Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With your decision, Mr. Chairman, which, I suppose, we must accept, the amendment is now before us. I wish at once to take very strong objection to its being passed by the house because I regard it as the negation of all government by parliament. There are on our statutes numerous laws with respect to peace, order and good government. If those laws are in any way inadequate to meet any situation that may arise, we should be so informed by the ministry and given an opportunity to supplement them in any particulars that may be necessary. But to say that, notwithstanding all the legislation parliament has thus far enacted, the ministry of the day shall have powers, once parliament has prorogued, to pass by order in council any enactment that it pleases, to make any order in council which shall be the equivalent of any law, with respect to a subject as broad as peace, order and good government, is, as I say, simply to take away from parliament its fundamental rights in matters of this kind. I feel very strongly on this subject for the reason that I think we are at the moment living in a period of transition when the actions of governments are being closely scrutinized by the public generally. There appear to-day to be two tendencies one or the other of which is becoming uppermost in different countries, and each of which, it seems to me, is as bad as the other. One tendency is away from parliamentary government to a dictatorship. We have that situation in Italy, and we have it developing in Germany at the present time. The other tendency is in the direction of a form of socialism which is heading towards communism. It is not unlike the movement for a dictatorship in that it seeks to wrest power from the people's representatives as a whole and to give that power to a class. Both tendencies are subversive of all that the British constitution really stands for. The British people have found their security in times of trouble, not in dictators, not in the rule of one class over all, but in their House of Commons and their parliament which represents all the people and all classes in the state. Where emergencies have been so great that the ministry of the day has found it necessary to secure additional powers, the way in which those powers have been sought in Great Britain, the mother of parliaments, has been by summoning parliament itself and allowing the people's representatives to say what they thought was in the circumstances the wisest and best course.

I do not think advantage should be taken of the existing distress or of any present fears to rob parliament of its real purpose as the representative of the people in all matters pertaining to their affairs. Speaking to the point of order, I suggested that I thought it would be better, even in the interests of peace, order and good government, for the ministry not to confuse these two all-important questions, that of relief and that of meeting an emergency which may arise from conditions of violence, if you will, on the one side, or something in the nature of a financial crisis or panic on the other; but to confine what relates to relief to a bill which will deal exclusively with that subject and the powers that are to be given to the ministry in respect thereto, and provide under a separate measure what may be required in the way of additional powers to cope with an emergent situation. I urged that very strongly when this step was first taken in 1931. In that year the Prime Minister asked that the minister should be given power to enforce peace, order and good government. As the house will remember, that power was obtained from parliament at the session of 1932 not as a result of free discussion carried on without pressure, but under closure; the instrument of closure had to be introduced in order at that time to obtain that power for the ministry. That again was in part a negation, I take it, of government by parliament. Having had those powers, and taken some action under them the ministry found, at the end of a year, that they could get along quite well with what the laws of the country generally provided, and the Prime Minister, at the conclusion of the next session in the bill providing for what was needed in the way of meeting conditions of distress and affording relief, omitted this objectionable provision from the measure. I thought at that time we would be spared its reintroduction on any subsequent occasion. If conditions have arisen which make something of the kind necessary to-day, when they were not necessary a year ago, let us be told what these conditions are, and let us see if the law as it stands is not sufficient to meet them without going the length of giving the ministry what to all intents and purposes is absolute power.

When I spoke on the matter in 1931, I sought to make it quite clear that so far as the Liberal opposition was concerned, we believed, first of all, that the government had all the power it needed to deal with any situation which might arise, but that if they had not that power, and would make clear to the house that they did not possess it, we would not oppose any reasonable measure necessary to meet any unforeseen situation which might develop. Let me read what I said at that time and, in doing so, say that I hold the same view to-day, and should like to repeat it to the ministry. This was what I said on July 29, 1931:

We have laws on the statute books at the present time for the maintenance of law, order and good government throughout the country. If those laws are not adequate and my right hon. friend wishes to have additional powers to maintain law and order in Canada, let him ask for them in a separate measure. He is responsible for the administration, and if he says to this house that he has reason to believe that the powers that exist at the present time are not adequate to cope with any possible situation with respect to the maintenance of law and order in Canada, I will accept his word and support him in any reasonable measure he may bring down for that purpose. But I do say that he should not confuse any question of the maintenance of law and order with the question of unemployment relief or farm relief.

I do not think it would be possible for any party in this House of Commons to make a fairer statement of what is due to the public by the parliament which represents it than what is given there. Again, a little later on:

I am going to ask my right hon. friend to eliminate that particular clause from his resolution. I would ask him to do it in the interest of the very subject that he mentions, namely, peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada. I do not think it will make for peace, order and good government to include that particular clause in a resolution dealing with unemployment relief. Let that particular clause be eliminated, and then if for reasons that he may have in his own mind, my right hon. friend, says, as I believe he sincerely thinks is the case, that there is need to give the governor in council additional power to deal with this question, let him bring in a measure for that purpose, and I think I can promise him the support of hon. members on this side.

That was our position in 1931, it was our position again in 1932, and it is our position at the present time. In no way do we wish to embarrass the ministry in any measures which it requires and which it can assure parliament are necessary, but we do feel that, after all, the ultimate security of the freedom of the people of this country lies in parliament, and in the control by parliament over all situations which may arise, and not in taking away that control from parliament and vesting it in the government of the day.

What were the reasons that caused the Prime Minister to ask for this power before? He may have other reasons to-day, and, if they are different, I hope he will give them to the house; but his reasons when he sought this power before were pretty well summed up in the remarks he made speaking in the house on March 23, 1932. I submit that, in examining carefully his remarks, one will see the strongest reason why parliament should not surrender to the ministry its control in the matter of legislation on peace, order and good government. The Prime Minister said then in part:

I would not ask this power from any parliament except reluctantly, and I so stated when I introduced the resolution the other day.

A little farther on he said:

We do not believe that this power will be called into play; nay, more, we sincerely and fervently hope that it will not be. But, sir, what is a man without a weapon in the midst of armed force? What is a man who has no instrument for his protection in the midst of the strife of brigands? Without this power we should be without a weapon that could be used except through a bill in parliament; and with the strange views that obtain in these days there is no assurance that the mind of the government would be sufficiently strong to secure consent for any measure it might introduce. And from what we know and have seen, we should certainly be opposed with respect to consent. Then the matter would go its weary way, for there is another chamber to be considered before legislation is enacted; and in the meantime the injury may be done.

What does that mean? It simply means that, in the Prime Minister's opinion, there are powers which he may wish to exercise which he believes this parliament would not grant to him. That is the word there, that he doubts very much if, with the mind of the government what it is, he could get consent from parliament for what he wishes to do. Now I say that no such power should be given to any individual, no matter how wise he may be or how worthy his intentions. That statement alone, it seems to me, makes it necessary that parliament, if it is going to protect and maintain its own interests, decline to extend to the ministry powers so extensive, powers that enable the ministry to override its will. Recognizing that those powers were very extensive, though he had not exercised them except in part, the Prime Minister later, in 1932, withdrew his request for full powers with respect to peace, order and good government, and said to the house:

Instead of asking for the right to pass orders in council with respect to peace, order and good government after the first of May, we shall specify the statute with respect to which we believe it may be essential in a time of crisis to enact reasonable regulations or orders in council.

Mr. Lapointe: A slight improvement.

Mr. Bennett: It will be a very great improvement. As I have said in this house repeatedly, you cannot deal with emergent conditions on the basis on which you deal with everyday conditions.

The Prime Minister at that time felt it would be sufficient if he indicated the particular statute of which he might wish to take advantage in a time of crisis. I wish we could hear from the Prime Minister as to just what particular situation he thinks is likely to arise which will necessitate giving this new wide power to the governor in council. Parliament has a right to know what that situation is. I wish that, at the same time, he would point out to us wherein the existing statutes do not contain provisions sufficient to meet any situation which may arise. We have statutes which relate to emergencies in the nature of unrest, violence and the like, even insurrection. The law in that particular is clear and comprehensive and sufficient for dealing with situations of the kind. Then in regard to a different class of conditions that may arise, something in the nature of a panic or a financial crisis, there are in the statutes at the present time provisions designed to enable the government to meet every such situation. But if those provisions are not adequate, let us be told what is needed by way of an addition to the statute as it stands, and give us an opportunity to consider and pass upon a measure of the kind before parting completely with what is the supreme function of parliament.

I may be mistaken, but I am inclined to think that the bill that is before us contains a provision that is broad enough to enable the government to do practically anything it needs to do in a time of crisis, apart altogether from the question of relief, though it is a provision in the relief measure. Let me read to the house section 2 of the bill:

The governor in council may, on such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, and notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law,—

(a) Enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein;

(b) Grant financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise;

(c) Take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof;

(d) Loan or advance money to, or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking.

What more power does any administration need than is given in that section? I think the Prime Minister ought to tell us very definitely what additional power is needed, why it is needed, and whether it is to be exercised or not. Subsection (c) does seem to be as broad as language can make the provisions of a statute:

The governor in council may, on such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, and notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law,—

(c) Take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

In the light of what I have said, believing that the law as it stands is amply sufficient to give the governor in council all powers that are needed to deal with any situation that may possibly arise, and having in mind the fact that when these powers were sought before from parliament they were obtained under closure, and having further in mind the dangerous tendencies which we are witnessing in other countries of the world, resulting in the transfer of the powers of government from parliaments to the hands of dictators or to a class, which is another form of dictatorship, I submit that we in this parliament, and particularly in this country, which I believe, despite all its ills, is in a better condition than any other country in the world, ought to consider very carefully before we part with what after all is our pride and our security, namely the control which the parliament of Canada, representing the people of Canada, has over their affairs at all times.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, since there was a parliament it has delegated its powers to governments. The very essence of parliamentary government is that to an executive body parliament at times delegates its powers. The extent to which that delegation is made depends entirely upon the circumstances under which it is requested from parliament. I was amazed that the right hon. gentleman should have mentioned again the mother of parliaments in dealing with a matter of this kind. I pointed out last year that not only had the mother of parliaments delegated the powers to which reference was made, but that the delegated authority exercised the powers while the imperial parliament was sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was with reference to the control of expenditure, and the lessening of it.

Mr. BENNETT: They had to do not only with expenditures but with other matters as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Only for one month.

Mr. BENNETT: I beg your pardon?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Only for the period of one month.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member has a question, would he be good enough just to ask it? When he breaks in in that way it does not do justice to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct, though.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will just possess his soul in patience I will continue my observations. It was for a limited time only.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Why? Because the circumstances were so pressing that the power had to be exercised promptly. And while the imperial parliament was sitting the delegated authority during the next thirty days was exercising all the power of parliament, and more.

One step more. In 1931 this parliament was asked to confer upon the executive those powers with respect to peace, order and good government. This parliament did so, at the request of the government. We have recently witnessed a situation develop in the United States of America which none of us ever believed would arise, namely the closing of the banks in the great city of New York. Had it not been for the power conferred upon us by the statute of 1931 we could not have taken the action we did and have prevented a crisis.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What action?

Mr. BENNETT: It shows how strikingly unfamiliar with conditions some hon. members are. I have made an absolutely correct statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of what; what action?

Mr. BENNETT: First of all, with respect to the exportation of gold.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: The exportation of gold, which is the one matter with respect to which the president sought help from congress.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was not necessary at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it possible that at this day for purely party reasons gentlemen are unwilling to concede facts as they exist? Is it possible that that is so? In view of the observations made by the leader of the opposition I had thought perhaps this problem would be approached with a view to avoiding the necessity of enforcing closure, to which reference was made.

I ventured to point out that the mother of parliaments had exercised this power. I point out that under the relief acts of 1930, 1931 and 1932 this parliament did confer certain powers upon the executive. In 1931 the executive was clothed with authority to pass orders in council dealing with peace, order and good government. In 1932 we passed legislation dealing with the gold question and with the valuation of insurance securities. Both those provisions, which had been covered by orders in council in 1931, were now properly embodied in the statute law of the country. Therefore the necessity for exercising them had passed. I will say this to the committee: If to-night we could anticipate every contingency which might arise, and thus deal with it by parliamentary action, there would be no necessity for the request of this power. But because we have not the vision to foresee all that may take place, because no government is able to know all that may happen, because we know that in the richest country in the world on a Thursday afternoon assurance was given that there was not the slightest chance in the world of a condition arising which would necessitate the action of closing their great financial institutions, and yet at half past three on Saturday morning of the same week a decree was signed by the government of the state which closed those institutions—because of these circumstances we have to act. I merely mention this, because we cannot with any degree of certainty predict what conditions may be.

It has been suggested that in 1931 legislation was passed by the exercise of closure. So it was. But I do not think that those who are associated with the party opposite fifty years from now will turn up the debates of that session and look at them with any degree of pride. I venture that suggestion. I venture to say further that the voice of the people as expressed throughout the country during the progress of that long debate was sufficient to indicate the views they held.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is only the opinion of the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Closure is a very essential practice in the conduct of parliament. The mother of parliaments, to which reference has been made to-night as a sure and certain guide, has not only used closure, but the guillotine falls at a certain minute, at which time all discussion is automatically shut off. In England they took but a few days to discuss what we took two months to discuss last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A different situation entirely.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course the mother of parliaments is a sure and certain guide, when it suits—but when it is adverse to us it is not a guide at all. In England closure has been enforced for sixty years or more. It has been in use in Canada for only a limited time. In this country its operation is different from what it is there. The Prime Minister simply rises in his place and states, "We will terminate the debate at twelve o'clock to-morrow." And at "twelve o'clock to-morrow" the guillotine falls; that is the end of it. He has complete control of the situation. In England there can be no such condition as we have here. We did give notice of closure for the purpose of enacting legislation, and it was finally enacted.

I say again to this house that all hon. members have to do is to consult those vitally concerned, and they will find that it served its intended purpose and enabled this country to reach the very condition to which the hon. gentlemen referred so kindly to-night when he said Canada was better off than any other country in the world. I wonder if it would be possible to convince this committee that those who for the moment are charged with responsibility, those who for the moment have to direct their energies and the best efforts they can give to the problem of maintaining the integrity of this country in a moment of great difficulty, have no desire to seize power for the mere sake of power. So carefully has power been exercised, and so reluctant has the government been to use it, that sometimes, as in 1931, the complaint has been made it has been used too sparingly. I yield in nothing to any hon. gentleman in this house in my love of parliamentary institutions and my regard for law, order and liberty. But the sure and certain insurance that we have for the maintenance of our institutions is to prevent chaos and anarchy. And chaos and anarchy frequently arise because there is not adequate authority which can be promptly used to change the conditions upon which anarchy and chaos are predicated.

Let us take England again—and I am sure the right hon. leader of the opposition must have forgotten this: At the very beginning of the war England passed the Defence of the Realm Act, familiarly known as Dora. And it not only remained in force in 1919, 1920, 1921 and 1922, but year after year men rose in their places in parliament and demanded that Dora should be repealed. But Dora remained on the statute book. And it will be recalled that a former Lord Chancellor, speaking in this city at a meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, gave an address in which he described the operation of that statute and the reason why, so many years after the war, it was permitted to remain, although the mother of parliaments has so long defended liberty and personal freedom. Why? Because it was uncertain, in the midst of a changing world, what changes might take place suddenly, and Dora, the Defence of the Realm Act, provided the authority whereby the government of the day could take the appropriate action.

I do suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that if they will take the trouble to look at the statute; if they will go into yonder library and look at the orders in council passed under it; if they will look at the substantive laws which came into being by reason of it, long years after the war had passed and ended, because extraordinary circumstances and changed conditions had made it imperative that immediate action be taken—and was taken—they will be convinced of its worth. The parliament of Great Britain, as we know, was sitting at the very time these regulations were passed and the executive was exercising the authority. So have we laws upon the statute books—the right hon. gentleman opposite refers to them—and I think it is fair to say to this committee that there is a law on the statute book of this country that permits us, in the event of a real or apprehended crisis, to publish a proclamation in the Gazette; and then there comes into being practically the War Measures Act, and the executive is clothed with full and complete authority to deal with all the matters therein provided for. But surely the very reason that this country has retained and maintained its position in the face of the difficulties we have had to meet is that we have calmly and patiently, and with, shall I say, much courage on the part of the people themeslves, borne difficulties without panic and without any indication that a condition of crisis existed in this country. Suppose for the sake of argument that this government to-night were to issue a proclamation and say that an apprehended crisis necessitated our passing this order in council and bringing into force all those provisions of the Finance Act and of the War Measures Act, what would be the effect upon the people of the country? One of the many reasons why the people of this country have retained their poise in the face of this world wide and unexampled depression has been that—if I might say it; I trust I shall not be misunderstood—there has never been any sign of panic on the part of the government of Canada. If there were loss of confidence in the institutions of the country as well as the country itself, the results would be such as no man would care to contemplate. In seeking this legislation the government desires only to place itself in such a position that it may be able to cope with difficulties that no man can foresee, which we hope will not arise, but which if they do arise we must be ready to meet. That is all. Without panic, without any sign of crisis or apprehended crisis, but in orderly and regular manner we must proceed with the business of the country, with the authority conferred upon the executive by parliament.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I will not repeat the many arguments that I and my colleagues have endeavoured to adduce in preceding years with respect to this matter. The government is entirely in the hands of the committee. The government does not seek these powers for selfish purposes. They can only add to the burden, the already great burden which the government bears. But the government must be true to their obligation to the country as a whole, and this they would not be if they did not anticipate all possible developments, seeing what they observe about them and what every hon. member of this house sees about him in all countries of the world, especially in the great republic to the south where for the first time in nearly a century the congress of the United States has enacted legislation to place in the hands of one man complete power with respect to the enumerated items in the bills that have recently passed congress. No one would have thought that possible a year ago, yet it is there; it is done. Are we to say that they are less careful of liberty than we, or that they have less regard for the maintenance of their institutions than we? To secure the power to enable the president to deal with the matter as he did, recourse had to be had to a statute passed in connection with the war in 1917. And so doubtful was its application, because of the absence of any general provision in their legislation, that the action taken had to be ratified and confirmed by the very statute that conferred the power upon the executive.

I agree with what has been said by the right hon. gentleman opposite, that there are tendencies in the world to lessen the base of authority. Democracy has not lived up to the prospectus. It has not been possible for thousands, by merely counting heads, to determine and dictate always what is best. In the very nature of things the thousands, or their delegates, have thought it desirable that the power which they possess and which they could not quickly and usefully exercise, should be vested in one whom they select for that purpose. It is true that in Italy, as the right hon. gentleman has said, you have a dictatorship; there is evidence of it in Germany, and on this continent you have power such as has never been known before vested in one man by the newly elected congress, fresh from the people, both the House of Representatives and the Senate. We do not ask that any such power be vested in any one man; we ask that authority shall rest in the government of the day, which means that there must be a majority who share a particular view before any suggestion made by any member of the cabinet could become law or have the force of law.

This in conclusion—for, as I say, I am not going to traverse the ground again; possibly it would be unnecessarily provocative, besides merely threshing old straw and discussing again questions that have been thoroughly discussed in this house—I merely desire to say that it is my firm conviction that if the right hon. gentleman and his friends were to the right of the Speaker, and were confronted with the world conditions that now prevail, they would seek, as other governments have sought, both Liberal and Conservative and of other classes in every part of the world, authority to enable those who for the moment are charged with governmental responsibility to deal with any situation that might arise, and which can be provided for, not in the general terms of the statute in the sense that the right hon. gentleman mentioned, but in terms that refer to the constitution itself. There is no magic in the words "peace, order and good government," were it not for the fact that that they are the words that appear in the constitution conferring upon this parliament its jurisdiction and creating the very institution itself. For section 91 of the statute says:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces—

An so on. The words "peace, order and good government" therefore have no magic meaning; they are the words that appear in the constitution itself. And in the exercise of the powers conferred upon this parliament we are asking parliament to confer such powers upon us; so that if any contingency should arise that is not amply covered by the specific terms of the measure to which the right hon. gentleman referred, we would be enabled in the plenitude of the authority thus conferred upon the executive to exercise those powers by order in council for the peace, order and good government of the country. That is the sole reason why these words appear in that form in the resolution that is now before the committee.

I cannot do more than ask each hon. gentleman to examine his own mind and conscience with respect to the conditions that exist in the world. When any hon. gentleman asks me to state to this committee all the conditions that I think might arise which might necessitate the operation of this statute, I say to him frankly that I cannot do so. If I could there would be no necessity for asking for this legislation, for we could cover by express language all the contingencies that we think might arise. But because we do not know, and because I think no hon. member of this committee examining as I say his own mind and conscience with respect to the matter, could honestly say he believed he could cover every contingency, we ask the committee to pass this resolution, upon which may be founded a bill, not to confer autocratic or dictatorial powers upon the executive, but to enable the executive charged with responsibility fittingly to discharge those responsibilities as if and when occasion may demand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavour to follow the Prime Minister in two of the particulars of which he has made mention, first, in not seeking in any way to be provocative and, second, to avoid threshing over old issues at any length. However, I think that the question which we are discussing at the moment is of sufficient importance to merit some debate and certainly to make perfectly clear the reasons why those of us who take exception to the course the Prime Minister is advocating, take that exception. I have listened very carefully to all that the Prime Minister has said, and I think I may concede all that he has argued, and still say with truth that there is no necessity for the government having more powers given to it than those contained in the measure before us at the present time. If one runs over what the Prime Minister has said and, at the same time, examines the bill to see whether its provisions are broad enough to help to meet any situation such as has been mentioned, I am sure he will find that the legislation proposed is wholly adequate.

The Prime Minister discussed the matter from the point of view of what had taken place in Great Britain; he referred also to some developments that had occurred in Canada, and also to what has recently taken place in the United States. I shall run over the points I have in mind in the same order.

The Prime Minister's main reference in connection with Great Britain was to the Defence of the Realm Act. In answer to my right hon. friend, may I point out that the Defence of the Realm Act is not at the present time upon the statutes of Great Britain and has not been upon the statutes of that country for a long time. It was a measure which arose out of the war. Surely we do not need to enact measures at the moment which are related to war. If Great Britain with all the problems with which she has had to deal has not found it necessary to ask for her executive powers enabling it to make by orders in council laws respecting peace, order and good government, surely, following the British example, we should not go that length in this dominion at this time. I think conditions in Canada are better than they are in Great Britain, and for that reason I deprecate our taking a step which goes to such great lengths in the way of arousing unnecessary fears and suspicions in the minds of the people. The Prime Minister has spoken of the significance to be attached to the words "peace, order and good government," and he drew attention to the fact that they are practically at the head of our constitution. Why are those words there? The words are there to indicate that the powers of the parliament of Canada are so comprehensive that it may pass laws with respect to peace, order and good government, which includes practically everything, and that if all the powers enumerated are not sufficient, then parliament has still the necessary powers to enact any other measure under this heading peace, order and good government. But the executive is not parliament. This power was meant for parliament only, it was never intended for the executive. Parliament is comprised of the people's representatives in the House of Commons, of hon. members of the Senate and of His Majesty's representative in this country. If it had ever been intended to confer at any time these wholesale or all embracing powers upon the executive, it would have been so stated in the constitution. If there is no necessity for anything of the kind in Great Britain, why should we in Canada take this step at this particular moment? As I have said, the Defence of the Realm Act has reference to war time and war conditions. I think it is important that we should relieve the minds of the people in this country and of the world of the thought that we in Canada believe that we are face to face with war conditions. We may have a great deal of distress—we have a great deal of distress—we may be facing something that is serious in many directions, but, surely, we do not contemplate a condition such as war. In the absence of anything as extreme as that, I think we should hesitate to enact measures which could only be justified in time of war, if indeed they would be justified even then. May I point out that, even in war time, this parliament never parted with its powers to the extent being asked for by the ministry to-day. Under the War Measures Act certain powers were given to the governor in council, but a great deal of power has been taken to itself by the present ministry which would never have been thought of, and which was never thought of, by the government of Sir Robert Borden which was in office during the period of the war. All that was needed for the purpose of carrying on the war was obtained from parliament and by coming to parliament. There was no unlimited executive action and no authority given the executive as broad as that derived from the provisions respecting peace, order and good government.

