot of money but we would have realized that the Conservative party was prepared to consider precedents and we could have shown them where a precedent could be found.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

TORONTO BOARD OF TRADE ACT

The house in committee on Bill No. 29, to amend and consolidate the several acts relating to the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto—Mr. Geary—Mr. Hackett in the chair.

Sections 1 to 14 agreed to.

Section 15, subsections (1) to (4) agreed to.

On section 15, subsection (5)—Powers of arbitrators hearing a case.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was there not some amendment regarding the powers of arbitrators to hear cases? Have we this bill reported as amended from the committee on banking and commerce? I think some amendments were made.

Mr. GEARY: On the next subsection.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 15, subsection (6)—Issue of subpoena.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the amendments?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): The amendment is the change of the word "my" to "may" in the third line of the subsection. It is a typographical error.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On section 15, subsection (7)—Compelling attendance of witnesses.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Will the chairman read the amendment?

[Mr. Hanbury.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): In the eleventh line the word "trail" is changed to "trial." Then there is an addition in the seventh line after the word "shall":

Subject to the provisions of the Judicature Acts of the various provinces and/or of the code of civil procedure of the province of Quebec.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does that give the right to that body to subpoena persons from all over Canada? There is a reference to the laws of the province of Quebec.

Mr. GEARY: Only if the jurisprudence of the province allows it. The reason for the amendment was that it was thought the section was too broad and subpoenas might issue out of one province and run in another, which was contrary to the validity of the subpoena as it exists at present. This amendment was inserted to make it quite clear that this was only a provincial matter.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I should like to have from the hon. member who has charge of the bill, more information as to why this board of trade and this board of arbitration thereof should have the right to subpoena persons coming from various provinces. I do not know that other chambers of commerce or other bodies have a similar right.

Mr. GEARY: I think all boards of trade, the larger ones at all events, in the dominion are incorporated by federal statute. The board of trade of Toronto has members in Great Britain as well as in all the provinces of the dominion. One of its functions, as my hon. friend well knows, is the holding of arbitrations in regard to commercial matters. If an arbitration be held in Quebec, then under the rules of practice of Quebec—I do not know how it is termed in that province, probably the civil code, while in our province it is under the Judicature Act—

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is the Code of Civil Procedure in Quebec.

Mr. GEARY: The result of the bill as amended is that the attendance of witnesses beyond the confines of the province cannot be compelled. The subpœna will run only according to the code of the province in which it is issued or according to the Judicature Act of that province.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask, Mr. Chairman, if this bill has been examined by the law clerk of the house and if it has received his approval?

Mr. GEARY: I believe so; the bill comes here in the ordinary way.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Subsections 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Section agreed to.

Sections 16 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

On section 20—Affirmations may be substituted for oaths.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is an obvious misprint, Mr. Chairman, in the third last line where "or" is intended for "of".

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): Shall the section be amended accordingly?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This section makes wilfully swearing or falsely affirming in any case where an oath or solemn affirmation is required an act of wilful or currupt perjury. Is that not already covered by the criminal code?

Mr. GEARY: It might be covered, but this relates to the matter of procedure in an arbitration. It is really to carry the law into arbitrations.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But we are here defining a criminal act and what shall constitute perjury. Perjury is already defined in the criminal code.

Mr. GEARY: You find this in many statutes.

Mr. SPENCE: In thousands of them.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In view of the experience of my hon. friend that he has found this in thousands of criminal acts I make no further objection.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 21 and 22 agreed to.

Schedule "A" agreed to.

On schedule "B".

Mr. CASGRAIN: I understand that there is an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to this schedule?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): The amendment deletes in paragraph 6 the words "the various acts relating to the board of trade of the city of Toronto and the by-laws made in pursuance thereof," and substitutes therefor the words "this act and the by-laws made in pursuance thereof."

Schedule "B" agreed to.

Schedules "C", "D" and "E" agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay, for Mr. Jacobs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 39, to amend the Railway Act (return tickets).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

Mr. MANION: I regret to say that on account of the hon. member who is moving this bill not being in his place I had not noticed the bill being called. I was looking at another matter.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I moved this bill because Mr. Jacobs asked me, if the bill came up in his absence, to do so. If there is no objection the bill might be allowed to stand.

Mr. MANION: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 43, to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is a simple amendment, and I think not very controversial. It is that section two of the Immigration Act, chapter ninety-three of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"(w) 'public charge' means a person who is in charge of or supported by a charitable or public institution but does not include any person in receipt of unemployment relief from any charitable or public institution or otherwise, or any inmate of an unemployment shelter, camp, or other refuge."

It is sought definitely to define "public charge," in order that the people who to-day are forced to accept unemployment relief will be excluded from deportation proceedings. Section 40 of the Immigration Act, deals with the deportation of prohibited or undesirable classes, and among such are those engaged in or in any way deriving benefit from prostitution, those guilty of any crime involving moral turpitude, those who are professional beggars or a "public charge," those practicing polygamy and so on. Under the act as it stands "public charge" is not defined; the words are:

. . . has become a professional beggar or a public charge . . .

Evidently the idea of the act is that people can be deported from this country who obviously are unfit to have any place in Canadian life. "Public charge" is closely connected with professional begging. Under this clause a large number of people have been deported from Canada. I have the figures here for the fiscal years 1930-31, 1931-32 and up to September, 1932, giving a grand total for that two and a half years of 9,446 persons deported for becoming public charges. I have not the figures for the last five months; they were not available the other day, but I am informed that the proportion is about the same which would bring the number up to 12,000 or 13,000 people deported on the ground of being public charges. In the two and a half years to which I have referred, 2,146 people were deported because of their having been convicted of criminal offences, and 458 because of misrepresentation or stealth. These, with those deported for other causes make a total in that two and a half years of 15,658 persons. It is obvious that with 12,000 or 13,000 people deported on the ground of their being public charges, the matter is rather serious. I am informed that a great many of those people were deported with their own consent. In fact I think the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) issued a statement not long ago in which he said that something like 46 per cent of the British deportees had made application to be deported; also that something like 6 per cent only of the British ordered to be deported had appealed, and about 14 per cent of the non-British. It does not seem to me that these latter proportions are very significant, for I think most people, once ordered deported, would hardly think it worth while to appeal, and would accept the deportation order without further protest. I am not in any way blaming the department for having deported this large number of people. As long as the law stands as it is and the phrase "public charge" is not clearly defined or definitely limited, it is quite within the authority of the minister to deport anyone who is in receipt of relief.

Further than that, I think we all recognize that in most cases the initiative in deportation proceedings has been taken by the various municipalities, which have found themselves carrying a tremendous burden in carrying the people coming on relief. Many of these have come in in comparatively recent years, and municipalities have said: "We cannot carry the burden; why not ship them out of the country?" I can quite understand the pressure that municipalities may put on the department, but I do not think that warrants us as a country in deporting people of this class. If people have shown that they are criminals or professional beggars, or are not qualified to earn a living in normal times in this country, I think it is quite right that they should be deported. In fact they should never have been allowed inside our gates; there should have been stricter supervision to begin with. But we all recognize that at present we are in the midst of a great depression, that there are tens of thousands of our own native born Canadians who cannot get work to support themselves and have had to go on relief. That is no crime, and no indication that they are incapable of earning a living under normal conditions; it is their misfortune. It would seem to me that in such conditions we should carry immigrants of this class, just as we are trying to carry our own native born Canadians.

I would recall what all members of the house know, that we spent millions upon millions of dollars to induce these people to come to this country, and I would also note that the greater number deported have been returned not to Europe but to the British Isles. We sent people to England and Scotland to tell what a grand country this was. I did not think it worth while to take up the time of the house in reading the glowing advertisements which were inserted in the English newspapers begging people to come to Canada and assuring them that they could make a good living in this country. Many of them took us at our word; they sold their little homes, disposed of most of their furniture, gave up their jobs and came out here. Some of them prospered when there was an opportunity for them to prosper, but when hard times came they were thrown out of employment with many native-born Canadians. Perhaps because they were not so deeply rooted in this country they were among the first to be thrown out of work, but that is no reason why we should try to evade our responsibility of caring for them during this time of depression. I am quite sure hon. members must have had individual cases brought to their attention. Very often when men were sent back to the old country their family ties were broken and their former occupations were gone, and there was a depression in their own country. Whether or not they would be able to establish any claim for relief; would depend upon the particular country. Under these circumstances it seems to me that we should not continue this process of deporting people simply because they have had to accept relief. I think we might accomplish the purpose I have in mind by a definition of a public charge which would exclude this particular class of people from the operation of this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask my hon. friend a question? Does he not consider that the definition of a public charge in this amendment shows very poor draftsmanship? It reads:

"public charge" means a person who is in charge of or supported by a charitable or public institution—

To me that would mean a person who is in control of or who directs such an institution, but I think the hon. member has in mind a person who is in the care of such an institution.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the legal gentlemen here think they can improve the wording of the amendment I have no objection at all. I sought the advice of a legal friend of mine who is rather familiar with legislation of this kind, and this is the draft he gave me.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, the phraseology of section 40 of the Immigration Act, to which reference has been made, has been on the statutes of this country for many years. If my memory serves me correctly, in the years prior to 1930 and since this legislation was enacted some 45,000 persons were deported from Canada under this section. It is true that since 1930 a slightly greater proportion have been returned from Canada to the land of their origin.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If I may do so without interrupting the minister, I should like to ask a question. The hon. gentleman said 45,000 people had been deported under this section. Could he say how many were deported under the specific charge of being on relief, or becoming a public charge?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figures separated in that way, and I am speaking from memory. The migration of people to Canada is and has been under the control of the federal government, and as soon as a person is legally admitted into Canada that person has the right to go from place to place with perfect freedom. He may become a public charge or he may become undesirable in any municipality or province of Canada. It has been said many times by provinces and municipalities, when these questions arise, that it was not at their invitation that these undesirables came to Canada, and with some justice they have turned to the federal authorities and said, "You permitted them to enter and now we find them to be public charges or undesirables within our boundaries." Heretofore the federal administration has made no provision for the maintenance and care of those found to be undesirable persons as defined by the act.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does not the hon. gentleman distinguish between an undesirable and a person on relief?

Mr. GORDON: Oh, quite; I do not see why the hon. gentleman should ask such a question, because it is so obvious and so apparent. The hon. member might be undesirable though not on relief, or he might be on relief and not be undesirable. The suggested amendment to the Immigration Act has an effect which I do not believe the mover of the bill intended. If the bill should pass as it now stands the hon. member might find that he had introduced into the Immigration Act something that was far from his intention. If the bill passed through this house in its present form a person who had not acquired Canadian domicile and who was in the charge of the Salvation Army, we will say, or of a church organization, deriving his support in that way for a temporary period, would become liable to deportation. I do not think the hon. member had that intention at all, but undoubtedly that would be the effect of the amendment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister explain what he means?

Mr. GORDON: It is obvious from the reading of the bill, which seeks to define a public charge. The amendment states that a public charge is a person in charge of or supported by a charitable institution. I think the Salvation Army might be called a charitable institution, and that might apply to a church as well. Some minister of immigration following me who might not be so kindly disposed to the people within our borders might take these people from the control of the Salvation Army and send them back to their country of origin. I am sure the hon. member was not thinking of that, but I think that is the effect of this amendment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But under section 40 as it is now those who are in the charge of a public charitable institution are liable to deportation.

Mr. GORDON: A public charitable institution; quite true. And again, probably I should agree with what the hon. member said about changing his counsel when he has a bill to be drafted. This says, "a charitable or public institution," thereby incorporating in the language of the proposed amendment all those various organizations who so very kindly extend their help to people coming to Canada for the first time in an effort to establish themselves. I merely point this out in passing, because the language of this bill is hopeless from the point of view of accomplishing the purpose sought by the mover of it.

There is however another and more serious side to the proposed measure and I intend to oppose the passing of it for this reason. In common with every other country to the shores of which there is a migration of people, we have encountered many pure malingerers who will not work. Indeed, it might be illuminating to hon. members to know that there are in one city in this country something like 3,000 to 3,500 people who are being fed and of whom at least 700 will not work although they have been offered jobs. I do not say that they are white collar jobs or anything of that sort, but these people are offered honest toil with a going rate of wage, and they refuse to take the work. In fact, I have received communications to the effect that they will not take the work because they have only to wait a short time until another party comes into power when they will not have to work at all. I can scarcely subscribe to that, but that is the feeling amongst them. In another city in Canada we have a similar condition, where our colonization field staff was requested by the authorities not to solicit for any more jobs for single men because they would not accept work at the current rate of wages. These men are malingerers, and if we restrict the effect of the language of the present section we simply divest the person who is administering the law of the power to take care of cases of that kind.

There is a section of the Canadian press—fortunately this is confined to a few newspapers, although they are widely read—which has consistently, in season and out of season, made the business of immigration a political football; and I think I am fairly safe in making this assertion, that never since railroad expansion commenced in this country has the question of immigration into Canada been dealt with on the basis of national business. It has been dealt with on anything but that basis, and I might go on to criticize what was done in the recent past with respect to the practice, not perhaps of inviting people to the country, but of entering into contracts and agreements with people whose eye was not single to the purpose of seeing that immigrants that came into the country should be those who were best suited to citizenship in the country in which they were seeking to establish themselves. I do not wish to dwell on that but it is obvious; it cannot be denied, because the facts are there in the department. Anyone who cares to review the history of any of these efforts can see that there was one cardinal outstanding weakness, namely, that those who promoted the migration of people into Canada did not throw around that movement, so far as it could be done, those safeguards that would restrict the number of those coming into the country by excluding those who were totally unfit to take up life here with any hope of success.

This bill goes on to state that "public charge" does not include any person in receipt of unemployment relief; and, again, words are used that appear in the preceding part of the subsection—"any charitable or public institution, or otherwise." The hon. member will see that if this is analyzed he falls into the same error again, and instead of restricting deportations, instead of divesting the administration of the right to deport, he is rather widening the interpretation of the section. I think I fairly well understand what the hon. member intends to accomplish: he wishes to restrict the right of the federal power to return to their country of origin people who are found unable to get along in Canada and who consequently become public charges. He wishes to have that power restricted. With regard to the policy of the department in that respect, I should be glad to know of any person who is receiving relief and whose case is associated with no other consideration than that, where deportation has been carried out against the will of the deportee.

Mr. FACTOR: Plenty of them.

Mr. GORDON: My hon. friend says that there are many such cases. Can he name one?

Mr. FACTOR: Yes, I could name half a dozen in my own constituency.

Mr. GORDON: I should be glad if the hon. member would name them.

Mr. FACTOR: I can bring down my file.

Mr. GORDON: Just name one for a starter.

Mr. FACTOR: I know of a gentleman who came from Poland and was in receipt of unemployment relief for over a year, and he was ordered deported.

Mr. GORDON: Does the hon. member know his name? Perhaps he would not like to mention it here, but I should be glad to have the name of that person so that I might look up the facts, because I am sure that I should find in the record something else besides his merely receiving relief.

Mr. FACTOR: Would the minister favour the principle of not deporting people merely because they are in receipt of unemployment relief? If he is in favour of that principle, surely he can draft legislation to that end.

Mr. GORDON: Not at all; I am not responsible for this bill. The policy of the department is simply this. If application is made for the deportation of an alien not having domicile, and it appears before the board of inquiry that that person is to be deported solely on the ground of having received relief, then the officials of the department will take every possible step to get that person into some useful vocation, and deportation is delayed in almost every case—I might not be correct in saying one hundred per cent of the cases—until some useful occupation is found. It almost invariably happens however that people who have been recommended for deportation by the municipal or the provincial authorities are of that type who are not willing to take whatever work is offered them. That is the position. Cases have come under my own review where people desired to go back home; they felt they could not get along here. They were comparatively recent arrivals and they considered that if they were returned to the land of their origin they could be reunited with relatives or friends and could probably tide over this time better than they would amongst strangers. That is not a desire to which we could take exception, it is a very natural desire. The only method which this government can invoke generally is to return people to the land of their origin when they apply for deportation stating that they cannot get work. I cannot see that we could do anything else. If we are to be precluded from taking that course by the definition of public charge set out in this bill, then we will be unable to return to the land of their origin those who desire to be returned. A very large percentage of those who have been returned so desired.

I receive from some sources serious criticisms of the policy of the government with respect to these matters where I think it should receive a degree of commendation. At times some churches take an active interest in matters of this kind. Only a month ago I received a copy of a resolution passed on December 18 by the Deer Park United Church of Toronto. I might say that I think the least reliable source from which to obtain the facts with respect to deportation is the newspapers. I say that with great respect for the press, but nevertheless I think it is abundantly true. There is one newspaper which I have to read in order to keep abreast of the times, and I say, I think with little fear of successful contradiction, that in no single case has the report of a deportation in that particular paper not been saturated either with half truths or whole falsehoods. Resort to the official records will bear out this statement.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What paper is that?

Mr. GORDON: The Toronto Daily Star. The resolution which I received from the church authorities in Toronto reads in part as follows:

> From time to time this session has learned from newspapers and other sources of information, that the deportation of inhabitants of Canada to their respective countries of origin is proceeding on a large scale, at the rate of thousands of deportees per annum. The persons so dealt with are not only of foreign birth, but also from England, Scotland and other parts of Great Britain. This process is secret in its nature. No public trial, or trial of any kind, seems to be required, but at the discretion or caprice of some public official, men, women and children whose only crime is their poverty or illness, are haled away and sent overseas, in many cases without money, without proper clothing, and even without food.
> Until recent years, it was the policy of every successive government in Canada to foster and encourage immigration, not from Britain only but from the countries of continental Europe. People of these countries, attracted by the highly coloured advertisements of Canada, its vast and varied resources, its cheap and fertile lands, came in numbers up to 400,000 or more per annum. Much of this immigration has already been absorbed into Canadian life, and in industry, intelligence, and the essentials of citizenship, the newcomers have proven not inferior to the average of native born Canadians. Many of them have struggled hard and valiantly with the inevitable difficulties attending their efforts to establish a permanent footing. Some have failed, and in these distressing times are regarded as "likely to become a charge upon the public." Hence, they are ejected from the country to which they had been invited and in which they had hoped to find a home. Even an English widow, temporarily ill and out of work is, with her helpless children, driven off with the rest.
> This session has no sympathy whatever with revolutionary or so-called communistic principles, but it is constrained to protest against this inhuman, wholesale and secret deportation, resembling in essence as it does the expulsion of the Greeks from Turkey after the great war, the activities of the Ogpu in Soviet Russia, or the historic carrying away of the people of Israel by their Assyrian conquerors.

I answered the letter enclosing that resolution and gave these gentlemen the facts. I do not remember receiving an acknowledgment. A similar inquiry from another church was received and similarly answered. The following is the reply received:

Thank you very much for your letter of January 11.

I do wish that the press would on all occasions endeavour to secure accurate facts and that they would not use their news columns to play politics.

I am sending you a copy of our annual report.

I suppose there are people who like to foster reports of that character. If those who have the position of these people at heart would resort to the department in order to obtain the facts, more accurate statements would be made. If hon. members would endeavour to obtain the facts before entering this chamber, we would get along a great deal better. Let me say to the mover of this bill (Mr. Woodsworth) that no one will be deported from Canada solely upon the ground that he is receiving relief unless that charge is linked up with something else that falls within this section, or he is a malingerer or desires to be returned to the country of his origin. We are finding jobs for hundreds of these men every week.

In the perilous times through which we are passing every department of the government and every hon. member of this house is faced with great difficulties and it is no time to be stampeded. We should not attempt to emasculate a law which has been upon our statute books for upwards of forty years. I oppose this bill because I do not think it is in the best interests of this country. Its intention is to divest the government of certain powers, and if that is done I am sure it will be regretted. I think we can rely upon the officials of the department and the minister in charge, whoever he may be, to see that hardship is not cast upon those who temporarily find themselves unable to obtain employment in Canada. In the meantime the work of the colonization department, and in fact of all departments of government is being directed towards seeing that people who want to work are absorbed into useful vocations.

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Manion for the second reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, before recess I was attempting to show that the bill now before the house was based upon the Drayton-Acworth report of 1917 and that the high praises sung for the members of the Duff commission would perhaps have been better deserved by the members of the Drayton-Acworth commission. I would point out that the provisions of this legislation were before the Conservative government in 1917, but the government of that day did not see fit to accept the suggestions made at that time, which suggestions are now contained in this bill. The government of this day now places these provisions before the house. There have been some changes and the principal one has probably been in connection with the one who as Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is directing the affairs of this country. For that reason I believe the mentality and the personality of the Prime Minister, the individual who has inspired this particular bill, become a question for the people of Canada and for the members of this house, and it is from that perspective that for a few moments I should like to analyze the bill now before us.

We know the right hon. gentleman has a very broad fund of information; we also know he is a man of great and singleminded purpose; we know he is one of those who at times go through the world with a vision before their eyes, with a mission. In the past we have had similar illustrations and demonstrations. We have had men whose purpose has been singleminded, whose vision has ever been before them. I would refer as an example to Napoleon of France. He had a vision, an inspiration, an objective. For another, we have one equally inspired, Kaiser Wilhelm. I am not suggesting that in levity; I think this is a matter for the serious consideration of every hon. member. Who is to judge of the mentality and the integrity of Napoleon and the motives that inspired him? Who is to judge of the motives that inspired Kaiser Wilhelm? There is no precedent by which we can judge those men. They were not subjected to the ordinary laws by which common individuals are judged. They were above the law, above restraint; they were men who invariably felt called upon by the Great Ruler of the universe, men who had a vision, who had to take the people along a certain course whether they would or not. They said: The people must go to my goal, not to their own; the people do not always know what is best for them. So sometimes we have before us a Napoleon, a kaiser, or someone equally inspired. We may criticize some of the means adopted by such gentlemen as these to attain their ends, but we should not criticize the endeavour that they are making from their own standpoint. They are here not to accept, but to establish precedents. Precedents established through generations mean nothing to them; constitutions mean nothing to them; they are above them; they are above ordinary human considerations, and even human life itself must, if necessary, be sacrificed in the attainment of the great objective. They believe there must be one man above the law, above the people, above the government, and that is what we have before us in this bill.

The mind that conceived this bill, the inspiration behind it, could well decide that in the interests of the efficiency of the nation, the necessity for rigid economies and for provision for taxes with which to pay bond interest, the country could best be ruled by one man above the people and above the law. Let me make a forecast: that if in the provisions of the bill before us the railway situation needs greater efficiency, greater economy and the dictation of one man, so the affairs of Canada will be shown to need greater efficiency, greater economy, and I would not be surprised if before the session is over we were told that we needed the dictation of one man, yes, not only one man, one dictator, but a dictator who will arrange for the succession of this power in perpetuity and so in that way will bring about the "kingdom of Canada" which is being espoused in this chamber by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne). I am not at present concerned with what the ultimate goal of the right hon. gentleman may be, whether it is a commonwealth of the free nations of the empire or whether he intends to establish an empire demanding tribute and collecting tolls from the other nations of the world. My attempt will be to relate to the present bill the mentality which I have described, a mentality that would take everything from the people and would concentrate all power in one man.

We have this tendency illustrated starting in the special session of 1930 and continuing to date. We have the bill known as "peace, order and good government" devised to take the power from the people; we have the bill known as a "blank cheque" for the same purpose; we have in the tariff board an attempt to inflict the will of the present Prime Minister on all future governments, another endeavour to get away from the will of the people. Again in the railway bill now before us we have the setting up of a dictator and a further getting away from the will of the people; the people cannot be trusted; the dictator must be followed.

I would refer to some of the Prime Minister's words that we have to guide us in connection with his thoughts on these and other matters. We know he believes that if a people are to be made great, they must be put through the crucible of sacrifice and of adversity. I would refer now to the Prime Minister's statement on October 10, 1932, as reported at page 51 of Hansard:

> We have no desire to undermine that high courage, that resourcefulness and ability of our citizens to emerge out of difficulties, strengthened by trials as by fire.

Mr. COTNAM: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point is that the hon. member is out of order in quoting from a speech that was made during the present session of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, certainly not.

Mr. HANBURY: The Prime Minister went on:

> We have no desire to remove those characteristics from our citizenship. We know what made this country great; we know what courage the pioneers had.

I would refer that to the hon. gentleman who raised the point of order, and I would repeat it for him: "We know what courage the pioneers had." Evidently the Prime Minister does not expect to find courage in the people of Canada to-day.

Again quoting the words of the Prime Minister, speaking in the present debate on Thursday of last week:

> This is a surgical operation and it must be a radical operation. In order to make it effective and successful we must eliminate every political consideration which would interfere with the success of the operation.

Again:

> It is the greatest problem that confronts the Canadian people; it is the problem beyond all others that calls for the exercise of patience and in my judgment of much sacrifice on the part of the taxpayers.

Once again:

> We are all human, but we must not forget that we have a larger obligation.

We are all human, but we must not forget that we have a larger obligation. What larger obligation is there than to be human and humane? The obligation under this bill to provide interest to the bondholders! There is a larger obligation than humanity. "Those opposed to my will must be put under the iron heel of ruthlessness." Who was it that used that expression of the iron heel of ruthlessness? Was it Napoleon to whom I have referred, or one of the czars or even the kaiser? No, it was the Prime Minister of Canada.

What is the objective of this bill? The Prime Minister is going to establish a liquidator to operate the railroad, not for the benefit of the people, not to give service to the people, not to protect the human individuals who are engaged in this industry. No, the only interpretation that can be placed on the bill before us is the intention by the iron heel of ruthlessness to crush from the Canadian people sufficient tolls and blood money to feed his golden calf.

Again, I should like to quote what the Prime Minister has to say about this liquidator. Speaking in this house on Thursday of last week he said:

> The position is not, as has been suggested so frequently in this house, that these are the properties of the people of Canada. They are now the properties of the people who loaned their money to build them, and under normal conditions they would take possession of them.

The Prime Minister says that the railroads no longer belong to the people, that they belong to the money lender, the money lender in Canada, the United States, and Great Britain, and he must operate these roads through a liquidator for the interests of the bondholders, and the interests of the bondholders only. The Prime Minister might have continued and said what he would have done had these bondholders been in Russia.

Again he said:

> For we are now dealing with very simple matters,—securities, property in default, and security owners having a right to enforce their claims. . . . But this enterprise belongs to the investors; let us keep that in our minds.

It belongs to the investors, not to the people of Canada. The people of Canada have no further interest in these roads, according to the Prime Minister, and we must simply run the roads in order to get the interest that is due to the bondholders. In this bill the Prime Minister says: We will have to create a Frankenstein, and we will put him in a watertight, bullet-proof case, and the Frankenstein will crush out every last mile of unprofitable road. To use a railroad man's expression, this Frankenstein is going to bump off every employee that is not absolutely necessary, everyone who can possibly be dispensed with.

This Frankenstein, this chairman of trustees, what is his job? What is this legislation built on? It is built on squeezing out the last dollar. It means tearing up all agreements that there may be in connection with the operation of the road in order that more money may be provided for dividends on stock and interest on the bonds. To provide money, through a Frankenstein, a monster whose humanity cannot see beyond dividends for the stockholders and interest for the bondholders. This bill, if I may use the expression, is begotten in lust, lust for power—

Mr. McDADE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman is reading his speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, he is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Get a pair of glasses.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He is referring to his notes.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gagnon): The hon. gentleman has the right to refer to his notes. I do not think he is reading his speech.

Mr. HANBURY: I would say to the hon. member who raised the point of order, that if he wishes to read my speech he will be able to do so to-morrow in Hansard.

I was just suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that the Frankenstein being created by this legislation has been begotten in lust, lust for power, and not only power until death but power after death. And it is born of fear, fear of political interference, fear of interference by the right hon. gentleman's own followers perhaps, possibly fear of political interference by his successors, fear that his successors in the government would lack the ruthlessness to effect the economies deemed necessary by himself.

This bill is based on efficiency and economy. I agree with reasonable efficiency and economy, but I do not favour the ruthless economy which is visualized in this bill, and which is going to force thousands of railway employees into the bread lines. Many merchants who are now supplying their requirements will be forced out of business, and many employees in those industries will also be in the bread line. I do not favour the efficiency and economy to be established under this one man, this chairman of the trustees, this kaiser, and I submit to the railway employees of this country that the running trades agreements, the shop employees' agreements and all others will be made a scrap of paper by this dictator. Wages will be cut to the bone, the number of employees on trains and other operations will be reduced, working hours will be increased, hundreds of miles of railway will rust and rot, towns and villages will be without their railway—

Mr. McDADE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is unquestionably reading his speech, and that is against the rules of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. McDade) is short-sighted.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gagnon): To my mind the hon. gentleman is a very clever reader, then, because he does not seem to read.

Mr. HANBURY: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will make allowance for the interruptions. I have referred to the fact that employees will be discharged, their agreements scrapped, their wages cut, many miles of railway will be torn up, towns and villages will be without transportation, and the lives of citizens will be endangered by virtue of the deteriorated condition of road and equipment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Turn over the page!

Mr. SPENCE: You have lost your place.

Mr. HANBURY: Mr. Speaker, it is evident from the remarks of hon. members on the other side of the house that they are quite prepared for the condition which I have pointed out. I feel that I have done my duty in drawing to the attention of the railroad people of Canada particularly what this legislation forecasts, and I say to hon. gentlemen opposite, and on this side of the house as well, that if they have any humane feeling, any humanity, they will give most careful consideration to this legislation, which proposes to place one czar in charge of such a large operation as we have in the Canadian railroads.

Mr. A. F. TOTZKE (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, in the few remarks I wish to make this evening on this very important bill I would first of all congratulate the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) on the tenor of his remarks in moving the second reading. To us who have been in the house a number of years it came rather as a surprise that the Minister of Railways could be so moderate in tone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TOTZKE: We all like the Minister of Railways, we like his style, and we feel that perhaps it is not so much the red-blooded Canadianism that is in him as his racial ancestry that makes him so fond of a fight. But on this occasion I am sure we are able to congratulate him upon the moderation of his views.

I should like very much to be able to say the same thing for his leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I have a high admiration for the abilities of the Prime Minister, but I believe he does not always do himself justice in speaking in this house. He does not need to go to the extremes of ridicule and almost vituperation that he employs on occasions towards members on this side of the house. Sometimes I think perhaps the Prime Minister does this with a purpose. I think he undertakes occasionally to give us a castigation in order that he may arouse the ire of members on this side and prolong the debate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be asked why at this stage of the debate anyone should join in and prolong the discussion. Perhaps everything that can be said on the matter has been said. But I have no apology to make for taking part in this debate. I believe that, as has already been said, this is one of the most important problems that is before the people of Canada at this time. I do not admit that it is the most important problem; I join with some of the hon. members who have spoken previously in saying that the most important problem in Canada to-day is that of unemployment. But this question is to my mind next in importance, therefore I wish to put my views on record.

I desire to review shortly the provisions of the bill, explain in the briefest way possible my views with regard to them, and give reasons why I am going to oppose the second reading. I feel I have a duty, as representative of a constituency the people of which are vitally interested in the railway transportation problem, to let my constituents know just where I stand and why I vote as I intend to vote. We have had many excellent speeches during the debate, and much valuable information has been put upon the records of the house. It it unnecessary to repeat information that has already been put on Hansard, so with the exception of a few figures which I will quote to bear out certain statements I shall make I do not intend to weary the house with figures.

The bill now before us affects not only the transportation system known as the Canadian National Railways, with which we as members of this house are more particularly concerned, and which is of such vital importance to large sections of our country, but also that other great railway system which we have in Canada, the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Pacific is just as vital to the interests of Canada as the Canadian National, and in my opinion nothing should be done which will in any way interfere with the efficiency of these two great roads. We have every reason to be proud of the great transportation systems of this country, greater than almost any others in the world. But the difference between our responsibility in connection with the one and the other of these two roads lies in the fact that representing the people of Canada we are directly responsible for the policies of the Canadian National, in spite of the statement of the Prime Minister a few days ago that the people of Canada really do not own this great railway. The service of these roads affects the economic life of the entire country. It affects eastern as well as western Canada, but to my mind it affects the western provinces more than it does the eastern provinces. The west is a country of great distances, rather sparsely settled. In eastern Canada the population is more concentrated, and the people have other means of transportation which they can use in case of emergency. In western Canada, if the weather is not propitious and our railways are not in operation, we are without transportation facilities. Settlement in western Canada in some instances followed the railways, while in other instances it went ahead of the railways, but where settlement went ahead to any great degree it was always with the understanding that eventually the railways would supply the transportation required. It is of vital importance to western Canada that adequate transportation facilities should be afforded, because of the very commodities we produce. Every member of the house knows that our main products are wheat and other coarse grains, cattle and so on, and that it is necessary for us to ship those commodities over long distances. The only method of transportation available to us is the railways. It has been estimated that a farmer in western Canada who must haul his grain more than ten or twelve miles cannot do so at a profit. Of course at the present time, Mr. Speaker, if the farmer must haul his grain half a mile he cannot do so at a profit, but these are abnormal times and I for one am sufficiently optimistic to believe that conditions will improve.

I am entirely in favour of practising economy in the operation of our railways. Every business corporation and every business man throughout the world at this time is practising economy, and necessarily so. But we must be careful when we practise these economies not to go too far and jeopardize the very existence of this country. I am aware of certain duplications of service rendered by the two companies, and as I have already said I am ready to admit that in some cases this duplication might be done away with, without impairing the efficiency of the service at all. I am afraid, however, that this mania for economy and for cooperation, for bringing together the two roads wherever there is the slightest suggestion of duplication, may be carried too far. It is my belief that at least a very large proportion of the people of Canada are opposed to any amalgamation of the two roads; I think the people want to see both roads prosper and give the service they were intended to give. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister state that there was no move towards amalgamation hidden in this bill, and the right hon. gentleman has promised to replace the section giving a definite assurance to that effect which was deleted in the Senate. I am afraid, however, that in spite of that clause the provisions of this bill are definitely leading towards the amalgamation of the two roads, but with that point I shall deal at greater length a little later in the course of my remarks.

A good deal of discussion has taken place during this debate as to where the responsibility lies for the condition in which our national road finds itself. A number of hon. members opposite have sought to put the blame upon the late administration, headed by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), but I think hon. members on this side of the house have succeeded in demonstrating that at least equal blame must be attached to hon. members opposite. But with this question of where the blame should be placed I am not concerned at all; the only thing with which I am concerned at this time is the possibility of getting our railways into a better financial position in order that they may give better service.

At this point in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay a tribute to the late Sir Henry Thornton. I am sure his death came as a shock to all members of the house. I went to Saskatchewan about thirty years ago and have seen the railway development in that province since that time. Almost thirty years ago I moved to a town situated on the old main line of the Canadian Northern from Winnipeg to Edmonton, and I have lived there ever since. I was there during the time the road was being operated by the Canadian Northern; I was there when it was being operated by the Canadian National Railways before Sir Henry Thornton took charge, and I was there after Sir Henry became president. In all those years I have had a good deal to do with the movement of goods to and fro over that line, and I have had a good opportunity to study the service we were given. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that until Sir Henry Thornton took over the management of the Canadian National railways we did not know what railway service was. Sir Henry Thornton was able to develop in the men working under him a spirit of loyalty and pride in the road which made all the difference between poor service and excellent service.

For a few moments now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with some of the provisions of the bill. As I said at the outset, I do not know that I shall have anything particularly new to contribute to the debate, but I should like to express my own views on some of these provisions and to make my position clear with regard to this legislation. Just here I might suggest that if the whips were withdrawn and hon. members opposite were allowed to vote according to the dictates of their conscience, and properly to represent the people of their constituencies, I am not so sure that this bill would pass this house. But if the bill passes part I will provide that a board of three trustees shall be appointed instead of the present board of directors. It has been said that this is the main portion, the most important part of the bill. With the view that a small board would perhaps function better than a large board I am inclined to agree, and whether it should be a board of three or five does not concern me very much. I rather agree with the suggestion that the smaller board could function better and with less delay than the larger one. I am not particularly in agreement with those who say that certain sections of the dominion should be given representation on that board, nor am I inclined to agree that any particular class should be represented, with the possible exception of labour, in view of the fact that it occupies so important a place in the working of the railways. But if we are going to appoint a small board such as this, the utmost care must be taken that only men of the highest integrity, men who have been zealous in public service and who have faith in the Canadian National Railways, should be appointed to the board.

Another thing I would emphasize is that if a board of three is to be appointed all three men should be full time officials. If we have only the chairman full time we shall find that the other two members of the board may not be sufficiently in touch with the affairs of the railway and may become more or less rubber stamps for him. Section 4 of the bill provides that the first board shall be appointed by the governor in council. To this a good deal of objection has been made; but here again I find that I have no particular objection to the government appointing the board of trustees I believe that the government should appoint the board of trustees and I believe they should appoint their successors; in my opinion the government should take full responsibility for everything that is done by the board. Neither this nor any other government in Canada can pass the buck to anyone else. They must assume responsibility for the work of the board of trustees in carrying on the business of this great transportation organization. I too agree that there should be no political interference with the working of the board of trustees. But political interference and the assumption of responsibility are two different things, and again I say that we in this House of Commons are the elected representatives of the people who own this railway. It may be a technical point with the Prime Minister but it is not a technical point with me; the people of Canada own this railway, and so long as we pay the interest and keep up our obligations with respect to the system, the people continue to own it, and the government should take full responsibility for the appointment of the trustees and for their actions.

Section 7 of the bill deals with the removal of trustees. I find myself entirely opposed to this section. I think it is too cumbersome; it is too difficult to remove trustees in this way. Let me read the provision:

> No trustees shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

It takes time to get the House of Commons together, and this is cumbersome and difficult as a means of rescinding an appointment of this kind; it is difficult to rescind such an appointment through action of the House of Commons and the Senate. Again I say that the government must accept the responsibility both of appointing and of removing trustees whenever there is cause for removal.

Subsection 6 of section 9 gives the trustees absolute power in all matters:

> No order, regulation, by-law, act, decision or proceeding of the trustees shall require the approval of His Majesty or that of any other shareholder of any company to which this section applies.

Again I oppose this section. I regard this as a most unusual and dangerous power to give to any board of trustees. Sometimes similar powers are given to managing directors of incorporated companies, but they are always subject to review of shareholders at the annual meeting. This perpetuates the power of the trustees for at least the time of their appointment, or until they are removed from office, and according to the provisions of this bill they may be reappointed to office and therefore be there in perpetuity. In my opinion therefore this clause is dangerous and most unusual, and once again I say that the government should take the responsibility. The cabinet acts as the executive for members of parliament. Members are here representing the shareholders of the railways, and to this clause I am therefore absolutely opposed.

Subsection 2 of section 11 is another provision with which I find myself in disagreement. It provides that the vote of the chairman must be included in a majority vote of the trustees. The majority vote of the trustees shall carry any resolution or any matter which may be under discussion, but in all cases where the trustees divide, the decision of the chairman shall be final. I could understand perhaps those who had to do with the drafting of the bill giving this power to the chairman of the board of trustees, if he were the only full time member of the board; but in that event there would be a one man board, a dictatorship for this great corporation, and he would have absolute authority to do whatever he wished. Should this bill receive the second reading, I suggest that this section should be amended in committee to provide that the decision of the majority of the board of trustees shall carry.

Section 12 provides that the budget of the Canadian National Railways shall be under the control of the trustees, and subsection 6 of section 9, as I have shown, gives them absolute authority to do whatever they may wish. Here again is an instance where the government should take responsibility and should have some control. Perhaps the late administration gave the railway company a little too free a hand; but we should profit by this experience and should therefore put a little more restraint on those who are now being appointed. But to say that to remove political interference means taking away the exercise of governmental authority is going too far. Subsection 2 of section 14 provides for the routing of freight through Canadian seaports:

> The trustees shall so direct, provide and procure that all freight destined for export by sea which is consigned within Canada for carriage to national railways either at point of origin or between that and the sea shall, unless it has been by its shippers specifically routed otherwise, be exported through Canadian seaports.

I am opposed to this section. I have nothing to say in opposition to the use of our Canadian seaports as much as and wherever possible, but I say that the board of trustees and the management of our Canadian National Railways should not be handicapped in this way. They should be in a position to ship in a manner that seems the most feasible and most profitable at the time.

Part II of the bill deals with cooperation. The idea of cooperation is very good, and I do not think anyone will deny that economies can and should be practised. During this debate as well as during the past two years we have heard a good deal about the reckless extravagance of the Canadian National Railways. There has been extravagance by the management of that railway, but it was not the only railroad or institution in the country guilty of extravagance during the last two years. What about our friends the Canadian Pacific Railway? What about the Royal York hotel in Toronto and the Empress of Britain? I am sure hon. members will agree that there was extravagance in that company. If the prosperous times of 1929 had continued these things would not have been considered as extravagant.

An hon. MEMBER: And Lucerne-in-Quebec.

Mr. TOTZKE: My hon. friend says, Lucerne-in-Quebec. I wonder if that was not extravagance, just another case of trying to keep up with the Joneses. Because of something the Canadian National Railways had done, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company thought that it should go one better. I heard a story about Lucerne the other day; I do not think it is true but perhaps hon. members would like to hear it. It appears that the Canadian National Railways wanted to buy a gravel or sand pit convenient to Montreal and they found what they wanted in the vicinity of Oka. Some Canadian Pacific officials heard of this and thinking that perhaps the Canadian National were trying to open a summer resort, they immediately jumped in and bought Lucerne.

An hon. MEMBER: More truth than poetry in that.

Mr. TOTZKE: I should like to quote a few remarks of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in connection with some statements of Mr. Hungerford. I believe that economies can be practised, but I believe also that there are many false economies. As reported on page 2772 of Hansard, the minister quotes Mr. Hungerford as follows:

> From the standpoint of efficiency the system was in a strong position. "Never in its history." Mr. Hungerford asserted, "has this property been in such good physical condition or so well organized to handle traffic cheaply and efficiently as it is to-day."

He quoted a further statement of Mr. Hungerford's as follows:

In gauging measures of economy to meet declining revenues, the executives of a railway system must guard against jeopardizing the condition of the property. Facilities and equipment must be maintained on a standard of safety and efficiency. This factor has been carefully considered by the Canadian National Railways management and at the present time the property is in fit and proper condition to handle all traffic offering safely and efficiently.

The minister then said:

That, I think, should set at rest any suggestion which occasionally is made to the effect that the efficiency of the railways is being in anyway sacrificed to economies.

That is very interesting and it is only as it should be. The Canadian National railways should be kept in an efficient condition to handle all the traffic offering; but is that all that is required? The physical condition of a railway is not the only measure of efficiency; the efficiency of a railway is more than simply the handling of traffic offered—it means getting the business. Any hon. member can quote instances where business men and merchants, though well equipped to handle all the business offering, have gone to the wall because they did not go out and get business. The minister has told us that the decrease in operating expenses for 1932 amounted to $44,000,000. That is a most commendable decrease in expenses, but can the minister say that that decrease was not made at the expense of the procuring of business?

Mr. MANION: Last year the railway handled fifty-three per cent of the business and the Canadian Pacific handled forty-seven per cent. Apparently it is doing pretty well.

Mr. TOTZKE: How does that compare with the previous years?

Mr. MANION: I can give it to my hon. friend, but I had intended to give this information when I speak later on. It compares very favourably with previous years.

Mr. TOTZKE: The minister mentioned also the dismissal of officials. I shall not quote his exact words, but I think he said that the saving affected in this way amounted to about $1,000,000. This would be commendable if it were not for the fact, as my information is, that certain of the officials dismissed were those whose work was to procure business. If that is the case, then it was false economy.

Mr. MANION: That is not the case.

Mr. TOTZKE: I will give the quotation in a moment. The following is the number of passengers carried one mile by the two railroads in 1931 and 1932:

	Canadian National Railways	Canadian Pacific Railway
1931..	788,423,849	743,036,667
1932..	632,465,682	644,797,144

The decline in the number of passengers carried one mile was 156,000,000 in the case of the Canadian National and only 98,000,000 in the case of the Canadian Pacific. In 1931 the Canadian National carried more passengers than the Canadian Pacific; in 1932 the situation was reversed and the Canadian Pacific carried more than the Canadian National.

Mr. MANION: The percentages I gave covered all traffic.

Mr. TOTZKE: For some reason or other the decline in business of the Canadian National was more than the decline in the case of the Canadian Pacific. This would seem to bear out the statement I made that possibly some of these officials whose business it was to get business for the road had been dismissed. Again I say that if that is so, it is false economy. The following are the figures for the revenue freight ton miles:

	Canadian National Railways	Canadian Pacific Railway
1931.. .. .	12,635,804,000	10,812,004,000
1932.. .. .	11,321,381,000	10,067,420,000

That is a decline of freight ton miles for the Canadian Pacific of 744,000,000 and for the Canadian National of 1,314,000,000. I would say to the Minister of Railways that if those figures are correct—and I have every reason to believe they are—he should look into the matter whether the responsibility lies in the dismissal of officials who are primarily there for the getting of business.

I am sorry my time will not allow me to make all the remarks that I wish to make, but there is one thing I do not want to miss. In all these economies that are being effected on our Canadian National Railways, the position of the railway employees should be very carefully watched. We have at least a moral obligation to look after those men who have spent all these years in the service of our great railway. We have an unemployment situation in this country, and it is not wise to aggravate that situation by throwing out of employment a good number of those railway men, thus adding them to the list of those at present unemployed. To do so would only mean that we shall have to look after them in another way, and therefore in the economies that are being effected nothing should be done that would in any way cause unnecessary loss of employment to our railroad men.

I wanted to say something about the Prime Minister's statement that this board was in the nature of a receivership. How it can be a receivership is more than I can understand. He said that the people of Canada do not own this railway; that it belongs to the bondholders; that they are virtually the owners of the road. My idea of a receivership is that the receivers work in the interests of the owners of the property. In that case it can be seen that under that assumption the trustees are going to work for the bondholders and not for the people of Canada. I am going to vote against the second reading of the bill.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on the legislation before the house, and I intend to follow my usual practice of being brief. I was rather surprised the other day in listening to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) when he moved his motion for the second reading of this bill. Having sat for two years on the committee on railways and shipping with the genial minister, and having heard him on many occasions make unfair statements in that committee and also in the house with regard to the expenditures of the Canadian National Railways and its management—

Mr. MANION: I do not think any of them were unfair.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: —it is a surprise and a pleasing one to me to find that my hon. friend is seeing the error of his ways and, as he is getting older and has more responsibilities on his shoulders, is trying to place before the Canadian parliament a true picture, one which ultimately will go before the Canadian people. I would commend his speech to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) and the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who was chairman of the committee last year.

Mr. GRAY: And the Prime Minister.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), but especially those gentlemen whom I have mentioned; because I have sat on that committee for two years with them and seen the unfair methods used and heard the uncalled-for and insinuating remarks made against the administration of the Canadian National Railways. I am not here to defend the Canadian National Railways, Sir Henry Thornton who has just passed away, or anybody else, but it behooves any hon. member to speak, especially when hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches are trying to make the Canadian people believe the government are favourable to the Canadian National Railways when their actions since they have been in power have been to the contrary.

I should like to quote some of the remarks of the Minister of Railways, but time will not permit me to quote them at any length. When he moved the second reading of the bill, he stated that the Canadian National Railways had done more to economize than any other railway in the world, one might say; that their decrease in expenditures should have been between 60 and 70 per cent of the decrease in revenue, but instead of that it was 112 per cent. He paid that tribute to the Canadian National Railways. How was it able to effect those economies? Because it had efficient management under the direction of Sir Henry Thornton and the road was put into such shape that in times of depression and decreasing revenue it was able to effect those economies.

Has the Canadian National been extravagant? Perhaps it has spent money where to-day we see that expenditure could have been avoided. We will all admit that, but can anyone show me any organization in this country, any individual in this house, any government that spent money that, if present conditions could have been anticipated, would probably not have been spent? Why have the government and its members for the last two or three years been throwing stones at the Canadian National Railways in relation to its expenditures? I could talk about Canadian Pacific expenditures which were unwarranted so far as I can see and so far as that railway itself can see to-day; but would I be doing any good to that railway, or would I be solving the railway problem of Canada by doing so? No. The only one thing for the government and the members of the House of Commons to do is to tell the people that the Canadian National is our railway and that they should make every effort to protect their property.

What is the cause of the present railway situation in Canada? Lack of business. How has this situation been brought about? By the policies of the present government since they have been in power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If any hon. members do not believe this, all they have to do is to look at the trade figures and my statement will be proved beyond any question of doubt. What is our solution of our railway problem? It is tonnage. So long as we continue the trade policies which have been in effect since 1930, the railways will not get tonnage, and if they do not get tonnage, the railway problem will not be solved. I am going to ask you, sir, at the moment presiding over this chamber (Mr. Gagnon): Can you, as one of the bright legal minds of the province of Quebec, show me anything in this bill which is a solution of our railway problem? No solution is provided there. It is a bill to effect economies. We do not have to have this legislation to do so. The Minister of Railways in his speech proved that our national railway has been effecting economies greater than have been effected by any other railway on the American continent. Why then the necessity for this legislation? Any man living along the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific does not need this legislation to show him that economy is being practised. He sees it in the curtailment of service, in the reduction of the numbers of section men and employees generally, in the closing down of stations, and so forth.

Why this legislation? This legislation is brought down in order to create a dictatorship in this country for the purpose of amalgamating the railways. I am prepared to take the interpretation of my hon. friend from Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), another bright legal mind from the province of Quebec, who says that he is in favour of the bill because he interprets it to mean amalgamation. I am opposed to this bill, Mr. Speaker, because it means amalgamation, and, if time permits, I am going to prove my contention that it means amalgamation before I am through.

The railways, from a revenue and business standpoint, I admit, are in an unfavourable position. But how about the farming industry? When I went home at the adjournment of the session last November I found that every farmer in western Canada who had produced a bushel of grain, raised a steer, fattened a hog or a turkey or a chicken, was disposing of all those commodities at a loss. But did that farmer tear up his farm in consequence? Did he tear up his fences? Did he quit farming? No, Mr. Speaker. When I went back home the land was all turned over ready for next spring. The farmers had gathered their hay into their barns to feed their stock during the whole winter, even though a grasshopper plague threatens to attack their farms in the spring. I say that the railways in this country, both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, have to do exactly as every other industry in this country is doing, and that is do as best they can, effect intelligent economies, but give the people the service. A railroad is judged by the service it gives to the public. Any fairminded man who will get away from legal technicalities can come to no other conclusion than that if you amalgamate the services—and that is what this bill really means—you are amalgamating the railways themselves, and once we have amalgamation of the railways in this country the minister and the government and the members of the House of Commons, who represent the shareholders, are absolutely powerless. Why? Because under this bill we are going to appoint a board of trustees, and the chairman of the board of trustees is to be appointed as such for a term of seven years. Some say that this bill does not mean amalgamation, but suppose the chairman of this board of trustees, appointed for seven years, is in the frame of mind to amalgamate the roads. Can the government prevent him doing it, or can any succeeding government prevent him?

Mr. MANION: We are putting a clause in the bill against that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will not prevent him.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: No, that will not prevent him, because what powers are you giving to this dictator, this superman? If he is in the frame of mind to amalgamate the railways, then under the powers that are given to him by this bill, neither this government nor any succeeding government can prevent him from doing so.

Mr. MANION: Oh yes, they can absolutely replace him if they want to, and my hon. friend knows that perfectly well.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: They can what?

Mr. MANION: They can put him out of his position.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am going to prove that the minister cannot put him out of his position. Let me read section 7 of part I of the bill. It says:

> No trustee shall be removed from office, nor suffer any reduction in salary, during the term for which he is appointed, unless for assigned cause and on address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

Suppose the House of Commons does pass an address asking for the dismissal of this trustee and the upper house refuses to concur; what then? Would the minister answer my question right now?

Mr. MANION: The upper house would not refuse if the trustee was breaking a law that had been passed by the parliament of Canada.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have been in the house since 1921 and I have seen many pieces of legislation passed by this house which were rejected by the Senate.

Mr. MANION: We have reformed the Senate.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not wish to criticize the upper house, but as a representative of the Canadian people, who are the shareholders of the Canadian National Railway, I am certainly not going to delegate my power to the upper body, which is not responsible to the electors. That is my contention, and that is why I say that if this chairman of the board of trustees, this superman, is in the frame of mind to amalgamate the railways, neither this government nor any succeeding government can remove him from office unless they get the sanction of the upper house, which is not responsible to the electorate.

What powers do we confer upon this superman by this bill? In the first place we appoint a board of three trustees, but we might just as well throw two of them in the Ottawa river and keep the chairman, because no decision of the board can be put into effect unless the chairman concurs in it. The other two trustees are nullified entirely except they agree with the chairman. Then why appoint three? Why not let this superman run the show? Of course, I suppose there is no place for two supermen in Canada.

Section 11 of part I provides:

> The trustees may decide or act at meetings only by unanimous vote or by majority which includes the chairman.

The Board of Railway Commissioners can give a decision without the chairman of the board concurring in it, and many such important decisions have been given by the Board of Railway Commissioners, with the chairman dissenting from the judgment. But in this case we give the chairman of the board of trustees power to do what? There is nothing under the sun in regard to the railways that this trustee cannot do. He can give leases, he can dismantle, he can do anything. Have the railways of this country got into such a position to-day that we, the people's representatives in this house, representing the shareholders of the Canadian National Railways, are going to pass legislation which will take away from us any control with regard to the national railways and put complete power in the hands of one man?

[Mr. Beaubien.]

I do not think the minister is fair in asking the house to pass this legislation. I do not think the government is fair in expecting us to cooperate in passing it, nullifying, as it does, the power of parliament in connection with the Canadian National Railways, making the minister nothing more than a messenger to bring the report into the house and lay it on the table. Surely the minister is not serious in wishing to belittle his office to that extent. I should be more confident of the results if the minister would retain the responsibility he has to-day instead of delegating it to this board.

Has the public any rights under this bill? Can the public appear before any of these tribunals? I do not see any place in it where the public is considered at all.

Mr. MANION: The chairman of the tribunal can allow the public to appear and make representations before any tribunal that is sitting. It is in the act.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Well I have read it; probably I am not as quick mentally as the minister, but there are many things that he does not know about the act or he would never have introduced it. I say that to the minister, because if he knew as much as I think he should know about it, he would not have it before us at all in its present form.

Then we come to part III, which deals with the tribunals and provides for cooperation. We are going to force them to cooperate. I would ask, how many times will the railroads cooperate after they have been forced by this tribunal to do something they do not want to do? A decision of the tribunal must be against one railroad or the other. Will the railroad against which the decision is given be very much enamoured of this arbitral board? You cannot have cooperation and compulsion together. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) last night compared this compulsion to the wheat pool contract in western Canada. There is no similarity whatever; the wheat pool members were all assembled at meetings in their local districts, at conventions for the whole province; they had their say and formulated their plans. But by this bill only one man has anything to say, and that is the chairman of the arbitral board.

The more I read this bill, Mr. Speaker, and listen to the speeches made in this house, the more I am against it. The bill makes no contribution to the solution of our railroad problem.

Mr. TOTZKE: The minister is against it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: My hon. friend says he thinks the minister is against it. I think myself if the minister sat another week hearing the good speeches being delivered from this side of the house he would be against it. One of the important things that should be done with the Canadian National is recapitalization, but there is nothing in this bill to bring that about.

Mr. McGIBBON: What good would that do?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It would put the Canadian National before the Canadian public at its real physical value instead of the value my hon. friend has been trying to put on it for the last two years.

Mr. McGIBBON: You are only trying to fool yourself.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am not trying to fool myself, and you have not fooled me either. I am against this bill because it is going to bring about amalgamation. I am against it because the public are not going to have any say in the administration of the Canadian National Railways. I am against it because it is going to throw thousands and thousands of men out of employment and demoralize the business of a good many parts of the country. The country is demoralized enough now. The policy of this government has stifled business enough without making it worse with this legislation. So I intend to vote against the second reading of the bill, and I am sorry I have not more than one vote.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, in rising at this late stage of the debate to add a few words one naturally realizes that most of the ground has been covered and that not very much new material can be brought in. I find myself largely in agreement with my good friend the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) as far as this bill is concerned, and I also say to him that he has to quite an extent taken my speech. However, my remarks like his, will be brief.

The railway problem of the Dominion of Canada, as well as the details of this bill, first dealt with in the Senate and then passed on to the House of Commons, have been given a good deal of consideration and ably discussed, I think every one will agree, by hon. members on both sides of the house. I think that the people of Canada will now have an appreciation of the country's railway problem such as they never had before. Regarding the matter of amalgamation, and the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) a few days ago that he would be prepared to have reintroduced into the bill the clause definitely stating that there shall be no amalgamation between the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways, I confess I do not know how the public of this country will interpret that statement. The bill provides for very extensive cooperation and joint use of facilities throughout the country, but I am afraid that this is just the thin end of the wedge to bring about amalgamation of the two railways. Much has been said in the country regarding the proposal of Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific, who urged at least amalgamation of management, and stated at different times that unification of control of some character would effect a saving in operation in the neighbourhood of $75,000,000 a year. I think it is only fair that the people should know that that statement was based on some 5,000 miles of railway mileage being torn up and service discontinued to a large number of people, as well as throwing out of employment many railway men, together with others who serve railway people in different parts of the country. So that as regards the concession of the Prime Minister as to reintroducing the clause prohibiting amalgamation, I think the people will be rather dubious as to its effect and they will be disposed to say they would prefer not to part with the control of their railway.

I think it can fairly be said that our railway problem has not been created in toto by either political party in this house. The speeches of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell), and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), clearly indicated that the Conservative party prior to 1920 played no small part in the creation of the present problem.

Mr. McGIBBON: A good deal smaller part than the Liberals.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I am not so sure about that. I will say to the hon. gentleman that if this problem has been intensified since 1920 it has been largely because of the policies inaugurated previous to that time by the Conservative party, and that it was done in order to give to the people of this country the railway service to which they are entitled and to bring the road up to a state of efficiency where the Canadian people would be proud of it. I think hon. members will agree that this has been accomplished. I am generous enough, Mr. Speaker, to go so far as to say that the railway problem is in reality not due to either political party, or perhaps it would be better to say that it is due to both political parties. I was almost going to be generous enough to say that the railway problem in the main was created by the Canadian people themselves. Certainly it is their problem today. Whether or not it was theirs in the beginning may be doubtful, but the fact is that the people demanded branch lines and other services. They may have been encouraged to request some of these services through propaganda and other inducements held out to them by certain sections of the country, but I think it is safe to say that in the main, and particularly so far as branch lines construction is concerned, the people wanted the branch lines and the country needed them. So I say again that to a large degree at least the problem is the responsibility of the Canadian people and it is for them to solve it.

The railway problem in Canada will not be solved simply by passing this legislation. The people are anxious that their burden of taxation, so far as the railways are concerned, should be lifted as much as possible, but I want to say to the minister and to the government that in working out a policy in connection with our railways the people must be given more consideration than appears to be shown in this bill. I say the people must be trusted in this matter; their interest in the railways cannot be delegated to any board of trustees that might be appointed by any government for all time to come. I think everyone appreciated very much the frank presentation made by the minister with regard to this matter, and I should like to say to him that I think he should make the same statement to the Canadian people as often as possible. I believe that if this railway problem is to be solved at all it will be done by presenting the facts in connection with our railways to the people frankly, honestly and conscientiously. In that way and no other we will secure their whole hearted cooperation in the solution of this problem. I have in mind cities, towns, villages, boards of trade and other community organizations that may be materially affected by the passing of this legislation. I believe they will make vigorous protests to the government if their particular services are unduly curtailed, but I submit that if the situation is placed before them frankly and honestly by the minister or the government, or both, the people will submit to hardship and the curtailment of service much more readily than if they have to submit to the arbitrary jurisdiction of a tribunal composed of three men.

I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is too much to ask the Canadian people to place their railway affairs in the hands of three men who shall have absolute control of the Canadian National system and all that belongs to it, while the Canadian people have nothing whatever to say as to the manner in which the railroad policy is carried out. Here we are setting up a board of three trustees to control the Canadian National railways. I believe that if the problem were placed before the people frankly and honestly they probably would not protest too vigorously against the curtailment of services which may take place. But when the time comes, as we all hope it will, that the railways present a better front to the Canadian people, the people have a right to demand that the Canadian National be handed back to the jurisdiction of their representatives. I must say that I have never had much sympathy with any government policy which attempts to delegate governmental responsibility to a commission. I do not say this with regard to the federal government only; I do not agree with the idea of any government handing over to a commission the control and administration of public utilities. After all is said and done the government must assume responsibility, and this bill merely provides the government with an opportunity to escape responsibility so far as our railways are concerned.

According to the bill there are to be three trustees and the first appointments are to be made by order in council. Probably that is all right. The term of office is for up to seven years, though some of the trustees may not be appointed for that period. According to the act, however, their successors are to be selected from a panel, which is to include the two remaining members of the board. In other words this is a device of the government whereby their appointees shall continue in office, so far as the Canadian National railway trustees are concerned. The point that confuses me is this: In the event of a change of government, which is always possible, the incoming government will be saddled with a board of trustees appointed by their predecessors in office, which they cannot possibly change, in spite of what my hon. friend the minister said. In the next parliament there may be a Liberal or a Cooperative Commonwealth government, but while we have a Conservative majority in the upper house there will be no chance of removing any of these trustees. Only one of these men is to be appointed as a full time trustee; presumably the other two are to work part time. I have no particular objection to the appointment of three trustees; I would as soon have three as five or seven or any other number, but I submit that they should be full time men. I think the job is big enough for that, and I hope the government will see to it that they give all their time to the handling of Canadian National railway affairs. Again I submit, however, that it is unfair to ask this House of Commons to appoint these men for a period of seven years, and to give them the chance of remaining there for all time to come. I should be prepared to support this bill if the government would undertake that these trustees should be appointed for a period of say three years or five years; and then, according to the success they had achieved in handling the affairs of the Canadian National Railways, succeeding governments could judge as to whether or not they should be reappointed. That is important. It is asking too much of the people's representatives to have them appointed for the long period which this bill contemplates.

A good deal has been said with reference to the different sections of the bill, but I submit again that the real importance of it is part I. The whole essential set-up of the bill is contained in that part, and if part I does not work satisfactorily then the rest of the bill does not matter. We have examples at the present time of cooperation on the part of the railways and an endeavour to curtail expenditures as far as humanly possible, so that I do not think we need worry about the other features of the bill. The important part is the selection of the men who are to operate the railways at the outset, and the term of their office. This section of the bill takes the absolute control of the Canadian National Railways away from parliament, the people's representatives, and gives to these three men unlimited powers to do as they see fit with the national system, regardless of its effect on the Canadian people. The object is, as everyone has said in this debate, primarily to effect measures of economy, and we are all in support of that. But I submit that the Canadian people should have the right to appeal from certain actions which this board might take. I think it is asking too much of the Canadian people to place absolutely under the control of three men the administration of the Canadian National Railways, men from whose decisions no one can appeal. They are virtually a dictatorship in the handling of the affairs of this railway, and that is unfair both to the people's representatives in this house and to the people themselves.

With respect to part II, subsection 2, if that can be interpreted to mean that these three men shall have the power to tear up tracks and utterly discontinue services through certain sections of the country, then I find myself in strong opposition to it. I can picture many communities which have been built up around a railway. People have gone in there with all their worldly resources in an effort to make a living, and I say that it is a national responsibility that they shall continue to have necessary transportation service supplied by the country. We cannot afford to sacrifice their interests and disregard them entirely through any action on the part of the board of trustees in tearing up tracks, discontinuing services and so on. I cannot conceive how parliament can agree to a policy that contemplates as farreaching powers as are here given.

In my humble judgment, and it is a very humble judgment, the greatest protection both the Canadian National Railways and public ownership have in this country is to be found right here in the House of Commons, and I cannot understand how members of parliament can give up that control. Some may argue that there are also in the House of Commons the greatest dangers to the Canadian National Railways and to public ownership. If that is so, then I suggest that we should adopt a code of ethics whereby it would be a disgrace to any member of parliament, or any member of the upper chamber, to use his influence, and the force of circumstances in which he might happen to find himself, with the Canadian National Railways or any other public utility, to thrust upon such organizations expenditures which were unjustifiable. It seems to me that the sooner we adopt some code of that sort the better it will be for the public utilities of the country.

There is one other point to which I would refer and in which I think the Canadian people are most vitally interested just now, with respect to the operation of the Canadian railways. The Canadian people, I think, realize their responsibility so far as railway matters are concerned, and in the effecting of economies they are most concerned with what might be called luxury expenditures in connection with the railway system. They are very strong in the opinion that such luxury services should be curtailed to the very limit. In this connection I might read a paragraph from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1931 at page 37:

> Unnecessary services should be abandoned. The expenses chargeable to passenger and allied services were 110·82 per cent of the revenue from the services, whereas for freight the corresponding figure was 68·62 per cent.

In other words, the passenger service took 110·82 per cent of the revenues, whereas the freight service cost to the railways required only 68·62 per cent of the revenue received. A similar comparison in the case of the Canadian railways would show, I believe, an even wider discrepancy because of our greater mileage and the fact that our population is less dense. This is one of the expensive items in railway operation which the people are particularly interested in. We have only to look at what has been done; we find railways running de luxe trains with very few passengers, building huge hotels and steamships that will never pay, and undertaking other services that could have been dispensed with. The money wasted on such items could have been used to reduce operating expenses and to cut down costs, and this would be reflected back in a reduction in freight rates and in passenger and express rates as well. This is one of the important things to which attention should be given, and something which the people are looking for. If these so-called luxury expenditures are not cut to the bone or practically eliminated, I am afraid the people of the country are not going to accept with very good grace the discontinuance of certain essential services which their communities have been enjoying in the past and which we hope will be continued in the future. We cannot afford to see communties that are entitled to service entirely cut off, and I hope there is nothing in this bill which can be interpreted to mean that these three trustees shall have the power to tear up railway tracks and to refuse to give needed service in certain communities. I submit that the tracks should be left there and at least a modified service given those communities which have been built up around such railways.

There is also reference in the Duff commission's report to truck and automobile service as a competitor with the railways. I understand also that the Minister of Railways has made representations to the provincial governments regarding uniformity of regulations so far as truck service is concerned. I just wish to submit this point without enlarging upon it: I hope no action is contemplated which will mean the elimination of the truck services. These trucks provide a very valuable class of service to certain communities and I submit that it would not be fair for the government to take such action as would put them out of business. The so-called freight truck might be curtailed to a certain extent, but if curtailed too much I am afraid that business concerns throughout the country will join together and purchase their own trucks and do their own freighting and I doubt very much if the government could control that to any extent.

The most important part of this bill is part I. If the government was prepared to accept the amendment which I mentioned a few moments ago, whereby the term of these trustees would be limited to a period of three or five years, I could support the bill. The set-up of this board is to be continued in perpetuity, even after the present government may have gone out of office, and I submit that is asking too much. These trustees are to be continued in office for all time to come, which means that the people of Canada will not be able to get this great public utility back under their control when conditions improve, as we all hope they will. I submit that at the present time the railways are cooperating very effectively and eliminating duplication, so that the other features of the bill, particularly those in part III, may not be called upon very much, and probably may not be used at all. The real kernel of the bill is part I, which sets up the board of trustees. I submit to the minister and to the government, and I hope the word will be passed along to the trustees, that what the Canadian people are looking for so far as railway operations are concerned is the preservation of the essential services to the various parts of the country and the elimination of unnecessary or luxurious services which do not bring in a return in keeping with the outlay made. The Canadian people are asking that there be no further expenditures of that kind.

I submit that it is the duty of the minister to place the whole railway problem frankly before the Canadian people and to ask for their cooperation. If he puts the matter before the Canadian people in as frank and as straightforward a manner as he put it before the House of Commons when introducing the bill some days ago, I think he will find a very decided willingness on their part to cooperate with this board of trustees in the working out of the railway problem of this country.

On motion of Mr. Factor the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), I desire to lay on the table of the house orders in council Nos. 434, 450 and 451, dated March the 14th, 1933.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 47, respecting The Canadian Anthracite Coal Company, Limited.—Mr. Stanley.

Bill No. 48, respecting an agreement made between the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company and the Northern Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. McDade.

Bill No. 49, respecting a certain patent application of Fred Charles Fantz.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto-High Park).

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 50 to amend the Railway Act (rate structure).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. REID: In the various appeals which have been made to the board of railway commissioners for a reduction in freight rates the argument has been advanced on behalf of the railway companies that because of physical and other conditions it was necessary for the railway companies to have rates greater in some sections than in others. The board of railway commissioners have made it clear, I believe, that under the act they have no authority to make decisions on broad lines in order to develop trade or help certain basic industries. This bill, Mr. Speaker, seeks to give such power to the board of railway commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), and if he is not able to answer at the moment perhaps he will take this as a notice. CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Hon. R. J. Manion for the second reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, no member of this house can afford to minimize the seriousness of the railway situation in Canada, aggravated as it has been by the depression prevailing in Canada and throughout the world, and any solution offered to meet the difficult problems facing the two great systems to-day ought to receive the sympathetic and thoughtful consideration of every member of this house. But, sir, that does not mean that we must swallow holus bolus a panicky piece of legislation which perhaps contains a few good clauses but which on the whole and reading between the lines means, I am afraid, the destruction of the principle of public ownership of our railway system.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in opening this debate. The hon. gentleman made a splendid speech; he gave a keen analysis of the transportation problem and made a dignified bid for the cooperation of hon. members on this side of the house. But, sir, unfortunately he was followed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), whose remarks entirely destroyed the effect of the speech of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is just your opinion.