I come now to the references made by the Prime Minister to Canada. My right hon. friend said that without the special powers which the government had, they would not have been able to do what they did with respect to the export of gold. I think the example the Prime Minister himself cited really shows that in this particular, he was not correct. He admitted that there is in the statutes provision whereby the government may, without further enactment by parliament, take action with respect to any panic or crisis which may arise.

Mr. BENNETT: They had to make a proclamation saying that there was a crisis.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is quite correct; the government would have to issue a proclamation saying that a crisis existed. But the position at present is not as inadequate, if one wishes to use that expression, as it was then. Since that time, this parliament has given to the executive—they have it to-day—the power to take all such measures as in the discretion of the governor in council may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof. Surely that power is sufficient to take care of the problem of the export of gold or to meet any similar situation.

I listened with care to hear if the Prime Minister would say what it was he feared. He spoke only of an apprehended crisis. I assume that what was in the mind of my right hon. friend was a banking or some financial crisis, but is not the power already held by the executive sufficient to meet a situation of that kind? The act reads:

I submit that with that power there is no necessity of going further afield for authority to meet some situation which is wholly imaginary, or so imaginary that it cannot be named in this parliament.

The third reference of the Prime Minister was to the United States. He pointed out how congress had been called and how certain powers had been given to the executive. I wonder if this committee realizes the real significance of the action taken in the United States. First of all, it was congress, the people's representatives, which were hastily brought together to deal with the situation immediately after an appeal had been made to the people. The president of the United States called a special session, but that privilege also exists in this country. The Prime Minister himself set an example in that regard. Immediately after the general election in 1930, he called a special session to meet what he then termed an emergency. Surely a special session could be called at any time in the future to give the people's representatives a right to say what should be done to meet the situation. The point, however, I wish particularly to draw to the attention of hon. members is that the powers given to the president of the United States and which were referred to by my right hon. friend as very great powers were powers with respect to enumerated items. That is exactly what we in this parliament have given to the executive in the legislation which is before us at the present time. That is what we are prepared to give to any extent that may be necessary, provided the ministry can present a reasonable case, and that is what I am asking that they shall confine themselves to now. I am asking that they shall enumerate the items on which they want absolute authority, because I do not think they should be given absolute authority with respect to unenumerated matters, the necessity for which is wholly imaginary.

That goes to the very root of the difference between my right hon. friend and myself and those who support us respectively on either side. The United States has taken a step to meet an emergent condition, but it has taken good care to see that congress shall not place in the hands of the president any powers other than those enumerated and of which it had approved in such an enumerated list. Yet we are asked now, in addition to all the powers set forth in the enumerated list here, to give the governor in council further powers. My right hon. friend, I submit, is making a grave mistake in asking for these powers. I am glad he feels as I do about this being a period of transition during which democracy is to some extent on trial in relation to the question of government itself. May I point this out—and I do so having in mind particularly the situation in Canada. Let the pendulum swing in one direction very far, and the inevitable reaction will be that it will go as far in the other direction. If this parliament parts with the power of parliamentary control over legislation generally and places that power in the hands of the executive—and I hope my right hon. friend will not take offence if I say that this means very largely himself, for everyone in the country believes that, and I think the right hon. gentleman himself believes it too—

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If that power is given to one individual, I say, we shall find very soon the contention being made in different parts of the country that if one individual or executive can exercise all the powers of government then a class can just as well do the same. We shall have our friends in the far corner, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, telling the people of the country that if they have to choose between two different types of dictatorships they had better choose a dictator that represents themselves, rather than one that represents an individual or a class to which they are opposed. I say that the only way to avoid such a situation is for parliament itself to retain control in the interests of all classes and all the people and not allow any individual or class to exercise autocratic powers in this country.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not wish to say very much on this point seeing that possibly I am not as conversant with parliamentary procedure and parliamentary government as the two hon. gentlemen who have already spoken.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not speak very often in this house, but I intend to speak whenever I have anything to say in the interests of those whom I represent. I was sent here to express their views and if any hon. gentleman does not care to hear me speak he need not listen. With regard to the provision for peace, order and good government, personally I do not think it is necessary because that is the first quality inherent in any government. The moment any government is unable to maintain peace, order and good government it ceases to be a government.

Of course, good government will always be defined from the point of view of the government in power, and therein lies my objection to this particular legislation. I am afraid that good government will not necessarily be defined as government in the interests of the people of the country as a whole but rather in the interests of a particular class.

The Prime Minister has referred to the decline of demoracy. As a matter of fact there has never been real democracy in any country. Expanding capitalism, that is to say, capitalism which was still growing and growing continously and afforded improvements in the condition of the people, made some measure of democracy possible; but with capitalism contracting to-day we find that democracy is being gradually curtailed in every country in the world, and this country is no exception. We hear very little disapproval of dictatorship where that dictatorship operates in the interests of the capitalist class. I do not think that this amendment is necessary, but if the government will use the power asked for for the purpose of improving the condition of the people who are in sore distress, then I see no reason why it should not be granted. If, however, as it seems, they want the power for other purposes then it should be opposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was indeed surprised, when we inquired of the Prime Minister as to what benefits the dominion derived from the exercise of the power vested in the administration under the legislation of 1931, to hear the right hon. gentleman instance first of all the export of gold and in the second place the valuation of insurance securities. A year and a half ago the question of the export of gold was discussed in this house and he said then that it was necessary, in order to effect the prohibition of exportation of gold to the United States, to have a proclamation under the Finance Act in regard to emergency measures. I am sure the Minister of Finance knows very well that the preceding administration in 1929 effected the prohibition of the exportation of gold from this country to the United States without a proclamation under the Finance Act and without resorting to legislation with respect to peace, order and good government. It was accomplished through an understanding between the Minister of Finance at that time and the financial institutions of the country.

As regards the powers exercised under the legislation of 1931, which was sought to be revived in this house by the continuance measure from March 1 to May 1, 1932, and which was so bitterly contested by both sides of the house, if hon. members will recall the powers exercised under that legislation, under the same provisions as are sought to-night, they will remember that those powers related among other things to increasing the armed forces of the crown without consulting the parliament of Canada—

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. BENNETT: To what is the hon. gentleman referring?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not an armed force of the crown; it is a police force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are a contingent armed force of the crown.

Mr. BENNETT: They are not; they are a police force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My contention applies equally well. No administration has the right, without consulting the parliament of Canada, to increase police forces which are national without a direct vote of parliament. Take another power exercised under peace, order and good government. Two million railway ties were contracted for at a price of 65 cents. We were promised that we should get all the information, either in this house or in the committee, with regard to this item of expenditure under this power exercised in connection with peace, order and good government, but when we asked for the details we were refused on the ground that it was a secret of the railways. We were not given any information except the bare price of 65 cents. Take the powers in relation to insurance companies and banks. I contend that the stand we took in 1931 and 1932 in this house has been abundantly justified. What does the right hon. gentleman do to-night? He mentioned England by way of example and adduced two illustrations from that country. First of all he referred to the Defence of the Realm Act, which was a war measure. I am not surprised at the similarity between these twin dictatorships. I have here a pamphlet entitled A Plan for Britain, by G. D. H. Cole, from which I will quote the following:

> We shall have, for example, to begin with a drastic measure of emergency powers similar to the Defence of the Realm Act passed in the early stages of the war.
> We shall have to take power, in one brief comprehensive act of parliament, to bring under the completest public control any industry or service which it may be necessary for us to administer publicly in pursuance of our national economic plan.

So here we have the official socialist plan, a complete repudiation of parliamentary authority and responsibility, and here we have the Conservative plan which is likewise a complete repudiation of parliamentary authority and responsibility.

Again, my hon. friend referred to the orders in council passed in the old country in 1931. He was referring to chapter 48 of the statutes of that year in Great Britain. The difference between that legislation and the measure now before the house is this: a national government was formed in 1931 in Great Britain under the leadership of the Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald. The powers that were vested by way of order in council were for a period of only thirty days. Seven days after the orders in council were passed, a general election was called, and that national government went to the country immediately to get a mandate for those orders in council. In other words, the executive orders in council underwent the acid test of public opinion in that election. Is that the same situation as the one which the right hon. gentleman presents to this parliament? It is not. I say that in the legislation now before the house, without the amendment dealing with advances to provinces or the one dealing with peace, order and good government, the Prime Minister has within the four corners of the measure, ample authority to effect any emergency measures he may desire for preserving the security and solidarity of this dominion. This power in respect to peace, order and good government, which we opposed with all the force at our command in March, April and May of 1932, is a complete violation of the fundamental rights of parliament, an abrogation of parliamentary authority and responsibility. So far as I am concerned, whether the policy advanced be that of the socialists on the left in regard to the establishment of a socialist state in accordance with this pamphlet which I have before me in regard to the socialist platform in Great Britain, or the Tory policy of establishing a Tory autocracy, let us maintain the rights of parliament and we shall not go wrong.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he was quoting from a pamphlet written by G. D. H. Cole—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): —as the platform of the group in this corner?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. It is an outline of socialist policy in Great Britain. I am glad to learn that my hon. friend repudiates it.

Mr. DUFF: After listening to the Prime Minister, I can come only to the conclusion that he admits that he has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. He went to the people of this country in 1930 and he promised them that if he were elected, he would deal with unemployment; that every man would get work and that Canada would blossom like a rose. He has been in power for almost three years and he has had full authority to deal with every problem. Now he comes before parliament, as he did last year, and asks from us extraordinary powers by legislation so that when we are not in session he may deal with some bugaboo which he conjures up. As the leader of the opposition and other hon. members on this side have said, if there are extraordinary circumstances in this country and if the statutes are not sufficient to deal with them, there is no difficulty in calling a special session to deal with any matters which we should handle. Therefore I say that this amendment moved by the Minister of Railways should be amended. At the moment it reads:

> And that provision be made for accepting securities from the provinces for such loans, advances, guarantees, etc., as may be advanced by the government, and that provision also be made for the maintenance of peace, order and good government throughout Canada.

As regards the first part of the amendment, I do not think any of us would find much fault except, as the leader of the opposition has said, that under existing statutes there is sufficient provision for that. But with regard to the second clause of the amendment, there should be a difference; I would suggest this and I am going to move an amendment to the amendment to read as follows:

> And that provision be made for accepting securities from the province for such loans, advances, guarantees, etc., as may be advanced by the government, and that provision also be made for the maintenance of peace, order and a change of government throughout Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I hardly think that is in order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I see one or two difficulties in connection with this legislation. First, let me say that I agree absolutely with the statement made by both the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, in that I fail to see the necessity of reenacting the clause in regard to peace, order and good government. But if the government are determined to have that power—and I suppose as usual they will force their will upon parliament—then I cannot understand the necessity for the insertion of the amendments, first, for the vote of $20,000,000 and, second, for the purpose of taking securities from the provinces. The government appear to have all the necessary power to deal with the provinces in any matter that may arise in connection with advancing assistance, taking care of their financing. Indeed, so far as we can learn, that is going on continuously, particularly with regard to the four western provinces.

One can, however, hardly understand the necessity at this stage for the extraordinary powers now asked for by the government. The Prime Minister takes a good deal of credit for the fact that we have had no financial panic in Canada. I have no recollection of his having had the Bank Act amended. The banks have been functioning under the same act. Indeed, so much confidence has he in our banking laws that he does not propose to amend them even at this session. Therefore the banks, in his opinion and in that of the government, must be stable and sound in every particular and I think Canada should be congratulated upon that fact. So far as the insurance companies are concerned, the Prime Minister has taken appropriate action to protect them with respect to the valuation of their securities. Contingencies may arise of which the government are aware, but which we do not know at the present moment, but it seems to me that at this stage, when any evidence of panic, if we may call it by that particular name, must be practically past, it is unnecessary to have this power, and if power is required, surely it is contained within the four walls of the statute of 1932. So far as I am concerned, I agree with the speakers on this side of the house that there is no reason for the reenactment of the clause giving the executive power in regard to peace, order and good government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the amendment before us?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): The second amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We should like to have a standing vote on it.

Amendment (Mr. Manion) agreed to: yeas, 60; nays, 23.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister was going to give us some information for which we asked when last we were discussing the resolution in committee, respecting the advances that have been made up to the present time to public bodies and corporations under the provisions of the Relief Act.

Mr. BENNETT: The only advances in cash were made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and to the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the Prime Minister indicate how much money has been advanced in each case?

Mr. GORDON: I think I have already spread upon the record the exact amounts advanced to the provinces and to the railway, but perhaps it would save time if I gave the figures over again.

Loans have been advanced to Manitoba amounting to $8,160,629.45; repayments $220,000. Loans to Saskatchewan $12,461,293.23; no repayments. Loans to Saskatchewan Relief Commission in connection with seed grain, $6,000,000, of which $410,000 has been repaid. Loans to Alberta, $5,982,000, none of which has been repaid. Loans to British Columbia $6,866,664.69, of which $3,169,915.19 has been repaid. To the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in connection with the keeping open of their various shops in 1931 there was loaned $1,447,222.71, and an additional loan of $1,000,000 has been authorized but is not payable until later on this spring.

Mr. POWER: How much has been advanced to the provinces for the purpose of carrying on the ordinary running expenses of the province, the payment of civil servants, and so forth, and to which provinces have such advances been made?

Mr. GORDON: There have been no loans to the provinces for that specific purpose. As to the purposes to which the provinces have devoted the proceeds of the loans advanced, I do not think I have the figures.

Mr. POWER: I have not the orders in council by me at the moment, but I have a recollection of having read at least one, probably two, under which advances were made, as I understood it, specifically for the purpose of enabling the province to carry on its ordinary business other than for unemployment relief purposes. If the minister will give me a chance I will get the orders in council.

Mr. GORDON: There was nothing loaned to the province of British Columbia or to Alberta for ordinary governmental purposes. To Saskatchewan there was loaned for governmental purposes, $3,500,000.

Mr. POWER: How much of that has been repaid?

Mr. GORDON: None of it.

Mr. POWER: Is it with respect to some of these loans that a new order in council was passed a month or so ago in which it was stated that the province could not pay its current interest, and that therefore the federal government would assume the interest in some form or another.

Mr. GORDON: I think the hon. member is right. They were unable to pay their interest and the interest was consolidated with the loan.

Mr. POWER: Then am I to take it that we have advanced money to at least one province to carry on the ordinary affairs of government, and that when these moneys became due we, by order in council, arranged that the interest should not be paid; or was the interest added to the capital?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, the interest was added to the capital, under order in council 385 of March 4, 1933.

Mr. POWER: The next question is: Does the minister ever expect to be repaid, and how?

Mr. GORDON: I have a great deal more faith in the probity and progressiveness—and I do not use the word politically—of the people of Saskatchewan than probably any hon. member from that province on the other side of the house.

Mr. POWER: That is hardly an answer to my question, because I do not come from that province. I have some faith in their probity, and more faith in their progressiveness politically, if this government remains in power very long. But I do ask the minister—and I believe we are entitled to a more serious answer than he has given—the following question: Does he think it is good business to lend money to a creditor, not for specific purposes, but simply to carry on his living expenses, so to speak. If he were a banker—and his government has become the banker of the bankrupt and semi-bankrupt provinces of this dominion—would he lend money to a borrower for living expenses, and when the borrower could not repay even the current interest, would he keep on adding to it by adding to the capital? I believe we have about reached the time in Canada when we should adopt a more definite policy with respect to the amount of credit the federal government is going to pour into the provinces, institutions and corporations. At the present time this government, in so far as it is able, is backing the banks, backing the insurance companies, backing Beauharnois, backing the wheat pool, backing the Canadian Pacific, paying deficits on the Canadian National and has at least four provinces on its hands. I suppose I will be accused of calling the credit of the dominion into question. Oh, I had forgotten—we are backing Newfoundland. And I suppose if Malta, Tasmania or Timbuktu went broke, if we could get a little credit at the seat of empire we would probably, out of the generosity of our hearts, back them too. Only two or three days ago President Roosevelt said the time had come to speak out boldly and frankly, to tell the people just what the situation is and to take them into the confidence of congress. I believe the government of Canada should take our people into its confidence, state frankly what the situation is and how long they expect to pour the credit of all Canadian people into any particular section. There is nothing which will bring about a national or financial crisis quicker than the habit into which we have fallen of backing this province and that province, this institution and that institution. There must be a limit somewhere.

Before this legislation passes I believe the government should lay on the table of the house the correspondence they have had with the provinces. If they have told the provinces to set their houses in order, we should know it. That was promised. But we were promised that information within two or three weeks, at which time, in all probability, this legislation will have passed. I suggest that to-day the minister should tell us the advice he has given to the western provinces. I repeat, in all seriousness, that we should come to some definite conclusion whether or not we will continue carrying on in this way. If Saskatchewan or any other province—I am not speaking about any one particularly—finds after a year or two that it cannot meet its current obligations, that it cannot pay for the running of the province and cannot pay the current interest, then the sooner the province of Saskatchewan goes to its bondholders and undergoes a process of reorganization, like a private corporation, the better it will be.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the minister if that statement is correct—that we are lending the province of Saskatchewan money for its ordinary revenues?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely to say that a provincial government is having its ordinary revenues supplied by the federal government is an astounding statement to make. We are going to extremes when interest payments are taken care of by the federal government to help a province out of a difficult situation in bad times, but it is an unheard of thing to be told that the government of Canada is providing the ordinary running revenues of the province.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not the revenue.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister has just stated it is.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Only part of it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why any part of it?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): What about Alberta?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I hope to heaven Alberta never gets into that position.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Saskatchewan finances are better than those of Alberta. You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All I can say to the hon. member is that it is a sorry day when any province has to come to borrow its ordinary running revenues from the Dominion of Canada. If the banks of that province are not prepared to take care of it in times of difficulty, I say they are in a sorry position. I do not care what province they are in—

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): We are in a mighty safe condition.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I believe I have the floor. I will give my hon. friend ample opportunity to say anything he has to say in defence of the government. I say it is an astounding condition when a minister has to make the statement to the House of Commons that out of federal funds—not out of the revenue, because undoubtedly he will have to borrow it—he is going to pay the running expenses of the province of Saskatchewan or any other province. Surely more drastic steps than have so far been taken will have to be taken to prevent such action. I do not know what authority there is for this government to lend money for such purposes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Peace, order and good government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But they have not got peace, order and good government. They have not that right at the present time. The statement made by the minister is the most astounding one I have ever heard in this House of Commons. He had said that the government of Canada has had to come to the rescue of a province in order that it may pay its ordinary running expenses.

Mr. VENIOT: And we have to borrow money to do it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It seems to me if the civil servants of that province cannot get their pay and the banks are not prepared to furnish the money—as they frequently do for provinces in reasonably decent standing—and the federal government has always come to the rescue in connection with interest payments, then that is as far as it should go; indeed, I am bound to say it is farther than it should be called upon to go. Where is this thing going to end? How long is it going to take the government to ruin the credit of Canada, if it continues such practices? We cannot wonder, after hearing the statement just made by the minister, that the government want the extraordinary powers for which they are asking to-night. They will need those powers if we are to come to the rescue and pay the running expenses of various provinces.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): My hon. friend comes from Alberta. Alberta is as nice a province as any in the Dominion of Canada. I have no feeling of ill-will in respect to that province, but when the hon. member assails Saskatchewan as he has done to-night he is doing a very great disservice not only to Saskatchewan, but to the dominion as a whole. The province of Saskatchewan, whose legislature is now in session and whose budget was recently brought down, has balanced its budget as well as, if not better than, any other province of the dominion, and is paying her way just as well as any other province.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What does she want with the money, then?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): If my hon. friends over there had not thrown 400,000 foreigners into our province and compelled us to build schools for them and educate them and spend millions and millions every year we would be in a much better condition than we are to-day. We have had to spend millions through the blunders of hon. gentlemen opposite. In addition we had the misfortune of this drought, and my hon. friend does not seem to know that that drought was not peculiar to Saskatchewan, that down in the United States 1931 is known as the year of the great drought. He does not seem to know that in thirty-three states of the United States the crops were absolutely wiped out by that drought, and we got only the tail end of it. You could not stop those winds blowing from Arizona at the international boundary; you might as well try to stop hon. gentlemen opposite from speaking—it cannot be done. It burnt up our grain and everything else. We have had that for three years, but that is no reason why hon. gentlemen opposite should assail our credit and denounce our province. You have got millions and millions of dollars' worth of trade out of Saskatchewan and Manitoba and Alberta; we are glad you got it, and you will get it again—because we buy from Canadians, we do not buy from Yankees as do hon. gentlemen opposite. We have been of far more benefit to eastern Canada than we have ever got from her, and hon. gentlemen had better quit assailing the province of Saskatchewan. If they do not, some of us will turn one of these days, and they will wish they had never spoken.

Mr POWER: In order that the committee may understand the purport of the questions which I was putting to the minister I should like to read into Hansard order in council P.C. 385:

Privy Council, Canada

Certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 4th March, 1933.

The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 2nd March, 1933, from the Minister of Finance, submitting that there became due and payable by the province of Saskatchewan to the government of the Dominion of Canada interest on treasury bills submitted as security for loans made under authority of orders in council P.C. 2336, of 19th September, 1931, P.C. 767 of 6th April, 1932, P.C. 789 of 12th April, 1932, P.C. 922 of 25th April, 1932 and P.C. 974 of the 28th April, 1932, passed pursuant to the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931 and Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, the interest on the said treasury bills being as follows:

Interest due, September 9, 1932; amount of treasury bills, $2,000,000; amount of interest, $45,000.

Interest due October 6, 1932; amount of treasury bills, $5,900,000; amount of interest, $148,635.61.

I will ask the minister now if that $5,900,000 is the amount which was advanced to the province of Saskatchewan for what I call running expenses.

Mr. GORDON: That sum would include what has been spoken of as $3,500,000 for governmental purposes, and also moneys advanced the province of Saskatchewan to meet obligations in New York.

Mr. POWER: Anyway that $5,900,000 was partly expended by the province of Saskatchewan, and was granted to the province for the purpose of carrying on its ordinary business?

Mr. GORDON: Undoubtedly.

Mr. POWER: The interest on that was $148,635.61. There was a still further loan due on October 27, 1932, $500,000, and the amount of interest was $13,750, making a total of interest, $207,385.61. I have not before me all the orders in council providing for the advance of money to the province of Saskatchewan, but I take it that since 1931 Saskatchewan has not been able to pay the interest on the loans made to it by the federal government. I make that statement subject to correction, but I take that to be the case. The order in council says:

The minister further submits that the provincial treasurer of the province of Saskatchewan has reported thaat it is impossible, under existing conditions, to pay this interest currently,—

That is, $207,385.

—and he has proposed that treasury bills of the province be accepted in respect of accrued interest.

The minister, therefore, recommends that under the authority of The Relief Act, 1932, the following loans be made to the province of Saskatchewan:

$45,000 on the security of treasury bill of the province dated 9th September, 1932, issued under due authority bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per cent per annum payable half-yearly and maturing the 9th September, 1933.

$148,635.61 on the security of treasury bills of the province for $94,479.44 and $54,156.17, dated 6th October, 1932, issued under due authority bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per cent per annum and maturing the 6th April, 1933.

$13,750 on the security of treasury bill of the province dated 27th October, 1932, issued under due authority bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per cent per annum and maturing 27th April, 1933.

The minister further recommends that authority be granted to the Minister of Finance at his discretion at any time before redemption to assign all or any part of the said treasury bills.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

E. J. Lemaire,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

If this procedure is to be followed the treasury of Canada will be full of these treasury bills. I am not surprised that the Minister of Finance asked the right to assign before redemption, but heaven only knows who is going to take the assignment. I have here copies of other orders in council which appear to deal with the same subject, and I will put them on Hansard if I have occasion as the debate proceeds. The point is that other provinces have perhaps not been able, on account of their lack of revenue, to give the services which the province of Saskatchewan has been able to give to its people. They have perhaps over a period of years stinted themselves in social services and matters of that kind. I submit that since the people in these older provinces are not able out of their means to give these services to their people, they should not be called upon indirectly through their contributions to the federal government to pay for them for provinces which have not as yet curtailed their expenditure, or which during the past have shown no signs of being willing to do so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask the minister whether advances have been made to other provinces that are in the same position for the purpose of meeting the payment of interest on previous advances?

Mr. GORDON: There are no other provinces that had to call upon the Dominion government for loans for carrying on the services of government. I think the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) should bear in mind that Saskatchewan probably suffered a tragedy such as no other province in this country suffered in connection with its crops.

Mr. POWER: Did we not provide for that by direct relief?

Mr. GORDON: If hon. members will come one at a time perhaps I can get along a little faster.

At one time this government, with some assistance from the government of Saskatchewan, were actually feeding more than 300,000 people who were absolutely without any crop of any kind. Such a condition in a province like Saskatchewan, with its scattered and comparatively sparse population, naturally reduced the tax-paying population, and unquestionably that brought about the condition which gave rise to the necessity of their receiving help from the federal treasury.

I think we can agree with what the hon. member for Quebec South has said with respect to the necessity for the most rigid control in connection with advances by way of loans to provinces, to other projects, to public corporations or anyone else. The responsibility is certainly upon this government and this parliament to see that the moneys of this country are administered to the best advantage. However, it is a very serious question to decide whether or not any one of the provinces of Canada should be allowed to go bankrupt because of the stress of present times. I think that is a debatable question and I would not care to subscribe to the rigid policy that at a time like this the provinces should not receive some help from the federal treasury to tide them over the present depressing period. These provinces, of their own prompting and of their own volition, have tried to reduce expenditures. I believe they are making very serious reductions in the cost of government and governmental services where that can be done without completely crippling the services. In some instances I believe they are finding that they can get along without services which they thought were indispensable.

Many conferences have been held between this government and those in charge of provincial affairs with a view to seeing if they cannot so fashion their affairs of government that they will bring themselves within their revenues. I do not need to tell the members of the committee how difficult it is for the Dominion of Canada to bring its revenue into equation with its tax collection.

I do not think we should utterly condemn the province of Saskatchewan because they are having to resort to this government for help in carrying on their public services. We must not forget the situation through which this province passed a year ago. No one anticipated anything like that and it has never happened before in western Canada. With respect to its tax-paying people and their capacity to pay, that province was placed in a very difficult position.

I do not think it is quite right for us in this parliament to assume that those in charge of municipalities and provinces throughout Canada are not just as earnest as we are and are not as seized of the necessity for economy. I think it is fair to say that those who have the responsibilities of municipal and provincial government are doing their very utmost. No doubt they will make mistakes, but they are doing their utmost to bring their expenditures within the range of their ability to collect taxes. The situation is not an easy one and I do not think we should utter wholesale condemnations of the provinces of Canada. It is my firm belief that every province, no matter under what form of government it may be, Tory, Grit or Progressive, is putting forth every effort to make its budget balance. Unfortunately in Saskatchewan they were not able to do that and we have helped them out.

Mr. POWER: May I say that I do not want my remarks to be interpreted as being aimed particularly at Saskatchewan. What I am objecting to is the policy of continuously—

Mr. HANBURY: Of this government.

Mr. POWER: I will not say even that. I am objecting to the policy of a great many people, adherents of this government and otherwise, who are endeavouring to support the national credit by giving assistance to the provinces. I will not go as far as my hon. friend on this side and refer distinctly to the policy of this government. I think the time has come when we should put a stop to this practice. We cannot go on giving money to our neighbours when we have not any ourselves. I do not know what deficit we will have to face, we will have to wait until tomorrow to know that. I assume it will be in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000, $70,000,000, $80,000,000 or $100,000,000, if we are to believe the newspapers. I do not want to take advantage of the Minister of Finance. If he were to say "no" his answer might be interpreted in one way, and if he were to say "yes", it might be interpreted in another. He would be making a premature announcement of his budget. In any case we are in a position where we have no money, where we cannot pay our own debts. Charité bien ordonnée commence chez soi—let us start at home and put our own house in order. When that is done we may be able to hand out a little to our neighbours, to our good friends, to our children or whatever you may call them. We have been advancing considerable money to the wheat pools, to the banks backing the wheat pools, to enterprises such as Beauharnois, to railroads including the Canadian Pacific, and I do not know to what other enterprises. The time has come to tighten up the purse strings.

If it so happens that Saskatchewan has been the first to run short of money and has had to come to the federal government, I do not want my remarks to be taken as reflecting upon the policy of the present government in Saskatchewan or upon the lack of foresight of past administrations. However, I think we should tell them that they must stand upon their own feet. I do not know what their bond issue is, but if they cannot pay more than one per cent interest, they should say to their bondholders: You will get only one per cent interest. That is what every private corporation has had to do, and even the federal government may have to do this if we keep on lending money. With all these guarantees and assistances, we are simply gambling that the depression will be over before it catches up to us. If it is not over within a very few years, it will overtake even the dominion itself.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There are two or three points which the committee should keep in mind as they relate to facts which must be faced. Speaking of the three prairie provinces there are three facts which must be remembered. First, two of them at least, and to a large extent, Manitoba, are almost wholly dependent upon agriculture for their taxes. The two provinces have practically no source of taxation save agriculture. Indirectly they may tax other people, but the source of the production of wealth is agriculture. Second, any one who is familiar with farm conditions and farm prices must realize that the tax-paying power of the farmer is extremely limited. Only a very small amount of taxes can be paid by the average farmer to-day with prices as they are now, leaving aside the question of crop failure.

The third point to remember is that of fixed capital charges, and as the hon. member for Quebec South has said, it is one which we shall have to face some day. While the farmers are limited to one class of commodities upon which taxation can be levied, their price levels have reached such a point as to limit very considerably their tax-paying powers. Throughout the country the balance between revenue and fixed charges is completely upset at the present time. We find this in the federal government, in the railways and in every business. While revenues are declining, fixed charges remain stationary. The fixed uncontrollable expenditures in the provinces will eat up the greater percentage of the possible taxation. These are facts that cannot be gainsaid, and we may have to consider the suggestion of the hon. member for Quebec South, whether in times like these we may not have to ask the bondholders to bear their share in the general distress. I can easily visualize the time when the total collection of taxes from the provinces wholly dependent on agriculture will barely meet the interest on bonds at the present rate of interest, and there will be a serious question throughout the country whether we shall not have to decide definitely that we cannot pay these rates of interest at a time when public and private revenues have so considerably diminished. During normal times there is a reasonable balance between the different factors that make up expenditures—in private business, between labour, management and capital costs, and in capital between bonds with fixed interest and capital invested in shares of stock. So long as there is a reasonable balance it works well, but in times like these when revenues fall fifty and seventy-five per cent the balance is completely upset if one form of vested capital must remain at a fixed level and must pay its full share, no matter how great the percentage of that share becomes. I can easily see the time when we shall have to summon all our resources to ascertain the best way of meeting the situation in Canada as a whole, and we may have to consider doing what the hon. member for Quebec South has suggested. We must ask ourselves how long we can pay full interest rates when the revenues throughout the country have fallen from fifty to seventy-five per cent.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Might I have a word to say on this rather sad subject we are discussing? The minister, in explaining the situation in Saskatchewan, rather left the impression that it was due almost wholly to the severity and extent of the drought in 1931, and that the consequent relief that had to be given in that year was the chief cause of Saskatchewan's present financial troubles.

Mr. GORDON: Three successive crop years.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was not the situation at all. The Liberal governments that preceded the one now out there gave more in the aggregate for relief purposes during their administration than the present Saskatchewan government ever did in their time. Mr. Gardiner, the former premier, has made that statement on more occasions than one, and it was never contradicted.

Mr. MacMILLAN: That is absolute nonsense.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not. The real trouble was due largely to the vast orgy of road construction entered into by the present Saskatchewan government immediately after coming into power, in 1930 and 1931, with the result that they more than doubled the capital debt of that province. The capital debt when the Liberals left office was $63,000,000, in round figures and a considerable proportion of that debt was revenue producing. It represented money invested in the public telephone system and in the cooperative elevator system, both of which were paying their way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That puts a different complexion on it and my hon. friends do not like it. I want the committee to make a decided distinction between Saskatchewan as a province and the Saskatchewan government, because we have no more faith in the government there than we have in this one here. I want to set the committee right as to what caused the enormous expansion in the capital debt of Saskatchewan, with consequent loss of credit. It was due largely to the extravagant system of road construction. This admittedly was not confined to Saskatchewan alone nor to this country alone, but it was particularly in evidence in Saskatchewan in the years 1930 and 1931, with the result that instead of a debt of $63,000,000 they have now a debt of nearly $140,000,000. That, I say, puts a different complexion on the matter. The minister did not say anything that was not correct, but he left the impression that the extra indebtedness of Saskatchewan was due almost entirely to the terrible drought of 1931.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. VENIOT: What was the amount of the last loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway, at what rate of interest was it made, and on what terms of payment?

Mr. GORDON: The last loan authorized to the Canadian Pacific Railway was $1,000,000 on December 22, 1932, for the purpose of paying the wages of workmen in connection with shop operations in December, 1932. This loan was to be repaid without interest before any further dividends were declared or paid. Although authorized, the money has not yet been paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. VENIOT: What was the rate of interest?

Mr. GORDON: No interest.

Mr. MacMILLAN: I am surprised to-night at some of the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite. I find myself in agreement to some extent with the hon. member for Quebec-South, but having listened in this house in the past year to members opposite from my province maligning this government and directing all sorts of scurrilous remarks to them because they did not spend more money in Saskatchewan in connection with the distressing conditions that have existed there, I am surprised to-night to hear them bewailing the fact that the government have spent as much as they have because they found such a condition of affairs in that province as required assistance to help them meet the interest on their bonded indebtedness. My hon. friend from Melville says that the previous provincial government spent more in relief there than the present government has done. Anyone who lives in the province of Saskatchewan—the hon. member will be confronted with his statement when he goes there—knows that what he says is the most ridiculous nonsense. No one knows better than he does that there was never a time in that province when agriculture has had to contend with the problems that have faced it in the past three years. There never was a time in any part of Canada when seventy-six rural municipalities had no crop for three years in succession. As my hon. friend down in the left corner has said, agricultural commodities command a very low price to-day. If you take that situation, coupled with the seventy-five municipalities that have been drought-stricken for three years, you will find that the taxable capacity of the province is strained to the uttermost. I want to congratulate the government and the minister in that province for this year coming within $1,000,000 of balancing the budget. Having regard to the steps which they have taken, I am satisfied that they will balance their budget this year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: With federal money.

Mr. MacMILLAN: Federal money has nothing to do with the question of balancing their budget. The federal government, however, I recall, handed out money when a great catastrophe took place in one of the eastern provinces, I think in St. John or Halifax. When a great explosion occurred there, the government handed out hundreds of thousands of dollars to help the people. Nevertheless hon. gentlemen opposite deny Saskatchewan, a new province populated with newcomers, as has been said here tonight, the right to ask parliament for assistance when it needs it so greatly. Is there an hon. member from Saskatchewan who will deny that province the right to ask the federal parliament for assistance? To do so would be grossly unfair. If hon. members opposite were to visit that province and give utterance there to some of the remarks that have been made here in connection with this matter, I do not think they would be very well received.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is scarcely necessary for me to repeat what I said, but after what the hon. member for Saskatoon has stated, lest I may not have been quite understood, I shall repeat that part of it where I stated that the aggregate spent by previous Liberal governments in Saskatchewan, prior to this present Saskatchewan government coming into power, was more than the total that this government has spent even during 1931 when the expenditure was tremendous, I admit.

Mr. ROWE: How many years?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Twenty-four years, but much of it was not called relief; it was called seed grain advances in many cases and relief road work in many others. But this government has charged everything up to relief, including seed grain advances. That is the reason they make the aggregate for this government very big and relatively small for previous Liberal administrations. My figures stand uncontradicted, and my hon. friend from Saskatoon can look them up and not trust to memory, particularly as he never knew anything about the matter anyway. My statement is correct and I have no desire to aggravate the situation. I do not want the hon. member for Saskatoon to put us in the position of complaining about the money that has been spent there by the present government. I am only trying to correct the impression that the present serious financial situation in Saskatchewan is due to the enormous amount of relief necessary in 1931 and the year following. It was partly due to that, but the great difficulty was the vast sums spent on road work the first two years after the present provincial government came into power. I have already made an extenuating remark, that not only were they guilty of that but other provinces and other countries were as well. I think I went far enough to let the Saskatchewan government down a little in this respect—at any rate as far as I intend to go.

Mr. MacMILLAN: My hon. friend states that previous governments have spent in Saskatchewan more in relief than has been spent by this government in that province or by that province in the past three years. If that is so, it is amazing that hon. gentlemen opposite now object to the government helping out the province, having regard to the situation in which it has found itself in the past three years. My hon. friend is bragging about the money that the Liberal government spent in past years. Now he is saying that this government, because it has lent that province a few million dollars to tide it over the present situation, should be criticized for doing so. My hon. friend also stated that the Saskatchewan government had been responsible for spending millions of dollars extravagantly. He mentioned roads. They spent $10,000,000 on roads in that province. That was on an all-weather highway. Prior to the time the present provincial government came in, that province had no all-weather highway. Further, as my hon. friend well knows, the wheat pool in that province cost this government in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000. My hon. friend used to brag a great deal about the cooperative creameries in that province; indeed, I think he was their father and mother both. My hon. friend in his time established cooperative creameries, political creameries, all over that province, but they were closed up even during his own time. I would like to suggest that he be at least gracious enough to give us some credit on this side for endeavouring to help out Saskatchewan in the distressing situation which at present exists there.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We shall have to admit charitably that the hon. member for Saskatoon knows more about these questions than anybody else in Saskatchewan. Perhaps that will satisfy him.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I am very much interested in this discussion, and I should like to remind the committee that western Canada is having difficulties to-day—

An hon. MEMBER: So are we all.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River):—but western Canada has been taxed by the customs tariff for twenty-five years for the support of industries in Ontario and Quebec, and it is shortsighted policy to start now—

Mr. McPHEE: The hon. member voted for that too.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When increases were made, the hon. member voted for them.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I did not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member supported the government.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): The present government at least has this to its credit, that it is trying to-day by these methods to equalize in some respects the burdens that have been placed upon the people as a result of tariffs. I do not agree with the high tariff policy of the present government, and I do not agree with the tariff policy of the Liberal party that went to the country promising low tariffs and did not give them. If tariff is good when it is working against the farmer, it is reasonable to say in this time of depression that agriculture and the agricultural provinces ought to be helped by direct grant. That is my point and the only one I wish to make. Whether we like the situation of not, whether it is just or not, we know it is generally admitted that the depression throughout the world has struck agriculture in a way that it has not touched other industries. I think it is agreed that agriculture has received the full force of the worldwide depression, and if the agricultural provinces go down, the rest will go down with them. The hon. member for Quebec South was speaking to-day about certain provincial industries and so forth that got financial support from the government, not being able to pay the interest. What about the port of Quebec? Did it ever get advances on which it did not pay interest? Did we complain about this?— We did not; at least I did not.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is the gateway of Canada.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I am exceedingly glad that the government in office, while its policy is not in accordance with that of hon. gentleman to my right, has at least tried during these very difficult times to face the facts and to give these grants so as to enable the western provinces, which have been so severely hit by the depression, to carry on. What is the condition of agriculture? Western agriculture is producing and selling products for fifty per cent of the cost of production.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The same situation exists in the east.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Not the extreme east, but Ontario and Quebec have been bonused by the customs tariff for the last forty or fifty years to a greater extent than the western provinces have been assisted by the Dominion government.

Mr. EULER: Nobody seems to be taking up the cudgels for the poor old province of Ontario, so I might say a word. As a matter of fact Ontario pays more taxes than any other province of this dominion, and we have not said anything about it. We said nothing when $50,000,000 was wasted on the Hudson Bay railway for the benefit of our western farmers. I imagine that the amount of money that has been lost in the construction of the Hudson Bay railway and in the construction and operation of branch lines in western Canada is a great deal more than was ever paid by our western friends in customs tariffs. So much for the province of Ontario.

I would like to support what my hon. friend from Quebec South has said. I believe he is on the right track; it is about time that we called a halt in more ways than one. The other day in the banking and commerce committee it was shown that the debt of the dominion, including the railway debt, is no less than $3,700,000,000. The dominion is already carrying a pretty heavy load without carrying the load of the provinces. I was amazed, as was the hon. member for West Edmonton, when the minister stated that we are actually advancing to Saskatchewan moneys for the carrying on of the ordinary business of that province. I have a good deal of sympathy for the people of Saskatchewan. They are in the unfortunate position of getting very low prices for their products, but the same is true of Ontario and Quebec.

The farmers of Ontario are not getting any more for their products than the farmers of western Canada; our manufacturers have their factories closed and their work people idle, and we have to support these people out of the taxes. It is a pretty heavy burden for Ontario without this province having to join in and help pay the ordinary running expenses of a western province.

I rose to make one suggestion which perhaps will not be received with any great deal of favour, but which I consider a very practical one. If these western provinces find it so difficult to get along and cannot raise the necessary revenues, would it not be a good idea if they cut out some of the cost of government by uniting the three prairie provinces into one, and have one government and one parliament.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is pretty evident to me that the government are so busy bailing out the ship that they have not the time to steer it. I want to make this very practical suggestion. Our present difficulties have been brought about by the fall in the price level, and unless you can bring the price level back to where it was in 1928 or 1929, you cannot continue to meet these enormous obligations. Make no mistake about that.

Mr. COWAN (Port Arthur): How are you going to do it?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is your job. But in all fairness I can say this, that the child was not left on the doorstep of the government, they went out and brought it home. I believe that the contention of the hon. member for Quebec South is a sound one, and that the duty of the federal government is to see that no man, woman or child in this dominion suffers from the effects of this depression. Arising out of this discussion I would say that the sooner the government tackles the debt situation in this country in a practical way, the better it will be for the dominion. I believe that that is a far more important problem than any other that has come before this parliament since I have been here. Hon. members may laugh. They may have been here longer than I have, but probably they have not thought as much or seen as much. The sooner we tackle the debt question in this country and take action similar to what was taken in Australia and New Zealand, the better it will be for the country. Perhaps it might be better so far as the provinces are concerned, and their ordinary obligations, to let them go to the wall, if you wish.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did they do that in Australia?

Mr. MITCHELL: No. I can tell you what they did in Australia.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You wanted us to do something similar to what they did in Australia.

Mr. MITCHELL: I said, unless you did what they did in Australia. The crux of the situation is this: I do not think that you can carry on the obligations of these provinces. I believe that we should adopt the very practical suggestion that was made by the recent preparatory commission of the League of Nations on the forthcoming monetary and economic conference. They recommended that the debt question should be dealt with first within our own boundaries, and we might get together the bondholders of the provinces which are in difficulty and get them to agree to a reduction in the interest rates. The capitalist system, if you like to call it that, works very well until you come to state debts, and in times of a depression the weak sisters are shaken off. Private industry may recapitalize and reorganize, but the state debt remains fixed, and you have to work out some technique for taking care of it. I am of the opinion that the price level is not coming back to where it was in 1928 and 1929, and I believe that this government should meet the debt situation along lines similar to those taken in Australia.

Mr. HEENAN: My hon. friends opposite have brought this discussion upon themselves. The hon. member for Long Lake tried to leave on the doorstep of the Liberal government the responsibility for present conditions because he said it had brought out too many immigrants. My hon. friend from Peace River laid most of the blame on the customs tariff. Everyone will remember that during the session of 1930 the Conservatives, then sitting on this side of the house told of the desperate condition in which they said this country was at that time. I want the hon. member for Long Lake to listen to what Premier Anderson of Saskatchewan was saying of the province of Saskatchewan at that time. He said:

> The settling of our vacant farm lands and the development of industries are reacting favourably upon the growth of our urban centres. The population of some of our larger cities has increased fifty per cent in the last three years. Since January 1st of this year the total value of building permits issued for construction work in the province amounted to $34,000,000 as compared with $20,000,000 for the year 1928.

The future progress of Saskatchewan rests upon the firm foundation of the productive effort of our people, aided by discriminating immigration policy. Capital from eastern Canada and the British Isles is increasingly available for the development of our natural resources. The achievements of the past have been considerable. We have merely scratched the surface of our vast resources, however, and there is every indication that the future holds in store tremendous possibilities for the people of Saskatchewan.

It was at the time that Premier Anderson was making that statement that the Conservatives, then sitting on this side of the house, were crying blue ruin in this country, and were ringing the deathknell of the western provinces and the rest of Canada.