Mr. FACTOR: I am expressing that as my opinion, but I am sure it will be the opinion held throughout Canada after the people read the Prime Minister's speech. The attempt made by the Prime Minister to cast all responsibility for our railway problems upon the Liberal party brought a political flavour into this debate which was entirely unwarranted and which should not have been injected because of the magnitude and seriousness of the problem confronting us. If this debate has become more or less of an acrimonious political argument during the last few days the Prime Minister has only himself to blame. The responsibility for the present situation cannot be lodged at the door of the Liberal party; it must be accepted by the parliament of Canada and shared by members on both sides of the house. There was one responsibility, however, which was assumed by the Liberal party, and which was discharged creditably and magnificently by the administration headed by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King). That was the responsibility of joining disjointed, disconnected, dilapidated, insolvent and bankrupt lines of railways into one great national system—a system which, despite the difficulties that are being experienced at the present time, the people of Canada ought to be and are justly proud of; a system which, for railroads, motive power and service, is second to no railroad system either on this continent or anywhere throughout the world.

The Prime Minister in his speech made the statement that the system is owned by the bondholders and not by the people of Canada, and in the light of that statement he asks for the cooperation of the Liberal party, the Liberal party which has for years stood and stands now and will always stand for the integrity of the national railways as a publicly-owned and publicly-controlled system. He asked the Liberal party for cooperation in relation to the empire trade agreement when he knew very well that that agreement was permeated with principles and policies diametrically opposite to the principles enunciated by the Liberal party. How can you hope, Mr. Speaker, for the cooperation of the Liberal party in connection with this measure in the light of the speech the right hon. gentleman made the other day?

I suggest to hon. members opposite in all kindness and sincerity that it is about time they stopped throwing around this two billion dollar baby, the Canadian National system. It was all very well for my hon. friends opposite to hug and fondle and love it when the baby was healthy and growing normally; but I suggest that it is unkind and unsportsmanlike of them now, when the baby is sick and anaemic and needs care and attention, to leave it on the doorstep of the Liberal party. Let us once for all recognize the fact that it is the child of the Canadian people, and as such we as the elected representatives of the people, irrespective of party, must care for it and maintain and support it until it grows to manhood and is able to support and maintain itself.

The transportation problem is not a new one in this country; it is as old as the history of Canada. From the very beginning of our history we have had a transportation problem; from the very beginning of our history public moneys have been expended, public credits have been pledged, and public lands given, as well as aid in other respects, both to water and to rail transportation. Why therefore should we regret the expenditure of all this money? Did it not enable the pioneers in the dawn of our history to hew out a civilization for themselves out of a wilderness? Did it not enable those who followed these pioneers to settle on the western plains? Did it not enable our people to open up the natural resources of the country for the development of this dominion and the welfare of mankind? We have spent a good deal of money on our railways, but we must not lose sight of the fact that we have also spent millions and millions of dollars, in aids to navigation, in the construction and maintenance of canals which are now a charge on the public treasury. It is all very well to say that millions have been spent on the railways, but I say that these millions are a national investment which was responsible for the development of Canada as it is to-day.

Another point to be considered is this. The promise of railway construction was an important part not only of the terms of confederation but of the terms of the agreement under which three or four provinces entered confederation—British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and the other maritime provinces. The obligations to the maritime provinces were embodied in an agreement to construct the Intercolonial railway from Halifax to the St. Lawrence, as well as to construct the Prince Edward Island railway. The agreement with British Columbia was to connect the Pacific coast with eastern Canada, and that was accomplished by the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway which, although originally started as a government railway, was ultimately taken over and completed as a privately-owned system. We talk about the Canadian Pacific railway being a privately-owned concern. Have we forgotten, however, the millions of dollars we gave to that railway at the time of its origin? Have we forgotten the millions of acres of land we gave that railway? Have we forgotten the miles of ready constructed roads handed over to that railway? At any rate the Canadian Pacific railway was completed in 1885 and a few years after the Canadian Northern came into existence. That was a line of railway from Winnipeg northwesterly to Edmonton and easterly to Port Arthur, which so far as the Edmonton branch was concerned was completed in 1905 and the Port Arthur branch in 1901. In 1903, parliament authorized the building of a national transcontinental railway from Winnipeg to Moncton as part of the Grand Trunk Pacific proposition, and in 1911 the Hudson Bay railway was undertaken as a government road. So that the Intercolonial, the National Transcontinental and the Hudson Bay railway were constructed with public money and operated by or on behalf of the government of Canada.

In 1903 the Grand Trunk Railway made application to parliament for the construction of a line from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast, and although this application was refused, ultimately the decision of parliament led to the construction of two transcontinental roads in addition to the Canadian Pacific railway, namely, (a) the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg west to the Pacific, together with the construction of a national transcontinental road, and (b) the Canadian National Railways, constructing their line westerly from Edmonton to the Pacific coast, and extending the line easterly from Port Arthur through the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. So that we have now these three transcontinental railroads trying to do business in a country of ten million people.

Time will not permit me to trace the history and the extent of the acquisition of various lines by the government of Canada. Suffice it to say that the government of this country is responsible for the ownership and operation of more than 22,000 miles of railway now included in the national system, a system which, as I have said, the people of Canada are justly proud of, a system which, despite tremendous burdens which the Canadian people are now shouldering, they are willing to continue operating; for they will never consent to the dismemberment of the national system of railways nor to amalgamation of that system with a private concern. The people will never consent, I say, to the dismembering of the national system nor to its amalgamation or operation as a privately-owned road.

That was the transportation problem. The government, as my hon. friends are aware, constituted the Duff commission to study this problem, to look into railway affairs in Canada; but quite improperly it failed to appoint on that commission a representative of that element of the community which is just as vitally interested in the problems of the road as are the bondholders and shareholders in England and the United States. I criticize the government for failure to appoint a representative of labour on that commission because I sincerely feel that had such a representative been on the commission, the report of the Duff commission would not have contained innuendos and direct statements about the high wages paid railway workers and about easing the burden of the railways by a reduction in wages. It should have contained some provision to take care of the human element in this problem. To a certain extent this bill does take care of the railway worker by section 2, which reads:

> The provisions of this act shall bind His Majesty and shall prevail over all inconsistent provisions of all other acts, but so that—
> (a) that part of section one hundred and seventy-nine of the Railway Act which relates to compensation of employees for financial loss caused to them by removal, closing or abandonment of any railway station or divisional point;

This legislation contemplates the laying off of many men because it provides that section 179 of the Railway Act shall continue in force. That section reads as follows:

> The company shall not, at any time, make any change, alteration or deviation in the railway, or any portion thereof, until the provisions of the last preceding section are fully complied with, nor remove, close, or abandon any station, or divisional point nor create a new divisional point which would involve the removal of employees, without leave of the board; and where any such change is made the company shall compensate its employees as the board deems proper for any financial loss caused to them by change of residence necessitated thereby.

I ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion): Is it fair to the railroadman who has invested his energy, his health and his very life in the service of the railway to be displaced from his job and be made a forgotten man? And the only compensation provided for him is that under section 179 wherein he will obtain a few hundred dollars for the loss of his residence. Is the government going to ask the people of Canada to approve of a piece of legislation which will put these railroad men out of employment, make forgotten men of them and provide only this type of compensation?

The causes of our railroad problem are set out on page 53 of the report of the Duff commission. There are seven contributory causes given, and I should like to refer briefly to these. The first cause given is:

> The over-development of railways beyond the immediate needs of the country.

The parliament of Canada must assume responsibility for creating that cause. There is no use in one party blaming the other, and even the people themselves have a share in this responsibility. What remedy is provided for this cause by this legislation? Sections 16 and 17 of the bill give authority to one man to abandon railway lines, to amalgamate services and to prohibit the construction of new lines. Parliament having created this condition, having authorized the construction of these railways, should not have taken away from it the right to say what railway lines should be abandoned, what services should be amalgamated and what lines should be prohibited from being constructed. Under the provisions of the Canadian National Act, the abandonment of lines or services could be carried out only with the consent of the governor in council, and all other agreements with respect to any change in lines had to receive the approval of the governor in council. I think this section in the bill should be strengthened so that the parliament of Canada, the elected representatives of the people, should have the say in these matters. But this legislation, Bill A, removes the control, even from the executive body, and parliament has no voice in the matter.

The second contributory cause is:

> Aggressive and uncontrolled competition between two nation-wide railway enterprises, a competition the more disastrous in that one of the competitors was publicly-owned and supported by the full resources of the dominion.

This cause seems to show the fine hand of some of the members of this commission who were not in favour of publicly owned railways. What remedy is provided by this legislation for the removal of cut-throat competition? The bill merely expresses the pious hope that the railroads will cooperate. I must confess that in the short experience I have had in this house, I have never seen a piece of legislation which asks that two companies shall cooperate. We might as well embody in the marriage contract the hope that the husband and wife will agree upon all occasions. No contract could provide for a condition of that kind.

The third contributory cause, and in my opinion the most important, reads:

> The reactions of the world trade repression which began in 1929 and has progressively increased in its severity with each succeeding year.

I humbly suggest that the commission might have added the following:

> The insane policy of Tory reactionary government in adopting a selfish, and narrow economic nationalism and the idea of a self-contained nation.

What remedy is provided in this legislation for this contributory cause? None at all. Our present problem has been created because no business is offering and no tonnage is moving. The bill provides no remedy. Perhaps the only remedy available is a change of government which I hope will come soon.

The bill does not deal with this cause nor does it deal with the remaining four contributory clauses, which time does not permit my reading to the house. This legislation merely touches the fringe of this gigantic railway problem. In so far as it attempts to eliminate cut-throat competition and extravagant expenditures I am in agreement, and so is every hon. member of this house, but we should not lose sight of the fact that it was not only our railroads that went through this mad dance of uncontrolled and jungle competition. What about our industries? Some of them ruined themselves by unrestrained competition and over-expansion. What about our own individual selves? Have we not been competing one with the other for more and more material wealth and a more luxurious existence? It was only the trend of the hectic prosperity which prevailed from 1928 to 1930. Those who were in charge of the management of the operation of our railroads were only human beings; they followed the trend of the times and were guilty of making some intoxicating expenditures. But the blame cannot be attached to our national system alone; the privately owned company was just as guilty of reckless expenditures in connection with hotels, steamers, resorts, and so forth. Let us not be too critical and condemn the whole national system because of these expenditures.

I have carefully examined the provisions of Bill A, and in all sincerity I want to register fourteen main objections to it. Some of these may involve merely matters of detail, but others are fundamental, going to the very root of this legislation, and these, in my humble opinion, after an analysis of the bill, are objections which absolutely destroy any benefits which this measure might afford in the solution of these problems.

First, the appointment of the first three trustees ought to be made from a panel to be provided by a nominating board instead of the appointment being made by the governor in council.

Second, all three trustees and not the chairman alone should devote their whole time to the performance of the duties of their office, and not be interested in any other companies.

Third, I believe there should be five trustees instead of three, but in any event one of them should be a representative of labour.

Fourth, the chairman of the board of trustees is given too much power under section 11. The provision that a majority vote be ineffective unless consented to by the chairman should be eliminated. The decision of a majority of the board should prevail.

[Mr. Factor.]

Fifth, there should be some provision prohibiting the trustees from issuing their own bonds. The government should look after this.

Sixth, the chief operating officer should be designated as manager rather than as president of the road.

Seventh, the seven year term as provided in section 6 perpetuates the trustees appointed by the government.

Eighth, removal from office or reduction in salary except by address of both houses should be eliminated.

Ninth, subsection 2 of section 14 as to routing of export freight through Canadian seaports is unnecessary and an unwarranted interference with the performance of the duties of the trustees and the internal management of the road.

Tenth, a section in the bill as originally submitted to the upper house provided that there should be no amalgamation. This section ought to be restored, but it alone is not sufficient. It should be strengthened. If this measure is going to pass, it should contain a definite and precise provision for the integrity of our national system of railroads under public ownership and control. There should be no ambiguity in the provisions of the measure in this respect.

Eleventh, section 16 is the most dangerous part of the legislation. It enables a one-man board to do everything, to amalgamate, to abandon lines, to lease lines, and this without the consent of parliament. Not only should the provisions of the Canadian National Railways Act be embodied in this measure, but it should be extended so as to provide that in addition to the governor in council the elected representatives of the people should approve before any amalgamation or any abandonment of lines takes place. After all, we must realize that settlements were made and new communities built up because of the construction of these branch lines, and surely before any of them are abandoned, the elected representatives of the people should have some say.

Twelfth, the creation of a tribunal as required in case of a disagreement should be enlarged so as to permit the public, the workmen or a municipality or any responsible body of citizens to initiate proceedings before the tribunal. As the measure stands now, only the railroads can initiate proceedings or cause the creation of the tribunal. It may happen that the railroads may have no need for a tribunal of this kind; they may agree to abandon a certain branch line or to the amalgamation of a certain service, the result being to the detriment and disadvantage of a community or a particular section of the country, and that community or that particular section is helpless to create a tribunal before which it can bring its grievances. This legislation, if it is to pass, should contain a provision enabling communities aggrieved or any responsible body of citizens such as a board of trade, to place their complaints before an arbitral tribunal.

Thirteenth, I am not so sure that it is in the interests of the public to have the chairman of the board of railway commissioners as chairman of all these tribunals as provided by the measure. He may be and undoubtedly is a man of ability, a man who has a great deal of experience, but if he is the chairman of all these tribunals he is going to be bound by precedent, by tradition, and I believe he will be unable to administer justice at all times. If any dispute arises which requires the creation of a tribunal there should be a different chairman in each case. Hearings of the tribunal should always be public except when some confidential information is required to be divulged.

Fourteenth, I certainly object to the entire dissociation from parliamentary control of the biggest business owned by the people of Canada, namely, our national railway system, and the vesting of it in the hands of a one-man board.

Time will not permit me to go into some of the other details of the bill. I want to conclude with these remarks: This legislation does not adequately meet the difficult problems facing our railways to-day. It may be a step in the right direction, but, as I pointed out before, it is taken at the sacrifice of the very principle, the foundation of public ownership, and time alone will prove the efficacy of the measure. The Canadian people are looking to this parliament to give them some relief in the way of lessening the burden of taxation under which they are being crushed. The people are carrying an unbearable load of federal, provincial and municipal taxation and they are looking to parliament to give them relief through drastic measures of economy in the government of our country and the administration of our railroads; but I say, full well realizing the tremendous burdens imposed by taxation and by the deficit of our national railway system, the people of Canada are willing, yes, ready to continue to carry this burden and will not consent to the dismemberment of this great national undertaking.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate for a short time in this debate, I do so because of a sense of duty to the riding that I represent in this chamber and also because of the sense of duty that I have to the great west, to Saskatchewan, the province from which I come, and, in the last analysis, to Canada which must always be an important factor in weighing pro and con one's vote in this house. I am taking part in this debate also because I am far from being enamoured of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific railway bill that has been introduced by the present government. In other words, the bill is not satisfactory to me.

Another reason why I am taking part in this debate is that I do not want this opportunity to pass without registering my protest against this measure originating in the Senate when it should have come in the first place before the people's representatives in this House of Commons. Lastly, I am speaking in this debate because I am satisfied that the more members who do so the wider will be the area of opposition to this legislation, which is covered pretty largely by a report from which I shall quote before I am through, but which report is prejudiced in more ways than one.

One of the conspicuous features of this debate up to the present time has been that so few members on the government side of the house have participated in it. I wonder why. I wonder if it is because they have no cause upon which to base a debate. I wonder if it is because they feel that this measure is satisfactory. I cannot conceive of any such notion on the part of any hon. member sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker.

The railways of this country have played a very important part in the opening up of western Canada. I would ask hon. members just where Canada would be to-day if it were not for the two great railway systems, both of which have been a great asset and have helped greatly to open up the four western provinces. But for them we would have no Canada as we know it to-day. We would have only a part of this dominion. When we are discussing this question we must not forget the phenomenal development of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, most of which has taken place from the first days of the present century.

Up to 1880, of railway development in the west, there was very little. But from 1880 to 1885 the Canadian Pacific railway system was in the building and in 1901 and 1903 were laid the foundations of the other great trans-

Canada systems—the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk and the National Transcontinental. They aided in the development of the great lone land known as "the west." It would indeed be a great lone land to-day if it were not for these two great railway systems. We speak of that country as a land of magnificent distances, which in itself indicates that the distances are so great that without railways settlement would be almost impossible, and development would not come as it should. But the railways daringly penetrated into the areas north and south and east and west, and then this great lone land took on new life. This land of magnificent distances became easier to settle and build up, and in its building up, first the railways, and then the automobile, together with human effort, played a conspicuous part and brought the west to what it is to-day.

Before proceeding may I say that I have not a word to say against the Canadian Pacific railway system, because from President Beatty and his staff right across Canada I have found, as a member of parliament, that those who are running that great railway have always been on the alert to do the best that was possible by the country. The treatment that was accorded me by that system has been in every way satisfactory. The Canadian Pacific Railway is wisely extending its branch line services throughout the prairie provinces. So far as the Canadian National railway system and its late lamented president, Sir Henry Thornton, is concerned, I received also from that system the very best of treatment. I found the late president the soul of honour and efficiency and every member of his staff and every representative of the system always eager to do their part in a constructive and businesslike manner in the opening up of backward yet productive sections in northern Saskatchewan. No politics so far as I could see ever actuated the late president or the officials of the National system in the parts of northwest Canada with which I am intimately acquainted.

Dealing with North Battleford more particularly at the moment, may I say that it is served by a main line and also by many branch lines. The main line that passes through North Battleford was built during the early part of the present century, running from Winnipeg and Saskatoon to North Battleford, and on to Edmonton. That is the old Canadian Northern main line. Then branch lines were built to Prince Albert and northwestward to Edmonton. But until after 1925 that part of Saskatchewan was not served as it ought to have been served by the railways. If you took a poll to-day of the electors in that part of Saskatchewan I am sure that you would find very few of them opposed to the sound development policy that was carried on by the late president of the Canadian National railway system. So far as conditions at the present day are concerned, in the North Battleford federal riding we have some construction not completed, and it has remained uncompleted because of the "penny-wise and pound foolish" economies which are being effected by the present government. May I point out that every mile which remains uncompleted would pay if built and bring in revenue to the National system, and help to meet the interest on its capital structure. Why this government is not pursuing a policy of sound constructive effort in northern Saskatchewan in regard to branch lines I do not know. Surely when you build a grade of sixty-nine miles, and then leave the ties by the side of the grade rotting, and allow the grade itself to fall to pieces, surely that is not economy. It is not sound business; it is not fair treatment; and I am here to-day to echo my protest against the retrograde policy pursued by the Minister of Railways and his department and the government in tying the hands of the Canadian National railway system and depriving of railway facilities that great area of country where there is business to be had for the railways, and where branch lines ought to be constructed, and where every mile constructed would mean enhanced revenue for the national system.

Coming to the question of the Duff commission which inquired into the railway situation in this country, I notice that the number of commissioners was seven; one from the maritime provinces, one from Quebec, two from Ontario, one from the western provinces, one for the United States bondholders, and one for the United Kingdom bondholders. I do not know why we had to imperialize the commission by appointing a representative from Great Britain. That may be all right, and it may be all wrong. Nor do I know why we should Americanize the commission by appointing an American to tell us in Canada what to do about our own railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Canada first.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, I would say that here was a place to carry out the Canada first principle, and have a full-fledged Canadian commission inquire into the Canadian railway situation and make a report. Instead of having two representatives from Ontario on the commission I would have had one. I would have had one from the three prairie provinces and one from British Columbia. Do not mistake me. I am not arguing simply for geographic structure; I am not arguing to have geographic areas represented, but I am arguing that Canada as a whole, the whole nation, should be represented. In this respect there was only one man from Winnipeg to the ocean—a distance of 2,000 miles. Who was that man? He was a university president—a very splendid man—but one who could not be expected to know much about railway matters or to pronounce wisely or constructively upon the problems to be dealt with in any far-reaching investigation into the transportation question.

More than that, there was no representative of labour on the commission, and no farmer representative. Why should not the commission have had a representative of the great agricultural industry of this country, the industry which in 1930 the Prime Minister was going to protect to a point of prosperity. Then, when he appointed the commission he had not enough thought for agriculture even to give it a representative, when an inquiry was being had into transportation matters of special significance to farming. He gives no representative to labour. What is he doing? By his words, by his actions, by his appointments he is simply crucifying farming, crucifying labour; that is all he is doing. He is keeping them from having a voice in the report of a commission which will have far reaching effects upon the transportation, agriculture and labour problems of Canada.

We are told that every great event has its roots sunk deep in the annals of the past. The report of this commission is an event; I would not say it is a great one. Every near great event has its roots sunk not so deep in the annals of the past, and every minor event has very few roots to sink into the past or anywhere else. May I say the report of this commission is therefore not a great event or a near great event, but rather a minor one. This document is only an average event—a poor average event at that. I shall endeavour to show why it is a very, very minor affair, and why all the statements contained in it should not be heralded far and wide as the last word in the investigation of Canadian railway problems. I shall deal now with some of the prejudiced presentations made by this commission. If I can show that the commission has made mistakes, has made presentations that are neither sound nor unprejudiced, then I for one, as a member of this House of Commons, will have very little faith in the report of such a commission.

Let us turn, for instance, to the nine-year statement of comparative earnings shown at page 15 of this report. What do we find? When dealing with the Canadian National system we find included in that system all the lines in the United States and in Canada. In other words so far as the commission is concerned, we are looking at the Canadian National system from an international viewpoint. But what about the Canadian Pacific Railway. We are not looking at it from an international viewpoint, but from a strictly national viewpoint. In my estimation we have there the first prejudiced presentation of the commission. Comparisons made by it are not sound. It is comparing the Canadian Pacific Railway, a Canadian system, with the Canadian National Railways, a Canadian-American system. It compares a national system with an international system. When we think of comparisons our minds turn to the comparison of similar, not different things. In that respect I believe the prejudice of the commission is clear and plain.

Let me go further. On the same page we find figures showing the interest paid on securities in the hands of the public. The figure shown for the Canadian Pacific Railway is approximately $122,000,000 and for the Canadian National Railways $402,000,000 odd.

Mr. MANION: I believe the hon. member is incorrect.

Mr. McINTOSH: If we take the mileages as about 23,000 for the Canadian National Railways and 16,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and apply the average security per mile of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Canadian National Railway, what do we find? We do not find the figures I quoted, at all. We find a different set of figures. For the Canadian Pacific Railway we have the same figure, about $122,000,000, and for the Canadian National Railways $177,000,000. In other words, the first figures as given by the commission were three and a half to one; in the second place the figures turn out to be about one and a half to one. Therefore, when we compare the two figures we find that the first is about two and a third times out.

Mr. MANION: Would the hon. member tell me, as a matter of information, what the $122,000,000 is?

Mr. McINTOSH: Interest paid on securities in the hands of the public.

Mr. MANION: Of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes.

Mr. MANION: It is about one-sixth of that.

Mr. McINTOSH: Turn to page 15 of the report and you will find it is exactly what I said. That is another prejudiced presentation I find in the report of the commission.

Let me turn now to another. On the same page in the report we find an item dealing with rentals for rolling stock. In that connection the Canadian National Railways is debited with over $23,000,000, and the Canadian Pacific Railway is credited with $15,000,000. In other words, the commission has drawn the attention of every reader of the report to the fact that there is a difference between one rolling stock rental and another rolling stock rental of approximately $38,000,000. What is the fact? The commission makes the statement that:

> Whereas in 1922 the Canadian National had 12·7 per cent more passenger train cars than the Canadian Pacific, in 1931 it had 18·1 per cent more. In 1922 the Canadian National Railways had 34·4 per cent more freight cars than the Canadian Pacific and, in 1931, 40·9 per cent more. The average mileage operated (first main track) of the Canadian National system was 39·6 per cent greater than that of the Canadian Pacific. The ratio of freight car ownership of the Canadian National system is thus found to approximate closely the difference in the actual mileage operated by the two systems. Generally speaking, the Canadian National has been abundantly equipped.

Well, the Canadian National system is abundantly equipped now, but what about it in 1923, 1924 and 1925? In what condition was it up until the last year or two? The commission did what? Whether purposely or not, it failed to note that while in 1922 the Canadian Pacific cars were modern and up to date, those of the Canadian National system were old wooden boxes which had to be replaced, because other roads refused to accept them on their lines. That is another prejudiced presentation, and when I read it I naturally come to the conclusion I can have no confidence at all in the report.

But let me proceed; let us turn to capital expenditures as they are shown at page 19 of the report. We are told again that the Canadian Pacific system is confined to Canada while, as a matter of fact, it is not. The Canadian National system is again presented in an international light. What difference does it make? It makes a difference in the capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways of at least $58,000,000 not mentioned by the commission at all. Then, if we take the figures at page 19, and divide the Canadian National Railways capital expenditures by the number of miles in the system, what do we get? We get about $19,000 per mile. If we take the capital expenditures of the Canadian Pacific Railway and divide them by the number of miles in the system we get what? We get approximately $20,000 per mile. What does that mean? It means that from the standpoint of capital expenditures the Canadian National system did not spend as much as the Canadian Pacific system, although it appears to have excited the commission a great deal, and prompted it in the report to take a fling at the Canadian National system wherever possible.

Now let me take up another point. At page 52 of the report the commission said:

> When considering the scale upon which branch line extensions and acquisitions, as well as hotel expenditures were made, and railway and steamship services duplicated, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the board of directors and the management of national railways were amenable to political influence and pressure, which it would have been in the public interest to have withstood.

This is a sweeping statement, and no doubt the commission thought it very eloquent, but what do we find? The investments of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific are as follows:

	Canadian National	Canadian Pacific
Branch line construction.. ..	$ 73,256,570	$ 65,067,288
Branch line acquisition..	18,780,309	5,347,378
Hotels..	31,828,234	71,148,772
Steamships..	7,201,117	6,339,302
Ocean steamships..	.....	50,271,336
	$131,066,230	$198,174,076

So after all the Canadian National did not spend money like water, as the government and its propagandists say; they did not throw money to the winds. They took cognizance of wise railway development and safeguarded every dollar of public money spent on branch lines and railway development. I would change that paragraph with regard to political influence and pressure to read thus: "When considering the scale upon which branch line extensions and acquisitions as well as hotel expenditures were made, and railway and steamship services duplicated, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the board of directors and the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway were amenable to influence and pressure it would have been in the public interest to have withstood."

I would balance the picture; my figures go to prove that if such a statement should have been made at all it ought to have been made with regard to the Canadian Pacific in the first place rather than the Canadian National.

That is the fifth prejudiced presentation I find in this report, and therefore you cannot wonder if I do not put much credence in it. I do not believe it was necessary to have a royal commission to investigate transportation in Canada; I think that investigation should have been carried on by the Minister of Railways and his department. I believe he could have saved a great deal of public money had he done so. The minister quoted Sir Henry Thornton and President Beatty as having put themselves on record in favour of a transportation commission, but I do not think their statements had very much effect on the policy of the government. I believe the government determined to appoint this commission, and I do not think they should try to protect themselves in any rearguard action by saying that the sentiments of the presidents of the two roads had anything to do with the creation of the commission at all.

In his speech the minister said this was a cooperative bill. When I heard that I thought of that quotation from Shakespeare, which I might paraphrase as follows, "Methinks the Minister of Railways doth protest too much." This is not a cooperative bill at all; it is a coercive bill. Anyone who reads the bill must realize at once that it is compulsory from first to last, and that is why I am opposed to it. I thought the minister made a splendid speech; he discussed the transportation problem dispassionately, as I think it should be done. At the same time I think it is well that we should put ourselves on record for or against this measure, and so far as I am concerned I am against it. The minister went on to say:

> There is, however, every expectation, particularly after the events of the last week, that we shall in the near future experience that revival in business which we confidently anticipate.

We are to have a revival in business because of the upheaval which occurred in the United States, according to the minister. I do not think we shall have any such revival as a result of some international event; I believe international action will have something to do with it, but I believe a business revival, like charity, should begin at home. So I think it would have been better if the minister had put himself on record as being opposed to the fiscal policy of his own party. Only if his party is driven out of power will we experience a national revival which, in common with an international revival, really will get us somewhere.

Then the minister went on to say that as a matter of fact it was not so much the wheat and grain traffic that was the paying traffic of the railways, as the fact that the people of the west were selling their products at a reasonable price and had the money with which to purchase goods from some other section of the country, thus providing return traffic, and the total traffic brought about the prosperity of the railways. That is sound logic, but I do not think we are going to have any return traffic while the policies of this government are in operation. I believe we must have a different policy. We sell our wheat, our cattle, our pigs and so on for almost nothing, and we have no buying power which would mean full cars coming back from eastern Canada. Therefore I find it hard to believe that there will be any real revival of business until this government is driven out of office.

Mr. GOTT: That will be a long time.

Mr. McINTOSH: Not so very long; I should say a number of months hence will see its end. When the government came into power employment was at a higher level than it is to-day. Now employment is more than twenty-five per cent less than it was in 1930, and unemployment has risen from eight or nine per cent to twenty-five and a half per cent. Parliament has been departmentalized; parliamentary rule has been scrapped and ministerial authority has taken the place of parliament. The Canada first high tariff policy has turned out to be the Canada last business policy, with the result, as the minister himself told us, that we have low prices, few markets and very little buying power. Naturally the cars come back empty from the east, and Canada finds itself in a demoralized business condition.

In the few moments left at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, there are one or two other points to which I should like to refer in connection with this bill which resulted from this prejudiced report. With clauses A, B and C of the preamble I could agree, if I had to, but part I of the bill which provides for the appointment of three trustees, though really there is to be only one superman who will administer the property and operate the road, is entirely unacceptable. I would rather think that instead of three full time men composing the board there should be five, one of whom should represent labour: I believe the result would be more satisfactory. More than that, I would not have the board appointed for seven years and I would not allow it to perpetuate itelf. I would have it operate on the majority rule, and I would not give it the full power of veto. I do not think it should have dictatorial powers; I do not think we should have even a figment of autocratic control in this country in anything. I am afraid the remedy may prove to be worse than the disease itself. With regard to the removal of that board from office I think this parliament should have control, and there should be no need to have an address presented from both houses. The house which controls the revenue and which represents the people of the country should have the whole say as to when this board should abdicate in order to get rid of a one man board that does not and never can command the support of the Canadian people.

More than that, the men who are appointed to this office should be men who are firmly convinced of the possibilities and the practicability of the Canadian National as a publicly-owned system. The trustees should be made responsible to the minister of the crown, the minister to parliament and parliament to the people. We want no more dictatorial boards in this country. We had enough of dictatorial power in the war for a period of forty-eight months, as a result of which there was added to the financial burden of this country something like $1,700,000,000. Had the Laurier policy been adopted during the war this would have been avoided. We should have conscripted capital and paid for the war as we went along. That policy was turned down however, and we fiddled and fooled with a policy of union government, which was in reality a Tory government, with the result that to-day we have added to the financial burden of the country more than a billion dollars that should have been liquidated between 1914 and 1918. And now hon. gentlemen opposite are now trying to damn the Canadian National system because the financial structure is topheavy, notwithstanding the fact that they sat by for forty-eight months and allowed the country to run so loosely that millions of dollars were squandered on the pretext of winning the war.

In regard to part II of the bill, with respect to cooperation, I would say that the two railways are cooperating at the present time. They are cooperating voluntarily and that is the only true kind of cooperation; there is no other way of bringing about cooperation, and public opinion as a driving force must inevitably bring the two roads together in such a way as to secure the utmost economy. There is no need to hold a big club over the railways, the railway department or parliament. If the roads were left to cooperate voluntarily—wisely directed by the responsible minister—I am satisfied that the railway problem of this country could be worked out satisfactorily and the department would in this way hold its responsible position as a department of the crown. Furthermore, the responsibility of parliament to the people would be upheld and Canada could look the world in the face and feel that she was standing on solid ground, and not sacrificing those principles of parliamentary rule which have been handed down to us from the past.

With respect to part III of the bill dealing with the arbitral tribunal, in my opinion this is another piece of dictatorship and I am not free to accept it. So far as the struggle for responsible government is concerned, may I read a passage or two from Edward Porritt's Evolution of the Dominion of Canada. And here, let me make this observation. If hon. gentlemen opposite suppose for a moment that Liberals have forgotten the struggle for parliamentary rule in this country they are sadly mistaken. We have not forgotten that struggle; we stand on the sound ground of individual and political liberty, and we want to have that principle applied to all parliamentary government and all parliamentary action. So long as that principle is not adhered to, then I say that we are not on anything like solid ground. Here is what this author says with regard to the important question of responsible government in this country:

> The claim for responsible government was conceded in 1841. The concession was withdrawn in 1843, but was completely and finally conceded in 1849. Its first and its final concessions were due, not to anything actually stated in the act of 1840, although that memorable act was the key to all the constitutional freedom now enjoyed by all the dominions.

Observe those words, "all the dominions"; not merely all Canada, but all the dominions. In other words, we unlocked the door to parliamentary freedom to all the dominions under the British crown:

> They were due to the statesmanship and democratic spirit of Sydenham, Bagot and Elgin, three of the four governors general who were in office from 1839 to 1850, and also, it is important to note, to the new policy literally forced on Downing street by the Liberals of Upper and Lower Canada, who were in control of the legislative assembly of the united provinces, during the first decade of the constitution of 1840.

There you have in outline the struggle of the past for responsible government in this country, and as a member from western Canada and a Liberal I say that unless the legislation passed by this house is in keeping with responsible government, fought for and won in the past, I am opposed to it. This bill, from its first word to its last, so far as I can see, is contrary to those principles, and therefore as a Liberal and a Canadian I oppose the measure in parliament to-day.

What about the rights of labour under this bill? May I here read what Abraham Lincoln said in his first annual address to congress, dated Washington, December 3, 1861. The words I am about to quote will show what that great man had to say about the relationship between capital and labour, and for my part I think he was on fundamental ground. We are not on fundamental ground so far as this bill is concerned, and we have not been for the last two or three years with respect to labour; on the contrary, we have been on slippery ground, abominable ground, and have been drifting towards ruin. Here is what Abraham Lincoln said:

Labour is prior to and independent of capital.

Deny that if you will.

Capital is only the fruit of labour, and could never have existed if labour had not first existed. Labour is the superior of capital, and deserves much the higher consideration.

How do my hon. friends opposite like that?

Capital has its rights, which are as worthy of protection as any other rights. Nor is it denied that there is, and probably always will be, a relation between labour and capital producing mutual benefits.

Labour, says Abraham Lincoln in this passage, is the superior of capital and deserves much the higher consideration, and it is because of that higher consideration that I have risen this afternoon and taken my stand as a member of this House of Commons, in behalf of labour under this bill. The labour organizations of the two railways asked for certain things. First, they asked for the welfare and interest of the human element as against the dollar bill. I do not believe this bill will ensure that, and on that ground I am opposed to it. Second, they asked for the continuance of a proven policy with regard to labour relations prevailing from one decade to another in the past in Canada. Third, they say that if labour were amply safeguarded and if capital would play the game as it should with labour, labour would put forth its whole effort in the way of cooperation and play its part in the running of the two great railway systems, in the interests of the dominion. Fourth, they declare that labour favours preserving the identity of the Canadian National railway system. So does the Liberal party. Fifth, labour is opposed to the appointment of trustees without a representative on that body. And, sixth, labour says that the time has come when the capital structure of the Canadian National system should be written down, a structure which was inflated and still is, and in which at least $1,300,000,000 should be written off.

Labour wants the system to be given a chance to function; it wants the system to be given a chance to breathe; it wants the system to be given an opportunity to go forward and serve Canada in a decent and honourable manner. More than that, labour has declared itself opposed to part III of the bill, the part that relates to compulsory cooperation. It favours the reference of any dispute to the railway commission or any other satisfactory industrial functioning body clothed with plenary investigating power, and also the calling of a conference to deal with motor truck competition, in which the various provincial highway departments and labour shall participate, with a view to working out a successful policy on labour and business principles in the management of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Perhaps there has been no bill before the House of Commons at this or any other session which was of so much importance to the railways of Canada and to the people of the country as the bill which is now before us. This legislation will have far-reaching effects and I have listened with considerable interest to the speeches that have been made both in its defence, by members of the government, and in opposition by members on this side. Needless to say, everyone in Canada who has a stake in the country is tremendously interested in the idea of making a success of public ownership. I doubt if there are many hon. members or many people in Canada who do not feel that the least that can be done is to give the best opportunity possible to the public ownership and administration of this great utility. That was the object which the recent government had in mind. I for one am going to confess that when I joined the government in 1922 I had some doubt whether a great commercial enterprise of this kind could be successfully managed and operated under government auspices, but after ten years' experience and despite the criticism made of the administration and operation of the line, it can be said that it has been quite as efficient as its privately owned competitor. I do not think anyone who has given careful consideration to the history of the Canadian National Railways for the last ten or twelve years will dispute that statement. I know there are hon. gentlemen in this house who hold the opinion that a privately owned system is much superior to a publicly owned system, but those who criticize the publicly owned system, and indeed some of those who criticize the privately owned system, should bear in mind that throughout all these years the people of Canada have enjoyed lower rates, both in passenger and freight traffic, than have our neighbours to the south upon their privately owned railways. That is something which we must not forget.

Mr. CANTLEY: That is not universally true.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Almost universally true. My hon. friend should not complain.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do complain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend's locality is enjoying a preference of twenty per cent over the rest of us.

Mr. CANTLEY: The rates are still fifty per cent higher than they were in 1912.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not speaking of the rates in effect in 1912; I am speaking of those which have been in effect for the past ten years and comparing them with the rates which have been in effect in the United States. We should not forget this fact when we are critical of expenditures made for whatever purpose upon these lines.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). I agree with him in his plea that we should view this question dispassionately and, as far as humanly possible, not from a political standpoint. Personally, I propose to view it in that way. At times I resented some of the criticisms made of the administration of this railroad while it was under the control of the government of which I was a member, but I think it can be said that most hon. members of the house have tried to be fair in their criticism of this great national institution.

No one will deny, and the minister does not deny, that the situation with respect to our railways, both national and privately owned, is extremely critical. But we must not forget that the same thing can be said, with scarcely a single exception, of every other business in this country. We all know of industries which were thought to be stable and beyond question as to their financial standing but which now find themselves in difficulties. We must admit also that mistakes have been made in the management of our railroads, but we must remember that this management was human the same as the management of other institutions, not only in our country but in every other country of the world. These are days when our faith in our country and its commercial institutions is rather severely shaken.

Perhaps I may be pardoned for interjecting a little politics at this point. While the present government perhaps cannot be held responsible for the major difficulties of to-day, it can be held responsible for a considerable portion of the difficulties facing this institution which we are now discussing as well as other institutions in the country. The fact that barriers have been placed in the way of trade has contributed in no small degree to the difficulties of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways. I cannot conceive of any individual engaged in the transportation business who would be in favour of trade restrictions to such an extent that they practically force the cessation of operations. I made a computation some time ago and found that we have spent something in the neighbourhood of over five billions of dollars upon our transportation system. By this I mean the steamships, the necessary port facilities and everything needed for the transporting of goods in and out of the country. Nearly one-half of that huge amount has been expended with a view to the carrying on of international trade. When we erect barriers against that trade, is it any wonder we find ourselves in our present position? Is it any wonder we are seriously alarmed about our financial situation and particularly about the situation facing our transportation system?

I have no complaint to make as to some of the suggestions made by the minister, but I have a great many complaints in respect to the provisions of this bill. I agree with what many of my colleagues have said, that there is evidence in this bill from start to finish of the unloading upon or the delegating of responsibility to a board over which this government, this house or this parliament will have little or no control. I am entirely in favour of a reduction in the board of directors, but I am sorry that the minister has interjected trustees in their place. I would be entirely in favour of a board of three directors, and I must disagree with many of my hon. friends on this side when they say that there should be sectional representation upon the board. If complaint could be made of any one thing it would be that in the past we attempted to give sectional representation and representation to labour and other crafts. All of this was unnecessary and in my belief led to some of the difficulties which were experienced in the administration. I am entirely in favour of a board of three directors. I refuse to call them trustees, and I shall have some opinions to offer later on with respect to this matter.

I should like to state what I consider to be a few of the salient facts with respect to this situation, and in doing so I shall not go back beyond 1920. Let me refer to the evidence given by Mr. Hungerford before the commission, because it meets entirely with my approval and because he says, but in a much better way, what I would wish to say. I shall not cite the statement which he made as to conditions prior to 1921, but this is what he says about the situation in that year as it affects the Canadian National Railways.

The situation which confronted the new management of the consolidated properties was an extremely difficult one and it had a great multitude of problems to solve. The Grand Trunk Pacific and The Canadian Northern were not entirely completed nor equipped for operation and the earlier constructed lines of the latter company were in a very poor physical condition; while the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial were badly run down as a result of war pressure and financial limitations. All of these groups were very short of rolling stock and what was owned was generally in a poor condition of repair.

On practically all of the lines the condition with respect to ties, rails, ballast, bridges, buildings, and other features of like character was most unsatisfactory; terminal facilities required enlargement and rearrangement to permit of satisfactory and economical operation; the coordination of the various groups so as to operate as a single system involved the construction of numerous connecting lines and rearrangement of facilities. Altogether, the physical condition was such as to preclude giving even reasonably satisfactory service.

Beyond all this, the management was faced with the following combination of conditions:—

(a) Property bankrupt by a very wide margin, i.e., capitalized far beyond its earning power.

(b) Lowest average traffic density of any large system in North America.

(c) Very low freight rates as compared with other countries.

And I am confident Mr. Hungerford was comparing it on that occasion with United States lines.

(d) Necessity of spending large amounts of money to keep certain lines in condition to operate at all.

(e) The necessity of spending large amounts to place the property in reasonable and economical working condition.

(f) The insistent demand of the public for the construction of branch lines, grade separations, stations and hotels, and for a higher standard of service generally.

That was the condition of these lines in 1921. It was well said by both the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) who, speaking of this question, went more into detail with respect to these matters, that fair value—and I shall perhaps except one or two items—was obtained for the expenditure of the money that went into the lines. In 1930, when our government went out of office, we felt that the lines were in such a position that in at least one or two years they would be taking care of the interest charges due to the public. I well remember, and I heard with a good deal of satisfaction, the statement of Sir Henry Thornton on that occasion and indeed the observation of the present Minister of Railways after he took office, that so successful was this institution that within a period of three years it would be in a position to pay its way. I know that difficulties arose and I repeat that while the government of the day were not responsible for all of them, they must be prepared to assume a fair share of responsibility for some of the difficulties in which the railroads now find themselves. Hon. gentlemen opposite, rightly or wrongly, felt they were going to improve not only the railways but commerce generally by the policies which they said they would put into effect if returned to office. In that regard they kept their word; they did put their policies into effect, with disastrous results. I sincerely trust that when the budget is brought down next week they will remove some of these obstacles to trade and give some assistance in rehabilitating the railways.

Speaking of 1930, one must not forget the added burden that was thrown upon the management of our railways by the employees who were kept on and who were really not required in the service. All credit is due to the government for keeping them on, but this caused an addition to the burden of railway administration. It is true that these men had to be employed somewhere and the government did their part in providing employment or retaining them in employment when their services were really not required, but to that extent they made the position of the railways just that much more difficult.

I want to deal now for a moment or two with what Mr. Hungerford suggested and which in my opinion should be the main features of the bill. I am leaving out his evidence and simply stating what I believe was sane and reasonable advice to the commission in assisting them to bring in a report that would be satisfactory and would lead to some solution of the difficulty. Let me at this point say that I do not wish to confuse any evidence that might be given by Mr. Hungerford with my own deductions with respect to some of the difficulties under which the railways are operating. This is his suggestion:

Having regard to all the circumstances I believe the best ultimate results will follow the adoption of the following policies:—

(1) Maintain present status and organization of the two railways.
(2) Cooperation between the two companies as far as feasible subject to the condition that in any case, neither company shall suffer loss, and that one or the other, or both, shall secure substantial advantage.
(3) Continue the present policy of effecting every practicable economy in operation.
(4) Take all reasonable measures to combat highway competition.
(5) Restrict capital expenditures to:
(a) Items necessary for safety of operation.
(b) Items ordered by competent authority or obligation assumed by agreement.
(c) Items which will undoubtedly earn a full return on investment.
In view of past experience and future prospects as I see them, I believe that these measures will best meet the circumstances, particularly as there are certain encouraging features in the Canadian National Railways situation as follows:—

And I think this is absolutely true.

(1) During the period under review, operating expenses have been increased much above normal by rehabilitation work and this may now be regarded as fairly complete.

The minister took considerable credit for the reduction in operating expenses effected during the last year or so.

Mr. MANION: I did not take any credit personally.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am merely citing what my hon. friend said. If he would prefer to give the credit to the officials of the company I am quite content. The above mentioned statement confirms the reason it was possible to put into effect many of these savings. I am not going to enter into that because, as I said before, former speakers have covered the ground fairly thoroughly. But I want to reiterate that the money expended upon these lines, resulting in the position in which they found themselves in 1930, renders it much easier to-day to effect economies than otherwise would have been the case. He continues:

(2) Capital expenditures in the future will be on a much reduced scale as the general improvement of the lines has been largely completed and no considerable new mileage is likely to be constructed.

Mr. MANION: What is the date of that, please?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was the evidence given before the royal commission. Quoting further from Mr. Hungerford's evidence:

The railway is now operating in every way on a more economical basis and with a return to a more nearly normal trend of earnings it will undoubtedly earn the interest upon securities in the hands of the public and something besides.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

I read that into Hansard because I for one implicitly believe that that statement is true. I believe that with reasonable economy and efficient management there is no doubt at all that the line will do as was suggested by Mr. Hungerford in giving his evidence. Despite the fact that the horizon looks very dark at the moment, I do not think it does very much good to be talking about it, I believe that we should if at all possible cooperate in measures which will bring about a return of prosperity. Cooperation may not be possible because we seem to be so widely divided upon perhaps the most important question that we have to discuss in this house. I have cited the evidence given by Mr. Hungerford because he is a man of very wide experience, with thirty-five years spent in railway operation, and he states that in his opinion the future is not so dark as it is depicted by some of our friends who are critical of the railway itself.

Coming to the bill itself, I have stated that I am entirely in favour of a board of three directors. With such a board I believe that a lot of sectional influence can be eliminated and perhaps we can get away from certain expenditures which have been incurred in the past because of sectional influence, not political but sectional, which was brought to bear upon the administration.

I am also in favour of giving the board wide powers, and in favour also of the board having control over every vestige of administration. But I might state here the reason why I differ from the statement of the Prime Minister. I do not for a moment pose as one with the wide knowledge he may have with respect to law, but when he stated in the House of Commons the other day that it was not the people of Canada but the bondholders who owned the road and were in control of the system, I think that his statement was very wide of the mark. If you, Mr. Speaker, or I were a bondholder and we were not receiving our interest, I wonder against whom we would take recourse in respect to the interest on a government-guaranteed bond, whether it would be against the property itself, or against the government which was behind that guarantee. I merely suggest that in passing because I am not going to take time now to enter into an argument as to the correctness of the statement of the Prime Minister. I assume, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada do own this enterprise, and that they are responsible as regards the bonds of nearly every private bondholder who has invested his money in this enterprise, and the people of Canada will have to see this enterprise through.

It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that I object to the name "board of trustees," because it has all the semblance of a board placed in charge of an institution in bankruptcy, and I do not believe that this line is in bankruptcy. Despite the fact that our friends opposite are placing this country in a very hazardous position by pursuing their policies, I do not believe that Canada is on the verge of bankruptcy either. I believe that the people of Canada, as in the past, will come through their present difficulties.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Under a Liberal government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) says, under a Liberal government. I will qualify my statement to this extent, that if this government remains in office it will have to change its policies to bring the country through its present difficulties.

Again I reiterate that I am entirely in favour of a board of three directors for the reasons that I have given, and to that extent I will support the bill. But when we are conferring such exceedingly wide powers upon the board of trustees it does seem to me, despite the promise of the Prime Minister to reinsert in the bill the provision against amalgamation, that we are not sufficiently safeguarded against the disposal of the assets of the property, and when the proper time comes, in committee of the whole on the bill, I propose to move an amendment providing that the board shall not in any way dispose of the properties comprising the system without the consent of the governor in council. Despite a provision against amalgamation, which the Prime Minister promises will be reinserted in the bill, it does seem to me that under the provisions of the bill as it stands, the board can proceed to divest itself of the property. Then, in another part of the act, further powers which are very wide indeed are conferred upon the board with respect to the arbitral tribunals. In a sentence, Mr. Speaker, what I object to in this legislation is that it places in the hands of this board powers that they should not have. I repeat that I am prepared to give them every power to deal with the administration of the line and the operation of the road without let or hindrance, and they can spend the revenues that are derived from the operation of the road, as was the privilege of the old board; but to say that the board can lease or otherwise dispose of the properties of the company without the consent of the governor in council seems to me to be going much too far in the way of handing over authority to the board.

Then as regards their appointment, what in the world is the necessity for all the provisions embodied in the bill in that respect? It seems to me that the system now in vogue under which the responsibility is placed upon the government itself and the governor in council, for the appointment of members of the board, should remain. I do not know what on earth is the necessity for the enactment that reduces the responsibility of the governor in council for these appointments. I am not going to quibble over the term of office, whether it should be five or seven years, but I do say that with respect to the appointment of this board of trustees, and with respect also to the disposal of the property in any way, both these matters should be in the hands of and under the control of the governor in council.

Mr. MANION: Some of the strongest protests against it being in the hands of the government came from my hon. friend's friends in their speeches in this house. Quite a number of them took the attitude that the appointments should not be in the hands of the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have already said that I did not subscribe to all that has been said on this side of the house. I am voicing my own objections, as I am free to do.

Mr. MANION: You could not subscribe to all that has been said on that side because it was too contradictory.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Possibly, but I am not going to enter into that. As I said, I am opposed to this board being designated a board of trustees, which is an indication that the property is in bankruptcy, and I maintain, rightly or wrongly, that that state of affairs cannot possibly exist. Secondly, while I would give the board the freest hand with respect to the operation of the road, I do think that they should be restrained from making any disposal of the property, or closing any lines, or doing anything else except with the consent of the governor in council.

There are one or two other objections which I have to register against the bill. I have said that I do not object to the term proposed, which is seven years, although personally I think five years would be better, but the process that is provided in the bill by which a director or trustee, as he is designated, can be removed only upon address by the House of Commons and the Senate seems to me a most cumbersome process. I do not think it is right. If parliament has control over the expenditures of money, and if the Senate has no right to interfere, why interject the Senate into the measure now before us? I am for direct responsibility, and I put that responsibility upon the Minister of Railways and upon the government. They are responsible to the people of Canada, and any evasion of their responsibility will but serve to lead us into future trouble. Under section 12 we have control over capital expenditures, and whether we like it or not we are forced willy-nilly annually to vote deficits. The minister has no control whatever.

Right here let me interject that I believe the elimination of the Minister of Railways from control under this bill is a great mistake. I believe the national railways are big enough and important enough to the people and government of Canada to merit the supervision of the Minister of Railways, a man who will have at least some control and be responsible to parliament for matters in connection with administration. If there is to be a semblance at all of public ownership in operation, the minister must have some say. And the provision for the removal of the trustees in the manner indicated in the bill I entirely disapprove and it is my intention to oppose it. Moreover, I believe we would have a much greater control over the trustees or directors if they were appointed and paid by order in council.

Mr. MANION: They have always been paid by the railways.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite so. I admit at once that that is true. Then, I take exception to the fact that the measure before us makes a bit of a czar out of the chairman. I believe on all occasions a majority vote should prevail; but in the present measure the chairman is given powers almost equivalent to those of a czar; he has practically unlimited control. Under the provisions of the bill about all the trustees are asked to do is to report annually to parliament, and present a budget. If there are deficits we will be forced to vote them, the only alternative being the privilege of refusing to vote them. That is the position in which we will find ourselves if the provisions in the bill are accepted.

I now turn to the arbitral board. At once I agree that if there is to be cooperation, if savings are to be effected in the two great railway systems, some method will have to be provided of assisting them. Undoubtedly, at times, they will disagree. As I understand the provisions of the bill, either one railway or the other will make application for a hearing. But, as the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners is to exercise most control in the arbitral board to be set up, and as in Canada we have had dealing with railway matters a trained body of men who, I believe, know their work fairly well and are thoroughly familiar with most aspects of railway operation, I can see no reason why those men should be forgotten upon this occasion and another board set up and given power, if necessity arises, to supersede an order of the Board of Railway Commissioners. The chairman of the arbitral board will have that privilege, under the provisions of the bill. I can see no reason for such a provision. If armed with sufficient power, I do not see why the Board of Railway Commissioners could not perform all the duties delegated to the arbitral board to be set up under this measure. For these reasons I am opposed to the measure.

Personally I believe there are many commendable features in the bill; many of its provisions represent steps in the right direction. I do, however, and shall in committee, oppose most vigorously and to the utmost of my power the provisions of the bill to which I have referred, and which do not, in my view, appear to be in the interests either of the Canadian people or of the railways themselves. Despite all that has been said in and out of this House of Commons, the national railways have given as good an account of themselves as has the system operated under private control. I do not believe it is even contemplated by any hon. member, but I say it would be the height of folly at this time, to turn over the national railways to private control or to an amalgamation with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Any government which would attempt to take such a course would meet a speedy end when it appealed to the public. The public believe that the national railways have been of immense value to Canada and, if properly managed, I believe will continue to be a valuable asset.

I do not share the gloomy views expressed by some hon. members to the effect that this and other institutions are not going to continue to function. I believe the national railways will in the future continue to serve as faithfully as they have in the past. I say, further, that I question very much whether the rates prevailing for passenger and freight traffic would have remained in effect had it not been for the nationally owned system. There would have been a tremendous urge for an increase in rates. Further, had the national railways and the Canadian Pacific enjoyed increased rates during the last ten or twelve years they would not find themselves in their present unfortunate position. I repeat that low rates, coupled with the trade policies put into operation in 1930, have had very far-reaching effects upon the financial position of our railways. Unless these policies are changed, unless they are revised, unless there is a revival of trade, we will face a difficult situation in the future.

Many things of a domestic nature may be done to relieve the situation. Hon. members have mentioned the competition of trucks and other vehicles which has had a detrimental effect upon the railways. However, this type of evolution will continue; Canada cannot get along without her railways. At the present time I do not know of one branch line in western Canada which could be scrapped. It is all very well for a commission to sit down and say, "We will tear up the ties and rails upon this particular line." They must remember, however, that towns have been established along those tracks, communities have been growing up which the railways will have to serve. May I predict that if hon. gentlemen opposite will change their policy, if they will adopt a more moderate policy with respect to trade, if they will get off the backs of industry and the railways of Canada, there will be a change which will be immediately perceptible and we will not be worried as we are to-day about our railways.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): I shall only add a few words to this debate on a bill which aims at improving the management of our railways. The discussion seems to clearly prove that this measure submitted to the house by the government, far from improving the situation, conceals a set purpose which the government fears to reveal and prepares the way to the merger of the Canadian National with the Canadian Pacific. The government intends to carry on its work by destroying our national economy. Not satisfied of having ruined our trade through its high tariff policy, it has decided by this disastrous and deceitful measure to confide the management of our national railway system to a committee of three trustees invested with exclusive powers, bearing no responsibility and whose chairman would rule as a master. He would become the dictator of our railways—a dictator fashioned in the school of the leader of the government.

The rights of parliament, the responsibility of the people's representatives and the interests of the country would thus be sacrificed.

A superman is sought to manage our railways. Where shall we find him? No doubt, in the ranks of the Conservative party, he will, however, be clothed with the mantle of political independence, although he may have been a defeated candidate at the last election. He will probably be a lawyer in order to interpret the act as he pleases. As you may imagine he will be a superman like Bennett, who, when speaking in the house, gave a false meaning to the words and acts of our great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier who, in his grave, still makes the present leader of the government shiver with fear, who is small when compared with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but appears taller when beheld from bended knees, as his followers opposite do. I wondered, after perusing this report, whether the Duff commission threw new light on the management of our railways. Its members were certainly men of high standing, the chairman, a legal light in his day, now a judge, however, with no knowledge of railway matters, the other members were as highly qualified. No wonder that the report limited itself to writing the history of our railways and copying balance sheets, financial statements, etc., of our two Canadian railways. This commission has taught us nothing, excess mileage, too much competition between the two roads, not enough cooperation and economy. It appears that since the government has assumed power—I take the word of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion)—thrift has been, to a certain extent, practised by the management of the national railways; why then make a change? The only aim the government has in view, by making this change, is to appoint a superman to carry out the high orders of the administration and sacrifice our national railways and interests in order to benefit the Canadian Pacific which should bear its share of responsibility in the present plight of our railways.

There is not a word in the Duff commission of what should have really been recommended: reduction in salaries, suppression of useless positions and private cars for those who occupy these positions; reasonable railway rates, so as to improve business and not divert it to road transport, such as motor-trucks and autobus. At first, our railways imposed on the people and neglected to give an efficient service; to-day, conditions have changed. The government wishes, at the country's expense, to give us a better service, but our trade is threatened, owing to the policy adopted by the Conservative party and we have no freight to transport. However, we must not entirely blame our railways. Closely linked with our national economy, they are not only necessary but indispensable. We must foster their activities so that they may play their part in the economic life of this country.

We have two railway systems, one controlled by the state, the other managed by a private concern. In this present crisis, sir, notwithstanding the critical situation in which are our two railways, it is the duty of the government to keep our National Railways separate. The government decided, so as to implement the Duff commission's recommendations, to bring down in the house a measure by which it hopes to improve the management of our railways. By this bill the government substitutes to the board of directors, composed of seventeen members, a board composed of three trustees, and decree that the chairman is to have, no doubt, with the co-operation of the other two trustees, absolute control of the railway management. What can be the result of such a reduction in the number of the board of directors and whence does the necessity arise? I, for one, sir, agree with the government when it restricts the number of directors. The past and present directors have been charged with unfairness—political interference, private interests and negligence—in the discharge of the duties assigned to them in connection with the management of our railways. These charges are, to some extent, substantiated. We must have in the management of our railways men who are above suspicion, possessing, to a high degree, public spirit—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): 103 degrees?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): And having no other aim than the general welfare of the country.

The discussion on this bill should, to my mind, bear on the general welfare rather than on local interests. We must help our railways to give the best results. One class of people or a section of the country must not be favoured to the detriment of the other. It is service we require and not favouritism. The management of our railways must be made to understand that their part is to serve the public in the interest of the country, as a whole.

Unfortunately, I fear that in the appointment of these trustees, the government will show partiality towards their friends, and I am convinced that they will blunder as they did in the appointment of the radio commissioners. These appointments should go to men outside of party politics; however, we are quite aware that when the government appointed Mr. Maher as commissioner, it was appointing the defeated candidate in the constituency of our good friend the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain).

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear! Thanks!

[Mr. Denis.]

Mr. DENIS (Translation): We trust, that in the present case, the government will not make the same mistake. I could mention other cases, such, for instance as the appointment of the tariff commissioners: I refer to the appointment of an ex-member Mr. Campbell, who always sided with the government. Perhaps he also helped in the campaign funds, which are supposed to be furnished by the leader of the government. This appointment was certainly not an impartial one, but was intended to safeguard the government's interests.

As I pointed out a moment ago, the only improvement which can be derived from this bill will come from the decrease in the number of the directors of our railways. On the other hand, the powers granted to these trustees are too broad, and exclusive; these powers entirely supersede the responsibility of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. I think the hon. minister must retain this responsibility and keep under his immediate authority this commission in order to be able to give a full account of it to the house and thereby be approved or censored.

It is time, sir, that governments, and more so this government should not divest themselves of the responsibilities inherent to self-government. The time has come to vindicate the rights of governments and parliament, the people demand it and wish to judge, finally, of the acts of their legislators, with full knowledge of the facts. That is why, sir, I disapprove of granting such wide powers to this board of trustees, because, in so doing, the hon. Minister of Railways divests himself of his responsibility and duties in favour of a so-called superman who, with his associates, will assume all responsibilities.

Part II of the bill refers to the co-operation which should exist between our two railways. It should have existed long ago. If there are people responsible for such conditions, they are here in the house. All governments, past and present, must shoulder their share of this responsibility. Railways applied to us for branch lines and built them with the approval of the majority of this house. To-day, by this bill, the co-operation of our two railways is sought. But why not also include the co-operation of the government. I think that such co-operation would be necessary for the success of the present management. On the other hand, can the government in all fairness force the Canadian Pacific Railway, a private concern, to co-operate with the management of the Canadian National, fully knowing that this co-operation is not in the interest of its shareholders? Such co-operation should be left to the discretion of the Canadian Pacific Railway itself, and not forced upon it. I am quite certain that the latter, both in the interest and development of this country, would deem it a duty to co-operate as experience has taught us that unrestricted competition brings disastrous results.

I think, sir, with reference to Part III, which deals with the arbitral tribunal, that the government could dispense with this board by granting broader powers to the railway commission, of which the Minister of Railways might form part.

I shall now close my remarks by stating that I, for one, do not agree with the spirit of this measure, and I shall strenuously oppose it, because it does not, in any way, improve the present act with reference to the management of our national railways.

This seems to be the first important bill submitted to the house this session, however, when examined from all angles, one finds that the situation remains unchanged. This reminds me of the various measures which have been enacted to relieve unemployment. At the special session of 1930, when the present crisis started, we had in this country about 200,000 unemployed. In haste, parliament was summoned and $20,000,000 were voted to relieve these unfortunate people. In 1933, when there are in this country over 1,300,000 unemployed, the government still requests $20,000,000. That is called solving the unemployment problem. $20,000,000 when we had only 200,000 unemployed, and again $20,000,000 to relieve 1,300,000 unemployed! That is the government's rational way of dealing with the problem; it is the interest taken by this government to solve our national questions! I wonder why this administration, finding itself helpless to fulfil its duty and pledges of 1930, still clings to power, although they know that they cannot face the situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DENIS (Translation): All the measures enacted by this house, since 1930, are tainted with this spirit, and as I think it will react unfavourably on the welfare of this country, I shall vote against the second reading of the bill.

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Maisonneuve) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, until the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) spoke on this debate, I held entirely different views on the nature and purport of this bill. I was under the impression, as the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) had sought to convey when he introduced this measure, that it was merely a question of making the management of our railways more efficient and economic, or rather, the management of what we thought were our railways. As a policy, we could but laud such endeavours on the part of our government and we would have co-operated, because I think it would have been our duty to facilitate the enactment of all government measures which would improve the situation, help the administration to solve the deficits of our railways, while, on the other hand, maintaining the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway as suggested by the royal commission's report.

No doubt, we would have reserved the right to discuss certain details, as, for instance, the appointment of the management and trustees, their term of office, qualifications, number, etc. However, as a policy, I repeat it, if the bill had been such as represented to us at the outset, we would probably have approved of it.

However, the right hon. Prime Minister thought proper to give certain details which entirely gave a new aspect to the whole question relating to our railways, and which have, therefore, greatly altered my views.

The speech delivered, on Thursday last by the right hon. Prime Minister, has given rise to a great uneasiness among the public and has considerably added to the anxiety of the hour. We gather from his remarks that the railway problem that we are, at present, facing is most serious, that Canada's whole credit is involved in the solution of this problem and, according to his own words, confided to Hansard, page 2861:

> Our effort must be to save not the road alone but, as I said, because of the guarantees that have been given, the credit of the guarantors themselves.

And, in this instance, the guarantors are the Canadian government.

On the other hand, the government in introducing this bill and by the explanations given of its provisions, recognizes implicitly, as stated just now by the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), its absolute powerlessness to solve the problem and its total incompetency.

The problem of our railways is a serious one, that is certain. It matters very little, for the moment, who is responsible for this situation. All our railways were built just as much by our federal and provincial governments and their guarantors as by private enterprise, at a time when optimism reigned and the people of Canada had an unshakable faith in the future of the country.

The railways, in most cases, preceded the development of the country and gave it its first impulse. Without our railways Canada would never have attained the position which it occupies among the leading trade nations of the world. Unfortunately, uncontrollable events happened; war and the present economic depression have spoiled our plans and created new difficulties.

It is certain that, at the start, our railways could not possibly be paying enterprises, however, with the expansion of the country following in the wake of its development which was destined to instil new economic life into the country as a whole, our railways were to meet by degree the cost of operations and reimburse, at least partly, the capital invested in its construction.

This continuous progress of our railways with the development of the country greatly benefited the Canadian Pacific, and its effects had already begun to be felt by our national railways. It is only necessary to compare the balance sheets of the two systems to be convinced of this fact. From 1923 to 1931, when the country was well administered by the Prime Minister of that period, now the leader of the opposition, and when it had reached a high degree of prosperity, the Canadian Pacific Railway distributed to its shareholders the handsome amount of $312,879,978 in dividends, while the Canadian National, during that period, was turning the operating deficits of its earlier days, into a surplus of $281,211,847.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Never, it has never had any surplus in its whole career.

Mr. JEAN (Translation): The hon. member has but to consult the report of the Duff commission, at page 15, and in reading it carefully, he will discover that the figures I have just given are correct.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Are they absolutely correct?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): If you contend that they are not, it is because you cannot read.

Mr. JEAN (Translation): Now that this trend towards progress has stopped, for the moment, the government instead of being inspired by the perseverance and hopes of its predecessors, preaches defeatism, spreads dispondency and endeavours to elude its responsibilities.

The question of the hour is one of faith in the future of our country.

Are we to take for granted that Canada has ceased to develop and forsaken all hopes which it had for its future, or are we to believe, once the economic crisis has passed, our country will take its flight towards the progress and realization of its legitimate ambition?

In the first instance, we can do no better than be guided by the leader of the government and declare our railways bankrupt as they are no longer of any use—

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Shame! shame!

Mr. JEAN (Translation): —and will no further be needed for the future development of our country; curtail their services; decrease their output; abandon those lines which do not pay their way and retain only those strictly requisite for the needs of the public. I contend, sir, that this is where the present measure will lead us. That is what we clearly gather from the remarks made by the right hon. Prime Minister, the other day, when he stated in the house, that our railways are no more the property of those who built them or of those who purchased them, but have passed into the hands of the bondholders and must be put in the hands of receivers pending the winding up of their business or reorganization, as the creditors may decide.

By the way, I wonder, sir, whether this statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister, that our railways are now the property of bondholders, has any connection with the law-suit brought against the government of Canada, the Canadian National and the Grand Trunk, last year, by a group of English bondholders who wished either to be reimbursed or take possession of the company's railway system. If such be the case, the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister and the appointment of receivers or rather, to use his own words, of trustees with the powers of a receiver as provided by the act, would indicate his determination to liquidate our national railways and, thereby, threaten the future of Canada.

If, on the contrary, we still have faith in the future expansion of Canada, and I think that every Canadian citizen has a right to hope that our country, with its natural resources, undeveloped regions and its high-minded population, may yet forge ahead. Therefore, if we still have faith in the development of the country, the bill submitted to us does not meet our present requirements. It is not any receivership, even temporary, which will help our railways to weather the crisis, but, rather, a controlled and efficient management, a well planned and economic operation of our present railway systems.

You cannot suppress part of our railways without threatening the life of this country.

What we require in Canada, to-day, is not so much a policy of economy and retrenchment which will lead us to bankruptcy, but a policy of putting to good use the assets we possess. The Canadian railways are an asset to the country, but this asset can only produce inasmuch as the country develops in conjunction with the railways, and with equal strides.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. JEAN (Translation): By the bill submitted to our consideration, if we are to put faith in the explanations given to us, there is no mention of facing and providing for the future of our railways or country, but simply of delaying the disaster, that is why, sir, I cannot support this measure.

If it is a fact that the credit of the whole country is threatened by reason of the guarantees given to the railways, and that its fate is closely linked with the future of our railways, we can foresee, at present, where the present administration will lead us. The way this problem is handled shows on the part of the government a delusive incompetency. For a government which was to bring complete relief and settle all questions on its assuming power, it is rather sad to note the means to which it resorts. To refer vital questions such as this one to a commission of so called experts, of whom two only had some experience in railway matters, however, strangers to this country, and to accept blindly the conclusions of this commission; I state, sir, any one could have done as much. This, again, clearly shows that the government in office is powerless to cope with the situation and their implicit acknowledgment of this fact is bound to depress our people. I shall not enter into the details of this measure. All those who preceded me in this debate, at least, on this side of the house, have clearly pointed out its defects. However, may I, in closing my remarks, state that this measure does not fulfil public expectations.

The public is, to say the least, as interested in the future of our railways as are the British, United States, or other bondholders, whose bonds are guaranteed by the government. This measure is introduced simply to safeguard the interests of the bondholders according to the statement made by the Prime Minister himself.

The railway employees, who also contribute largely to the good management of our railways, should at least, in my opinion, have a representative in the new proposed management.

The Canadian Pacific Railway, which has managed its own lines heretofore, should not, in my opinion, be forced to cooperate to its own detriment. If unrestricted competition, has sometimes created abuses, enforced cooperation may lead to the ruin of both railways.

These are some of the things which bring out the defects of the bill and force us to vote against it. Let the government bring down a truly constructive measure based upon the maintenance of the integral identity of our railway systems as well as their services. although keeping in mind the relations which exists between the development of the country and that of the railways, we shall be but too pleased to support such a measure. However, the bill before the house does not fulfil these conditions, therefore, for my part, I deem it a duty to oppose its second reading.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I do not really rise to make a speech. At this late stage of the debate the ground has been well covered and there is not much satisfaction or interest in reiterating the remarks of others, but I have had an insistent prompting during the last day or two that the part of the country which I represent will expect me to go on record in connection with this vitally important matter. I have risen therefore to state my position with reference to this bill.

We are told that we have a railway problem in Canada to-day. As a matter of fact we have had a railway problem in this country, with the exception of the short period from 1922 to about 1930, ever since I can remember, and that is quite a long time. It is certain, however, that the railway problem that has presented itself to the Canadian people in the last three or four years has assumed rather serious proportions. The late management of the Canadian National Railways is very largely blamed for the condition of that road to-day. There can be no gainsaying the fact that in the fulness of prosperity and success which this country enjoyed between 1922 and 1930 the management of the Canadian National Railways probably provided for that system with a lavish hand. They found these railways in poor condition, seriously handicapped. The late Sir Henry Thornton was asked to combine the railways into a national road to compete with perhaps the best railway on the American continent, namely, the Canadian Pacific Railway; and if in doing so he found some success and sought to outdo his opponent, who in turn sought not to be outdone, and if in this way the Canadian railways indulged in unnecessary expenditures and extravagance, it is not to be wondered at, and there should not be a great deal of blame attached thereto.

I am quite prepared to admit that the railway problem in Canada to-day was caused to some extent by the vying of these two railways, in a period of prosperity and advancement, to outdo each other and that the late management of the Canadian National Railways is not entirely blameless. But I would suggest also that to a great extent the railway problem in this country has been caused latterly by a lack of haulage, a lack of business; and so far as that lack of business is concerned the government we have in this country at the present time is not blameless, for to a considerable extent the policies initiated by that government were responsible therefor.

Mr. HACKETT: What about Great Britain and the United States?

Mr. HOWDEN: We are talking about Canada just now.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Canada first policy was good in 1930 only.

Mr. HOWDEN: It has been the policy of this government during the last number of years to declare for government ownership and control of the national railways. The Liberal government, not only by what was said in the house but by what was said on the hustings made clear its position in connection with the government railways. In appealing to the country during the last federal campaign, the Conservative party went in strong for government ownership and government control. During that campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was quoted as having said at Winnipeg: Amalgamation never, competition ever. In the bill now before us many of us on this side of the house are inclined to believe that the Prime Minister is hedging just a little on that former position which he took. During the course of the debate the other day the Prime Minister said "hear, hear" to a remark of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) which suggested that probably the government would not view with alarm the private ownership of this railway.

Mr. HACKETT: That is not a fair statement; it was said by somebody at his back, by myself.

Mr. HOWDEN: If that is so, I regret having made the remark and I withdraw it.

The bill before us certainly opens the way for amalgamation, in the view of many of us on this side of the house it looks like a step in that direction. The bill seeks to place the management of the Canadian National Railways in the hands of three trustees who are to take the place of the old board of seventeen directors. I cannot understand why the bill does not name only one trustee because it states quite plainly that the majority of the three trustees shall prevail only if the chairman is voting with the majority. The entire management of the railways is to be placed in the hands of one man and, as has been stated in the house on a number of occasions, this man is to be given the absolute say in the control. No action taken by this board of trustees can be questioned by order in council, by the government or, indeed, by the crown. The chairman of this board will be an all-powerful czar in connection with the Canadian National Railways. Not only is this so, but the board is to be elected and have the power of perpetuating itself in office for all time. It looks to me as though the government was relaxing entirely from the control of the Canadian National Railways; they are putting the control into the hands of this board of trustees which can take any action it likes in connection with the national railway. This board can abandon lines, it can lease lines and, as far as one can see, it can enter into amalgamation with the other road. It is to this portion of the bill that we on this side of the house are diametrically opposed.

I have no desire to make a lengthy speech on this matter but as I represent a riding in which are many railroads, I believe the people expect a statement of some kind from me. I have accordingly risen at this late time to state that I am entirely against this bill at the second reading, the third reading or at any time. I believe it opens the way for amalgamation, a thing which should be avoided and the suggestion of which should be deplored. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am entirely against this bill.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver) the debate was adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume we will continue to-morrow with this debate?

CANADIAN NATIONAL-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Hon. R. J. Manion for the second reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for cooperation with the Canadian Pacific railway system, and for other purposes.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in my judgment this has been a very excellent debate, and I think its duration has been more than warranted by the transcendent importance of the problem to this house and to the Canadian people. At the outset may I extend my congratulations, with certain reservations which will become manifest as I proceed, to those who have participated in this debate thus far. May I be allowed to extend to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) my personal felicitations upon the studied moderation of his presentation of this resolution. I trust and hope that after having been subjected for two weeks to the slings and arrows of the outrageous Grits on this side of the house, my hon. friend will maintain that same degree of studied and constructive moderation when he concludes this debate to-day. If he does that he will have convinced us that he has experienced a remarkable change of heart since the days when he sat on this side of the house.

As I said before, this is to me one of the most important debates which has ever taken place in this house. At the outset of my remarks may I suggest that the Canadian transportation problem is affected by both national and international factors. The national factors lie largely in the policies of the present administration for which they must accept direct and final responsibility. The international factors are of two kinds. First, there are the factors which affected our railway system during the great war, from 1914 to 1918; second, there are the repercussions of these factors upon our Canadian national life and structure.

May I summarize briefly three of these great world factors. I would remind the house of the tremendous cost of the great war to the participating nations. The great war cost Great Britain and her allies $43,000,000,000; it cost the Germanic allies, $15,000,000,000, a total of $58,000,000,000. This amount was expended largely in the destruction of property and human life within the brief period of four and one half years. May I also refer the house to the tremendous expansion which took place in world trade between 1913 and 1928. From the dawn of civilization up until the year 1913, the total export and import trade of the world amounted to $35,000,000,000. Within fifteen short years, all within the lifetime of everyone of us present in this house, the trade of the world increased from $35,000,000,000 to $68,000,000,000. This increase was not due to the expansion of the gold reserves of the world because they increased only from $7,489,000,000 to $10,500,000,000. The trade of the world practically doubled in fifteen short years. Let us consider next the national debts of the various countries of the world. Next Tuesday, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) presents his budget, we will probably hear something of the public debt of Canada. The war cost this country something like $1,700,000,000. In 1688, the year of the revolution, the British debt was only $3,320,000. In the year of the first jubilee, 1887, this debt had increased to $3,690,000,000. Just before the war it was $3,255,000,000 but by 1920 it had increased to $39,390,000,000. There had been an increase in the British debt of $36,000,000,000 in six short years. In the United States there was a similar increase from $900,000,000 to $16,000,000,000 during the same six years. There was also a corresponding increase in Germany and France. In 1870, at the time of confederation, the debt of Canada was only $78,000,000. Before the war it was $336,000,000 but last year it had reached a total of $2,504,000,000. This is our national debt apart from other obligations which must affect us. I mention these things at the outset of my remarks to show the house the tremendous obligations which confront us at the present time.

Our railroad problem has been affected by these international factors; it has been affected by world considerations and yet we are attempting to solve this great problem with a mere administration bill which is now before the house. There is nothing within the four corners of this bill of a constructive nature to meet the quintessence and fundamental needs of this transportation problem. One of the most essential recommendations made by this commission is in connection with our canal structure, but what do they say? They say that water-borne competition does not affect in any way the transportation problem of this country. I should like to direct the attention of the house, of the government and of the Minister of Finance, if he were here, to some of the figures showing the investment in our canal system. Up to March 31, 1932, the total investment in our canals amounted to $245,000,000. For operation and maintenance there had been expended up until last year a total of $81,000,000, or a grand total of $326,000,000. In 1931-32 the operations and repairs amounted to over $3,021,000, while interest at five per cent amounted to $16,300,000, or a total in round figures of $20,000,000. The revenue for 1931-32 amounted to $976,845, so that in one year there was lost to the Canadian treasury a total of $19,000,000.

I suggest to the Minister of Railways that the time has come when we should impose tolls for the use of our canal system. This would be in the interests of the Canadian people and the Canadian treasury. What happens in connection with this water-borne traffic? We have Norwegian tramps, Danish tramps and German tramps coming over here during the summer months to enter into competition with our own steamers and our own transportation systems. These boats do not pay one cent into the Canadian treasury, while the Canadian steamship companies pay income taxes as well as direct taxes to the Department of Marine. I suggest that this government should immediately meet this problem of water-borne competition. I am immediately suspicious of the recommendations of the Duff commission when it says that the development of our waterways will not be prejudicial, deleterious or injurious to our railway systems. I believe there is in that recommendation an implied approbation of the policy of this administration in signing the St. Lawrence waterways agreement with the great republic to the south. That paragraph apparently is inserted in the Duff commission report as a justification for the signing of an agreement which is unfair to Canada.

Your Honour knows as well as I do the conditions which now prevail in western Canada. Ships going through the American Panama canal are subject to an average toll of one dollar per ton. An average sized ship pays a toll of $8,000 going backward and forward through the canal. We have an expensive canal system representing an investment of $326,000,000 and there is nothing in any of the treaties now in effect with the United States to preclude us establishing a toll against American ships similar to one to be charged against our own. There is not a single word in the Duff report to show how this situation could be met.

There is nothing in this bill. A board of trustees and an arbitral tribunal is the concrete result of an expenditure of $62,000, by the Canadian people. There is only the prospective establishment of two Tory triumvirates. I am quite certain the Minister of Railways will agree with me. He has read the report of the Drayton-Acworth commission of 1917 very carefully and he knows its provisions. He has also read the Duff report very carefully. I can find in this poor and pallid Bill No. 37 which we have in front of us now, but three things, part of them the recommendations of the Duff commission, part of them the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth commission of 1917, and the most insidious features of them the recommendations of neither one commission nor the other, evidently written in by the fine Machiavellian hand of some member of the present administration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Before I conclude I think I shall be able to satisfy my hon. friends that what I say is true. Before I come to a detailed consideration of this bill, I should like very briefly to refer to railway development in the Dominion of Canada. One of the speakers said the other day that the history of railway legislation in this country was not a happy story. I should respectfully like to disagree with that statement. To my mind railway development in this dominion is the story of Canada herself since the year 1853; it is the story of the great struggles of statesmen on both sides of political life, the story of the enterprise of great financial men throughout this country and, above all, the story of the vision, energy and genius of great engineers who were able to overcome the tremendous difficulties of the Rocky mountains, and under handicaps almost insuperable, to bring these lines of steel to our Pacific coast. So I do not think it is right for the Prime Minister or anyone else in the house to condemn any former leader of a party for the vision that inspired that gigantic program after 1903.

May I say this in regard to the Prime Minister's observations: It ill behooves him, in the time of this nation's financial and economic peril, to be constantly indulging in those Cassandra-like wails in which he indulged in this chamber the other day. He attacked members of the opposition, accusing us of being the people who were trying to undermine the integrity of our country. What about his own Toronto speech delivered just before the house convened, when he made that tragic and tremendous blunder in regard to our maturing obligations in the United States? And when that had to be recalled and corrected in the press within two or three hours after it was delivered, what about the fact that exchange went down four per cent the day after the right hon. gentleman made that address in Toronto? What about his interview with the labour men a few days after when he told them that we were on the brink of the abyss, on the verge of disaster? It is no wonder that Canadian exchange suffered. I take issue with him in this hour of our country's need and peril, if such it is. What we need is not pessimism, and yet we had in his speech nothing but a gospel of despair proclaimed by the man who should lead this house and country to greater courage, faith, optimism and belief in this Canada of ours.

Let us take the story of our railway development and I shall deal with it only incidentally. The wonderful story started between 1850 and 1860 when the Grand Trunk group went over to London in 1853 to project the development of 1,200 miles of railway. In 1850 we had only sixty-six miles of railway and in that decade we increased the mileage by 2,000. Take the period of the Canadian Pacific development between 1880 and 1890 and it is a story of achievement and endeavour of which the Canadian people may legitimately be proud for all time to come. Take the story of the Transcontinental development, these same costs that are affecting Canada at the present time. It was the great war that compelled the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific to come clamouring to the treasury for help. Who gave them the help, the grant, to extend the Canadian Northern from the Yellowhead pass to Vancouver? It was the Conservative administration of that day. Who gave them the guarantees of $45,000,000 in 1914? It was the Conservative administration of that day, and yet the Prime Minister had the effrontery, during the course of this debate, to tell the house that his party was not responsible for the present situation. If you study the history of railway obligations; if you consider the financial obligations incurred before 1922, to what do they amount? Since confederation there was expended on the Canadian National system as a whole the sum of $2,487,000,000 from the federal treasury and $2,045,000,000 were expended before the Liberal government came into power in 1922. Still these hon. gentlemen tell us: Our party did not cause the trouble. These were not the words which the present Prime Minister used in the debate of 1914 when he said that both parties were equally to blame. I would advise the Minister of Railways to read that remarkable address delivered in 1914 by his present leader. In it will be found strange words: "receivership," others with reference to "equity of redemption." We have there ideas that caused the address the other day by the Prime Minister.

An hon. MEMBER: The precedent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, that is the precedent, and of course there are some unusual things in it too. He referred to his former colleague, who is his present leader in another chamber, as "an impertinent young man." That gentleman was roundly condemned by the present Prime Minister, and yet to-day we find these two confederates piloting this bill—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): —through first the Senate and then the House of Commons. This Bill No. 37 means what? It means the destruction and annihilation of public ownership and control of railways in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. COTNAM: How about the Vancouver Sun?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How about my hon. friend using some intelligence and keeping quiet?

Mr. COTNAM: The hon. gentleman does not use any when he is speaking.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend wishes to discuss the Vancouver hotel I shall give him an opportunity later.

Mr. COTNAM: I was speaking about the Vancouver Sun?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was moved to this resolution an amendment which was disposed of on a point of order. That amendment contained two essential and fundamental principles. The first dealt with the larger principle of amalgamation and the second with the fundamental principle of the control of parliament. The Prime Minister, in speaking to that amendment, announced that the government would insert in this legislation, before it was finally disposed of, a provision that there should not be any amalgamation between the two railways. In my opinion that provision will be absolutely useless, for this reason; the government are absolutely destroying public control and ownership; they are setting up a self-perpetuating board of trustees with a supreme Caesar in charge of the triumvirate appointed by this administration. When the government goes to the people in six months or a year from now, faces the acid test of public opinion, and is rejected and cast out, and this party comes into power—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): —what will be the situation then? We shall have an appointee of the present government, a self-perpetuating trustee, and the government of the day will not have the slightest say in regard to regulation or management of that official, the chairman of the board, or any of the trustees. My hon. friends might very well take a leaf from the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth commission, because they said that the five trustees mentioned in their report should be appointed in the first instance by parliament. Will the Minister of Railways consent to having the House of Commons insert in this bill, before it goes through this house, the names of the three trustees? That is the recommendation of the Drayton-Acworth commission appointed by his friends in 1917. That would retain at least a semblance of popular control. Why not leave this iniquitous legislation alone? Why not cut down the present directorate from seven to five, and appoint to the board a representative from the west, one from the east, one representing labour, and if possible one representing the Minister of Railways, so that there will be a link and liaison between the board and the government of the day, so that we can have at least a semblance of popular and democratic control in this dominion? But as it is, here is this board of three trustees, and what control have we got over them? The Prime Minister says that they must submit their budget to parliament. Is that control? Of course it is not. Section 12 is specific and inexorable. It says that the budget is submitted to the board of trustees, and except as regards income deficits and certain advances in regard to meeting maturing obligations and with regard to capital expenditure this house has no authority, not the slightest tittle or semblance of authority, over the financial expenditures of this great triumvirate which we are going to establish to manage the railway system of Canada. Just imagine the situation if a Liberal government were returned to power in this dominion next year, believing as we do in our platform, in maintaining the integrity of the Canadian National Railways, and yet finding ourselves without the slightest power to control or dismiss these trustees! Will the Minister of Railways do this? Will he have the power given to this House of Commons to have the trustees dismissed upon a resolution of this assembly alone? We are the elected representatives of the people of Canada: the other house is not. The other house is altered in complexion by whatever party happens to be in power at the time. If the Minister of Railways wishes to maintain and preserve a semblance of democratic control in this dominion, will he eliminate that provision of the bill, that the trustees can be dismissed only upon a joint address of both houses of parliament? I know that the Drayton-Acworth report recommended that the board should be appointed like judges, which is probably where the Prime Minister got the idea. But will he admit that he believes in the public ownership and public control of railways? If he does, he should be willing to meet us half way, and in the first place have the first trustees to be appointed named in the bill by this House of Commons; and secondly, he should have their dismissal, subject to the will of those who represent the people in this House of Commons.

On the twenty-seventh of February my right hon. leader placed on record the viewpoint of those of us to your left, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the Canadian National Railways. The Liberal party believes in and stands for the maintenance of the integrity of the Canadian National Railways as a publicly owned and publicly controlled service. But have we got a publicly controlled service in this bill? No, every vestige of control is gone. Every single tittle of democratic control has absolutely vanished—banished by this administration.

Mr. NICHOLSON: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who says no?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I say no.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is not a section in this bill which leaves the slightest vestige of control to this House of Commons.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Certainly there is. Read the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not one.

Mr. COTNAM: What control was there over the old board?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We had a committee of parliament in the old days which considered the budget of the national railways. Immediately after the budget of the national railways was presented to this house by the Minister of Railways, it was referred to a committee composed of all parties of this house, and in my experience that committee every year presented a unanimous report to this House of Commons. And could you have a finer exemplification of democratic control than a unanimous report of a committee of parliament representing every single party in the House of Commons of Canada? Will you have that under this bill? Not a single shadow of it. The power is entirely gone from this House of Commons and is placed in the hands of this board of trustees, who are appointed not by this House of Commons, but by the government of the day, and who can be dismissed, not by this House of Commons, who can in fact be dismissed by nobody except upon a joint address of this House of Commons with possibly an accommodating majority in the other house. That is the situation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COTNAM: That is parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am very glad to have my hon. friend's interpretation of parliament. I suggest to my hon. friends that public ownership means ownership and control by the people, and that means ownership and control by those who represent the people in this House of Commons. The members of the other house, and I speak of them with all respect, do not represent the people, because they are not elected representatives but are appointed by the party that happens to be in power at the time. But you can go back to your constituency and I to mine as representatives responsible to the people, the final tribunal of Canadian public opinion. The other house has no such responsibility.

Mr. COTNAM: Why didn't you reform the Senate?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are reforming it now, only in a different way from what I would.

Mr. POULIOT: Better reform North Renfrew.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish to emphasize my submission that under this bill every vestige of democratic and popular control of our national railways is gone. You can put in a section providing against amalgamation, but what does that amount to? Nothing, because you have one private company, and another company controlled by three trustees responsible to whom? Responsible, not to this parliament, not to this house; and they cannot be dismissed by the minister. I think the Minister of Railways himself, for the sake of maintaining the dignity of the office of Minister of Railways, should resent this power being taken away from him.

I wish the Prime Minister were here. He used to quote in this house from a favourite book of his. This is the scripture according to Bennett. Hon. gentlemen who were here in this house before the last election will remember the Prime Minister quoting from The New Despotism, by Lord Hewart of Bury who, at page 158, says:

Where is the arch-defender of bureaucracy who would have the courage to say in the House of Commons: "I am placing these proposals for legislation before the house, but candour compels me to tell the house that the only terms upon which matters so intricate can be disposed of are that my department should be placed above parliament and beyond the jurisdiction of the courts."?

Again:

It is right that the public should be made thoroughly well aware of the price which they are invited, or compelled, to pay. If they were really aware of it, they might well think that the price was too high, and that they would prefer to forego the particular commodities which are so expensively to be obtained.

Those words, Mr. Speaker, used to be quoted in this house by the present Prime Minister when he was in the ranks of the opposition, and his objection did not go so much against the establishment of bureaucracy such as you have it under this bill, as against vesting too much authority in the executive of government. But this is a hundred times worse than vested authority in the governor in council. We protested against the powers taken by the governor in council in regard to peace, order and good government, and anyone who voted against giving to the governor in council those tremendous powers in regard to peace, order and good government and who now votes to give these powers to this board of trustees, is voting for something that is tenfold more disastrous because this board of trustees has no responsibility whatever to the people. Furthermore, the Minister of Railways is reduced to the shadow of a shade if this clause goes through. He will have no responsibility, nothing whatever to do with the Canadian National Railways.

We came down to this house, Mr. Speaker, in 1930, summoned by this government of conferences and commissions, this government of Fabian tactics, this C.C.F. government on the other side of the house, to deal with unemployment, and overnight we found the tariff raised, and we were told to hurry home because the great man, the superman, was going to cross the seas to take part in the Imperial conference of 1930.

Again, in 1932, in this house we endeavoured to deal with the problem of unemployment and the other great national problems of this dominion, and what were we told? Hush, hush, we were told by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). Hurry back to your homes, he said, and be ye good; do not stir up strife, but bless this government for the wonderful work it has done in regard to unemployment. And why were we told to hurry home on that occasion? Because July was going to see the Imperial conference of 1932 in Ottawa. Well, we had that conference, and its great results have been presented to this house. What happened at that conference? We found that the fundamental rights of parliament were violated in the legislation that followed because we lost control over our fiscal policy and over questions of tariff taxation in this dominion for a period of five years.

Then, again, this session we have looming over us the shadow of the international economic conference, and when we come to discuss the budget and other things we shall be told that we cannot discuss budgetary or tariff matters or the Bank Act or monetary questions because an international economic conference is going to be called and the Prime Minister is going to attend.

What about commissions? Commissions—non-political commissions, to deal with radio! What have we got? Oh, a splendid Tory triumvirate all over again, just the same as we will have in this bill. And we had a tariff commission, another Tory triumvirate adorned by an ornament from my hon. friends of the C.C.F., the left wing. What are we going to have here? Fabian tactics, Tory tactics, C.C.F. government—that is what we have. A conference government, commission government, Fabian tactics government—that is what we have.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to explain to my constituents why I am opposed to this legislation. If every one of my colleagues would support this legislation I could not support part I of it, nor part II nor part III. Why? The Prime Minister told us, in that address containing more inconsistencies than any address which has been delivered in this House of Commons—he told us that part II meant cooperation by agreement, and that part III meant cooperation by direction. I say part II of this bill means cooperation by direction, and part III means cooperation by compulsion. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to part II and part III. So far as part I is concerned, I say it is taking away privileges from the Canadian people; it is destroying public ownership and public control of your railway system in the Dominion of Canada. For those reasons I am opposed to this legislation. I believe it destroys the fundamental rights and the constitutional authority of Canada. It destroys the essential privileges of the House of Commons which we find outlined so well in the first fifteen or twenty pages of Durrell's great work on parliamentary grants. A great struggle was waged in Britain in 1910; two great elections were held in the one year on the question of the final responsibility of the House of Commons and the ordinary control of the House of Commons over national expenditures. This House of Commons is asked to throw away its rights, to take a leap in the dark, to throw away its own voluntary and free will, to throw away the rights of our forefathers who fought for hundreds of years for the constitutional development of our country.

I suggest to the house that this legislation should not pass. Amend your railway act; give extended power to the railway commissioners. If you are going to force this legislation down our throats make it that it shall become operative by proclamation of the governor general in council, because I believe this legislation will be regretted by the present administration. If I should happen to be in any subsequent parliament—

An hon. MEMBER: You won't.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will take my chances with any of you over there. I took my chances once before with one of your best.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If I should happen to be in the next parliament I will use all the strength I can towards the repeal of this legislation, and towards the restoration to the Canadian people of full and undoubted control over the Canadian National railway system, because I believe this bill is an abnegation of the fundamental constitutional rights of parliament and, inferentially, of the Canadian people. As Locke said long ago: Parliament is the people. This parliament seemingly is not the people. This government and its supporters are floundering in a Serbonian bog. By this measure we would be establishing a bureaucracy, a Tory triumvirate who would function in glorious Tory togas for the next seven years. You took one from the C.C.F.; you will take them from other sources. I resent and repudiate the policy of this administration in pursuing such tactics as these.

What did the Prime Minister say? He said: This national railway is not the property of the Canadian people. I am going to fight my next election on that declaration by the Prime Minister of Canada. This railway, said he, belongs to the bondholders and the security holders. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite: Do they endorse such a statement by the Prime Minister? Do they endorse it?

Mr. McINTOSH: No answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, they are not exactly sure where they are. They are floundering in the dark, every single supporter; they don't know where they are. And if the whips were called off I am sure that my smiling friend across the way, and other friends who sit across there, would gladly vote against the second reading of the bill.

In conclusion may I say this: Remember the splendid showing made by the national railways between 1923 and 1930. To-day continents are paying tribute to that record. And here I wish to pay tribute to that great Canadian who a few days ago passed from our ken and who, in the future days of Canada, will be looked upon as one of the greatest public servants this dominion ever had. May I say this: Let us not lightly or wantonly destroy the property of the Canadian people. Let us not forsake all to support a party to make possible the second reading of this bill, a bill which violates the cherished principles I have mentioned. Remember the words of Kipling about freedom that was won for us by the men of long ago,—"

> All we have of freedom,
> All we use or know,
> This our fathers bought for us
> Long and long ago.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, with some of the remarks of the previous speaker in regard to the railway bill, I am in agreement. But with some of the asides he made I am not so much in harmony. For instance, he made reference to the C.C.F. It is not very long ago since he was proclaiming in the western provinces that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation were preaching the gospel that the Liberal party had preached for so long. Now the hon. member charges the government with being C.C.F. I do not know whether he is intending to insult the government or the C.C.F.

Previous speakers in this debate have laid great stress and emphasis upon the importance of railway service in Canada. In that regard I need not repeat what they have said. Nearly all speakers have offered felicitations to the minister for the high ground he took in presenting the bill, and particularly for his eschewing anything in the nature of a party debate. I am sorry that I have to oppose a measure so presented. I agree with the broad generalizations of the previous speaker in respect to economic conditions throughout the world which certainly indicate, as I understood him, that the railway problem cannot be solved by itself, that it is merely part of a great economic problem with which Canada and the world is faced, and that the railway problem would more or less automatically solve itself, were the major economic problems of the country solved.

I oppose the bill not because of some of its details, with which I also disagree, but because of the principles involved. I am not influenced by any undue enthusiasm for national ownership, for as a matter of fact we have not got a national railway in Canada. Everyone should know, if they do not, that the people of Canada through their government became responsible for the bonds, worthless in some instances, of defunct concerns—

Miss MACPHAIL: Privately owned.

Mr. IRVINE: —that it guaranteed those bonds and the interest on them, and the Canadian people have since that time run the railway in the interest of those who own the bonds. That is not national ownership. So I have little enthusiasm for the railway system thus begotten and controlled. I oppose the bill chiefly because it ignores the difficulty for which it purports to be a remedy. What are the conditions? I shall not waste the time of the house by going into the figures as presented by the Duff report, upon which this legislation is largely based; I confine myself rather to what those figures indicate. In the main, the figures show that the fixed charges on the Canadian National are greater than the earning power of the system can support. And the traffic is becoming less, naturally, through the present depression. Higher freight rates cannot be charged to make up the deficits, therefore not only the Canadian National so-called, but the Canadian Pacific as well, are both coming to the point where they cannot take care of their fixed charges. These fixed charges jeopardize both railway systems. The fixed charges of course are charges on bonds, and arise out of a faulty financial system. Bonds represent money invested, and money is supposed to represent wealth. Wealth is perishable, but bonds are eternal. Besides being granted eternal life these bonds have been fructified through being made interest-bearing and become prolific in their creation of debt. If bonds were no more eternal than any form of wealth which money might represent there would be no such debts as we have to-day. But on this phase of the matter I shall not dwell.

In order to meet the shortage in earning power of the railways to take care of fixed charges the bill proposes retrenchment. The retrenchments proposed are at the expense of the railway workers, the wage earners on the system. They are also at the expense of the railway services which should be given to the people of Canada, in view of all the expenditures and guarantees which the people of Canada have made and given on both systems. Why should there be retrenchment of railway services at the present time? Certainly not because of lack of equipment, for we are assured by the minister, on the authority of the present head of the national system, that the equipment was never in better order. So it is not due to lack of railway lines or cars or engines or men that we have to curtail services. But we propose to curtail railway services in order that we may protect the interests of the bondholders. There can be no question about that. I am opposed to this bill because its purpose is retrenchment in the interest of bondholders in a vain attempt to meet the situation I have described. That attempt ultimately will be absolutely vain.

Let me come then to the real point as I regard the duty and responsibility of an individual member of this house. Members of this parliament really represent the directors of the Canadian National Railways, since, as I have described, a certain government of this country made the Canadian people responsible for paying the interest on bonds and paying the principal. In connection with this situation therefore, this parliament is in the position of directors of the company representing the investment of the Canadian people. As such I ask, will the people of Canada be able more adequately to meet the payment of the bonds that they have guaranteed and the interest on those bonds, as well as the expenses of the national railway, by passing this bill? As far as I have been able to understand from the bill itself, or from the speakers on the government side, or others who have supported the measure, I cannot see how the position of the Canadian people can be improved in the slightest degree by the passing of this bill. Therefore, unless such assurance can be given me as a representative of the people in this enterprise, I feel it my duty to oppose the bill. I contend that this bill will jeopardize the investments for which the people have become responsible. The people of Canada cannot carry both systems while the fixed charges remain as they are. Up to this time the two railway systems have been running in competition. According to the statement of the minister and many others, as far as this bill is concerned, this competition is not to be interfered with. But the inevitable logic of competition is that one or other of the systems will not survive. Faced with the fact that competition is not to be interfered with, according to the minister, and recognizing that the logic of competition means that either the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific will ultimately go down, there are only two courses which this government could take. The first course is competition to the death, giving no quarter to the Canadian Pacific, writing off the dead stock of the Canadian National, economizing in every legitimate way, getting the best possible management, meeting the Canadian Pacific at every turn with irresistible competition. The other course is the nationalization of the Canadian Pacific along with the other. There is no middle course. Of course we cannot nationalize the Canadian Pacific on the same basis as we did the Canadian National, for to-day that would bankrupt the nation. But the bill does not propose that we nationalize the Canadian Pacific, it proposes rather something which would require Professor Einstein and the use of his fourth dimension to explain, for it is to be competition with cooperation, and outside of the fourth dimension I am unable to explain what that would mean. In spite of the fact that the management was highly praised by the minister for having saved the nation a great deal of money last year this management is to be changed, and the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway are to be given at least equal attention.

Perhaps it may be regarded by some as being part of the duty of this government and of parliament to give equal attention to concerns other than national concerns, but since the bonds guaranteed by the Canadian people would be jeopardized if the Canadian National were to be run inefficiently or to yield in competition to the other line I maintain that our first duty is to the Canadian National, in order that these bonds may not be endangered by any hesitation on the part of the administration to face the competition of the opposing system. Since competition is to be adhered to, according to the decision of the government, I submit that the national system must fight the Canadian Pacific to the death. Every ton of goods hauled over the Canadian Pacific which might be hauled by the Canadian National will jeopardize that enterprise and endanger the investment that has been guaranteed by the Canadian people. I say this bill brings about fraternity with the enemy, and since the government under the proposed measure loses control of management of the national system it may be even worse than that. Hon. members may argue that if the government should put the resources of the state behind the Canadian National and enter into keen, cutthroat competition with the Canadian Pacific it would mean the ultimate bankruptcy of the Canadian Pacific, but bad though that might be I say it would be better than the bankruptcy of the nation, and in my opinion this course will bankrupt the nation.

Let us look for a moment at this proposed compulsory arbitration. I conceive that this would be resorted to most frequently when one line or the other made extravagant claims in one particular; this body then would decide just how the matter should be settled. Let us suppose that this board should make what might be regarded as a fair decision under the circumstances; no one would quarrel with that. But let us suppose this arrangement had not been made and that through competition the Canadian National gained the advantage otherwise yielded by a decision of the board. Then to the extent that such an advantage might be nullified by the actions of the arbitral tribunal the Canadian people would suffer and their bonds would be jeopardized. If on the other hand, however, as a result of competition the Canadian Pacific would have obtained an advantage but for the decision of the board, then there will come a time when this railway problem no longer can be put off as it is put off by this bill and when the effect on the financial structure of the company inevitably will be felt. Then the Canadian Pacific Railway will have at least a moral, and for all I know a legal, claim upon this government for having interfered with open competition and having thus brought the railway to the point where it cannot longer carry on. That will be the argument, and in that case we will find the people of Canada left holding the bag in both instances, burdened with the responsibility of meeting the bonds of both railway systems.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the objective of this parliament should be one national railway system, and that system may be evolved in one of two ways. The first method of bringing about one national system of railways would be by having the Canadian National successfully compete with the Canadian Pacific until that road became bankrupt, when it might be taken over at bankrupt prices. So far as I know there is only one other way of accomplishing that purpose; that is to face the facts as they are and conscript or expropriate the Canadian Pacific as it now stands. There is no other course open except the yielding of the Canadian National to the Canadian Pacific, thus losing to the Canadian people the investment they have guaranteed by the assets of the nation. Of course I appreciate the fact that this house would not think of conscripting the Canadian Pacific; the house only thinks of conscripting men in time of war. It is all right to conscript men, give them $1.10 a day and kill them; there is nothing wrong about that. But when this nation is faced with a tremendous problem which neither the government nor the opposition can solve, if one should propose that in order to meet this problem we should create one national system by conscripting the Canadian Pacific, and pay $1.10 a day to those holding Canadian Pacific bonds while they lived, that would be considered a great tragedy; it would be breaking faith with the bondholders. It is much simpler for us to break faith with humanity; that really does not matter, but the bondholders must be saved without regard to expense.

In view of the fact, therefore, that this bill rather evades the situation which it purports to meet; in view of the fact that it proposes to put competition on a cooperative basis, which is impossible and which in the last analysis probably will mean that the government will stop competing but that the Canadian Pacific will continue; in view also of the fact that if this bill is carried into practical effect it will mean jeopardizing the investment guaranteed to the bondholders of the Canadian National by the people of Canada, as a representative of those people I have no choice but to vote against the bill.

Mr. C. E. FERLAND (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the house desires to hear the remarks with which the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) will close this debate, but I should like to place on record my personal views with regard to this very important question. Since I am more familiar with the French language I should like to speak in French, but for doing so I do not offer any apology. I want everyone to know that I am simply exercising a right which for many years in the past was denied but which now is acknowledged by both parties in this house.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, the bill under discussion is the most important one which has come before parliament since I have had the honour of representing the constituency of Joliette, in the house. This railway problem is probably the most serious one we have had to solve and is of the utmost interest to my constituents. Canada must settle the question of our railways. To my mind, this measure is important because it concerns the whole of Canada and more particularly the town of Joliette where we have a terminal station. The hon. Minister of Railway and Canals (Mr. Manion), in a splendid speech, when introducing this bill, expressed his personal views as well as those of the government of which he is a member.

I heartily agree with him on one point, namely, when he acknowledges the efficiency, ability, experience and competence of the higher officials of the Canadian National in managing this colossal enterprise. I entirely agree with him, and I am glad, indeed, to associate myself with him in congratulating the higher officials not only of the Canadian National Railway but also those of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

However, there is one phase to which I wish to take special exception. In these days of economy, I think that the higher officials of our railway companies are too highly paid in contrast with the salaries received by the Prime Minister and other members of the government. I was glad to hear, not long ago, that both senators and members, would again be given the opportunity to subscribe $400 to the public treasury, by a cut made in our parliamentary indemnity. It is a duty for members to accept with the best grace and satisfaction this cut of $400, because this sacrifice asked from senators and members is of a nature to encourage the poor, if not in a pecuniary manner, at least morally. It behooves members as well as all public administration, to set an example in such matters of economy and self-sacrifice that is incumbent on everybody, in order to relieve the crisis and help the poor who are more numerous than ever.

The higher railway officials, as I have just stated, are too highly paid. First, their own private interests are not at stake. They manage a public enterprise, their positions are permanent and assured, as secure as those of our hon. senators; therefore, in my opinion, their salaries should not be as large. However, I do not insist on that point as I shall refer again to it.

At present, there is a railway question, in Joliette, which needs to be settled, I have already drawn the attention of the house to it, in my first speech in this Chamber. When I had the honour of seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I requested the government of that date as well as the railway management to recognize the rights of the town of Joliette, in connection with the car repair shops. The following day, I read in a newspaper, opposed to our views, that for a member who moves or seconds the address it was certainly overstepping the mark to rebuke the government.

I have confidence in the fairness, rectitude, experience and competency of the present president of the Canadian National Railways. Mr. Hungerford rendered me a service at one time. About two years ago, I headed a delegation of the municipal councillors of Joliette who were to interview Sir Henry Thornton, in Montreal; we submitted our case, namely, what we considered our rights in connection with the Joliette terminal station. As Sir Henry Thornton generally made no decision without consulting his high officials, he called in his engineers, some experts and Mr. Hungerford. After perusing part of the memorandum which I had prepared in English so that it might be understood by all, Mr. Hungerford, in the presence of Sir Henry Thornton, stated that by virtue of the well known contract between the city of Joliette and the Canadian National Railways, we were requesting a terminal station and shops for the repair of cars in Joliette. He added the following which is important: A terminus comprises a superintendent and his staff. We are entitled to a terminal station in Joliette, according to the contract to which I have just referred; however, at present, we have neither superintendent nor any staff. All business transactions are carried on in Montreal; our repair shops have been abandoned and the Canadian National railway has completely disregarded a valid contract which still exists, and all cars are repaired in Montreal.

About 1900, the mayor of Joliette was the Hon. Justice Mathias Tellier, who, to-day, presides over the Quebec Court of Appeals, one of the most learned judges of our province; I take great pride in this fact since, beside being a relative, he resides in my town. Mr. Tellier himself prepared and had the contract to which I refer, accepted; it was endorsed by the Quebec Legislative Assembly and may be found in the Quebec Statutes of 1900, 63 Victoria, chapter 59. There is no need to enter into details about this contract since it is embodied in a statute. I already told Sir Henry Thornton that he could not read, when we disagreed on the interpretation of this contract.

As Sir Henry Thornton has passed away, I do not intend to quarrel with him in his grave; quite the contrary, I pray God to forgive him the errors of his ways inasmuch as the city of Joliette is concerned, but especially because he was responsible for a loss amounting to about $100,000 per year, to that city.

By virtue of the contract upon which my request is based, the Great Northern Company obtained subsidies and exemptions of taxes which amounted to a considerable sum; it undertook to establish and maintain permanently, in Joliette, car repair shops; to establish and maintain a terminus or a divisional point where it was to repair the cars of the division comprised between Joliette and Quebec, in the province of Quebec, and between Hawkesbury and Joliette, in the province of Ontario.

[Mr. Ferland.]

The shops which the company had built were destroyed by fire in 1925 and were never rebuilt by the Canadian National Railways which practically stopped all work in Joliette. I have here a list of cars which, during the years 1931 and 1932, were sent from Longue Pointe to Joliette, thence from Joliette to Montreal, for repairs. According to the terms of our contract, these cars should have been repaired in Joliette. Instead of adhering to the terms of this contract, these cars are sent a distance of 70 miles to Montreal, to be repaired. Thus the ratepayers' money was wasted by sending these cars to Montreal or vicinity, when they should have been repaired in Joliette.

I have no need of stating, sir, that I am not satisfied with the mangement of the National Railways, inasmuch as it affects Joliette. Perhaps, it may be said, to-morrow: The member for Joliette is not satisfied with the policy of the higher officials of the National Railways, and in retaliation he requests that their salaries be reduced. No, sir, I am more serious and honourable than that, if I request that their salaries be reduced, it is because I deem it only fair and equitable. I do not think it right for any citizen of Canada, whether he is president of a large insurance company or member of a board of directors of a railway, to draw from their own treasury a salary of $40,000 or $50,000 per year.

At present, when we have hundreds of thousands of unemployed, who are in distress and receive but three or four dollars per week to feed and keep up a home with a family of five, ten or twelve children, I state, no one in this country is entitled to draw from the treasury of large insurance companies or railways an annual salary of thirty, forty or fifty thousand dollars.

It is absurd and inexcusable for the representatives of the people to tolerate such abuses.

I am opposed to this bill for various reasons. I do not intend to repeat all the arguments set forth by my liberal colleagues, however, briefly, I may state that the bill is a great menace to the security and welfare of the workers or railway employees; it is the most threatening bill that has ever come before Parliament or Legislature of any province. It is inconceivable that,—owing to the problem being so important and requiring to be studied by experts, technical and experienced men—this bill does not provide at least, for the appointment of a representative of the labour classes on the board of management.

Railwaymen constitute a body of worthy citizens who are entitled to our gratitude for their services. The employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway or Canadian National Railway, are highly thought of, they are the fathers of fine families in the various provinces; they have travelled, are well read and received their education in our schools. In 1923, 210,000 were employed, since that date, 90,000 were thanked for their services and have joined the ranks of the great army of unemployed. This bill having closed every avenue to the railwaymen, there will be fifty or seventy-five thousand less, within two or three years.

Shall the answer be: we must do something. A liberal senator stated, the other day, at a caucus: "The people of Canada expect that something will be done; it is shameful to allow deficits to accumulate and thus waste the people's money. It is said that our two railway systems show a deficit of $1,000,000 per week—

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Do not betray caucus secrets.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): —we must come down to brass tacks, practice thrift, the people expect the government to act.

The government must act. Has it done anything to relieve unemployment? May I point out that the bill under consideration will permit us to carry out the following economy: Where two stations exist, one will be done away with; duplication of lines will no more exist; thousands and thousands of railway men will be dismissed and within three or four years, about half of the railway employees will feel the sting of this measure.

In the name of economy all kinds of hardships will have to be borne by the labouring classes. If such is the aim which the government has in view, I deem it my duty as representative of the farmers, workmen and railway employees to protest and vote against this measure.

I received, quite a while ago, the memorandum of railway organizations, entitled: "Memorandum of Comments and Recommendations."

Submitted on behalf of the standard organizations of railway employees covering the report of the Royal Commission on Railways and Transportation in Canada, 1932.

This memorandum is dated November 24, 1932. I wish to state that I entirely endorse without restrictions, this memorandum which is full of wisdom and couched in moderate terms, in a spirit of conciliation. It contains splendid suggestions to solve our problem and I am pleased to side with the workmen and endorse this report.

May I take a few minutes of the time of the house to enumerate the names of the organizations which signed, approved and endorsed this report. The list follows.

Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.
Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.
Order of Railway Conductors.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Have you any knowledge whether this report was forwarded to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion)?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If the Prime Minister were in the House, he could inform us.

Mr. JEAN (Translation): It was addressed to all members.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): I do not think that the question of the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette) is a serious one, because he must be aware, as we are all, that this memorandum was addressed to all members, and that the Prime Minister, as a member, has as high a standing as the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé, who is a personal friend of mine.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If the Prime Minister is not in the House, it is because he is endeavouring to master that report.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): In expressing my congratulations to the railway men, in connection with their memorandum, I do so with some reserve. It is of some import to my compatriots, and I wish to make myself clear, even at the risk of making enemies. If to keep my mandate, I cannot express my views, I invite my constituents to withdraw this mandate at the next election. If we are to champion the rights of our fellow-citizens each time justice is denied them, I think that due regard should be shown for the candid opinions of those who wish to follow my example in this respect. Here is a report of which thousands of copies have been printed, a report dealing with the most important question as regards the future of Canada, the welfare of employees, workmen and all citizens generally. I am addressing the House in French, although I have an English copy of the memorandum in my hands. This report is interesting; I could quote extracts, but it has not been translated in French. Does any one think that I am going to waste my time in translating a report covering twenty or twenty-five pages, when I have, as a member, so many other duties to attend, obliged as I am to pass three days a week among my constituents and four days here attending to my duties, as a member; morever having to waste twelve hours on each trip from Ottawa to Joliette? Do you think it reasonable on the part of railway employees. who although they have our sympathy and know that we support their claims, to show such little consideration for the French language as to not address us a document of such importance in French? Do you think it reasonable on the part of these gentlemen to expect that members will become translators, waste four or five hours to translate a document of such importance? I am aware that ill-intentioned people will contend that the member for Joliette is unable to translate this English report into French and that some member with a better knowledge of languages could have read this English text in French. That may be so. I do not contend that I can read an English text and at the same time give a perfect version of it in French. It would be boasting that I have a thorough knowledge of English and the genius of Shakespeare. Let my National railway friends and those who form part of labour organization accept my remarks in the best spirit. They are not addressed to the railway men but to a narrow minded group of English speaking people who always wish to curtail our rights of speaking French; this is very wrong. It is wrong for railway men, the Government or any political party to ignore the French language. In this matter, I think that my friends from those parts of Canada where French is spoken will agree with me and admit that it is time to wake up, if we do not wish to see, twenty-five years hence, every thing anglicized in this Parliament, as in the Senate, and discover, one day, that we have no more bilingual civil servants and practically no French Canadians employed by large companies, governments and public services.

Before resuming my seat, Sir, I wish to read to the House an important document which I received from the employees of the two railways in Joliette, the C. N. Ry and C. P. Ry., dated February 23, 1933, and bearing the signatures of every employee, and, couched in the following terms:

Joliette, Feb. 23, 1933.

Mr. Charles Edouard Ferland, M.P., for Joliette.

Dear Sir,—

Whereas the railway companies have decided to reduce, for the second time, the wages of their employees, we the undersigned, all in the employ of said railways, in your district, beg of you to espouse our cause and this to the best of your ability, for the reasons undermentioned:

Whereas last year we had to undergo a reduction of ten per cent in our wages.

Whereas the railway companies realized, during the year 1932, substantial savings and were able to show a reasonable balance sheet, considering the depression prevailing in all spheres of activity, which is a direct proof of the sacrifices, already too numerous, imposed on their employees.

Whereas said employees retained in the service of our two large railways have to their credit a length of service of at least ten years, all heads of family and receiving wages already too little remunerative and equitable.

Whereas if the proposed cut is carried out the salaries of the undersigned would be of a minimum of $900 and maximum of $1,800.

Whereas, if other economies are necessary, it is important that those who receive higher salaries be first affected, this to conform with the decision taken in connection with the civil service.

As our representative we beg of you to nobly champion our cause and to rest assured that we shall greatly appreciate this cooperation.

This document carries weight and comes at a time when economies are practised at the expense of railwaymen who are unfairly treated. Because the government and a number of companies, here and there, throughout the country, enforce a ten per cent cut in salaries, the railwaymen are reduced 20 per cent. I would request the hon. Minister of Railways to use his good influence to prevent railway companies perpetrating this injustice.

Before closing my remarks, sir, I wish to state that I am opposed to the present policy of the government for reasons known to all;

however, I wish to add that I disapprove also of the abuses perpetrated in the past by capitalists in this country. I strongly protest against such abuses. I do not request a change in the fundamental principles of our constitution and administration, but I request the government to be more vigilant and guarded against the large corporations which, in the past, have, in many instances, robbed the people. Keeping this in mind, no new measure will even be necessary, since the companies act embodies a clause which provides for such acts and stipulates that the government may hold an inquiry over the operations of any company doing business in this country.

I therefore close my remarks by requesting my railway friends to forget my reproaches with reference to the French language, and I wish to openly state: Above all, I am a French Canadian, honi soit qui mal y pense.

Mr. C-N. DORION (Quebec Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Ferland), in the narrow path he has pursued.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): A slippery one.

Mr. DORION (Translation): This bill is a national affair, and should be studied in that light. When we examine the present railway situation in Canada, we quickly conclude that radical remedies must be applied, without further delay. It is futile, for the moment, to seek the origin of such a situation and place the responsibility of it on such and such a political party. This question has been before the public for the last twenty-five years. Already, in 1925, a special committee of the Senate was selected to hold an inquiry and report on the means to be taken to relieve the country of the heavy expenditures in which our railways had dragged us. A number of plans were proposed and these form the nucleus of the Duff Commission's report.

We are bound to acknowledge the fact that, of all the difficulties prevailing in the various spheres of our national activities, the transport industry of railways is certainly the one which affects us the most. The situation of this industry is most alarming. No more than in the various fields of activity were our railways spared, however, what makes the settlement of the problem more difficult, is that it embraces our entire national life.

Personally, I do not think that the remedy proposed by the present bill can entirely restore the finances of our railways, although it will perhaps, improve the conditions now prevailing. Even after this measure is enacted, we must discontinue the operation methods used heretofore.

No doubt we will be called upon, before long, to again legislate in order to rescue what can be saved by merger, in connection with the management and operation of the railways, namely the colossal sums invested in the railways by the Canadian government and shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Let us be frank, is this not the beginning of a liquidation? Is it not our duty to endeavour to make this liquidation the least burdensome possible for the Canadian people? If we do not stem the tide of this crisis, it is the entire structure of our financial system which will be shaken.

In a message to the United States Congress, President Hoover pointed out the immense danger threatening the United States railways, and I think the same may be said of our Canadian railways.

> The railway problem, he stated, is, among all, the most pressing one. The prosperity of our railways is closely linked to that of all the country's industries. The financial stability of the railways is of the utmost importance to the United States, and all improvement in the economic situation is subordinate to its maintenance.

This weighty statement, I repeat, might also have been made to the Canadian people. Our railways had and still have to contend with numerous defects: too numerous lines; double or triple services without any profit possibility; exaggerated and ruinous competition with one another for over forty years; lack of a sound policy generally in the railway management; numerous duplication of lines, etc. But what has caused more trouble in the railway transport industry are the senseless expenditures as, for instance, the building of large hotels, many of which cannot meet their cost of operation; also the continual and unrestricted borrowing, either on long or short terms, without providing for a sinking fund to meet these liabilities. I shall not quote what the amounts of the liabilities of our two railways are, they are on record. Without the continuous and repeated help given by the state to the Canadian National Railways they would have been bankrupt long ago.

Again, I state that I am doubtful of the complete efficiency of the remedy proposed by the bill under discussion. With the fixed charges which burden the national railways, the enormous capital which must be refunded, and the mortgages they are burdened with, their operation becomes almost impossible.

Very little can be saved; however, if, to protect what can be saved, a merger is necessary, the sooner it comes the better it will be. If traffic continues to decrease, the business depression persists, road transport competition by motor vehicles continues to increase, I cannot see any other solution.

It is true that in resorting to this solution, there would be a conflict of interests and strong economic and social controversies would rise; however, we must be fearless, a surgical operation, although painful, is necessary and we must not flinch in carrying it out.

I think that in their conclusions the members of the Duff commission did not go as far as some of them would have wished. Moreover, they express themselves as follows:

> Some members would have preferred a plan which would have established a complete dissociation of the government of Canada from the responsibilities of competitive railway management or of any direct interest therein.

Must we not conclude that, had there not existed, during the inquiry, a general sentiment against merging, their recommendation would have been to merger? Fortunately, for some time past, our railways, under the influence of a pressing necessity, have greatly reduced their expenditure. Their staff has been decreased, salaries cut down, the amounts set aside for the maintenance of the rolling stock and roadway were also reduced. However, there is a limit which we cannot overstep if we wish to have an efficient service; notwithstanding this retrenchment, there seems to be no other possible issue, unless we confess that our state railways are bankrupt, come to terms as insolvent debtors and act accordingly.

This deplorable situation does not exist only in Canada, but also in the United States, England, France, Germany, and all countries where railways are meeting with serious difficulties.

No doubt, the economic crisis is one of the causes of this situation. The competition of motor vehicle transport is still a greater cause. One can foresee that the difficulties arising from the crisis are only temporary; however, one cannot look upon the competition created by motor vehicles in the same light. Unfortunately, too busy carrying on a disastrous competition with one another, our two railway systems forgot—or did not notice—that another kind of conveyance had appeared and, are we to judge by its rapid progress, this competition will further increase, unless we entirely revise the statute on transportation. Up to a few years ago, the railways had the monopoly of transports; on the one hand the governments protected this monopoly while on the other hand they destroyed it by constructing at a great expense a system of new roads to facilitate motor vehicle transport. It is a waste of time to keep on blaming the railways for not having adapted themselves to the new conditions created by road transport. It behooves us to seek a remedy to an existing situation.

Two urgent solutions are required: regulate the various kinds of transports; reorganize by merging the railways under state control for management and transport purposes. It is understood that we cannot interfere or decrease certain services because they are public necessities. It appears difficult to carry out further economies, if we wish efficient service, at the same time keeping in mind public requirements.

The members of the Duff commission realized how road competition greatly affected our railways. No doubt exists that motor vehicles take away from railways the lighter and best paying kind of traffic. The traffic which is left to the railways is not a profitable one, it is the burdensome kind. Railway traffic is based on the following principle: merchandise having a high value pay for those that have less value. Therefore they sustain considerable losses. It behooves us to establish as soon as possible a trade equilibrium in connection with transports by putting into force rates which would be in the interest of both motor vehicles and railways; to put the two financially on equal bases and rationing traffic to the various modes of transport. Thus the motor vehicle could do the service of branch lines while the railways would look after the traffic of the main lines. At certain points the motor vehicle roads would reach the main lines, thence the traffic would be by railway. With that end in view, the entire cooperation of the provinces with the Dominion government would evidently be necessary. Since it is a question which affects the whole nation, I do not see why this cooperation would be refused. The necessary authority to bring about this cooperation, this coordination, would have to be left to an absolutely independent board. There would then be one schedule of prices, one service, one contractor and one responsible organization.

Would that not be the means of giving an efficient service to the public, with its modern requirements, which demands that goods be left where they are required.

So far as the reorganization of the railway systems—I repeat what I stated a moment ago—the merger of the railways is necessary for management and transport purposes. The following are the recommendations of the Senate committee in its report, at page 412 of the journals of the Senate in 1925:

> The merging of the two railways for purposes of operation and administration as above will remove or dispense with duplication in railway tracks and rolling stock in passenger and freight services, in railway stations from the Atlantic to the Pacific in telegraph, express and other service, in offices in accounting, in book keeping, in numerous other special offices and staffs, in administration boards, etc., etc., and thereby and otherwise save an enormous amount of money to the country.

The two railways systems must better regulate their operations, utilize in common a number of services and adapt themselves to modern conditions of transportation. There must be total or partial merger of certain services. The arbitral tribunal provides, in the bill under discussion, enforced cooperation if necessity arises. However, I think it would have been better to make the authority of this tribunal more effective by making it larger.

As to the financial question of these two railway systems, I do not think myself sufficiently qualified to express my views on the subject. May I, however, request that this intense competition be stopped, it is one of the causes of the present plights of our railways. So far as the Canadian National Railways are involved, I think that an estimate of their assets should be made not from their present balance sheets, but on a real and equitable base, that of their probable future returns. It is perhaps still possible for the state railways to practise more economy where it would not affect the efficiency of the service or the maintenance of equipment; a still further cut in the salaries of the higher officials is necessary. For both railways, the burden of municipal, provincial and federal taxes should not be heavier for them than for other industries.

There is no doubt, sir, that this bill will help to improve the management of our railways although I repeat that I do not think that the measure will entirely solve the problem. It is a relief for the time being; however, it is necessary, under the circumstances, to adopt this measure which is based on a report the conclusions of which are inspired both by common sense and the public welfare.

Mr. J. A. VERVILLE (Lotbinière) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I closely followed the speech which the hon. member for Quebec Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), has just read to the house. From his viewpoint, his speech is a vindication of the bill under consideration, it is also, to a great extent, a censure of the measure. So far as we can judge by the provisions of the bill, we must readily recognize that it lays down a principle that we must either accept or reject. Must the government exercise a control over our railways? This question is clearly stated in the bill.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): My reply to this question is that I cannot answer for the Liberal party; however, as a member of the opposition, I state that the government should not divest itself of the responsibility which it assumed when it took over the administration of the railways of this country.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): That is the point!

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): If, at the time, the government were justified in assuming the responsibility for the administration of our railways, it behooves them, to-day, to carry on this administration, and, I wonder why the government tell us: Let us set aside this responsibility, because the Senate requests us to do so and wishes us to act in such and such a way. Who is responsible to the people? The House or the Senate?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The people.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Louder.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I put the question, whether I do so in a loud voice or not, the question is put and let hon. members answer it.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The people.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I am in favour of the bill inasmuch as no merger of railways is contemplated or the national railways, do not become the property of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): That is to the point!

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I should like to use an expression which is commonly used—however politeness and the rules of the house do not allow us to disclose all our thoughts. I shall simply state: The bill such as it is, is very indefinite as to what may become of our railways. The government will appoint three commissioners—designate them as you please—however, let us proceed rationally; there is no intelligent member who does not foresee what will happen. The government will appoint some one to represent the Canadian National Railways, there is no doubt that it will he a person connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The latter will naturally recommend also, that one of its men be appointed, both will then choose a third person who will again be a Canadian Pacific Railway man. We shall then have three Canadian Pacific Railway men to manage the Canadian National Railways. The bill states that there will be no merger; however, the bill embodies all the necessary provisions to safeguard the Canadian Pacific Railway bondholders—there are a great number of them on the government side and they will appoint their own men to carry out the merger of the Canadian National Railway, with the Canadian Pacific Railway; not officially, as this merger practically took place two years ago.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): Quite to the point!

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): To better illustrate what I have in mind, may I state that, if one has travelled the least between Quebec and Montreal—the railway distance is not a long one, 170 miles—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It is a tedious trip.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): —one knows that the Canadian National Railways gave us a very efficient train service between Quebec and Montreal. It has now been discontinued. This train afforded people, who were travelling to Montreal, an opportunity of arriving early to pass a quiet evening.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Co-operation! co-operation!

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): What train does the hon. member take?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I always took the train on which I could get service, that is the one which was taken off. Now, each time I have to travel to Quebec, I take the Canadian Pacific Railway because I get better service, for which the officials of the Canadian National Railway became responsible when they discontinued this train service to the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): Shame! shame!

[Mr. Verville.]

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I should like to ask the government a question; however, I know the government will refuse to answer it: When the Grand Trunk was purchased by the government so as to permit the bondholders to save whatever money they had invested in this enterprise, is it not a fact that the higher officials of the Grand Trunk were transferred to the management of the Canadian National Railways? After putting, first, the Grand Trunk into bankruptcy, to-day these same officials are responsible for putting the Canadian National Railways into bankruptcy! And to thank them for this service, positions are created for them! They are told: we shall merge your company with the Canadian Pacific Railway; however, you must keep it quiet; the bill stipulates: no merger, fair competition.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): There is more than one way of killing a cat!

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): One complains that the government railways are costly, that they do not meet their liabilities, that the country must disburse millions and millions of dollars yearly to meet their deficits. I wonder how it happens that this was only discovered since our friends opposite have assumed power. Have hon. members opposite noticed that a crisis existed throughout the country? Have they noticed that there was a business depression? They stated when they were endeavouring to get in power, that there was nothing abnormal. Do they notice anything now? They were wrong, they expected that the crisis would only last a year; it is lasting too long for them and, to-day, instead of admitting that they were wrong, they confess their incompetence.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): It will destroy them.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): They have made quite a find to replace the word merger; fair competition. Is there anything which would lead us to believe that our hon. friends are in favour of fair competition? Let them state it openly! We belong to the people, we live among the people, we are not capitalists. We might make suggestions which would improve the lot of our railways, however, they state that they could not accept them because their leaders, the front benchers, would not wish to invest their millions in any enterprises we might suggest.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Not the millions of the hon. Minister of Marine?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Instead of concealing the facts, let them state, in the house, that they are ready to act; let them ask us for suggestions and show that they are ready to accept them and co-operate with us. They request co-operation, let them give us proof that they are in earnest. That is necessary—

Mr. DORION (Translation): Honey would be needed.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I did not catch what my hon. friend said. Would he kindly speak louder.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): The hon. member said that honey would be needed.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): That is not slippery enough.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): That is unnecessary, there is much more on this side than there is on the opposite side, that is why the ground is more slippery on one side.

Mr. DORION (Translation): It can also be found in bee-hives.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I am amazed, after all the speeches I have heard in the house, to note that no one discussed a deficiency in the service of the railways and which is a cause of a large decrease in their yearly returns. No one referred to it. Is it to protect certain interests, certain people? I wonder. I requested, last autumn, that the freight rates on cord-wood be reduced. I stated then that it was astonishing to note that it cost more to ship a car-load of cord-wood from the county of Lotbinière to Montreal, than the wood itself cost. At present a car of cord-wood, including the loading, costs $28, while the freight rate, from Lotbinière to Montreal, is $43. I requested a lower rate, and I wish to thank the hon. Minister of Railways for the correspondence exchanged between myself, the railways and his department in this respect. Unfortunately, the final answer came, that it was impossible to lower the freight rates.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): However, many promises were made.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): A car of cord-wood costs $28 loaded, and it costs $43 to ship it to Montreal, a distance of 170 miles. Mr. Hungerford, who is acting as president of the Canadian National railways, occupying the same post as the late Sir Henry Thornton, assured me that it was impossible to lower the freight rates.

I wish to draw the attention of the house to another point? The price, at present for a return ticket from Laurier to Montreal, is $8.40. Excursions are organized, at times, and the price of a return ticket is $2.50. When these excursions are held, forty to fifty people take advantage of it. This has been going on for six months, even last week there was such an excursion. When the price is $2.50 people travel to Montreal. They have not the means to pay $8.40. One complains of motor vehicle competition. What happens? A person that owns a motor car invites others to travel to Montreal as paying guests, as they travel four or five in a car the expenses are small and much cheaper than by train. However, people do not care to travel as far as Montreal by motor car, they prefer the safety and comfort of trains. Only, the cost is too high. Let the railways bring down the passenger rates. They have had some experience by their excursions, there is again one this week, from Toronto to Montreal for $2. Why is this done? Because it is profitable to the railways. Reports from ticket agents show that people travel when railway fares are reasonable. Then why not lower the passenger rates and ask a reasonable price?

The same may be said for freight rates. Railways complain of a lack of freight traffic. The public cannot afford paying the rates charged so they look elsewhere to have their goods transported. I shall cite a case: A small manufacturing concern had to ship 2,500,000 feet of lumber from Laurier station to Victoriaville, they inquired from the railways what their lowest rates would be, the directors found the rates too high, so they had these 2,500,000 feet of lumber transported by motor trucks and saved $1.50 per thousand feet. The name of the concern is the Olivier Mercier Company, of Laurier, it saved $1.50 per thousand feet by shipping its lumber by motor truck instead of by railway. That is the kind of service the public gets from those officials receiving $30,000 per year.

It was shown at the inquiry held two years ago, that there were more than 300 employees, both in the Canadian National Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway, receiving each $30,000 per year. I contend, sir, that not one of these officials should receive $30,000 at the present, when salaries are being reduced all over the country. Let the railways first reduce the salaries of their higher officials before depriving the small wage earners of their livelihood. Railway stations, which do not give big returns and where employees earn only $100 per month, are being closed. The order to close them comes from those officials who receive $30,000 per year.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Who appointed them?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Who appointed them? The railway management—and hon. members opposite are as guilty as we are.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Who appointed Sir Henry Thornton?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Let him rest in peace. I do not think that as much praise will be bestowed upon you, when you have passed away, as there has been upon Sir Henry Thornton.

Let the salaries of high officials be reduced before asking for our cooperation.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Why did you not reduce them?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Put out the officials who are useless and are like leeches.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): We would have to put out the opposition.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Do away with private cars. I could point out many abuses. At a certain divisional point, I know that some superintendents are unable to move fifty feet to attend to their private affairs without having a private car. Suppress such abuses. Begin by practising economy where it should be practised, among those who can afford it, they do not earn their money. That is what I request and I state so openly, because I know all this to be true.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): That is being very frank.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): The bill stipulates that there is to be no merger. May I inquire from the government how will the three trustees, who will manage the affairs of the Canadian National Railway be appointed, and who they will be? I shall go a step further and inquire whether they will give the names of those assigned to office. If we had the guarantee that our railways, while under government control, would be managed by people outside of political influence, who have not supplied funds to the Conservative party, who expect no favours and are appointed to carry out their duties and draw their salary, I might perhaps change my views; however, I know for certain that under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, three Tories will be appointed and that is why I protest.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Oh, oh.

[Mr. Verville.]

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): No doubt exists that the house will be asked one day or another to approve of their salaries; again, under the guise of economy—when $5,000 or $6,000 is sufficient for any man to earn—the salaries will be fixed at $15,000 or $20,000.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): With a pension?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): With a pension, that is understood. Such people display a great affection for their friends and wish to prove it while they are alive and ten years after they are in their grave, they still display this affection by paying a pension.

Mr. DORION (Translation): That reminds you of the time you were a Conservative.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): He was never a Conservative.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): He never made such a mistake in his life.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Or he mended his ways as he grew older.

Mr. SPEAKER (Text): I would ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of speaking for forty minutes. I have submitted my views to the house. There is one remedy, I do not know whether there is anyone opposite open-minded enough to refer to it; however, I shall suggest it myself: instead of recommending all kinds of quack remedies which are simply fool-traps, let them recommend a radical one; reduce the high salaries of officials in large companies, do away with big offices which are unnecessary. In Quebec, for instance, there is a railway superintendent, while in Levis there is another. Because a river separates these two cities, there is no need of two railway superintendents. Do away with one. I do not suggest to throw on the street the Quebec employees; let those who are required be transferred to Levis, but cut down the large salaries. Too much consideration seems to be shown for those who receive high salaries.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Did you suppress them previous to 1930?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Suppress them, do away with a superintendent and place the employees in one office. They will perform their duties more efficiently than at present. It will, perhaps, then be possible to suppress three or four salaries of $30,000. Do away with the private cars of superintendents. Nothing prevents them travelling in passenger cars like we do. There is an excellent Pullman with almost every train, let them travel in it. They travel free. Each time that the superintendent at Levis comes to my constituency, it costs the country $600 or $700—this happens three times a week.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Why did you not make such a suggestion when your party was in power?

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I am suggesting it now that this bill is before the house. It is because the Liberal party's policy was to never shift on private individuals the responsibility which was incumbent to them. To-day, it is proposed to shift this responsibility. Let us, as members, bear this responsibility.

It is not because railways are passing through a crisis that we should shift this responsibility. Everybody has made losses within these last years. If there is an institution which can afford losses, it is our national railways, since they have the people to back them while we have no one. It is a public service; let us bear our responsibility as in the past. Let us practise thrift and cooperate, as the bill states, but let the government show that they are in earnest by cooperating when they request us to do so. We point out the way, and, for my part, I have already made a suggestion.

Let the railway companies avoid duplicating their lines. Is there anything more ridiculous to see trains leaving Montreal for Ottawa, one at 3.30 p.m., another at 3.45 p.m., again one leaving at 6 p.m. and another at 6.15 p.m., and, in the morning, one at 8.25, and another at 8.30.

The railway officials have a hard time keeping up their time schedule to avoid collisions before the trains leave the station. I think some improvement could be carried out in this connection.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Trains have already collided.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Let both the Canadian National railway and Canadian Pacific railway cooperate in spacing the time between their express trains so that we may not be held up eighteen hours in Ottawa. This will avoid sending out three or four trains practically at the same time. The same thing happens between Montreal and Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It is the same everywhere.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Let us practise economy in big things and let us not close the doors of small country stations, which were built for the service they render to the public.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear! Hear!

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): The moment you close a station, motor coaches and trucks appear which cater to the people and divert traffic to the highways, to the detriment of the railways. This is happening at present, and, I shall prove it: there was an excursion from Quebec to Montreal, the price of the return ticket was $2.50; the local agent—I can give his name if the house wishes—called on me to inform me that some officials of the railway company had given an order for the train not to stop at Laurier station—this station serves five parishes. It was doubtful whether the train would stop or not. After numerous telephone messages, telegrams and protests, the train did stop, however, I was obliged to guarantee, personally, the sale of 25 tickets.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): How generous they are!

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): What happened? The train arrived with 32 passengers and took 37 on at Laurier station. We did this to help the Canadian National railways and our own citizens. Ever since, when there is an excursion the train stops. It is evident that a train which does not stop at a station cannot pick up passengers; yet the high officials of the railways, those who receive large salaries, do not seem to realize these facts. I have in all earnestness drawn the attention of the house to this matter, these are facts, although it may not please everybody.

I shall vote against the measure, because no explanation is given as to how the railway deficits are to be eliminated and, because the bill embodies a fool-trap clause which permits the government to safeguard the interests of their friends by helping the Canadian Pacific railway to the detriment of the Canadian National railways, inasmuch as the three trustees to be appointed will be Canadian Pacific railwaymen; finally, because it is submitted to the house by the government and its leader (Mr. Bennett) in whom I have no faith.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, my only reason for rising at this late stage of the debate is that the course of action which I propose to take on this bill will in all probability require some explanation and perhaps some apology, if not to the House of Commons, at least to my constituents.

Reading the report of the Duff commission I was particularly struck with the chapter dealing with the contributory causes of the railway problem. I do not propose in the time at my disposal to go into these causes, but I suggest that a study of them will help us to understand better what is proposed to be accomplished by this bill.