As mention has been made of the three western provinces, it might be interesting to see what the premier of Manitoba said about the same time. Speaking on January 14, 1930, Premier John Bracken of Manitoba said:

It is a common belief that Manitoba is a purely agricultural province. It is true that agriculture is still her chief means of maintenance, but during recent years other industries have grown and prospered until to-day the annual value of their gross output closely rivals that of farm products. The year 1929 has seen substantial progress in that direction. During the past year thirty-six new manufacturing concerns have been established in Manitoba, while twenty-two others have extended their plants. It seems certain the total output will substantially exceed that of 1928, which was estimated at $159,252,000.

And then Premier Brownlee of Alberta issued the following statement on January 14, 1930:

At the end of another year the province of Alberta finds itself in a strong financial position. At the end of March, 1929, the fourth successive surplus was reported. The surpluses for the past four years have been as follows:

1926	17,800 53

For the fifteen months ending March 31:

1928	$ 279,763 13
1929	1,578,823 09

Therefore we face the end of the year in a spirit of confident optimism, believing that the next few years, at least, will be years of continued development, both agriculturally and industrially.

Hon. members will note that the premier of Saskatchewan was lauding the fact that through the immigration policy of the then Liberal government the population in urban centres had been doubled, and that he had great hopes for the future. The premiers in the other two prairie provinces made similar statements. It ill behooves the hon. member for Long Lake or any other hon. member to decry a policy that the premier of Saskatchewan endorsed at that time.

Mr. GORDON: The premier referred to a selective immigration policy.

Mr. HEENAN: No he did not.

Mr. GORDON: Yes, I believe that is the language he used.

Mr. HEENAN: I did not read that; I said "discriminating".

Mr. GORDON: No one complains about that.

Mr. HEENAN: I am prepared to vote any sum for relief in Saskatchewan or any other province, but when an hon. member of the party which went out and made the promise in 1930 to blast its way into the markets of the world and to guarantee higher prices for produce, makes a complaint, I say to him that he is getting only his just due.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): The hon. member suggested that the premier of Saskatchewan had advocated a discriminating policy. I should like to ask the hon. member whether, when his party was in power, he considered he was developing a discriminating immigration policy when he was instrumental in importing thousands of Doukhobors, naked men and women who paraded up and down the concessions, raising Cain and doing all sorts of things. Is that the type of immigration policy the hon. member likes?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pettit): May I remind hon. members that the speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the matter under consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This resolution covers everything.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pettit): It seems to me hon. members have been wandering far afield, and I must ask them to confine their remarks more strictly to the resolution before us.

Mr. POWER: I was discussing orders in council passed under relief legislation.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pettit): A certain amount of latitude is permissible.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But no longitude.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have before us a resolution which gives the government a blank cheque, authority to spend any sum it wishes. If the amendment proposed this afternoon is adopted, the government will have authority to pass orders in council in connection with any matter. The discussion cannot be too wide, because the resolution covers everything.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, everything.

Mr. QUINN: What about the fourteen points?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Seventy-five points.

Mr. HEENAN: We should have wide enough powers of discussion to cover the Doukhobors in Saskatchewan.

Mr. POWER: The night shirts.

Mr. HEENAN: I must tell the hon. member for Long Lake that not one Doukhobor came in at the time Premier Anderson made that statement.

Mr. NEILL: At 4.45 this afternoon I asked the minister a couple of simple and practical questions, and in his kindly graciousness he said he would answer me later on. That is six hours ago. I have waited with patience and faith, that faith that laughs at impossibilities, but have received no reply. I am quite sure the minister would not wish the resolution to pass without first having given me that information.

Mr. QUINN: He has not had a chance to get a word in.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Pettit): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. NEILL: No; I think in all fairness the minister should reply to the questions to which he promised an answer six hours ago.

Mr. GORDON: I have no recollection of promising anything six hours ago.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is the policy of the government not to remember promises.

Mr. GORDON: What are the questions? Would the hon. member ask them now?

Mr. NEILL: I should be happy to do so. One was this: Whereas it has been the policy of the minister's department to pay one-third of the direct relief moneys, the provinces and the cities paying one third each, and in unorganized territories to pay one-half the amount, the province paying the other half, would he adopt the same policy in connection with the land settlement scheme where, in the present instance, covering people leaving a city, the dominion pays $200, the city $200 and the municipality $200, but in cases which are now beginning to be developed, where people not living in towns but in unorganized territories want to go on the land. In such cases would he apply the same principle of the dominion government paying one-half? There is the precedent I have quoted for that procedure, and I am wondering if he could see his way clear to do it.

My second question is: Whereas the Dominion government does come to the rescue of provinces when they are short of money, not only putting up the dominion's third, but also lending the province its third—when they cannot pay their share themselves—so far as British Columbia is concerned, would he adopt the same policy in connection with the land settlement scheme? This afternoon I quoted from a letter from a man in British Columbia living in an unorganized territory who had applied to the British Columbia land settlement scheme committee and had been told that all parties had agreed to the system being applied to unorganized territory but that they had no money to carry out their share. I ask the minister if under the circumstances he could not see his way clear to lend British Columbia its share, the same as he did in connection with direct relief.

While I am on my feet, and so that the minister will be able to cover the whole at once, I would remind him that I suggested this afternoon that the Prime Minister might give us a statement in regard to unemployment insurance, which certainly has a very direct bearing on this subject. As the Prime Minister is not present, perhaps the minister, in whose department it comes, might be able to give us a short statement as to the situation in that regard, having in mind what took place here last November, when we received a definite pledge that the utmost effort would be made to come to an agreement with the provinces. I am quite sure that the house and the country would like to know what the situation is in that regard, and what the prospects are, if any, of an unemployment insurance measure being brought down to this house either at this session or at a future session.

Mr. GORDON: Probably I can deal with both questions at the same time. The policy of the Dominion government with respect to diverting some of the direct relief moneys to non-recoverable advances for settling people from the urban centres on the land, the open spaces of Canada, at no time was thought to be a complete solution for unemployment, as

I have often heard said by those who probably have never followed the subject. It is not sanity to think it. But some people, even in high places, sometimes say that, and then ridicule the government for so pale an effort in connection with unemployment. That was not the situation at all. The situation was simply this; in the fall of 1930 when I was charged with the responsibility of administering the Department of Immigration and Colonization, I could only apply to that department the experience I had had in private life and the observations I had made almost ever since I can remember with respect to what was being done in connection with immigration and colonization in Canada. I have no hesitation in telling hon. members of this house that, rightly or wrongly—I may be quite wrong—I never was in favour of the immigration policies of the past of this country. Others may take a different view—

An hon. MEMBER: What about your chief?

Mr. GORDON: —but that always has been my view, and down through the years since I was a very young man I have often asked people who I thought could answer the question: Why did we project two or three transcontinental railways, with their ancillary branch lines and the rest? I am still asking the question and waiting for an answer, particularly in the light of what we are facing to-day and have been for some years past. This question of land settlement and colonization becomes a very important thing to-day, much more important than it has ever been in the history of Canada, for two outstanding reasons. The first is that because of the extension of railroad services in this country in the past by those who were sometimes called pioneers and nation-builders—I would call them something else; I always have—we find ourselves burdened with railroad services sufficient for our needs for probably fifty years to come. I do not think I am exaggerating. What did we do to try to keep up with that expansion? Successive governments since the early years of this century have gone to all lengths to take anybody from anywhere who would come to Canada, in order, I assume, to provide revenues to pay for those railways. There was no selective immigration. If anyone cares to expand the subject I will meet him at any place at any time and I think I can show the kind of immigration we had. Do not misunderstand me; there are in Canada tens of thousands of splendid people from foreign lands, and they have my sympathy, on this ground if on no other, that by reason of the fact that there was no discrimination, no selection, their whole race is damned in the eyes of Canadians because of the extreme actions of a few.

What do we find? On the one hand, if we are ever going to overtake even a part of our railroad debt, we must of necessity have more people in our country. For my own part I would have been immensely happy if we had not had all those railroads. On one occasion the last words of Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, then Prime Minister of Great Britain, when leaving this country, if I recollect aright, were "Canada, go slow." That is the position that confronts us. That is the position that confronted me in the fall of 1930. Right up to the 28th of July, 1930, there were at least three full trainloads of people a week on the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, and other trainloads on the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Pacific, going into western Canada—59,000 in the four months prior to July 28, 1930. Those people were not settled on the land. We are feeding them to-day. I will hazard the opinion that we are feeding nine-tenths of them. And in the years before that the immigrants being brought in were not absorbed into agriculture. They were intended to be, but were they? Go to our lumber camps; go to the cities and the industries there, and see where our immigration went. That, combined with the attractions of industrial life, has caused the reversal of the ratio from 18 per cent urban forty-five years ago to 54 per cent urban to-day. That is the reason, or the main reason, for our present disproportionate city population.

Apart altogether from the money spent on soldier settlement and United Kingdom special settlement schemes, this country in its immigration department spent in the eleven years prior to 1930 over $33,000,000. Doing what? Administering the department with respect to people coming into Canada from other lands. It was my considered view in the fall of 1930 that this government had on its hands the job of starting to colonize at home; that if any money was to be devoted to colonization it should be devoted to replacing on the land our own people who had departed from the farms and found themselves without jobs in the cities. That policy was consistently followed, and it is being followed to-day. Almost 100,000 people have been induced, directed, guided and inspired to go back to the farms, under the schemes inaugurated by this government with the very valuable assistance of the provinces and the railway companies. I have heard in this house criticisms of the colonization schemes of the government of the province of Quebec, and while I have the utmost respect for the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) I do not think for one moment that he has a sound conception of the earnestness with which the government even in the province of Quebec are pursuing their colonization policy.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why "even" in the province of Quebec? Why the word "even"?

Mr. GORDON: If my recollection serves me correctly and my hearing is right, the hon. member for Témiscouata directed his barrage against the province of Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But why should the hon. gentleman say "even in the province of Quebec"?

Mr. GORDON: I think I have a fair conception of my French Canadian fellow citizens. During all my business life I have lived with them and I am happy to say that my relationships have always been of the best and I think they will continue to be of the best. I know the former Minister of Justice was in my riding during the last election, he created a very favourable impression, nevertheless his compatriots voted for me.

We are pursuing that policy and we intend to pursue it. I will subscribe to a state-aided colonization plan only as a last resort. It may be that we will have to do that in order to fill up our vacant places and get our people into some sort of security which will be founded upon a return to something more nearly approaching normal in price levels. I am not unmindful of the situation, but the policy which I have outlined will be pursued.

We have found that we have almost entirely exhausted the number of people who formerly had been on farms. In ninety-nine cases out of one hundred the success of a back to the land movement depends upon getting those who understand farming. There is no use in sending a lawyer out on a farm, although it is said that a lawyer can make a living almost anywhere. One hon. member referred to a newspaper reporter who had gone up to northern Ontario to farm, but that man should never have gone there. He should have gone to Norval school or some such place to take up some farm training, and then gone on a farm. That is not the way we approach this subject. We have committees set up throughout Canada for the purpose of making selections and seeing that family conditions are what they should be. These committees find out if the wives want to go back on the farm, if the men understand the problems to be tackled in going on the land, and such things. We reject many more than we approve, but we finally came to the time when we had exhausted that class of person who had some money to go back on the land, often times to the old homestead, but who saw his savings dwindling in the city. The landlord had to be paid, taxes, water rates and electric light bills had to be met, and so on. These men were approached with the idea of getting them started without having a burden of debt to bear. Whether or not a man is a farmer, if he starts in a new business with a burden of debt he has to be very fortunate to get rid of that burden and place himself in the clear. I know that from my own business experience.

We went over the situation again with a view to endeavouring to assist people who were in the cities and in receipt of direct relief. We were considering those who were physically able, who had been on farms, who did not want to be upon direct relief and who were willing and ready to go back to farms if they were assisted. This proposition was put up to the provinces. We did not urge or ask them to accept it; we simply said: There are a number of people who will take advantage of this and perhaps it will be helpful in solving the general difficulty. Every person placed upon the land relieves an industrial worker who does not know anything about farming.

The reason for making the contribution three ways was adequately borne out by the subsequent experience. It got noised about that there was $600 of the government money ready for anyone who wanted to come and get it. We were simply swamped; everybody wanted to go and they wanted to start with $600. We did not suppose that that was going to happen, and we took a survey, if you like to call it that, of those who were on relief but who were able to go on the land and earn their own sustenance. We then capitalized what we felt we would have to pay in direct relief and made it a non-recoverable advance under the agreement. The various provinces and the municipalities who were also contributing to direct relief were invited to subscribe one-third each. If we were successful in placing these people permanently upon the land we were not one penny out. We would have had to pay it in direct relief anyway and we were just that much further ahead. That was the underlying principle. If the municipality was not asked to contribute anything it is quite likely that every one on direct relief in the municipality would be passed by the municipality in order to get away from its responsibility, whereas if the municipality has to bear its share of the burden with the chance that the person will become self-sustaining on a farm adjacent to or far away from the municipality, it benefits in the end by not having to carry that person on direct relief for a longer period than $200 would cover.

Mr. NEILL: But where there is no municipality.

Mr. GORDON: I do not propose, at this time at least, to recommend that the provinces and municipalities subscribe to placing people who are already out in the open spaces of this country upon the land.

Mr. NEILL: The dominion and the provinces?

Mr. GORDON: I suppose the hon. member means that the dominion and the province shall share equally in the establishment of some person who is now out in an unorganized part of Canada?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: I would not care to embark at the present time upon a policy of that kind.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 21, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Rising to a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) stated yesterday, as reported at page 3203 of Hansard:

> If my recollection serves me correctly, and my hearing is right, the hon. member for Témiscouata directed his barrage against the province of Quebec.

The hearing of the hon. gentleman may be correct and his recollection may serve him correctly, but his understanding was very poor because I did not direct any barrage against my own province, which I love as much as my country and for which I am always fighting.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. EDGAR N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

> That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving that you do now leave the chair to enable the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means to enable supply to be granted to His Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1934, it is proposed to discuss the year's financial operations under the five headings followed in the last budget, namely:

1. A short review of world economic conditions;
2. Canada's trade and commerce and financial conditions in Canada;
3. The financial operations and accounts of the dominion for the year ending March 31, 1933, and, as the fiscal year has not yet closed, the transactions still to take place have been estimated as closely as possible;
4. The estimated revenue and expenditure for the year 1933-34;
5. Ways and means to secure the revenue required to meet the estimated expenditure.

World Economic Conditions

When the budget was presented one year ago, a world financial storm of unprecedented severity was still in progress. It had started, you will recall, in Austria in the spring of 1931 and had passed from one country to another, crippling financial institutions and generally dislocating the machinery of finance and trade. Before the end of September, England had been forced off the gold standard and her example was soon followed by a score or more of other countries. With few exceptions, all countries felt it necessary to institute exchange controls or impose additional restrictions on trade, in order to protect the value of their currencies and to safeguard themselves against unfair competition arising out of depreciated exchanges.

As a result of these conditions, the international exchange of goods tended to become more and more restricted; the world level of prices, particularly the prices of primary products and the staple exports of debtor countries, became subject to intolerable pressure; and the forces making for declining business activity and increasing unemployment were reinforced.

The United States was perhaps the last important country to feel the full force of the financial storm. During the winter of 1931-32, its banking system was subject to a double strain; foreign individuals and institutions with balances in the New York money market repatriated these balances or earmarked gold against them, while domestic depositors, distrustful of the solvency of their banking institutions, withdrew deposits. The inevitable result was the failure of thousands of small unit banks, heavy depreciation in the value of securities thrown upon the investment market, falling commodity prices and a vicious spiral of deflation. To counteract this movement, a program designed to create an expansion of credit was instituted, involving chiefly the formation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the liberalization of banking legislation and extensive open market purchases of government securities by the Federal Reserve banks. By midsummer the processes of disintegration appeared to have been effectively checked.

Up to this period, world commodity prices had been falling and business activity steadily shrinking. Even in England, departure from the gold standard had brought only temporary inflation and the level of wholesale prices had been declining since November. In June or July, however, prices turned upward in both England and the United States, and industrial production showed a similar upswing. In June, the Lausanne conference, somewhat to the surprise of the world, reached a provisional settlement of the reparations problem. While the European nations made their acceptance of the agreement conditional upon similar action being taken by the United States with respect to war debts, this conference had all the promise of marking a real beginning of international co-operation, through which the hopeless tangle of reparations, debts, tariffs, armaments and unstable currencies might be solved by international action. In July-August, the Ottawa conference, to the accomplishments of which further reference will be made a little later, succeeded in effecting a measurable relaxation of trade restrictions within the huge trading area of the British Empire, and pointed the way to similar action on a broader scale. These developments in the international sphere created an atmosphere favourable to business recovery.

During the summer also Great Britain carried through a highly successful conversion operation, reducing the rate of interest from 5 to 3½ per cent on over two billion pounds of callable public debt. This was made possible by a condition of extraordinary ease in the money market, symbolized by successive reductions of the Bank of England rate from 6 to 2 per cent and by the sale of Treasury bills at the record low rate of ⅜ of one per cent. Somewhat similar conditions prevailed in other leading money markets of the world. In the security markets, prices rose rapidly, particularly for high-grade bonds. Low money rates are traditionally regarded as the chief prerequisite to and as the forerunner of business recovery. It was not unnatural therefore that confidence began to return. Indeed, the third quarter of 1932 was a period of noticeable improvement in world industry and in business sentiment.

But the improvement was not maintained, and since last October world trade, industrial production and wholesale prices have once more tended downwards. In the renewal of the decline, the failure of the war debt negotiations has been an important, though not the sole, factor. During the last few weeks, there has been a recurrence of banking troubles in the great country to the south of us, and new clouds have appeared on the political horizon in Europe. On the significance of this banking crisis and these new political disturbances, it is not necessary for me to comment. But I do wish to warn against too gloomy an interpretation of current happenings. Events that may seem well-nigh disastrous in themselves may nevertheless be necessary to effect some of the radical changes in public attitudes and national policies which will make possible a fundamental and permanent solution of the difficulties which beset the world.

There are those who decry the possibility of an international solution and who insist that we should seek remedies at home for present conditions. I do not wish to minimize the difficulties and delays which are involved in any program based on international agreement, or to overlook the plain duty which rests upon every nation to keep its own house in order and to strive to the utmost by domestic action to accelerate the processes of business recovery. However, one cannot fail to observe that the present crisis is international, both in its causes and its effects, and that the remedy must be sought in international understanding and co-operation. Slowly, but nevertheless surely, the world is approaching full realization of the fact that the day of national self-sufficiency is past, that an international disease can only be cured by an international remedy.

Therefore, I look forward hopefully to the World Economic and Monetary conference which is expected to meet in London in the near future, and to which we propose to give our whole-hearted support. Members of this house have already had an opportunity of studying the agenda of that conference prepared by an able committee of experts. I am hopeful that on the basis of this agenda a program can be worked out for the relaxation of exchange controls and other excessive restrictions on international trade, for the stabilization of currencies, and for the stimulation of a rise in the world level of wholesale prices. The success of this conference assumes a prior or simultaneous settlement of the war debt question and some appeasement of political fears and rivalries as a result of progress in disarmament discussions or otherwise. If these prerequisite conditions can be achieved, it should be possible to reach agreement upon a program which would be effective in restoring world confidence and initiating an early recovery of business activity. The world has this solution within its grasp and in my opinion there is no other—short of prolonged and painful liquidation, if this indeed can be called a solution. Events are moving rapidly, driven by the urge of economic necessity. On this fact may rest the basis for a greater degree of optimism than has obtained in many months.

As foreign trade plays a dominant role in Canada's economy, it follows that the world conditions which have just been outlined, have inevitably been reflected in business conditions within this country. The course of industrial production and the physical volume of business in Canada has followed very closely that of the other leading countries. Fortunately, since the first of the year, there has been a moderate improvement in wheat prices and those who are usually well-informed are hopeful that this improvement will be sustained. I do not need to emphasize that if this rise in wheat prices can be sustained and carried farther, no other single development could be of more importance in stimulating business recovery and reviving a spirit of confidence.

Trade of Canada

Reference has been made to the factors which have contributed to a further decline in world trade, including lower commodity prices, reduction in purchasing power of many of our principal markets due to unfavourable exchange conditions and the widespread application of import restrictions. It is a matter of satisfaction that relatively the position of Canada among the great trading nations has been so well maintained. In 1932, Canada again ranked fifth, after having been seventh in 1931. An examination of the statistics also reveals that the loss in dollar value of total trade in 1932 was proportionally not so great for Canada as for other important trading countries. The soundness of our financial policy, and the beneficial effect of trade agreements, particularly those concluded with empire countries, have contributed to this result.

The following is a statement of Canada's foreign trade for the first eleven months of this fiscal year, as compared with the same period in 1931-32:

(000 omitted)

	Eleven months ended Feb. 29—1932	Eleven months ended Feb. 28—1933	Decrease
Imports	$ 521,056	$373,421	$147,635
Exports—
Canadian produce	536,595	437,329	99,266
Foreign produce	9,952	6,332	3,620
Total	$1,067,603	$817,082	$250,521

It will be observed that the value of the exports of Canadian produce has declined to a lesser extent than the value of imports. Indeed, when the lower prices of the leading Canadian export commodities are taken into consideration, there will be found to have been very little reduction in the actual volume of exports.

It is also noteworthy that, despite the unfavourable conditions which have prevailed, there has been a progressive improvement in the balance of trade. In the first eleven months of this fiscal year, ended February 28, the excess of exports over imports was $70,240,000 which is a remarkable showing as compared with a favourable balance of $25,490,000 in the corresponding period of the previous year, and a complete reversal of the position in the eleven months ended February 28, 1931, when our trade showed an unfavourable balance of $70,524,000. Comparative figures are as follows:

(000 omitted)

Eleven months ended—	Imports	Exports	Balance
February 28,1931	$831,232	$760,708	(—) $70,524
February 29, 1932	521,056	546,547	(+) 25,491
February 28, 1933	373,421	443,661	(+) 70,240

Although the tariff agreements arising out of the Imperial Economic Conference have been in force only a few months and their advantages are not yet fully reflected in the trade statistics, significant developments of the utmost importance to our trade with empire countries are indicated.

In the ten months ended January, 1933, (the latest date for which trade statistics by countries are available), Canada's exports to various parts of the empire were slightly greater than in the same period in 1932, and to the United Kingdom had increased by some seven million dollars. In addition, the decline in empire imports was much less, relatively, than in respect of non-empire imports. Trade totals reflecting the inter-empire movement of goods are as follows:

Inter-Empire Trade of Canada

	Ten months ended January 31, 1932	Ten months ended January 31, 1933
Imports from United Kingdom	$ 87,509,816	$ 73,629,042
Exports to United Kingdom	153,776,204	160,610,678
Imports from British Empire	122,448,561	101,939,909
Exports to British Empire	192,824,941	193,115,066

When expressed as percentages of total trade, these figures clearly indicate the trend towards increased trade with empire countries. In the ten months ended January 31, 1933, imports from the British Empire were 29·13 per cent of total trade, as compared with 25·23 per cent for the previous corresponding period. Exports to empire countries in the same period were 46·34 per cent of total trade, as compared with 37·84 per cent formerly.