The first cause mentioned at page 53 of the Duff commission's report is, "the over-development of railways beyond the immediate needs of the country." May I point out, sir, that there is no great danger of any further over-development of railways at the present time or for some considerable time to come. The financial condition of the country, the financial condition of the Canadian National Railways and the financial condition of the Canadian Pacific Railway, would seem to indicate that at least for many years to come there will be no more of that over-development. On the other hand, the recommendation of the commission, which is translated into the bill, calling for cooperation in order to do away with any excess mileage at present existing, does I believe have some application, and for that reason I think the bill should receive at least some measure of support.

The second cause mentioned is the aggressive and uncontrolled competition between two nation-wide railway enterprises. That also is dealt with in the legislation which we have before us in the attempt by compulsory arbitration to do away with aggressive and uncontrolled competition. To that extent also I believe the bill is worthy of some support.

The third cause mentioned by the Duff commission reads:

> The reactions of the world trade repression which began in 1929 and has progressively increased in its severity with each succeeding year.

That cause is not dealt with in the bill at all; it is not even being considered by the government. It seems to me to be highly improper for the government to endeavour to bring about a solution of the railway problem without touching one of the fundamental causes which have brought about this problem. That feature has been dealt with by a number of speakers on this side of the house, and I do not wish to traverse the arguments which they have put forward, but may I submit that before we can accomplish anything in the way of rehabilitation of our railways we must first settle our trade difficulties, bring more trade to the country and more traffic to the railways.

There is another contributory cause mentioned by the Duff commission, namely, competition from other forms of transport, notably road transport. I notice that the commission took three or four pages in which to discuss the competition by road transport with rail transportation. In order to deal with this question I have but to refer to the observations made by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), who I think showed conclusively that on balance, if you take the advantages derived from the invention and operation of automobiles since their inception, you would find that the railways of Canada have profited far more from the automobile industry than possibly from any other industry, what with the building of roads necessitated by motor traffic, what with the traffic originating on account of the factories building motor vehicles, together with the traffic derived from the establishment of motor vehicle factories themselves. I remember that in 1928 or 1927 some member of the railway committee asked the late Sir Henry Thornton whether the railways had suffered from motor traffic, and the answer which he gave at that time in most emphatic language was that taking it by and large the railways had derived more profit from the shipment of automobiles and automobile materials than they had lost through the competition of automobiles engaged in road transport. And here I make the same observation, as did the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) that, strangely enough, the commissioners were somewhat loath to deal with water transportation. It seems to me that that was an extraordinary omission from a document such as the one they placed before the public of Canada. We were on the verge of entering into a contract with the United States of America—if we had not already done so—whereby we would throw open to water transport hundreds of miles of waterways. It is not necessary to quote figures to show that if the arguments put forward by those who favour the St. Lawrence waterway development are of any value whatsoever, the construction and operation of these waterways must inevitably take away from our railroads hundreds of millions of dollars worth of traffic. To the extent that the commission did not make a study of that question, and did not place figures or estimates before the people of Canada, to that extent I think they were lacking in the duty they were appointed to perform.

Then, there is another contributory cause, namely the inelasticity of freight rates and railway practice generally. This is not dealt with anywhere in the bill. Hon. members on both sides of the house have spoken about freight rates and have explained that either excessive freight rates or certain rates put into force have interfered with the normal development of the trade and commerce in the regions they represent. To my mind in the reconstitution of our railways it is of vital importance that something be done about freight rates. They have been mentioned, but purely casually, in the report. No indication or guidance is given to the people of Canada or to the House of Commons as to whether or not it was the belief of the commission that, by a decrease in freight rates on at least certain commodities, the trade of Canada might be further developed. I note that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is in his seat. I believe he will agree with me that at the present time it is absolutely unfair to maintain the same freight rate on lumber, for instance, when the cost of that commodity has decreased about one-third. The same is true all along the line. If we are not to be met with competition from road traffic we will have to decrease our freight rates.

Then, the sixth cause is:

Contractual arrangements with labour organizations which set up a rigid wage scale and inflexible labour practices generally.

I note that the commission was mighty careful to say nothing about that. They did not consider it within the ambit of their duty to make any recommendations along those lines. As I understand it, unfortunately this bill may bring about that which a great many people would like to have in Canada, namely a reduction of the wages of labour by the indirect method of setting up a board of trustees and an arbitral tribunal from which there will be no appeal, and which will not be affected by public sentiment.

Then, we come to No. 7 which, in my view, is the most important. We shall read to the end of the first subsection:

7. The special disabilities of the Canadian National Railways due to:—
(a) Assumption, through government action, of liabilities of insolvent railway systems for reasons of national credit.

I submit there is nothing in the legislation before us which can prevent that very thing from happening namely, assumption through government action, of liabilities to sustain the national credit of Canada. May I give an example? There is a railway in British Columbia known as the Pacific Great Eastern, the bonds of which are guaranteed or in some way secured by the people of that province. Should it so happen that traffic should fall off to an extent where the railway could no longer pay its bonds, I submit that as sure as we are in this House of Commons, at some time, sooner or later, the people of Canada in order to save the national credit, would be called upon to take over that road. There is nothing in the bill now before us to prevent it being taken over and placed under the control of the trustees.

Then, the large capital expenditures mentioned in subsection (b) of the special disabilities of the Canadian National Railways may perhaps to a certain extent be considered. But, in any case, there will continue to be these large capital expenditures, if we have to take over railroads, lame ducks, outside of the present system.

Then, subsection (c):

Political and community pressure on the management arising out of direct government control.

May I suggest nothing has gone out to the public so far which has given them a worse impression of the operation of the Canadian National Railways than has this very paragraph. They are under the impression that individual members of parliament, ministers, and people interested in politics throughout the country, simply through their political influence, have been able at any time to enter the offices of the various railway executives and impose large expenditures on the railways.

Mr. McINTOSH: They are judging others by themselves.

Mr. POWER: Paragraph 146 at page 51 of the report is as follows:

Of direct political interference by ministers and members of parliament in the detail operations of the railway, we were assured by the officials there was little or none. It was in the larger sphere of policy that political considerations led to unwise and unnecessary capital expenditures, the result of which was to create an atmosphere in which the ordinary principles of commercial operation of the railway were lost sight of.

There is nothing whatsoever in the bill to remedy that situation. If, for instance, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) were to find that the Temiscouata Railway, now being operated, I believe, by the Quebec Central Railway, a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway, were to be closed up, and if he were to come to this house with the same energy, the same ability and the same perseverance as he showed in connection with the railroad station in his constituency, he could force any government to take this road over, and there is nothing in the bill to prevent the government from doing so. If the House of Commons of Canada voted to take over any railway, it would be taken over. So, in so far as this bill purports to get away from the serious part of political interference, it fails. Having said that may I deal with the sections of the bill.

With the principle of section II which provides for cooperation, I am in accord. I do believe, however, that there should be some restrictions placed upon the powers of cooperation vested in the trustees. I believe it would be very dangerous, for instance, to leave in the hands of trustees the right and power to lease the Intercolonial railway or any part of it to the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is nothing in this bill to prevent it.

With part III, dealing with compulsory cooperation and the restriction of competition, I am also in agreement. I believe we have carried competition too far, not only in connection with railways but in many other things. I cannot agree with those who regard this provision as being of a confiscatory nature. I am convinced that it is the duty of parliament and of the people of Canada to see that corporations, no matter how large, are restrained in their operation and kept within the control of the people. It is true that in the theory of government usually held by persons on this side of the house the laissez-faire policy has been fundamental. But I believe that in this modern age we have to set that aside and think rather of the greatest good for the greatest number; and if in any community a corporation or an individual becomes too powerful and by its action threatens disorder to the state, or works injustice, it is the duty of the representatives of the people to restrain and restrict such action. For that reason I favour part III of the bill.

Coming to part I, I listened with considerable interest to the very remarkable speech made by the Prime Minister on March 9. It was remarkable in this, that as we listened I believe most of us were almost persuaded that it was one of the best speeches he has delivered in this house since he became Prime Minister. It was remarkable also in that when it is analyzed I think it is one of the worst. He began by giving us the political history of railroads in this country. I hope I may be excused for saying that the political part was better than the historical. He told us, in regard to part I of the bill, that the number of trustees should be three. At page 2858 of Hansard he is reported as follows:

> Why is the number three? It is the considered judgment of the commission, every one of them, that any number greater than three means disaster.

[Mr. Power.]

I wonder where the Prime Minister got that. I have not been able to find it in the Duff report. At page 2859 he continued:

> And by that unity of effort which three, rather than five, can make possible, we will restore the property to the position in which we desire it. That is the fundamental recommendation with respect to administration.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what is there that is fundamental, what is there that is holy, what is there that is sacrosanct about the number three?

Some hon. MEMBERS. The Trinity.

Mr. POWER: It is true that there are three leaves in the shamrock. But I hardly think the Prime Minister can expect us to accept as a fundamental principle of this bill, one of the things on which the government must stand or perish in the attempt, the number three. Perhaps three is a good number. I am of the opinion that perhaps the Prime Minister's speech was not intended so much for us on this side of the house as for some of his own supporters who showed indications of wanting more than three. I have an open mind as to whether the board of trustees should consist of three members or five, but the argument of the Prime Minister almost convinced me that I should vote against the bill, because if he attaches so much importance to the mere number of trustees it gives me the impression that when we endeavour to amend the bill before third reading we may get very little consideration for the suggestions we offer by way of amendment.

With respect to the powers of the board of trustees, I share entirely the views expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). We have no justification, no mandate, and no right to give away the property of the people of Canada—we believe it to be their property notwithstanding what the Prime Minister said—to give that property to any three men and tell them: "You may do what you like with it and we will pay the bill". As the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) said, he who pays the piper has the right to call the tune.

There is something more. No one who has spoken in favour of this bill on either side of the house has said anything more in its favour than that it is a palliative; no one has given it as his considered judgment that the bill is a permanent solution of the railway problem of Canada, not even the Minister of Railways, not even the Prime Minister, not even my hon. friend the member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I take it the best we can say for it is that it is an emergency measure to deal with certain aspects of the problem. It does not settle it; I do not think even the Minister of Railways will say that it does. Why, then, set up a board which by its very nature is irrevocable? We are dealing with a temporary situation; why set up an administration which cannot be changed or removed even by the will of the people of Canada? To that feature I have the strongest objection, and unless it is so changed as to bring these trustees more under the control of the parliament and people of Canada I shall be reluctantly forced to vote against the bill on third reading. We should be setting up an eternal self-perpetuating board, committed to payment of their salaries, and giving them full power to carry out their policies for the term of their appointment. Nobody taking over the management of a railway would lay down a policy for one month or one year; they would base their policy on the term of their tenure of office. I think in binding ourselves so we should be exceeding our mandate. Therefore unless this provision is altered I think many of us will have to vote against the bill on the third reading.

I propose to vote for the second reading because the bill is the outcome of the report of a commission which the government set up on the unanimous recommendation of the house. The recommendations of the commission's report are largely embodied in the bill, therefore it should have respectful attention, and it would be inconsistent and illogical not to permit the bill to come before the committee of the whole to be considered in detail, when it may be amended or modified. For that reason also I am inclined to support the second reading.

There is a further reason which perhaps should appeal more strongly to my friends on this side of the house. Never since the present administration came into office, so far as my recollection serves me, have we been so favoured by a minister bringing down a bill. When this bill was introduced the minister told us that he was prepared to consider amendments and that he would welcome suggestions from all quarters. In spite of the remarks of the Prime Minister, which to a certain extent seemed to limit the authority of the minister to consider our suggestions, I prefer to take the position that the minister, as the man responsible for this legislation, is in good faith and that, if he is not prepared to acquiesce in all the views we may express in committee, at least he will give us a fair hearing. We on this side of the house have constantly claimed that the government have not sought our cooperation. On this one occasion, when perhaps the government wishes to get away from its own responsibilty, I think it would be very ungracious if we did not extend every assistance and all cooperation in endeavouring to whip this matter into something resembling the form we think it should take in order to deal with the problem confronting the people of Canada to-day.

Since this debate opened a great deal has been said with regard to the lack of foresight and the extravagance displayed by the people of Canada. Perhaps while I am on that point I may be permitted, though some may consider it rather indecorous, to refer to a great Canadian who has just passed away. I realize that perhaps, in the midst of a controversy with regard to the things with which he was closely connected, this is neither the time nor the place to refer to his work, but I think all hon. members will agree when I say that Sir Henry Thornton was a great Canadian. At no time was that better shown than to-day, when hundreds of thousands of people throughout this country are bowing their heads in grief at the passing of a real friend.

I am not one of those, Mr. Speaker, who are prepared to hang their heads in shame because those who have gone before were extravagant in this matter of railways or in any other matter. That was characteristic of the people who inhabit this North American continent; it was characteristic of the two great races which make up the great Canadian people. They went forth into the blue to explore, to discover, to Christianize and to civilize. They were not fireside pioneers; they were not armchair explorers. They mortgaged their future when they went to the western prairies and when they took up land in the back settlements of Quebec and Ontario. They did not know from where the next dollar was coming. If they borrowed a few dollars from a merchant in order to go into the woods they never knew how they were going to repay that loan, but they did so through unremitting toil, they were sustained by high courage and they refused to despair. If during the good days we believed this country had a magnificent future; if we spent more money than we should it was, as I said before, only characteristic of the people. What do we care if we did spend too much? Are we any the worse off to-day because we indulged in an orgy of spending? I do not think we are. We gambled on the future of this country, and what young pioneer country would not gamble in that way? I believe throughout the length and breadth of this land to-day you will find people who are scheming and working in an endeavour to find a way out of their difficulties, and they are working far harder and exerting far more mental and physical effort than would have been the case if money had continued to be plentiful as in the days gone by. If in connection with our railways we are loaded with debt it is but an incentive to our people to show their courage, their initiative and all the other qualities which have made this country what it is to-day.

So, sir, I resent the charges of extravagance which have been made. Money might have been saved in some cases, but if it helps this country realize that we can only get along by working harder; if it helps us remember that our ancestors showed better foresight than we did; if it helps us realize that before we came on the stage of public life there were those in this country who believed that there was a future in Canada; if it helps us enter into the spirit of those men, I think Canada will become even greater and more prosperous.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, it will take but a very short time for me to say what I have to say. I think all hon. members will agree that our railway problem originated a long time ago, and that our railroads have been overbuilt and built unwisely because of paralleling lines and insufficient branch lines or feeders for the trunk lines constructed. Many of the original railroads which now go to make up the Canadian National Railways had gone broke. After a process of many railroads becoming fewer in number, they were then taken over as the national system. These roads were taken over at great cost but had they been written down to something like their real value we would have got rid of one of the difficulties which has followed us ever since. In my opinion the Canadian National Railways never had a real chance to show the virtues of public ownership. There was always this backbreaking burden of debt to carry, a debt which should not have been carried by the road proper. The earnings could not possibly cover the charges against the road. I have often thought that this national road was forced upon us before the public was ready to support public or state ownership. Then again we had the problem of having people connected with the administration who did not really believe in public ownership. It seems to me that I read some place that the present president of the road stated publicly that he did not believe in public ownership. It is a great handicap to any experiment if those conducting it do not believe in it.

I do not intend to discuss the bill in detail because those who have preceded me have done so much better than I could. I know the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) is having a very difficult time with the railways because of a lack of volume of traffic, but this bill will not increase traffic. It seems to me that the railway problem is being attacked in the wrong way. I believe that the deflationary monetary policy which has been pursued by this administration has had more to do with the lack of volume of traffic than any other one thing. There is not enough money in circulation to enable Canadians to exchange the goods they produce for other goods, and therefore the railroad traffic has been lessened. There are also the tariffs to be considered. While the monetary problem is fundamental and the tariff problem is not, it is rather curious that an administration that has done everything possible to obstruct international trade should now be worried because our railroads have not a sufficient volume of traffic. Not only have tariffs been raised higher and higher but we have had excise taxes and dumping duties as added obstructions to trade. Is it to be wondered at that we have a railroad problem of gigantic proportions? The ability of the Canadian people to produce goods has not been lessened; we could have just as great a volume of goods and passenger traffic as we ever had because there are just as many people and their ability to produce goods is just as great as ever.

If this bill should pass, our unemployment problem will be increased. Further unemployment will be created among the railway employees and the employees in the steel and other industries closely associated with the railroads. Employees of the railways and in the steel, wood-working and other industries will be affected. They will not be able to purchase as much as previously and this will prove to be but another step in the process of deflation and the further contraction of the purchasing power of the Canadian people. On general principles, I am opposed to the bill.

Apparently the government has expended much energy and time upon the railroad problem as a separate problem, but I think it would have been wiser had the administration devoted its energies to increasing traffic for the road. In my opinion, the best way to do this would have been to increase the medium of exchange and remove the obstacles to trade. It is also within the power of the Dominion government to lift the burden of federal taxation from the masses of the people and put it upon those best able to pay, by means of direct taxation. I believe that these methods would provide a permanent solution of our railroad problem, which I do not think is provided by this bill.

The bill calls for compulsory cooperation upon the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am afraid that that may lead to a moral responsibility on the part of the Canadian parliament for the bonds of the Canadian Pacific. There is a very real danger of it, and we want no more of that kind of thing. Having taken over the fearful debt burdens of the roads which went to make up the Canadian National, let us not put an additional burden upon the Canadian people in the form of responsibility for the Canadian Pacific bonds. In my opinion, people who hold bonds should take a chance of personal loss. If we are going to guarantee the Canadian Pacific bondholders against loss, as we have guaranteed the bonds of the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and so on, we should guarantee every individual in Canada against loss. But that we do not do, and so we ought to be very careful not to put ourselves in a position where there will be a moral obligation in connection with the Canadian Pacific bonds.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stressed the importance of the board of three to be appointed. Apparently the Canadian National is going into receivership and the members of this board are to be the receivers. If that is the case, the business of this board will be to get as much out of and put as little into the road as they possibly can. We may look for a curtailment of services and a possible disregard for the well-being of the employees of the road. If this board is to be a receivership, why should it be in perpetuity? That is the second reason why I am opposed to the bill in principle. I may not be justified in seeing these dangers, but I do see them in connection with a board that is self-perpetuating. No matter what the views of any future government may be they cannot change the committee of three without the consent of both houses of parliament, of which, as we know, in practice is very hard to get.

I should like to say a word or two about the commission. I think that mental capacity and integrity should be admired and respected whether found in high or low circles, at home or abroad. But the occupancy of a conspicuous position is not, in my opinion, necessarily proof that the incumbent possesses either or both these qualities. At any rate I have come to the place where I am not willing to take the word of any person just because that person holds a high position or possesses great wealth. I rather drew from the forceful words of the Prime Minister that it was almost going too far to criticize any members of the commission and that the commission being what it was, we should take its recommendations without further thought. With that I do not agree. I know very little about the members of the commission, but I want to tell the house an incident in relation to two of them which does not strengthen my faith in the recommendations of the commission. One is a very personal little incident. At a meeting in Newmarket a couple of years ago which was attended by Sir Joseph Flavelle, he stated that the bankers had only the savings of the people to lend and that they could not lend any money other than that of the depositors. I asked him if he actually meant what he said, and he replied that he did. I think no one could accuse Mr. Wayne Plumptre of Toronto university of being a radical. Yet he, in a recent article in MacLean's said:

> The fallacy that bankers loan only other people's deposits is just as pronounced as the fallacy that money is backed by the security of gold. The banker, in the main, does not lend accumulated savings.

I would prefer to believe that Sir Joseph Flavelle really thought the bankers did loan only savings. We are getting him into a rather tight box, because, if he thinks they lend only depositors' money, I am afraid I do not bow in admiration to his ability, and if he knows they do lend ten times as much as is deposited with them, then I am afraid I cannot admire his integrity, so that in either case he is really in a bad fix. Besides that, with all respect for years, I think this is a time when people who got their ideas out of this generation should be in high places and on commissions. To too great a degree we have people affecting the action of to-day whose ideas were formulated in a time that is past forever, an age very different from the one in which we live.

I found accidentally in the New Republic a very interesting story about Mr. Loree, who was the United States citizen on the commission. I am sorry that the members are not interested in Mr. Loree; at any rate, I shall proceed to put this on Hansard, even if only the Hansard reporter and I hear it. This is, as I said the New Republic of February 8 of this year:

> Leonor F. Loree, boss of the Delaware and Hudson Railroad, having bought his way into the New York Central road, wants to become one of its directors. If he were applying for the job of office boy instead of director, the personnel department would want to know something about his record. If they found out that, as an office boy, he had done anything quite on a par with at least one of his performances as a railroad director, he would be tossed out of the window. However, there is one standard of ethics for office boys and another for directors. If you doubt it, draw up your chair while we tell you a little story about Mr. Loree.

I shall try to abbreviate the story, but it is a very interesting one:

He has now caused his Delaware and Hudson Railroad to buy 500,000 shares of New York Central stock and thus become its largest stockholder. Before that, however, he was ambitious to set up a great trunk line of his own with the Delaware and Hudson in the north and the Kansas City Southern in the south as the nucleus of the dream. Loree is chairman of the board of the Kansas City Southern as well as of the Delaware and Hudson. As part of this plan it was necessary to purchase stock control of some other railroads. Here is what he did.

September 25, 1924, as chairman of the Kansas City Southern board, he named a special committee to buy stocks in railroad companies in the southwest. November 6 and 7, Loree bought for his own account 14,000 shares of Missouri, Kansas and Texas common at an average of $20.35 a share—total cost $285,872.14.

Four days later (November 11) the special committee began buying Missouri, Kansas and Texas stock for the Kansas City Southern. It bought 350,000 shares at an average price of $32. Total price, $12,000,000. Mr. Loree then sold his shares at prices ranging from $31·375 to $32·375. He made a profit on the deal $144,707.

An hon. MEMBER: Did he buy any oil stock?

Miss MACPHAIL: I shall tell the hon. member about that some day. If Mr. Loree did, he would not have made money out of it. The article continues:

This was all secret and no one knew of it until in 1928 the facts came out in a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Wall Street Journal commented on these strange facts, but no daily newspaper published any account of them.

This is the Wall Street Journal's account under date of July 27, 1928, analyzing the conduct of Mr. Loree:

The reason why Mr. Loree should not have bought stock in Missouri, Kansas and Texas, for his personal account is that he contemplated purchasing Missouri, Kansas and Texas stock for the account of the Kansas City Southern of which he is the head.

When the New York Stock Exchange discovered some years ago a broker trading on his own account against the interests of his clients he was expelled from the stock exchange with the stamp "obvious fraud." That broker, having an order to purchase shares, would first buy for himself, then, of course, at a higher price for his clients. It mattered not to whom he sold the stock later. He traded for his own account against the interest of his trust.

Mr. Loree traded for his own account against the interest of his trust. That is the simple, plain and direct statement, if one must put a label on Mr. Loree's conduct.

A Boston lawyer, who saw this report in the Wall Street Journal, remembered he had a client who had a block of shares in the Kansas City Southern, so on behalf of his client he asked the directors of that railway to bring Mr. Loree to account. But the board of Mr. Loree's railway submitted the demand to a well known New York lawyer who advised them that Mr. Loree's conduct was quite proper and the board thereupon passed a resolution whitewashing him. The Boston lawyer then notified Mr. Loree and his directors that he would institute a stockholders' suit to force Loree to disgorge his profits, and as the suit would have to be brought in Missouri, the Boston lawyer engaged Senator James Reed to bring the suit. When it became known that the doughty Missouri senator, famed for his ruthless and searching cross examinations, was about to launch an attack, Mr. Loree, just as the bill in equity was about to be filed, caved in and paid the entire amount of his profit including interest, to the railway company.

I said that I have respect for ability and for integrity, but may I say that the two gentlemen whom I have named do not, in my opinion, strengthen the findings of the commission. I know nothing about the others, nor do I want to do so, but for too long have we thought because people occupied high positions or because they possessed great wealth, we should swallow any statements they made as being the wisdom of the ages. I have got quite past that point, and for the reasons which I stated earlier and which I do not care to repeat, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I shall briefly give my reasons for objecting to this bill. I believe that as labour and capital are partners, labour should be represented on the board. This legislation tends toward amalgamation and eventually the destruction of the national ownership of railways. I object because this bill will remove entirely from the hands of parliament control of the national railways, and has a tendency to destroy the principle of responsible government. Undoubtedly the effect of the bill will be to aggravate unemployment in this country. Surely the government could devise some means of alleviating the economic conditions in Canada without increasing unemployment. I object to this bill because undoubtedly it will aggravate unemployment. Its concern appears to be moneyed interests, and it disregards the interests of labour. Surely the government knows that its primary obligation is the relief of unemployment. In 1922, when conditions somewhat similar obtained, the government of that day did not dismiss men from the railway or lower their wages. They adopted other means of improving the conditions by lower tariffs, and at this time the humanitarian side should also be considered. We all agree that first in importance is the problem of unemployment, next farm relief, and third, perhaps, the economic condition of the railways. This bill proposes to relieve the economic condition of the railways at the expense of the railway employees, among whom, every member of this house will agree, it will increase unemployment. I have often thought that labour and labour unions went too far, but surely none of us now can say that labour has not drunk deep of the bitter cup of poverty.

All that is wrong with the railways in my opinion is that we have overbuilt. A young nation, like a young person, is apt to be over-optimistic. Perhaps we expected too much of this young country. What the railways need, and I am speaking now of both Canadian railways, is more business, and I believe that if the tariffs of this country were lowered, and the sales tax removed, if there was less bursting and blasting, if we would learn how to be courteous to other nations, it would help both external and internal trade and bring about a great improvement in the condition of the railways. It would help to check this wholesale selling of our ships, the rusting of our trains on railway sidings, the wholesale dismissal of train men and sailors. I intend, Mr. Speaker, to vote against the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is my duty to point out to the house that if any other hon. member wishes to speak in this debate he must do so before the minister rises to reply, as the minister will close the debate.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Speaker, before the minister speaks, I rise to a point of order. Standing order 43, at page 366 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, says:

(1) No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood.

The next subsection of standing order 43 reads:

(2) A reply shall be allowed to a member who has moved a substantive motion.

Your Honour will find a substantive motion defined at the bottom of page 108, paragraph 366:

By a substantive motion is meant a motion not incidental to a proceeding before the house.

I submit, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is pretty dirty stuff.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark. He has no right to make it. I am a member of this house, and have the same privileges as every other hon. member. I insist, Mr. Speaker, upon the remark being withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand what the hon. member said.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He said, "dirty stuff." I heard him, as did others around me, and he repeats it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not aware which hon. member made the remark.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It was the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sure that the hon. member for York-Sunbury, if he made the remark, will withdraw it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the remark is unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw it, but I meant it just the same.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A member cannot qualify his withdrawal.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member for York-Sunbury unequivocally withdraws the remark?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Having regard to the rule which I have quoted, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it would not be proper for the hon. Minister of Railways to resume the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Notwithstanding what the hon. member has said, it has been the practice of this house to consider the motion for the second reading of a bill as a substantive motion. Prior to 1927 what is now standing order 43 of this house was standing order 21, and it contained the words, "who has moved a substantive motion or the second reading of a bill." When the rules were revised the words "or the second reading of a bill" were considered superfluous; it was considered that it went without saying that a motion for the second reading of a bill would be considered as a substantive motion. On March 30, 1920, and on May 30, 1920, the Speaker of this house so treated a motion for the second reading of a bill. A similar ruling was given during the present parliament. So I cannot admit that the hon. member's point of order is well taken. In accordance with the practice of this house the member moving the second reading of a bill has the right to reply.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that during the two weeks this debate has been going on, two out of three speeches have been coming from the other side of the house, and that on three occasions at least this side of the house permitted hon. gentlemen opposite to exceed their time against the rules of the house, I must confess that, after extending this courtesy to hon. gentlemen opposite, I am somewhat surprised by the attitude now taken by the chief whip of the Liberal party in trying to prevent me from speaking.

In speaking for the forty minutes at my disposal in closing the debate on the second reading of this bill, I do so with mingled feelings because, in moving the second reading nearly two weeks ago, I particularly requested of all sides of the house that, as far as possible, they should deal with the question on a high plane. I will quote my words:

> I sincerely hope that when this bill goes to the committee of the whole or is otherwise disposed of by this house it will be dealt with on exactly the same high plane, because I submit that this is no time for party strife, and I do not believe that the people of this country in these critical times, particularly having in mind the incidents of last week, are looking for party strife on a matter which is so serious to them as is this question.

I repeated the same suggestion later in my remarks. I endeavoured at that time to take a non-partisan, non-controversial and unbiased attitude on this whole question, and this is proved by the commendations which I have received from the other side of the house from various speakers, on the high stand taken at the opening of the debate; though their commendations have made me sometimes wonder if I was not wrong. Then the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) took exactly the same attitude as I did. He took an unbiased, non-partisan attitude, certainly one which supported the position which I had taken. He was followed later by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) later by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), this afternoon by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), and various others who took exactly the same broad attitude towards this very important question. I may add that a number of speakers on the other side of the house who belong to the third party took the same position. Of course they differed in regard to details of the bill, but on the whole they took a non-political stand, although they were critical of some portions of the bill. I congratulate them and the others I have mentioned on their very fair stand.

Speaking after me, the hon. member for North Waterloo obviously spoke on behalf of the whole Liberal party. He was their spokesman for the time being, and I must confess that sometimes since the beginning of this debate I have found myself wondering how he felt, after having stood up in this house and showing a very fair-minded attitude and more or less pledging the party, to see a large portion of the party desert him. That is not his fault, and I am not urging it as any criticism against him; yet I found myself wondering over and over again, as I listened to the change in tone after the hon. member for North Waterloo and one or two others had spoken, as to what caused that complete change of attitude voiced by so many hon. gentlemen who followed a little later in the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: The Prime Minister's speech.

Mr. MANION: The attitude of hon. members had changed long before the Prime Minister's speech. However, I will deal with that later. Criticism did come, it is true, in regard to some details of the bill, from this side of the house. I admit that. I find myself again wondering if it was not a fact that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) came to the conclusion there must be some difficulty in our party, and therefore decided he would do well to take advantage of it and perhaps split the party on a vote. However, I am just guessing as to that.

I do say this, that I listened to every speech made in this debate from all sides of the house, and I heard no speech from this side—and in that I include the Prime Minister's speech—I heard no speech from this side of the house which was really partisan in any way. I shall try to establish that as I go along. But some hon. members on the other side, at least half of them, made political speeches. They found fault not only with the bill—and I do not quarrel with that—but they imputed motives to us. The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition spoke of sinister designs behind this bill. I doubt if anybody could have used more severe language than to suggest that there was anything in the shape of a sinister design behind this bill. It is true hon. members opposite—as they did also a minute ago—in their speeches did charge the Prime Minister with having taken a partisan attitude. I deny it. He followed the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) whose speech was a very very severe castigation, from a political standpoint, of everything coming from this side of the house. He followed the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition who moved an amendment which could not possibly be accepted, the right hon. gentleman who used the expressions I have just quoted.

The right hon. gentleman opposite suggested sinister motives, and so that there may be no mistake I shall read his words as they are reported in Hansard. At page 2853 of Hansard the right hon. gentleman is reported as follows:

> But if that cannot be done,—

That is, if the amendment cannot be accepted—

> —I must confess that so far as I personally am concerned I should not find it possible to support the second reading of this bill, because I would find in the refusal by the government of a declaration of this kind, evidence that there must be a sinister design which is not apparent on the face of the measure itself.

What possible suggestion could anyone make of a more partisan nature than that the whole government of my right hon. leader had a sinister design behind the bill? I say the leader of the government was justified in becoming a bit irritated by the speech of the leader of the opposition, and even more so by the speech of the hon. member for West Lambton.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My remark was conditioned upon the acceptance of the amendment.

Mr. MANION: Upon the acceptance of an amendment which could not be accepted, because it amounted practically to a six months' hoist, an amendment which the Speaker himself ruled out of order. Yet we were asked by the right hon. gentleman to accept the amendment; in the event of not accepting it he suggested there was a sinister design behind the bill.

It is true the Prime Minister did quote Sir Wilfrid Laurier as having said that the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific would cost the people some $13,000,000 when the cost was hundreds of millions. However that is a matter of history. There was nothing wrong with the quotation; it was absolutely according to facts. He also pointed out that Mr. Blair, the Minister of Railways of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's day, had resigned because he did not agree with the proposal to build the Transcontinental railway. However those are historical facts.

I do not remember any statement made by the Prime Minister which was of a partisan nature.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: On the other hand, the hon. member who has just said something to me which I did not hear, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) got up to-day in this House of Commons and commended me upon my moderation, and hoped that I would show the same type of moderation in my speech to-night. But here is the way he showed moderation: I marked down two or three headings as the hon. member spoke. He talked of an iniquitous bill; he talked about an insidious measure; of the Machiavellian hand of this government; of a Tory triumvirate; of a Tory conspiracy. I found myself again asking the question: If that is a moderate speech, what would he say if he were immoderate?

The right hon. leader of the opposition, in his speech, of course dealt with the bill in most moderate fashion. I shall give some of the statements he made. He said the bill was sinister in design. He said it would deprive parliament of its fundamental rights; that it would adversely affect the Intercolonial railway and the rights of the maritime provinces. I ask hon. members just to note the geographical distribution of his phrases. He said it might result in the shut-down of the Hudson Bay railway project—he had jumped from the maritimes to the Hudson bay. He said the limitation of the board of trustees was unfair to organized labour; that was a touch for labour. He said that the powers granted the trustees "may effectively bring about amalgamation," as to which, unlike certain of his followers, he was "unalterably opposed." I say that the attitude of the right hon. leader of the opposition was merely a camouflage, that he was merely pretending to take a moderate attitude in connection with the bill, that he was simply carrying out the usual policy of an opposition whose duty it is to oppose. He is opposing the measure.

I do not wish further to deal with that line of thought, but may return to these matters later. In the remaining time at my disposal I shall turn my thoughts to the charges made by some hon. members.

The hon. member for West Lambton made a very partisan speech. He made the statement that the position of president and chairman being divided under this bill would have a very serious effect on the national railway.

Mr. GRAY: No, no.

Mr. MANION: He opposed very strongly the division of this power. I simply point out—

Mr. GRAY: I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but I commended the minister on the very fact that there should be this dissociation.

Mr. MANION: I accept the hon. member's correction. However, some hon. members made that statement. Some suggested the arrangement would be detrimental to the railways. I have a list of sixteen American railroads on which such an arrangement obtains. The hon. member for West Lambton said that the government was seeking to foist its trustees on the country, and keep them in that position. He took that stand. I cannot agree with him because if the government had desired to do that it would have gone a whole lot further in carrying out the recommendations of the royal commisssion in that regard. At page 64 of the report it is recommended by the commissioners how the trustees shall be appointed in case of a vacancy. It is stated in the first sentence at page 64:

> Vacancies among the trustees shall be filled from a panel of eight named by the remaining trustees.

But when the bill was going through the Senate it was changed so that the panel would be supplied not by the remaining trustees but by the remaining trustees with the addition of the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and President of the Exchequer Court of Canada—in other words widening the base. If we had been desirous of perpetuating our trustees we would not have widened the base for the framing of the panel, because it will be remembered that the president of the exchequer court, for whom I have the greatest respect, was an outstanding Liberal, and a minister in a former Liberal government.

Another of the complaints, this one I think from my hon. friend the member for West Lambton, was that this bill by clause 16 would lead to amalgamation. Of course laws can be broken, but this measure is not being enacted for the purpose of permitting amalgamation. I think it was Daniel O'Connell who at one time said he could drive a coach and four through any act of parliament, and this act may be like others in that respect. But my right hon. leader, the Prime Minister, gave the pledge that I had already mentioned—that we do not intend this bill to bring about amalgamation, and we have given the pledge that an amendment will be moved to protect against that possibility. It would be also a breach of trust on the part of the trustees appointed to look after the welfare of the Canadian National Railways should they take it upon themselves to adopt any such policy, and I do not think this or any government would consider appointing to such an important position men who would do this.

Then it was suggested that this measure is for the purpose of wrecking the Canadian National Railways. I say, and have said on many other occasions, that any man who would set out intentionally to wreck the Canadian National Railways would not be fit to bear the name Canadian or to represent any constituency in this house. Canada has too much interest in, is too much bound up with, the Canadian National Railways; that great transportation system is too intimately related to our national life, for anyone on either side of the house to endeavour to wreck it.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) claimed, as did the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), that this bill could only mean amalgamation, and the hon. member for Provencher opposed it for that reason. If that is the object in view, why is the bill so strenuously opposed by the Canadian Pacific Railway? That, I think, is a sufficient answer, for Mr. Beatty has taken the position throughout the country that he believes amalgamation is the proper solution of Canada's railway problem, yet the Canadian Pacific is opposing this bill very strongly,—they did so in the Senate, and they are not favourable to it at the present time.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan)—I am sorry I do not see him here at present—spoke of the decrease in wages to be brought about, and said that already there had been a decrease on the Canadian National, as I understood him, of $125,000,000 from 1929 to 1932. I find there has been an actual decrease of $59,000,000, a little less than half the amount the hon. gentleman gave, but as the hon. gentleman is so often not more than half right I suppose this is in line with his usual accuracy in such matters. He also took the attitude that this measure was going to injure labour, and asked for consideration of what he called the human element in industry. Of course we must all think of the human element—and if I may be permitted to refer to my own constituency, it is, I think, more a labour constituency than that of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River—I am just as anxious for the welfare of the industrial class, the working class so-called, as any one in this house, and I do not except the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River although I do not speak so often about it as he does. I even go so far as to admit that our economic system is at a fault in permitting conditions to exist that have existed in this depression and other depressions in the past, and that we will have to correct those conditions so that men thrown out of work in any industry will have some care given them. I admit that, but at the moment such measures have not been put into effect and cannot be put into effect under the conditions existing at this time. During all the years that the hon. gentleman administered the Department of Labour in the late government I did not notice that he put any such policies into effect.

But I do not think it is proper in this house to argue the question from the standpoint of any one class in the community. It seems to me that an hon. member represents every class not only in his own constituency but in all the country; at least that is the position I have taken as a member of parliament. And while the argument may be made that there should have been a representative of the railway workers on the commission or the board of trustees, what about the agricultural workers? We have in this country under 200,000 railway workers and over 1,000,000 agricultural workers, and one class is just as dependent on the railway as the other, because the agricultural people cannot buy anything that they require to eat or wear or use that does not pay toll to the railways. So if 200,000 or less railway workers must be represented surely the agricultural class have the same right.

My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), together with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), the hon. member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) and others, took what I consider a fair attitude; but I wish to refer to one statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He said the bonds of the railway should be exchanged for stocks. If the holders were willing, yes, I agree. But you cannot take possession of the bonds and give stock on which dividends would be paid only when earned, unless you are prepared to repudiate the country's pledge, because the bonds of the Canadian National Railways are guaranteed by this government, and unless we come to the point, which we have not reached yet, that we repudiate our obligations, we cannot force the holders of these bonds to exchange them for stocks.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) complained that there was no labour representative on the commission. I point out that there was no class representation of any kind on the commission. Perhaps I was a little unfortunate in saying that Lord Ashfield and Mr. Loree represented bondholders and stockholders in Great Britain and the United States. I did not mean that they were chosen for that purpose; I simply meant to point out that as there were hundreds of millions of dollars of Canadian Pacific securities held in Great Britain and Canadian National bonds in the United States, it was the opinion of the government that it would bring about a better understanding if we had on the commission a representative from each of these great countries. I think that was a reasonable and logical attitude to take. But, as pointed out this afternoon by some speaker, labour was considered in this report. Section 190 deals with contractual relations of labour, and a clause was put in the bill by Senator Murdock to protect labour in changes brought about by cooperation, so that the labour people on the two great systems would get a fair deal. Throughout the hearings before the commission and also before the Senate committee representatives of many different labour organizations appeared and made representations, so that labour did have opportunity to put its case before both the commission and the Senate committee.

On this side of the house a number of members, two particularly, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst), advocated enlarging the number of trustees, and the same recommendation came from some members on the other side of the house. As to the number, I would only repeat the argument of the Prime Minister, that three was the number recommended by the royal commission. As far as numbers go I believe that, as I said in my first speech, the seventeen who are on the board now have done splendid work in bringing about economies, but at present rearrangement is needed. There must be a chairman to assist Mr. Hungerford, because he cannot be both operating head and chairman or whatever you choose to call the position. So since the royal commission recommended three, it was the opinion of the government, as expressed by the Prime Minister, that we should as far as possible follow such recommendations.

After all, the imporant man among the trustees is the chairman. It will not be an easy thing to pick a man suitable for that position, but if we succeed in getting the man most suitable for it, I think all hon. members of this house will agree that he would be quite well able to act alone as far as that is concerned.

The hon. member for North Waterloo claimed that the public was not being protected in the tribunals. I do not agree with him on that, because the head of any tribunal will be the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, Mr. Justice Fullerton, a man who, before he came to this city of Ottawa, had won a very high position indeed in the judiciary and who to-day has the confidence, I think, of both railway systems and of the people of this country generally. He is the head of the Board of Railway Commissioners for the purpose of protecting the people of this country against possible injustices on the part of the railways, just as on the arbitral tribunal he will be in a position to protect the public. So in that regard I think my hon. friend has a fear which is without foundation.

Mr. EULER: He could not initiate a tribunal himself, could he?

Mr. MANION: No, he could not, I will admit; it has to be asked for by the railways. The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) in what I will say for him, as he said for me, was a very moderate speech,—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Thank you.

Mr. MANION: —did make one or two immoderate statements, which was a fairly low average for the hon. gentleman, and I do not wish to be unkind at all. One of the statements he made—I submit without support at all—was that the Conservative party always has been against the Canadian National Railways. That is unfair and untrue. The Conservative party always has been for the Canadian National Railways. Certainly we were for the system in 1919, and the best service to be done for the Canadian National system during its history has been done during the last two or three years, when it encountered present business conditions. The hon. gentleman also reiterated a charge which has been floating around western Canada for a long time; I thought it had died, but my hon. friend resuscitated it. His words were to the effect that freight was being switched from the Canadian National to the Canadian Pacific. He did not say we were doing that, though one might have taken that inference from his remarks. I think he did say, however, that freight was being switched from the Canadian National to the Canadian Pacific. I should like to point out to him and to my hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Totzke), who I think made the same charge—

Mr. TOTZKE: I did not take that attitude.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend even quoted figures to prove it.

Mr. TOTZKE: I said we were losing business.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend did take the attitude that business was going to the Canadian Pacific rather than to the Canadian National. The hon. member for Melville was a little more extreme in his view, but I am not quarrelling with him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend will remember that I gave him the opportunity to quote the correct figures.

Mr. MANION: I think my hon. friend was very generous, and I have no objection to take to his remarks. I am merely directing my hon. friend's attention to the fact that if he did not charge us with switching, as I thought he had, certainly we have been so charged throughout the west. I should like to give the percentage of gross earnings of the two railways which went to the Canadian National Railways during the last few years, in order to make the position quite clear. I am hurrying a bit, because unfortunately for me my time is somewhat limited. Of the total gross revenues of both railways in 1928 the Canadian National earned 51·8 per cent; in 1929 it earned 52·6 per cent; in 1930 it earned 53 per cent; in 1931 it earned 53·7 per cent, and in 1932 it earned 53 per cent. These earnings were from traffic of every sort. So it will be seen that the average is pretty constant, though there has been a slight gain in the last two or three years.

One hon. gentleman whom I see here to-night though not in his own seat, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) made a speech to which I do not wish to reply except to this extent: May I say that he did what I think was not necessary in dealing with a bill or statute of this kind; he made a personal attack upon the Prime Minister. In considering measures of this kind I do not think such personal attacks are called for; I think they are entirely out of place, and I do not believe my hon. friend made a speech worthy of himself in so doing.

This afternoon the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Verville) made the statement, I understand, that we have not been making the proper salary reductions. I do not know where he got that information, because I gave the figures showing that the management of the railways had cut salaries—urged by ourselves, I frankly admit—to the extent of $1,900,000 during the last two years. That is, the salaries for 1932 as compared with 1930 showed a decrease of $1,900,000. And here I must remind hon. members that this refers only to salaries of over $3,000 a year received by the main officials of the road. I am not speaking now of any wage cuts; I am speaking of the salaries of the officials of the road. By reducing those salaries and eliminating certain positions the management brought about a reduction of $1,900,000 in 1932 as compared with 1930. In addition let me say something else I had not intended to bring up, and may I just interject here that many of the things I am saying now I had not intended to say, but hon. gentlemen opposite have made statements which must be refuted. We did away with the positions occupied by many men drawing huge salaries, who should not have been drawing them. There was one gentleman whose name I will not mention, because possibly he may be seeking some other railway position to-day. This gentleman was drawing a salary of $62,000 a year; he had been drawing from $50,000 to $60,000 from 1925 on, and from no official of the system could I find that this man was doing any service useful to the railway. As a consequence the officials of the road were instructed to look into the matter, and the officials themselves were very glad to get rid of that gentleman. And there were various other officials drawing huge salaries, though possibly not so great as that drawn by the gentleman I have mentioned, whose positions have been eliminated.

Now I should like for a moment to deal with the speech of my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power). This afternoon the hon. gentleman delivered a speech which was not only able and analytical but which was fair in every possible way. He pointed out that there was nothing in this bill to remedy public interference or public pressure in the larger sense. I should just like to say that to my mind the whole purpose of the bill in appointing the trustees as outlined and placing them beyond the power of parliament and the power of the government is to attempt absolutely to remove them from such influences and make them independent. I believe they are so much removed from such influences that they could refuse to listen to any parliamentary representatives who might press them for favours, and could refuse to heed public pressure from any part of the country. That is why they have been given such powers under this bill. They are given the power to oppose public and political pressure, in the interests of the railways as my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) suggests.

My hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) made a speech in the course of which he blamed everything upon protection. He often reminds me of Mr. Dick in David Copperfield, who always found the head of King Charles before him. The hon. gentleman cannot discuss anything in this house without bringing in the question of free trade. He said that one of the troubles with this railway was the insane practice of buying Canadian goods. I should like to ask him or anyone else why this practice should be called insane. It seems very strange reasoning to me; surely the people of Canada and particularly a Canadian institution such as the Canadian National Railways—and the Canadian Pacific Railway also, for that matter—should buy Canadian goods where they can get goods of like quality at equal prices.

Mr. YOUNG: I did not say the practice of buying Canadian goods was insane; I referred to the insane practice of forcing the railways to buy—

Mr. MANION: Canadian goods.

Mr. YOUNG: —Canadian goods when they could not buy them to the best advantage.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend can have it his way, but I wrote down his words as he uttered them. I am sorry I have not had time to read his speech since, but I think if he checks it up he will see that I have quoted the effect of his words if not the words themselves. I noticed that my hon. friend found it difficult to correct me, but I do not wish to do the hon. gentleman any injustice. It did strike me as peculiar reasoning, however. I frankly state, as I think every hon. member will admit, that we must love our own country and our own people best, and we should endeavour to give them whatever favours we have to give.

The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) made a very interesting and witty speech, full of good humour, the sort of speech he usually makes in this house. Whether or not you agree with the hon. gentleman he always makes a speech that entertains and that is enjoyable to listen to. As he spoke he reminded me of the fact that he cares very little about the danger of losing his reputation by being humorous. There was a great English statesman who once said that the only way for a public man to keep his reputation of being wise was to be as solemn as an ass, and I can assure my hon. friend that he never is as solemn as that.

However, the hon. gentleman did make one or two statements to which I must take exception. He stated, or at all events implied, that the Canadian Pacific Railway was on the verge of bankruptcy. I do not think that was a wise statement to make; I do not think it is on the verge of bankruptcy. I believe both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways will come back if we have a decent revival of business, and I do not think it will do any good to exaggerate the condition in which these railways find themselves. I have no desire to do that and I do not think any other hon. member of this house wishes to do so. I noticed also during the course of my hon. friend's very interesting speech that he said he supported the bill because he believed it would lead to amalgamation.

Mr. JACOBS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: And my hon. friend now says, "hear, hear." He has never lacked courage. As he said the other night, we have both been in this house for some seventeen or eighteen years, but in spite of being on opposition sides of the house we always have been the best of friends. The hon. gentleman said that he favoured the bill because it led to amalgamation. I should like to point out to the house, especially to my hon. friends on the other side who have been pointing to us as the amalgamationists, that the only man in the whole house who openly favoured amalgamation was one of their own members, the hon. member for Cartier.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope the hon. gentleman will give me credit for frankness.

Mr. MANION: I do, and for courage as well. It takes courage as well as frankness to differ from one's party, as I well know.

Mr. JACOBS: And truth also. That is one of my weaknesses.

Mr. MANION: I know some of my hon. friend's weaknesses, but I do not know them all.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) made one of those speeches for which he has become famous in the house. He can draw his own conclusions as to what I mean by that statement. He said that he wanted to draw the attention of the house "to the legacy we got and the legacy we left," the "we" being the Liberal party. He twitted the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) on a speech he made in 1928 when he referred to the progress made by the Canadian National Railway. The Minister of Justice does not need me to defend him, but I think I should say that at that time he could not tell what the Liberal party was going to do to the road in 1929.

[Mr. Manion.]

An hon. MEMBER: Very weak.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out that he spoke in 1929 also.

Mr. MANION: He is a very fine speaker and he speaks every year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He went on record then to the same effect.

Mr. MANION: It must have been before he recognized that to which I am now going to refer. My hon. friends have forced me to refer to these matters. I had no intention of taking them up but in view of the severe criticism of hon. friends opposite I believe it is only fair that these facts should be told. In 1929, because of public pressure, if you will, political pressure, if you will, or some sort of pressure, the Canadian National Railways presented to this house a budget amounting to over $200,000,000. When hon. members recall that before the war the national debt of this country was only $336,000,000, they will realize the immensity of the $205,000,000 mentioned in the report of the royal commission. A year before the royal commission was appointed I gave the figure as $270,000,000, but I was high by $18,000,000, which represented refundings. Subtracting $18,000,000 from $270,000,000 leaves $252,000,000, which I think is the correct figure instead of the $205,000,000 given by the royal commission.

I should like to refer to some of the sections of the royal commission report. Section 142 reads in part as follows:

> The conduct of the affairs of the national railway has been subjected in the past to political and public pressure.

Section 146 reads:

> Of direct political interference by ministers and members of parliament in the detail operations of the railway, we were assured by the officials there was little or none. It was in the larger sphere of policy that political considerations led to unwise and unnecessary capital expenditures, the result of which was to create an atmosphere in which the ordinary principles of commercial operation of the railway were lost sight of.

Section 150 refers to the budget of $205,000,000, and section 151 reads as follows:

> The actual cash expenditures during the same year covered by these authorizations amounted to $113,859,777, the balance, $91,748,104, being chargeable to subsequent years as construction work proceeded or obligations on account of roads purchased matured.

Section 152 reads:

> The net increase in funded debt of the Canadian National due the public for the year 1929 amounted to $144,670,459;

Section 154 reads:

When considering the scale upon which branch line extensions and acquisitions, as well as hotel expenditures were made, and railway and steamship services duplicated, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the board of directors and the management of national railways were amenable to political influence and pressure, which it would have been in the public interest to have withstood.

That was in 1929, a preelection year. These commitments were made from coast to coast covering steamships at one end, hotels in the east, terminals at Montreal and branch lines through the western provinces.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Did the members of the railway and shipping committee object to those expenditures? I think they were unanimously adopted.

Mr. MANION: Probably that is right but I cannot check it up. In 1929 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) sitting beside me as he is to-night, made a speech wherein he pointed out the immensity of the expenditures being made. I remember that speech very well. It is true that we did not do much criticizing, but it must be remembered that if we had dared to open our mouths against the Canadian National Railways we would have been accused of enmity towards the road. That is the position we were in. I remember when the Prime Minister was sitting in the seat of the right hon. the leader of the opposition. I remember taking a seat beside him and discussing the immensity of the expenditure. But I repeat, if a man had dared to open his mouth at that time in criticism of any of these expenditures he would have been branded as an enemy of the Canadian National Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The committee was unanimous.

Mr. MANION: Hotels were scattered from coast to coast. One of the hotels to be built was at Prince Rupert, a town of four or five thousand people. They were going to build a $600,000 hotel, and $250,000 was later included in the estimates for that purpose. These expenditures were projected from coast to coast.

I should like to point out an extraordinary thing which has never been referred to publicly before. During 1929 when this country was being committed to expenditures totalling over $200,000,000 on behalf of the Canadian National Railways, Sir Henry Thornton was not technically an employee of the company. Sir Henry Thornton's contract had run out on October 3, 1928, and it was not renewed until September 23, 1929.

Mr. HANBURY: That is not very good law.

Mr. MANION: I am not arguing about the law, I am simply pointing out that during that particular time when this country was committed for these tremendous expenditures, Sir Henry Thornton was not technically an employee of the company. His contract had run out and it was necessary that it be renewed. Sometimes I find myself asking this question: Was that used as a club over Sir Henry Thornton? My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition shakes his head rather emphatically, but he did not hesitate to impute sinister motives to us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister is the only one who would think of that sort of thing.

Mr. MANION: It is a rather strange thing but Sir Henry Thornton was not again employed by agreement until long after the session of 1929.

This road has now been brought to a state of fitness from the standpoint of economical management and our desire is to keep it in that position. It will be easy for the board of trustees to do it if we get the right men.

I should like to point out one or two facts in connection with the arbitral tribunal. It seems to be thought that the arbitral tribunal is to be a continuing body, but it is not. The tribunal will be set up only upon the request of one of the railroads whenever there is a dispute between the two roads as to cooperation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not the recommendation of the commission.

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes, I think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They went further.

Mr. MANION: I have not the time just now to argue it out but we can deal with it in committee. The purpose of the arbitral tribunal is to effect economy and to bring about more remunerative operations. That is the only purpose of the tribunal. It cannot do damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway and it cannot do damage to the Canadian National Railways, because its whole purpose will be to bring about cooperation to result in economies and more remunerative operations. Had an arbitral tribunal been in existence a few years ago with the same powers as are being given by this legislation to the present arbitral tribunal, there would have been no duplication of hotels at Halifax and Vancouver and there probably would not have been commenced that wild scheme of a $50,000,000 passenger terminal in the city of Montreal, the total of those three items alone amounting to $63,000,000.

Another question I wish to deal with in hurrying along—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MANION: I wish to thank my hon. friends for allowing me to go on for a few moments. They are returning the kindness we showed to some on their side and I appreciate it.

A number of different speakers, particularly the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor) and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), stated that when the Canadian National Railways in 1923 went through the process of reorganization or coordination, or whatever the term was, they had been taken over in a dilapidated condition, and it was pointed out what wonderful work was done in coordinating these straggling nonentities into one system.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Let me quote the words of the hon. member for Toronto West Centre. He spoke of the responsibility—listen to this; it is rather good:

> The responsibility of joining disjointed, disconnected, dilapidated, insolvent and bankrupt lines of railways into one national system.

I thought this was rather effective from his own standpoint, and I found myself thinking of a remark made by a great gentleman of his own race about fifty years before he was born, Disraeli, who became prominent as a prime minister of England, who on one occasion spoke of Gladstone as being "intoxicated with the exuberance of his own verbosity." I wonder if my hon. friend had not been a bit carried away by his own verbosity. If not, he was certainly carried away to some extent by a lot of arrant nonsense, because those roads were not in any such condition as my hon. friend and many others have tried to make out and as has been reported in the press throughout Canada at various times.

Let me give some of the facts very briefly. In the first place the Intercolonial was then and is now a high-class railway. I do not think it is any better railway now than it was in the old days. The Grand Trunk railway was built in the fifties and was and has been throughout all these years one of our greatest railways running from Portland on the east through the southern part of Canada to Chicago on the west. The Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific have the finest roadbeds ever built in this dominion and the lowest grades through the mountains. In addition to that there was the Canadian Northern, which I have left to the last because there may be some criticism of it; but even that was not in anything like the condition my hon. friends painted. To prove I am not altogether wrong in my statement, I might as well quote one whom my hon. friends opposite always accept, and that is Sir Henry Thornton, who, to the regret of all of us, died recently. In the 1922 report of the Canadian National Railways signed by him, he made a few statements about the condition of the road, and I shall put them on record just for the sake of future discussion. He said:

> 1922 completes the four-year period of unified management of the former Canadian Government Railways and the Canadian Northern railway system.

Then he says:

> During the period the government has provided large sums of money for the physical improvement of these properties, for coordination facilities, for additional rolling stock and for branch line construction.

Then a little lower down:

> While the demands for capital expenditure on a system of such extent in a growing country, as the former board stated, are never ending, yet it may now be said that the three groups of lines, until recently the Canadian National Railways, enter the consolidation in excellent physical condition and operating at a high mark of efficiency as regards actual performance or movement of traffic and other factors controllable by management. Apart from certain well known cases of duplication the lines are well located and in exceptional position to successfully perform the transportation demands of the country.

A little further down:

> On some of the older sections there are still improvements that should be undertaken, but in the main the lines are modern in character and were built or have been brought up to standards which are ahead of actual traffic requirements, except under stress of seasonal movements.

He concludes:

> The whole reorganization has been accomplished with the best of good feeling generally prevailing, and I feel sure that the splendid loyalty which I found existing among the employees of the various lines now brought together is being rapidly transferred to the new administration and that enthusiastic and constant team work will be forthcoming from the great army of men in the system's employ.

That is signed by Sir Henry Thornton in April, 1923. Therefore the statements that the roads were in a dilapidated condition are absolutely beside the mark and untrue; the roads were in splendid condition, and while I am not trying to belittle anybody, they did not require the work that some of my hon. friends state they did to coordinate them and to get them into splendid, first-class running shape.

Let me give another proof by pointing out the figures in regard to earnings. In 1922 the total earnings of the system amounted to $234,000,000. The highest figure ever attained was in the peak year, 1928, and it amounted to $305,000,000, so that there was not a very large gain in total earnings after hundreds of millions of dollars had been spent on the road.

Let me give some other figures. In 1923, the first year of coordinated management, the gross income of the national railway amounted to $253,000,000. In 1930, the last year in which my hon. friends opposite were in power, the gross earnings were $250,000,000, or practically the same figure. But the interest on the bonds in 1923 was $35,000,000, and in 1930, $54,000,000. As the net operating revenues in both years were the same with the exception of two million dollars, there was a deficit in 1930 of $32,000,000 against $15,000,000 in 1923, so far as paying interest to the investing public is concerned. I give that because those facts prove that the roads were in splendid earning condition, and also that the hundreds of millions of dollars spent upon the road and added to the capital cost were not giving an adequate return. That is all I wish to prove by that.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister if he agrees with his chief, the Prime Minister, that the people of this country have no more equity in the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend can ask the Prime Minister that the next time he gets the chance. My leader is quite capable of taking care of his own statements.

Mr. SANDERSON: The hon. gentleman is Minister of Railways.

Mr. MANION: The trouble was that there was no check on the management of the Canadian National Railways either by the late government or by the late directors, and that is why the capital expenditures increased much more rapidly than the returns coming back to the national road. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth spoke of recapitalization, and while it would not have any material effect upon the Canadian National, there would be no particular reason against it. If my hon. friends will look at the report of the royal commission, they will find there the suggestion that the trustees deal with this question at the earliest possible opportunity.

I did not know until late this afternoon that I was limited to forty minutes and I had prepared some statements which I have in my hand, but I shall not take up much more time. In regard to amalgamation, it has been pointed out by the Prime Minister and myself that we intend to move an amendment to prevent amalgamation and to protect the railways in every possible way. It is the opinion of many railway experts that the amalgamation of these two roads would be too immense an undertaking for any one man to handle. I have a quotation from a former president of the Southern Pacific Railway of the United States who, when he was asked to increase his railway from 10,000 to 11,000 miles to 25,000 miles by the inclusion of another line, said that this would make an impossible proposal from the standpoint of proper administration. There would be a great danger of that in our own case. May I point out another danger in regard to the amalgamation of these roads? So far as we are concerned we are not in any way supporting amalgamation, because if you had amalgamation there would be the very great danger of a huge body of voters having political influence over any government, this government or any other. Let me tell a little story in that connection which will illustrate what I mean. When we suggested cutting down the salaries which were being paid to some of the officers of the system, salaries of very large proportions in times like these, for which the people of Canada had to dig down in their pockets and pay by way of taxation, we took the attitude with the late management, as we have taken it with the present management, that irrespective of whether or not these officers were really earning these salaries running up to $30,000 and $50,000 and $60,000, they were too high to be paid under present conditions. The directors themselves took that attitude, and one day after a meeting of the directors at which a number of them had been taking a strong attitude against the high salaries paid to some of the officers—it was recommended, for instance, that a salary of $30,000 should be cut to $18,000, and others in proportion—one of the directors when he left the room was approached by an officer high up in the railway service, not vice president but the head of a branch, who told him that if he were not careful he was going to get this government into trouble. "I want to advise you," this man said, "that you had better leave salaries alone, because if you interfere I have enough dynamite to blow that government up there to hell." It was not very elegant language, but those were his words, and I might add for the benefit of my hon. friend from Cartier that this man said that he had enough dynamite to blow the late government also to the same place, and perhaps the Cooperative Comomnwealth Federation might think it a good idea if we were both there. However, that was the threat he made to one of the directors. I was told the story by a member of this house to whom the director had told it. I asked the director if it was true, and he said that it was. I said that that man should be dismissed by the directors, and let him set off his dynamite. It took about two months, and then the directors dismissed him, and there have been no explosions of any particular kind that I have heard since. I think that story illustrates the power which these huge organizations might exercise if they grow to too great a strength.

Mr. JACOBS: Was that official dismissed?

Mr. MANION: Yes, he was.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps he has gone to prepare a place for you.

Mr. MANION: I can only say in reply to my hon. friend that while he and I are of different religions I hope that we shall meet wherever we do go hereafter.

There was one other question with which I wanted to deal for a moment, and that was the alleged political colour of the royal commission. It was stated by some hon. gentlemen that the royal commission had a political tinge, a Conservative tinge. As a matter of fact, there were only two men on that commission who had ever been Conservatives. Three had been Liberals, and Lord Ashfield and Mr. Loree were from other countries than Canada. I mention that in passing because I think it is worth remembering.

In closing, I wish again to urge upon the house that when we go into committee on the bill we get back to a proper plane in discussing this measure. I admit that I have got a little off that plane myself, but my hon. friends opposite led the way, and I certainly was not going to permit them to make statements that were not correct. I should like to go back to the high plane on which the debate started, but if my hon. friends decide otherwise we shall stay on the plane we are now on, for I have not any fear of not being able to take care of myself. My hon. friends can take their choice, or as my hon. friend from Cartier would say: You pay your money and you take your choice.

There has been no objection to the principle of the bill; there have been objections to its details. In dealing with the details, let us try to cooperate. It has been suggested many times that you cannot have cooperation with competition. I believe that you could have the finest demonstration of cooperation with competition that has ever been given to this house if all three parties in this house competing for power would cooperate to put this bill through in the best possible manner. It would be a splendid example to give to the people of this country of cooperation with competition.

I say to labour that if a business revival takes place, as I have no doubt it will, it will mean the taking on of more men, not the laying off of men. It is the hope and belief of everybody who gives real thought to present day problems that a revival will take place. This country does not need to put up its shutters. It is only beginning its career; its greatness is only starting. This country can go forward with an optimistic attitude concerning its future, and I believe that in enacting this legislation into law we shall be laying the foundation which will make both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific greater roads than they have ever been in the past.

I repeat that when we get into committee we are ready, not necessarily to accept, as I have been quoted as saying, but to give fair consideration to and perhaps accept the suggestions of my hon. friends in regard to some of the details of the bill. If we cannot agree on the details, after all we can agree to disagree, and the government will be prepared to take the responsibility.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Manion) which was agreed to on the following division: yeas, 120; nays, 65.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hackett in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understood the minister to say last night that when the second reading was carried we would take up other bills.

Mr. MANION: I think the right hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I said when the bill was finished—I meant concluded. I noticed my remarks did not seem to be interpreted that way, although they were really humorous at the time. May I suggest that we might deal with clauses which are not controversial? My right hon. friend misunderstood me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hansard will show that the minister said we would take up other bills.

Mr. MANION: Yes, if we were finished with this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When we were finished with the second reading.

Mr. MANION: No, I did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read the record and see what it says.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. MANION: Here are the exact words. The right hon. gentleman asked: "I assume we will continue to-morrow with this debate," and I said, "Yes, and should we get through we will go on with some of the other bills." I meant that if we got through this bill we would go on with some of the others.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit the minister could not have meant that at all. We were talking about the debate on the second reading. The minister could not possibly have meant that he would go on with this bill in committee.

Mr. MANION: The right hon. gentleman cannot say what I meant; I know what I meant. I meant we were going to continue with this bill, and the rest of my remark was merely jocular, because there was no possible chance of finishing this bill to-day. I meant we would go into committee of the whole. Members on this side and from other sections of the house have asked me, and I said we were going on with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are some hon. members on this side of the house who are not here to-night to whom I gave the assurance that the minister had said we would not go on further with the bill. However, if he wishes to go on, well and good. But I submit that is not a fair way to treat the house.

Mr. MANION: I object to the right hon. gentleman's last remark. If he misunderstood me, very well; I admit my language was not altogether clear, but he has no right to state that I treated the house unfairly. I am just as fair in my treatment of the house as he has ever been. I resent any such suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say my remark just made has reference to the statement the minister gave to the house as it appears on Hansard. I quote from page 3048:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: I assume we will continue to-morrow wth this debate?
> Mr. Manion: Yes, and should we get through we will go on with some of the other bills.

On that record the minister is not treating the house fairly if he insists on proceeding in committee at the present time.

Mr. MANION: I have suggested to the right hon. gentleman that we should deal with no clause that he or any of his party object to. Surely I could not be fairer than that. I admit my words are open to misunderstanding, but I tell my right hon. friend that neither I nor the government thought of anything else.

I have no desire to quarrel with the right hon. gentleman about it, but I see no reason why the right hon. gentleman should object to dealing with any clause that is not controversial.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I requested a copy in French of the bill under discussion and until I have received it, may I ask that the debate be postponed. I trust that the discussion will not be resumed until my request has been granted as I wish to understand what it is all about. I am informed that there are no more French copies.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, since there seems to be a misunderstanding I gladly move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. VERVILLE (Translation): I wish to thank the Minister of Railways.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

JURISDICTION RESPECTING VISITING COMMONWEALTH FORCES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 44, to amend the Exchequer Court Act (exclusive jurisdiction).

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice if he has received communications from the bar of the province of Quebec and the Attorney General of Quebec?

Mr. GUTHRIE: My friend has the wrong bill. This is an innocuous measure complementary to the bill we introduced a few days ago with regard to visiting commonwealth forces.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hackett in the chair.

On section 1—Exclusive original jurisdiction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister gave a short explanation at the time he introduced the bill. Perhaps he would say a word as to the significance of this section.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill is framed to give jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court of Canada in respect to visiting forces of the army, navy or air force of the mother country or any of the self-governing dominions which may in future be in Canada as visitors. At the present time there is no court in Canada clothed with jurisdiction in regard to such forces. During the present session a bill has been submitted, and stands on the order paper for further consideration in committee, to regulate the conduct of visiting forces while in Canada. That bill results from the Statute of Westminster. Some court should have jurisdiction in regard to such forces, and the proposal in this bill is to give the exchequer court that jurisdiction, to deal with writs, cases of capias or mandamus or other cases of that nature which may arise. Otherwise none of our courts would be clothed with the appropriate jurisdiction.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does this make any change in the law as it is at present as to applications for a writ of habeas corpus, for instance?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, no change.

Mr. ELLIOTT: As to where those applications may be made, must it be to the exchequer court here in Ottawa, or can they be made in any of the county towns as in ordinary cases of habeas corpus?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is not the ordinary writ of habeas corpus; it is habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, in other words, bring forth the body and submit, or submit to the jurisdiction of the court. I assume that applications for such a writ in regard to these forces would have to be made to the Exchequer Court of Canada in the future as the only court having jurisdiction.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would that mean that the application would have to be made in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Wherever there is a judge; it would not necessarily have to be made in Ottawa. The exchequer court judges are often away from Ottawa.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But are they? I think as a general rule they sit in Ottawa, not in different places as do the judges of assize and other judges.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, the exchequer court is in the nature of a travelling tribunal. It sits in the chief cities all over Canada, as the judge may determine for the convenience of parties.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Very seldom.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, quite frequently. The president of that court, I think, sits in every province in the course of the year. He is now planning a trip to the west to hear a large number of cases. It is in that way a travelling tribunal for the convenience of the public, though I think the majority of cases are heard here.

Mr. CARDIN: I am afraid that does not apply to the initiation of proceedings. The judge travels to hear a case, but not to initiate proceedings.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I was referring to the hearing of a case.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Soldier Settlement Act to provide for the remission of interest in certain cases and the application of payments made to reduction of principal indebtedness; and for additional credit on payment of arrears or instalments; the removal of the lien on the equipment of soldier settlers; and for the application of certain of these provisions to British family settlers by consent of the British government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the minister would be good enough to explain.

Mr. GORDON: Perhaps I could explain it better in committee, but if hon. gentlemen would like the explanation now I can give it. The bill to be founded upon this resolution is remedial in its character with respect to soldier settlers and others owning land or under contract to purchase land the title to which is at present in the crown.

The first part of the resolution refers to the remission of interest. In the bill founded upon the resolution it will be proposed to remit the interest accruing for the twelve months immediately preceding the standard date as determined and interpreted by the statute. In order to avoid the error that arose in connection with the thirty per cent reduction, for the sake of those who have paid their interest it is proposed that credit be given in such cases by a reduction of the principal indebtedness.

The remainder of the resolution has to do with extending credit, dollar for dollar, for the years ending with the standard dates in 1927 to those who pay the whole or part of the instalments falling due during those years.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Hon. members will remember that in 1930 the interest was spread, so this bill will deal from the period from 1932 to 1937.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister say a word about the British settlers?

Mr. GORDON: I presume the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has reference to what is known as the three thousand family scheme. The bill founded upon the resolution will make reference to the situation of those settlers and will indicate the course to be followed by the government in the event of the agreement under which these settlers came to Canada being changed, which of course would have to be with the consent of the British government. It is contemplated that appropriate representations will be made in order to secure that end.

Mr. REID: Will there be anything in the bill to take care of those soldiers who have purchased under the soldier settlement board during the last six or seven years, and who do not come under the original act?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that the house is not in committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Baker in the chair.

Mr. REID: I should like to ask the minister if he can answer the question I just asked, whether it is intended to do anything for those soldiers who have purchased land during the last seven or eight years, and who do not come under the original scheme. There are many returned men, as the minister knows, who have purchased land under the soldier settlement board and who are in great difficulties.

Mr. GORDON: Those cases will be provided for in the legislation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is implied in the words "the remission of interest in certain cases"?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was going to ask the same question. Is this to be a general act covering all cases or is it to cover only certain cases?

Mr. GORDON: The act will provide for the remission of interest charges which accrue during the twelve months immediately preceding the standard date in 1932.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: For every soldier settler?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, with the exception of persons falling under the agreement between His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Dominions and the government of Canada, which has reference to the three thousand family scheme. As I indicated a moment ago, the legislation founded upon the resolution will show the course the government will follow with respect to these settlers. The matter will be taken up with the British government in order to obtain their consent to the application of these remedial measures to the settlers, and to have the cost apportioned as the agreement contemplates in other cases.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: What I had in mind was whether this was to be a general act covering all settlers or whether it was to be discretional, to apply only in certain cases. I understand, however, that it is a general remission.

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister give us the number of settlers under the three thousand family scheme who have returned to the old country? I should like to know what percentage made good in Canada and what percentage returned to England.

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I have not those figures, but I believe such an analysis could be made. In all probability I could have that done by the time the item in the estimates comes up for consideration, and I will give the information at that time, unless it is necessary that the hon. member have it now.

Mr. NEILL: I cannot understand where there is any advantage in introducing legislation in this roundabout way whereby we are forced to discuss a resolution couched in very vague terms instead of having a bill before us which we could discuss intelligently. Presumably there must be some purpose in bringing in legislation in this vague way and presumably there is some sort of a mantle of secrecy over the legislation until it is discussed in committee. This is the sixteenth of the month and under date of the tenth this was all published in the British Columbia papers at far greater length than the minister is giving it to-night. Does the minister think that that is a desirable custom to have in effect?

Mr. GORDON: I do not read the British Columbia papers.

Mr. NEILL: Shame!

Mr. GORDON: I have not had an opportunity to see what they said about the legislation. There is one thing certain, they never got their information from me. Sometimes the newspapers are good guessers but I can assure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that I have not followed any circuitous route in bringing this resolution before the committee. The subject matter of this resolution has been given very earnest study by those charged with the administration of the act, and it is hoped that it will meet with general approval among the settlers. There is nothing further from my mind than to cloud this matter in mystery, as is suggested. I really cannot understand where the newspapers got their information.

Mr. NEILL: The resolution is essentially vaguely worded as compared with the definite language which would be used in a bill. I am not complaining of that, I simply say that presumably there must be some useful purpose to be served by this method. Why was this information given out to the British Columbia newspapers to a fuller extent than we have had it to-night? The papers published this information on the tenth, but it would have to come from Ottawa, so it must have been given out before that date. I suggest that there must have been a leak somewhere. I am not blaming the minister but I do contend that the information published could not have been based on a guess because it was a very definite statement. If the minister is satisfied I do not suppose I need worry, but it does not seem to be a desirable thing to have information leak out through the press before it is given to the House of Commons.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Quite a number of soldier settlers are not residing upon the land which they took up under the act but still have an equity therein. I should like to know if any easement is being provided by this bill to take care of such cases.

Mr. GORDON: I imagine that would be purely a question of adjustment between the soldier settler who had sold the land and the soldier settler who was on the land. The debtor to the government would be the settler now upon the land.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That hardly answers my question. The situation in the west is that many of the men on the land have not been able to make their payments to the soldier settlement board. The soldier settler who has an equity in a piece of land sees that equity gradually vanishing. I have one case in mind where a soldier settler has an equity of $2,000 in land that has been sold to another party under the tripartite agreement. The purchaser of that land has not been able to make his payments to the board and interest is accruing. The soldier settler is not actually upon the land and I want to know if he will be taken care of by this legislation.

Mr. GORDON: This legislation will remit the interest accruing in 1932 under the contract. So far as the board is concerned the equity will be paid to the original settler as soon as the tripartite settler completes his contract.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Could the minister give the committee an idea of the amount of accrued interest now due and the amount proposed to be remitted under this bill? Is it proposed to remit all interest that has accrued or, if not, what part?

Mr. GORDON: It is proposed to remit all the interest for the twelve months immediately preceding the standard date in 1932. Hon. members will remember that there is a standard date for both western Canada and eastern Canada. For the twelve months prior to the standard date in 1932 the interest will be remitted to all those who have not paid. Those who have paid interest during 1932 will be placed in equation with those who have not paid by having an appropriate amount credited upon their contracts.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is upon the principal?

Mr. NEILL: The resolution reads:

—and for additional credit on payment of arrears or instalments;

That is the dollar for dollar credit to which the minister alluded. Would that apply to the payment of interest also, or will they have to pay the interest due after this year in full?

Mr. GORDON: Any payment made after this year and until the standard dates in 1937 will be credited at the rate of two dollars for every dollar paid. As hon. members will recall, these payments are amortized and it does not matter whether it is interest or principal, they will get credit no matter what they pay.

Mr. NEILL: Are they charged interest upon the past due amortized payments?

Mr. GORDON: That is interest upon interest?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: I am not sure of that point.

Mr. NEILL: Would they get dollar for dollar on that?

Mr. GORDON: They will get dollar for dollar on anything they pay during those years.

Mr. McINTOSH: What is the standard date for western Canada?

Mr. GORDON: October 1 for western Canada, and November 1 for the provinces lying east of Manitoba.

Mr. McINTOSH: Do I understand that the remittance of interest for 1932 will date back twelve months from that standard date? What about the principal that is owing?

Mr. GORDON: If the hon. member will recollect, the interest is joined to the principal, if I may put the matter in that way. As regards anyone indebted under contracts or agreements made prior to January 1, 1933 if payments are made in respect of arrears, or of any instalment due up to and including the standard date in 1936, the soldier settler will be credited with double the amount of the payment.

Mr. McINTOSH: There are quite a number of soldier settlers not only in the riding of North Battleford, but clear across northwestern Canada. May I ask the minister if he understands the objective to which the different locals of the soldier settlers in these different areas are directing their efforts?

Mr. GORDON: Who is the head of the organization?

Mr. McINTOSH: There are different locals and a head to each one. I do not think there is any official head of them all. There is a president and a secretary for every local.

Mr. GORDON: Does my hon. friend refer to the soldier settlement unions?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: Their propositions were received by the director.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is the point to which I am coming. I understand the department over which the minister presides was endeavouring to find out the minimum objective of these soldier settler unions that have been organized right across western Canada for a set purpose, that is to try to find out how they could reasonably remain on the land. In organizing themselves towards this end and in coming to definite conclusions in regard to how they could remain on the land, they worked out one or two main objectives. One was that if they were going to remain there under existing conditions of low prices with farms bought at inflated values and with large sums of principal and interest owing, there would have to be either a total cancellation or a fair adjustment of interest from 1929. If I understand correctly the attitude of the soldier settler unions, they want no interest charges added from 1929 and in their opinion any interest paid between 1929 and 1933 ought to be allowed on the principal, but they definitely state that no interest should be added to the principal accruing from 1930 on, that is from the last revaluation of the soldier settlers' lands. If the department is allowing only a rebate of interest for a year, this is not meeting the viewpoint of the soldier settler unions, and I do not think the legislation will go far enough. I thought it of importance to bring this point before the minister at this time in order to see if he could not try to meet the desires of these men who served their country at such small cost to us, who were overseas for years fighting the battles of Canada, who then came back, bought land at distorted values and are now up against a serious proposition in endeavouring to hold land which they desire to retain and to hand on to their dependents.

Mr. GORDON: What the hon. member has just said has of course been under my review and from the facts that I have been able to gather, perhaps the hon. member is seeking for the soldier settlers more even than they want themselves. I was well aware that Mr. Price, the gentleman to whom reference has been made, was president of the soldier settlers' union, and on behalf of a very large body of soldier settlers on the land representations have been made by the unions from time to time to the department. Those representations have all been taken into consideration and a number of conferences have been held throughout not only western but eastern Canada making a general review of the situation in the light of present conditions as well as in the light of the situation in which the soldiers generally find themselves. When I say that the hon. member asks more than the soldier settlers union itself asks, probably he would not urge the proposition he has just outlined. In order to make the position clear, may I read a letter which I received from Mr. Price, president of one of the unions, under date of February 14, 1933.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask what is Mr. Price's local?

Mr. GORDON: The hon. gentleman knows who he is. He is Mr. H. J. Price, the man to whom I referred a moment ago.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am not clear as to his district.

Mr. GORDON: He is president of the soldier settler union and the letter is dated from Saskatoon.

Mr. NEILL: Union of Saskatchewan?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. It reads:

Dear Mr. Gordon:

I have spent the day discussing with Mr. Magladery, General Ross—

That is Judge Ross, I believe, of Yorkton, Saskatchewan, who is very deeply interested in the welfare of the soldier settlers and the soldiers generally.

—soldier settlers, and representatives of the board, the problems of the settlers and, as a result, we submitted certain conclusions for your consideration. The submissions are generally satisfactory to the delegates who have attended the conference to-day, and I believe will meet the situation.

If you can see your way clear to implement these recommendations by legislation, I will undertake to recommend to the soldier settlers' unions that, barring any unforeseen calamity not at present within our contemplation, the unions should refrain from making any further representations on matters of policy in connection with soldier settlers during the currency of the arrangements which are now recommended to you. I have no doubt that the soldier settlers' unions will accept my recommendation in this regard.

Yours faithfully,

H. J. Price,
President, Soldier Settlers' Union.

The recommendations that Mr. Price has reference to in that letter are incorporated in the legislation that will be founded upon this resolution.

Mr. NEILL: The union refers apparently to Saskatchewan.

Mr. GORDON: I believe it includes some parts of Alberta.

Mr. NEILL: In the district that I represent there is a settlers' association of that nature and they kept aloof from that union because they were not satisfied with the proposals put forward by it. Not anticipating that this matter was coming up to-night, I have not my papers with me, but my recollection is very definite that they went on record they would be satisfied with nothing less than a total remission of past interest, that is, I presume, since the date of the last adjustment of 1930. They said that it was no use beating about the bush or pretending to be able to pay something they could not pay, and conditions were such that they were reluctantly compelled, not perhaps to demand, because we do not demand from the government, but to submit that the only acceptable arrangement, acceptable because there was a possibility of its being carried out, would be a total remission of interest. I have a very definite request from them to that effect. The minister says, and says truly, that these payments are all by way of amortization. A man does not owe $100 and pay 8 per cent interest; he pays a sum capitalized or amortized over twenty-five or thirty years. The minister says that he is going to rebate the interest. Will it not be a very complicated thing to arrive at the interest for any specific year? How is the settler to know to what rebate he is going to be entitled?

Mr. GORDON: I am told that there will be no difficulty in identifying the interest for 1932, because that is separated in the ledgers. With respect to the following years, the act makes provision for a credit of one additional dollar if one dollar is paid. If he pays one dollar, he gets credit for two. It is putting a premium on thrift rather than otherwise.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister has made it clear that there is to be a remission of interest from 1932, and the resolution says, "and the application of payments made to reduction of principal indebtedness." Is that payments of interest made? I presume it would be, because it is all in the one sentence.

Mr. GORDON: If the 1932 interest was paid by any settler, then in order to bring his position to an equality with those who did not pay but whose interest was remitted, the payment of those who did pay is credited upon their payments falling due.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): When the interest is credited, does the man also get an additional one dollar credit?

Mr. GORDON: No. For the one class the interest is remitted because it was not paid for 1932. As regards the other class who paid the interest, the person under the contract gets credit on his payments generally.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just to the amount of the interest?

Mr. GORDON: For that year.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): To the amount of the interest only?

Mr. GORDON: For that year.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The additional credit on payment of arrears or instalments of arrears—that is the dollar added to the dollar—applies in the future and only on principal payments? Is that correct, or does it apply also to interest?

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. GORDON: It applies to both interest and principal payments.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): To all payments?

Mr. GORDON: To payments made from March 31, 1933 to March 31, 1936. Wherever a payment of one dollar is made, whether on principal or on interest, the settler gets credit for two dollars.

Mr. McINTOSH: The Minister has quoted the point of view of Mr. Price. Is Mr. Price the president of the Saskatoon local of the settlers' union, or just what position does he occupy?

Mr. GORDON: He signs himself, president of the soldier settlers' union.

Mr. McINTOSH: That may be the soldier settlers' union for the district of Saskatoon, but that is only one local of the soldier settlers' union. I understand that there are fifty locals of the soldier settlers' union organized in northern Saskatchewan and elsewhere, and I do not think the point of view of these fifty locals is the same as that presented through the minister by the locals stated. I did not know this matter was coming up today and there is some information I have not at my disposal, but I have a letter here from H. S. Clarke, the secretary of the North Battleford local. He farms a short distance from North Battleford. He met the commissioner and General Ross when they went out west last fall to meet the soldier settlers and conferred at Lloydminster, Saskatoon, North Battleford and other places.

Mr. GORDON: I see that Mr. Price gives his address as Lloydminster.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then that would be the Lloydminster local he was speaking for. What I want to point out is this, that the North Battleford local, I presume, is working in harmony with all the other locals, and therefore I am wondering at the discrepancy between the point of view presented by the minister and Mr. Clarke's conception of the question. Mr. Clarke says:

> Our aim is that the debt be as it stood at the time of revaluation in 1929, and no interest charges be made from that date. Any moneys paid in since to be applied to principal only.

If Mr. Clarke has the right slant on this question, then the statement I made previously is sound, that the department is not going as far as I anticipated to meet the wishes of the soldier settlers, and I am wondering if the limits set by the resolution are going to be strictly adhered to by the minister and his department. I rather hope not. I would like to see the minister and the department take as favourable a view of the whole situation as possible.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I shall reserve most of what I have to say until the bill is before us. Did I understand the minister to say that this remission of interest would be from the standard dates in 1932 onward to 1937, for a period of five years, or just for one year?

Mr. GORDON: The interest is remitted for one year. That refers to the interest accruing under the act during the twelve months immediately preceding the standard date in 1932.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: So interest is due on present payments? It is just remitted upon arrears?

Mr. GORDON: It is the interest for the twelve months that have passed. If those interest charges have been paid, the person paying them gets this credit applied on principal. The hon. member for North Battleford will probably remember that when the thirty per cent horizontal reduction was made in May, 1930, just near the end of the spring session—

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In the last week of the spring session.

Mr. McINTOSH: That was the date.

Mr. GORDON: The arrears of interest were spread at that time, and the interest that is being remitted entirely is from the standard date in 1931 to the standard in 1932. That is remitted, washed out, and those who paid are given credit for an amount equal to the payments they made. From that time on anyone who pays a dollar gets credit for two dollars.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am going to ask the minister, when he introduces the bill, to bring down to the house details showing the total cost of administration of the Soldier Settlement Act from the beginning to date; the total cost to the country of the revaluation of stock and equipment; the total cost of the revaluation of land; and after adding all those together I would ask the minister to tell the house whether he has ever thought of the advisability of giving the land to the settlers who still have a slight equity in it and wiping out the whole settlement scheme once and for all.

Mr. NEILL: I am asking for information, not seeking to delay the minister. Will this resolution, or the bill founded upon it, apply to settlers who, so to speak, have followed up the original settlers?

Mr. GORDON: It does apply to them.

Mr. NEILL: My other question is this: The resolution contains the expression, "the removal of the lien on the equipment of soldier settlers." Does that mean that the lien will be wiped out or turned on to the land?

Mr. GORDON: The amount of money secured by the lien will not disappear, but the lien will be removed the same as it was removed some time ago on stock and equipment.

Mr. NEILL: It still adheres to the land?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: There is one further question I should like to ask the minister before the bill is brought down. At that time I shall have something more to say. What about the soldier settler who year after year for many years has paid to the board his principal and interest and then, just a limited number of years before his principal and interest is paid, passes out, or goes west? What about the dependents of that man? Will the department modify the legislation in any way so that the property will pass into the hands of the dependents? Because if the money is not paid, and the breadwinner is taken away, they would have to leave their farms and lose all their holdings.

Mr. GORDON: I assume the hon. member is referring to the interests of a deceased soldier settler.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: As I understand it, the interest of the deceased in the land devolves upon his dependents and is administered by the estate. Whether or not there are cases where the estate is not able to administer them and suffers hardship, I do not know. There may be such cases.

Mr. McINTOSH: I think the average soldier settler is fearful of that condition arising. He feels that if death comes there will be nothing left for those remaining.

Mr. McINTOSH: Nothing left, if something is not done to save the estate for those who are left.

Mr. SPENCER: I believe when the minister was considering bringing down this legislation an opportunity was given to soldier settlers to place their views before him. I should like to ask to what extent the present legislation is in line with their wishes.

Mr. GORDON: The present legislation is not in line with the original view of some of the soldier settlers. A number of them wanted the whole debt wiped out. In fact, I believe some of them asked the return of money they had paid. Of course those differences had to be the subject of conferences, investigations and exchange of views. All the various possibilities of legislation of this type had to be considered. In the main these settlers do not want to be legislated into ownership. The final result was that the legislation drafted as nearly as possible conformed to the views of the majority. I have no doubt in the world there are those who will not be satisfied and, although I am an optimist, I never expected that we could satisfy everybody. I do say however that, in my judgment, as a remedial measure the proposed legislation does deal equitably with the soldier settlers throughout Canada, and others holding contracts with the government. An effort has been made in framing the legislation to see that a penalty is not imposed upon other soldiers, because it must be remembered that soldier settlers represent less than three per cent of the Canadian expeditionary force. There are many soldiers in Canada to-day who are not on land and who are in the same difficulties in which many of us find ourselves. I make the statement, believing it to be true, in the relative sense at any rate, that there are many soldiers who are not in the preferred position that the soldier settler is in, and who have not had the advantage of residing upon lands for the last thirteen or fourteen years. Having that in mind, and also the position of other land owners in the various provinces where different legislative enactments have been passed or are contemplated, the government felt that the best course to follow was to deal with the soldier settlers and others holding lands from coast to coast in the way indicated in the resolution, and which will be set out in greater detail and accuracy in the bill to follow.

I do not believe that the horizontal reduction was at all sound. I cannot help but think it was put through in a hurry, and that at the time consideration was not given to the effect it might have. The effect was not an equitable distribution. I think in so far as it is possible this bill will bring about equitable distribution. Then, again, the government do not deem it desirable to enter into any such agreements as were entered into with respect to taxes and things of that character. They were not universal or dominion-wide in their application. That was hurriedly done; the so-called agreement was hurriedly entered into. I do not say this in a spirit of ultra-criticism of those who had charge at the time, but in my estimation it was hurriedly done and did not extend to all those under the act the benefit of the so-called agreement. As a matter of fact it applied only to the three western provinces, and was entered into when there was before the then soldier settlement board the opinion of the Department of Justice that it was illegal to do it. I have no doubt it was illegal. I say it was hurriedly entered into in the late spring or early summer of 1930, that it was not a wise procedure to take and has not worked out well. It has given endless trouble; it has taught many settlers to disregard their responsibility to their municipalities, and rendered the position of those municipalities almost hopeless so far as collecting taxes is concerned. Some of the settlers do not consider that municipal taxes are obligations which they should take seriously. I say that with great frankness, because that was one of the results achieved by the so-called tax agreement.

Mr. SPENCER: I understand that owing to poor prices for crops last year the soldier settlers had great difficulty in meeting their one-third crop payment. Is an attempt now being made to collect one-third, or is it being dropped to one-fourth?

Mr. GORDON: In accepting a portion of the crop the director endeavoured to conform to the practice and the law in the various provinces. The provinces would adopt one-third or one-fourth or some other fraction, and the director endeavoured to conform. But the practice now is to accept one-fourth or less, regardless of whether or not the province asked for more.

Mr. NEILL: A lot of these men will have payments coming due for the next ten years, say. The credit of $2 where he has paid $1 applies only for five years. Suppose by some miracle he gets some money—he will not get it out of the land, but his mother-in-law might die—will he be allowed to pay in advance in order to get this $2 for $1?

Mr. GORDON: He can prepay for one year.

Mr. NEILL: One year at a time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gordon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 45, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.56 p.m.

Friday, March 17, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 51, to incorporate Devonshire Jockey Club.—Mr. Morand.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Maisonneuve) moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. JEAN: The object of this bill is to provide for a joint superintendent of bankruptcy who will be familiar with both official languages as well as with the civil laws of the province of Quebec. Representations have been made that the administration of the act as amended last year would be more effective if such an officer were appointed, and that is why I introduce this bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a point of order to be raised in connection with the introduction of this bill because if it proposes that a charge shall be made upon the revenue, it would be out of order.

Mr. JEAN: I do not think there is any charge upon the revenue as the bill provides that the salary to be paid to the joint superintendent shall be subject to the approval of parliament. The act as amended last year provides that the salary and expenses of the joint superintendent shall be paid by the revenues obtained under the act. A special assessment is made upon every bankrupt estate to pay these expenses and I do not think an appropriation would be required.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the point of order is well taken. The bill provides for the appointment of an official and would therefore entail a charge upon the revenue. Such legislation can be introduced only by a minister on the approval of the crown.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members for greater Vancouver I should like to ask of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) a question based upon a telegram sent by the mayor of the city of Vancouver. I informed the minister's office this morning that I would ask this question. The telegram is very brief and perhaps I might read it. It reads:

> Critical condition exists in Vancouver due to inadequacy of relief scale as allowed by provincial government to meet shelter. Wholesale evictions involving hundreds of families under way resulting in increasing threatening condition.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should not read that telegram.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then I shall ask my question based upon the substance of the telegram.

Mr. BENNETT: I am raising a point of order. The other day Your Honour at the instance of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) very properly directed attention to the fact that to read a telegram in this house is to indicate what may or may not be true. In many instances telegrams have been read which doubtless the hon. members reading the telegrams believed to be true but which upon investigation were found to contain absolutely improper and incorrect statements of fact. To spread upon Hansard a statement which an hon. member does not know of his own knowledge to be the fact is to introduce into this house another member. That member is making a statement when not actually a member of the house. I object to the reading of this telegram because to do so is contrary to the rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the point of order, may I point out to my right hon. friend that the point of order raised the other day by the leader of the opposition was entirely different. He spoke of a telegram received by the right hon. gentleman which referred to certain proceedings of this house. If I am not to be permitted to read the telegram, I shall incorporate its contents in my question to the Minister of Labour. Surely when an emergent condition exists in one of the large cities of Canada and when a telegram is addressed by the mayor of that city to all members irrespective of party, it is a matter of which this house should take notice.

Mr. SPEAKER: Whether or not it is from the mayor does not make the slightest difference. The hon. member should proceed to ask his question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall ask my question in my own way.

An hon. MEMBER: Take that back.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I mean nothing disrespectful. I shall base my question upon my knowledge of what is in the telegram. Is the Minister of Labour in receipt of information from the authorities of the city of Vancouver pointing out that very emergent conditions exist there and that wholesale evictions have been carried out? If his attention has been directed to this situation, what measures does he propose to adopt to remedy it?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The answer to the interrogation is obvious. While I have not had any communication direct, the position of this government was stated by me on February 16. If hon. members will refer to page 2151 of Hansard, they will see that my answer to a similar question was as follows:

> The only conditions which this government has at any time laid down with respect to direct relief have been to define direct relief as consisting of food, fuel, clothing and shelter or the equivalent thereof, and that there shall be no discrimination in the granting of relief to any applicant by reason of political, racial, religious or other considerations. No limit has ever been set by this government to the amount of relief which shall be granted to any applicant, this being constitutionally a matter wholly within the determination and judgment of the local authorities. It will also be obvious to members of the house that, even aside from the constitutional aspect, such matters are properly for the local authorities to determine.
> Answering my hon. friend's third question, "On whose authority rates for direct relief are fixed?" I would say that municipalities must determine, first, whether relief shall be granted and, second, to whom and in what amount it shall be granted. I also presume that such decisions on the part of municipalities receive provincial approval.

From time to time the department does receive communications direct from individuals and provinces, but I do not think it would be even enlightening to hon. members for me to reiterate what I have said so often before. There is a proper method to bring this matter before the government, namely, through the provincial governments. If representations are made to a provincial government and if in turn that government, the municipality and the individual respectively find themselves unable to take care of the things outlined with respect to his maintenance, then the matter will promptly be considered by the government and such appropriation made as to take up the difference between what those primarily responsible are able to do and the total amount.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have any representations been received from the government of British Columbia in regard to this?

Mr. GORDON: I believe not. I have received this message from another member, but the department has not had anything direct.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister be prepared to investigate this particular situation in regard to the city of Vancouver?

Mr. GORDON: The province must unquestionably have knowledge of the contents of the telegram. The provincial authorities are in touch with the department here almost daily. I do not think it is desirable that we should prompt the provincial authorities to exceed what in their judgment seems to be adequate provision for cases of this kind.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Is the minister not aware that when the municipalities apply to the provincial authority in British Columbia, the invariable answer is: We cannot help you to any greater extent because the dominion will not contribute their share of any larger rate?

STEAM TRAWLERS' LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Fisheries and in order to make it intelligible, may I make one or two brief remarks? Steam trawlers' licences expire on March 31 of this year and resolutions have been sent from a large number of boards of trade in Nova Scotia asking that those licences be not renewed on account of the difficulties which individual fishermen are experiencing. I would ask the government to consider refusing to renew those licences when they expire.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): I can tell my hon. friend that the matter is now under consideration.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HEENAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday evening the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), in referring to some of my remarks, had this to say:

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan)—I am sorry I do not see him here at present—spoke of the decrease in wages to be brought about, and said that already there had been a decrease on the Canadian National, as I understood him, of $125,000,000 fom 1929 to 1932.

I just wish to say that that was not the statement I made. It was to this effect:

Who suffers most in connection with the economies made on our railways?

Not the Canadian National Railways; I did not say that:

In 1931 the railway men were paid $74,000,000 less in wages than they received in 1929. I have not all the figures for this year, but I am satisfied that they will receive in wages $125,000,000 less than they were paid in 1929.

So that there may be no misunderstanding between the Minister of Railways and me on the 17th of March, I wish to make this correction.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but it was not quite clear. As a matter of fact, in order to keep the record straight, I looked up the figures for all railways, and it was $108,000,000 and not $125,000,000.

Mr. HEENAN: I had just the government's own statement; I was quoting from that and the statement I made was quite correct.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Deficit of Canadian National Railways

Amount required to provide for payment to the Canadian National Railway Company of the net income deficit including profit and loss incurred by the system during the year 1932 as certified to by the shareholders' auditors in the annual report of the company for the year 1932, but exclusive of all non-cash items including interest on Dominion government advances and eastern lines deficits as further certified to by the shareholders' auditors and approved by the Minister of Railways and Canals, this payment to be applied in reduction of temporary advances made to the company from the consolidated revenue fund under authority of the Canadian National Railways Guarantee Act, 1932, $53,422,661.67.

Mr. YOUNG: We have not yet received the report of the Canadian National Railways and we do not know what they have been doing for the year. The minister might give us some information in regard to this deficit on the national railways.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I thought I gave the hon. gentleman enough information last night.

Mr. YOUNG: It was not authentic.

Mr. MANION: I do not know what information the hon. gentleman wants.

Mr. YOUNG: We would like to know how this deficit is made up. Some time ago I spoke about the Canadian National Railways being compelled to pay $1,000,000 a year more than was necessary for coal on the western division—and I presume the same is true of the eastern division—while in the United States they owned a coal mine which they had been compelled to close. How much of this deficit is due to that?

Mr. MANION: I cannot give any particulars to-day as to how much is due to that. Both railways in this country do patronize, so far as they can, Canadian coal mines, and without any doubt, in some instances at any rate, it costs them a little more to buy Canadian coal than it would if they chose to take coal from United States sources, but I do not think the difference amounts to any great sum of money.

This $53,000,000 odd, as the house knows and as I think my hon. friend knows although he is asking the question as if he did not, is the difference between the net operating profits of the railway and the amount of interest owed to the investing public, the interest owing to the investing public in 1932 amounting in round figures to $57,000,000 or $58,000,000, and the net profits of the railway amounting to something like $4,000,000, leaving a balance of approximately $53,000,000 which the government of Canada has to meet, being the interest on bonds purchased by various investors, the bonds to a large extent being guaranteed by the Dominion government, but raised for the necessities of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. YOUNG: That is very true, but when the new bill becomes law, all that this house will have to do is to vote the deficit. But the bill is not in effect now, and before we vote this deficit I think we should know how it is made up. If the statement I made a few moments ago is correct, that the western division is paying $1,000,000 more than is necessary for coal, perhaps a similar or a larger amount more than is necessary is being paid on the eastern division. I think the minister should give us that information so that we can see how the deficit is made up and whether or not we can reduce it.

Mr. MANION: This item will shortly come before the select standing committee on railways and shipping which examines the items of the Canadian National Railways budget, and when that committee meets, detailed information can be secured. I have not the information at hand. I did not know that anyone was going to ask for detailed information, and in any event the information is in the possession only of the management at Montreal. I could not give those details. I have given all the information I have as to the cost of coal.

Mr. YOUNG: The trouble is that some of us are not members of the railway committee, and if we do not get the information in this house we may never get it. However, I will accept the minister's promise to let us have the information later.

Mr. McGIBBON: What was the loss on exchange last year?

Mr. MANION: I understand that it was $4,500,000. There was a greater loss than that on American exchange, but that loss was partly made up by the favourable British exchange. The net balance against us I believe amounted to $4,500,000.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police

Further amount required for the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the allocation of this and other votes pertaining to this service to be as treasury board may direct, with effect from April 1, 1932, notwithstanding the provisions of vote No. 202 and vote No. 277 of the main estimates, 1932-33—the amount hereby granted being the equivalent of the half-yearly payments due under the provincial agreements, such payments having been made by the several provinces and paid into the consolidated revenue fund, $357,500.

Mr. VENIOT: What share of the cost of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was paid by the province of New Brunswick to the federal government?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I think that information was put on Hansard a few days ago. I cannot give the figures offhand but I may say that the amount in the estimates represents the half yearly expenditure of the police in the various provinces of Canada. It is paid back into the treasury here in half yearly payments, but it goes into the consolidated revenue fund and we have to get it out. That is the object of this vote. As the provinces pay, the amount is remitted to the consolidated revenue fund. I can furnish my hon. friend with particulars for each of the provinces. All of the provinces now have made agreements with the federal government with regard to police services except Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia. We have no agreement with those three provinces, but the other six have all come in under an agreement.

Mr. VENIOT: I am content if the minister will provide me with the information.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Would the minister be kind enough to tell us the total establishment of the mounted police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot give it exactly, but it is about 2,400.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does that include the new services which have been taken over by the mounted police, such as customs work?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. I think the total establishment is around 2,400 or 2,500.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there any increase as compared with last year?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Some increase, but not a notable one.

Mr. HOWARD: Possibly this is the only item under which I can bring to the attention of the minister a matter that was drawn to my attention recently. Some time ago the mounted police purchased three motor boats for protective purposes. Those boats, under the control of the National Revenue department, were built in Canada, but the specifications called for United States motors of a size and kind which could have been just as well built in Canada. I should like to know from the minister if there was any special reason why these patrol boats had to be engined with American motors.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is an explanation but I have not it by me at the present time. However, the estimate for the mounted police will be down I hope next week, and I will have full information when it comes up for consideration. I think the boats had been ordered by another department and that the engines were placed in them before the boats came into the hands of the mounted police at all. I will have full particulars for the hon. member when the mounted police estimate comes up shortly.

Mr. HOWARD: The reason I ask is that there is an industry in my section of the country, although not in my county, which is complaining very bitterly over this transaction. I thank the minister for undertaking to give me the information.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask the minister as to the duties of the mounted police with regard to liquor enforcement. How do they work in with the customs officials?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Generally speaking, the Excise Act is one of the acts which the mounted police are charged to enforce, but the customs department has also a staff of men who to some extent take part in the same work. The Excise Act, however, is a dominion act and the mounted police are charged with its enforcement. In provinces where agreements have been made with the provincial authorities the mounted police are also charged with the enforcement of the provincial liquor acts. That does not apply in Ontario, Quebec or British Columbia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I noticed in the Montreal papers a few weeks ago an account of the seizing of a still in that city, about which complaint had been made for a considerable time past, but about which it is said the mounted police had failed to accomplish anything until after the customs officials had stepped in. I quote from the Montreal Herald of January 19, 1933:

> It is believed that the Department of Justice at Ottawa, following many complaints took the matter in hand and ordered special investigators to work under the orders of the collector of customs in Montreal.
> Even the lawyer for the accused appeared surprised yesterday when he appeared for police bail for his clients.
> "My clients were arrested for allegedly being found with a still, not by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, not by the Quebec liquor police, but by a man named Laing," he stated in surprise. Making a gallant effort to force the still into the open two weeks ago, R.C.M.P. officers, on a tip from the Herald, raided almost every garage in the west end of the city but failed to find anything but five American cars in storage. The still was then in operation on the same premises the officers raided about noon yesterday.

In the Montreal Gazette of the same date there is an account along similar lines ridiculing the mounted police and pointing out their inefficiency. I quote this paragraph:

> The grim, taciturn, relentless, brilliantly-arrayed Royal Canadian Mounted Police shortly, if they have not already done so, grimly and relentlessly will destroy another monument erected by man to the God Bacchus, to wit an illicit still; in fact, what is said to be one of the largest illicit stills ever unearthed in local communal confines. This establishment, furthermore, is believed to be the selfsame still rumours concerning which have been going the rounds for some weeks by word of mouth and in the pages of certain weekly papers.
> Daily newspapermen, daring to brave the grimness, the taciturnity, the relentless and the brilliancy of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I desire to raise a point of order. I do not think it is proper to read items from the press reflecting upon the very force we are now dealing with. This is not the place to do it. No one is assuming responsibility for it, and it happens that the very item the hon. member is reading is absolutely untrue. That is the difficulty.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point of order raised by the Prime Minister is quite proper. Unfortunately I was the only one of that opinion on the last occasion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If it is not true, I think it should be so stated. This is an article from a reputable paper, the Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: The Gazette is not doing it; someone else is writing it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister says it is not true.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, the Prime Minister says it is not true. If it is not true, it seems to me that is a very good reason why it should not be quoted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot quite get your point, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member says if the statement is not true, that is a good reason to read it; in my opinion it would be a good reason not to read it. I believe the quoting of the article is not proper. I have decided that on many occasions, but the last time I did so the house seemed to be unanimously against my decision.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot understand your ruling. Does it mean that we are not to read from a paper simply when the Prime Minister does not want an item to come before the public. If that is what it means, we should know it.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the reflection by the hon. member is quite uncalled for and fair neither to the Prime Minister nor to the chair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, in my opinion—

The CHAIRMAN: The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the house either directly or indirectly, is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinions, and not to quote the opinions of others.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman: I presume the rule referred to is No. 306, which says:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

The article I am reading does not refer to anything said by a member, nor does it express an opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes it does.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is a matter—

The CHAIRMAN: Either it is or it is not relevant to the issue.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is relevant to the issue.

The CHAIRMAN: If it is, it comes under commentary No. 306, and should not be quoted in the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is relevant to the issue, but the rule distinctly states that to be out of order it must reflect upon some member of the house or proceeding in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, proceedings within the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This article does not refer to a proceeding of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot be used at all then; it is irrelevant.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is in reference to the operations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the body we have under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will allow me to say so, commentary No. 306 is only quoting a decision. The spirit of the rule is that members are here to give their own opinion. They may quote an article or a book stating facts, but a commentary on any proceeding or any discussion in the house, with the object of swinging an opinion to one side or the other, is out of order. Hon. members are here to give their own opinions and they cannot base them upon commentaries or opinion coming from outside the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, again I submit that this rule distinctly refers to reflections upon members of the house or proceedings within the house.

The CHAIRMAN: I remind the hon. member that No. 306 is not a rule, but merely a commentary on a rule. Rule No. 41 is the one in question. I interpret the commentary to mean that members cannot quote opinions from outside the house on any matter being discussed in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where do we find that?

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no such rule.

The CHAIRMAN: It is a decision I am giving.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With all due deference to the chairman, I submit he has no right to interpret other than according to the written rules.

The CHAIRMAN: Then, the hon. member would give no latitude to the chairman or to the speaker. Standing orders are numbers so and so, and so and so, and the other paragraphs in Mr. Beauchesne's book are commentaries or decisions. The paragraphs I have mentioned are to guide the chairman or the speaker, and my intepretation is this—I may be right or wrong—that members are not allowed to quote any opinion commenting on the debate. Last time I decided I must be wrong because there seemed to be an unanimous opinion against me.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This has nothing to do with the debate.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor. Has he finished what he has to say?—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. I say this article is not a comment; it is not commenting in any way on the debate. This is a statement which has to do with actions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is quoting facts?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quoting facts.

Mr. BENNETT: No, you are not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quoting a newspaper.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will read the article I shall decide, after hearing it, what he is quoting.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall continue to read, then?

Mr. BENNETT: But, before reading the article I should like to make some observations. I have no desire to curtail the debate. The hon. member suggested that because I directed attention to a point of order, therefore the chairman should decide that the point had been well taken. Far from it. As I understand the rules of debate in this house a member who quotes from a newspaper, if he does, is taken to pledge his honour that the statements, if they are alleged to be statements of fact, are true. If he is unwilling to do that, he should not read them. That is perfectly clear. Certainly that is the rule in the mother of parliaments.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, when I have finished. The rule as to quoting of opinions of people outside the house with respect to matters under discussion seems to be so clear that we should not have any difficulty in interpreting it when the house makes its own rules to govern its own conduct. That is clear. But there are 245 members in the house endeavouring to influence the conduct and opinons of one another. To introduce the 246th member by quoting in the house the opinion of someone not in the house with respect to a matter not under discussion is to add to the membership of the house an irresponsible outsider. That is clear, as I understand the rule. Certainly in England it is not done; wherever else it may be done it is not done there.

It has been suggested I have been an offender in this regard myself. I think we all have been. But, with the multiplicity of magazines and papers, and with the number of articles appearing in newspapers for which there is no warrant, does it not occur to the house that in its own interests it should limit the debate to statements of fact made by the members themselves upon their honour as members, after satisfying themselves that those statements are correct, rather than reading statements made by the correspondent of a newspaper, and then stating that "from such and such a paper I read so and so" and ask the house to believe it is true, because someone has said it is true. In my judgment that is not correct practice.

The matter under consideration is the making available a sum of money that has been paid by a province for police service. That is the item now under debate. One of the provinces has paid into the consolidated revenue fund a sum of money which should be available for this fiscal year. It can only be made available by the passing of this vote. The vote refers to an appropriation paid by a province into our consolidated fund for the police force, which this item would release. That is all. How that has anything to do with the conduct of police with respect to a still in the province of Quebec, I cannot understand. It would not be relevant; and relevancy, at least with respect to debate, used to be necessary.

I mention this only because it seems to me that if we are going to get the business of parliament transacted at all, there should be some regard for these matters. If repetition is to be the measure of merit then you will have repetition and repetition and repetition, the same thing being said in every debate, as has been frequently done in this house. I only direct attention to this point for the reason that I think it is desirable that we should discuss the matter with some degree of relevancy in the first place, and secondly that we should not introduce the opinions of other persons, which may or may not be correct, for the purpose of influencing opinion in this house, or read statements as statements of fact for the accuracy of which we have no warrant.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member proceeds, let me say that, without having at least heard or read it, it is impossible for me to decide whether the article the hon. member wants to quote is relevant. I will ask the hon. member to send it to me so that I may read it, or I will let him read it and stop him if I think it is not relevant.

Mr. POULIOT: As the question is very important may I say a few words on the point of order, stating certain general views with regard to constitutional law.

The CHAIRMAN: No, I think the hon. member had better speak on the point of order and reserve his lecture on constitutional law.

Mr. POULIOT: No, it is not a lecture, but it is in order to prevent being lectured in the future. We are discussing a matter of the utmost importance, on which the right hon. Prime Minister and other hon. members have spoken, bearing upon what is to be the procedure in future in this house. Here I have the standing orders of the House of Commons. There is nothing about reading books or newspapers. We find in Beauchesne's book—which is made with pepper, scissors and glue—a reference to—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I ask the hon. member to take his seat. Hon. members must speak to the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to do so. If I may read this note—

The CHAIRMAN: I can read myself.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to read it for the benefit of the whole house. At page 335:

But a member may read extracts from documents, books or other printed publications as part of his speech, provided in so doing he does not infringe any point of order.

That is something that anyone can see.

But there are certain limitations to this right, for it is not allowable to read any petition referring to debates in the house, and where the language of the document is such as would be unparliamentary, if spoken in debate, it cannot be read. No language can be orderly in a quotation which would be disorderly if spoken. Nor can any portion of a speech, made in the same session, be read from a private book or paper. It is also irregular to read extracts from newspapers or documents referring to debates in the house in the same session. (May 326.) In making extracts a member must be careful to confine himself to those which are pertinent to the question; it is not regular to quote a whole essay or pamphlet of a general character.

I wonder if the hon. gentleman is reading the whole essay or pamphlet!

Neither is it regular for a member to read a paper which he is asking the house to order to be produced.

This is not produced.

Nor is it in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or other communications, whether printed or written, emanating from persons outside the house, and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member, or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

There is a reference to English Hansard:

"Allusion to debates in the other house are out of order," says May, "and there are few orders more important than this for the conduct of debate and for observing courtesy between houses."

Then Bourinot continues:

During a debate on the tariff in the session of 1877, Mr. Mills referred to the opinions of Sir Alexander Galt, formerly a member and Minister of Finance. Subsequently one of the Canadian papers published a letter from Sir Alexander in answer to some of Mr. Mills' remarks; and the latter rose and proposed reading from the paper in question; but the Speaker interrupted him and questioned the propriety of this course,—a decision entirely in accordance with the English rules of debate. It is in order, however, for a member to quote from a printed paper, on which he proposes to found a motion.

The same thing should be said about a question he asks.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to disagree with some of the general statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister. I do disagree with you, sir, and the assertion that there is any rule in the book of rules of this house or the customs of this house that would justify a ruling along the lines that you indicated you might give.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no set rule.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Exactly, there is no such rule. Therefore any statement by yourself, Mr. Chairman, in connection with this point would be your opinion as to the proper conduct of this house. You would in that way be establishing a precedent.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will allow me, the chairman has to go by the well-known maxim stare decisis. He must be guided by the previous decisions of the speaker or chairman which have been voted upon by the house.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the chairman would be well-advised to be guided by the procedure which is customary in the British house also. I think he hardly did justice to his own well-read mind when he said it was not the custom in the British house to give quotations. Anyone who has studied the British Hansard recently will find numerous quotations. I recall for example that Sir Robert Horne in the budget debate last year quoted from Allison's History of Rome very freely in connection with certain monetary questions—

The CHAIRMAN: It was written before the debate.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Time after time the right hon. leader of the government has attempted to influence the opinion of the house by quoting—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The new despotism!

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): —in support of his own opinion from Salter to Gladstone and Bryce and heaven knows who. It is almost impertinence on the part of any hon. member at this stage in the development of parliamentary procedure to suggest that because it is inconvenient or unpleasant for him to listen he should wipe out the customs of the past. This house has established definitely the custom within certain limits of relevancy or appropriateness of quoting authorities, sometimes of value, sometimes of little value, depending on whose opinion it is. There is also the practice in connection with the estimates, I have noted for over eleven years, of quoting from newspapers and asking questions based thereon. The only way we can get information in connection with affairs with which we are not personally acquainted is from newspapers. To correct items in newspapers we must ask questions in regard thereto. I have no knowledge of the newspaper item that brought about this discussion, but I think the subject matter of it justifies questions based thereon,—not charges but questions to the minister. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that you will reconsider your decision and not make a brand new rule of your own to go down in history as one of the most serious curtailments of free speech and public opinion that this house has been subjected to.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I gather from the temper of the committee that this discussion bids fair to be protracted. It is of course, perfectly competent to the committee to debate this item at great length, if it chooses to, but may I point out respectfully that, as was indicated by the Minister of Justice, all that this item does is to release funds which have been paid by the provinces into consolidated revenue, and make them available for the use of the service within this fiscal year. And unless my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) would be prejudiced by the delay may I point out that he would have ample opportunity to discuss any point arising with respect to the mounted police in the main estimates. I would like to have these estimates passed at an early date. I do not suggest for one moment that it is not competent to the committee to discuss this item as long as it chooses, but inasmuch as there will be ample opportunity in connection with the main estimates, I suggest that that might ease us over the difficulty for the moment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has already spoken on the point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I may be granted a word in reply to the Minister of Finance.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member can speak only once on the point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But this is the point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. YOUNG: We are in committee, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister spoke twice.

The CHAIRMAN: I am endeavouring to give a fair decision, but at the same time I cannot ask hon. members to follow the rules strictly if I do not follow them myself. The leader of the opposition wishes to speak to the point of order. I desired in the meantime to read the article and I asked the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to be good enough to let me see it, but he would not let me have it. Obviously therefore he puts me in a difficult position. In the meantime I must give the floor to the leader of the opposition on the point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope it will not be necessary for the chairman to give a ruling. It need not be necessary if what, sitting here, I heard was correct. It seems to me that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the chairman are at cross purposes. The statement of the article which the hon. member was attempting to read has been denied. What the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said—at least as I heard him—was that the article which he wished to read, if not true, should be denied.

The CHAIRMAN: Should be quoted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, Mr. Chairman. I did not understand the hon. member to say that the statement it contained was correct. What he did say was that if it were not correct it should be denied, and I heard the Prime Minister himself say that it was not correct. The Prime Minister himself denied it. It seems to me that if that is the situation there is no need for any ruling at all. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has asked the ministry a question with respect to a certain statement that appears in the press but which does not bear any relation to this debate, because this debate has commenced only to-day whereas the article in question was printed some time ago. It is perfectly proper for him, when the house is discussing estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to ask any question with relation to the mounted police and to ascertain whether or not a statement referring to the police is correct. I think that was what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was doing. He read a certain article with a view to ascertaining whether it was correct or not. He did not himself say whether it was correct or not. If it was correct it was a serious reflection on the mounted police and therefore he thought we ought to discuss the matter; but if it was not correct, he said it should be denied. If the minister denies that the statement is correct that settles the matter without the necessity for any ruling whatever. Certainly, if the chairman takes a different view—

The CHAIRMAN: The chairman expressed no opinion. He asked to see the article to see for himself whether it was relevant and applicable to this debate, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre refused to let him have it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It could not possibly be a comment on this debate inasmuch as this debate started only this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN: I must read the article if I am to decide whether it is relevant.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would it shorten matters, Mr. Chairman, if I were to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the two articles have been brought to my attention by the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and that they are not correct?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I offer a suggestion, Mr. Chairman. Some time ago the same point came up that we are discussing this afternoon and you decided that certain articles could not then be read. The house on that occasion was unanimous against your decision. Should we not regard the decision of the house in that connection as a precedent to guide us on this occasion?

The CHAIRMAN: The feeling of the house on that occasion did not change my opinion.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But does not the action of the House of Commons on that occasion constitute a precedent which should guide the chairman of committees or the Speaker?

The CHAIRMAN: It would, if it had been a decision. Had the house given a decision I should be bound by it. What did occur on that occasion was this. I said that if the house seemed to be unanimous against me I would not press my decision.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But you were convinced, Mr. Chairman, that the house was unanimous against your decision.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the right to the point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to add a word or two. The chairman has asked me to submit a certain extract to him privately, and this I decline to do. It does not seem to me that in this house we should have to run around submitting extracts to the chairman before we are allowed to read them. That is not the way parliament has been conducted heretofore.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The CHAIRMAN: I wished to prevent the hon. gentleman from being stopped while he was reading the article.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With due respect to you, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to submit articles to you in order that I may know whether or not I may read them.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will have to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I do not propose to.

The CHAIRMAN: Whether publicly or privately, he will have to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the eleven years that I have been in this house we have never had to submit articles to the chairman before attempting to read them, and I do not propose to do so to-day.

The CHAIRMAN: I was doing it as a matter of courtesy to the hon. gentleman, but he can go on.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I appreciate the courtesy but I decline to accept it.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not surprised.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not going to insist at the moment upon reading the article nor indeed am I going to extend the discussion. I quite agree that if the Minister of Finance is correct that the particular item before us does not refer to the general activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police there is no need for me to extend my remarks at the moment.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the hon. member withdraws the point of order?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I do not.

The CHAIRMAN: Then I shall have to decide upon it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not raising the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Then, if the point of order is disposed of, the hon. gentleman will proceed with his speech.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was reading an article that had been brought to my attention, conveying the information that although the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had been informed with regard to the existence of a still they had not succeeded in unearthing it nor in making the arrest.

Mr. DUPUIS: I rise to a point of order. A few minutes ago the Minister of Justice denied the statement with regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police having made an investigation, and in answer to the hon. member he said that the information contained in the article was not true. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is now persisting in his statement.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has the right to accept a denial made by any other hon. member with respect to facts personal to himself, but he can state any fact that he knows of, or has heard of or that has been published in the press, notwithstanding the denial of any other hon. member. I am therefore willing, so far as this debate is concerned, to let him proceed with his statement of facts.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Hasn't the point been decided, Mr. Chairman? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has endeavoured to read an article which, I understand, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have denied, and that ought to settle that point. But may I point out that so far as the article in question is concerned, as the leader of the opposition has indicated, it could not possibly refer to any proceeding that had taken place in this house. This is clear from paragraph 306, which reads:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

It could not be said that this article is expressing an opinion or is reflecting upon the proceedings within the house because the matter has just originated. The whole thing should be dismissed at once. The statement has been denied and it must be accepted and besides it has no bearing upon the proceedings of the house, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has pointed out.

The CHAIRMAN: Simply to read an article does not mean that it must be accepted. Surely the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) cannot ask me to decide this matter without my seeing or having heard read the article in question.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot conceive of any proceeding in this house whereby a member is asked to submit an article from a newspaper or anything of that kind to the Speaker or the Chairman before it is read.

The CHAIRMAN: I agree with that. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What item are we dealing with?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 394.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will content myself at the moment with asking a definite question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). Is it true that efforts were made about January 19 by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to locate a still which they were unable to do and that later on instructions were given to the collector of customs who succeeded in locating the still and having the men arrested and the still destroyed? If we can get back to the original matter, I should like to inquire if there is close co-operation between these two groups of officials. If this article is true and if the customs officials had to be sent out after a futile investigation by the mounted police, it would reflect upon the efficiency of the mounted police.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can only repeat what I stated before. Both these newspaper articles were brought to my attention by the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who informed me that the statements contained therein were not correct. There are two forces in Montreal, one belonging to the customs department and called the customs investigation branch and the other, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The customs investigation branch claims certain rights and privileges in regard to these matters. It has been said that when seizures are made they are allowed part of the fine or penalty whereas the mounted police are not. There was some friction between the two bodies, but that has ceased. The new commissioner has been in Montreal and the various jurisdictions have been established. The articles which have been read in part by the hon. member are not correct and place an entirely untrue light upon the whole situation.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Pacific Science Association towards expenses of the fifth Pacific Science Congress, $70,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where is this meeting to take place?

Mr. BENNETT: This was arranged for before we came into office.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to know who and what is the Pacific Science Association?

Mr. RHODES: The only information I have is that this vote is necessary as a result of an invitation extended by the preceding government to the Pacific Science Association which held its last meeting in Java in 1929. As to the details of the character of the organization and the subjects which it studies, I would have to ask that that explanation be given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) who is not here at the moment. I find that I have not these details before me.

Mr. NEILL: Seventy thousand dollars is a great deal of money to vote just "as is" and I suggest that we should have some information.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps I can assist the hon. gentleman. Canada has been represented at various meetings of this organization which comprises most of the countries which border upon the Pacific ocean. The last meeting was held in Java. We have extended invitations, I think twice, to the congress to meet in Canada but until the 1929 meeting our invitations were not accepted. We then became obligated as hosts to this organization. Owing to economic conditions, the meeting which was set for last year was postponed, but it became clear that it could not be postponed again. This organization discharges rather important functions with respect to various matters—the circumstance that it met in Java in 1929 is some indication of that fact—and it deals with scientific problems of the first order connected with various matters which arise in the Pacific area. I do not think any of us are anxious that we should spend this money but, on the other hand, this country occupies rather an important place in international matters and the invitation has been extended and accepted. I understand the meeting is to be held in Vancouver. There is no sum less than this vote that we could arrive at which would enable the matter to be dealt with properly. Doctor Tory has given a great deal of attention to the matter and various scientific organizations in the country are interested. Unless we become "welchers" we are not warranted in refusing to pass this vote. That is not a very excellent term to use, but it expresses exactly the true situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that I am happy to be able to agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). As I recall it, this organization is one of the world scientific organizations. It deals more particularly with problems relating to the Pacific and Canada, being a country that borders on the Pacific, is deeply interested in the study and research carried on. As the Prime Minister has said, Canada has been represented at previous meetings. Our representatives have been entertained by other countries and the turn of Canada had come to invite these other nations to our country. In doing so it was thought that we were not only performing an international courtesy but also doing something that would be of real advantage to Canada itself.

Mr. NEILL: We have heard from two of the most able men in Canada but both of them have failed to give us any real information as to the purposes of this body. One said that as they met in Java last year, that would give an indication of the scientific importance of this organization. I do not know very much about Java. I associate that country only with coffee and I do not know what scientific bearing the fact that this organization met in that country would have. The leader of the opposition is also vague in his remarks; he says that it is of great scientific importance. Would somebody, if he knows, tell me what was discussed at Java and is now to be discussed at Vancouver? Has it to do with the marine life of the Pacific or with trade or what? I am quite willing to vote the money; I do not want, as the Prime Minister suggested, to be a welcher, but I should like to know what we are voting and what we are getting out of this affair.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that the members of the organization comprise some of the most eminent scientists of the world. I am afraid, if I were to read one of their papers, it would not add greatly to the sum total of the knowledge of more than a few members of the house.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It would be ruled out of order.

Mr. BENNETT: It would not be out of order, because it would be merely a statement in answer to a question as to what was done at the meeting. I have not brought with me a copy of the proceedings at the last meeting. As a matter of fact I thought probably the committee would be content with an explanation of the circumstances under which we are called upon to make the expenditure in question. I promise the hon. gentleman between now and the consideration of the estimates of some department, say External Affairs, I shall endeavour to bring down the last volume and perhaps make it available for him so that he may be able to add to the sum total of his knowledge.

Mr. HEAPS: How many delegates are expected at this congress?

Mr. BENNETT: I am speaking subject to correction, but I think 100 eminent scientists gathered at the meeting in Java. The Japanese meeting was more largely attended. It is expected that probably 100 scientists will attend the meeting at Vancouver.

Mr. HEAPS: For a meeting of 100 scientists, it is necessary to vote $70,000?

Mr. RHODES: I may say that the Japanese government, during the period this organization met there, expended $250,000 and the cost to Java was some $130,000, so that it will be observed that the sum we ask as compared with those figures is rather modest.

Mr. SPENCER: How are the expenses allocated between the different countries?

Mr. BENNETT: A committee of Canadian scientists under the chairmanship, if my memory serves me aright, of Doctor Tory, has accepted the responsibility of preparing for the meeting and making the necessary arrangements, shall I say on a very meagre scale as compared with what was done at the last two meetings, to try to provide for the meeting in a way that will not be unworthy of Canada. The committee is not at the moment large, but I think additions have been made to the number. If my memory serves me correctly—and I speak subject to memory—there is a small local committee that Doctor Tory established at Vancouver in the course of a recent visit to that city. Last year the work was proceeding with a good deal of difficulty when it was concluded, with the consent of the organization, that the meeting would be postponed until this year. I would not like those who come here to read this debate as an indication of the welcome that will be extended to them if they come to this country.

Item agreed to.

Grant to Philip Campbell re illegal warfare claim, $1,460.

Mr. RHODES: I may say that this particular item is not to be classed with those cases which may be considered Canadian and which were dealt with by the reparations commission. The facts of the case, as I recall them, are that this man was a member of the crew of a British trawler. He was for a time interned in Germany with his associates who were members of the crew. After the war he became a resident of Australia and in 1921 or thereabouts he moved to Canada. He was in this country for some time before he discovered that his associates had all been reimbursed by the British government. He put his claim into the Canadian reparations commission and very properly in the circumstances it could not be granted. Then representations were made to the Imperial authorities who would have granted compensation as was done in the case of his shipmates, but unfortunately he made his application after the cases had been closed in the mother country and it was impossible for him to receive compensation. So the British government said this: Inasmuch as we have compensated a number of Canadians without calling upon Canada to pay, we think, as a matter of courtesy and of fairness in the circumstances, you might be able to take care of this man who now has a residence in Canada. So, as a matter of grace, we felt in these circumstances that to place this man upon a parity with his shipmates, we should ask for this particular appropriation. In view of the conditions of to-day, the cost of living, the value of the pound sterling and the comparable amounts which were paid to his shipmates in England, I think the figure in this item is rather high, and I am going to ask my deskmate to move that the sum be reduced by $460. I think the compensation of $1,000 is reasonable.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is compensation in full?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, and it is admitted it is purely a case of a compassionate grant.

Mr. HANBURY: It is not a legal claim?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. POWER: Who fixed the amount at $1,460?

Mr. RHODES: Due to exchange, I think there was an error in the figures. Who prepared them, I cannot say. In the ordinary course the supplementary estimates come to my office and I do not examine them until they are presented to my colleagues in council. As a matter of fact the item came into the estimates at the instance of the Department of External Affairs after communication with the home authorities.

Mr. POWER: Has Philip Campbell returned to his home in the old country?

Mr. RHODES: No, he is a resident of Canada to-day.

Mr. BROWN: What amount was paid by the British government to his shipmates?

Mr. RHODES: £300.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move that the item be reduced in the sum of $460.

Item as amended agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933, the sum of $54,380,349.93 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 52, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Quarantine: salaries and contingencies of organized districts, public health in other districts, Tracadie and Bentinck island Lazarettoes and leprosy generally, $162,000.

Mr. VENIOT: I would like to get some information from the minister respecting the appointment of a medical superintendent at the lazaretto at Tracadie. What I desire to learn is whether a permanent appointment of a medical superintendent has yet been made; who is temporarily in charge, and when does the minister expect a permanent appointment will be made.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The appointment of the medical superintendent at Tracadie lazaretto has not yet been made. The medical officer who is temporarily in charge at Tracadie during the vacancy is Doctor Peloquin, a medical officer of the Department of National Health. He has had experience in dealing with leprosy at our lazaretto on the Pacific coast. The position I understand is now being advertised by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask if Doctor Hache of Caraquet was not placed in temporary charge in October last? If so, what position does he now occupy in connection with the lazaretto.

Mr. MacLAREN: Doctor Hache was in charge for a certain time; I do not recall the exact months, but he is not associated with the lazaretto at the present time.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister has just stated that the vacancy is now being advertised by the Civil Service Commission. Is it not a fact that it was advertised last year and that applications were received, that Doctor Hache was one of the applicants among others, and that no action was taken by the Civil Service Commission at that time towards making a permanent appointment? If that is so, why is the position advertised a second time?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think the statement by the hon. member for Gloucester is correct, so far as I heard him. Doctor Hache was temporarily acting, but has not been appointed.

Mr. VENIOT: What about the first call for applicants by the Civil Service Commission? Why was there a second call?

Mr. MacLAREN: Because his appointment was not confirmed.

Mr. VENIOT: But there were other applicants? Why the necessity for a second call for applicants, when there were three or four other applications from medical men, men who had undergone the so-called examination, and some of whom were returned soldiers?

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot answer that, because it is a matter which comes under the control of the Civil Service Commission. They decided the position would be advertised for, but I do not know anything beyond that. I am not familiar with their special reasons.

Mr. VENIOT: I say the committee has a right to know those special reasons. I do not say the minister should carry them in his mind, but at least he should endeavour to obtain them. In practice, it is very seldom indeed that the Civil Service Commission call for a second tender—if I may use that term—without having received some intimation from the department. Here we have a vacancy created by the retirement on pension of Doctor J. A. Langis, the man who for twenty or twenty-five years was in charge of the lazaretto. He was perfectly willing to accept his superannuation, but had to be replaced. The vacancy was advertised. A number of physicians, some of whom I know to be very capable men, applied for the position. As I have already said some were returned soldiers. Yet the appointment has not been made. Although almost a year has passed the appointment has not been permanently made, and the commission make a second call for applicants. There must be some reason for it, and I believe the committee is entitled to know what the reason is, if the minister can possibly get it from the commission. We are entitled to know why the applicants in the first instance are all thrown aside and new applications asked for. I am convinced it is not fair to the men who applied at first, and especially unfair to the returned soldiers.

Although I represent Gloucester county, through illness in the last six months I have been unable to keep in touch with my constituents. Until the minister announced it to-day I was not aware that Doctor Peloquin was temporarily in charge. I understood Doctor Hache was still in charge. Further, I was not aware that the Civil Service Commission had made a second call, and was greatly surprised to learn it. I contend we are treating those men unfairly who were called upon to go through the usual routine the Civil Service Commission requires in such cases.

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot speak for the Civil Service Commission. I know what they have done; they have decided to advertise again, and all I can say to the hon. member is that I do not believe any previous applicant has been treated unjustly, because his application will be in order now just as it was previously.

Mr. VENIOT: It cannot be in order. If I had learned of these circumstances before I left home, and had not been surprised by receiving the information to-day, I would be in a better position to speak. I claim an injustice has been done Doctor Hache. He will not have the same standing before the Civil Service Commission upon his second application that he had on his first. Doctor Hache was placed in charge of the lazaretto on October 2, 1932; the minister himself placed him in charge. Then the minister made a tour through Gloucester county, and when going through my home town was kind enough to call upon me. I believe the minister's call was just at the time Doctor Hache was placed in charge. However, the date makes no difference. Doctor Hache and the minister, when on their way to Tracadie, called upon me at my home, and upon that occasion the minister informed me he was going to instal Doctor Hache temporarily. I was very happy to see that an appointee from the county of Gloucester was to be placed in charge of the hospital; I did not consider the matter from a political standpoint at all. I felt the work rightfully belonged to a doctor from the county of Gloucester providing he could qualify. Doctor Hache has been temporarily in charge of the hospital at Tracadie. He resides at Caraquet, a distance of twenty-one miles from the institution, and visits it three times a week, which was all he was called upon to do. I understand he was paid according to the services rendered; in other words he was not paid a full-time salary, but was paid a proportion of the full salary paid previously to the resignation of Doctor Langis.

Doctor Hache has been set aside. Is it because his services were not satisfactory? Was Doctor Peloquin called in to take charge of the lazaretto because it was found that, after serving three or four months Doctor Hache's services were not satisfactory to the department. Action certainly would not be taken through the Civil Service Commission because before they could act they would have to get a report of his qualifications as a temporary employee from the department. I claim what has taken place is a reflection on Doctor Hache, and that he does not stand the same chance on a second application or examination as he did on the first. He has been replaced, and an official permanently employed who is at the disposal of the department to be sent here and there for relief work, and to relieve superintendents in medical institutions. I claim that the department must have had some reason for taking that action. Having had some reason, they must report it to the Civil Service Commission, if Doctor Hache applies a second time. If he does apply a second time, whatever reason the department may give will militate against him. I claim the regular appointment should have been made when the Civil Service Commission received the applications and were in a position to decide upon the qualifications of each applicant. In five or six months they should not turn around and say, "We will call for new applications." What they should have done was to place Doctor Hache aside as a temporary employee and place Doctor Peloquin in charge temporarily. Then the Civil Service Commission could have gone on with the applicants they had and made an appointment, instead of waiting until nearly a year after and then calling for new applications.

Mr. MacLAREN: As the hon. member for Gloucester says, they might have, but they did not. The Civil Service Commission act for themselves, I cannot speak for them.

Mr. VENIOT: Who displaced Doctor Haché?

Mr. MacLAREN: I have stated to the committee that his temporary appointment was not confirmed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: Who replaced him as a temporary officer?

Mr. MacLAREN: Excuse me if I finish what I am saying. I would like to correct a minor point in the statement of the hon. member for Gloucester. I did not say to him that I went down to instal him, because Doctor Haché had been attending there previous to my arrival in Bathurst.

Mr. VENIOT: Just two days.

Mr. MacLAREN: Well if it was one day. So it was not an installation. His appointment was on temporary certificate of the Civil Service Commission, not by the minister or the department.

Mr. HOWDEN: I would like to broach a matter that comes under this item. There has been established in Toronto and Winnipeg and possibly other cities throughout Canada, sponsored by the provincial governments with the aid of the federal government, depots or offices for the interception and treatment of venereal disease. These offices have done splendid work, so much so that the discoverable incidence of this disease has been diminished fifty per cent in a comparatively short time. This year and last year and the year before no provision was made by the federal authorities for this grant, and the province of Manitoba at least was forced to discontinue the service. In view of the very far spread incidence of this form of disease—and it is impossible to find an adjective which describes the devastating effect it has on society and the people of the country at large—I would like to plead with the Minister of Health that he would try and find a means of placing an item in the estimates that would enable this work to be carried on in the province of Manitoba. It would not only be a charitable work but a work for the protection and welfare of the whole nation.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, I will bring the views of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) concerning this matter to the attention of the government. I would not like to give any answer now, but I will be pleased to bring the matter before my colleagues. I notice he asks that this amount be available for the treatment of venereal disease in the province of Manitoba. I think probably it would have been better had the request been made to apply generally, as before.

Mr. HOWDEN: Quite so, but I am from Manitoba.

Mr. LUCAS: I would like to ask the minister how many stations there are in Canada where leprosy is being treated, and where they are located?

Mr. MacLAREN: There are two lazarettos in Canada, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific. The one at Tracadie, New Brunswick, is much the older institution, because leprosy became endemic there, it had its home there, in fact I think that is the only instance in Canada where leprosy has become seated among the people. It has diminished very considerably as years go on. I visited the lazaretto there something like thirty or forty years ago and there were about thirty cases, and all of them had developed within that area. To-day there is a total of ten cases. But it does not mean that these cases arose in the east of Canada or the neighbourhood of Tracadie. It has now become a hospital for cases of leprosy found to exist over the eastern half of Canada. There are comparatively few of the ten that came from the original source about Tracadie. That is an instance where leprosy has diminished slowly but very substantially.

The other lazaretto is at Bentinck island, Williams Head, Vancouver island. It is a small island near Vancouver island. There are five cases of leprosy there to-day. All are Chinese. In fact the history in western Canada has been that the cases of leprosy are largely Chinese. These Chinamen are sent back to their home, if possible, but in a number of cases it is not possible on account of transportation reasons.

Mr. LUCAS: Has scientific medicine developed to a point where a permanent cure can be effected?

Mr. MacLAREN: Leprosy is essentially a long standing disease, usually very slow in progress. Certain cases come to a finality, apparently they are cured. No doubt they are assisted by treatment, but time is also an important element. There are cases of leprosy that do not tend to progress, even apart from any special treatment. On the whole treatment is of value, it certainly relieves, it extends their lives and makes them more comfortable. The treatment is not a prompt curative agent, but is of value all the same. As I say some cases become quiescent and are apparently cured.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: How many cases are there at Tracadie?

Mr. MacLAREN: Ten in Tracadie, Gloucester county, New Brunswick, and now five at Bentinck island, Williams Head, British Columbia.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Are the ten cases at Tracadie members of the white race?