The percentage distribution of Canada's trade is shown in the following statement:

	Imports Ten months ended January 31		Exports Ten months ended January 31
	1932 %	1933 %	1932 %	1933 %
United Kingdom	18.03	21.04	30.02	38.54
British Empire	25.23	29.13	37.84	46.34
United States	60.77	57.22	41.54	30.89
Other countries	14.00	13.65	20.62	22.77

In imports from the United Kingdom, the chief gains have been in textiles, coal, manufactures of iron and chemicals. So far as exports to the United Kingdom are concerned, important increases are being registered in many products of the farm, mine and factory.

An increase has occurred in both imports from and exports to Australia, the latter rising from $4,207,000 to $6,047,000. This improvement is especially gratifying to those interested in trade from the Pacific coast.

A feature of the import trade has been the growing importance of the West Indies as a source of supply of semi-tropical fruits and vegetables.

Considered in the light of world conditions, Canada's external trade has shown a reassuring stability which reflects not only the underlying productive capacity of the country, but also the energy and capacity of those engaged in production and trade.

Financial Conditions in Canada

It will be recalled that after Great Britain departed from the gold standard, the export of gold from Canada was prohibited except under license and the gold production of the mines was purchased by the government at the world price. This policy has been continued, and the receipt of the New York premium, which would, of course, have been obtainable by producers had they been permitted to export their gold freely, has undoubtedly contributed to the substantial expansion which has occurred in gold production. Next to South Africa, Canada is now the largest producer, having expanded her output from $16,000,000 in 1913 to $63,000,000 in 1932, succeeding the United States as the second largest producer. It is estimated that for the present calendar year our production will amount to $67,000,000.

The importance of this industry lies not alone in the increasing employment it has given to labour, the profits which have been disbursed in dividends and the impetus given to domestic trade generally, but perhaps primarily at this time in the support which it has given to our exchanges and the national credit.

This increased gold supply, available for export without weakening monetary gold reserves, taken in conjunction with the elimination in the past two years of a large unfavourable balance of trade and the substitution therefore of a favourable balance exceeding $70,000,000, has been most significant in relation to Canada's ability to meet, without undue strain, the burden of interest and principal payable abroad. Without making a detailed presentation of the various items entering into Canada's balance sheet of international payments, it may be noted that current estimates of the position indicate that exports of goods, gold, and services, are sufficient to offset annual charges payable abroad and to leave a substantial balance for principal payments on account of external debts. This has been a most important factor in maintaining the high credit position of Canada in world markets. During the past year Canada was the only foreign country that was able to borrow in the public markets of the United States.

This enviable position has been and can be held only by the maintenance of sound financial and monetary policies. Much has been heard in recent months about inflation. Some of the advantages claimed for inflation may seem alluring to industries harassed by falling prices and declining turnover. But let the sponsors of inflation never forget that apart from the other difficulties and dangers involved in their program, one inevitable result would be a flight from our dollar, a withdrawal on a large scale of the capital invested by foreigners in this country in the form of securities and bank deposits. There are also to be considered internal reactions to any steps which might impair confidence in a country's currency. Against policies which might lead to such dangers, this government has resolutely set its face.

The external value of the Canadian dollar, though showing greater fluctuations than are desirable for the normal conduct of international trade, has been maintained at a moderate discount in terms of the United States dollar. In October last, the rate rose to 6½ per cent discount, and at no time during the past year was it depresesd to the level of December, 1931. There are some who advocate that our dollar should be tied to sterling at the old parity and still others who criticize what they mistakenly believe to be a policy of pegging our dollar in terms of New York. This is not the time to enter into a discussion of this broad and complicated question. Suffice it for me to say that our dollar has been allowed to find its own level and that as a result it has been fluctuating about half-way between the United States dollar and the English pound. In so doing it may be working out a not unsatisfactory compromise between those of our national interests which would be benefited by close and stable relations with sterling, and those on the other hand which would be seriously harmed by a heavy and fluctuating discount in terms of New York.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

The financial and monetary policies which have been followed have also contributed to the efficient working of our internal credit and investment facilities. In general the needs of industry, of crop-marketing agencies and of public bodies harassed by falling revenues have been taken care of with admirable efficiency, particularly in view of emergency conditions and in the light of the situation in many other countries. Canada is one of the few countries that has been able to retain a market for new long-term financing, and the volume of long-term capital issues which were floated in the domestic market last year is, I submit, a splendid tribute, not only to the efficiency of our investment and banking institutions, but also to the thrift of the Canadian people and the underlying strength of our economic position. Excluding short-term and refunding loans, a total of $267,000,000 was raised. In passing, it is interesting to note that over $15,000,000 was secured by Canadian borrowers from the London market, three provinces and two municipalities selling their first sterling issues since 1914.

The dead hand of past lavish expenditure and borrowing still weighs heavily upon all public bodies. While public revenues keep falling, debt charges persist and increase, consuming an ever-growing proportion of total current receipts. This whole problem of interest charges is now receiving the attention of the banking and commerce committee of this house. Without touching upon their field, may I say that the policy of this government is to keep the interest charges upon the public debt as low as possible by maintaining such financial policies as will enable us to raise new funds and convert maturing loans on the most economical basis. When the opportune moment arrives, we propose to offer a conversion loan to the public of this country. But it will be on a basis that will keep faith with investors and will not in any sense involve repudiation of existing contracts. Under such conditions, the issue can be made, it is believed, at a rate which will involve a substantial saving to the public treasury.

May I refer also, at this time, to a matter which has received some attention in the public press, namely, the movement on the part of the banks and other financial institutions to reduce the interest rate on savings bank deposits. In my judgment this reduction is a necessary step if we are to reduce the interest rate on bank loans, on mortgages and on long-term bonds to a level where business recovery will be most effectively stimulated. I need not dwell upon the extent to which it will ease the burden of financing for all public bodies by enabling funds to be raised at lower rates. In this matter, therefore, the government is prepared to cooperate by reducing the rate of interest paid on postal savings deposits.

Finally, I wish to refer to the contribution of the chartered banks to the orderly financing of our economic life. Under the impact of the severest financial storm that history records, our banking system has fully maintained its enviable reputation, meeting every demand upon it and retaining the fullest confidence of the public. The annual bank statements which have been issued recently indicate an exceptionally strong and liquid position, while the chief concern of our banks would appear to be the difficulty of finding satisfactory outlets for the investment of their surplus reserves.

A bill has already been introduced in this house providing for the extension of existing bank charters until July 1, 1934. Before that date the periodic revision of the Bank Act will have taken place. Speaking in this house more than a year ago, the right hon. the Prime Minister, raised the question as to whether or not a central bank should be established in Canada. In recent months the question has been widely discussed, but it must be recognized that it is a highly technical matter, upon which conclusions should be reached only in the light of the fullest enquiry into all aspects of the problem. The government proposes, therefore, to appoint a royal commission to study the organization and working of our entire banking and monetary system, to consider the arguments for and against a central banking institution and to make recommendations for revising or supplementing our existing banking and monetary legislation. I need scarcely say that the endeavour will be made to secure a body of experts, wherever they may be found whose competence and whose freedom from bias will command the respect of every section of the Canadian public. The intention is that the commission should begin its investigation at an early date, should adjourn, if necessary, in order to consider its findings in the light of any recommendations that may be made by the World Monetary conference, and should submit a report which would become the basis for study by the banking and commerce committee at the next session of parliament.

The brief reference which I have made to the financial situation in this country may well be a source of satisfaction to Canadians, having regard to world conditions. I do not overlook the darker elements in the picture—the low level of business activity, the shrinkage of trade, the pressure of low prices and of existing debts, the increase of unemployment and the various social costs which it involves. Nevertheless, it means much for the prospect of future recovery that as a nation Canada is able to take care of her foreign commitments without undue strain; that our financial structure continues intact and our credit remains unimpaired in the markets of the world.

Taxation Revenues 1932-33

The continuance of the decline in business activity and in commodity prices had the inevitable effect, in Canada as in other countries, of a continuing fall in public revenues. This was particularly marked in taxation revenue from which the dominion derives over 80 per cent of its total receipts.

Of the major sources of taxation revenue, the income tax alone will yield the sum estimated. When the fiscal year ends on March 31st, income tax receipts, as now estimated, will approximate $62,000,000 as compared with an estimate of $60,000,000 and a yield during the previous fiscal year of $61,255,000.

The customs tariff still ranks first as a contributor to the dominion treasury, but its yield of $72,000,000 for 1932-33 is substantially below the customs revenues of last year. This decline reflects, of course, the fall in commodity prices and the gradual shrinkage of international trade due in part to exchange restrictions and chaotic monetary conditions. The fall in excise duties, which are estimated to produce $38,594,000, was slightly less rapid than that in customs duties.

Because of the increase in the rate from 4 per cent to 6 per cent, the sales tax again rose to third place in the list of revenue producers. Though the higher rate was not fully effective during the entire year, the return will exceed $58,000,000 and closely approach that of the income tax and the customs tariff. If to sales tax receipts we add the yield of the various other excise and miscellaneous taxes imposed by the Special War Revenue Act, we have a total estimated return of $85,432,000 or over 33 per cent of our total taxation revenue.

The following table gives a comparative statement of the estimated receipts from taxes for the fiscal year now closing and the previous four years:

Public Service Revenues

The sum of $52,709,932 will, it is estimated, be collected by way of revenues from the various public services. This is slightly larger than the corresponding figure for the previous year.

The chief source under this head is the Post Office Department, the revenue of which is estimated at $31,129,243. This is slightly less than the estimate and less than the total for 1931-32. On the other hand, post office expenditures have been reduced more rapidly with the result that a deficit of $2,214,000 in 1931-32 has been turned into an expected net revenue of approximately $567,000 during the current year. The figures for post office receipts do not include any credit for handling the mail of the various branches of the public service free of charge, nor does the department's expenditure take into account disbursements made by Public Works and other departments on account of Post Office.

The second largest item of public service revenues is interest on investments, representing interest on advances to harbour commissions, provinces, etc., and including the regular payments by Roumania on its loan. The total this year will exceed $11,500,000, as compared with $9,330,125 last year. Included in the total is the payment of $807,000 by the chartered banks for interest upon advances under the Finance Act. The corresponding payment last year was $360,247.

A five-year comparison of non-tax revenues follows:

Included in casual revenue in the above table is $1,400,000 received from the sale of radio licences. This compares with $514,177 received during the previous year when the fee was $1 compared with the present $2.

Special Receipts

Special receipts were not as large as during either of the previous two years, primarily because nothing has been received on account of German reparations since the Hoover moratorium. From the Custodian of Enemy Property, however, there has been received $4,000,000, which has been taken into the accounts in part as an offset to the disbursements from the consolidated revenue fund in respect of compensation paid to civilians for damages sustained in the war.

Summary of Revenues

Adding special receipts to the returns from taxation and public service revenues, we reach a grand total revenue of $315,290,000, which is $18,549,000 less than the figure for the previous year.

A comparison of revenues for the last five fiscal years is given in the following table:

Ordinary Expenditures 1932-33

The ordinary expenditures for the year are estimated at $364,425,000, which is $8,080,000 less than the figure for 1931-32. Whilst this expenditure is $130,000 more than was estimated, this slight increase must be considered in the light of the fact that after the budget estimate was made, supplementary estimates were passed, amounting to $7,644,000. By means of rigid control over expenditures, it was possible to effect a total saving of upwards of $12,000,000 from the total amounts voted by parliament.

In previous budgets it has been customary to give a statement of ordinary expenditures by services. The following five-year summary is given on the basis of expenditures by departments (with sub-heads for the more important services), in the belief that this classification will be more serviceable.

Premium, Discount and Exchange

It will be noted that only the net balance of the above account is included in the figures. During this fiscal year, the expenditure for this purpose will, it is estimated, total $8,000,000. Of this amount, $7,962,000 represents premium paid on gold purchased by the mint, the balance representing exchange on sundry items. This expenditure was more than offset on the revenue side by credits totalling $8,301,000, resulting from the sale of New York funds acquired by the shipment of gold, the discount on sterling purchased to meet London requirements, and the discount on sterling securities purchased below par for sinking fund purposes. This makes a net revenue for the year of $301,000. The inclusion of the net balance only in the accounts avoids the undue inflation of revenue and expenditure arising primarily from the governmental policy of centralizing and controlling the purchase and export of gold.

Capital Expenditures

The amount voted for capital expenditure was $9,678,100, of which $9,123,000 will be spent. Last year the expenditures on capital account amounted to $16,980,000 and for the year 1930-31 the expenditure was $28,222,000.

Classified on the usual three-fold basis, capital expenditures for the last five years are presented in the following table:

Capital Expenditures
(000 omitted)

	1928-29	1929-30	1930-31	1931-32	Estimated. 1932-33

Total capital expenditures	$22,809	$22,561	$28,222	$16,980	$9,123

Special Expenditures

Special expenditures, it is estimated, will amount to $42,483,000. This represents a reduction of $12,993,000 from the previous year.

The two chief items in this classification are wheat bonus and unemployment relief. The carry-over of wheat bonus paid during the current fiscal year is $1,826,260, making a total outlay on this account of $12,734,689—considerably larger than was at first contemplated due to the unexpectedly large crop of 1931.

Unemployment Relief

On unemployment relief, the total expenditure during the year will be $35,603,000, which is a larger amount than the current annual cost of relief due to the fact that there was carried over from the previous year a large expenditure in respect of the Dominion government's share of the cost of relief works, the accounts for which reached us for payment some time after the actual expenditures were incurred by the provinces and municipalities.

The total amount paid in respect of commitments arising out of the 1931 act was $17,300,000, of which $12,400,000 was for the public works just mentioned. The amount paid in respect of commitments carried forward from the 1930 legislation was $553,400, and the payments under the Relief Act of 1932 are estimated at $17,749,600. The whole expenditure may be summarized as follows:

Public works	$12,531,100
Direct relief (including Saskatchewan Relief Commission, $4,600,000)	19,630,280
Other expenditures, mainly Dominion projects	3,441,620
	$35,603,000

Loans to Provinces

Loans by the Dominion government to provincial governments under authority of the Relief Act, after taking current repayments into account, amounted to $17,489,725. The loans carried forward from the previous fiscal year totalled $22,544,422, on account of which $2,000,000 was repaid during 1932-33. The total presently outstanding is therefore $38,-034,147.

Two provinces—Manitoba and British Columbia—were given temporary assistance in meeting maturities in New York, undertakings having been given that the loans by the dominion would be repaid from refunding issues in Canada. A portion of such loans has been repaid, as well as $2,000,000 by British Columbia on account of a similar loan made in the previous year, the result being that the loans to assist provinces to meet their New York obligations increased during the year by a net amount of $506,716.

The prairie provinces, in the spring of 1932, granted assistance in the form of loans for seed grain and seeding operations to farmers in areas that had suffered from drought, and the Dominion government co-operated in this emergency measure by lending the provinces the required amounts, aggregating $6,740,000, on account of which $630,000 has been repaid, leaving $6,110,000 presently outstanding.

The loans for other provincial purposes, mainly for the financing of public works and direct relief expenditures, totalled $8,873,009, of which amount $6,500,000 was assigned to the financing of provincial and municipal share of the cost of public works under the 1931 relief program, provision for which extended over into the present fiscal year. It will be remembered that in view of conditions existing in the western provinces, the dominion then undertook not only to pay the agreed share of the cost, but also to assist the provinces in the financing of the balance.

In all these cases, the dominion made the loans only after the most pressing representations by the governments of the provinces concerned, and as a temporary measure until these provinces, admittedly subjected to far-reaching readjustments in their budgets, were afforded the time necessary to arrange the financing of their own obligations.

A summary statement showing amounts of loans and the purposes for which they were authorized, follows:

Loans and Advances, Non-Active

The final classification of expenditure consists of those advances to corporations which are non-interest-bearing and are regarded as non-active. They are charged as expenditures for the year and are not treated as assets in establishing the net debt of the Dominion.

Steamship Companies

Under the head "Canadian National Steamships," provision is made for the operations of the West Indies service and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. There was an improvement in the operating results of the West Indies service in 1932. The cash outlay from the dominion treasury for the year's operations was $753,716; the corresponding figure for 1931 being $916,568. However, as $161,448 of the 1931 loss was not voted until the commencement of the current fiscal year, our accounts for 1932-33 will show total loans of $915,164 to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships.

The operations of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine fleet have been subject to some curtailment and 13 vessels not in service were disposed of during the past year. The dominion treasury furnished $326,613 for 1932 operating loss but, on the other hand, received back from the company $2,624,000 as a credit to previous years' advances. Of the latter amount, $600,000 represented working capital released as a result of lower commodity prices and diminished fleet and $2,000,000, a surplus transferred from the company's insurance fund. This fund accumulated by reason of the fact that the annual charges for the cost of insurance were greater than the losses realized, and as the government has financed directly the whole cost of the merchant marine, it is appropriate that the surplus so accumulated should, particularly in view of the reduction which has been effected in the operations of the company, be now returned as a credit against the loans made by the government in previous years. Taking into consideration these refunds, the accounts for the year will show a credit under the classification "Canadian National Steamships" of $1,383,000.

The other non-active advances include $500,000 to the Quebec harbour commission, $2,447,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to enable the company to keep its shops open and provide employment for labour and $395,000 for Montreal harbour bridge deficit. The net requirements for loans and advances non-active will therefore be $1,959,000, as shown in the following statement which gives comparisons also for the previous four years:

Summary of Expenditures

Grouping the 1932-33 expenditures together as in the following comparative table, it will be observed that the total of government expenditures for the year amounted to $417,990,000 as compared with $448,073,000 in 1931-32, a reduction of $30,000,000.

Canadian National Railways

All of the money required for the Canadian National Railways in 1932 was provided from the dominion treasury.

It is well-known that as regards the volume of railway traffic, the year was very disappointing. Taking the system as a whole gross operating revenues suffered a decline of 19 per cent or over $39,000,000 as compared with the previous year. Notwithstanding that the management paralleled this decrease of $39,000,000 in gross earnings by a reduction of $44,000,000 in operating expenses, the net financial result for the year, after absorbing fixed charges due the public and exchange premium, was only slightly more favourable than in 1931. The dominion was required to provide in cash $60,058,506 for deficits, as compared with $60,968,438 in the previous year. These figures are for the whole system, including eastern lines, and take no account of interest amounting to $35,500,000 accrued in the accounts of the railways, but not paid, on loans by the government to the company.

In addition to provision for deficits, cash must also be furnished for debt retirement and capital expenditures. The former are, of course, fixed and uncontrollable. Capital expenditures, however, have been drastically curtailed, the net in 1932, after crediting equipment retirements, amounting to $799,158, as compared with a corresponding figure of $34,373,262 in 1931.

The following statement gives a comparison of the financial requirements of the system for 1932, as compared with the budget estimates, and actual requirements in 1931:

Canadian National Railways—Financial requirements

Less working capital available	4,231,997	.....	633,155
Amount required	68,135,845	67,717,400	108,976,265

Of the total of $72,367,842 required by the railways in 1932, $4,231,977, it will be seen, was secured from the working capital funds of the company; the balance of $68,135,845 was furnished by the government—$6,635,845 by payment of the deficit on the eastern lines as a charge on the consolidated revenue fund, and $61,500,000 by loan to the company under authority of the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Acts, passed at the 1932 session. The whole of the amount authorized was paid.

One of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Railways and Transportation, to which effect is being given in the legislation now before parliament, is that sums which are required to meet deficits should be voted by parliament annually. To implement this recommendation, the government has submitted an estimate of $53,422,661 in respect of the income deficit of the system in 1932, (excluding the loss on eastern lines already provided for by vote). This amount will be credited against the loans of $61,500,000, above referred to, leaving a balance owing the government of $8,077,339, which will remain standing as an interest-bearing loan, representing as it does outlay for capital account and debt reduction.

At the same time, loans of $41,121,216 made by the government to the Canadian National Railway Company in the fiscal year 1931-32 in respect of railway operations in 1931, will be transferred from the category of active to non-active assets, as these also represent loans for deficits. They will be added to the $614,000,000 of non-active assets shown in the public accounts for loans to railway companies and for the purchase of capital stock.

In so far as the accounts of the railway company are concerned, the ultimate treatment of government advances, prior to the year 1932, representing partly losses and partly capital expenditures, will be governed by the action of the proposed board of trustees to whom the control and management of the railways will be entrusted. The royal commission has recommended that the question of the capital structure of the system have the early attention of the board of trustees. It should be understood, however, that so far as the government's accounts are concerned, the effect of treating these railway advances as non-active assets, has already been to absorb them fully into the government debt.

As at March 31, 1933, the funded debt of the Canadian National Railways due the public will amount to about $1,263,000,000, having been reduced by $11,000,000 in the past year. Of the amount outstanding, $965,000,000 bears the guarantee of the dominion.

The company has also been able to retire a temporary debt of $9,008,250, by the utilization of working capital released through reductions in stores and material accounts. This debt represented the construction cost of the Manitoba Northern railway, a branch line undertaken in 1927 and financed under authority of order in council by temporary bank loans.

Harbour Commissions

Advances to harbour commissions totalled $6,657,000, a considerable reduction from the previous year when upwards of $14,000,000 was loaned. For the most part, this sum represents capital cost of port developments inaugurated some years ago. A statement of the advances in 1932-33 and four previous years, and the total advances to date, is as follows:

It has been the practice to carry these loans, with the exception of those for the Quebec commission and the Montreal harbour bridge deficit, as active assets, on the assumption that they represented capital works that would sustain the debt incurred for them. Clearly, that has not been the situation with respect to the Chicoutimi, Three Rivers, Halifax and Saint John commissions. Interest can be paid only because it is added to the construction cost. It is proposed to transfer the advances to these commissions totalling $26,000,000, to the non-active category at once, as the financial position of these commissions is anything but satisfactory. It may be observed that Sir Alexander Gibb's recommendations for the control and operation of national ports would, if put into effect, involve further adjustments in the manner of recording the expenditures which the government has made for their development.

Canadian Farm Loan Board

The dominion continued to purchase at par the board's 5 per cent bonds to the extent that loaning operations required. Bonds purchased amounted to $850,000 and a subscription of $70,650 was made to capital stock

The capital furnished from the dominion treasury for the operations of the board now aggregates $8,137,115, divided as follows:

Initial capital	$5,050,000
Purchase of bonds	2,650,000
Purchase of capital stock	437,115
	$8,137,115

Having presented the revenues and expenditures under the appropriate classifications, we are now in a position to indicate the net results of the dominion's accounts for the year. Minor adjustments have yet to be made before the accounts are closed, but the figures given are believed to approximate the final balances for the year.

With ordinary expenditures totalling $364,425,000 and revenues of $310,817,000 it will be observed that the resulting deficit on ordinary account is $53,608,000.

When the budget was brought down last year, it was expected that the taxation proposals then submitted would increase the receipts to such an extent that there would be at least a balancing of the budget on ordinary account. The actual expenditure, as has been indicated has closely approximated the estimate. The explanation for the deficiency on ordinary account is therefore found in the failure of the revenues to attain the expected yield due to falling prices and shrinkage in business activity.

Special expenditures, including $37,400,000 for unemployment relief and wheat bonus, amounted to $42,483,000. If against this sum there is applied $4,473,000 received in special revenues, there remains a balance of special expenditures not provided from income, of $38,010,000. In addition there are the capital expenditures of $9,123,000 and net loans and advances non-active of $1,959,000. The resulting increase of debt on government operations for the year is therefore $102,700,000, as compared with a corresponding figure in the previous year of $114,234,000.

To give effect to the assimilation in our accounts of the deficit of the Canadian National Railways, the increase in debt of $102,700,000 on government operations will be augmented, as previously referred to, by the addition of a special charge of $53,422,000, resulting in a total addition to the debt, after taking into consideration the year's operations both for government and the railways, of $156,122,000.

In the balance sheet, effect will be given also to the transfer from active to non-active assets of $41,000,000 of advances to the Canadian National Railways in 1931-32, and of $26,000,000 of loans to harbour commissions, as already referred to.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Loan Flotations

The dominion has been able to arrange for the orderly financing of all requirements during the year, including provision for maturing securities and the financing of the Canadian National Railways.

External borrowings in 1932-33 were for the purpose of meeting maturing obligations in New York. An issue of one-year 4 per cent treasury notes dated October 1, 1932, for the amount of $60,000,000, was sold to a New York banking group at 99·28 and accrued interest. From the proceeds of this issue a 5 per cent temporary bank loan, then standing at $13,000,000 but originally negotiated in 1931 for $19,000,000, almost entirely for railway purposes, was paid off and the cash balances of the dominion held in New York were restored to the extent that they had been utilized in making periodic payments on account of this indebtedness. The other maturing obligation paid from the proceeds of this sale was the issue of $40,000,000 two-year 4 per cent notes which fell due December 1, 1932.

In Canada $85,000,000 was raised by the sale of treasury notes to the chartered banks. The first issue dated August 1, 1932, was for one year at 4½ per cent and was sold at par and accrued interest. The other issue of two-year notes, dated November 1, 1932, was for $35,000,000 at 4 per cent and was sold at par and accrued interest. In addition, for temporary financing, $12,000,000 of 90-day 4 per cent treasury bills dated October 15, 1932, were sold to the banks at par. These were called for redemption on November 3.

A public issue of securities was made in Canada at the end of October. The offering was for $80,000,000 4 per cent bonds dated October 15, 1932, divided into two maturities:—$25,000,000 of three-year bonds and $55,000,000 of twenty-year bonds. The three-year bonds were sold at 99·20 and interest, yielding 4·28 per cent; and the twenty-year bonds at 93·45 and interest, yielding 4½ per cent. The three-year maturity was immediately over-subscribed about three times, and all subscriptions in excess of $25,000 were allotted on a percentage basis. The twenty-year maturity moved more slowly but the books were closed shortly before the date set with a slight over-subscription, the total amount of the issue being $56,191,000. The whole issue is payable in Canada only, and the twenty-year bonds are subject to redemption at par after fifteen years.

The sale of the 4 per cent loan of 1932 was in charge of a committee representing banks and investment houses, under the chairmanship of Sir Charles Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, and operated along lines similar to that employed in the national service and conversion loans of 1931.

The expense of raising the loan, including commissions, advertising, printing, and delivery of securities, was about three-quarters of one per cent.

The proceeds of the issue were used for the purpose of paying off $34,449,950 of 5½ per cent renewal loan bonds which remained outstanding after the conversion loan of 1931, and the balance of the proceeds was devoted to the general purposes of the government.

It is well to record that with this issue new ground was broken and for the first time there was offered for public subscription in Canada, a dominion security bearing a 4 per cent coupon.

While this factor produced some sales resistance, notwithstanding that the yield to the investor on the twenty-year maturity was actually 4½ per cent, it speaks well not only for the organization which conducted the sale of the loan, but also for the responsiveness of investors to the prime security of Canada that the issue met with success.

The direct obligations of the dominion in the form of unmatured funded debt are listed in the following statement:

Indirect Liabilities

A statement is submitted presenting in detail the various bond issues guaranteed by the dominion outstanding in the hands of the public as of March 31, 1933, of a total par value of $996,148,354, or $4,300,000 under the figure of a year ago. There are, in addition, contingent liabilities of a special character assumed under the several relief acts. These include guarantees in connection with wheat marketing, the Province of Manitoba Savings Office, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company and Newfoundland.

In the budget speech of last session, mention was made of the guarantee given by the government to chartered banks in respect of their advances to Canadian Co-operative Wheat Producers Limited, arising out of operations in connection with the 1930 crop, and also with respect to the banking accommodation guaranteed to the wheat pools in the three western provinces in connection with the marketing of the 1931 crop. In connection with the latter operations, the advances made by the banks and guaranteed by the government were repaid with the exception of small balances transferred to the present crop year, and no liability has accrued against the government in respect of its guarantee for the marketing of the 1931 crop.

In response to urgent requests of the governments of the three western provinces, similar arrangements were effected for financing the 1932 crop and consequently, under authority of order in council of September 20, 1932, P.C. 2077, passed pursuant to the Relief Act, 1932, a guarantee was authorized, subject to certain safeguarding provisions, of advances to the three provincial pools arising out of the marketing of last year's crop. In the case of the Manitoba organization, the limit of credit was established at $1,395,000; for Saskatchewan, at $15,000,000; and for Alberta, at $9,000,000. Within the last few days, arrangements were made by which a guarantee was given to enable the pools to distribute an additional 5 cents per bushel to farmers whose grain of the 1932 crop is being marketed on the pool plan. This action was taken so that an increased percentage of the value of their grain might be available at seeding time. Under these guarantees, the liability of the government accrues only after the crop has been marketed, and there is no ground for anticipating any less favourable outcome than in connection with the financing of the crop of the previous year.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

The guarantee of advances to Canadian Co-operative Wheat Producers Limited in connection with the 1930 crop remains in effect, and it was necessary during the past season for the company to increase its liability as a result of stabilizing transactions which it was considered expedient in the public interest to support. To these operations the government gave its guarantee. The steadiness which has developed in the wheat market has undoubtedly vindicated the action then taken and the question of ultimate liability will depend entirely upon the future course of wheat prices.

By order in council of April 28, 1932, P.C. 972, effect was given to an undertaking by which, in the month of February of that year, the dominion guaranteed the chartered banks doing business in Winnipeg from loss in respect of the assumption by these banks of all liabilities of the Province of Manitoba Savings Office. The banks received from the province of Manitoba as security for the assumption of such liabilities, $12,442,400 one-year 5½ per cent treasury bills, maturing February 27, 1933, and on the maturity of these bills the banks were willing to accept a renewal, less the sum of $334,098 paid on principal account, provided the guarantee was continued. This the governor in council authorized under minute of February 22, 1933, P.C. 318.

In connection with the Beauharnois power project, the government has guaranteed advances of a principal amount of $15,539,000 made by several of the banks to finance construction work. These advances are secured in practically double this sum by the deposit of first mortgage bonds of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company which, in the opinion of the government affords ample security. The orders in council relating to this guarantee are dated July 11, 1932 (P.C. 1577) and February 6, 1933, (P.C. 213).

Finally, mention may be made of the assistance rendered jointly with the government of the United Kingdom, which enabled Newfoundland to meet interest obligations due January 1 last. The commitment of Canada relates to the guarantee of a bank loan of $625,000, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

The indirect obligations represented by guaranteed securities outstanding in the hands of the public are set out in the statement which follows:

The statistical presentation of the dominion's financial position is completed with the submission of the balance sheet enumerating the assets and liabilities, estimated as of March 31, 1933. Total liabilities are shown at $2,990,315,000. After deducting from this amount active assets made up of cash balances, specie reserve, income-producing and current assets, totalling $391,226,000, the resulting net debt is shown at $2,599,089,000. The statement is as follows:

Estimated Revenues and Expenditures 1933-34

Based upon current rates of taxation the revenues for the next fiscal year are estimated at $287,230,000 made up as follows:

Taxation revenue:
Customs duties	$72,000,000
Excise duties	38,000,000
Income tax	40,000,000
Sales tax	59,000,000
Manufacturers', stamp, importation and other special taxes	26,655,000
		$235,655,000
Non-tax revenue:
Post office	30,100,000
Interest on investments	11,400,000
Other sources	10,075,000
Total		$287,230,000

With revenues so reduced, it becomes incumbent on the government not only to propose measures which will add substantially to the present income, but also to put into effect every reasonable economy in the administrative cost of the public service. The estimates for the ordinary services of government in the fiscal year 1933-34 total $369,429,000, a figure which closely corresponds to the actual expenditure in the present fiscal year after taking into account the estimated increase in interest on public debt and pensions. The gap therefore between the revenues at the present yield and the estimated ordinary expenditures is $82,000,000.

Last year, attention was directed to the extent to which the government had endeavoured to meet existing conditions by reductions in the expenditures within its control. For the purpose of making comparisons, special expenditures for unemployment and farm relief and the railway deficit, are set aside, but all other expenditures on capital as well as ordinary account, are taken into consideration. These expenditures, controllable and uncontrollable together, have fallen from $427,000,000 in 1930-31 to $381,000,000 in the current fiscal year, a reduction of slightly over ten per cent. Opportunities for the reduction of expenses, however, are necessarily confined to the expenditures that are controllable, as opposed to those which are fixed and generally uncontrollable, of which the main items are debt charges, pensions, subsidies and ex-soldiers' care. The controllable expenditures in the present year have been $145,000,000 as compared with $208,000,000 in 1930-31, a decrease of $63,000,000 or thirty per cent. The estimates for next year indicate a further saving of about 3½ millions in this class of expenditure.

Under the urgent pressure of declining revenues, it is considered necessary that further substantial economies should be made. It is proposed therefore that the original allotments to departments of the votes for controllable services should, when supply is released in the new fiscal year, be so modified that ten per cent of the total, or approximately $14,000,000, will be withheld. This saving cannot be achieved by a uniform deduction from all services. The percentage may be smaller in some and larger in others, but the object in view will be to so adjust expenditures that this further economy will be effected with the minimum disturbance to personnel and to essential public services.

It is perhaps hardly necessary to say that such a measure will entail not only the earnest cooperation of employees of the civil service, but also a measure of forbearance on the part of the public generally. Recently, the Treasury Board appointed a committee of officials to review and report upon the cost of government printing and stationery with a view to the formulation of regulations and procedure which would, with an effective cooperation from the civil service, as well as the public, result in substantial savings in that direction. There are other avenues for improved and economical administration which it will be necessary to explore.

In this connection, I may say that with respect to pensioners who are in the employ of the government and who are paid the salary of the position, action will be taken whereby the payment of pension will be suspended during the period of such employment. Where the full salary of the position is not paid, the pension payment may not exceed the amount of the difference between salary received and the established salary of the position. If the pension is greater than the salary, the employee shall elect either to be paid the pension and relinquish the position, or to retain the position and have the pension withheld during the period of such employment. This will be made applicable not only to the government service but also to boards or commissions whose activities are financed from the dominion treasury.

Not only in the government services, but also in the budgets of the railways and other bodies financed by the dominion, are we endeavouring to meet the exigencies of the day. Economies instituted by the Canadian National Railways in the course of the year 1932 will be fully reflected in the 1933 operations. Last week this house gave second reading to the legislation to make effective the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Railways and Transportation, under the provisions of which additional large savings should, in course of time, be attained. Mention may also be made of the proposed legislation relating to the administration and control of our national ports, based upon the report of Sir Alexander Gibb. The measures for coordination of administration and more effective control and supervision of capital expenditures, may be expected to afford further relief to the dominion treasury.

After making allowance for this estimated reduction of $14,000,000, ordinary expenditures will be approximately $68,000,000 in excess of revenues estimated on present rates and yield. Accordingly it is proposed to recommend measures which will, it is anticipated, produce at least $70,000,000 on the basis of present business conditions, leaving a surplus of $2,000,000. Even a slight improvement in price levels and the general volume of business would increase substantially the surplus to be applied agairst capital and special expenditures. Capital expenditures for the coming year are estimated at $7,166,000. It is difficult at this time to make a precise estimate of special expenditures, but in view of the practical completion of public works projects for which commitments had been made under the 1930 and 1931 relief acts, it is clear that the total should be substantially less than during the present fiscal year. Special expenditures and non-active advances will probably not exceed $35,000,000.

If business conditions do not improve, estimated revenues will not cover these special expenditures for unemployment relief nor the Canadian National Railways deficit, estimated at $47,941,000. It is nevertheless the considered view of the government that the reduction in expenditures for the ordinary public services outlined above, and the proposed increases in taxation represent as drastic a fiscal program as should be contemplated at the moment although further proposals with respect to the railway deficit are subject to review before the close of the session.

Income Tax

It is proposed to raise the rate of taxation on incomes of corporation and joint stock companies to 12½ per cent, and to remove the exemption of $2,000 in respect of such incomes. Where a corporation files a consolidated return of its own income and the income of its subsidiaries, the rate of tax is to be 13½ per cent. The surcharge of 5 per cent of the amount of tax otherwise payable in respect of corporation incomes in excess of $5,000 is to be absorbed into the new rate.

In respect of the tax on personal incomes, the statutory exemption, where heretofore $2,400 will be reduced to $2,000, and where heretofore $1,200 will be reduced to $1,000. The exemption for dependent children is to be lowered from $500 to $400. The exemption for parents, grandparents, brothers and sisters, is to be the actual amount expended up to a maximum of $400. The surcharge of 5 per cent in respect of personal incomes in excess of $5,000 will be continued.

A new schedule of rates will be inserted in the act applicable to all incomes in excess of the exemptions and allowances. The changes in the exemptions and in the rates of tax will apply to incomes of 1932. The following statement indicates the proposed increase in taxation in the case of a married person without dependents at various amounts of income:

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Schedule Showing Taxes Payable on Certain Incomes under the present rates and under the proposed rates with an Exemption of $2,000 for Married Persons and $1,000 for Single Persons and commencing the first $1,000 of Taxable Income at 3%.

It is felt that higher rates of taxation could not reasonably be imposed, bearing in mind not only the depleted incomes out of which the tax must be paid but also the fact that in some provinces the same incomes will be subjected to further levies for provincial and/or municipal purposes.

In order to ensure that income from bearer coupons does not escape taxation, it is proposed that all bearer coupons must have attached thereto a duly completed ownership certificate disclosing certain necessary information with respect to the owner of such coupons. The ownership certificates attached to the coupons will be forwarded by the paying agents to the debtor corporations which will be required to segregate them and to file them with the commissioner of income tax under a covering form.

A tax of 5 per cent is to be imposed at the source on all interest or dividends paid by Canadian debtors to non-residents of Canada. In this connection I may remind you that the Dominion Income Tax Act contains a section providing for a credit to Canadian residents in respect of taxes paid abroad, provided that other countries grant reciprocal allowances. Similar provision is contained in the tax legislation of those countries in which there reside any considerable number of persons who would be affected by this new impost.

A tax of 5 per cent is also to be imposed at the source on all interest or dividends received by way of bearer coupons or cheques by Canadian residents where such coupons or cheques are payable, by Canadian debtors, optionally or otherwise in foreign currencies, and such coupons or cheques are cashed in a currency which is at a premium over par of Canadian funds.

The Income War Tax Act will also be subject to other amendments of a minor character, designed primarily to strengthen its administrative provisions.

Sales Tax

The sales tax will remain at 6 per cent as at present. Additional revenue will be derived from a limited adjustment of the exempt and partially exempt list, in the case of a number of articles not primary products which it is believed should, under present conditions, carry a proportionate share of the tax burden. The chief items to be taken from the exempt list are materials and non-permanent equipment entering into the manufacture of goods subject to the sales tax, fuel oil, molasses, corn syrup and sugar cane syrup, cleaned rice, sago and tapioca, certain other processed foodstuffs, and certain types of machinery and appliances.

All items included in schedule IV of the Special War Revenue Act, now taxable at 3 per cent, will be subject to tax at the full rate of 6 per cent, with the exception of articles manufactured or produced by the labour of the blind in institutions in Canada established for their care or under the control or direction of such institutions.

Excise Taxes

Special excise taxes will be levied on the following products at the rates specified; cosmetics and toilet preparations, 10 per cent on the duty paid value, when imported, or the manufacturer's sale price, when manufactured in Canada; automobile tires and tubes, 5 per cent on the duty paid value or the manufacturer's sale price; cigarette papers, in sheets, packaged or not, imported into or manufactured in Canada, 2 cents per hundred leaves; and cigarette tubes, imported into or manufactured in Canada, 5 cents per fifty tubes. In the two last-named cases the tax will be collected by requiring the importer or manufacturer to affix stamps to the packages of paper or tubes.

A special excise tax of 2 cents per pound will also be levied on all refined sugar imported into or refined in Canada. In announcing this tax, however, I call attention to the fact that the government has refrained from imposing any special excise tax on tea, coffee or other similar commodity of general consumption.

It is also proposed to levy an excise tax of 25 cents per gallon on unfermented wort and an excise tax of 50 cents per pound on malt syrup or malt syrup powder, extracts of malt, fluid or not, or any other malt product intended for the brewing of beer.

The provisions of the Special War Revenue Act exempting from the stamp tax, cheques, receipts to banks, money orders, travellers' cheques and post office money orders where such instruments are for an amount not exceeding $5 will be repealed, except in the case of creamery tickets or cheques. The stamp tax on postal notes will be raised from 1 to 3 cents. When matches are put up in books or packages containing less than twenty-one matches, excise tax will be payable at the rate of 3/20ths of one cent per package.

Other amendments to the Special War Revenue Act will include a provision exempting from the note circulation tax the notes of a Canadian chartered bank specially issued to circulate in any British colony or possession other than Canada, to the extent that they are subject to tax by or under the laws of such colony or possession.

Excise Duties

The excise duty on distilled spirits used in the manufacture of proprietary medicines, extracts, essences, perfumed spirits, and pharmaceutical preparations will be raised to $2.50 per proof gallon. An excise duty of $1 per proof gallon will also be imposed on spirits distilled from the juices of native fruits for use by registered wine manufacturers in fortifying native wines.

Customs Tariff

In the early stages of this session, in order to implement agreements entered into at the Imperial Economic conference, amendments were effected involving 260 items of our tariff schedules.

Recently, a tariff board was established. In these circumstances, it is deemed undesirable to propose, either in whole or in part, any major revision.

Certain amendments of a minor character, some 57 in number, are submitted. These may be sub-divided as follows:

Clarifications of wording	21
Reductions under all tariffs	15
Reductions under British preferential tariff	3
Reductions under intermediate and general tariffs	12
Increases under intermediate and general tariffs	5
Increases under British preferential tariff	1

The rates in our tariff schedules were made having in mind parity of exchange. Consequently when the pound sterling became depreciated, it was necessary to value it for purposes of special or dumping duty at $4.40, in order to offset in part the advantage which the British exporter obtained in our markets as a result of the depreciated pound. After careful examination, it is believed that under present conditions this valuation can be lowered with safety. I am therefore pleased to announce that, effective to-morrow, the value of the pound sterling for this purpose will be $4.25.

The government has given most careful consideration to the problems with which our agricultural and fishing interests are confronted in selling their products in countries with depreciated and fluctuating currencies. As a result it is proposed to establish a fund to be known as the agricultural stabilization fund.

From it there will be paid to exporters to the British market the difference between the price actually received and the pound sterling valued at $4.60. In other words, to the extent that the pound sterling falls below $4.60 the difference will be made good from this fund.

This will apply to the following commodities: animals, meats (including bacon and hams), poultry, fresh fish, canned fish, tobacco, cheese, milk products, canned fruits, canned vegetables, maple products, eggs and honey.

The direct result of this policy will mean increased returns to producers, and it is believed that the indirect returns will be even greater. To-day the exporter has to insure himself against losses arising from fluctuations in currency, and this insurance can only be secured at the expense of the producer through the payment to him of the lowest possible price. With an assured fixed and certain cash return the exporter can afford to pay the producer the full value of his product. There remains the additional advantage that as exports are stimulated there would follow improved prices in the home market. Appropriate measures will be taken to give effect to this policy.

It is fully recognized that the additional measures of taxation will involve further sacrifices and the assumption of further burdens by individuals, commerce and industry. Four years of stress and strain resulting from a world depression of unparalleled magnitude cannot but make these burdens more difficult to bear. Nevertheless, it is of paramount importance that as to current expenditures at least we should live within our income. We cannot do less and preserve our national credit. Should that be impaired it would be found that the ultimate sacrifice involved in the effort to restore it would be many times greater.

It has been urged in many quarters that we should balance our budget to the extent of providing currently for the additional expenditures we must make to provide for deficits of the Canadian National Railways and for unemployment relief. Beyond question this would be the ideal course. But to attempt to pursue it under existing conditions would—in my judgment—not only place an unbearable burden upon the taxpayer of to-day, but would as well retard that recovery of business and industry which is essential to our future well-being.

With a slight improvement in business our present taxation will produce an expanding revenue sufficient to provide a margin beyond our current needs. Furthermore as conditions improve the drain upon the treasury for the national railways and unemployment relief will, at the same time, automatically diminish. With expanding revenue upon the one hand and lessening demands upon the other, we can approach gradually and in orderly manner that goal which we must determine to attain at the earliest possible moment, namely, to pay our way year by year, and contemplate a reduction rather than an increase in our national debt. Meantime it is not unreasonable to spread over a period of years the exceptional burden imposed upon us by the unusual severity of existing world conditions.

That conditions throughout the world are grave it would be idle to deny. That we have our own serious problems to solve is beyond question. At the same time we have no occasion to despair for the future, on the contrary I am of the firm belief that we can look forward with complete confidence to better and happier days. We still retain the same rich and varied resources, we are still blessed with those qualities of resourcefulness which are a heritage from our sturdy pioneer forbears. As we have overcome all obstacles which in the past have bestrewn our national path, so will we continue to overcome those which lie ahead.