Mr. MacLAREN: Hon. members can easily understand how occasionally a case creeps into Canada. Most recently a case was found of a British subject, white, who had lived in South America and subsequently came to Canada. That was a case which no doubt originated in South America. They are all white, and there are a few from the neighbourhood and others from various parts who have come to Canada and afterwards shown the disease. There is one patient who is supposed to have become infected in South Africa. Naturally a case creeps in occasionally, as I say. There is a general impression that leprosy is a highly contagious disease, but that is not the case. It is contagious, it is true, because that is the explanation of its continuing all through the ages; but with proper care and attention, proper living, it is only slightly so. If, however, people live in one household and do not take care of themselves—it is pretty much the same in the case of tuberculosis—then the disease is conveyed. In the case of the lazaretto at Tracadie, the institution is in charge of a community of sisters. That community has been there for very many years, and no case of leprosy has developed among any of the sisters. This is a good opportunity, I think, of indicating the excellent care that the sisters show, the proper spirit, and the kindness which they exhibit in their work. They are devoting their lives to the care of these lepers.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to add a word in support of the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Boniface, that it is the grave duty, particularly under present conditions, that the Dominion government and its department of health should interest themselves directly, both financially and otherwise, in the growing problem of venereal disease throughout the country. It is not necessary for me to tell the minister that under conditions of unemployment and underemployment, and under conditions of reduced income on the part of many of the middle and lower classes, there is a pressure which is greater than ever on the provincial clinics which have been maintained with some success—considerable success in many provinces. That strain, as the minister knows, has been very heavy owing to the fact that hundreds of people who formerly could afford to undertake private medical treatment now make application to the clinics, being unable to defray the cost privately. In view of the general conditions resulting from this state of affairs, and the conditions that will continue to result from want of adequate care of these cases, I would urge upon the minister that he give serious consideration to the proposal of the hon. member for St. Boniface, in the hope that next year if not this year there will be a large vote from this department for their responsibility in this matter.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall keep the matter before me.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister did not give me the date that Doctor Peloquin was temporarily in charge at Tracadie.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have not the date here.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister obtain it for me and let me have it by communication?

Mr. MacLAREN: I certainly will.

Mr. ELLIOTT: How long has the lazaretto been in existence at Tracadie, what was the greatest number of patients afflicted with leprosy at any one time, and at what date? I gather from what the minister has said, and I believe it to be the fact, that there has been a diminution in the number of cases in Canada in recent years and that the disease is now regarded as controllable, from the point of view of preventing any contagion to attendants. I should like to know how long ago the institution was established and when it had the greatest number of patients; also how that number compares with the number to-day. I take it that the patients in British Columbia come practically entirely from boats and largely from the orient. That was the impression I gathered, and I also gathered that no new cases have broken out there among residents in Canada.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should not care to give the exact date as to how long ago the lazaretto was established there. There has been more than one in that neighbourhood. I think however it goes back to 1830; it may be 1844, I am not quite sure. There has been a diminution in the number of patients, but as I said a few moments ago most of the cases now there are cases that are sent from the eastern half of Canada, and they are not Canadian cases because they have not developed in Canada; they have just drifted in. Actually there are now very few so called Canadian cases that have developed in this country. The Chinese come from abroad; in fact, most of the cases in Tracadie have come from abroad. There are a few however that originated in the area I speak of, where the lazaretto now is, and that is the explanation of the lazaretto being there. In the British North America Act there is a section providing that one of the duties of the federal government shall be to provide and care for lepers in Canada.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What was the greatest number at any one time in Canada, and when?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am informed that the greatest number at any one time in Tracadie was twenty-eight. I think there were quite that number there in 1886.

Mr. VENIOT: And the number in Tracadie now is between nine and eleven?

Mr. MacLAREN: The total number of cases at Tracadie is ten, but I do not think that more than two or three are natives of New Brunswick. The others are from large centres like Toronto and Montreal.

Mr. VENIOT: In the past lepers have been received at Tracadie hospital from the British West Indies. I think we have had one or two Chinamen and also some Icelanders. Leprosy was first discovered in Gloucester county some eighty or ninety years ago. It was supposed to have been brought in by a ship-wrecked crew. That was before confederation and before the federal government took over the care of lepers, this service was provided by the province. At that time the lepers were stationed at Sheldrake island on Miramichi bay. They became somewhat disgruntled and revolted and burned down the establishment. After confederation the federal government took charge and a colony was established on the western shore of Tracadie harbour. In 1887 the government made a grant and the present lazaretto was constructed. At that time the occupants of this colony were mostly residents of Gloucester county but I am pleased to be able to say that leprosy has been almost entirely eradicated from this district. This has been brought about by medical treatment and the watchfulness upon the part of the officials of the federal government in following up suspected cases and, despite opposition, placing them in the lazaretto. As the minister has said, at the present time there are about ten inhabitants in the lazaretto and of that number, not more than two or three are natives of Gloucester. These are old people who have been in there for years. There have been cases of absolute cure. I know of one old lady who was declared to be cured. She lived outside the lazaretto for years but finally asked that she be allowed to return there in order that she might die in the place where she had received such wonderful care. The sisters were employed after the federal government took charge and have had charge of this colony ever since. This old lady to whom I refer had been a resident in the lazaretto for some twenty-five or thirty years but due to recent medical discoveries, a perfect cure had been effected. I am informed that there are other cases now in the lazaretto well on the road to absolute recovery.

Mr. McGIBBON: If there are only five cases in the institution in British Columbia, all from the orient, why could not they be deported or moved east in order that the institution could be closed?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think I indicated the reason a short time ago. With one exception, we have returned all that it was possible to return. Difficulty is placed against the return of the other inhabitants by the transportation company. If a man happens to be disfigured or his hands or face ulcerated to any great extent, it is not possible to have the shipping company accept him for transportation to China. There is one man who might be returned but he has been found to be very useful in looking after the others and making them comfortable.

Mr. McGIBBON: Could not they be moved east? Surely the difficulties of transportation could be surmounted.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is natural for one to ask why these people should not be sent back to their country of origin, but I hope I have explained the difficulties in the way. It would be very desirable if that could be done but due to the attitude taken by the shipping companies it has been found impossible to do so.

Mr. McGIBBON: Why not move them east and close the western institution? That would save some $80,000 a year.

Mr. MacLAREN: Would it? This is a question about which one has to know a good deal before he can offer an opinion. How much does the hon. member think it would cost to transport a leper from British Columbia to Tracadie? Such transportation would involve a special car as neither the Canadian Pacific nor the Canadian National will allow such a case even in a drawing-room which is quite separate from the rest of the car and believed to be absolutely safe. But the fact is that they will not do so. This means there has to be an attendant. As hon. members seem to be really very much interested in this matter, let me give them our experience of the last case we sent to Tracadie. It will cost about $700 to send that one case there from Toronto. We have to be a little cautious about advocating economy on those rates. If you bring those five cases from the coast and place them in Tracadie, what guarantee is there that next week there will not be another case, because they are liable to occur anywhere in Canada amongst the Chinese, and then the same process has to be repeated? The department was carrying on prior to my time—and I am not taking any credit for this—and is continuing to act in the wisest, sanest and most economical manner possible.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know there was an agitation some years ago to have all the lepers in Canada put in one place, and I think those in charge thought a certain quarantine station at Grosse Isle would be a suitable place. When you talk of sending lepers to any particular spot, you will find no enthusiasm on the part of the people of that district. I happen to know because I was in charge of that department at the time somebody suggested that being done and I quite agree with what the minister has said in regard to the inadvisability of attempting to move a patient affected with this disease either any great distance or from one station to another where there has not hitherto been a hospital for this kind of patient. It is a matter of great satisfaction to those in charge of the department from time to time that this disease is gradually diminishing and that the fear of contracting it is nothing like as great to-day as it was, say, twenty-five or thirty years ago. I do not think any good purpose will be served by attempting to move the patients who are now in Vancouver to Tracadie or any other place.

Mr. MacLAREN: Just to complete this subject, I should like to say that opinions vary in reference to the care of lepers. Everyone is agreed that under ordinary circumstances this disease is not contagious to any substantial extent. For instance, of all the sisters at Tracadie with all their contact, nursing, dressing wounds, and so forth, not one has contracted the disease. That is because they are careful and understand the matter. Recently letters have come to the department from quite an outstanding physician stating that we were too strict about this matter and that the act was too severe in calling upon those cases to go to a lazaretto. First, let me say that nearly all of the cases that I have seen in Canada, with perhaps one exception, are of poor people and they must be cared for in some way; second, if a subject of leprosy is able to care for himself in the way of a home and nursing, it seems to me that the most practical thing to do is to allow him to go to the lazaretto. Such a patient will have somebody with whom to associate, the opportunity of gardening, boating, fishing and be able to live in a more wholesome, natural and happy manner than if allowed to remain in some other place where the public would have fear of the disease.

Mr. HOWDEN: I should like to make a further observation on this appropriation. It is true that in the constitution of this country provision has been made for the care of lepers, but that constitution was framed nearly a hundred years ago. I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health whether he does not consider that there are other infectious diseases of a venereal nature which are much more important to the Canadian people in this day than the incidence of leprosy. I have been a medical man for thirty years in reasonably active practice and I have never come across a case of leprosy, but I should like to state to the minister that I find syphilis in about every tenth patient. This is a matter of vital importance to the Canadian people, and I have no hesitation in making that statement on the floor of the house. The vast majority of people never see leprosy; it is not a very important matter. I would not for a moment have the government of this country ignore it or not make for it the provision that they do, but I say without hesitation that so far as the health of the Canadian people is concerned, the discovery, cure and prevention of syphilis are infinitely more vital matters. There are couples who have married and raised large families of, say, six or seven children who have grown up imbeciles or something of the kind, and it is a fact that neither the parents nor anyone else realized that the trouble was due to this disease. This has been discovered probably only when it was too late to do anybody any good and possibly when the disease might have spread indefinitely. If the government of Canada feels disposed to curtail and, if possible, destroy infectious diseases which threaten the health of the nation, the provinces are reaching out their hands for a little help in order to take the best and most efficacious steps that can be taken. The best we can do so far is to institute clinics. We have had two or three clinics which did splendid work in Canada until suddenly, almost overnight, the assistance from the federal government was shut off.

Mr. MacLAREN: It was not a sudden, but a gradual reduction.

Mr. HOWDEN: Well, it did not take very long to put an end to the grant. It has been ended for years although it was for a work that has not been exceeded in importance in this country. I desire again to urge the minister to confer with his colleagues in the cabinet in order that this matter may be seriously considered and that some assistance may be extended to the provinces so that we may once more, if possible, institute these venereal clinics.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am sure my hon. friend fully appreciates the difference between the two diseases. Leprosy is an obligation of the Dominion government to take care of.

Mr. HOWDEN: If the Dominion government had known as much about syphilis as about leprosy, that would have been a dominion obligation too.

Mr. MacLAREN: Please allow me to finish. We had no option in the matter. We did it in the case of leprosy because it was there for us to do, but venereal disease is not an obligation of the federal government. That is the difference.

Mr. HOWDEN: It should be an obligation of the federal government.

Mr. MacLAREN: The federal government made a grant, which was at one time very considerable, to assist in the treatment of venereal disease. That grant has gradually been decreased, but the grant was made originally to help the movement get on its feet. There is no obligation for us to continue. The cases are fundamentally different, but I quite sympathize with my hon. friend in the views he has put forward, and I shall bring them to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which might not strictly be considered a federal matter, but rather provincial, but yet I think the federal authorities would have at least some interest in it seeing that these items come under the heading of national health and the particular item we are dealing with deals with public health in other districts, among other things. The matter I wish to mention is the length of hours which nurses are obliged to work in taking care of the sick. I know that it is a provincial matter but I think it is worthy of being brought to the attention of the Minister of National Health. Our nurses in the various hospitals throughout the country are required to work twelve hours a day, from seven in the morning to seven in the evening, and the night shift from seven in the evening to seven in the morning, often with scarcely enough time to grab their meals while they are working. I have been connected with a hospital for several years, sitting on the board, and I have often wondered why our provinces do not take action and reduce the working hours of the nurses. Surely the health of these nurses should be considered. They have no labour organization like our masculine sex has to present their pleas and petitions even on the floor of this house, and try and get reasonable working hours. Generally speaking, men do not work more than eight hours a day, but here are young girls plodding away for twelve hours a day, and by so doing many of them ruin their health and prematurely shorten their days. Seeing that this comes under national health, I wonder if the minister would not think it worth while taking the matter up with the provinces, through the provincial departments of health, with a view to having the hours which the nurses are required to work brought down from twelve to, say, possibly eight hours a day.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is primarily a matter for the provinces. The question of the number of hours a day they should work would raise a very difficult question no matter under what authority it comes. Hosiptal orderlies of course, work similar hours, as well as that splendid branch of humanity, the medical men, although I am not making a personal reference there. The hours can hardly be avoided, but I may say for the comfort of my hon. friend that I appreciate what the nurses have to do, the long hours they have to work, and their faithful services, but in the majority of instances I believe that they have many opportunities to sit down and rest during their period of duty. It is not a continuous occupation like that of a girl in a factory. I should like first of all to have some helpful suggestion from my hon. friend. It is a matter that is brought to our attention frequently, although it is hardly in our field, but that of course does not prevent us taking a proper interest in the subject. Just at the moment I do not see any solution.

Item agreed to.

Immigration medical inspection, $141,500.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the minister tell the committee why the expenditure is still so high? I understood that immigration had been reduced most materially and that the offices abroad had been closed, but here we are spending $141,500 for medical services in connection with immigration. Do we still keep a staff of doctors in England or where are these doctors who are being paid?

Mr. MacLAREN: The amount does seem considerable in view of the fact that immigration has been reduced so very greatly, but still it will be noticed that there is a decrease in the expenditure from last year, and the figures for the last few years, which I expect to have in a moment, will show a similar reduction. No matter how small the immigration, it is necessary to maintain a certain organization at the various seaports; in this country, at Halifax and Saint John, Quebec, Montreal and in the west. Then in Europe we have a medical office in London, with two medical officers, and one at Liverpool, Glasgow, Belfast, Paris, Hamburg and Antwerp, together with stenographic staffs. In 1928-29 we had twenty-nine medical officers overseas as compared with eight to-day, a reduction of twenty-one, and that of course means a material reduction in the expenditure. In the year 1931-32 the total expenditure in Canada, Great Britain and the continent was $178,947.13. That is as against $162,000 this year. In the year 1930-31 the total expense was $254,160.10. That shows a substantial reduction. If hon. members wish, I could give the items to show how that amount is made up. The estimates for this year for these medical officers and their staffs are as follows:

Salaries, $85,433.50.
Allowances, including clothing, $10,000.
Wages, $1,000.
Professional services, $1,000.
Equipment and supplies, $15,000.
Rent, $9,000.
Travelling and incidental expenses, $14,000.
Miscellaneous, $6,066.

Or a total of about $141,500.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): While I have no complaint with regard to the reduction in immigration explained by the minister, I do think that in view of the statements by this government to the effect that it intends very seriously and drastically to limit migration to this country under present conditions, there is not a valid excuse for an expenditure of $140,000 for medical inspection. I believe those offices at Antwerp and in European countries generally, outside of Great Britain, should all be closed. I strongly recommend to the minister that the closing of all European offices outside of those in Great Britain would be a great step in the direction of cleaning this matter up.

Mr. MacLAREN: That has not been overlooked by the department. The advice of the immigration department is asked concerning the number of medical officers who should be in Great Britain and on the continent. Within the last twelve months there has been a reduction of twenty-one medical officers. That is evidence of withdrawing with considerable speed. At the present time we have only one man in Paris, one in Hamburg and one in Antwerp. I am advised by the Department of Immigration that that is a minimum number which we should have at those points. Then, there are two in London, one in Liverpool, one in Glasgow and one in Belfast. That is a very small number, even with immigration where it is to-day. As we have come down to only eight officials on the continent and in Great Britain, hon. members must realize that the saving is very material. These medical officers are paid between $3,000 and $4,000 a year, with the addition of some living allowance. Therefore I believe I can assure the hon. member for Bow River that the matter is being considered from a practical standpoint, and staffs are being steadily cut down.

Mr. LUCAS: Has there been any reduction in the staff in Canada?

Mr. MacLAREN: There has been a small reduction; I may be in a position to give the figures later. The number employed is in proportion to the amount of work required to be done. There are always ships coming in to Halifax and Saint John. For that reason there must be officers at those points. During the summer months they come to Quebec, and provision must be made at that point.

While in the year 1931-32 we had forty men on the staff that number has been reduced by nine.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I note from the report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1932, that there were only 7,332 British immigrants from the British Isles and 4,123 from all other countries, other than the United States. That would mean that there were only between 11,000 and 12,000 immigrants, and it would seem to me that the staffs are still too large to handle only that number of people. Further, if the staffs on the other side are doing their work effectively it seems strange to me that we should still have a total rejection of 324 at ocean ports for the fiscal year 1931-32. Would the minister explain why it is necessary to have so many people to handle so few immigrants, and if they are well handled on the other side why there are so many rejections on this side.

Mr. MacLAREN: I would suggest the number is very small. We have only four in the British Isles. People sail from many ports, and, if we have immigrants examined by our own medical men, I do not believe we could get along with a smaller number of officials. Were the 324 immigrants mentioned by the hon. member all coming to Canada?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have given the figures appearing in the report showing rejections at ocean ports, nationality and sex, for the fiscal year 1931-32.

Mr. MacLAREN: Let me say that all immigrants who come to Canada have not necessarily been previously examined. Those coming from Great Britain, and the parts of the continent I have mentioned, are examined. But, for instance, those coming from Norway, Sweden, or Denmark are not examined, and when they come to Canada a larger proportion of these are refused admission.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the method of procedure in the examination of immigrants coming from the British Isles? Have we Canadian doctors there to examine them, or is there a roster of English doctors? What is the pay given to English doctors for examining immigrants?

Mr. MacLAREN: We have both plans; we have our own medical men and we have British medical practitioners on a roster. As I have mentioned several times, there are five Canadian medical men in Great Britain, but they cannot examine people from all over a large area, although they are located at the principal points; so they are supplemented by those from the roster. They are paid for the examination by the immigrant.

Mr. ROSS: At what points are Canadian medical examiners placed in Europe, and what amount of work have they done during the past year?

Mr. MacLAREN: There are in Great Britain two Canadian medical officers—

Mr. ROSS: On the continent.

Mr. MacLAREN: I will make a complete statement. There are two in the head office, one in Liverpool, one in Glasgow, and one in Belfast. On the continent: one in Paris, one in Hamburg, and one in Antwerp. As to the number of examinations, there has been a marked reduction. In 1929-30 they numbered 131,185; in 1930-31, 62,975; in 1931-32, 16,958. This year, with incomplete figures it is estimated that there will be 6,000 examinations.

Mr. ROSS: At what points were these examinations made?

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot give the points I am merely mentioning our own medical officers.

Mr. ROSS: How many examinations did the man at Hamburg make?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am sorry, but I have not the figures here.

Mr. ROSS: I can hardly see the possibility of an examiner at Paris doing all the work for the southern part of Europe. If he cannot, of what use is he to this dominion? Do immigrants coming from Russia have to come to Antwerp or Hamburg to be examined, or does the medical examiner go to certain ports to examine?

Mr. MacLAREN: Only to some extent. For instance in Paris our immigration authorities wished us to have a medical man there to advise them.

Mr. ROSS: Why? How many have come from France?

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot give the figures.

Mr. DONNELLY: What medical examination or inspection is made of American immigrants coming into this country, and where are they examined?

Mr. MacLAREN: As far as I know there is no difference in the examination. They are passed by the medical men as they come through.

Mr. DONNELLY: Where are they examined?

Mr. MacLAREN: They are seen by the medical officer, and if he is satisfied he lets them come through.

Mr. DONNELLY: Have we Canadian medical examiners at the line to examine them as they come through? I have never seen any. I have been at Canadian ports when immigrants were coming through and I have never seen any Canadian doctor or anyone else examine them. In my constituency a man who some time ago came into this country from the United States developed in the last few years an incurable disease and is a charge on the municipality. I think it is the duty of the federal government to examine immigrants; if they are negligent, or have no medical examiner it is up to them to look after the patient, not leave it to the municipality.

Mr. MacLAREN: The system followed by the Canadian authorities is the same as that followed in the United States. While they are not actually examined, if there is a suspected case the immigrant is detained for examination by the medical officer. But examiners are not posted all along the border, either by us or by the Americans.

Mr. DONNELLY: I wish to lodge a protest. Where an immigrant comes into Canada from the United States and is accepted by the immigration authorities, and subsequently develops an incurable disease and becomes a charge on the municipality, the government should either have him deported or take care of the case.

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member understands, of course, that if a man is in such a condition that he should be deported, he can be sent back.

Mr. POWER: Since it would appear that we are not now encouraging immigrants, and we have heard on all sides that it is not the policy of the government to do so, I propose to move a reduction in this vote. I move:

That vote No. 212 (immigration and medical inspection, $141,500) be reduced by $100,000.

Mr. ROSS: I imagine this amendment would not have been moved if I had been able to get information—

Mr. POWER: We cannot get information, so vote for the amendment.

Mr. ROSS: I think we ought to wait until after six o'clock, and give the officials time to get the information. It was my intention, Mr. Chairman, in asking the questions I did, to obtain information that would enable us either to justify this estimate or to condemn it.

Mr. POWER: Condemn it.

Mr. ROSS: I think the officials should be able to tell us how much work these men at Paris, Hamburg, Antwerp and so on have done in a year, to justify their existence or the money they get. I may be stupid, but I cannot understand how a man in Paris can take charge of this southern part of Europe. Is he only there as an A.D.C. or an ornament to the office in Paris? I think that if we give the officials time to furnish the minister with the information perhaps there will be no reason for the amendment, and I suggest that we might wait until after six o'clock to find out what work these men have actually done, if anything. I have come across several cases in connection with which I think very good work has been done. I know of one case of trachoma which people have persistently endeavoured to get into this country, and I think you have an example in the west of one case that cost the department some $30,000 for treatment. So that if these men have done a certain amount of work in the way of prevention they have probably justified their existence and the money which we spend on them. It was with that idea that I asked the question as to what work had been done.

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member asked for the number of examinations. I cannot give information in regard to each individual; those details are not available. I suggest, however, that the hon. member read the last report of the department wherein he will find the particulars he wants. The number of British examinations by Canadian medical officers was 16,888, by roster doctors, the number was 7,817. This gives a total of 24,705. On the continent, the examinations by Canadian medical officers show very few there, and they are scattered; but they do manage to make examinations. For the year the total is 26,818.

Mr. POULIOT: In connection with these 26,000 cases, did the doctor take the blood pressure.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is the hon. member asking that question seriously?

Mr. POULIOT: I ask it with a smile but I am serious.

Mr. MacLAREN: The total examinations, both on the continent and British, number 51,523. There is an interesting figure at page 118 of the report. On the continent, in April of last year, there were 7,263 examinations. That is the evidence I would submit that these three medical men are as a matter of fact making examinations. Paris is one of the thoroughfares immigrants tend to pass through. I presume that the man in Paris does his share of the work. The examinations in April, as I say, numbered 7,263.

Mr. ROSS: Where were the 26,000 examined?

Mr. MacLAREN: That is the total for the year by Canadian medical officers.

Mr. ROSS: On the continent?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: I thought the minister said the number was 7,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MacLAREN: No; it is not carried yet. I want to explain this important point and I want if possible to convince the hon. member for Kingston, which is no easy matter. With all respect to my hon. friend, I must say that the questions which he puts he generally contrives to make rather puzzling. According to the report of the department, which I have no doubt is correct, the number of examinations on the continent was 26,818. I think that is the question my hon. friend was asking. The total for Great Britain and the continent was 51,523.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

VANCOUVER, VICTORIA AND EASTERN RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY

Mr. G. M. McDADE (Northumberland) moved the second reading of Bill No. 48, to confirm an agreement made between the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company and the Northern Pacific Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. 39, to amend the Railway Act (return tickets)—Mr. Jacobs—Mr. Bury in the chair.

On section 1—Return tickets good on railways between same terminals.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps this bill could be explained in the same manner as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) explained the Pacific Science Congress.

Mr. MANION: After the very fine performance last night by the hon. gentleman I dislike objecting to anything which he proposes, but this bill impinges upon the whole question of cooperation covered by the main railway bill now before the house. I think this bill might wait for another year and, therefore, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. POWER: Is this the forerunner of amalgamation?

Mr. MANION: No, cooperation. I move that the committee rise.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 43, to amend the Immigration Act.

SUPPLY

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Bury in the chair.

Immigration medical inspection, $141,500.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I should like to give the committee some particulars that I now have in reference to the number of examinations held at the different ports in Great Britain and on the continent. I give first the figures for 1931-32:

City—	Number of examinations
London	720
Liverpool	415
Glasgow	799
Belfast	314
Paris	1,175
Hamburg	1,037
Antwerp	1,287

For the ten months ended the last day of January, 1933, the figures are as follows:

City—	Number of examinations
London	712
Liverpool	388
Glasgow	384
Belfast	193
Paris	994
Hamburg	794
Antwerp	511

Further, I should like to make this statement, which was not, I think, made this afternoon, that these officers have the care of two infectious diseases hospitals, one in Halifax and one in Quebec, both hospitals calling for medical service. I wish again to say that this department keeps in close touch with and acts on the advice of the Department of Immigration as to the necessary number of medical officers both in Great Britain and on the continent I might say further in reference to deportees that these officers examine such cases, and I have no doubt I have not exhausted the list.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The amendment is that vote No. 212 be reduced by $100,000.

Amendment (Mr. Power) negatived.

Item agreed to on division.

Civil Government — Pensions and National Health — salaries, $165,870; contingencies, $40,500.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What are the duties of the large number of chemists, some ten in all, listed on page 88 of the details and drawing salaries totalling about $28,700?

Mr. MacLAREN: We have laboratories in various parts of Canada, two in Ottawa, and one each in Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What are these chemists doing?

Mr. MacLAREN: They examine food and drugs for adulteration.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is to these various laboratories that the samples are sent in by the departmental inspectors for chemical examination?

Mr. MacLAREN: They are referred to our laboratory at Ottawa or to the nearest laboratory, where the purity of the samples and the presence of adulteration in spices and foods and various other substances is reported on.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What are the duties of the chief of division of child welfare?

Mr. MacLAREN: Her duties are largely of an educational character, to prepare for distribution leaflets and pamphlets on public health matters, and to cooperate with the child welfare organizations throughout Canada, and generally to further child and maternal welfare.

Mr. SPENCER: I understood that the vote for venereal diseases had been left out of the estimates, yet I see here a salary of over $4,000 for the chief of division of venereal disease control. I would like to know what this official has to do.

Mr. MacLAREN: This official is still in the department, which may be some encouragement to those who are encouraging the government to continue that particular vote. This is the officer who formerly supervised for the federal department the venereal disease problem and he still keeps it under observation. The fact that the government is not making a grant this year does not mean that this official has ceased to take an interest in the problem, for on the contrary he is observing it throughout the country. This officer has also other duties apart from those to which I have first referred, such as the physical examination of civil servants many of whom are sent to him for examination and report. Though the vote is not in the estimates this year, I can assure my hon. friends that the services of this official have not been precipitately disposed of.

Mr. SPENCER: I take it that this officer would from time to time get into touch with officials of the provinces who have to do with the control of venereal disease and collaborate with them in that regard?

Mr. MacLAREN: His duty in that sense is the same as that of the chief of the child welfare division, to cooperate and keep in touch with the provinces and be of as much assistance to them as possible.

Item agreed to.

Pensions—pensions payable to militiamen on active service, northwest rebellion, 1885, and general pensions, $25,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. MacLAREN: This is to meet the pensions principally of those who were in the northwest rebellion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How many pensioners are there?

Mr. MacLAREN: The total number of disability pensioners is 53 and there are 6 dependent pensioners. The number is naturally decreasing and the expenditure also.

Item agreed to.

Pensions—European war—naval, militia and air forces after the war, $45,000,000.

Mr. POWER: Will the minister give a general explanation of this vote before we start discussing it in detail? Perhaps he would give us information particularly with respect to the proposed pension legislation.

Mr. MacLAREN: Answering the last part of the question first, I do not think that I can inform the house of the proposed pension legislation until the bill is brought down.

Mr. POWER: With all due respect I submit this estimate should not be assented to until such time as we are familiar with the pension legislation. I do not know what other hon. members feel, but I believe we should not consider this large item of $45,000,000 until we know on what basis the money is to be paid out. If we are to believe the rumours which we hear, there are to be radical changes in the pension legislation. In all seriousness I suggest to the minister that the house not being informed concerning the proposed measure the government is bringing down, he would not serve any useful purpose by endeavouring to put the item through to-night.

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member for Quebec South need not be exercised over this matter. I believe he asks for something to which he is not entitled, namely a statement regarding amendments to be brought before the house. In my view such a statement would not be in order until the bill is presented. His request is entirely different from postponing consideration of the item or allowing it to stand. If my hon. friend will say, "It would be well for the item to stand", it will stand.

Mr. POWER: I think it would be well. We might as well let it stand voluntarily; there is no use getting into a row about it.

Mr. MacLAREN: There is no occasion to believe that suggestion would be resisted—not at all. If it is the wish of the committee, it will stand, without further difficulty. I trust that is satisfactory.

Mr. POWER: Quite.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister tell us why there is to be a decrease of $3,000,000 in the amount of pensions for 1933-34 as compared with 1932-33?

Mr. MacLAREN: I have just said to the hon. member for Quebec South that this item will be allowed to stand. For that reason I do not believe it advisable to deal with it piecemeal. When the proper time comes I hope to give to the hon. member for North Winnipeg all the information he desires. I believe we would do well now to take up vote No. 195.

Mr. BRADETTE: I should like to bring a local matter to the attention of the committee before the item is allowed to stand. One day last fall before the orders of the day were called I brought to the attention of the house the special case of private Joseph Hussin. I believe this is the proper time to discuss the matter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): If the item is to stand I think the hon. member should speak when consideration is resumed.

Mr. BRADETTE: Not necessarily.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): If the item is allowed to stand until the bill is considered, there should be no further discussion at this time.

Mr. BRADETTE: I direct the attention of the committee to the matter of two returned soldiers; the sooner I put the circumstances before the house, the better it will be for the men concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): An item has been called by the minister. Unless it is retired by a vote of the committee, it is still open for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): But the feeling of the committee, expressed very clearly, was that the item should stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not all the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): If the item stands, the matter can be discussed when the item is under consideration.

Mr. BRADETTE: I refer to a matter which is very important to two returned soldiers in my section of the country. I believe the committee will be indulgent enough to allow me to state the circumstances. One day last fall before the orders of the day were called I directed the attention of the house to the case of Private Joseph Hussin.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Is it the will of the committee to hear this matter now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRADETTE: If the committee knew the situation they would have no objection. I realize there is not one man in this committee who would want to do an injustice to the two men in question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It is entirely a matter for the committee to decide.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Again I rise to a point of order. I submit the procedure is entirely irregular. The minister has offered an item for discussion in the proper way. Because one hon. member in the committee says "stand" is no reason why we should not continue consideration of the item. The hon. member is quite within his rights.

Mr. MacLAREN: At the request of the hon. member for Quebec South I said the vote would stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I say to the minister that he and the hon. member for Quebec South are not ruling this committee?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister may have an item stand if he wishes.

Mr. BRADETTE: Surely the committee—

Mr. MacLAREN: I move that vote—

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for North Timiskaming has the floor.

Mr. MacLAREN: I move that vote No. 80 stand.

Mr. BRADETTE: I have the floor, and I believe this is the proper time to speak.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member has not the floor until the question is settled as to whether or not the item shall stand.

Mr. BRADETTE: I believe I am absolutely in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member will be allowed to speak if it is the will of the committee that the matter shall be debated.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order, and protest most emphatically against that ruling. Surely a member may speak to an item that has been called by a minister of the crown in committee of the whole. Surely he is not precluded from debate because some hon. member says "stand." Surely he is properly in order until the minister moves that the item be withdrawn from consideration, and is supported by a majority vote.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have made that motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But you are not in order.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat until this matter is settled? The ruling of the chair is that it was not merely a matter of one or two members deciding the matter should stand; it was the wish of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I declare that the item should stand; is that the wish of the committee?

Item stands.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I shall now call item 79.

Mr. MacLAREN: I understood that vote 79 had carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It carried last year.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It has not been put before the committee.

Mr. COOTE: We should have some explanation about item 79 in the estimates; it was not carried.

Civil flying—$1,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: Item 79 concerns compensation or pension for injuries resulting directly from a flight undertaken in the course of duty. The injury must be suffered while in the public service of Canada, by any person employed in the public service or employed under the direction of any department of the public service.

Mr. COOTE: Was there any money spent under this vote last year?

Mr. MacLAREN: Up to December 31, 1932, $207 had been expended.

Mr. HEAPS: In the case of accident to any person in the employ of the government, would such persons be entitled to compensation by the government? Is that the general policy of the government in that respect?

Mr. MacLAREN: If it is a case of civil flying, flying on duty.

Mr. HEAPS: Does this apply to all departments of the government? When a person is injured in the employ of the government does he get compensation?

Mr. MacLAREN: It applies to all with the exception of those in the flying corps—those in civil duty.

Mr. POWER: Is there a special rate of pension set up for civil flying?

Mr. MacLAREN: In computing the rates at which compensation is to be paid, the annual rate of the total emolument which the person was receiving from the crown at the date of the death or the injury in question shall be taken as a basis. That is to say, if $1,200 or less, the scale of pension shall be as provided for a private. If over $1,200 and not more than $1,800, the scale of pension shall be as provided for a sergeant—

Mr. POWER: But may I ask the minister, have we privates and sergeants and colonels in civil flying? We are talking about civil flying.

Mr. MacLAREN: It may be. It is based on the pay he is receiving at the time.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

Sir EUGENE FISET: Surely there is a mistake somewhere. When you called this item, Mr. Chairman, you said: civil flying, $1,000. Surely there is no question of pension in this vote; it must mean simply compensation for injury received while flying.

Mr. POWER: If you killed a general you would be out of luck.

Sir EUGENE FISET: There is no case of pension involved.

Mr. POWER: I think I must repeat my question, there is a mistake somewhere. The minister is giving the rate of pension based on military rank, and this is an item for civil flying, limited to $1,000. I did say jocularly that if you killed a general you would be out of luck; if it goes up on that scale—a private at $1,200, then a general would be given pension on the basis of $6,000 or $7,000 yearly. It would appear that if unfortunately a general fell out of an aeroplane there would be a deficit. I submit we are entitled to some accurate information.

Mr. MacLAREN: I can only tell my hon. friend the facts; the pension is computed on the amount of pay the injured person was receiving, on the basis I have mentioned.

Mr. POWER: Will the minister then keep on reading the rates of pension? He had got as far as a sergeant; I would be very much interested to find out about people higher up, and also how we get military grades in civil flying. Surely the committee is entitled to some information.

Mr. MacLAREN: I would refer the hon. member to P.C. 2187; I am quoting from that.

Mr. POWER: May I ask where that order in council is to be found, and if the minister will be kind enough to send us a copy before the item passes?

Mr. STEVENS: It is in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. MacLAREN: Certainly, I shall send it with pleasure. In the meantime I may say that the order has been in force since October 20, 1922.

Mr. POWER: It may have been in force since flying was invented, but that does not explain how we are basing pensions on military ranks when it is civil flying we are talking about. I understood the minister at the beginning of his explanation to say that this referred to flying other than military flying.

Mr. MacLAREN: I said civil flying, persons engaged in civil service occupations and not the flying corps.

Mr. POWER: Then is there a corps of civil flyers, graded according to military rank?

Mr. MacLAREN: It has nothing to do with the flying corps, but one can think of a civil servant proceeding on his duty in an aeroplane.

Mr. POWER: And called a sergeant? The minister started to read the scale of pensions, and as I understood him he said that if a man were a private there was pension on a certain scale; if he were a sergeant there was another scale.

Mr. MacLAREN: No, that is just what I did not say. Let me try to explain it to my hon. friend. I said it was based on the pay he was receiving, and I said his pension in that sense would correspond to what a soldier would receive, on that basis, up to $1,200; over $1,200 and up to $1,800; over $1,800, and so on. It does not mean that the man is a private or a sergeant; it means he is receiving such and such a rate per year as his pay. Then in case of accident—fortunately there have been almost no accidents—they base it on that scale.

Mr. POWER: Now I understand.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada, $467,436.

Mr. BRADETTE: I would call the attention of the minister to the case of a great war veteran in my riding. This is a non-political matter and I think it is deserving of the attention of parliament. Last fall I brought to the attention of the minister the fact that this man was not receiving the attention he deserved from the pension board, and which he asked for two years ago. He was an early volunteer, a Belgian by birth having his domicile in Canada. At Valcartier he was inoculated, and following inoculation one arm became useless and has been useless ever since. Owing to this bad arm he had no active service overseas. When he was discharged he went on his farm in the Porcupine district and there for sixteen consecutive years carried on the work of a pioneer settler and farmer, never asking any help from the government. But two years ago, after putting up this long struggle, he realized that he could not support his family on his holding, and he then made application to the pension board to have his arm examined. Last fall, when I brought that matter to his attention, the minister was kind enough to refer it to the board. Under the orders of the pension board Private Hussin was sent to the Christie street hospital in Toronto—that was the second time. There his trouble was diagnosed as hysterical paralysis. He was discharged as cured of this ailment and returned to his holding, and after trying to carry on for a number of months he was unable to support himself and had to receive relief. Throughout that time he has suffered untold misery and has had great difficulty in keeping his family. Now, I have every confidence in the medical men, but I may tell the minister that in my section of the country we strongly resent the conclusion reached by the medical board as a result of their examinations. The man undoubtedly suffered from the electrical treatment he received when he went to Christie street. I would ask hon. members to read the editorial articles that have appeared in connection with this case in the Porcupine Advance, as well as articles published in the Globe, and they will see that what I have said is fully corroborated by these newspapers. They urge, not so much upon the government as upon the Board of Pension Commissioners, the reopening of the case.

It is really a sad spectacle, and although I am a poor man I would gladly pay the travelling expenses of this unfortunate ex-soldier to have him brought before a committee of this house so that the medical men and the members here could see for themselves just what his condition is, because there is no doubt whatever that the man is absolutely helpless. He is entirely without the use of one arm and is utterly unable to get employment in the mines, nor is he able to work on his own farm. I have no hesitation in mentioning these facts because I think it is important for the house to have the information. I know the minister is sympathetic to the case, as will be seen in the fact that only last fall he found it advisable to send the man back to Christie street hospital.

I repeat, I would gladly pay all expenses of this man in order to have him appear before a committee of the house. If hon members could see him they would agree with me that he is not a hypocrite; he is not play-acting but is actually a cripple. To send him back to Christie street would be a crime. He is afraid of the treatment he received there, and he knows from past experience that he cannot be cured of his present ailment.

Mr. STANLEY: I would point out to the hon. member that at Christie street hospital they have all the means of making a thorough examination, and after going fully into the case they made their diagnosis.

Mr. BRADETTE: The diagnosis was wrong; I defy anyone to dispute that. We are intelligent people in our section of the country and we are convinced that this man has not received fair treatment. It is therefore my bounden duty to present the case to the committee. I know that within the four corners of the act there was room for fair treatment of this man's case. The people in my part of the country are of the opinion that we should have the whole list of pensions paid to the war veterans. I do not think we shall get it, but it seems that because this man has been able to carry on for a number of years the medical board has come to the conclusion that he is not entitled to consideration. That is why I protest against the treatment he has received, and I appeal to the fair-mindedness of this house whether it is not simple justice to have the case reopened so that this man may receive the pension he deserves.

I can assure the minister that the case is not by any means settled so far as the people in that section of the country are concerned. This man is entitled to fair treatment. He enlisted in the war and gave his services to the country and, I say, it is my duty to bring his case before parliament. I know that the Minister of Health has been trying to deal fairly with these cases, but I must tell him in all frankness that we are not satisfied with the present situation so far as this case is concerned. Some remedy should be found for this man's condition. I have sufficient confidence in the Board of Pension Commissioners and in the minister himself to believe that this matter will be taken up again, not in two or three years' time, not in two or three months, but immediately. If the minister wants the newspaper articles to which I have referred I will send them to him, just as I did last fall. Strong editorials have appeared in the Porcupine Advance, an independent Conservative newspaper which has taken up this question. That newspaper has discussed matters pertaining to northern Ontario and has always kept its articles on a high level. It does not play politics, and there is certainly no room for politics in this particular matter. It is one in regard to which the house should be properly seized of the facts.

Hon. members may say that this is only an individual case, but I would remind them that individuals make up the collective community. I know that some veterans who have not suffered nearly so much as this man have received compensation from the board, and were entitled to it. We are satisfied that they should have received the compensation they were given, but it is our opinion that there should be a general rule applicable to all alike. And this applies more forcibly to the case I have just brought to the attention of the minister.

There is one more case which I wish to deal with on this occasion. I refer to private H. H. Joanisse, of Cochrane. He appealed to the board a few months ago but his appeal was rejected last January. This returned soldier went overseas and is now suffering from a heart attack. He has also defective eyesight and this makes it impossible for him to engage in any remunerative occupation. I plead now with the minister to acquaint himself with all the facts in connection with these two cases, because, I cannot repeat it too often, it is my solemn duty to bring these matters to the attention of the house so that these men may receive that treatment to which they are entitled.

Mr. MacLAREN: I recall fairly well the case referred to by the hon. gentleman; it has been declared to be a case of hysterical paralysis. Apparently the hon. gentleman disagrees with that diagnosis, but that is the considered opinion of the medical examiners. However, I shall ask to have the whole matter reinvestigated, but I do not wish my hon. friend or others to consider that appeals should be taken to the minister to have these matters put right. That is not the province of the minister, nor is it in his power; and I do not know that it is desirable that it should be. It is a matter that rests with the pension board, the tribunal, and the pensions appeal court. They are independent bodies. They were created so with a special object in view, namely, that they should be free to form their own opinions and not be influenced by others. That is the position, and I fancy that when my hon. friend thinks it over he will agree that he is taking fairly strong ground when he suggests that all these medical men are wrong and he is right. There is of course always a possibility of error, but as I recall it, this case was sent to Christie street hospital; an examination was made by a large number of medical men, and there it was the consensus of opinion that it was hysterical and not actual paralysis. I cannot say anything more about the matter, but I will ask that it be again gone into. I repeat, however, that I do not wish this to be interpreted as an opinion on my part that they were wrong or anything of that kind; on the contrary I know that the matter has been carefully studied for a considerable period.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want to add another word. I am prepared to make the statement outside parliament that in this case the doctors were wrong. In the first place, they were not unanimous in their diagnosis. One doctor, indeed, reported that the condition of the man was pitiful, and the final word of the Board of Pension Commissioners was that he was suffering from hysterical paralysis. The diagnosis has now been changed to that of malingering. They have no right to make such a statement in connection with this man. There is no hypocrisy about him and he was not trying to malinger. I do not understand why that was said about this man. Surely parliament shoud be able to deal with this matter if these doctors or the commission cannot. Considerable dissatisfaction has been caused in my section of the country by this judgment. I am not a medical man but I know it would be impossible for Private Hussin to do any work. That would be impossible because one of his arms is absolutely helpless. Five hundred doctors could not make me think that that man can use his arm. There was no need to use the word "malingering."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRADETTE: Some hon. members may think it is all right to laugh, but they have the full use of their limbs and are enjoying good health. This is no laughing matter to a man who enlisted and has been suffering for years. This man was vaccinated and inoculated; by that medical action he practically lost the use of one arm, making it impossible for him to provide bread, clothing and shelter for himself and his family. As far as I am concerned, I feel it to be my duty to bring this situation before the house as often and as forcibly as I can. I repeat that I am prepared to pay the expenses of Private Hussin so that he may appear before any committee of this house when the medical men and members of the house can then see that he is unfit to do any manual work and should receive a reasonable pension.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister stated a few minutes ago that he himself did not have any power in these cases because tribunals had been established in Canada to deal with pension applications. I desire to take this opportunity of drawing to the minister's attention five outstanding pension cases which do not come within the category of the reply made by the minister to the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette). I should like to refer to the report of the committee appointed to investigate into the administration of the Pension Act and to quote the findings of at least a section of that committee in regard to these cases. This section of the report is signed by General Ross, Mr. Myers, Mr. McDonagh and Colonel Wood, and reads as follows:

> Another matter to which our attention was drawn refers to five applications in which entitlement was recommended by the old Federal Appeal Board. The Board of Pension Commissioners took exception to the jurisdiction of that board to give entitlement in these cases. However, the judgment of the board which is in effect a judgment of a court of record, has never been set aside, and according to the record, these men should be entitled to receive the moneys awarded to them. We did not go fully into the cases as they could not be considered within the scope of our inquiry, but the attention of the government is drawn to the matter as a source of irritation making it difficult for the pension machinery to function smoothly. I submit that it is the duty of the government either to have the judgment of the Federal Appeal Board set aside if it is in fact in error, but if not, it stands as a judgment in favour of the men and should be carried out. Such irritations do more to interfere with the smooth operation of an organization than anything else that can be imagined.

Parliament is the last resort for cases such as these. The minister has refused to pay pensions in these cases, the Board of Pension Commissioners has refused to pay pensions—

Mr. MacLAREN: Upon what authority does the hon. member say that I refused to pay pensions in these cases?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad to be corrected if I am wrong, but I believe my facts to be absolutely beyond question.

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member made a statement and I am asking him to prove it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am going to proceed with my speech and give the actual facts. If the minister can question my statements, I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. MacLAREN: I question what the hon. member has just stated.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I say that the department over which the Minister of Pensions and National Health presides is the department which should and does pay pensions to successful applicants throughout Canada. Is that not a correct statement?

Mr. STANLEY: That is not what you said before.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If I misled the minister I shall be very glad to withdraw my previous statement. I say that the Department of Pensions and National Health and the Board of Pension Commissioners have refused to pay a pension in any one of these five cases. I trust that that is a fair statement, and I think the minister will agree with me.

Mr. MacLAREN: I say that that is not correct and I do not wish the hon. member to repeat that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am making a statement.

Mr. MacLAREN: I say it is not correct and I ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I say it is correct.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, I appeal to you.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister allow me to proceed?

Mr. MacLAREN: I wish to challenge what the hon. member has said.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Go ahead.

Mr. MacLAREN: I ask that the hon. member withdraw that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will not withdraw that statement. I state upon my responsibility as a member of parliament that the Department of Pensions and National Health has refused to pay a pension in these five cases although a pension was granted by a superior tribunal then functioning in the Dominion of Canada. The exchequer court, to which the case was referred in 1930, declared that that court had full jurisdiction to hear these appeals.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will the hon. member let me clear up this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let me clear it up.

Mr. MacLAREN: You may not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have I not the floor?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The minister is preparing to answer the hon. member.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He can answer me when I have concluded my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): He rose to answer the hon. member.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He cannot interrupt except with my permission.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MacLAREN: I rose to a point of order to state that the hon. member did not make a correct statement.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member has not finished his remarks?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I certainly have not, I have hardly begun. I desire to go through the facts in these cases and deal only with such facts as I believe to be true. I shall first give a brief resume of the case of William D. Skitch, number 43,503.

Mr. STANLEY: The hon. member's statement is incorrect.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think my hon. friend will agree that it is correct. If the statement is found not to be correct I will agree to withdraw it. I say that the minister as head of the Department of Pensions and National Health has refused to pay pensions in these cases. Skitch went overseas in October, 1915, with the 50th battalion from the city of Calgary. He arrived in France in December, 1917, and was sent to hospital because of a wound in the right leg. He returned to Canada on April 29, 1919, but his wound never healed and he died in September, 1921. He was survived by a widow and one son born on June 20, 1920. He received a pension from the date of his discharge from the army up until the time of his death. In 1922 his widow applied for a pension which was refused by the Board of Pension Commissioners. Her appeal came before the federal appeal board, the old board in operation before the new organization was consummated in 1926, and entitlement was considered on that occasion. The pension board refused to pay the pension upon the ground that the federal appeal board had exceeded its jurisdiction in dealing with the case. This particular case came before the parliamentary committee which sat in 1928 to revise the Pension Act. Many hon. members will remember that a reference was made to the Exchequer Court of Canada upon the question of jurisdiction, that is, decide whether or not the federal appeal board had proper jurisdiction to hear this appeal in the manner in which it was heard. The case was referred to the Exchequer Court of Canada in May, 1929, and in December, 1930, the Minister of Pensions and National Health applied to the Exchequer Court of Canada to withdraw the reference which had been made in 1929. I believe the reason for that, although the minister may be able to explain, would be the new legislation of 1930, which, as hon. members are aware, practically changed the entire basis of pension administration in the Dominion of Canada. In 1931 the reference was heard by the exchequer court, which held that the federal appeal board had jurisdiction to entertain and determine the appeal mentioned in the reference at the time it heard and determined the same. I trust that this is quite clear. After that decision of the Exchequer Court of Canada, application was made to the Department of Pensions and National Health for the payment of the pension which was found by the federal appeal board to be due to W. D. Skitch at the time the appeal was made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the hon. member give the citation of the exchequer court?

Mr. MACKENZIE Vancouver): I shall be glad to send both reports to my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to read them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are two different citations. The Board of Pensions Commissioners replied—and I have their reply before me—as follows:

Dear Sir:

I am instructed to refer to your letter of the 17th ultimo, addressed to Colonel the Hon. Murray MacLaren, relative to claim for pension in this case, and to inform you that, while the judgment of the exchequer court to which you refer was to the effect that the federal appeal board had jurisdiction to deal with claims of this nature, the judgment in question made no order regarding payment.

It would appear that the only action which may be now taken in this case is for the applicant to renew her application as provided for by the 1931 amendments to the Pension Act.

May I point out as fairly as I can—and this is for a thirteen year old boy now living in Victoria, British Columbia—this was a judgment rendered by what was at that time the ultimate tribunal in regard to pension legislation in this dominion, and a verdict was given to the widow and to the little boy who was then a baby and who is now thirteen years old. That boy has not to this day received payment of a single cent of pension, because the department or the Board of Pension Commissioners has refused to implement the decision of the federal appeal board as interpreted, if you like, by the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman allow a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman explain how the minister of that department, in view of that answer of the board, could himself authorize payment? By what authority could he do so?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If the Department of Pensions and National Health had wished—may I put it in that way as fairly as I can?—to make payment of pension in any of these five cases which are known in Canada as "the disputed cases," they could have applied to parliament for authority, and I am sure that every humane hon. gentleman opposite would have immediately insisted on having the pension paid where the highest court functioning at the time—

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman allow another question?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Certainly.

Mr. CAHAN: As the hon. gentleman says, there is always an appeal to parliament, but under the statute law, as it existed at that time, I suggest that the minister had no personal jurisdiction in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think my hon. friend is correct in that, because there was a change made.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend is quite correct. At the time this judgment was awarded, the authority to make payment of pensions was with the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Since then that authority has been transferred from the Board of Pension Commissioners directly to the Department of Pensions and National Health, so that if the argument of the Secretary of State were sound prior to a certain time in the past, it has not been sound for some considerable time, because I suggest to him that the Department of Pensions and National Health have every possible authority to make payment of these pensions when they are due and payable and when they have been found to be due and payable and authorized by the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: When they are authorized under the law, in accordance with the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Without disrespect, may I say I think my hon. friend is indulging in legal subtleties. Let us take a broad view of the case.

Mr. CAHAN: Parliament may take that view.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am coming to that point. We have five applicants who made their applications to what was in those days the court of first instance, namely, the Board of Pension Commissioners. That board turned them down, not, I admit, on the same ground in every case. In each case an appeal was made and in each case the court of last resort said that the pension was properly due to each of these five applicants. After that, the Board of Pension Commissioners, in most cases on the ground of a change of diagnosis, took the view that they would refuse to implement the judgment of the supreme tribunal. A reference was made to the Exchequer Court of Canada as to whether the appeal board then existing had full and ample jurisdiction to make the decision it made with regard to these cases. After that higher court made a finding with regard to these cases, the Board of Pension Commissioners, while having, I admit, power to pay pensions, refused to pay a cent of pension in these five cases.

Mr. CAHAN: Does my hon. friend not admit that his present statement entirely exonerates the minister personally?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am coming to that. I had no intention in the world of making any reflection on the minister. I refer to the Department of Pensions and National Health. The only person to whom we can appeal in parliament is the minister responsible for that department, and I say that once the power of paying pensions was transferred from the Board of Pension Commissioners to the Department of Pensions and National Health, the minister or the department could have come to parliament. A similar course was taken this afternoon for a man named Campbell in regard to a claim he had for reparations for service on an English trawler, and we awarded in this house, with great sympathy for such a case, the sum of $1,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: What is the hon. member's authority for stating that the power was transferred from the board to the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to give that. If the minister will read the evidence of Captain Hodgins at the recent investigation into the administration of the Pensions Act, I think he will find that this statement was made by several of the witnesses. I shall refer my hon. friend to the evidence given by Captain Hodgins.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MacLAREN: There must be something more convincing than simply the statement that some witnesses gave that evidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is Captain Hodgins not the official accountant of the minister's department?

Mr. MacLAREN: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Well, he is the man who made the statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is asking: What is the law? Where is the authority in law? That is the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has been part of the trouble in this matter all the way through. I am appealing on the ground of equity, on the fact that the highest tribunal then appointed by this parliament, wisely or unwisely—I am not criticizing or commenting on that at all—awarded a pension in each one of these five cases. A question was raised by the Board of Pension Commissioners in regard to the matter of jurisdiction. That question was settled by the judgments given by the exchequer court, which judgments I have cited to my hon. friend. That court held that the federal appeal board had complete jurisdiction. If my hon. friend would like me to read the evidence, it will be found that Mr. Justice Audette, who was an eminent judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, repeatedly throughout the evidence in the inquiry, criticized the present chairman of the Board of Pension Commissioners for having defied the mandate of a superior court. The trouble all along has been as to finding out who was the proper official to undertake the actual payment of these pensions when found due. That is why I am bringing the matter before parliament. I agree with the minister that any case which can be referred to the existing tribunals should not be brought before the house, because those tribunals are intended to be the functioning machinery in such matters. But these cases have already been given the judgment, the finding. My hon. friend will understand the Latin motto: Transit in rem judicatem. My hon. friend may say: Why do they not appeal again? Why does not this little boy, now thirteen years old, and the other applicants, lodge an application before the pension board again and go from them to the new tribunal and from them to the appeal court? That is the argument that is used occasionally in this evidence which I have in my hand, but I ask the Secretary of State, who is an eminent lawyer, is it a matter of equity and justice for five claimants to a pension who have had a decision given in their favour by what was then the highest court in regard to pensions in this dominion, to be compelled to start all over again and possibly take two years to run through the whole gamut of uncertainty that lies in pension administration at the present time?

Mr. CAHAN: Since the hon. member put that question to me I should like to answer it, and I will answer it in this way: In the meantime the law of this country in regard to pensions has been changed, and the new tribunal found that under the law as then existing they had no power to order payment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh no, that is entirely wrong.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; the new tribunal absolutely refused to order or authorize payment in these cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, they say the Board of Pension Commissioners—

Mr. CAHAN: I am talking of the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Please do not call them the tribunal because that is an appeal court from the board.

Mr. CAHAN: Well then, take an appeal if there is one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There you are again—take an appeal! Here are five people who have had these judgments given in their favour for five, six or seven years by the highest pension tribunal then existing, and my hon. friend says: Take an appeal. These people have their judgments, and they cannot obtain payment of the pensions because the chairman of the Board of Pension Commissioners has resisted paying them pensions all the way through. I say that if the government can give an allowance to this man Campbell for whom we passed a vote this afternoon—I am not criticizing the government for doing that at all; I think they acted properly—for injuries he received presumably while serving overseas, surely similar action can be taken in these five Canadian cases.

Mr. CAHAN: It is proper to appeal to parliament, but it is not a proper ground for condemning the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am appealing to parliament now.

Mr. CAHAN: But you make that a ground for condemning the minister in the administration of his office.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not condemn the minister. I condemn the department for not paying pensions in these cases But if my hon. friend takes the ground that the department could not pay pension in these cases, I am content to disagree with him, and to bring my appeal from the Department of Pensions and National Health to parliament, because after all this is the court of last resort.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask a question to clear up one point which I think is rather important? When the appeal was lodged with the exchequer court, did not the exchequer court in its decision say that it was proper for the court of appeal that preceded it to hear the case, but that the ground upon which the commission refused to pay was that the appeal court had changed the diagnosis? But that latter point was never before the exchequer court itself for decision.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend is partly right and partly wrong. He is correct in saying that the exchequer court gave that ruling, but they went further and said that as long as they had not heard any evidence that was not on the record before the Board of Pension Commissioners they were quite entitled to make the decision they did even if the diagnosis was changed. I have seen the two decisions of the exchequer court. One was on a reference by the minister in which he applied to have a previous reference in 1919 withdrawn, and the exchequer court refused leave to withdraw it; and the other decision was in this Victoria case which I have mentioned to the committee. The language of Mr. Justice Audette all through this evidence is very forcible and condemnatory—I do not want to read it unnecessarily—of the present chairman of the Board of Pension Commissioners. His language is very strong indeed. In this evidence taken before the Rinfret committee over which Mr. Justice Audette later presided, you find Mr. Justice Audette condemning the Board of Pension Commissioners for not having paid pension in these cases.

I am just putting these cases forward as a matter of equity. I think my hon. friend will agree that these five people have a claim. They won their pensions in the highest court there was. Then we changed the legislation in 1930 and set up new machinery, but the exchequer court held that the fact that we changed the machinery in 1930 should not be held to prejudice the claims already established by those who had won their cases back in 1924 or 1925.

Mr. CAHAN: Did the exchequer court hold that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes indeed. You will find that in the evidence and in the judgment.

Mr. CAHAN: I would rather find it in the judgment than in the evidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They held that the change in the legislation did not change the status of those who had obtained judgment in their favour. In these five cases the claimants have been absolutely locked out; they do not know where to turn for a remedy. The department says: We will not pay. They were ordered to pay by the decision of the exchequer court in 1931 and 1932, but both times payment was refused. When it is suggested that these claimants should now start all over again with the new machinery, I submit with all deference that that is scarcely fair. I do not know just how we can deal with these cases as a committee of parliament, but at least the government could take action as it did this afternoon in the case of Campbell. I think we should take cognizance of these judgments as a matter of judicial decision and act upon them and do justice to these people who really deserve justice. This little boy has been without pension since 1921, and he should have had a pension since he was a child. He is now more than twelve years old and he has not received a cent from the dominion. I know that it is not the proper procedure as a rule to bring up individual cases in parliament, but these particular cases are locked out from any other remedy except what can be afforded by the high court of parliament, and I feel that it is my duty to bring them to the attention of parliament. Here we have the judgment of the exchequer court, the judgment of the federal appeal court, the two references to the exchequer court, the evidence and the very strong and expressive language used by the chairman of the Rinfret committee, Mr. Justice Audette, practically saying that it was a shame that these pensions were not paid. Now if there is a grievance surely this house can remedy it; if there is a wrong surely we can put it right.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And I am now appealing to parliament to do so.

Mr. CAHAN: I understood the hon. gentleman to condemn the minister by reason of—

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, Mr. Chairman, I give you my fullest assurance that there was no intention on my part to condemn the minister.

Mr. CAHAN: That was the only ground upon which I intervened.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I had not the slightest intention of condemning the minister. I submit that these five cases should have the immediate attention of parliament. If the government itself cannot act, parliament can act, and we can deal with these cases in the supplementary estimates on meritorious or compassionate grounds, on the same basis as we dealt with the Campbell case this afternoon. But personally I regard it as a matter of strictly legal right that these people should receive a pension. Already it has been established that a pension is due, but we cannot establish who is the proper officer to pay the pension in each case. I appeal to the minister and to the Secretary of State to take notice of these decisions and to see that justice is done in these five cases which were decided favourably to the applicants by the then existing highest pension tribunal in the dominion.

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has stated that the method of payment had been changed and that what was formerly done by the pension board was now being done by the department. Let me put the matter as it is, because I think that the hon. member has fallen into some error. The same system is pursued to-day as was pursued in 1921. There is no change. Secondly, the department does not pay these pensions of its own motion and of its own authority. The department issues the cheques, but on the authority of the pension board. I think that is a plain statement, and it is not in accord with what my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre evidently thought at the time. Next I would say that this whole matter was referred to the Department of Justice, and the procedure and action taken was in accordance with the advice of the Department of Justice. Finally, I shall look into the case again and see if anything can be done.

Mr. ROSS: May I ask the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who brought this matter up, if this was considered by a part of the general committee which probed administration during the summer?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The entire committee.

Mr. ROSS: Were they a separate committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. ROSS: In what way have they acted?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I read the paragraph to the committee when I commenced my remarks; perhaps the hon. member was not in his seat. It is as follows:

> Another matter to which our attention was drawn refers to five applications in whcih entitlement was recommended by the old federal appeal board. The Board of Pension Commissioners took exception to the jurisdiction of that board to give entitlement in these cases. However, the judgment of the board which is in effect a judgment of a court of record, has never been set aside, and according to the record, these men should be entitled to receive the moneys awarded to them. We did not go fully into the cases as they could not be considered within the scope of our inquiry, but the intention of the government is drawn to the matter as a source of irritation making it difficult for the pension machinery to function smoothly. I submit that it is the duty of the government either to have the judgment of the federal appeal board set aside if it is in fact in error, but if not, it stands as a judgment in favour of the men and should be carried out. Such irritations do more to interfere with the smooth operation of an organization than anything else that can be imagined.

Mr. ROSS: Who is the "I"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is signed by four gentlemen, namely, Alexander Ross, Richard Myers, Frank G. J. McDonagh and W. C. Wood.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): From the ex parte statement made by the hon. member it would appear that an injustice has been done. I have examined the reports of the exchequer court and the judgment of the president of that court. All he affirmed in the judgment was that the old federal appeal board had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, notwithstanding the repeal of the legislation I think the hon. member will agree with me that that is the only construction which could be placed upon the judgment.

But there must be something behind the whole matter, or the Department of Justice would not have given the opinion which they gave. That department is the final legal resort of the government. I believe there must be something behind the whole matter which the hon. member has not set before the committee and the country. I suggest this, that the federal appeal board in excess of their duty and jurisdiction under statutory authority creating them, and by which they are bound, gave a different diagnosis of the case from that which they should have given, and it is on that account that the pension board have refused to pay the pension.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Even if my hon. friend's contention is correct, the exchequer court still held that the judgment should stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, they did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; that is not a fair construction to place upon the judgment. All the Exchequer court held was that the federal appeal board had jurisdiction to hear the appeal, notwithstanding the repeal of the old legislation. The reports are here. I had to read them rather hurriedly, but I believe that is all the headnote or judgment indicate. That does not carry the matter as far as my hon. friend says it should go. The finding of the president of the exchequer court, which is to be found at page 102 of part IV of the Canadian Law Reports for 1931, is as follows:

> There will be an order declaring that the pension appeal board as it existed on the date of the reference herein had jurisdiction to entertain and determine appeals from refusal of pension by the Board of Pension Commissioners.

It only went to the point of jurisdiction in hearing the appeals, not to the merits of the appeal at all.

Mr. McPHEE: Read the preceding paragraph.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is very long. This is the finding and order of the court:

> There will be an order declaring that the pension appeal board as it existed on the date of the reference herein had jurisdiction to entertain and determine appeals from refusal of pension by the Board of Pension Commissioners.

The finding of the court is exactly as I said it was, namely only on the question of jurisdiction and not on the merits at all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is that not all that is necessary?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; you have to go farther than that. The hon. member for West Edmonton knows very much more than the rest of us about most matters which are discussed. This is a legal problem however, and I venture to suggest he does not know anything about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I read to the hon. member the part of the judgment to which he has referred:

> I should very much doubt if the statute ever intended, that a judgment rendered on appeal by the board, should be of no effect,—

That is just exactly what happened in all these cases.

—because the statutory directions which I have already mentioned were not complied with. It is perhaps unnecessary that I should go so far, because that point was not argued before me.

He finds that even if there were irregularities in regard to diagnosis, the judgmeint was one which should be complied with.

Mr. POWER: The cases of Skitch, Isadore Ouellette and three others came before the committee on pensions and returned soldiers' problems on several occasions in 1928. We heard evidence, as I have no doubt the hon. member for Kingston and the minister will remember; I recall that we heard evidence in particular on the Ouellette case, which is similar to the Skitch case. I have before me a portion of the evidence as it appears at page 311 of the journals of the House of Commons for the year 1928. In that evidence I find a letter dated November 11, 1924, addressed to the Board of Pension Commissioners, and from the letter the committee will learn that this has been a long standing complaint. It is addressed to the Deputy Minister of Justice, and is as follows:

Dear Sir:

I have had under consideration the questions regarding the jurisdiction of the federal appeal board submitted with your letter of the seventeenth September, ultimo, and beg to advise you as follows:

In this case it appears that the difference of opinion between the two bodies—

That is, between the Board of Pension Commissioners and the federal appeal board.

—relates to a matter of diagnosis and not to the question whether the disability, if any, was attributable to military service. The Board of Pension Commissioners found that the "error of refraction resulting in defective vision was a pre-enlistment congenital condition and was not aggravated during military service."

This is the Ouellette case.

Whereas the federal appeal board found that "the defective vision in this case is due to optic neuritis, and that the weight of evidence indicates that optic neuritis was incurred on service."

It seems clear, therefore, that the federal appeal board disposed of the case upon a different diagnosis than that upon which the Board of Pension Commissioners proceeded, and that no question of attributability within the meaning of the statute was involved. I am of opinion, therefore, that the federal appeal board did not have the jurisdiction to make the order in question.

Papers returned.

Yours truly,
W. Stuart Edwards,
Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. Edwards gave that opinion in 1924. That was put before the pensions committee. Hon. members will note that the letter is dated 1924. In the 1928 hearings before the committee this matter was brought up and was the subject of much discussion. The result was that in the amendment put before and passed by the house we find the following:

Any dispute as to the jurisdiction of the board to entertain and determine appeals from refusal of pension by the commission shall be referred by the department to the exchequer court for determination.

That was the considered judgment of the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is on the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. POWER: These cases in the hands of the committee were questions of jurisdiction.

Mr. CAHAN: Was not the reference which was made subsequently to the exchequer court confined solely to the question of jurisdiction?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was.

Mr. CAHAN: Therefore if the reference was solely on the question of jurisdiction the opinion or judgment of the court must necessarily be confined to the question of jurisdiction, and not extend to the merits.

Mr. POWER: The point at issue between the Board of Pension Commissioners and the federal appeal board was one of jurisdiction. The Board of Pension Commissioners had granted a pension to Ouellette and then discontinued it. Ouellette asked to have his pension continued. The board refused. In those days there was a federal appeal board; the case came before that board and the appeal board found that he was entitled to a pension on the ground that his defective vision was due to optic neuritis, whereas the Board of Pension Commissioners said he was not entitled to pension because his defective vision was due to an error of refraction which was congenital.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not a fact that the federal appeal board changed the diagnosis, and had no authority in law to do it?

Mr. POWER: That is just the point; they changed the diagnosis. Admitting they changed the diagnosis, Mr. Edwards in his letter to the committee and in his letter to the minister stated:

I am of opinion, therefore, that the federal appeal board did not have the jurisdiction to make the order in question.

There was the contention of the Board of Pension Commissioners, there was the contention of the Department of Justice. That was placed before the committee. I am willing to admit now that the means we took were not the best, but we did what we thought best under the circumstances. We said: Since these two boards are in dispute as to jurisdiction, any dispute as to the jurisdiction of the board to entertain and determine appeals from refusal of pension by the commission shall be referred by the department to the exchequer court for determination. Acting on that, under the law passed in 1928 this case was submitted—in 1929, if my memory serves me aright—to the exchequer court; and the exchequer court decided as my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has pointed out, and as my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has admitted. In December, 1931, the reference was heard by the exchequer court, which held that the federal appeal board had jurisdiction to entertain and determine the appeal mentioned in the reference at the time it heard and determined the same. Therefore the Board of Pension Commissioners should have granted that pension. That is, the contention of the Board of Pension Commissioners was set aside.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I think that is a non sequitur. The concluding clause of the headnote reads:

That whether or not the appeal board in giving its decision complied with the statute did not go to the question of jurisdiction.

Now the Justice department, as I understand, have ruled—

Mr. POWER: May I ask when the Justice department gave a ruling?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Justice department was heard before the exchequer court on the point and its contention was not sustained.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, that is not correct. That was not argued, and any remarks the judge made on that point are obiter dicta. The judge was asked only to decide the bald question of jurisdiction, and he decided that in favour of the pensioner. I think he was right. The mere fact that the statute had been repealed did not rob the federal appeal board of jurisdiction at the time when the matter was before them. I think that is sound. But it does appear from the finding of the exchequer court that the federal appeal board in giving its decision did not comply with the statute—that is the inference—on the merits. They had no right to change the diagnosis.

Mr. POWER: They did have jurisdiction?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They had jurisdiction to hear the appeal; that has been decided as a matter of record in the court. But they had no authority to change the diagnosis. I am not defending the case; I am just trying to elaborate it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Justice Audette, the chairman of the committee in the recent investigation, referring to these cases, said:

There seems to be something wrong there. If there are two tribunals, one of the first instance and the other an appellate division, and the appellate division gives its judgment, then it is no business of the court of first instance to criticize the judgment and say, that you are not to put that into force. There must be some remedy somewhere.

Again:

Then the Minister of Pensions and National Health applied ex parte in the exchequer court, representing to the court that new tribunals had been created—

By legislation of 1930.

—for disposing of pension decisions and asking that the reference be withdrawn. The submission was made ex parte to the president of the court—

My hon. friend has the reference.