Mr. Speaker, I beg to give notice that when we are in committee of ways and means I shall move the following resolutions:

Resolutions to Amend the Customs Tariff

1. Resolved, That the Customs Tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter thirty-nine of the Acts of 1929, chapter thirteen of the Acts of 1930, (first session), chapter three of the Acts of 1930 (second session), and chapter thirty of the Acts of 1931, be further amended by adding to Section six thereof the following subsection:—

(9) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the Governor in Council may from time to time and as occasion requires order and direct, subject to such exceptions as may be made, what shall be the rate of exchange fixed for any currency in computing the value for duty of goods imported into Canada from any place or country the currency of which is depreciated, and in case a sum in Canadian currency less than the invoice value of the goods in the currency of the place or country of export, computed at the rate of exchange so ordered, be paid for the goods, the actual selling price of the goods to the importer shall be regarded as less than the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption, and the provisions of this Section shall apply and special or dumping duty shall apply equal to the difference between the value of the invoice computed at the current rate of exchange or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the Governor in Council, and the value of such invoice, computed at the rate of exchange for duty so ordered as aforesaid, or may be less than such difference as the Governor in Council may from time to time order and direct; and the Governor in Council may order and direct that in all cases of sales or consignments of goods imported into Canada, where the importer owns, controls or is interested in the business of the exporter, or the exporter owns, controls or is interested in the business of the importer, or the importer and exporter operate under a controlling or holding company, notwithstanding the expressed terms of the sale or consignment, the transaction shall be regarded as a sale and the actual selling price to the purchaser in Canada shall be taken to be the value of the goods in the currency of the place or country of export converted into Canadian currency at the current rate of exchange, or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the Governor in Council, and shall be regarded as less than the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption and the provisions of this Section shall apply and special or dumping duty shall be deemed to apply equal to the difference between the value of the invoice computed at the current rate of exchange or at the average current rate from time to time fixed by order of the Governor in Council, and the value of such invoice computed at the rate of exchange for duty so ordered as aforesaid, or may be less than such difference as the Governor in Council may from time to time order and direct.

Any order in council made hereunder may be varied, extended or revoked at any time by the Governor in Council.

This subsection shall be deemed to have had effect from and after the first day of September, 1931.

2. Resolved, That Schedule A to the Customs Tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter seventeen of the Acts of 1928, chapter thirty-nine of the Acts of 1929, chapter thirteen of the Acts of 1930 (first Session), chapter three of the Acts of 1930 (second Session), chapter thirty of the Acts of 1931, chapter forty-one of the Acts of 1932, and chapter six of the Acts of 1932-33, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 79, 99c, 101, 123a, 157a, 173, 194, 203a, 203b, 206a, 208, 208e, 208o, 209, 210e, 278, 315, 315a, 316, 327, 353, 366b, 385a, 409j, 409q, 417, 438b, 438d, 445c, 471, 475, 476a, 485, 520c, 568, 571, 682a, 756, 783, and 799, the several enumerations of goods respectively and several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said Schedule A:—

3. Resolved, That Schedule B to the Customs Tariff, being Chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, be amended by inserting therein the following Item, enumeration and rates of drawback of customs duties:—

Item No.	Goods	When Subject to Drawback	Portion of Duty (Not including special Duty or Dumping Duty) Payable as Drawback
1063	Materials, including all parts.....	When used in the manufacture of engines for use exclusively in the equipment of aircraft.....	60 p.c.

4. Resolved, That Schedule C to the Customs Tariff, being Chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, be amended by deleting therefrom Item 1215 and by inserting in said Schedule C the following Items:—

1215 Used or second hand automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds, manufactured prior to the calendar year in which importation into Canada is sought to be made.
Provided, that this Item does not affect in any manner automobiles and motor vehicles,—
(a) Imported under Tariff Items 702, 705a, 706, 707 or 708, or under tourists' or travellers' vehicle permits;
(b) Imported by a bona fide settler on a first arrival but not entitled to entry free of duty under Tariff Item 705a;
(c) Bona fide purchased on or before the first day of June, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one, by consumers for their own use and not for resale;
(d) Forfeited or confiscated for any offence under the Customs laws, or the laws of any province of Canada;
(e) Left by bequest.

1216 Used or second-hand aeroplanes and aircraft of all kinds.
Provided, that this Item does not affect in any manner aeroplanes and aircraft,—
(a) Imported under tariff Items 707 or 708, or engaged solely in international traffic, or brought in by non-resident tourists for temporary use under permit issued by the Department of National Revenue;
(b) Bona fide purchased on or before the twenty-second day of March, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-three, by consumers for their own use and not for resale;
(c) Forfeited or confiscated for any offence under the Customs laws, the Air Regulations or the laws of any province of Canada;
(d) Imported by the Department of National Defence for military purposes.

5. Resolved, That any enactment founded upon Resolutions 2, 3 and 4 of the foregoing Resolutions to amend the Customs Tariff or Schedules thereto, shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-second day of March, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-three, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing Resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for consumption for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

EXCISE ACT

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act, chapter sixty of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, and to provide:—

1. (i) That section one hundred and forty-nine of the said Act, as amended by chapter eight of the Statutes of 1932, be amended by providing that the rate of excise duties set out by the second paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of the said section be fixed at two dollars and fifty cents per gallon of the strength of proof on spirits used in the manufacture of patent and proprietary medicines, extracts, essences, perfumed spirits, and pharmaceutical preparations manufactured in bond, instead of $2.40, $2.42 or $2.43 as set out in the said paragraphs:

"(ii) That said section one hundred and forty-nine be further amended by adding thereto the following subsection as subsection two thereof:

"(2) There shall be imposed, levied and collected on all spirits distilled from the juices of native fruits for use exclusively by registered wine manufacturers under prescribed regulations, a special excise duty as follows:

On every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, one dollar and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon, and the said duty shall be payable by the registered wine manufacturer at the time such spirits are taken out of warehouse."

2. That subsection two of section one hundred and fifty of the said Act be amended by repealing paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"On every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, two dollars and fifty cents, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than one gallon."

thereby increasing to a flat rate of two dollars and fifty cents the duties already imposed at $2.40, $2.42 and $2.43 as the case may be on spirits used by licensed druggists in the manufacture or preparation of medicines, etc.

3. That any enactment founded on the foregoing paragraphs of this Resolution shall be deemed to have come into effect on the twenty-second day of March, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-three, and to have applied to all goods taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Special War Revenue Act, chapter one hundred and seventy-nine of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter fifty of the Statutes of 1928, chapter fifty-seven of the Statutes of 1929, chapter forty-three of the Statutes of 1930, chapter fifty-four of the Statutes of 1931 and chapter fifty-four of the Statutes of 1932, and to provide:

1. That section four of the said act be amended to provide that notes of a bank in circulation in any British colony or possession other than Canada, under the authority of section sixty-two of the Bank Act and in respect of which taxation is levied and payable by or under the laws of such colony or possession, shall be exempt from the taxation required to be made under sections three and four of the said Act, provided that if the tax imposed by or under such laws is less than the tax imposed under section three of the said Act the amount of such exemption shall not exceed the amount required to be paid by or under the laws of such colony or possession in respect of such notes.

2. That the provisions exempting from the stamp tax cheques, receipts to banks, money orders, travellers' cheques and post office money orders, where such instruments are for an amount not exceeding $5 be repealed, except in the case of cheques issued by butter or cheese factories to producers of milk or cream.

3. That section seventy of the said Act, as enacted by chapter fifty-four of the Statutes of 1931, be amended by providing that the stamp tax on postal notes shall be at the rate of three cents.

4. That section fifty-eight of the said Act, as enacted by chapter forty-three of the Statutes of 1930, be amended by adding thereto and making liable to the excise tax on sale, transfer or assignment of stocks, bonds, etc., the following:

"Any participating interest in the operations or profits of any association, company, or corporation, represented by certificates, documents, or other instruments of title capable of being sold, transferred or assigned, including mineral deeds, oil royalties, and fixed investment trust shares issued by a trustee and representing equitable ownership in deposited securities."

5. That section seventy-six of the said act be amended by providing that when matches are put up in packages containing less than twenty-one matches each the tax shall be payable at the rate of three-twentieths of one cent per package instead of at the rate of three-sixteenths of one cent.

6. That part X of the said act be amended by adding thereto the following as section 77 (a):

"77(a). Except as hereinafter provided, every manufacturer and every importer of cigarette papers in packets shall affix to every packet of cigarette papers manufactured by him or imported into Canada, an adhesive or other stamp of the value of 2 cents for each 100 leaves or fraction of 100 leaves contained in such packet.

2. On motion of Mr. Ralston, the debate was adjourned.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUATION FOR ONE YEAR OF PROVISIONS OF RELIEF ACT, 1932

The house resumed from Monday, March 20, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Gordon. Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to continue in force the provisions of the Relief Act, 1932, until the 31st of March, 1934.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The debate is on the second amendment. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BENNETT: The amendments are all carried.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the nature of the second amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister was to give us some information which would enable us to form an idea as to the basis, if any, on which he was estimating the amounts that would be necessary for the next year. Can he tell us what was paid out to assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine during the last year under this act?

Mr. GORDON: The only direct payment was the sum of $3,000 for the fitting up of one of the ships for the cattle trade, I believe.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: From the statement which has just been made by the Minister of Finance it is evidently intended that certain payments shall be made which will facilitate the export of cattle and the like from this country. Is the money for that purpose to come out of the relief fund?

Mr. GORDON: I assume it would. The act makes provision for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of such sums as may be expediently paid for that purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seems to me that is confusing the issue very much. The resolution before us is for the relief of unemployment. Surely the minister cannot justify paying out of funds voted for relief purposes moneys to assist producers in the export of their produce, using moneys intended to relieve the unemployed to bonus those who have employment.

At the moment I do not take any exception to money being used to assist in the export of live stock and products of different kinds, but I do take exception to this parliament voting money for relief which is to be used for the purpose of subsidizing producers or exporters.

Mr. GORDON: Of course the act places a limitation on the amount to be devoted to direct relief and as hon. members know, what is meant by direct relief is set out in the regulations. The act also makes provision in terms for the use of some money for other purposes as occasion may arise, and one of those purposes is that which the right hon. gentleman has just mentioned. I think it is well understood that the act contemplates that if money can be usefully employed in that way it should be so employed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In his remarks the Minister of Finance clearly indicated that there were to be certain expenditures on account of relief. In addition he spoke of expenditures for other purposes, one of them being to subsidize—I think we might call it that—producers who are exporting certain commodities to Great Britain. I do think, if such is the case, that the house should vote these amounts separately; it ought to know what it is voting in exact terms. If these amounts in the nature of subsidies are to be paid, I do not think that should be done under the guise of unemployment relief; they should be voted distinctly for the purpose of furthering production and the export of certain commodities from this country to Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: If the right hon. gentleman will observe, the power to assist agricultural development has been contained in the relief bills for the last two years. This provision in the present bill will be made use of as indicated by the Minister of Finance in the statement he just made; that is, whatever amount may be involved will be a charge under this measure, just as it would have been last year if such payments had been made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the Prime Minister sees what will follow as a result; we will be told that trade with Great Britain in these products has increased as a result of the United Kingdom-Canada agreement, while as a matter of fact if that trade does increase it will be because we have voted for the relief of unemployment money which is being used to subsidize the export of certain commodities to Britain. To me that does not seem a fair way to deal with the appropriations which this house is asked to make. I would ask the minister if there are any other objects or services, for which the Minister of Finance has indicated provision is to be made, payment for which will come out of money we are now voting for relief purposes.

Mr. GORDON: I know of no others at the present time, but I can easily understand that occasions might arise when the provisions of this act might be resorted to for other purposes, and I think very properly so.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: This information may have been given, but if so I did not catch it. I should like to ask the minister just how much was expended last year on that kind of direct relief which is covered now by the $20,000,000 limitation.

Mr. GORDON: The expenditure this year which I estimate will not be more than $20,000,000 covers all that sort of relief that was given during this fiscal year.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is hardly the information I wanted. How much was expended last year on that sort of direct relief which will be covered this year by this $20,000,000?

Mr. GORDON: Nothing was paid out this year except money for direct relief, and the amount actually paid out in that way up to February 28, 1933, amounted to $11,898,291.76. There are other commitments which will come in and which will be shown in the report which will be tabled under the act. As my hon. friend understands, sometimes the accounts are delayed; in fact quite recently we paid small accounts coming in under the 1930 legislation. However, that is substantially the position.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I wanted to ascertain whether the limitation of $20,000,000 inserted in the act this year will prove adequate as compared with the expenditures of last year for the same purposes. I understand that we did not spend $20,000,000 last year on direct relief.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GORDON: I estimate, and I am certain that I am right, that the $20,000,000 named in the present legislation will be sufficient to take care of direct relief for the coming year. Last year, of course, the amount was greater, but with better organization, a better system, and I think with some improvement in general conditions—it is slow but I think it is noticeable—I believe the expenditure will be cut down.

Mr. HEAPS: If this amount of $20,000,000 is not sufficient to cover the cost of relief what course of action will be open to the government?

Mr. GORDON: I do not think that difficulty will arise, but unquestionably if it does present itself it will come about when parliament is in session, and the government can apply to the house for assistance.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister has the information at hand with regard to the number of families that have been put on the land in British Columbia, and if he could say where they have been located.

Mr. GORDON: I believe the government of British Columbia have placed a small number—probably less than one hundred—of families on the land under their agreement. I am not disappointed, however, because it is essential that a rigid selection be made if any permanent colonization is to result. The actual number has not been reported to us by the province of British Columbia as yet.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the unemployed who are placed on the land. Is the land selected by the federal government or by the provincial government? What sort of land is it? Is the land improved; is it government land, or is it land that has been abandoned by other people? Could the minister give us some particulars along this line?

Mr. GORDON: Committees are set up in each province of Canada to deal with the matters to which the hon. gentleman has referred. It is obvious that the purchase of land must be discouraged. In many municipalities throughout Canada there are abandoned farms belonging to those municipalities, and generally we have found the municipal authorities anxious to cooperate in placing these farms at the disposal of the various committees. The purchase of farms is discouraged for the reasons I indicated last night and during the course of the debate a week or so ago; families starting on the land have very little hope of paying a large purchase price for their farms. I am of course not a farmer, as is no doubt obvious to most of the farmer members of the house, but it is quite apparent that one of the outstanding causes of so many failures is the fact that people go on land with a burden of debt which in too many cases spells their ultimate disaster. Therefore the attention and the efforts of the committees throughout Canada are directed towards placing these people on lands which have fallen to and are now owned by the municipalities, and in a larger measure upon crown lands owned by the provinces, the purchase price of which is practically negligible.

Mr. SPENCER: Will these people be on a rental basis in relation to the municipalities?

Mr. GORDON: No; that has not been the experience of the committees. The municipalities in some instances donate land without reference to arrears of taxes; and with respect to crown lands, although I have not the exact details, I do know that the purchase price in Ontario—and I believe it is about the same if not more favourable in Quebec—is 50 cents an acre, and the locatee has ample time in which to pay. In fact, it is spread over five or six years.

Mr. SPENCER: Is any of the money given by the government allowed to be used in part payment or as a down payment?

Mr. GORDON: None of the money which the Dominion government subscribes is permitted to be used as a down payment on land. In fact, the committees throughout the country have insisted that none of the $600 subscribed through the three-way agreement shall be used for that purpose. The agreement with the various provinces provides that. The whole of the $600, which is given in progressive payments to the locatee, is therefore devoted to establishing him on the land on which he is located.

Mr. SPENCER: If men who have been farming for years have found it necessary to throw up their lands because they cannot make a success, does the minister think that men who do not know as much about agriculture, and who are under-financed can possibly be successful on land so poor that it has a value of only fifty cents an acre? As one who has had a great deal of experience in agriculture, I cannot see how these people can have the ghost of a chance under the circumstances.

Mr. DONNELLY: With regard to the seventy municipalities that suffered three crop failures, I understand that one hundred per cent of the relief was given by this government; that is to say, this government furnished these people with their seed grain and so forth and feed for horses and cattle, and all the moneys for this purpose were put up by the dominion and not by the province. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. GORDON: The money for seed grain in the dried out areas to which the hon. member refers was not paid in that sense by this government. That was a loan to the province of Saskatchewan. In these municipalities, which I believe number eighty-four, one hundred per cent of the relief that was given to the people in that area was paid by the Dominion government.

Mr. DONNELLY: When the minister says that one hundred per cent of the relief was paid by the Dominion government, does he mean only groceries and clothing, or groceries, clothing and feed for cattle and horses as well?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, it includes everything.

Mr. DONNELLY: We listened last night to two members from the province of Saskatchewan saying that the reason for the difficulties in Saskatchewan was the fact that the province had to look after these people in the dried out areas, and these hon. members pretended that the province of Saskatchewan had fed the people.

Mr. GORDON: I did not hear any member say that.

Mr. DONNELLY: They said that the province of Saskatchewan was in a serious situation because they had had to take care of these people in the dried out areas where there had been crop failures. Personally, I understood, precisely what the minister says now, that the money had been put up by this government and not by the government of Saskatchewan, and there is no reason why the financial condition of the province should be ascribed to these crop failures, seeing that the money was put up by this government. What I have objected to and still object to, however, is that though we are putting up one hundred per cent of the money we have nothing whatever to do with the administration of it. The administration of the money is entirely in the hands of the province, as I understand it, and during the first two years of such administration we saw men running up and down the country handling relief and drawing salaries equal to what they were handing out in the way of relief for groceries. The salaries of these supervisors in each municipality, taking all their expenses into account —the supervisor would drive from town to town and village to village, charging so much for each trip—amounted to as much as was handed out in the way of relief for groceries. Taking the administration of the system as a whole, the amount handed out in this dried out area looks small, but a large amount was for seed and for feed for the cattle and horses, and that required very little supervision in its distribution. But so far as the groceries were concerned, most of the expense was incurred in connection with supervision and the handing out of supplies. This year I am pleased to see that they have taken it out of the hands of these men and put in back where it was before, in the hands of the municipal officers, who are handling it for nothing.

The only objection we have to-day to the handling of relief in these districts is that the people in the dried out area, where there has been no crop for four years, have not been receiving enough money for clothing. I urge upon the minister the importance of furnishing both bedding and clothing. These people have had no crop for four years, and a man with a family of four or five cannot do very much with fifty dollars a year. When he is given fifty dollars a year for the purchase of clothing and bedding and everything else for his family, you can readily understand that some members of his family must suffer. I have come across families some of whose little ones have been unable to go to school because they had no clothing, and some of the women have told me that they were obliged to keep fires on all night because there was not enough bedding to keep the children warm—and this, not in one or two cases but in many instances. The children were unable to go to school because they had no clothing. Again I urge upon the minister the necessity of handing out more money for clothing in these districts. During the first year or two of the present calamity a great many people in eastern Canada sent out a lot of secondhand clothing, but there has not been so much in the last year or so. Apparently they are weary in welldoing and are not sending the same quantity of clothing as before, so that it is imperative that the government should look after these people and see that they are better provided for than in the past.

Mr. GERSHAW: Could the minister inform the committee what period elapses between the time that a particular municipality pays out money and the time it receives the government's share? In the usual course of events, a municipality pays one-third of the cost of relief and many municipalities are having great difficulty in financing because of the time which must elapse before they receive the government's one-third.

Mr. GORDON: About ten days elapse after the receipt of accounts before the cheques are forwarded to the municipality or the province.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Yesterday the minister seemed to be in fine form when speaking of the back to the land movement. He stated that almost 100,000 people had been induced, directed, guided and inspired to go back to the land. Apparently this made such an impression upon the members of the committee that I thought that most of them would go back to the land immediately. I was surprised to-day to find that they were still present in the chamber.

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid that they would not make good.

Mr. BOUCHARD: This afternoon the minister told the committee that he was not a farmer himself. I am not surprised that he speaks with such enthusiasm of the back to the land movement because it is a matter of experience that those who speak most about a thing are those who know least about it. Apparently this is another make-believe policy and is similar to many other measures introduced by this government. We all know from experience how we try to induce the electors to vote for us and we are generally quite satisfied when we succeed in getting a majority to do so. Does the minister intend that the people shall be led to believe that nearly 100,000 people have been induced, directed, guided and inspired to go back to the land? I should like to know just how many have been established upon the land. I am entirely in agreement with what little good may come out of a back to the land movement but I do not think the government should try to induce the country to believe that so much good has come out of this movement. The best settlers on the land are those who are not given a chance to settle, the sons of farmers. These men cannot obtain any advantage from this scheme. Despite what has been said by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I contend that the best scheme to be followed in this regard is that one introduced a few years ago by the Minister of Colonization of the province of Quebec. That province gives a premium of $24 to any settler for every acre of land he opens up. This is a real scheme and it offers a cure for the situation which confronts us. Perhaps the minister may not agree with me, but I would characterize this back to the land movement as a public confession by the government, as an expatiatory formula, as an admission of carelessness in the past, as a demonstration of the use of two pounds of cure where one ounce of prevention would have brought about the same result. I do not want to be too critical of the minister because I welcome any effort which is made in this connection. However, I do not think the country should be misinformed about the facts and told that 100,000 people have been induced, directed, guided and inspired to go back to the land. In effect, the minister is stating that he has induced one-eighth of our unemployed to settle upon the land. I should like to know just how many people have been settled upon the land, how many have stayed and how many are likely to remain permanently.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, a short time ago the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) asked me if I thought it possible that a man could take up a farm location and sustain himself with only $600 in cash. From what the hon. member said, I take it that he has had much experience in colonization. I have seen one of the finest agricultural sections of Canada opened up, I refer to Timiskaming. When I went to that section of the country there were only a few small locations opened up. The settlers who came there had no money and prices were extremely low. If the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) were in his seat, I think he would agree with me when I say that probably there is not a finer section of settled agricultural land in Canada than the hundreds of miles to be found in our ridings. These men went in there when there was nothing but spruce trees upon the land; they had no money but to-day they own their farms. It is to their everlasting credit that I have received but few communications from them asking for any kind of relief. The population is about evenly divided between French and English speaking settlers, and I think I should comment upon how splendidly these people get along together. Anyone who started anything in the way of racial strife in that part of the country would not get very far. These people have confidence in each other and they are getting along as the two races should get along. They went into that country when it was solid spruce bush, when there were no pulpmills to which to sell their wood. In the first few years they did have difficult times but to-day the great majority of the settlers own their beautiful farms without one cent of encumbrance against them. They did not have $600 given to them. Their products were very low at the time they went in there, but they have made a success.

I take issue with the hon. member for Battle River with respect to the province of Quebec because the province of Quebec probably above all other provinces in Canada has for centuries devoted itself to the expansion of sound colonization within its boundaries, and in fact has extended its colonization schemes beyond its own boundaries into other provinces.

I am not in agreement with what the hon. member for Témiscouata has said with respect to colonization in the province of Quebec, and I had not intended to refer to it because I do not think I am charged with the responsibility of settling a scrap between the hon. member for Témiscouata and the Minister of Colonization, Hon. Mr. Laferté, in the province of Quebec, but I do say this, that in the county of Témiscouata, of the total number of settlers who were placed there, only two were placed under this scheme. Mainly the settlers that we have assisted to place on the land through the organization of the province of Quebec are in Abitibi and Timiskaming. When the hon. member for Témiscouata says that men, women and children, were hived there in sheds, and eating grass and roots and all that sort of thing, I do not know that he was speaking seriously; I cannot help but think that he was a little facetious. The fact is that under our colonization scheme the men folks went up into that country first, and they went there in charge of officers who are acquainted with that sort of work, and those officers stayed there until the men got their houses built and a little clearing made, and it was not until long afterwards that the men's families came along. I have had not only one but hundreds of communications sent to me by the railway committee upon which we have representation indicating the success of that scheme. At no time were any of these people housed together in the way the hon. member for Témiscouata has suggested.