—and he said—We have already here before us a statement of claim from the Skitch dependents and we think their solicitor should be advised of this action. Notice was accordingly given to the solicitor and we apeared before the court. There was a full dress debate on the thing. The justice department was represented, and after an argument lasting all day the president of the exchequer court came to the conclusion that the references should not be withdrawn, that there was a vested and legal right in the people who had obtained judgments from the old appeal board, and that these rights had not been cancelled by the repeal of the sections which had created the federal appeal board.

Could anything be more specific? He said there was a vested and a legal right in the people who had obtained judgment from the old board, and this could not be destroyed by the legislation amending the appeal board system passed by this house in 1930. Mr. Justice Audette also said the tribunal below had no right to question the judgment of the tribunal above. That is the situation. It is really an impasse; no one would pay these pensions. A properly constituted court found in favour of the appellants, and some of them have been waiting now eleven or twelve years without a cent of pension. There is an obvious inequity in the whole situation, and I think it should be remedied. I am speaking entirely on the facts, not laying any blame on the minister. I would without any hesitation lay blame on the chairman of the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the hon. member not like for his own satisfaction to read the opinion of the Department of Justice, upon which the minister by virtue of his office is bound to act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I did not know there was any. I did not understand that the Department of Pensions and National Health referred the question to the Department of Justice. But even if it did, that was overruled, because when the minister made an ex parte application to the exchequer court—

Mr. CAHAN: No, since then.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was not aware of any since then.

Mr. CAHAN: I have heard this matter mentioned before. It is not in my department, therefore I have no particular knowledge of it, but I was under the impression that after the judgment was given which the hon. gentleman has just read, a further opinion was taken from the Department of Justice as to what action the minister or his department should take in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Could I have that opinion now?

Mr. CAHAN: I am speaking only from memory.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister that decision?

Mr. MacLAREN: All I can say is that I know it was referred to the department, but I cannot say whether I have the written opinion or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am quite aware that it was referred to the Department of Justice before the reference was made by the minister to the exchequer court, but my question is this: Was there a further application for a written legal opinion from the Department of Justice after the Exchequer Court of Canada turned down my hon. friend's ex parte application?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am sorry, I cannot say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But that is important to my hon. friend's argument.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. CAHAN: I was speaking solely from memory.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Having made a fair statement of the facts, I should like to know from the minister what remedy this man can look for from the people of Canada. What is the remedy to be after the facts have been brought out and we have had the comments of these distinguished members of the judiciary? There were two judges sitting on the committee to which I have referred, one from Saskatchewan, Judge Ross, and the distinguished chairman of the committee. I should be glad to lend the evidence to my hon. friends if they would care to see it. If they will read that evidence they will find therein comments from these distinguished members of the judiciary as to what has happened in this case. They condemn what has taken place, and I think it is the fault of a bureaucratic system. I do not believe that a board has the right to refuse to pay a man a pension which a superior tribunal is of the opinion is properly payable. I do not think that is at all right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The general principle as enunciated by the hon. gentleman is correct, but I am not satisfied that he has told the house the whole story.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let us hear the other side of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us get word from the chairman of the pension board. Let us have a statement from him and we shall then hear both sides of the story, because I am quite satisfied that there is another side to it.

Mr. POWER: If there is a statement from the chairman of the Board of Pension Commissioners, it seems to me that we should have a statement from the other side, because this matter has been hanging fire for five or six years. I will not enter into an attack on Colonel John Thompson, with whom I have been on the friendliest terms, although we have not been able to agree in this matter, but I think he will admit that ever since this case has been before the public and those interested in pensions he has repeatedly taken the position that he would not pay this pension. I have here the evidence which was given in 1928 in the Ouellette case. There were five cases, and I would refer the committee to page 303 of the journals of the house of 1928 giving the proceedings of Wednesday, March 14 of that year. Let me quote. Colonel Belton, chairman of the federal appeal board, was called as a witness. He was duly sworn and was asked this question:

The Chairman: Colonel Belton, have you any statement to make with regard to the workings of the Pension Act in reference to the federal appeal board or in reference to pensions generally?

Colonel Belton: Mr. Chairman, I have thought that possibly I might recite what took place in the case of Ouelette that you have been considering; that is, what had happened in the federal appeal board. It might perhaps save a great many questions being asked later. . . . This man Ouelette had been on pension for some years, from 1919 up to April, 1923, for defective vision, due to optic neuritis. There was occasion to examine him again about this, and a report was given by a medical man that the condition was not optic neuritis, but an error of refraction, and as a consequence, his pension was cancelled. He also was on pension for disordered action of the heart, but that was continued. He then made an appeal to the federal appeal board. His appeal stated that it was in respect of refusal of pension on account of sore eyes. That is the man's own description. The case came on, and the appeal was heard in the city of Quebec before one commissioner, who, after hearing the case, reserved judgment. . . . It was suggested that another specialist still might have the case sent to him. And the medical officers were asked to suggest some local medical man of standing for such an opinion, and the case was referred to him.

Mr. MacLaren: Who was he?

This Mr. MacLaren was no other than the hon. gentleman who now graces the position of Minister of Pensions and National Health.

Colonel Belton: I may say that I am purposely avoiding mentioning names, but they may be mentioned, if you desire.

The Chairman: They may be mentioned.

Mr. MacLaren: I just wanted to know if it was Dr. Minnes.

Apparently the minister had a high opinion of Doctor Minnes. The evidence goes on for two or three pages and then we come to the judgment of the appeal board. I quote:

The judgment was then issued and the important paragraph is as follows. (Reading):

Upon examination of the record on which the board of pension commissioners gave its decision, I find that there was a marked difference of opinion with regard to the cause of disturbance of vision. I have accordingly found that it was desirable to consult with two specialists in diseases of the eye, as well as with the medical officers of this board. I am convinced from a review of the medical opinion available, that the defective vision in this case is due to an optic neuritis and that the weight of evidence indicates that optic neuritis was incurred on service.

The appeal is allowed.

That judgment was given in 1924. The exchequer court declared that this federal appeal board had jurisdiction to give such a judgment, yet these cases have been waiting since 1924 for final decision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are waiting to hear the appeal.

Mr. POWER: I will admit that the hon. member is right—I do not believe it, but I will admit that he is right to please him.

Mr. ROSS: Did the hon. member read that pension had been originally granted on account of optic neuritis?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. ROSS: Hold on. Will the hon. gentleman please keep quiet? He is not running the whole committee.

Mr. POWER: I will read the statement again for the information of the hon. member. This statement was made by Colonel Belton, who was chairman of the federal appeal board. He says:

This man Ouelette had been on pension for some years, from 1919 up to April, 1923, for defective vision, due to optic neuritis.

I do not know what it was due to; I am not a medical man.

Mr. ROSS: Will the hon. member read after that?

Mr. POWER: Then they cancelled the pension on the ground that it was not optic neuritis but that it was an error of refraction.

Mr. ROSS: In other words, they changed the diagnosis.

Mr. POWER: The Board of Pension Commissioners, after having given him a pension for optic neuritis, said that it was an error of refraction. He went before the federal appeal board and they called in their own doctors, including Doctor Minnes and a number of other medical men from Quebec, and they said they were convinced that defective vision was due to optic neuritis, which was incurred on service. But that is not all. Let me continue the statement made by Colonel Belton:

The Board of Pension Commissioners, according to the statute—

That is, as it existed in 1928.

—had then a month during which they might appeal this decision to a quorum of the board.

Members of the house who were members of that committee will recall that there was a sort of board to which you could appeal decisions of the federal appeal board. To continue:

That was not done, but our board was advised that they considered we had gone outside of our jurisdiction in the case, and that they did not intend to carry out the recommendation for pension.

That was the attitude which Colonel Thompson took—that he would not pay the pension, no matter what you did. And the committee in its wisdom tried to do the best it could to settle the case by having it referred to the exchequer court. It was referred to the exchequer court and apparently Colonel Thompson persists in his view that no matter what court gives these poor devils a pension they will not get it. I say, Mr. Chairman, it is time that something was done in this matter. This afternoon we could give a man named Campbell some consideration—a man who had seen no service at all either in Canada or in the empire, but who had been on a trawler. He was caught on a trawler and taken to Germany and he found that he would have been entitled to place his case before the British authorities at the proper time and that he would have been entitled to some compensation under reparations. Apparently he had been in Australia. He finally drifted into Canada. He made application to the British board from Canada but was told he had no right to compensation. Out of the generosity of our hearts we said that this Englishman who, having served on a trawler, was not a soldier, should receive a pension because he happened to be loafing in Canada and Australia. He could not obtain a pension before his own courts but we out of our generosity said we would give him one. Yet every court except the Board of Pension Commissioners that has to deal with these cases has granted a pension to these men and still they cannot get it. If there is no other way of granting a pension to these men, I submit that the minister should bring in a compassionate grant.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In answer to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), I should like to quote further from the evidence given before the commission as follows:

The Chairman: Well, you had no right to criticize the reasons which prompted them to arrive at the conclusion they did.

Colonel Thompson: The justice department said we had.

The Chairman: There is no common sense in it. Let us be guided by common sense. Surely an inferior court cannot say the judgment that has jurisdiction on appeal reverses me, but it is wrong.

Colonel Thompson: Well, supposing the man appealed on assessment?

The Chairman: I do not care. The court is there duly constituted. It is not for the inferior court to say, I am not obeying the judgment because I don't think you are right. If the administration of justice was constituted that way it would be a farce.

[Mr. Power.]

Colonel Thompson: But surely, sir, they must act within their limited jurisdiction. That does not apply.

The Chairman: Yes, they did act within their jurisdiction. There was an appeal, and if you thought that the judgment was not right you could have taken it further; but it is not in your mouth to say that you are not going to obey the judgment. I think that with a little common sense and willingness, and with a heart, these cases could be brought before the department and dealt with just the same as any good businessman would deal with them. We are fighting over nothing, we are just fighting in the air; we are just standing on technicalities; you won't approach the question. It is a pretty bad example to give to the rest of Canada.

Mr. ROSS: I am not a lawyer so I cannot discuss this case from the legal aspect. From what I remember of the case, it seems that the diagnosis was changed by the Board of Pension Commissioners. I do not know that they have the authority to change a diagnosis any more than anybody else. The statute says distinctly that a diagnosis must not be changed. I admit that but we organized these two boards and gave them medical men as advisers and permission to obtain other advice in connection with cases. The matter of changing a diagnosis does not come before the federal board, but in this case the Board of Pension Commissioners changed the diagnosis. I know of a concrete case where an ex-service man dropped dead in Rochester. The diagnosis was given as pneumonia. The man had been working on a ladder and when an examination was afterwards made it was found that although he had some congestion of the lungs he had also half a dozen other pathological conditions any one of which could have caused his death. The stand was taken that the diagnosis could not be changed. If the diagnosis could not be changed in that case, what right had the Board of Pension Commissioners to change another diagnosis? I am not discussing this case from the legal aspect but more along medical lines.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to inquire of the minister what the practice is with regard to the admission to hospital of an ex-service man applying for pension who has established by his own medical officer, at least to some extent, that he has a disability but is told that he must have some sort of technical examination. In the particular case I have in mind a cystoscopic and X-ray examination was necessary. Application was made to put this man into hospital but it was turned down, I understand upon the ground that the Board of Pension Commissioners did not consider him entitled to pension. He was told that he would have to have this examination before his case could be considered. This man had a good war record and he wants treatment or examination in order to establish his right to pension.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like to reply first to the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Mackenzie). The discussion has been very full in connection with these particular cases and has showed a considerable lack of unanimity. I propose to have the whole matter reviewed, and that is as far as I can go at the moment.

In reply to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) I may say that I do not think there is any difficulty in obtaining all necessary examinations. A man makes application to the pension board for pension and that board makes arrangements for his medical examination. In many cases it is not necessary for the applicant to enter an hospital, but a cystoscopic examination would require such admission. Admission to hospital is effected by the pension board directing that the man be admitted for examination. I understand from the hon. member that there has been some difficulty in the particular case to which he refers.

Mr. RALSTON: I will finish giving the minister the particulars of this case, which I am using only as an illustration. This man was examined a year and a half ago. He came up again for examination claiming that his disability had not been recognized and the doctor who examined him recommended that he have a cystoscopic examination. I understand from the officials of the Board of Pension Commissioners that unless entitlement is recognized the admission to hospital which is necessary in order to have a cystoscopic examination could not be granted. I am mentioning this instance because it is the result of the adjudication of the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. MacLAREN: Before a man can demonstrate his entitlement he must be examined and a cystoscopic examination would have to be made in a hospital. The pension board can and frequently does order that a man be committed to hospital for examination and observation.

Mr. RALSTON: But if the Board of Pension Commissioners does not do that, has the minister not the power to send him there, and is it good enough for the board to have the right to refuse him admission or to refuse that certificate of admission to hospital, thus possibly precluding the proof of his case?

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not know where, in a bona fide case, this has been refused. The fact is that the man does not come under the observation of the minister or of the department. He is dealing with the pension board and their medical officers.

Mr. RALSTON: In the particular case I have in mind, he does not come under the observation of the minister. My hon. friend is quite right; I did not mention it to the minister; I mentioned it to the director of medical services and he advised that the man could not be admitted. It was not the minister; it was his official. It is the same thing.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the facts are as stated by the hon. member the official in question was a medical man. I presume he had no connection with the department.

Mr. RALSTON: He was connected with the department.

Mr. MacLAREN: There must be some mistake. What I would expect to happen is that the man would be admitted for observation and examination.

Mr. RALSTON: I am concerned not only in this case, but in having the rule established. I submit—and I believe the minister will bear me out—that it is not sufficient for the Board of Pension Commissioners to have the authority to say: yes or no; you shall or you shall not go into hospital for the purpose of examination to have it decided whether you have a pensionable disability or what your disability is. It seems to me that the Board of Pension Commissioners are more particularly concerned in deciding whether a man's disability is attributable to war service, but in the earlier stages it is the department who must look after him and assist him in proving his case, and that is exactly why the minister has scattered throughout the dominion officers attached to the department in order to afford that sort of service to applicants. I say that that should be supplemented by either those doctors or the director of medical services having the right to order that man into hospital in order that his examination may be completed as recommended by the doctor in the field. I do not think it is sufficient for anyone to say that the Board of Pension Commissioners is the one that decides whether the man goes into hospital or not. The hospitals are under the administration of the minister and not of the board.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think the hon. member is quite correct in that. The man was asking not so much for treatment as for a pension; therefore he goes to the pension officials and they take the proper steps. If the hon. member will kindly let me have a memorandum of the matter, I will check it up and see if there is not something a little different from his information.

Mr. RALSTON: I am making it clear why I am bringing the matter up now. There is no quarrel between the department and me. But if the rule is as stated, then the minister ought as a general practice to take more jurisdiction in assisting these men in establishing their case, or, at least their disability, and not leave it to the Board of Pension Commissioners to say whether a man shall have assistance in proving his case. That is a point the minister might take into consideration.

Mr. MacLAREN: The Board of Pension Commissioners do more than that; they frequently order men into hospital for observation and report.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think they should have the say as to whether a man shall or shall not go into hospital.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the hon. member will let me have the man's name and number, I shall look up the matter. I do not like talking about these hypothetical cases, because the reports on file often differ from what is said in good faith.

Mr. RALSTON: The whole Pension Act is founded on hypothetical cases; it is drafted for the purpose of covering cases that have not necessarily been presented, and we must have certain rules on which to proceed. Regardless of this particular case, the question is whether the minister and the department will assume the responsibility of assisting applicants in proving their cases, more than simply appointing officers in the outside districts. If the men, in order that their disability may be established or examined into, need to be admitted to hospital, I feel the department should assist them in that way. That is merely a matter of justice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I did not hear the minister's decision in regard to the five cases which were brought to the attention of the committee this evening. Did he come to any conclusion as to what is to be done in regard to these cases?

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member surely quite misunderstood me. I said that I would have the matter reviewed. It will probably take a week to do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If that is all the minister is able to promise, I suggest that the matter had better be reviewed by this committee, because we are sitting probably as the last court of equity in regard to these cases. They have been disposed of by the courts.

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member can hardly expect me to dispose of the matter in the ten minutes just elapsed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister not give me any better guarantee than that he will review the case? Will he not report back to the committee?

Mr. MacLAREN: My word is the guarantee; I say that I shall have the matter carefully reviewed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister report back to the committee as to his findings in these cases?

Mr. McGIBBON: What does the hon. member expect?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Equity and justice.

Mr. McGIBBON: What does the hon. member want?

Mr. POWER: The payment of pensions.

Mr. McGIBBON: One cannot promise to pay pensions unless they are honestly deserved.

Mr. POWER: I think one can. I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend if he intends to speak on the subject.

Mr. McGIBBON: I shall make a speech if the hon. member wants me to do so.

Mr. POWER: I think the minister ought to tell the committee that he is going to do more than merely review these cases. They have been reviewed since before 1924 until the people are sick of hearing of them. I am not going to repeat, but every court except the Board of Pension Commissioners has given a decision in favour of these men. The Board of Pension Commissioners and Colonel Thompson, if he is consulted, will not say that these men are entitled to pension. There is perhaps a little stubbornness on the part of someone connected with the department. I am not speaking of the present minister, because this condition existed long before the present minister took office; but somewhere there is a stone wall that prevents people who have been declared to be entitled to pensions, from getting them. If the minister reviews the matter, he will just traverse the same ground. It has been reviewed time and again.

Mr. MacLAREN: How does the hon. member know that the result will be the same?

Mr. POWER: I am saying so because I know the minister will not do anything else.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is where the hon. member is wrong.

Mr. POWER: I am quite willing to be considered wrong by the minister.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is the hon. member's impatience again.

Mr. POWER: I am doing the talking now, and I shall carry on with my job. If the minister does his job equally well, there will be no complaint.

Mr. MacLAREN: I thought the hon. member had finished.

Mr. POWER: I am only starting. It is useless for the minister to tell us that he is going to review these cases, because I know where he will go for his information. He will go to the Board of Pension Commissioners, and this board has made up its mind that these men are not going to be paid.

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member is wrong again.

Mr. POWER: The board have said so repeatedly; they have taken advantage of every technical point they could raise. The whole thing was started by a technical point raised by Colonel Thompson in the first place. He did not like to have a court over him. He was practically told so by Judge Audette in the recent investigation.

Mr. McGIBBON: The tribunals were over him.

Mr. POWER: They were over him. These are federal appeal board cases, and if I understood the implication of my hon. friend the tribunals are not going to be over him much longer. In any case I think the minister should give us the assurance that he will personally study these cases and if he finds there is merit in them and that he cannot under the act—perhaps he will find that under the act, no matter how much he reviews them, he cannot grant a pension—do justice in these cases, he will come before parliament with a vote in order to settle these claims once for all, to remove from the department and from the people of Canada the stigma under which they have so long been labouring. I think that is a pledge which the minister ought to give us.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interject one or two observations? I have listened with interest and close attention to the presentation of these cases, and presented as they have been they are a serious and an interesting problem. I detected, however, as we proceeded, that there were one or two points which might be possible grounds for the Board of Pension Commissioners refusing to pay. I certainly, with what information we have before us, am not in a position to express definitely an opinion whether they were right or wrong, but I submit to my hon. friends that the minister's suggestion that the matter will again be reviewed by him should be accepted in good faith. I am quite certain that he makes it in good faith, and obviously he could not in his position as minister of the department pledge himself offhand to the payment of a pension apart from the technical provisions of the law. But if the minister after reviewing the cases is convinced that there are sound grounds for special treatment, he would then have to bring them before his colleagues in council and submit to parliament whatever action might be decided upon So I think my hon. friend in his enthusiasm for these cases, which I do not call in question for one moment, is hardly fair in asking the minister to give a definite promise.

Mr. POWER: I do not want that.

Mr. STEVENS: I personally must confess that I should want to know something more than we have been able to gather tonight before I could be clear in my own mind. Two or three points have occurred to me on which I think there is need for further light. We cannot get it here, and so I shall not mention them. The minister has not all his records here and was not prepared to deal with these cases. So I think my hon. friends should accept the minister's offer to review the cases and undoubtedly discuss them with his colleagues, and then at a future time, when the other estimates are up, the whole matter can be discussed again.

Mr. POWER: I would be satisfied if the minister would say that he would review the cases and if he finds that they cannot be conveniently settled otherwise than by presenting a special bill to parliament or a special item in the estimates—by that I mean that he will not ask these poor unfortunate people to go dragging their cases again through the whole gamut of pension board, pension tribunal, and pension appeal court—if he finds that these cases have the merit which we have urged here and which has been urged by other hon. gentlemen, all I am asking is that he will take it on himself to ask parliament as the court of last resort to pass on the matter. But if he only reviews the matter, we shall not get anywhere.

Mr. STEVENS: It is scarcely fair to ask for a pledge of that kind. The minister can only say now that he will review it because he does not know until he does reivew it what conclusion he will come to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am willing to accept the suggestion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that before the estimates are finally through we may expect to hear something further about these cases.

Mr. MacLEAN: Do the salaries for the pension tribunals come under this vote, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): No. This item applies to the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a special item for the tribunals, No. 204.

Mr. MacLEAN: The cases which have been reviewed by my friends to my left are similar to a great many cases which no doubt can be found right across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I could cite many such cases in my own riding, and what I particularly want to point out is the unfairness of the way in which the cases are handled by the attorney or advocate who follows the pension tribunal around. Last fall in my home town a pension was awarded by the tribunal to two men—

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that this matter comes under the item before us.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson-York-Sunbury): We shall reach the pension tribunal item later; it is No. 204.

Mr. POWER: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that the Board of Pension Commissioners has working under it commission counsel who appeal cases from the tribunal to the appeal court, and as they are under the control of the Board of Pension Commissioners I think that any case that comes before the tribunal can properly be discussed under this item.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. MacLEAN: I should like to refer to one remark that was made by the minister to-night. He said that these cases were all reviewed by independent bodies. I would ask the minister on whose authority does this attorney or advocate follow the tribunal around and after the men have been awarded a pension take that pension away?

Mr. MacLAREN: He works under the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. MacLEAN: Then all I now say is that we shall have more to say about this when the time comes.

Mr. RALSTON: Are we still on the item for the Board of Pension Commissioners, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Yes, item 81.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the minister feel that he ought to press this item, and item 204 which the Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned, when there is overhanging this parliament the idea of a new Pension Act? I submit that it is not quite fair to vote these salaries and these amounts for the various tribunals when we have had in the last six months a pensions investigation and reports varying in effect from three or four different groups of members of that committee. I do not think we ought to go on discussing these items. Does the minister think that we shall really make time by pressing these items in view of the fact that this very item is a vote for the salaries of one of the bodies which is being considered in connection with any new legislation which is being brought down?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth was not in the house when it was agreed to allow item No. 80 to stand after a certain amount of discussion until after the amendments to the Pension Act were before the house.

Mr. RALSTON: I was told that, and I was suggesting that the same thing be done in connection with this item. It seems to me that we cannot go on voting money for pension administration when you are talking about radically amending pension legislation, and when you have had a pension investigation which has been reported on four different ways by four different groups of the committee that made the inquiry. I do not think parliament ought to vote these items now in view of the fact that we are going to have legislation which may materially alter the present situation. There may be no Board of Pension Commissioners when we get through with the new legislation, or it may be that the board will be twice or three times its present size, and altogether differently constituted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is understood that legislation will be introduced which may alter the three courts now functioning in regard to veteran treatment. In this connection I support the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken. It is possible, almost probable, that the legislation may affect the size and personnel of the present Board of Pension Commissioners. When we come to the pensions tribunal it is possible that it may be abolished. How, then, can we intelligently vote appropriations at this time? How can we vote intelligently without first having before us the proposed new legislation? Surely we should not be asked to vote in the dark, and blindly to deal with an estimate based upon last year's figures until we know what the plans of the government are in regard to pensions legislation for the next year.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not believe I have asked the committee to vote blindly. The hon. member who has just sat down has spoken a great deal; whether it has been blindly or not I must leave to the judgment of the committee. At the same time I am quite prepared to allow the matter to stand.

Mr. McGIBBON: I should like to ask hon. members opposite if they would be willing to vote that this item be deleted from the estimates?

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

National defence—salaries, $441,378; contingencies, $35,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the present strength of the non-permanent forces?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): This is a civil government item; the question of the hon. member cannot properly be asked at this point.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps the minister could answer the question. Could he give me the figures for the permanent and non-permanent forces?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: On January 31 there were 3,524 in the permanent force.

Item agreed to.

Non-permanent active militia, $1,994,000.

Mr. RALSTON: What are the plans for training next year? I refer to the number of days training, and the number of men who train.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Generally speaking, there will be a ten day training period for about 30,000 men. For specialists such as signallers there may be a twelve day training period.

Mr. RALSTON: What about camps?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There will be no camps, in the general sense of the word as it was understood some years ago. There will probably be smaller camps used over a few week ends. With that exception, however, there will be no large camps.

Mr. RALSTON: What about Petawawa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There will be an artillery camp at Petawawa.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the minister explain the increase of $111,000?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The increase of $111,000 is made up of grants for training. There was artillery which in the year 1931-32 had no camp training at all. Last summer a very small number of batteries went to Petawawa. During the coming summer, however, it is felt that there will have to be a larger quota go to Petawawa in order to keep up efficiency. That accounts for the greater part of the increase. Then, as I have said, there will be a little more training for specialists, such as machine gunners and signallers.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Was there any training at Valcartier last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: A number of regiments in that dstrict took the funds they were given for training purposes and used them for short training periods of three or four days each.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am talking about rural units. Is it the intention of the government this year to have them train locally, or does the minister intend to have a quota of officers go to Valcartier for training?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The following regiments went to Valcartier:

Thirteenth Infantry Brigade Headquarters:
Regiment Montmagny.
Regiment de Dorchester et Beauce.
Fusiliers de St. Laurent.
Les Franc Tireurs de Saguenay.
Les Chasseurs Canadiens.
Fifteenth Infantry Brigade Headquarters:
The Royal Rifles of Canada.
Les Voltigeurs de Quebec.
Le Regiment de Quebec.
Le Regiment de Levis.
5th Machine Gun Battalion (B Company).
No. 5 Casualty Clearing Station, C.A.M.C.
No. 5 Detachment, C.P.C.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does the minister intend to carry on the same kind of training this year so far as non-commissioned officers and officers are concerned?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The whole object of the training is to train the key men, namely the officers and the non-commissioned officers.

Sir EUGENE FISET: There will be no local camps at local headquarters so far as whole regiments are concerned?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr GARLAND (Bow River): The minister kindly explained how the increased amount was to be expended. I understood him to say it was in additional field artillery training. Why under existing economic conditions does he consider it advisable to increase the vote for artillery training this year by $111,000? Is there anything ahead of us that we must fear? Are we going to be attacked in the near future, or is he going to send a force away somewhere? We got along all right last year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The vote as a whole is down, but this vote for the non-permanent militia is really the key vote of the whole department. Everything else hinges on it, because if anything ever did happen it is the non-permanent militia which would have to be expanded to do the work. Therefore it is very important that the key people be kept on an efficient basis. It could not be kept on an efficient basis the way it has been going the last couple of years. I assure the hon. member that it is far from full battery strength; we have the lowest possible number from which we consider we can get efficient training.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Would the minister also inform us if it is the intention of the department to pay to the local regiments—I mean rural regiments especially—the ordinary allowances they are entitled to per annum?

[Sir Eugène Fiset.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: For the care of arms, yes.

Item agreed to

Naval services—to provide for the maintenance of the ships and establishments of the naval service including the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, $2,422,000.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the reduction?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Last year in the vote there was an amount for preliminary work in connection with a new trawler. The naval staff have been very insistent that we needed one or two new trawlers, because the Thiepval that we had on the western coast was sunk some three years ago. This year the Ypres is out of commission; I do not think it will ever be going again. They urged that very strongly last year, and an item for preliminary expense was included. That is cut out this year and the idea given up for the time being.

Mr. RALSTON: It was not spent last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the program in regard to naval training this year—the same as last?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Practically the same. The two destroyers on the eastern coast this year have been taking a trip in southern waters The two on the western coast went further south in the Pacific. The general plan of training is practically the same as last year.

Mr. COOTE: How many boats have we?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We have six boats in commission—two destroyers and one mine sweeper on each coast.

Mr. COOTE: Is the bulk of this money used for salaries, or is it upkeep of the boats?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is practically all for salaries. These boats have to have a certain amount of refitting in the dry docks every year, and staffs are maintained at the dry docks for that purpose.

Mr. COOTE: What is the total personnel?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: About 850.

Mr. COOTE: How many officers and how many other ranks?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are 89 officers; that would leave about 790 other ranks.

Mr. COOTE: Could the minister tell me what the rate of pay is for the ordinary seaman? If he cannot find the information he can give it to me at some other time. I thought surely the officers would know the daily rates of pay.

Miss MACPHAIL: They know the officers' rates.

Mr. RALSTON: How is the minister getting on with the Canadian personnel?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We are gradually getting on with the personnel. At the present time we have on loan from the Royal Navy 8 officers and 66 other ranks.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the minister if there will soon be some vacant positions in the royal navy?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At the present time we are not taking on any men, because the estimates have been cut, and the wastage, that is the gradual dropping out of men, is very small. Consequently there are practically no new openings.

Mr. POULIOT: There are only 66 men?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, the 66 are men that we have from the royal navy who have been on loan. Now I have the information as to pay: Ordinary seamen, $1.25 a day; stokers, $1.35; artificers, $2.10; artisan ratings, $2.10. Then they take on some younger boys at 60 cents a day.

Mr. COOTE: For how long do these men serve?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: A seven year term.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Air Force—all expenses in connection with the general maintenance of the air force, including training personnel for civil aviation, and provision of the necessary facilities therefor; also

Civil Aviation—all expenses in connection with civil aviation, including the control of commercial and private flying, construction and maintenance of airways and aids to air navigation, airship bases and flying clubs, etc., $1,600,000.

Mr. ROSS: I wish to say something on this item but I shall not have time now. I wonder whether the minister would call it eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, March 20, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. GORDON: I desire to lay on the table of the house certain orders in council passed pursuant to the relief legislation.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 53, to amend the criminal code (offensive weapons).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill is introduced in response to a very large number of resolutions and requests that have come from public bodies throughout Canada, nearly all of them asking for legislation to prohibit the importation, manufacture and sale of pistols and revolvers. The house is aware that to grant a request of that kind would involve very serious constitutional questions as between the rights of the dominion and those of the provinces. As a matter of fact, upon inquiry, I find that there is no manufacture in Canada of pistols or revolvers. I also find that the importation of pistols and revolvers is already prohibited under the Customs Act except under permit from the Minister of National Revenue.

The remaining question is as to the sale of these articles. In the bill which I am introducing, I have endeavoured to provide further safeguards to restrict the sale, possession and carrying of pistols, revolvers and other offensive weapons. I have endeavoured to recast the provisions of the criminal code in respect to these matters and I think on the whole the present clauses have been very much strengthened.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NEW ZEALAND BUTTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): I should like to direct a question to the government. There is a rumour to the effect that several thousand boxes of New Zealand butter are on the high seas on their way to Canada. My question is: Can the government confirm that rumour and, if so, are any steps being taken in regard to the matter?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There is on the order paper question No. 3 couched in somewhat similar terms.

The government cannot indicate with any degree of certainty the number of pounds of butter that are on the ocean from New Zealand to Canada, but it has been advised that substantial quantities of New Zealand butter are on the ocean en route to this country. The government has, under the provisions of the trade agreement, taken appropriate action to deal with the situation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A sister nation's butter.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman refers to sister nations. We have a contract and in its terms we had foresight enough to provide for this contingency. We have taken appropriate measures accordingly.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Referring to the Prime Minister's answer in regard to the importation of New Zealand butter, might I be bold enough to ask what is the natural and appropriate action which has been taken?

Mr. BENNETT: I would refer my hon. friend most respectfully to the terms of the agreement itself, article IV.

ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): As rumours are appearing in the press at the present time regarding the financial assistance that is being given by the Dominion government to the provincial governments, particularly of the west, may I ask the Prime Minister whether there have been any recent communications with the provincial governments regarding this matter and, if so, say since March 1, whether he would be prepared to lay any such communications on the table?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Communications have been had with the four western provinces. Letters were dispatched to the premiers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia with respect to their financial position. A reply was received this morning from Manitoba; a telegram was received indicating that a reply from British Columbia was in the mails, and a telephone communication revealed that in Saskatchewan the matter is under consideration. The situation in Alberta is, of course, somewhat different from that in the other provinces. When the replies have been received, the letters with the replies will be given to the house.

RADIO STATION CRBO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I direct a question to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), regarding a news item which appears on the first page of the Montreal Gazette of Saturday concerning the erection of a radio station by the radio commission? I notice that there will be four letters "CRBO." What would be the meaning of such letters, and is the last "O" a number or a letter?

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion that is a frivolous question.

CANADIAN ANTHRACITE COAL COMPANY, LIMITED

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary) moved the second reading of Bill No. 47, respecting the Canadian Anthracite Coal Company, Limited.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. STANLEY: The purpose of this bill is to ratify an agreement that was made in connection with the Canadian Anthracite Coal Company, Limited, whose property is located at Canmore, Alberta. Thirty years ago the company were in some financial difficulties, and the shareholders, very small in number all told, made an arrangement for certain transfer of shares between themselves and the elimination of a certain amount of bonds. Some doubt has been cast upon the legality of the action that was taken thirty years ago, and the purpose of this bill is simply to ratify the agreement that was made between the shareholders at that time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

DEVONSHIRE JOCKEY CLUB

Hon. RAYMOND D. MORAND (East Essex) moved the second reading of Bill No. 51, to incorporate Devonshire Jockey Club.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MORAND: This bill is made necessary because one of the existing jockey clubs has been operated under a receivership for some time, and in order to wind it up and convey the assets, special legislation is necessary because under the Bankruptcy Act only the physical assets can be conveyed, and not the right to race. This is not a new charter nor a new race track of any kind.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

Mr. BARRETTE:

1. Is the contract dated December 10, 1908, respecting the leasing of the old Beauharnois canal, to which the Minister of Railways and William Cassell McIntyre and Edmond Arthur Robert were parties, still in force?
2. Was the contract transferred to some other party, and who holds the contract at the present time?
3. Are the obligations arising out of this contract still in force, and if any modifications have been made, what are they?
4. Are clauses 16 and 17 of the original contract respecting the transfer of the lease of the old Beauharnois canal still in force?
5. If these clauses in the contract were cancelled, what reasons were adduced for their cancellation?
6. Were similar clauses embodied in the agreement concluded between the federal government and the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company?
7. Was a guarantee to the effect that this company will not amalgamate or merge or sell any of its shares to the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company inserted in the contract of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to this question was prepared a few days after it appeared on the order paper, but there seems to be some doubt as to what the seventh question means, whether it refers to contracts which are solely under the control of the provincial authorities or to arrangements made with the dominion. It will perhaps be remembered that the province, and not the dominion, made the grant of the water power rights in the first instance. The question need not be dropped. If the hon. gentleman in the light of the explanation will indicate clearly what he means, the answer will be provided.

NEW ZEALAND BUTTER IMPORTATIONS

Mr. REID:

1. Has the government been advised of expected importation of New Zealand butter, during the present month, to be followed by further shipments later on?
2. If so, how many pounds are reported to be expected (a) this month; (b) by later importations?
3. What steps, if any, have been taken by the government to protect the interests of Canadian dairymen?

Mr. BENNETT: The question has been answered.

Mr. REID: The information given by the Prime Minister is not what I was asking for. I was asking how many pounds of butter, as well as what steps. I understand that certain steps have been taken, and the information in that regard has not been given to the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that we were not in a position to indicate the number of pounds. That will be determined by the number of pounds that arrive. As to the last question I said that we had taken appropriate steps under the terms of the trade agreement, and the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) wished to know what that referred to, and I referred him to article IV of the agreement.

JAM PURCHASES

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Have jams been purchased from J. Gobeil of La Patrie, county of Compton, Quebec, from August 7, 1930, to date, by (a) the government of Canada or one of its departments; (b) the Canadian Government Merchant Marine; (c) the Canadian National Railways; (d) the Canadian National Steamships; and (e) the parliamentary restaurant?
2. If so, what quantity and what was the value of such purchase in each instance?

Mr. MANION: The government has no information with regard to the railways purchasing materials of this kind, and the railways in reply to our request for the information took the attitude that it is not in the interests of the public or in the interests of the railways that it should be given out.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

MONTREAL HARBOUR BOARD EMPLOYEES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. How many new employees have joined the staff of the Montreal harbour board since January 1, 1933?
2. On what date was each employee hired?
3. What was the previous address of each such employee?
4. By whom and to whom was each one recommended?

Mr. BENNETT: The government has no information, is the answer to the question. I need hardly do more than direct the attention of the house to the impossibility of even the harbour board being able to supply the previous address of each employee taken on in connection with a work of that character, whether taken on by day labour or otherwise.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question should not have been put on the order paper. Dropped.

DOMINION TAX-FREE BONDS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Are there any more dominion tax free bonds held by certain persons?

2. If so (a) what is the name of such persons; (b) the amount held by each one of them?

Mr. BENNETT: "Are there any more dominion tax free bonds held by certain persons?" That is rather a difficult question to answer. I am not able to understand exactly what it means. The second part of the question reads, "If so, (a) what is the name of such persons; (b) the amount held by each one of them"? It is clearly obvious that the government cannot answer such a question as that regarding a public sale of securities.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

TUG OCEANEAGLE

Mr. COOTE:

1. Does the government own the steel tug Oceaneagle?
2. If so, when was it purchased?
3. From whom was it purchased?
4. Were any alterations or repairs made to this tug subsequent to its purchase?
5. If so, what was the nature of these repairs and alterations?
6. Who performed such alterations and repairs?
7. What was the cost of same?

Mr. MANION:

1. Yes.
2. September, 1927.
3. St. John Dry Dock Company, Saint John, N.B.
4. Yes.
5. Framing at bow was strengthened and bow plates thickened for service in ice; smoke stack extended; wooden fenders replaced by steel plates; new propeller supplied as spare; towing machine installed.
6. The Davie Ship Building and Repairing Company, Limited, Lauzon, Quebec.
7. $18,600. Towing machine installed was purchased by the department from Corbet Foundry & Machine Company, Limited, Owen Sound, Ontario, at a cost of $3,032.

BACH PENINSULA STATION

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. When was the Dominion government station at Bach Peninsula last visited by the Dominion government relief ship?
2. How long has the present contingent of Dominion government officers at Bach Peninsula station been at that point without having been visited by the Dominion government relief ship?
3. How many people were in the said contingent when it was first stationed at said point?
4. Did the expedition under Major D. L. McKeand in its last northern expedition reach the said Bach Peninsula?
5. If not, what was the reason therefor?
6. Since the establishment of said Bach Peninsula station what is the longest period of time during which the said station has remained without being visited by the Dominion government relief ship?
7. What was the total cost of the said expedition sent out in 1932?
8. What was the cost of every (separately) such expeditions to Bach Peninsula station since its establishment?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. In 1931.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Three.
4. No.
5. Unfavourable ice conditions.
6. Three years.
7. $23,810.95.
8. 1926-27, $55,871.45; 1927-28, $67,270.39; 1928-29, $49,647,17; 1929-30, $50,945.50; 1930-31, $49,147.86; 1931-32, $49,301.55; 1932-33, $23,810.95.

DOMINION GOVERNMENT DEPUTY MINISTERS

Mr. BARRETTE:

1. What was the total number of deputy ministers in 1881 and 1882?
2. How many were English-speaking?
3. How many were French-speaking?
4. How many were appointees from the province of Quebec?

DEPARTMENTAL AND ROYAL COMMISSION REPORTS

Mr. BOURGEOIS:

Mr. BENNETT: Before the motion is adopted I desire to inform the house that communications sent from a minister to an official would be privileged and should not be brought down. The public documents, of course, will be.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: With that understanding.

Motion agreed to.

SALISBURY, N.B., RURAL ROUTE

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, and other documents with relation to a change effecting rural route No. 2, Salisbury, New Brunswick, by which a change was brought about in the original contract, and showing the cause assigned for changing the hours at which the mail man should receive the delivery of mail matter on the arrival of trains from east and west (Moncton and Saint John).

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the closing words of the motion, "from the time the change was contemplated until the present" I would suggest that if the hon. member would substitute the expression "during the years 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933" he would probably get the information he wants. It is difficult to say when a change was contemplated, or who did the contemplating.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I should like the information from 1929.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member substitutes the expression "from 1929 until the present." Shall the motion as amended carry?

Motion as amended agreed to.

DOMINION NOTES

Mr. BOULANGER:

For specimen copies of Dominion notes issued and printed under chapter 41 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to me this is an improper request. It means the mutilation of a bill and the accounting for it through the Department of Finance and the comptroller. The hon. gentleman is as familiar as everybody else with the notes of the country, and I submit this is not a proper request to put upon the order paper. Everybody has one in his pocket.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman suggest any amendment?

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest the hon. member drop the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall it be dropped?

Mr. BOULANGER: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion dropped.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUATION FOR ONE YEAR OF PROVISIONS OF RELIEF ACT, 1932

The house resumed from Friday, March 3, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to continue in force the provisions of the Relief Act, 1932, until the 31st of March, 1934.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I move that the resolution be further amended by adding thereto the following words:

And that provision be made for accepting securities from the provinces for such loans, advances, guarantees, etc., as may be advanced by the government, and that provision also be made for the maintenance of peace, order and good government throughout Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The clerk informs me that the first amendment was not carried. I shall read it:

That this resolution be amended by adding thereto the following words:
Provided however that the amount to be paid for direct relief for the fiscal year ending the 31st day of March, 1934, shall not exceed the sum of twenty million dollars.

That was the first amendment. The question is on the first amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Shall we dispose of it first?

Mr. BENNETT: Take them all together, if you wish.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, on March 2 last, I had the honour to submit to the house certain suggestions in connection with colonization. I wish to thank the newspapers which echoed throughout the country my humble remarks made in the house.

The "Droit" on March 3, in an article signed by Leopold Richer, stated:

The two foremost speeches were delivered by Mr. J. A. Bradette, liberal member for Temiskaming North, and Mr. Jean-François Pouliot, liberal member for Temiscouata. Mr. Bradette had spoken at length, last Friday, so he simply completed his speech yesterday. As to Mr. Pouliot he fearlessly criticized the way the movement of Back to the land was managed in the province of Quebec.

The Ottawa Journal and Citizen, the Mail and Empire, of Toronto, the Toronto Daily Star, the Border Cities Star have published articles in this connection. The latter paper published an article signed by Mr. H. M. Morden:

Jean François Pouliot, liberal member for Temiscouata, attacked the working out of the plan. He told of unqualified people being sent to unproductive, virgin districts, huddled together promiscuously in shacks, and in some cases forced to subsist on grass and roots. It was a harrowing picture which moved Mr. Gordon to rather incredulous horror.

The Toronto Globe published the news item on the front page, in its first column, and followed it the next day by an editorial which ends as follows:

By careful selection and under sympathetic supervision and instruction a great deal may be done by way of opening up on the land a new and better life for many people now sorely distressed; but if those who, because of lack of experience, and generally unfitted for farm life, are left to their own resources they will depart at the first opportunity. And the last state of these will be worse than the first.

Which is true.

The "Devoir" on March 3, published the following, signed by Emile Benoist:

One of the splendid speeches made to-day was that of Mr. Jean François Pouliot, member for Temiscouata. He attacked the method of colonization which is being followed, at present, in Quebec.

The Gazette of Montreal, published the news item on its front page. "La Presse", also of Montreal made an excellent report. The Montreal Daily Star, under the signature of Norman M. McLeod wrote as follows:

Mr. Pouliot's charges with respect to the back-to-the-land policy in Quebec province were also of a nature which could not be ignored.

"Le Canada" published an excellent report sent by the Canadian Press, "La Patrie" had also a good report, as did "l'Action Catholique", and "Le Soleil", while "l'Evénement" also reproduced a Canadian Press despatch. "L'Union Catholique des cultivateurs" owns a newspaper known as the "Terre de Chez Nous". In the latter newspaper, dated March 15, last, an editorial appears on the front page, which is as follows, under the heading:

Colonization at Ottawa

On March 2 last, in the House of Commons, at Ottawa, Mr. J. F. Pouliot, delivered a splendid speech on the errors of the ways of colonization; we regret, however, that he took to task l'Union Catholique des Cultivateurs".

This was a misunderstanding. It sometimes happens that I am mistaken, however, when I am, I hasten to apologize so as to be fair to everybody. The following is the letter which I received from Mr. R. M. Pucet, chief editor of this newspaper:

Montreal, March 8, 1933.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot,
Member for Temiscouata,
Dominion Government,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

We read with the greatest of interest your speech delivered on March 2, in connection with colonization, we wish to convey to you our sincere congratulations as we agree with you on many points. We noted, on page 2799 of Hansard, that part of your speech where you refer to l'Union Catholique des Cultivateurs" and we wish to say that we sincerely regret that statement.

In fact, at our general congress, the question of colonization was the subject of a talk by Mr. Albert Rioux, who has since become President of our Association; we are forwarding to your address, under separate cover, a copy of the "Terre de Chez Nous" dated November 23, you will find in it a complete report of the U.C.C.

This report was the result of an inquiry held by the U.C.C., previous to the congress. A questionnaire was sent to the 560 associated groups of the U.C.C., throughout the province, and it was by basing his conclusions on the numerous answers received, that Mr. Albert Rioux prepared his lecture which was, so to speak, the principal dish on the menu of the congress. We are forwarding to your address a copy of the U.C.C. dated August 31, in which was published this questionnaire.

A resolution with reference to settlements was forwarded to the hon. Hector Laferté, Minister of Colonization, at Quebec. The U.C.C. was right in its views, that it devolves upon the provincial government to first assume the responsibility in respect to colonization and come to some arrangement with the Dominion government.

Since then the U.C.C. has pursued its work and—trusting that you will not be annoyed in receiving all these copies of our newspaper, relating to colonization—we take the liberty of sending you the text of a lecture given by your humble servant on the 3rd instant and published in the newspaper of that date.

We trust, sir, that you will agree with us that "l'Union Catholique des Cultivateurs" is carrying out its good work and if errors are committed, it should not be blamed, one should endeavour to discover them in a higher sphere.

Believe us, sir,
Yours sincerely,
The Union Catholique des Cultivateurs Inc.
(Signed) R. M. Pucet,
Editor.

My reply was as follows, on March 9.

Mr. R. M. Pucet
Editor of the "Terre de Chez Nous"
5505 St. Lawrence Boulevard,
Montreal, P. Q.

Dear Sir,

Your letter of March 8, to hand, for which I wish to thank you, and also for your kind congratulations. It is, indeed, unfortunate that one cannot find the time to read what is published in our province.

I carefully read over a letter, dated November 19, last, from Mr. Boucher, your general secretary, addressed to the members of the House of Commons. In thanking him, I added, that I much regretted that there was no reference made to colonization.

I am very much pleased indeed, that you have sent me copies of the "Terre de Chez Nous" dated August 31, 1932, and November 23, 1933.

I have only had time to glance over them, however, I shall do my utmost to read them when my mind is clearer, between now and the end of the week.

Allow me to sincerely congratulate you on your lecture published on March 8, last. I read it, and shall again read it over.

In closing my letter, may I again thank you for the documents you forwarded to me, I shall deem it a duty to see that justice is done to you when the debate on unemployment is resumed; trusting also that I shall have the pleasure of personally thanking you before long.

Sincerely yours
(signed) Jean-François Pouliot

On March 2, the opportunity was afforded to me to submit to the house certain important documents. I did not have them with me, so I quoted from memory. There had been an inquiry held by "l'Action Catholique," an important newspaper of Quebec, under the heading "must our society be ruralized"? The first letter, in connection with this inquiry, was written by His Grace Mgr. Villeneuve, Archbishop of Quebec, and to-day, His Eminence Mgr. Villeneuve, Canadian Cardinal. Previous to reading certain excerpts from this letter of my reverned Archbishop, I wish to state that I greatly regret that the House of Commons did not follow the example set by the Quebec Legislative Assembly, and vote an address of thanks to the Holy Father, on the occasion of the appointment of Mgr. Villeneuve as a member of the Sacred College. The house adjourned once when an oriental prince visited Ottawa. I think it would have been but fair to acknowledge the honour bestowed by the Holy Father, on the Catholics in Canada, and, which reflects great honour, not only on the Quebec diocese, but on the whole country, because a Cardinal is a Prince of the Catholic church. Bearing such a title, he has the same standing as a royal prince and has a right to the same honours. Since the government did not think it proper to address, officially, its congratulations to the Holy Father, I think that I am expressing the feelings of the members of the House, whatever be their religious belief, in expressing to the sovereign pontiff the gratitude of the whole of Canada, on the occasion of this excellent appointment to the Sacred College. Mgr. Villeneuve stated, in his letter dated Jan. 11, 1933 and published on January 12, in "l'Action Catholique."

The rural problem is one which affects everybody, it is the elementary problem of society. The fundamental formula which will solve it, is to make the land produce what the farmer requires for himself and the other classes of society.

And His Eminence Cardinal Villeneuve ends his letter as follows:

The fair and sincere co-operation of everybody, individuals and social bodies, with public authorities, the latter being conscious of their responsibility for the public welfare, that is the solution of the farming problem, and the golden rule for all social problems, even those of today.

I remain, sir, yours very devotedly in J.C. and M. I.,

J. M. Rodrique Villeneuve O.M.I.
Archbishop of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, another very important letter was written by Rev. Father Bonhomme, a highly esteemed Oblate Father of Hull. He refers, in "l'Action Catholique" of January 20, 1933, to the excellent work which has been accomplished by "La Conférence Saint-Vincent-de-Paul de Notre-Dame" of Hull, in connection with the back to land movement. I have not the time to read the whole letter, however, the Rev. Father Bonhomme insists that the settlers should be placed, when possible, on lands that have already been farmed and are not occupied, in old established parishes.

Still another most interesting letter was published in the same newspaper, on February 18, signed by the Rev. Father Alexandre Dugré, Provincial of the Jesuits in Canada. I shall read the following excerpt:

To ruralize society, means ruralizing many things, beginning, first, with the soil itself: have we not in Quebec 26,000,000 acres of fertile forest land which could be turned into farms, yet cannot be cleared? Enclosed within timber limits, they are tabooed, condemned to only grow spruce trees and ferns, thus held in bondage forever. Should we not take advantage of the trade depression in lumber to free 2,000,000 acres, or 20,000 lots for colonization purposes, a territory equal to 100 new parishes?

One of the remarks I made on March 2, was as follows: First, lands should be classified. I do not think that any difficulty would be encountered in this respect. It is clear that lands should be classified and that there should be a difference established between timber lands and farming lands before placing settlers on them. My second remark was the following: After the lands are classified, the new settler should be selected accordingly.

The following is what his Lordship Mgr. Hallé, Vicar Apostolic of northern Ontario, states, in "l'Action Catholique" of February 9, 1933:

We note, by a long experience, that the settlers must be well chosen by people who are familiar with their work, experts in colonization.

First, one must find out by what the future settlers say—or endeavour to conceal—whether they are men with determination, energy, and show a willingness to work.

Note that I state men and not young men because the latter left by themselves—with few exceptions—do not succeed; they become discouraged.

With the desire to work, the future settler must be attached to the land, if not through heredity, at least by training. Without such attachment, no great or difficult task can be accomplished. His wife must also have a liking for the land in order to help her husband and at times encourage him should he weaken.

A third very important qualification is an aptitude to learn all about farming. The hon. Minister of Agriculture is unceasingly pointing out the necessity of agricultural science to farmers. He is entirely right. The same applies to the new settler. Otherwise the work becomes a routine, and discouragement and failure follow.

Further on Mgr. Hallé continues:

People who simply wish to change locality just for the sake of making a trip—and they are numerous—the people who wish to settle on new lands only to cut the pulpwood or other kinds of wood, the people who lack energy, show no aptitude and attachment for the land should not deceive themselves in thinking they are doing a great honour to settlements. They soon become a drag, an unbearable burden to the small communities which have no pecuniary means to support them.

In "l'Action Catholique" of December 17, 1932, I note the following:

446 families are settled on lots. A total of 2,876 people—Quebec sent a contingent of 1,204—the service of a nurse.

Since September 1, 446 families, comprising 2,876 people have been settled on colonization lots. These figures are furnished by Mr. J. S. Marcotte, director of the back to the land scheme. The number is made up as follows:

Cities—	Heads	Dependents
Quebec	236	1,204
Montreal	55	333
Hull	43	216
Three Rivers	56	337
Sherbrooke	12	62
Lachine	9	47
Victoriaville	8	51
St. Georges de Beauce	20	126
Ville St. Pierre	4	26
Ville St. Rachel	1	5
Levis	1	12
Notre Dame de Ham	1	11
Total	446	2,430

In a speech which the hon. Minister of Colonization, Mr. Laferté, delivered in the Quebec legislative assembly, he quoted certain excerpts from the reports which were made by the Rev. Mr. Bergeron, and by other colonization agents, and while the house still recall the wise suggestions made by Mgr. Hallé, may I read what the report of the Rev. Mr. Sirois states:

I hasten to state—the Rev. Mr. Sirois says—that the failings which I apprehended among last year's settlers did not appear. Will these settlers with an occupation not of their choosing, for many of them—

I lay stress on the words "occupation not of their choosing."

—take really root! I am inclined to think so, at least to hope so, and the crisis, under the circumstances, will have been almost a blessing.

I do not think, sir, that it is a blessing to have settlers with an occupation not of their choosing because to keep a settler on the land, he must be greatly attached to the land and show a desire to farm it.

Another remark which I made, sir, and it was my third suggestion, was that colonization roads were required, it was necessary to build roads previous to granting lots. In the "Devoir" of January 21, 1933, I find a report of a lecture broadcast by the Rev. Mr. Georges M. Bilodeau, a colonization agent. In the third column I find the following:

Secondly, with these grants, roads must be constructed. It is by constructing roads that a settlement begins and I do not hesitate to state that it is the most economic method.

In fact he is quite right, however, he is only repeating what I told him when I met him on a train last December.

I mentioned in my speech, on March 2, the views expressed by Mgr. Ross. I had not with me at the time his letter, however, I have it here now; it will be interesting to hear what His Lordship, the Bishop of Gaspé, has to say in connection with the ruralizing of our society:

On the other hand, he states, in "l'Action Catholique" of January 14, 1933, there is a lack of control. This fact, in my opinion, is as indisputable and universally acknowledged as the other. In many problems which are closely wrapped up with our national life—and the back to the land is one—wonderful views are expressed, laudable schemes are proposed, generous endeavours are made; there lacks, however, cooperation between these forces which are scattered, a strong hand to unite them, one mind to direct them in the light of a well conceived plan, having a clearly defined aim.

It therefore seems to me that present efforts should tend towards not so much convincing as organizing and bringing the movement to a happy goal.

Who will be the driving power of this movement? What strong hand will unite these forces and see that the necessary directions are followed out? That is, in my opinion, the practical side to which we must direct our attention.

This letter, sir, bears the signature of Mgr. Ross, Bishop of Gaspé.

Following this letter, may I read another which was sent to "l'Action Catholique" by my excellent friend and distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), and published on January 18, 1933. The third paragraph states:

I wonder whether the farmers, especially in the Eastern part of Canada, do not form the class of citizens which are the most neglected and forsaken by public bodies, notwithstanding the laudable endeavours made on their behalf by the Quebec government.

The views, sir, of another great colonizing agent, an eminent member of the clergy, are those of Monseigneur Lapointe who was for a long time Vicar General of the diocese of Chicoutimi.

The following is what he writes in "l'Action Catholique" of January 24, 1933; in reply always, to the question: Must we ruralize our society?

Yes, let us ruralize. That is first: let us colonize. But let us colonize in the way settlements should be carried out, to-day; let us have a policy which is well conceived, regulated, consistent and strictly adhered to. Let us part with the old methods.

Have we ever had in our province a national policy on colonization? It is an undeniable historical fact—that seems a paradox—that for the past century at least, if not always, official public assistance, most of the time, has been too much delayed, has always followed the settler and never preceded him.

Thus colonization has always had the pace of a tortoise. And at the cost of what hardships!

I do not wish my words to be misinterpreted. The other day, at the Quebec Legislative Assembly, Mr. Barré, the member for Rouville, stated, according to the following report, as published by "l'Action Catholique" on March 10, 1933:

The hon. Mr. Laferté, at the outset of the sitting, yesterday afternoon, put things in their true lights with reference to a statement of Mr. Jean-François Pouliot, at Ottawa. Mr.

Barré taking no notice of Mr. Laferté's statement, contended that the member for Témiscouata was too much a liberal to exaggerate the abuses of the Quebec government.

I wish to thank Mr. Barré for the high regard in which he holds my liberalism, however, in my remarks I had no more the intention of attacking the Quebec government than I had of launching out to-day, in the house against the Minister of Labour. May I be allowed to discuss this important question from a non-political viewpoint—that is non-political in the generally accepted sense. This all important question is worthy of being fully studied without any prejudice, because the question is to find out whether the methods followed are the right ones or not. If they are let them so be proved, if not let them be changed.

There was a speech delivered by Mr. Authier, a member, probably of very little weight, who discussed the question of colonization, but from such a petty and narrow viewpoint, that I attach no weight to his opinion.

The hon. Mr. Laferté, Minister of Colonization, on the contrary, was courteous and I shall act accordingly towards him. In my opinion, it is the best way of applying the golden rule. According to "l'Evénement" of March 10, last. Mr. Laferté, referring to the member for Témiscouata, at Ottawa, made the following statement:

He even went so far as to contend that in Témiscouata, the new settlers were reduced, last summer, to feed on grass and roots and that in another section of the province they were lodged in a shack where men, women and children mostly strangers to one another had to live together under most deplorable conditions.

I deem it a duty to defend my province and compatriots against such charges. I have no idea where Mr. Pouliot sought his information, however, I wish to state in this Chamber that they are not according to facts, that even if such was the case in few isolated instances, we cannot be held responsible. The hon. member is free to comment as he pleases on public matters; personally I would not have referred to this incident, but unfortunately it was published by the Press, and the Ontario newspapers, among others, after such a statement, raised such a halloo-balloo, that the good name of our province has been questioned.

It is not a matter of the good name of Quebec being questioned. It is a question of remedying an evil, it is a case of being open minded enough to state the truth, and we earnestly believe, sir, that it is necessary and urgent that we should take this stand.

However, nothing can be done without proof, and this proof I have in a letter of the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau, himself, dated March 3, 1933, and published by "le Soleil" on March 6, 1933.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The settlers, in 1931, were located in the Auclair and Biencourt townships. . .

In the county of Témiscouata.

. . . in concentration camps while awaiting the completion of their own camps and the arrival of their families. These concentration camps were modelled on lumber camps and the settlers were well fed and cared for, at least as well as in the lumber camps. Never were whole families grouped together.

That is, the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau contends that never were whole families agglomerated in concentration camps in the Auclair and Biencourt townships. However, that is not the point. It is neither what I stated. What I said was that the settlers had been lodged in so-called hotels in Timiskaming or Abitibi in the north, at least—that whole families were living mixed together in a shameful way. And I had the proof. On the same train with the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau, were men, women and children, children so young that the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau, himself, gave one a ride on his knee. They were sent to take possession of lots that they obtained either by location tickets or letters patent; however, there were no roads leading to those lots and these people were obliged to take refuge in those so-called hotels until roads were built to reach their lots. At all events, it was admitted by the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau, himself, that the settlers were placed in so-called lumber camps before they could reach the lots which were to be conceded to them.

I have, sir, received a number of letters from settlers who inquire what chattels are exempt from seizure on their land, and whether, in case of a lawsuit they could be forced to give up all they possessed. I have here my replies to these letters, in which I had the article of the Civil Code Procedure and the articles of the act protecting settlers, transcribed, so as to inform them what chattels they could withhold if they became involved in a lawsuit. They certainly cannot be well to do settlers who have need of such information. In the second part of his remarks Mr. Laferté expresses himself as follows:

"I shall, on my behalf, quote the evidence set forth by the colonization missionary agents of Témiscouata, the Rev. Mr. Léo-Pierre Bernier, this evidence may be found in the report sent to my department, at page 126. Referring to the county of Témiscouata, the Rev. Mr. Bernier expresses himself as follows:" As a practical result, four new parishes, which have their own resident priest, were settled: Auclair, (St. Emile), Biencourt, (La Nativité-de-Marie), Robins, (St. Jean de la Lande), St. Elzéar de la Petite Rivière Bleue; two missions: Lejeune et le Lac-des-Aigles and five older parishes were considerably enlarged: St. Benoit-Abbé, St. Eusèbe, les Etroits, Squatic and St. Juste-du-Lac.

Such a development in so short a time is unheard of in the annals of the colonization of our county and perhaps of the province, thanks to the excellent policy of back to the land that your department advocated; thanks to the assistance extended under various forms, especially by the opening of new roads, direct assistance, special bonus, help in the form of charity, the distribution of seed-grain and grants to ferry boats carrying on a service for the settlers who are located beyond lake Témiscouata."

May I reply to the statement made by the Rev. Mr. Bernier by the statement made by a parish priest of one of these new parishes, that of St. Jean de la Lande, the latter wrote to me on March 1, as follows:

St. Jean de la Lande, March 1, 1933.

Mr. J. F. Pouliot,

Rivière du Loup.

Dear sir,—On behalf of all my parishioners, of St. Jean de la Lande, I am applying to you in order that you may use your good offices to obtain from the Minister of Railways a further increase of 10,000 sleepers of hard-wood in connection with the contract of Mr. Damase Lang, of Lake Baker. You are no doubt aware that we are living here under trying conditions; we have no soft wood, as all lumber required by trade was cut by the Fraser Company or destroyed by forest fires; there only remains hard wood upon which 95 families of settlers must depend for a livelihood; we receive direct assistance but in too small quantity to relieve all these people. Mr. Damase Lang has already been awarded a small contract for sleepers, but this contract was filled in a few days, and if no further increase is awarded to him, the entire population of this township will have to live on thin air, which you will agree, is not very nourishing.

It is still less nourishing than roots, leaves and grass.

Trusting that you may obtain for us this increase in the contract, which would accommodate everybody, believe me, sir,

Yours devoted in J. C.,

Léopold Desbiens, priest,

Parish priest of St. Jean de la Lande.

He forwarded by the same mail a petition addressed to the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) which is as follows:

Petition

To the

Hon. M. Manion, M.P.,

Minister of Railways,

Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,

"We, the undersigned, settlers of St. Jean de la Lande, in the county of Temiscouata, province of Quebec, humbly request the hon. Minister of Railways to award Mr. Damase Lang, of Lake Baker, N.B. a contract:

Whereas St-Jean de la Lande is a new parish;

Whereas the whole settlement depends entirely on direct assistance;

Whereas this contract would be of precious help to us and would afford us work, we beg of you to kindly award said contract to Mr. Lang."

I have not the original copies with me, they are in the possession of the hon. Minister of Railways.

This, however, is not all. I could read dozens, hundreds of similar letters.

The following is a letter from a parish priest of another settlement in the county of Pontiac:

Belcourt, February 27, 1933.

Sir,

Allow me to forward to you this letter in order to interest you somewhat in the hardships with which my humble parish has to bear up. When to clothe ourselves we have to resort to fibre bags, there is no need of stating that the necessities of life are wanting. Nor is it necessary to mention that municipal taxes or church dues are not paid.

The church of Ste-Cécile-de-Courville is actually in a critical stage. Will it become bankrupt? The following is what Mgr. Louis Rhéaume wrote to me: "While awaiting the settlement of the problem, write to the bondholders and inform them that the church wardens have no funds". The liabilities incurred for the construction of the church only amount to $10,000 but the settlers have not a cent. The direct assistance, the work afforded to unemployed provided barely enough to keep them alive, but did not enable them to pay taxes.

Are we to sell the lots in order to collect the taxes and church dues? It does not seem right that people who have cleared the land at great sacrifice should depend on government, federal and provincial.

I therefore appeal to you to help our church, and this on behalf of my worthy and courageous settlers. The smallest subscription would be greatly appreciated. May I place your name on the subscription list?

Kindly accept my heartfelt gratitude and sincere thanks, in anticipation.

Yours very truly,

A. Marion, Priest.

It is when we hear of such appeals, that we regret not being millionaires and able to subscribe generously.

I think I have answered the questions of the hon. Minister of Colonization by producing undeniable evidence of the facts which he can ascertain at any time and which prove that the situation is more critical than it is generally represented to him. I am anxious to see this speech translated in English, on Monday, in order that the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) may read it.

Before closing my remarks, sir, there is a point to which I wish to draw the attention of the house. It is sometimes difficult, owing to friendships or deference for such and such a person, to openly express our views on certain important problems which are submitted to us; however, may I, first, refer to a letter published in "le Soleil" on March 6, by the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau, a missionary agent of colonization, it is as follows:

The member for Témiscouata has just made in the House of Commons—if I am to believe the report published by "l'Evénement"—a statement on the back-to-the-land movement which is, at least, extraordinary. He contends that, in his county, settlers were reduced to eat grass and were lodged like pigs.

Let me remind you, sir, that the parish priest of St-Jean-de-la Lande states that if the Minister of Railways does not come to the rescue of the settlers by awarding a contract for 10,000 sleepers, they will be obliged to exist on thin air.

The Gordon scheme of back-to-the-land was never applied to Témiscouata. On this point, Mr. Pouliot is not well informed.

Mr. Bilodeau is still worse informed than I am, because I have never stated that the Gordon scheme had been applied to the county of Témiscouata. He continues:

The Gordon scheme of back-to-the-land was only applied in 1932 and almost exclusively in Timiskaming and Abitibi. Heretofore those families never felt any hardships, notwithstanding whatever may be the opinion of the member for Témiscouata. Future alone will disclose what will be the success of this back-to-the-land movement; however, for the moment it seems successful.

Future alone will disclose what will be the success of this back to the land movement! Why? Because there is no plan, no system.

That there should be discontent or some complaints among a few settlers, is but natural. No great movement is undertaken without displeasing some one. As a whole, people are satisfied.

The best move which Mr. Bilodeau could make, would be to retire.

I would prefer in this matter to accept the evidence produced by the parish priests of these settlements, and this evidence is far from being as pessimistic.

When so many other eminent clergymen publish letters stating that there is no system followed as regards colonization, should the views of Rev. Mr. Bilodeau, to the contrary, prevail? He prefers, he states, to accept in this matter, the evidence produced by the parish priests of these settlements, and which is far from being as pessimistic.

What must we think of the letter written by the parish priest of St. Jean-de-la-Lands who feels anxious for his people, his flock, who are in distress and cannot see their way out?

I am in no way opposed, states Mr. Bilodeau, to the colonization movement being placed in the hands of the Trappists Friars, Oblate Fathers or the Clercs de Saint-Viateur. However, may I point out to Mr. Pouliot that the little faith he reposes in the secular priests who are connected with this work proves that he has no knowledge whatever of the self-sacrifice and self-denial shown by the secular priests to foster colonization. Ever since the founding of New France, the secular priests were, especially, the agents of colonization. Does Mr. Pouliot contend that these priests were never equal to their task?

No, sir, and all what Mr. Bilodeau writes in le Soliel is disgraceful. I never denied the great service performed in this country by the secular clergy, from the very moment they set foot on this soil. We must also bear in mind the service rendered at the outset of the colony by the Recollet Friars and the Jesuit Fathers a number of whom have just been canonized. Why did the secular clergy render such service to the country? It was because these priests were not civil servants. If, to-day, Mr. Bilodeau insults me so openly it is because he is an employee before being a missionary. And the reason why the members of the secular and regular clergy did so much good, not only in Quebec but throughout Canada and as far as the Mississippi valley, it was because they were especially and above all missionaries, they sought the Kingdom of Heaven before the kingdom of the earth, and the sooner Mr. Bilodeau realizes this fact the better it will be for him.

As a last thought, he states:

I regret, in a general way, that one should attack a beneficial movement approved by the majority of our well-thinking men in order to serve political ends. When one has worked for a number of years in the interest of colonization and that one is aware under what conditions these settlements have always been undertaken, one cannot complain that, within the last two years, the new settlers had to undergo much hardships. However, if we persist in telling the settlers that they are being neglected, we shall greatly increase the protests of the less desirable element among our new recruits.

What I state to be disgraceful, sir, is that they were lodged in a shack—whether it is designated as an hotel, concentration camp or whatever one may call it—it was disgraceful to bring courageous settlers from the cities to these places when there were not even roads leading to these settlements. In his correspondence to le Soleil as well as in a letter addressed to me later, Mr. Bilodeau does not deny that there were no roads leading to these settlements. Moreover, he clearly admits himself that it was unfortunate to send settlers on lots before building roads.

As a last thought, he states:

I regret, in a general way, that one should attack a beneficial movement approved by the majority of our well-thinking men in order to serve political ends.

There is no question here of serving political ends, but it is one of the country's interests, and if sometimes I have to say things that hurt, it is because I have at heart to defend the rights of the people in the house, "Salus populi suprema lex esto."

When one has worked for a number of years in the interest of colonization and one is aware under what conditions these settlements have always been undertaken, one cannot complain that, within the last two years, the new settlers had to undergo much hardships.

From various settlements information has reached us that the settlers were in distress, suffering from hardships, exhaustion, and feeling unhappy, it is because they are exhausted and unhappy that I wish to espouse their cause, to-day. I am certain that public feelings in Quebec and Ontario, as the press has informed us, side with us in this respect.

However, if we persist in telling the settlers that they are being neglected we shall greatly increase the complaints of the less desirable element among our new recruits.

What we ask is system, because it does not exist.

I wrote to the Hon. Mr. Laferté, Minister of Colonization, to draw his attention to certain facts, I sent him by registered mail my speech and I received a letter from Mr. Laforce, Colonization agent, a full three page letter which I have not yet read, but which must be very interesting. I read the first paragraph only. I replied as follows:

In reply to your letter of yesterday, may I state that in no way did I allude to you in the speech I delivered last Thursday on the back to the land movement. I was alluding to a provincial civil servant of whom I had requested the dismissal from the minister.

After Mr. Laforce was apprised that I had requested from the Quebec Minister of Colonization the dismissal of Mr. Bilodeau, I received the following letter from this Mr. Bilodeau:

I was handed the statement which you forwarded to me on my return from a mission trip where I probably had to undergo more hardships than you do in the house, as a member.

We have no hardships here because we work with a light heart, and he himself should have no hardships to undergo, if he travels in those settlements where hotels are so excellent; he should not feel more tired than the people who register at the Chateau Frontenac, Chateau Laurier or the Royal York hotel.

I had read the newspaper reports and was therefore posted. However, I could not believe that you could make such a vile abuse of a private conversation. You intended to abuse of my good faith, which is unworthy of a man in your position.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett) (Translation): The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, if the house will allow me five more minutes, I shall be able to complete my remarks, otherwise, I shall have to continue later.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What has the committee before it at the moment; are we dealing with the original amendment and nothing else?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): The original amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are not discussing the amendment to the amendment; that will not come up until we have disposed of the first amendment?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): If it is the wish of the committee, they might be consolidated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I wish to thank the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) for his questions, which arrived in the nick of time and thus permits me to continue my remarks immediately.

Mr. Billodeau wrote to me on March 14, 1933. I shall continue reading his letter:

I had read the newspaper reports and was therefore posted. However, I could not believe that you could make such a vile abuse of a private conversation. You intended to abuse my good faith which is unworthy of a man in your position.

This is what happened. On a Canadian Pacific train, I saw two cars filled with settlers—men, women and children. I inquired who was in charge of this convoy or trip; I was told that Mr. Bilodeau was in charge. I therefore went to him and asked him simply this question: It is a fact, I said, that there are no roads, at present, connecting with the lots where these people are to settle? His reply was—and I challenge him to deny it: "It is unfortunately too true that there are no roads built, at present, reaching these lots, however, we hope that they will be built next spring." That is word for word the reply of the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau. I never sought to make a vile abuse of it; does it seem unworthy of a man, in whatever position he may be, to protest against such a sad plight. He continues:

However, had you stated the truth; intentionally or not, your statement in the House of Commons, on March 2, is absolutely false.

But, sir, I have given proof to bear out my statement. It is proved by public documents, by the views, publicly expressed, of His Lordship the Bishop of Gaspé, Mgr. Lapointe, of Chicoutimi, and so many eminent and distinguished men; but, not only that, my statement is corroborated by the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau, himself. Further on he continues:

You completely distorted the meaning of the few words which I may have said when I was listening to the speech you were making to me; and you are fully aware that you evaded my explanation by leaving in a hurry after concluding your speech.

After ascertaining, sir, that the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau was bringing over there, into the forest, people from Three Rivers, that he was leading them into the bush where no means of communication existed, the information was sufficient, and from the moment he admitted the fact, I was no further interested in his conversation, there was no need to enter into a controversy with him. He adds:

It is unnecessary to inform you that I shall not resign on your order. And I trust that when you mention my name in the House of Commons, as the evil "Guide" of this group of settlers, you will produce this letter although it is of a confidential nature. I expect you will misinterpret it as you did in connection with the private conversation I had with you.

I do not, sir, take advantage of anybody; I would consider it unworthy to do so, in whatsoever manner, but here we have facts. He wishes me to read his letter: I read it textually. Not only have I read his letter but his article published in the "Soleil."

As the letter of the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau was a picture of the truth, my reply was brief. I sent him a picture of myself. As the one I have in my hand was too large, I had quite a small reproduction made and addressed it to him. I sent him something small so that it would be on a level with him.

Mr. BENNETT: That is Liberalism at its best.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the point of the remark?

Mr. POULIOT: He says it is because it is a good picture.

(Translation): On March 15, Mr. Bilodeau published the following letter:

Two weekly newspapers of Montreal absolutely want the settlers of Abitibi to endure hardships, in support of their contentions; they can always find lazy and discontented settlers to supply them the needed information.

At all events, I contend that they give a wrong impression to the people and by that fact, are doing harm.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I am in a position to state that all the settlers of Abitibi who wished to work this winter suffered no hardships. What is true for this year, is true for previous years.

The story as regards wolves existing in Abitibi is a pure invention. There are as many wolves on the streets of Montreal.

I am aware that such a denial will not prevent the newspapers referred to from carrying on this campaign; however, it will prove that their object is entirely detrimental to public welfare.

From this date, I shall entirely ignore them. One must only discuss with people that are in earnest.

I remain,

Yours respectfully,

(Signed) Geo. Marie Bilodeau, priest,
Missionary agent of colonization,
Parliament Buildings, Quebec.

"Parliament buildings" employee!

Mr. Chairman, when I note that an important commission has been appointed by Mr. Laferté, comprising the Reverend Messrs. Jean Bergeron and G. Bilodeau, and Mr. Mercier, to study the system at present in practice for the distribution of grants to settlers, I wonder how it is possible: I wonder how the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau can possibly judge of the work he has been performing since he fills this official post.

Money is granted to settlers. Colonization will not succeed by means of the mighty dollar, but will prove a success the moment an efficient system is adopted.

The president of l'Union Catholique des Cultivateurs, Mr. Albert Rioux wrote in the Devoir on February 28, 1933, as follows:

To colonize, is to sow. This sowing of people must be, at least, sifted just as much as the seeds are when sown.

No money should be expended to place a settler on the land without first being well acquainted with his past life, his ways, his willingness to work, his spirit of thrift and his readiness to make sacrifices.

The settler's wife must also show her willingness to share his life; she must be like a solid pillar (une bonne "colonne") on which the settler (le "colon") may rest. Often the wife is the first cause of his deserting the land.

Very few of the industrial unemployed display any further disposition for their previous farming occupation.

We must not depend too much on city folks for the back to the land movement to ruralize our province.

And we find in l'Action Catholique of March 11, 1933, under the signature of Pierre Dupont, the following:

In the back to the land movement, we must include the whole problem which pertains to the land, namely:

1. The maintenance of farmers on the land.
2. The settling of farmers' sons on the land.
3. Back to the land of farmers who were once farmers.

4. The settling on the land of those who have been chosen among city unemployed, not including those who were farmers once.

To be methodical, we must proceed in the way we have just pointed out. To act differently would be irrational, would be to put the cart before the horse, or to fill a bottomless cask.

Before concluding my speech, I may say this to the committee. This gentleman said something about sincerity. He wrote me a letter which was a caricature, so that I could answer him only by sending him another caricature. If anyone has been sincere in the matter of colonization it is the member for Témiscouata. I do not know whether hon. members know this, but I was once arrested for libel because I dared to defend my poor fellow citizens of the county of Temiscouata against a man who was compelled by the Prime Minister of Quebec to resign, although he was a Liberal. I have proved my sincerity, because I was not afraid to attack a man of influence when I knew he was doing wrong, and the Prime Minister of that province gave me credit for what I had done by compelling that man to resign. After that I made other charges against him for which he had me arrested for libel. My case was transferred to Rimouski on a change of venue and I had to go there as a criminal and stand before a jury whom I had never seen before. The case was postponed and finally came on before a jury absolutely unknown to me; I had never seen any of them before. I was there in court in Rimouski and the jury, after listening to the evidence, acquitted me of the charge. Subsequently this man who had brought the charge of libel against me stood as a candidate against me in the county of Témiscouata in a by-election and the ex-Minister of Justice came there and expressed satisfaction in the fact that he had nothing to say against me. I was not the official nominee but I defeated this man by 3,500 and had a majority of 1,500 in my home town.

An hon. MEMBER: The ex-Minister of Justice was against you.

Mr. POULIOT: He said nothing against me; he was too gentlemanly for that. I was not the official nominee but I carried the election because I had fought the fight of the people, and I will do the same thing again if anyone does wrong, as was done in this instance. When we hear men who are highly paid by the provincial government saying that there is no suffering among the settlers in the townships we know it is false. These people are too far away to have their complaints heard. I submit that there should be a fair system of colonization. I have the greatest regard for the clergy of Quebec, and I would not say anything offensive to those who are not employed by the government. But when a man is employed by the government he must be treated exactly the same as other government employees, and when I see any wrongdoing I regard it as my bounden duty to protest as strongly as I can against it at any risk, without fear or favour. In this case I say that this man should be dismissed at once, and those who are equally incompetent should be laid aside and replaced by men with experience in colonization work, such as the Oblate Fathers, The Trappist Friars and the Clercs de Saint-Viateur.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to displease my friend the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), with whom I generally agree, however, I cannot allow some of his remarks to pass without protesting. I think I am better acquainted with the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau than he is. We were told a few moments ago that his acquaintance with the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau dated back to when he accidentally met him on board a train. Both Mr. Bilodeau and myself were born a few miles distant from one another, we lived in the same county. I also had the privilege of meeting him often, and I am aware of the work he has accomplished. I therefore deem it my duty, with all due deference and assurance to my hon. friend from Témiscouata, that I do so not to displease him; however, I deem it my duty, I said, to protest against the attacks and innuendoes of the hon. member for Témiscouata against a civil servant who fulfils his duties very well, to the satisfaction of both his civil and ecclesiastical superiors. Mr. Bilodeau has had a long experience in connection with colonization; he knows his work thoroughly. He is very competent and performs his work, I repeat it, to the satisfaction of his superiors both civil and ecclesiastic. Mr. Bilodeau is very intelligent, honest and conscientious, and I have never heard a word said against him in connection with his work.

Mr. DORION (Translation): You heard some criticism this afternoon.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I think that the only crime that my hon. friend from Témiscouata can reproach the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau, is that the latter did not take him seriously—I beg pardon of the hon. member for Témiscouata for using this expression—but, as I stated, the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau, perhaps, did not look upon the charges made by the hon. member for Témiscouata, seriously. Who can blame Mr. Bilodeau? I fear that my hon. friend from Témiscouata was a little too hasty. It is true that he asserted, in a general way, that a number of settlers had been reduced to feed on grass and roots, that in other sections of the province the settlers had been huddled together, men, women and children, in a house. That may be so. My hon. friend might have been more precise. I am quite willing to believe him, but he should have given the names of these settlers and further details. It seems hardly possible—and probably the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau thinks as I do—that in a civilized country like Canada, people are left to feed on grass and roots. I cannot believe it, and the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau is probably of the same opinion as I am, that in a civilized country like Canada men, women and children are huddled together in a house, out in the bush. Again I state it may be so, but I should have liked the hon. member for Témiscouata to give up proofs instead of simply making a general statement. It seems that this is the only crime with which he reproaches the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau. I have no intention to keep up this debate. The Rev. Mr. Bilodeau has no need of any one to take up his cause. He probably does not expect it. He has the feeling and satisfaction of having fulfilled his duty, and I think that this is sufficient; however, I am unwilling as representative of the constituency of Bellechasse, to allow, without an answer, an attack launched in this House against a citizen hailing from that county. Once more I state that the Rev. Mr. Bilodeau has the experience and competence requisite and that he does his work to the best of his abilities and conscience, as the hon. member for Témiscouata himself does.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to reply to my excellent friend the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), for two reasons. First, all that I intended to say, for the present, I stated, and the House is free to weigh the pro and con. Then, I prefer not replying to my excellent friend from Bellechasse because, when I came forward as a candidate in the by-election of 1924, he helped me to carry the county.

Mr. HANBURY: When speaking on this resolution on March 3, the Prime Minister made certain references to me, and I should like to take this opportunity of attempting to justify myself and to clear up the question. The basis of my present observations is a statement by the Prime Minister as reported on page 2671 of Hansard wherein he says in reference to me:

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Mr. Bennett: If he is not ashamed of himself, he should be.

On that occasion, the basis of the remarks of the right hon. gentleman—and I wish he would correct me if I make any misstatement—was copies of correspondence which I was supposed to have exchanged with the late Sir Henry Thornton, then president of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. BENNETT: And Mr. King, a former Minister of Public Works.

Mr. HANBURY: The Prime Minister did not refer to that in his remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: That is part of the correspondence.

Mr. HANBURY: For the purpose of clearing up this question, may I say that as the correspondence has been stolen from my files, naturally I have no access to it. The Prime Minister has not as yet tabled the correspondence and consequently I must depend upon my memory. With reference to the establishment of an executive officer in Vancouver for the Canadian National Railways as referred to on page 2860 of Hansard, I would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that at the time this correspondence took place I was not a member of parliament. Further, at that time the Canadian National Railways had a director in British Columbia, but that director was situated in Prince Rupert which is many hundreds of miles from Vancouver. The Canadian National Railways had no executive officer in Vancouver; the Canadian Pacific Railway had an executive officer and a director there. In the interests of the Canadian National Railways and of the citizens of Vancouver, I made representations to the late Sir Henry Thornton that an executive officer should be established in that city. After some correspondence and after personal interviews with Sir Henry Thornton, such a representative was appointed in the person of Colonel A. T. Hiam. Colonel Hiam's appointment was, as I say, in 1927 or 1928—I am not sure of the date.

Mr. McGIBBON: At $25,000 a year and no job.

Mr. HANBURY: I have no information as to his salary. His appointment was made in 1927 or 1928 before I was a member of this house. If that is the action to which the Prime Minister referred when he suggested that I should be ashamed of myself, I would be prepared to let it stand on that basis because like any citizen of Vancouver or of any other city, for that matter, I was endeavouring to do something for the benefit of my community and I would do so again. The Prime Minister referred to correspondence in this connection having come before the committee. I think it was not the whole correspondence but one letter which the Minister of Railways filed with the committee on national railways and shipping, but the balance of the correspondence to which he has referred, has not to my knowledge ever been filed.

Another matter to which I wish to direct attention appears on page 2672 of Hansard. Again referring to myself, the Prime Minister made this statement:

> A problem the hon. member did as much to assist in making as anyone I know, through the expenditure of public money in respect to the national railways.
> An hon. Member: The Vancouver hotel?
> Mr. Bennett: Yes, and protests were made because a contract was signed for $4,000,000 and it is now $11,000,000.

I wish to explain to the Prime Minister and to the members of the committee that I never at any time had any connection with any contract for the construction of a hotel at Vancouver. Before the fact was made public through the press, I did not have any knowledge that any increase in the contract was contemplated. The only connection I ever had with any discussion of the contract for the construction of the Canadian National hotel was after the defeat of what is known as the "shadow government," when the gentleman who had a contract for the construction of the hotel at that time came to me in connection with it. To the best of my knowledge the information that I gave to him was that unless he could establish before the courts a legal claim, he might as well forget that he had a contract. That is the only information I had at the time. As I say, I was not a member of parliament and I had nothing to do either directly or indirectly with any increase in the cost of construction of the hotel.

If there is anything incorrect, Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I have made it may be explained by the fact that the correspondence has been stolen from my file and I have no access to it. If what I have been stating is not in accordance with the facts, I should be very pleased to have the Prime Minister state the facts as he must know them because he has access to the correspondence. I would prefer that the correspondence be tabled, but if it is not, and the Prime Minister has no further explanation to make, I would suggest that it must then be for the members themselves to make up their own minds whether or not there is anything in the action I have described which would justify the Prime Minister in stating that if I am not ashamed of myself I should be.

Mr. BRADETTE: I just wish to say a few words regarding the back to the land movement. I do not entirely agree with what the hon. member for Témiscouata said a few minutes ago because in my own section of the country there is quite a number of people who have come from the cities and are now working on the land, and the failures among them I find are the exception, and not the majority. I am absolutely in favour of encouraging the back to the land movement, but undoubtedly when you have a large number of people coming into the newer sections and taking up what is to them a new occupation there are bound to be some anomalies and injustices.

I made a point of presenting to the house a few weeks ago some of the matters which I thought should be remedied by either the federal or the provincial government. I state frankly that I find myself under a very serious handicap in answering a question asked of me by the Minister of Labour. He asked me if I realized that the matter about which I was asking was under provincial jurisdiction. But my contention is that as long as the federal government is voting large sums of money for schemes which are to some extent under the jurisdiction of the province, this parliament should have something to say in regard to the policies that are governing such a movement. This applies particularly in the case of the back to the land movement because after all it was inaugurated by the federal government. Back to the land was a slogan that was well received by every section of this country. I believe it was given to the country in the fall session of 1930, and it was well received by the people of Canada because they realized that that policy would help to alleviate the unemployment question so far as the city populations were concerned. I am pleased to be able to say that a real amount of good has been accomplished by that movement. I protested in the fall of 1930 and again in the session of 1931 against the government claiming that it was accomplishing a lot of good in placing on the land a number of people without the expenditure of any public funds. I maintained at that time, and I maintain now, that some money has to be spent to make the scheme a success. We all know the situation in regard to unemployment in the cities, and the same situation applies to a large extent in the rural sections, particularly in the newer settlements in northern Ontario, where there is a large amount of unemployment. We all know what is the primary crop in the timbered area of colonization. It is pulpwood, and for pulpwood we have had no market for the last three years. This winter some of our settlers are getting limited contracts for cutting pulpwood at $2.75 a cord. I know something about farming and lumbering, and I realize that it is absolutely impossible for any man who has been living in Hamilton or Toronto or Ottawa to go back into the rural sections of Ontario and try to make a living cutting pulpwood at $2.75 a cord. That situation has been remedied to a large extent because, as the minister stated the other day there is paid under the back to the land scheme out of the federal, provincial and municipal treasuries the sum of $600 to those going back on the land, and if I understood him aright, that amount is contributed equally by the federal and provincial governments. In my section of the country many of the municipalities are not in a position to vote any money for that purpose, and so it comes back to what I said originally, that the federal government must have and should have at the present moment some voice in the policies controlling the back to the land movement.

Mr. GORDON: May I interject that the contribution is borne equally by the federal government, the provincial government and the municipality concerned.

Mr. BRADETTE: Would that apply to my section of the country and the section from which the Minister of Labour comes, in the unorganized districts where there are no municipalities?

Mr. GORDON: So far as I know there has been no effort made in the unorganized parts of northern Ontario to settle people on the land within those areas. Most of the settlers are there now. The people coming from the urban centres are settling mainly in the older parts of the province, and that applies in the province of Quebec and the other provinces.

Mr. BRADETTE: If my information is correct, in the district of Ferguson, with which the minister is very well acquainted, in the northwestern section of my riding there is quite a number of settlers living in the township of Casgrain, for instance, under the back to the land scheme. There is a certain number of settlers in the township of Stock near the Porcupine district. There is no municipal organization there, and so I gather that any assistance which the federal government gives must be on a fifty-fifty basis with the province, or else that the federal government pays 33⅓ per cent and the province the balance, because, as I say, it is an unorganized district without any municipal councils.

I have a letter in my hand regarding a man who came from Hamilton and is at present residing in Frederickhouse, which is not an organized district; it has no municipal council, and there is no possibility of the settlers there receiving any help from the municipality. I know that is only a matter of detail because I realize that the settlers who go on the land under the back to the land scheme receive the sum of $600, and if I understood the minister aright, $500 of that is paid the first year, $100 being reserved for the second year in case of emergency.

Only a few weeks ago I stated in this house that the government should have a better follow-up of these settlers. There should be a way of keeping in close contact with them because a back to the land policy may mean a lot to the people of this country not only at the present time but in the years to come. So I believe that there should be a better follow-up system. While this parliament may say that that is not within the federal jurisdiction, I maintain that the responsibility originally rests with this administration. Only a few days ago I received a letter from a very respected citizen in my section of the country to the effect that these new settlers are limited to receiving the sum of $10 a month, that no matter how large a family a man might have, and how many dependents, he receives no more than that sum under the back to the land scheme. More than that, the relief commission deducts any amount of which the family is in receipt. I have a letter in my hand from a man who comes from the city of Hamilton, a very good citizen, whom I had the pleasure of meeting on his holding last fall. He has the stuff in him to make a good farmer. After being out of work in Hamilton for two years, he came to our section of the country and settled in Frederickhouse. He was primarily a farmer; that had been his occupation. He was told when he went there that he would receive the sum of $10 a month. The house will understand it is absolutely impossible to provide food, clothing or even shelter for a family of ten on the small sum of $10 a month. I should add that after a protest had been made the first amount had been increased to $15 a month. That however was not sufficient, and not even maintained. Two months ago he was cut down to $10, the relief commissioner giving him the right to work two days a month at $2 a day, bringing his total receipts up to $14 a month.

The committee will fully realize that it is absolutely impossible for a family of ten to keep body and soul together on that small amount of money. I am not a sob sister, by a long shot, and it is not pleasant for me to bring these matters before the house. However, I know the spirit in which they are given and will be received by the Minister of Labour and the committee. I know a tremendous amount of good is being accomplished through the back to the land movement. Some hon. members may object to the fact that I have availed myself of the opportunity to bring to their attention individual cases. I am convinced however that this is the place to speak concerning these matters, because it should remain within our jurisdiction to remedy the difficulties. The man to whom I have referred wants to play the game with the authorities, and also wants to play the game with his family and the country. However on the sum of $14 a month he is finding it impossible to continue. That is absolutely all he can get to-day. He has been told by the relief commissioner to go ahead and do some work for his neighbour, so that there may be an interchange of labour for food, vegetables and so on. But that man came under the back to the land movement only last fall. He has no garden, and his neighbour cannot give him work, because most of the settlers in northern Ontario are on direct relief. I am not trying to paint a picture worse than it is; I am stating facts, and I feel it my bounden duty to bring them to the attention of the house. I feel at least I should present them, because I am convinced the minister will do everything within his power to remedy the difficulties.

Probably there could be no objection if I were to read part of a letter written by the man in question. If the minister would like to know, I should be quite happy to give the name of the writer. He is a good citizen, originally from Hamilton, and now trying in our section of the country to make a living. However he finds the going very hard, because the amount of money he receives each month is altogether too small. In part his letter is as follows:

> Now, it does not take a mathematician to figure it out that a family of ten cannot live on $14 per month which is $1.40 per person each month. I wonder how some of those who are governing the relief question would like to live on $1.40 for a month, and I have no garden to help out either.
> I cannot get enough milk or butter for the children. If I order enough of that I am away short of other commodities. My children were the picture of health when they left the city. Shortly after arrival here I had a pair of twins taken sick with double penumonia and they nearly died. The whole family have lost considerable weight. My wife has been in ill health on account of worry. I can't give them enough to eat and I can't send them to school as they have not sufficient clothing. What kind of a future generation does our government expect to have when they are undernourished during their childhood.

I read the letter so that the committee may realize the gravity of the circumstances. I would not go the limit to which the hon. member for Témiscouata went, so far as the back to the land movement is concerned, because, after studying the situation thoroughly I am positive, that in new centres the government is trying to play the game. However there are some cases in which we find evidence of misery. Really good Canadians are trying to gain a living against great odds. I believe it is not the intention of the government to allow those people to starve, but that it intends to give them the necessities of life. They want comforts, not luxuries, and ask merely for a chance to get along under their new occupations and surroundings.

I hope the committee will forgive me for speaking at such length, but I know hon. members will realize that these individual cases are of great and personal importance. Such cases may be the source of protests of which there would be no end. If the difficulty is met as soon as possible it may be possible to save criticism, and to save prejudice against the government. The back to the land movement means much to Canada as a whole. We have noticed that for the last fifteen years people from rural centres have been going to the larger centres of population. But, under present circumstances, owing to the fact that men cannot find useful employment in the cities, they are attempting to find ways and means of earning a livelihood away from the cities where they have lived for the last few years. Knowing the Minister of Labour, I feel that these matters will be attended to.

I know the movement has been well conducted in my section of the country, and that they have been given road and school accommodation. However that is not sufficient. There should be an inspector to see how those settlers are getting along, and to find individual cases of misery. There should be grading of the amounts of money paid by the government. Surely a family of ten on a holding, with no opportunity to grow a crop will require more help from the government than a single man or a family of only three or four. That is why I say that a follow-up process should be adopted whereby individual cases may have special consideration.

I have in mind a settlement of families from East York, in the southern section of the province of Ontario who moved to the third concession of the township of Stock. Those people have complained that after doing lumbering and logging work they had to wait two and a half months for their pay. Anyone knows that those people who have left the city to get other employment have little or no money, and it is impossible for them to wait two and a half months for it. These are some of the anomalies to which I wish to direct the attention of the minister.

Again, I believe I am quite in order when I say I believe the back to the land scheme will go to the root of the matter, and at least to some extent will help to relieve the unemployment situation.

Mr. NEILL: I presume the matter of unemployment insurance is sufficiently near that which we are now discussing to allow me to make a few remarks concerning it. Certainly unemployment insurance has a bearing on the matter, although perhaps in an indirect way, because if carried out it would relieve the demand of unemployment relief in this or in future years.

On April 29, 1931, the Prime Minister made two definite statements, one to the effect that before he left office he would bring down legislation along these lines. Then on behalf of the administration he made another definite statement, that at the earliest possible moment consistent with obtaining the necessary information they would prepare and submit to the house a measure embodying the views which he then expressed. Then, on November 22, 1932, he said he rose to reiterate and restate the statements I have just mentioned. He went a little farther than that, and wound up by saying:

> I cannot promise that the legislation I mentioned in my speech of April 29, 1931, will be forthcoming, but I can promise it will be no fault of ours if we do not meet with the provinces between now and January 30, next, and at least arrive at some conclusion with respect to those controversial matters which must be settled before any appropriate action can be taken by this parliament.

The conference of course was held, and as far as I know no formal report was made of its proceedings. Rumours leaked out into the press, but we know they are not always accurate. On the 17th of February, on the orders of the day, I asked the right hon. Prime Minister if he was prepared to make a statement, in view of what I have already stated, in connection with the conference, and he replied that it was idle for me to ask without notice for a statement on a matter of that kind. I assumed, apparently wrongly, that he would make some such statement later on. Finding none was forthcoming I did the only thing I could, I put it in the form of a definite question, which, of course, was limited in its scope, and asked:

> Will the government be in a position at this session to bring down legislation dealing with unemployment insurance as referred to by the right hon., the premier, in debate in this house on November 22nd last?

To which the right hon. Prime Minister made the cryptic reply, "No." That of course, was very definite, but I submit that we ought to have a statement from him as to what prospect he can hold out, and this I think would be a proper time to have it. If there was disagreement at the conference I think we are entitled to know, if some disagreed and others were favourable we and the country would like to know, it would be in line with the promises he made in November last if he would give us some general but definite statement, and I trust that before this debate ends he will do so.

As regards the general relief question I have very little to say. I had not intended to deal with it at all, except for one or two particular points that I want to bring up. After years of experience I regard it as absolutely hopeless to discuss this matter in the house with any expectation of definite results, the minister either cannot or will not appreciate the situation as it is revealed to him by the members from British Columbia; he replies either with courteous evasions or more or less pious truisms which while very nice are far from meeting the situation. When we find a minister of the crown who will stand up in this house as my hon. friend did on February 24, and say that it is a matter for congratulation to this country that the expenditure for relief has gone down from some $46,000,000 to $25,000,000, although in the same breath he admitted that the number of people on unemployment relief had increased, it is hopeless to argue. His remark was heralded throughout Canada with large headlines in many newspapers to the effect that the Minister of Labour saw the upturn of unemployment conditions, the statement being based on the fact that he had been able to reduce the outlay on relief, although the numbers receiving it had greatly increased, as we all know, and as he himself admitted. But he took pride in congratulating the people of Canada on that reduction as indicative of improved conditions, although of course it merely indicated that the people received less per capita. With such a point of view it is hopeless, it is a waste of time, to discuss the matter further.

I want to contradict one statement. I would not do it if he had not reiterated it last Friday. I do not need to quote his whole statement, he was replying to an interrogation by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), and he laid down the conditions on which this government deals with the provinces. I will only quote this sentence:

> No limit has ever been set by this government to the amount of relief which shall be granted to any applicant, this being constitutionally a matter wholly within the determination and judgment of the local authorities.

Then he goes on to amplify it. On the same occasion I asked him if he was not aware that when the municipalities apply to the provincial authority in British Columbia the invariable answer is: We cannot help you to any greater extent because the dominion will not contribute their share of any larger rate. If he really believes that the words of his which I have quoted represent the policy that he and the government have been following, then he is in some kind of mirage or dreamland, from which there will be a rude awakening some day. He must be like the kaiser who within forty-eight hours of his abdication was firmly convinced that his forces were sweeping on to ultimate victory. He is either deceiving himself or being deceived.

I can speak only of my own province, but let me tell him this, that British Columbia to-day is aflame against this government; that applies not only to the government, British Columbia politically sympathetic to this government as it is, and has every reason to be, but to the council of municipalities, representing a very large body, and also the ordinary common people. On the 11th of March the council of municipalities waited on the provincial government, they were alarmed at what they had heard were going to be reductions made in relief, and they wanted to know where they were going to get off; and the province told them they were unable to announce what changes had been ordered—note that word—"ordered"—from Ottawa. That was the provincial government's language. They said it had been given to them confidentially, and they were not in a position to tell what changes had been ordered from Ottawa; they were bound to secrecy. But it was unofficially learned that a recent federal ruling as to the administration of relief would materially affect the situation and probably take 2,500 men from dominion assistance and put them on the province, which would, of course, be a disastrous thing for the province. Then we find Vancouver city sending a resolution of protest to the Dominion government at the suggestion of the provincial finance minister, not going over his head, not complaining of him, but doing it at his suggestion. Then we find the council of municipalities contemplating making arrangements to send a delegation down here, aided by the provincial government, to try to straighten this thing out and see if they can get what they claim they are entitled to, and which they say is withheld due to the action of the Dominion government in refusing to grant them more than certain sums. That looks like a flat contradiction of the statement of the minister which implied very plainly, that the province could within reasonable bounds give any relief they liked and the jurisdiction and duty and practice of the dominion was to pay one-third. I say these statements that I have read, which are repeated in almost every paper in British Columbia, are indicative of a situation very different. If it is not so, why are they proposing to send a delegation, a joint delegation of the municipalities and the provincial government, down here?

Before I sit down I want to deal for a moment with the situation outlined by the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) who preceded me. He was dealing with the question of farm relief in unorganized territory. As the minister knows, the arrangement was that $600 should be granted to a settler, that amount being deemed to be the minimum necessary; if a less sum would have sufficed we assume it would have been agreed on. Therefore we assume that to give a man an ordinary chance to make good on these lands $600 has to be forthcoming. It was arranged that the provision of this amount should be divided between the dominion, the province and the municipality, $200 each. As time went on, the hon. member who preceded me indicated that it was necessary, or advisable at any rate, to put some people on the land who were not living in cities and therefore did not have any city to back them up to the extent of $200. I find on inquiry that the arrangement is that the dominion will not grant more than the original $200, and the rest will have to be provided by some person or persons unknown. The province cannot provide more than $200 for the reason that they are very hard up. I have a letter in my hand from a settler, quoting a letter received from the British Columbia government relief land settlement committee. They say that while they have made a bargain with the dominion as regards the unorganized district settlers, they say that they regret very much that they have no funds to carry it on. Where they have no funds to carry it on we may be quite sure that any money that they do have or can get will be devoted to helping those out of the city where they will have to pay only $200 instead of those from the unorganized districts, where they would have to pay $400.

I have two questions I would like to put to the minister if I could get his attention. Apparently that is a courtesy not always displayed to this side of the house. Under direct relief the dominion pays one-third, the province one-third and the municipality one-third; in the case of relief granted in unorganized districts, the dominion pays one-half and the province one-half. There is no contribution from a municipality because there is no municipality. Would it not be fair and reasonable for the dominion to adopt the same system in connection with the land settlement scheme? That is, where a man was getting relief in an unorganized district, the dominion would pay one-half and the province one-half. This seems to me to be a reasonable argument to advance, and there is already a precedent.

Secondly, it is well known that where a city finds itself unable to handle the relief situation, it gets assistance in the way of a loan from the province and where a province falls down, it in turn gets a loan from the dominion. In the case of British Columbia, the Dominion government has not only paid its share but sometimes it has loaned to British Columbia the amount of the provincial government's share. I should like to know if the minister would be willing to extend this same system to the land relief scheme. If a province has no money, then the scheme is useless and I should like to know if the minister would be willing to lend to British Columbia the provincial government's share of the $600 in order that they may function? If the minister can advise me on these two points, I would be much obliged.

Mr. GORDON: I will have some observations to make later on in the debate.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, the committee does not need to be told that the unemployment situation in this dominion is getting exceedingly critical. On Friday last the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) asked a question of the minister on behalf of all the members from Vancouver. The situation in that city is exceedingly grave. I understand that on the fifteenth of this month a delegation of apartment house and rooming house landlords interviewed the city council and pointed out that unless certain rents were paid, nine hundred tenants with their families would be evicted. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), the city finds itself in this difficulty: when they take the matter up with the provincial government they are informed that that government is paying all they are allowed to pay by the Dominion government and when they take the matter up with the Dominion government, they are told to take the matter up with the provincial government. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre was prevented from reading a telegram which he had received from the mayor of the city of Vancouver on Friday last, but if it is in order I would like to read a similar telegram which I received. It reads:

> Critical condition exists in Vancouver due to inadequacy of relief scale as allowed by provincial government to meet shelter. Wholesale evictions involving hundreds of families under way resulting in increasing threatening condition. Repeated representations to provincial government unavailing as it states Ottawa refuses to increase British Columbia quota. Direct communications to Ottawa from the city always answered that issue should be taken up through provincial government. Vancouver already bearing staggering relief costs. City council recognizing that their continued efforts to stave off crisis will in the immediate future be unavailing calls upon you as Vancouver's representative to immediately bring this need for action to the attention of the proper authorities and asks that irregardless of party lines you cooperate in any move initiated to relieve the present emergent situation by supplementary government aid and in formulating a future scale of assistance that will prevent its recurrence. Full particulars already in possession of Premier Bennett and Hon. H. H. Stevens.

The minister will realize that this telegram outlines a very grave situation but it refers only to a small proportion of the 7,000 families who are on direct relief. The situation of those living in rooming or apartment houses is somewhat different from that of those living in houses. In the one case they can be evicted simply by the landlord locking the door, in the other, a court order is necessary. I understand that the allowance for rent, fuel and clothing is $5 per month for a family of two with an extra dollar per month for each child up to three. The landlords are demanding that $10 per month be paid for a family of two with a dollar for each child, and up to the present time the city has been paying the extra $5. I would like to ask the minister if the Dominion government would be willing to pay one-third of the difference between what the governments are now paying and the city is having to pay, that is, one-third of the additional $5? If that were done it would relieve this phase of the situation. But it will not relieve the whole unemployment situation; something permanent and adequate will have to be done very quickly, otherwise there will be trouble in the city of Vancouver.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to cover ground which has been gone over again and again in connection with this unemployment situation. However, I desire to say that I regret that this amendment has been introduced. It may theoretically be a good thing for a government to bring its plans before the house and that there should be a limit to the authority placed in its hands, but we must remember that we are facing a very serious situation. I regret that the government has seen fit to vote only a sum of $20,000,000 for this purpose. We have been told that although unemployment has materially increased during the past year, the grants for unemployment have decreased. I do not think that that can be considered as a satisfactory state of affairs. It may be possible that there have been savings in administration; so far so good, but I am afraid that in many cases the saving has been accomplished by cutting down the amounts given to unemployed families.

An hon. MEMBER: By whom?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not very much concerned as to who did it, I am concerned primarily in the results. The trouble is that under existing arrangements, this problem is footballed back and forth between the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion. It is very easy to get tangled up on the question where precisely responsibility lies.

Mr. ARTHURS: There is no question of primary jurisdiction.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member says that there is no question of primary jurisdiction. The primary jurisdiction is with the dominion government; there is no doubt about that, and that was frankly acknowledged by the Prime Minister himself before the election.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh yes. He said that under a national emergency this responsibility belonged to the dominion, and he is now receding from that position and adopting the position taken formerly by the official leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: An emergency can exist only if it is national, under our institutions; and at least two of the provinces say that they will not permit us to take over the administration of what is their business.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If a matter becomes a national emergency I submit that two provinces cannot take responsibility away from the dominion for acting under that emergency. If there were an earthquake in Vancouver that would be a national emergency and the dominion government would come to the relief. Now, there is a national emergency in my province, to my knowledge, and so there is in British Columbia. There is not the slightest doubt about that. We who come here are sometimes accused of being alarmists, but if this situation continues we shall before very long have most serious conditions in the west. The last issue of the Winnipeg Free Press just to hand points that out in very definite and unmistakable language. Under the circumstances therefore I cannot accept what the Prime Minister says, that because one or two provinces do not want to have any interference in their internal affairs, the emergency ceases to be national. It is a national emergency and the dominion must take the responsibility for it. So far as the west is concerned, we all know that a very large number of municipalities are either bankrupt or on the verge of bankruptcy, having had to be assisted again and again. They are cutting down services in every direction and the financial situation is anything but satisfactory in the four western provinces. They cannot begin to cope with the unemployment situation that exists. Under these circumstances it is not primarily a question as to where theoretically the responsibility lies. Sooner or later this government will have to assume the responsibility and it would be well advised to assume it before a financial collapse forces definite action.

I regret, in view of these facts, that the house should limit the government. If this is a national emergency—and I think it is much more so than it was two or three years ago—I do not think that the amount of relief which is to be handed out should be limited as we propose to do at the present time. The sum of $20,000,000 is stated. We were told a few weeke ago by the Minister of Labour that there were over 1,300,000 unemployed men with their wives and dependents receiving unemployment relief.

Mr. GORDON: Every time the hon. member comes around to this figure of 1,300,000 odd he has to be corrected. I corrected him on a former occasion when he made this statement and I now correct him again. The figure I gave of 1,300,000 odd refers to men, women and children on relief for varying periods.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so; I do not think my statement was incorrect.

Mr. ARTHURS: You said unemployed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said 1,300,000 unemployed men with their wives and families were receiving unemployment relief.

Mr. MORAND: At some time during the year.

Mr. ARTHURS: You said 1,300,000 unemployed men with their wives.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With their wives and children.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. member should have said "including."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will accept the word "including."

Mr. GORDON: Why make it worse than it is?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no intention of making it worse than it is. It is bad enough as it is, but the fact is that there are 1,357,000 people—that is the right figure I am told—in receipt of unemployment relief. Is that correct? Now, $20,000,000 means only a very few dollars in the course of the whole year, for each of these people, and even supposing the provinces were able to contribute one-third, which they are not able to do, and the municipalities one-third, which they too cannot do, that would be only $60,000,000 to take care of one million and a third of people for the whole year. The whole thing is preposterous; people cannot live on that low scale.

Mr. ARTHURS: They do not require unemployment relief for the whole year.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member says they do not require unemployment relief for the whole year. I submit that they are altogether likely to require relief for the great part of this coming year.

Mr. ARTHURS: Great part is different.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For the greater part of this coming year they will require relief, because unemployment shows a steady increase, and there is nothing whatever on the horizon to suggest that there is going to be any letup. In fact, if you look at that aspect of the matter there is everything to suggest that conditions may be worse in the next twelve months than they have been during the past year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, no one has so far pointed out where they will improve.

Mr. McGIBBON: They are improving in Winnipeg; look at the car loadings this week.

[Mr. Arthurs.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The car loadings do not indicate that there is much improvement for the unemployed people in Winnipeg at the present time.

Mr. McGIBBON: It means something, the hon. member will admit.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My point is that $20,000,000 is altogether inadequate to take care of the situation that faces us to-day, and I think the house would be well advised not to press upon the government a limitation of this kind.

An hon. MEMBER: We have never done so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand that there was pressure from the Liberal party that some limitation should be placed.

Mr. HANBURY: Just a stated amount.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, that means that some limitation should be placed on what should be spent. Theoretically that is perhaps desirable, but certainly it is not desirable to limit it to a comparatively small amount like $20,000,000, which might be taken by the government as the maximum that could be spent. I do think we face a very serious national emergency, and even at this late period we should take some very definite steps to make a survey of the whole situation with a view of dealing with it in a more adequate way than we have done in the past two or three years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the limitation which the government is placing upon the amount to be spent for direct relief is a limitation that applies only to direct relief. The government does not place upon itself any restriction with respect to what it may do under the provisions of this legislation in other ways so far as grappling with unemployment is concerned. The statement made by the minister, that the government was intending to restrict unemployment relief to $20,000,000, has created a wrong impression throughout the country. It has created the impression that the government believes the situation is getting better and that, therefore, it is justified in limiting the total amount for unemployment relief, whereas all that the government is doing is limiting the outlay to $20,000,000 with respect to direct relief, in other words, the dole. So far as other forms of relief are concerned such, for example, as providing or assisting in providing work, the ministry has under this legislation unlimited powers.

May I point this out to my hon. friend. We, on this side, are not limiting the government, as he suggests, nor could we limit the government. We are agreeing to give them what they ask. The government can ask whatever amount it thinks necessary to meet the situation in any particular and all that is expected of it is to give substantial reasons to parliament therefor. It is not the duty of those who are not members of the government to say how much money is needed; it is the duty of the government to inform the House of Commons in that regard. Our responsibility lies in voting or refusing to vote what the government asks us to vote, but it is the government's responsibility to name the amount which it thinks is required. If the government is of the opinion that $20,000,000 is not sufficient for the purposes of the dole for next year and desires to ask for $40,000,000 or $100,000,000, they are at full liberty to ask for those amounts, it is then for those of us on this side of the house to consider whether we shall agree to support giving that amount. As I have all along said, if the government will indicate whatever sum it regards as necessary, so long as parliamentary control is maintained over a definite amount, we on this side will be prepared in existing circumstances to vote whatever amount is named if a substantial reason is given therefor. That was made quite clear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I say with regard to the observations of the leader of the opposition that there is a definite amendment before us and that we must assume our responsibility in voting for or against it. If we vote in favour of it, we are taking the responsibility of limiting the amount. Under these conditions the only thing some of us can do is oppose the limitation involved in this amendment.

In regard to the other point, the government has brought forward no scheme for any works of any kind or any other means of relieving unemployment than by the dole. The hon. member for Southeast Grey suggests the sending of men to the farms. That would take care of only a few thousands at the best. Since there is no other scheme, we must for the moment take it for granted that this $20,000,000 will be the maximum or almost the maximum spent on relief.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not agree with my hon. friend in his statement that, because the government in this measure says that it wants the dole limited to $20,000,000, we are in any way restricting the government. The government may, as my hon. friend knows, come along with a supplementary estimate before the session is over and ask for a further amount. Therefore, by what we may do in this particular measure, we do not necessarily restrict the government. It has a free hand as long as parliament is in session. It has in addition under the provisions of this bill a blank cheque for relieving unemployment in other ways than by the dole.

It is important that, in everything the government asks for, it should give to the house the reasons for the amounts it requests. It must assume responsibility if it suggests too large or too small an amount; it cannot get rid of its responsibility any more than we can of ours in agreeing or not agreeing to support it. If I support the amendment, I am not supporting it with a view to restricting the amount of relief that should be given; I am supporting it because it is what the government requests for a definite purpose; it offers a certain control by parliament and is in accordance with the responsibility on the part of the ministry which should be exercised in this manner in connection with every appropriation of this House of Commons. That is fundamental.

May I say a further word in reference to what the Prime Minister said in interrupting or in speaking at the same time as my hon. friend. He states that, so far as the provinces were concerned, they would not allow us to interfere with their administration. Personally, I think what is said in this way is all beside the mark. Certainly the provinces are not going to allow us to interfere with the administration of their own business, but, if they want to secure the assistance of this parliament, they must be prepared to permit this parliament to do as it pleases with the money it votes. No province, if it is going to get federal money, can for a moment decline to accept the conditions which the federal parliament may wish to impose in connection with the grant.

May I say I agree wholly with the view, and it has been stated over and over again, that, with respect to present conditions we are in a state of emergency, a national emergency. The unemployment problem is a national emergency to-day. It has become the duty of the federal government to deal with that problem before all others. The federal government ought to face the problem of depression and emergency so far as it relates to unemployment in exactly the same way in which it would face war and war conditions. It should organize with the assistance of the provinces and the municipalities the whole distribution of relief on a nation-wide scale under national direction. That, as was advocated from this side, should have been done at the very outset. It was not done in the first year nor in the second, and now in the third and getting on to the fourth, it is more necessary than ever that this should be done. It is the only way in which the problem can be met. The Dominion government should say: We are taking this problem as a national one; we intend to deal with it as a national emergency; we shall organize the country from coast to coast under a commission which will have direction of the moneys voted by parliament, and we shall ask parliament for what we need in order to meet the situation. It will not now suffice any longer to fall back on what comes within the jurisdiction of a municipality or a province. On this side we have always taken the view that when the municipalities and the provinces found that they could not deal with the situation, it then became a national one. It is all very well for the provinces to say that they wish to keep control over their own particular affairs so far as they have the right so to do, but it is an entirely different thing, to say that the provinces would not welcome with all their hearts a great national scheme which would be one of cooperation with them and the municipalities in dealing with this great problem.

Mr. MacINNIS: Speaking in connection with the amendment to the resolution, I may say that our objection to it is that it limits the expenditure of money in only one particular. The resolution itself and the bill that will be founded on it are extremely wide. They do not limit the government in the expenditure of money in any other direction than in that of direct relief. In view of the fact that the policy of the government is increasingly one of taking care of unemployment through direct relief, we do not see why they should be restricted in the amount to be spent in that particular direction. It is discrimination against those who are on direct relief.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I find myself in substantial agreement with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South. The policy of the government since the special session of 1930 has been one of direct relief, and that alone. Now we find in this bill a limitation of $20,000,000 on the amount to be spent on direct relief. If the government continues its present policy, that will be practically a total limitation of $20,000,000 on all government expenditures, except as regards demands made by provinces. So this house is considering an amendment that under the present policy of the government limits the expenditures to a total of $20,000,000.

I wish to identify myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Vancouver South in regard to the emergent situation in British Columbia and greater Vancouver. There is no question that the Prime Minister in 1930 in all his election promises and speeches told the Canadian people that he would deal with the unemployment situation as a national problem on a national basis. Further, I find when we met here in the special session of 1930 and when we were considering the appropriation of $20,000,000 for the relief of unemployment, the Prime Minister speaking in the house used these words:

> We are asking this parliament by the measure now before it first of all to recognize the situation as one of a national character and secondly to agree to the appropriation of the sum of $20,000,000 to be applied (a) in useful works and undertakings authorized by this central government; (b) in assisting useful works and undertakings of municipalities and provinces; and (c) to assist such municipalities and provinces in granting relief where relief may be necessary or where employment may not be possible.

So that the idea which permeated every promise and pledge made by the right hon. gentleman in the election of 1930 was based on dealing with the unemployment situation on a national basis. I am making this suggestion this afternoon: If the problem in September, 1930, with 117,000 unemployed should, in the words of the Prime Minister speaking in the house, be recognized and considered as a national emergency, how much more should the problem to-day, with practically 800,000 people unemployed, with 1,357,562 receiving relief, with 252,000 heads of families receiving direct relief, be regarded as a national one. Surely this is the time when the problem must be considered on a national basis. I am just warning the administration, not in any critical way, that if conditions in Vancouver continue to progress as they are at the present time, they are going to be very grave. We have received representations from organized municipalities of British Columbia, from city councils of that province, and they are practically approaching a condition of despair in regard to the situation. They tried to approach the federal government through their members in this house, but according to the rules, we were adjudged out of order. They approached their provincial government.

The provincial government informs me that the blame lies with this administration. They approach my hon. friend the Minister of Labour and he informs them that they must first of all come through the government of British Columbia before they can obtain redress. There can be only one consequence and one result of a policy such as that of refusing to accept final, ultimate and direct responsibility. It will be a policy of chaos and, I am afraid, of riot in our cities if we do not meet the situation in a constructive and non-partisan way. I appeal to the Minister of Labour himself—I know that his sympathies are with this problem—to confront the unemployment situation in a national way, not in this picayune way of raising technicalities and subtleties and saying that application must be made through the provincial government before the minister can deal with it, and the provincial government saying, "We cannot raise the scale of relief without federal sanction." I heard my hon. friend the Minister of Labour make the statement to the assembled members of this house that no unemployed man during the present winter would go without food, without clothing or without shelter. But what is the situation? In my own city of Vancouver there is a threat of nine hundred people being thrown out upon the streets to-day, with their families, without shelter. Why? Because a substantial degree of concurrence has not been obtained with regard to an adequate system of direct relief to be allocated for shelter purposes.

Mr. GORDON: But they have not been put on the streets yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And I trust they never will be. Let us do all within our power to prevent such a thing happening. But my submission is this, that the threat was made in the city of Vancouver only last Wednesday that unless an additional scale of relief for shelter purposes is provided to take care of these unfortunate people who are unemployed through no fault of their own, they will be evicted and will be without any shelter in the city of Vancouver to-night. In view of the pledge given by the Minister of Labour himself so recently to the members of this house, and considering the emergent conditions that prevail in many of our Canadian cities, surely the time has arrived for the government of the day, in a large national and constructive way, to envision and comprehend this entire problem as a nation-wide problem, a Canadian problem, in its very essence, and as far as I personally am concerned, if the government deals with it as a national problem I shall be only too glad to render any assistance I can. It is a national problem, Mr. Chairman, because our municipalities are practically all bankrupt. They are out of resources, and I am afraid that the policies of the administration during the last few years have very largely been driving them to that condition because they have been compelled to live beyond their resources to face the present emergent situation. So I am appealing to the Minister of Labour, particularly in view of the very grave conditions that exist in the province of British Columbia and all through the Canadian west, both in the industrial centres and on many of the farms in western Canada, to deal with this question in a national way, not in any piecemeal fashion, providing one scale of relief here and another there, not with the present lack of coordination and uniformity throughout the dominion; but let us have a large national constructive scheme with federal control and direction of the unemployment situation, and then with cooperation between all parties in this house who want to see real remedies applied and real relief obtained, I believe that we shall be able to do something to meet the unemployment situation in this dominion.

Mr. HEENAN: I am afraid that the minister has not calculated very closely the amount that he will require for the present year. If I have his figures correctly he says that there are 1,357,562 people on direct relief in this country at various periods, and that this represents 252,000 families. I am sure, in view of the fact that the railway bill has been given its second reading, it will not be long —this is its intention, and if not, it is not of any use at all—before thousands of railway men and their families will also be on direct relief. So I do not see any way in which the minister is going to reduce the present number of unemployed.

If you take that figure of 1,357,000 people on direct relief, and divide it into $20,000,000, it amounts to only about 4½ cents per head per day, and if you take the 252,000 families and divide that into $20,000,000 it amounts only to about $77 per head per year, or a little over $6 per head per month. I am quite certain that the minister has not given this matter his full consideration or he would have asked for a far greater amount than $20,000,000. That is the only complaint I have to make at the present time. I am sure that $20,000,000 will not nearly meet the situation, if we are going to do what the minister says he intends to do; that is, provide food and clothing and shelter for every person in this country who needs it.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall not detain the committee very long, but I wish to come back to the suggestion I have already made to the minister regarding a classification of the unemployed. Would it not be possible for the minister, with the assistance of Mr. Hereford and others of his staff, in association with the provincial heads of labour, to arrive at a certain classification of the unemployed. It is impossible to cure an evil until you know its extent, and the same is true of meeting the unemployment situation. Just as during the war some soldiers were wounded, others shell-shocked and others gassed, and different treatment applied to each class of cases, so unemployment can be properly cured only if the appropriate treatment is applied to each different class of case. Such a classification could be made by the service organizations like the Salvation Army, the Red Cross and the St. Vincent de Paul society, better I think than by any other means. I offer that suggestion once more in all earnestness to the minister, in the hope that it will be duly considered and that the department will be able to do something in that connection.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just want to say a few words before this clause carries. The question of shelter for the unemployed is going to be a very important one. Indeed I believe it will be a critical problem in the very near future. The owners of property—and there is some merit in their contention—claim that owing to circumstances over which they have no control they are being compelled to provide shelter for the unemployed while at the same time they are being pressed for the necessary carrying charges on their houses, interest and taxation, and it is only a matter of time before they themselves will be in the same position as the men and women who are now out of work and in need of relief. It will be agreed that unless they derive some revenue from their properties they cannot meet the taxes, interest, and provide for reasonable depreciation. In the city from which I come I understand that in the very near future a drive is going to be made by owners of property for compensation for housing the unemployed who are paying them no rent because they are in the unfortunate position of not being able to do so. I understand that it is the intention of the owners to put into operation eviction orders on a wholesale scale. I agree with what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has said. I believe that this bill in itself is an evidence of the bankruptcy of the government in its efforts to meet the unemployment situation as it exists in this country to-day. Make no mistake about it; this kind of legislation cannot go on forever, otherwise you would wind up with nothing on either side of the ledger. Some day some government in this country has to meet the unemployment problem in a constructive way. We cannot wait until the world situation clears up. There is some suggestion that the coming world economic conference is going to bring about the return to more normal times, but the happenings in Europe during the last few weeks should have been sufficient to dispel any idea of that character. I believe we have to meet the difficulty in a national way. I have no objection to giving power to the government in this connection so long as the end in view is that of putting men and women to work. Under this legislation the government will have power to go to the rescue of banks and other corporations finding themselves in difficulties. There is no use putting the water into the cistern; we have to give it to the people to drink. We have to give them the work necessary for them to earn a living, and break down that division between production and consumption. We have to give men and women in agriculture and industry an opportunity to go to work and earn so as to obtain the necessities of daily life.

I believe the government should attack the problem from two angles, namely that of currency and mass production. If we wait until general world conditions right themselves we will have to wait too long; we cannot wait months or perhaps years for the present situation to rectify itself. In the city from which I come there are 35,000 people on relief. That, in itself, is a big problem, and the municipal authorities are at their wits' end to know what to do to meet it. In one year there is an overdraft of over a million dollars, and the relief department is the biggest spending department in the whole municipality. Then there is the further fact, that nothing of a constructive nature is being done in return for relief. We might as well put the money on wings. It is gone forever, with the exception that we have the satisfaction of providing people with the necessities of life.

I had hoped that this year the government would have some constructive unemployment measures. I do not care about the constitution; let us get the people to work. Give the government all the power it requires to put them to work. I do not care whether the solution comes from one of the two older parties, or from the group in this corner of the house, but there must be action and quick action to meet the serious unemployment problem confronting the industrial centres of Canada.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if the government has taken into consideration the situation which is likely to arise in the province of Manitoba during the coming year. I refer to the possibility of calamity from destruction of crop by grasshoppers with which I have had some experience. I have seen a map prepared by department officials indicating the extent of possible damage from grasshoppers during the coming year. Unless very drastic action is taken and a great deal of money expended I am afraid the possible grasshopper menace will destroy the crop of practically half the province of Manitoba. I hope the government has not overlooked this possible situation.

There is another matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister. I refer to the amount of money paid out two years ago by way of wheat bonuses to growers of wheat in the western provinces. I believe the minister has placed on record figures showing the amount of money spent in each province by way of wheat bonuses to the growers of wheat. I am interested in the area which last year was affected by grasshoppers, and which may again be affected in the coming season. That section of the province grows chiefly durum wheat. In connection with the pool operations which the Dominion government for the past two years have been assisting, the durum wheat growers were not paid the full amount of money coming to them. I mean by that that durum wheat was received by the Manitoba pool at a less initial payment than was common wheat and was sold at a price higher than common wheat.

I have under my hand a statement which I think should be placed on record. The people in the area affected are very much concerned, and I believe they have a reasonably good claim. The letter before me, which I shall place before the committee, came from the committee of two which interviewed the government on two or three occasions and in making its report to the durum wheat growers of Manitoba, they say:

> We, growers of durum wheat in the province of Manitoba in the crop year 1930-31, notwithstanding the statement made in the House of Commons on November 14, 1932, by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, respectfully submit:
> 1. That, being under contract with the Manitoba pool, we delivered collectively to the pool 3,520,675 bushels of durum wheat.
> 2. That the initial payments of the pool on durum wheat were as follows:
> 43,827 bushels at 64 cents.
> 2,957,839 bushels at 54 cents.
> 276,161 bushels at 49 cents.
> 242,847 bushels at 49 cents.
> 3. That the corresponding initial payments on No. 1 northern were: 70 cents, 60 cents, 55 cents and 50 cents.
> 4. That these figures show that all durum wheat was delivered at initial payments below the corresponding payments for No. 1 northern.
> 5. That all this durum wheat was sold by the central selling agency of the pools at an approximate average price of 67·69 cents per bushel.
> 6. That the initial payment represents a differential amounting to approximately $199.078 in favour of the growers of durum wheat, which is still in possession of the central selling agency of the pools.
> 7. That the selling price of durum wheat represents a further amount of approximately $300,000 received by the selling agency, and still held by them, making a total due the deliverers of durum wheat of approximately $500,000.
> 8. That this sum now held by the central selling agency of the pools of right belongs to the durum growers after deducting their fair share of the costs of the agency, and may not rightly be held as against the operations in connection with the sale of marquis or other bread wheat.
> 9. That it is inequitable to use this money belonging to the growers of durum wheat to finance any operations in connection with the sale of other wheat.
> 10. That this money cannot be released or paid to Manitoba wheat pool, trustee of this wheat for the durum growers, without the special consent of the Dominion government which has assumed control of the finances and operations of the central selling agency.
> We, therefore, respectfully repeat the request made to the Prime Minister in July, 1931, by the delegation appointed by and representing us, that the money now held by the central selling agency of the pool from the sale of durum wheat, be released by the government and paid to the shippers of durum wheat, to whom this money is imperatively necessary to enable them to carry on their farming operations.

I believe this matter should be taken into consideration. The area in which the durum wheat mentioned herein was grown is the same area which was so severely damaged last year, and is likely to be damaged again this year by the invasion of grasshoppers. For that reason I believe special consideration should be given to the request made by these people to have their fair share of money for the sale of durum wheat through the wheat pool. I am not at the moment suggesting that the full amount should be paid, but I think they are entitled to have their payments on durum wheat brought up to a basis equal to the payments made on common wheat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Railways I assume on behalf of his colleague, that this resolution be further amended by adding thereto the following words:

And that provision be made for accepting securities from the provinces for such loans, advances, guarantees, etc., as may be advanced by the government, and that provision also be made for the maintenance of peace, order and good government throughout Canada.

I must rise to a point of order, as to whether or not the amendment is in order. The resolution is:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to continue in force the provisions of the Relief Act, 1932, until the 31st of March, 1934.

If this amendment is adding anything substantially different to the Relief Act of 1932 it is introducing entirely new matter. This I think it is, especially when it embodies a provision for giving powers to the administration in the nature of a free hand to enact orders in council with respect to peace, order and good government. May I say that we on this side would certainly not at the outset have consented to support the motion to go into committee on the resolution if we had had any idea that in committee it was intended to move this particular amendment.

May I draw attention more particularly to standing order number 60:

If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

One of the citations appearing in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, number 548, from May, is as follows:

Before clauses in a bill can be considered which apply the consolidated fund or money to be voted by parliament as a guarantee for sums to be raised, paid or borrowed for any purpose, such clauses must receive the preliminary authority of a committee resolution founded upon the recommendation of the crown.

And the first part of citation 549:

All bills providing for the payment of salaries or for any expenditure whatever out of the public funds of the dominion must be first considered as resolutions in committee of the whole. And all such resolutions necessary to the introduction of a bill must first obtain the recommendation of the governor general.

May I say that what is proposed by this amendment has not received the consent of His Excellency the Governor General, and has not been recommended to this house by the government as having received the approval of His Excellency. The resolution as it is before us had been submitted to His Excellency, and we were informed had been approved by him and recommended to the house, but that resolution does not contain any clause with respect to peace, order and good government. I submit that the insertion of that clause places an extra charge upon the consolidated revenue of the country, and that it should be submitted in the form of a resolution in the first instance, as having been recommended by the crown and as having the approval of His Excellency.

That is the point of order I wish to raise. Perhaps in this connection the Prime Minister would let me say at this time that I am raising the point of order not for the purpose of opposing what the ministry may regard as necessary in the way of additional powers to meet a fiancial crisis. We are dealing here with the question of unemployment relief, and I want to urge at the moment, as I did when this question of peace, order and good government came up before, that I think it would be infinitely better in every way not to confuse these two great questions, relief, on the one hand, and on the other, the powers that the government may require to deal with an emergent condition. If the government feels—and I imagine it has reason to feel—that there may be some particulars in which it wishes to have additional powers, let it bring in a measure asking parliament for the additional powers it feels it needs, we will be prepared to judge the measure on its merits. I would suggest, unless there is a special reason for wishing to press the matter in this form, that advantage should be taken of the recess by the government to think over that aspect of it, and let us proceed with the relief measure as we have it before us. If the government needs additional powers, we on this side will be disposed to grant whatever is reasonable in that regard.

May I say further that I believe the powers that are being asked for now are to be found in large part in the measure already before us. Concerning the first part of the amendment, as to taking securities from the provinces for any loans, the bill we are being asked to reenact provides that:

The governor in council may, on such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, and notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law,—

(a) enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein;

(b) grant financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise;

(c) take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof;

I should think those provisions were ample to meet the first part of the amendment proposed by the Minister of Railways on behalf of the Minister of Labour. And I am not at all sure that subsection (c) of section 2 which I have already quoted, which gives the governor in council power to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof, does not give to the ministry practically all they need to deal with any situation that may arise.

I think it is best to put the whole case as I see it before my right hon. friend at the moment, I hope he will feel that I am doing so not in any contentious way but simply to present the difficulties that we see in accepting the amendment in the form in which it is presented.

Mr. BENNETT: The point of order that has been raised by the right hon. gentleman is in my judgment untenable, for the simple reason that with respect to paragraph (a) the addition to the section as it was passed last year is merely technical. Power was given, as will be observed, to loan or advance money or guarantee the payment of money, or take all such measures as might be deemed necessary or advisable to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof; and a question was raised, a purely technical legal question, whether or not there should be in the act itself, provisions that would enable security to be taken in advance for guarantees given. The addition reads as follows:

> And in respect of such loans, advances and guarantees, may accept such security, enter into such agreements, and generally do all such things as the governor in council may deem necessary and expedient in the public interest.

That is purely technical; it has been suggested by counsel for one of the banking institutions with regard to which a guarantee was given in respect of certain securities that were taken by the government to secure itself against any possible loss. It adds no additional burden to the body politic. An amendment that has just been moved restricts rather than adds to the public obligation.

With respect to the observations of the right hon. gentleman regarding peace, order and good government, the real reason we have proceeded in this way is that these words did appear in the statute of 1931, and I felt, in view of the statements made by the opposition last year and the year before, that if we were to ask for the emergency powers such as were granted during war time it would be provocatory—I use that word deliberately—and in addition might leave a wrong impression on the public mind. So I thought it desirable under the circumstances to use the words that had been used in a former statute, and confine ourselves to those words, to maintain within the competence of parliament peace, order and good government throughout Canada and protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof; those latter words, of course, were in the legislation of last year. I did before proceeding with the amendment to the resolution look into the authorities roughly, and asked the clerk at the table as to whether or not the amendment was a customary and usual one according to our parliamentary practice, rather than proceeding last week with either a new resolution or by other form of legislation. It was because of amendments which had been made according to precedent to resolutions in committee that the course I have indicated was pursued. I think it will be found that when proceeding in this way there will be less occasion for complaint than if we had undertaken to introduce a lengthy bill conferring upon the executive, the powers for instance, conferred under the War Measures Act. Rather than embarrass the opposition, desirous as it is to assist at this time in enabling government to be carried on properly, we came to the conclusion that we would, to use the words of a very distinguished author when writing to the Romans, give less occasion for offence if we proceeded in this way rather than in the other.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does not my right hon. friend think that the leader of the opposition is right when he argued that this amendment should be submitted to his excellency for approval?

Mr. BENNETT: No. I tried to make clear that the power to make this amendment to this resolution in committee is a power within the rules of the house. That is my understanding. After the adjournment of the debate upon this measure, the executive came to the conclusion that under the circumstances it was desirable to seek wider powers, and the question then arose as to whether or not that would imply, (a) a new resolution or (b) an amendment to the existing resolution now before the committee. After looking into the authorities and conferring with those who are in a position to advise, it was found that it would be no departure from existing precedents to proceed in the manner I have indicated. That is why this course is being followed. I should like to assure the committee that in adopting this method the government is endeavouring to give as little cause for unnecessary criticism as possible and to leave upon the committee a sense of responsibility such as has been very properly—I trust the right hon. gentleman will not misunderstand me—indicated this afternoon by the leader of the opposition. To use the words used on a previous occasion, we thought we would be giving as little cause as possible for unnecessary criticism in extending the powers of the executive to the extent to which the War Measures Act had extended them. I shall be glad indeed to consider what has been said by the right hon. gentleman, but in view of what I have stated as to the reasons why we took this course, namely to accelerate the passing of the legislation and lessen so far as possible any occasion for criticism, and to meet the wishes of the opposition, especially in view of what has been said by the right hon. gentleman, I trust that the committee will accept the legislation in the form in which we have drafted it.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the point of order, I would say that the words "peace, order and good government" might readily be added after the resolution had gone out of committee. It would be competent on its second or third reading to add these words, which impose no charge on the treasury.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am sorry I was not in the house at six o'clock, but I understand that a point of order was raised as to the propriety of introducing this amendment to the resolution. I understand that the amendment to the amendment consists of two parts; in the first place it deals with the receiving of securities from the various provinces as against contingent advances to be made to the provinces; and an amendment is also to be added to the resolution with regard to peace, order and good government. I respectfully suggest that these two issues are both fundamental issues different from those raised in the bill before the house. The bill before the house was based on a resolution—

Mr. BENNETT: The bill is not here yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): —moved by the Minister of Labour, which resolution proposed the continuance for a year of the terms of the relief act of 1932. Hon. members who recall what happened in this house last year will remember that in the first instance we had a bill to postpone from March 1 to May 1 the terms of the Unemployment Relief Act of 1931, and then there was a second bill, passed in the closing days of the session of 1932, and upon which the present resolution proposed by the Minister of Labour is based. That resolution was properly introduced and submitted to the house, and upon that resolution, and upon the amendment with respect to the $20,000,000 for direct relief, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole. After the house has gone into committee of the whole an amendment has been moved dealing with two very fundamental issues: in the first place, the power to take securities from the provincial authorities as against contingent advances to be made them, and in the second place dealing with the fundamental question of peace, order and good government, which was contained in the bill of 1931 but omitted from the act of last year, upon which the resolution of the Minister of Labour is based.

I suggest that this is a matter absolutely of fundamental policy. So fundamental was it considered a year ago that it entailed a debate of three weeks in this house as between the varying points of view of hon. gentlemen on all sides. Here we have a resolution introduced after the house has been notified that His Excellency the Governor General in Council has been advised of the contents of the said resolution. The house properly moves itself into committee of the whole on the resolution, and after we are in committee of the whole the Minister of Railways this afternoon, on behalf of the government, proposes an amendment dealing with the very principle which was abrogated in the legislation of a year ago but which was embodied in the legislation of 1931—a principle which is in direct conflict with the legislation of 1932, because it is a principle that caused so much acrimonious debate in this house.

I suggest with all respect to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways that this further amendment should have been introduced in the proper way, after the house had been warned, with the Speaker in the chair, that a minister of the crown intended after notice to move this concrete resolution by way of amendment to the resolution proposed by the Minister of Labour, or by way of addition thereto, because it is fundamentally different from the terms of the legislation of 1932.

I understand that the Prime Minister this afternoon suggested that the only alternative would be to introduce a resolution along the lines of the War Measures Act. That, I submit, is not so. The alternative to the procedure which has been followed to-day would be this. Notice should be given of a resolution amending the resolution moved several days ago by the Minister of Labour, and the house should be duly apprised of that resolution, duly notified that it would come up, and duly warned that His Excellency the Governor General in Council had been made aware of its contents and had given his consent thereto. Then, on a given date, the house having been properly advised of the contents of the resolution with regard to advances to the provinces, and also with regard to the provision for peace, order and good government, we could move into committee of the whole and discuss the measure with propriety.

The procedure now being followed takes, I submit, an unfair advantage of the committee of the whole house and is entirely contrary to rules 548 and 549 as well as to the opinion expressed by Bourinot at page 504. I think, Mr. Chairman, that if you will take the trouble to read Bourinot at page 504 you will find the practice specifically set out there. With respect to payments to be made out of the consolidated revenue fund or out of moneys to be provided by parliament, the clauses providing for such payments must first be considered in committee. There is an elaborate argument there in support of my contention and I suggest that the alternative is not to pass legislation in accordance with the terms of the War Measures Act. According to the terms of the rules, the alternative is to introduce a resolution with due notice given to the house. The resolution can be properly debated and then the house will go into committee of the whole and consider the amendment that is submitted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): The amendment in no way changes the financial features of the resolution and in no way adds to any appropriation of any part of the public revenue or to any tax or impost. I therefore hold that the amendment is in order.