In the riding of Témiscouata, where the settlers were placed by the provincial government alone, an effort was made some years ago, I am informed, to flood that land under some conservation of water scheme, and at that time—I may be misinformed—I was told that the hon. member for Témiscouata was in favour of colonization there. But now he has changed his viewpoint and claims that that effort by the provincial government should not have been undertaken. But these are all provincial matters which have nothing whatever to do with the joint effort of the municipality, the province and the dominion.

I have a detailed report, which I have not by me at the moment, from the colonization agent of the Canadian National Railways with respect to the settlement that has taken place in Abitibi and Timiskaming, in the province of Quebec, not in Ontario. I know that country very well, as well, in fact, as I know the country across the interprovincial boundary line where I live. I know that those people are located close to the railway; I know that they have passable roads built already; I know that good judgment was used by everyone concerned, both by our representative on the committee and the representative of the province of Quebec, to see that the locations were arable crown lands which were adjacent to and had the benefit of that best of all markets, the immediate home market in the rapidly expanding mining sections of Quebec. I wonder if members of this house realize what is going on in mining up in that section of the province of Quebec. Those mines have lain there longer than I would care to calculate. They were opened up only in 1923 as a result of prospecting by prospectors from the towns of Haileybury, Cobalt and New Liskeard, and they located what is now that wonderful mine, the Noranda. That inspired other prospectors to come in, until to-day in the northwestern part of the province of Quebec I hazard the opinion that there is not a finer mining camp on this continent, and of necessity it provides an immediate market for those who go on the land. So I say that the joint committee of the railways, ourselves, and the province of Quebec, should be commended for that effort. Whether we are commended or not we have evidence now of the success of at least that portion of the effort that we are putting forward to endeavour to locate upon the land those people who are suited to taking up farm locations and becoming farm owners with a view to placing themselves in a position of independence so far as their immediate needs are concerned. That generally has been the policy that we have been projecting.

I know how easy it is, by reason of my experience with those pioneers who went into the northern part of Canada, for a man to become discouraged. That all too frequently happens, but I say this, that we are at least devoting our effort towards giving Canadians in Canada, regardless of their race and political affiliations, a chance to become owners of that part of the national assets of Canada.

[Mr. Gordon.]

We must do it of necessity if we are going to support the services that have been projected, particularly railways. That necessitates turning a lot of our vacant spaces into production.

It may be asked, what is the use of doing it with price levels so low? Well, a few years is only a short space in the life of a country, and I think it will be only a short time before that condition disappears. If our own people do not accept the opportunity that I believe we are giving them—and it must be remembered that we have restricted immigration into this country for the purpose amongst others of giving our own people the first chance—in devoting any money we have towards the assistance of colonization by Canadians within Canada, but if our own people do not see the force of taking advantage of this opportunity, then I say that if we must have people we shall perhaps have to turn once more to seek new people from other lands. Bear this in mind, that at no time have there ever been any restrictions placed by this government on British people coming to Canada. That has never been done. But the movement is a slow one. Often we find that people even from Britain come out here for the purpose of colonization who are not suited. The selection was not made of them over there, and there have been disappointments. So far as the continent of Europe is concerned, it is well known that governments on the continent and many private agencies have devoted their energies towards moving the populations of Europe. Some of those countries are crowded, of course, and they are looking for an outlet wherever possible. It is equally true that no country likes to get rid of its best, and therefore it is essential that we exercise that degree of discrimination which is likely to result in contracting the migrations of peoples and result in the bringing to this country, so far as is humanly possible, those who are likely to be easily assimilated into our national life and become proper and useful citizens of this country. Shortly, that is my conception of the immigration policy which should be pursued. True, it is slow; it is not as colourful as the plan which has been followed in the past, but in my judgment it is the policy which will ultimately be found to be sound. Because, in my view, the greatness of a nation must be measured not merely by the number of people within its borders, but by the spirit and character of those people. That is the true measure of the strength of a nation.

In short, that is the policy this government is pursuing. While I do not expect we will attain one hundred per cent success in the movement, so far as I am personally concerned

I shall at least have the satisfaction of knowing that we have given our people at home a chance to take advantage of an opportunity and to become the owners of locations within Canada. I am convinced that a fair measure of success will be the result. The head of the colonization department of the Canadian Pacific Railway has handed me a list showing those who have settled on one short branch of that railroad in Ontario. It shows that during the past eighteen months 1,510 families settled there, without any help from the railway or from the government. Hon. members can see that at least some people in Canada believe that to establish themselves on farms, whether they intend to stay there or not, is the course of wisdom. The fact that they go to the farms is an illustration of their confidence in the belief that at least they can go into our farming communities and support themselves during this period when there is little or no employment security in industry.

Shortly put, that is the object of our devoting this comparatively small sum of money towards helping people to become self sustaining on the land.

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a few words to the remarks of the hon. member for Kamouraska concerning the back to the land movement. I do not wish to criticize the plan; on the contrary I should like to congratulate the minister upon its success, despite the difficult conditions under which it has been operated. The scheme is carried out through the cooperation of the federal, provincial and municipal governments, and applies only to the unemployed in the cities. Any hon. member who has been born on a farm knows that in order to be a successful farmer one has to be born to it. Farmers are not improvised; they are not trained in a day. To use a French expression, d'aujourd'hui à demain. Because of this handicap it is a surprise that the back to the land plan has met with such a degree of success.

It seems to me one of the great difficulties in connection with the execution of the plan arises from the fact that the municipalities are asked to contribute to the amount being spent in settling the urban unemployed on the land. Very few municipalities, with the exception of large cities such as Montreal, Winnipeg, Toronto or Quebec have any money to help settle their unemployed in faraway colonization districts. That is one reason why the plan does not work as successfully and as speedily as one might hope. Another reason is that the large municipalities which could contribute towards settling their unemployed on the land are not very anxious to spend the money to send the citizens away from those municipalities. I have been informed that the large cities are more or less reluctant to settle their unemployed in faraway colonization districts such as Abitibi, Timiskaming or even Temiscouata county. The reason is very simple: When the unemployed remain within the boundaries of a city they receive relief moneys for shelter, for food, for fuel, for clothing and so on. This money is spent in the cities in local stores, with consequent benefit to local trade. Some of it returns to the municipal coffers in the form of taxation. For those reasons, of course, the cities prefer to retain their unemployed and have them spend their relief moneys in the cities. They do not wish to have them go to distant points to settle on the land.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not agree with that.

Mr. BOULANGER: For those reasons I urge upon the government that it should relieve the municipalities from contributing to the land settlement fund, and that the scheme should be only a two party affair, between the federal and the provincial governments.

I have another suggestion to make to the government in connection with the back to the land movement, namely to enlarge the scope of the plan. At the present time it applies only to the city unemployed, and to the heads of families. As I said a minute ago, to be a successful farmer one has to understand farming and to be born to it. We cannot make a successful farmer of a person who has been living in the city for fifteen or twenty years. There is possibility of making a successful farmer of a man who has been in the city for only a short time. If he is a farmer who has been lured into the city, but has kept in touch with operations on the land and has not forgotten the elementary principles of farming, his chances of success are much better. But it is very doubtful whether a man who for fifteen or twenty years has been a labourer in industry could make a success, if he were transplanted in a far away district such as Abitibi or Timiskaming.

I repeat that in view of the conditions under which the back to the land movement has been operating its success has been marvellous. I would urge upon the government, therefore, to extend the plan, so that it might apply not only to city unemployed but also to farmers' sons. In old counties the scheme cannot be carried out. For instance, in an old county such as the one from which I come, a county which has been settled for over three hundred years, there can be no colonization. Our great problem is to know what to do with our farmers' sons. We cannot place them in commerce or industry, we cannot place them even in the civil service. They are the real prospective farmers who would make a success on the farms. They have the proper training, they are familiar with farming, and they would be more successful than would be the city unemployed. I therefore ask the government to extend the scope of the back to the land movement so that it may embrace farmers' sons. The rural sections are full of young men who have nothing to do. They cannot get land in their neighbourhood; their fathers cannot place them in the parish where they were born, or the county or district, so they have to go far away. They can no longer go to the cities because there is no work; the only place they could go would be on the land in the colonization districts. There you have the very best of settlers. I would ask that the government find means to help those young farmers in the same manner as city unemployed are helped to settle on the land.

Another point I would like to bring to the attention of the minister is this: In some places where farms have been opened more or less recently the clearing of land has not advanced far enough to make them capable of supplying sufficient revenue to support the occupants. Those farmers are willing and anxious to increase their clearing, but they have not the money or the help to do it. I wonder if it would be possible to use some of the unemployed, more especially the unemployed living in the country, and even those living in cities, to help these farmers to clear their land. The owners of the farms cannot pay for help, but they could give them food and shelter if the government under a back to the land movement would undertake to pay a small wage to those engaged in clearing land for the benefit of already established farmers.

Another suggestion I would like to make concerns a plan which has been discussed for a long time in the province from which I come. At the present time the provincial government makes grants or pays premiums for clearing and ploughing on unpatented land; but once letters patent have been obtained the settlers no longer get those premiums or grants. It would perhaps be possible, under a scheme of co-operation between the federal and the provincial governments, to continue the payment of those grants or premiums even after letters patent have been granted. It would enable the farmers to clear enough to produce revenue sufficient to support themselves and their families. I offer these suggestions not in any spirit of criticism but only with the intention of making the land settlement plan a little better, a little larger, a little more beneficial for all concerned. Before I resume my seat may I be allowed to congratulate the acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon) upon the sentiments and opinions he expressed last night and to-day on the question of immigration. I do not doubt the sincerity of the minister, and I am willing to admit that he has always held those opinions and sentiments; but may I be permitted to remind him that they have not always been the opinions and sentiments of his party? I remember very well, as those will who were with me here in 1928, that very few hon. members at that time held the opinions to which the minister gave expression yesterday. Very few of us warned the country to go slow on immigration. In the session of 1928 the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister, made a savage attack on Mr. Forke because he was not filling the country up fast enough with immigrants. I am glad the opinion has changed, and that the acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization has expressed as favourable to a principle for which my good friend the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and myself fought in the house in 1928.

Mr. GAGNON: Before the minister answers my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) may I be permitted a few words to congratulate my hon. friend for the excellent spirit he has displayed in his criticism of the back to the land movement. I would have been much pleased if the criticism of my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) had been on the same lines.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I made no criticism at all. Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. GAGNON: I shall be through in a minute, and I do not want to enter into any controversy. I desire only to support what my hon. friend from Bellechasse has said about the sons of farmers from our districts, Bellechasse and Dorchester, who are unable to profit by the back to the land movement because our municipalities and districts cannot provide the sum of $200 which is required by the legislation. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Bellechasse ought to be studied very seriously. May I suggest that this government in conjunction with the provincial government consider a plan whereby the cost of transportation of sons of farmers might be paid, in order to help those who wish to leave the old districts such as Dorchester and Bellechasse and the counties situated south of the St. Lawrence, and go to the new territories like Timiskaming or Abitibi? Last year I had a request from a man in the county of Dorchester who had twelve children. He had secured lots in Abitibi for three of his sons but unfortunately he could not find the necessary money to carry his furntiure and family from Dorchester to Abitibi. He applied to the provincial government and to the federal government, but was told that the back to the land scheme did not provide for the cost of transportation of the sons of farmers. May I suggest that the government study that side of the matter and enter into negotiations with the provincial government to find a way of helping fathers of large families who are anxious to have their sons settled on land in the newer districts?

My hon. friend from Bellechasse says it is difficult to make a good farmer of a city dweller. That is true, but on the other hand my hon. friend and others on that side of the house should not forget that during the years 1927-28-29 a great number of sons of farmers were lured into the cities by industrial activity. For instance in Quebec when the Anglo-Canadian pulp and paper mill was opened I think 2,000 young people came in from the neighbouring districts to settle in Quebec. These people have since been unable to secure employment, but they are not city dwellers in the true sense of the term; they are sons of farmers who have been lured into the city but who would be willing to go back to the land and would make very good settlers.

May I also point out to those on the other side of the house that this government has taken into serious consideration the suggestion which has been offered by the provincial governments. The federal government has respected the autonomy of the provinces, and in regard to the back to the land movement this government has done nothing contrary to the wishes and desires of the government of Quebec. So we on this side of the house were surprised to hear the strong criticism offered in the house yesterday by the hon. member for Temiscouata, and we wondered if all hon. gentlemen opposite were of the same opinion. We would be interested, and I am sure the government of Quebec would be interested also, to know whether hon. gentlemen opposite share the views of my hon. friend from Témiscouata with regard to the colonization policy of Quebec.

This is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman, and I conclude my humble remarks by thanking my hon. friend from Bellechasse for his broad criticism. I am sure the government will take his suggestions in the proper spirit.

Mr. POULIOT: Unfortunately I was not in the house yesterday when the Minister of Labour said:

> If my recollection serves me correctly, and my hearing is right, the hon. member for Témiscouata directed his barrage against the province of Quebec.

When the house opened to-day I rose to a question of privilege and said:

> The hearing of the hon. gentleman may be correct and his recollection may serve him correctly, but his understanding was very poor because I did not direct any barrage against my own province, which I love as much as my country and which I am always fighting for.

Yesterday I said the following words, which appear at page 3156 of Hansard:

> In my remarks, I had no more the intention of attacking the Quebec government than attacking, in the house, the Minister of Labour, yesterday.

I was referring to my speech on March 2. I am sorry that the minister does not understand French, but it will be noticed that in my remarks yesterday I did not seek to place any blame on this or any other government. For this reason I was very much surprised to hear my hon. friend from Dorchester ask what Mr. Taschereau might think or what the Quebec government might think. I have nothing unpleasant to say about the Quebec government, but I find it very strange that the hon. member for Dorchester should stand on the platform and oppose the Quebec provincial government during every election and still be so much interested in their welfare between elections. He might be taken much more seriously if he supported the provincial government during elections as well as between election campaigns. What I said yesterday was mostly objective and not subjective; I wanted to give my unbiased views with regard to this extremely important problem confronting us at present. Speaking yesterday the Minister of Labour said:

> I am not unmindful of the situation, but the policy which I have outlined will be pursued.

So he is the father of that policy; he has given his name to it. So much the better for him if he is pleased with it, but there is a lot that can be said about this policy; he must be told where it is wrong. It does not matter what name may be given to it; it does not matter by whom the policy is outlined. The essential thing is that it should bring about efficiency, and if it does not do so it is a bad policy.

What did I say about those camps on March 2? I did not mention there were any camps in Témiscouata county, though I have since learned from a letter which appeared in the press that there were such camps. I did say they had these camps in the north and I saw families going there while there were no roads leading to their lots. I do not say I have been misquoted or misunderstood; I have said what I have said and nothing else. There is something I should say, and I do not refer to it because I have any quarrel with any person; I have no quarrel with anyone, but when a man is incompetent I ask for his dismissal without fear or favour. I am here to do my duty. I am not here to exact any sort of vengeance from this person or that, and I have no such idea and no ill feeling towards anyone. I will do my duty as best I can, and I will not be swayed by what may be said by the hon. member for Dorchester, or even by the minister himself. I fear no one but God, though after listening to the budget speech this afternoon I also fear for the future.

Here we have a scheme to send people back to the land, and it is advertised like a circus. Has it been well thought out? Is there a careful selection of the would-be settlers? On what basis is that selection made, and who makes it? Those are interesting questions.

In my constituency of Témiscouata there is a seigniory, an area two leagues wide along lake Témiscouata; that seigniory is a cancer in that farming district. Many people there suffered eviction, just as the Irishmen were evicted from their own country. That property formerly belonged to Seignior Thomas, who died, and now it is the property of the Fraser Company. There are several parishes contained in that siegniory: Sainte Rose du Dégelé, Notre Dame du lac, Saint Mathias de Cabano, Saint Louis du Ha! Ha!, Saint Eusèbe de Cabano. The new parish of Squatec is close by, and there is also the parish of Saint Juste du Lac. Among these are some rather old parishes, but the seignior refused to grant lots to the sons of the farmers, and as a consequence the young men could not settle near their homesteads. As a result they have had to settle on land farther away, though if conditions had been reversed there would not have been the gaps between those parishes and the crown lands in the eastern part of my constituency. For a long time now I have advocated an exchange of lots in order that the sons may be near their fathers. Nothing has been done except to create a new parish in front of Notre Dame du Lac, although there was a good location further south on the Madawaska river. That scheme has never been accepted for the simple reason that there was too much common sense in it. The lands in the vicinity of the Madawaska river are excellent for farming but they have been neglected. The soil is good and there is only one river to cross, a small river, to reach the other side. Lake Témiscouata is over a mile wide and is quite deep, and for about two weeks in the spring and two weeks in the fall it is impossible to cross it owing to the moving ice. Now this is my suggestion, which I have often made in public and in the press. I suggest that there should be an exchange of lots so that these vacant lands might be granted to farmers' sons who have experience in farming and who could settle near the old homestead. In the first place, the farmers must strengthen their position in the old parishes; they must strengthen the old fortress in each parish, and after that is done colonization should go forward step by step just as in the army. When a range in a new township is conceded, a second range should be conceded provided all the lots on the first range are inhabited by serious settlers. How can we pick and choose this and that one? How can we take Paul and Joe, Fred and Tom, and take them away into the midst of the forest and say to each of them, "You will have to settle here and there."

I submit that there has been no system in colonization; there has not been any system for some time, perhaps since confederation, and possibly even before that. I do not blame any government, but I offer them this suggestion and ask them to take it into serious consideration so that all may profit thereby. The Gordon scheme is a very nice name, and perhaps no one could suggest any better; but it must be lasting. It should not merely be a palliative. If it is only a palliative, what is the use of taking men from the city where they are on relief and placing them in the middle of the wilderness and giving them $600? They will simply die there; you might as well support them in the city. It would be cheaper, for it seems to me that the government will simply have to bring them back from the forest and see that they are cared for.

These are all serious considerations. More than that, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the reason I spoke as I did yesterday is that I am tired of this wonderful picture of colonization which is given us by those who have an interest of some kind in painting it that way. Things must be presented to us exactly as they are; there should be no camouflage. If a thing is good, let it be so represented; if it is bad, we must be told that it is bad. But what have we here? We have the maple syrup of Dorchester uttering sweet words to the house in the same fashion as French fried potatoes are sizzled in the pan. We have complaints of every description—flowers of every kind. To-day it was just as at a wedding, flowers everywhere, flowers to this one and flowers to that one. I suggest that the minister is too much of a man to care so much for flowers.

Mr. GORDON: Certainly I don't like French fried potatoes and flowers in the same bouquet.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, this is about dinner time and that is why I said that, but when I spoke of French fried potatoes I did not mention the minister but my hon. friend from Dorchester. I say that it is simply a waste of time indulging in such compliments in regard to everything. The Minister of Labour is a jolly good fellow, but there are others on the opposite side who are so touchy that we have to wear white gloves in dealing with them. Is it manly? No; we have to get at the facts as they are. We had an example of this to-day; the Minister of Finance set a very good example when he told us the bare truth. We have been looking for the truth in regard to our financial situation ever since August, 1930, and the Minister of Finance to-day gave us the facts in this regard. Now, I am giving the truth with regard to colonization. I have a proper regard for the men but none for the system as it now operates, because it does not deserve it. I do not wish to be unpleasant to anyone in the province of Quebec, not even to Mr. Bilodeau, and I asked for his dismissal not only for the good of the settlers but for his own good. There is no personal feeling between himself and myself, nor is there any personal feeling between Mr. Taschereau and myself. That gentleman was kind to me and I appreciate it highly, and Mr. Laferté is not a bad fellow. But the important question is this: Have we competent men managing this scheme? I do not intend to reflect on the minister. He probably said to his staff, "I want this to be done in such and such a way". Well, who did it? Was it the provinces or the federal government? Under the scheme the sum of $600 is provided for each family, either $400 or $500 in cash quite early, and $200 or $100 later on. I say that this will not suffice. I do not think it is fair to treat people this way.

To sum up what I have said, I submit that in the first place there must be a proper classification of the unemployed, as was said yesterday. My hon. friend from Bellechasse spoke about farmers' sons who would be good settlers to take advantage of the scheme. That is all very well, but the farmers are now in such dire straits that they cannot give money to their children to live outside the home. Some of them are so badly off that they have no clothing for their children, so that the young ones cannot get the benefit of fresh air nor can they go to school this winter. I say this with a full knowledge of the facts. Not only that, but in those parishes that have been referred to by the Minister of Colonization for Quebec, and the names of which you will find enumerated in my speech yesterday, there are places where the situation is so bad that mothers of large families came to my place and told me that when it was raining the roof was leaking so much they had to put on extra clothes to keep from getting wet. Something should be done for these people. It cannot be done by money cooperation in colonization schemes, it must be done by a regular increase in the provincial subsidy. The British North America Act provides that the federal government shall have certain duties, certain responsibilities and certain rights and outlines the jurisdiction of each province in similar matters. During past years, and especially since 1930, the provinces have been coming to the federal government for assistance. This government owes them nothing more than the agreements in virtue of the British North America Act provide for, but if the provinces cannot manage themselves, they have to come here and ask for an increased subsidy. I would have no objection to an increase in that way. But as this matter of colonization has been decided by both the federal and provincial governments, I desire to discuss this matter and to express my views. Some of the money given to the provinces has been collected by federal taxation, and because of that fact, I feel it is my duty to fight for the recognition of these elementary truths. It is not pleasant for me to do this but I repeat that I feel it to be my duty and I shall continue upon this course until I have satisfaction. As I have said many times, I do not wish to be unpleasant to the minister but I cannot understand how he hopes to bring about a real cure for unemployment without having a classification. Otherwise, any measures adopted will be but palliatives. It reminds me of the director in the Quebec seminary which I used to attend. When we had a cold he would tell us not to use any cold syrups because when a cold was not cured it lasted for thirty days and when it was cured, it lasted for twenty-nine days. This is the same thing, it is a palliative measure.

Unless we stop the country will be bankrupt. Common sense is the only thing that will stop this race to bankruptcy. There is no necessity of having a Union government to do this; the only thing needed is the co-operation of minds. I put the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) in the category of those who can provide this. I ask him to see to it that more care is given in council to the preparation of our laws. The ministers have great responsibility but they should do more thinking before rather than after when preparing legislation to be passed by order in council or otherwise. I ask the minister to see, first, that there is a classification of those who want to enjoy the benefits of the Gordon scheme for the relief of unemployment and back to the land policies; second, that there is a classification of lots in order that settlers may be placed in convenient locations; third, that the position of the farmers in the older parishes is strengthened by filling up with new settlers the farms which are now vacant. These farms could be purchased by the government and given to the new settlers rather than having them placed back in the forests. When a man without experience in agriculture is placed upon the land he should really have one or two neighbours who have had farming experience. They would be like columns to support him in his efforts to obtain the benefits of this scheme. There should be no vacancies in our settlements. There have been cases where a man has succeeded in getting a letters patent for his lot and then selling it to a lumber concern. The timber was taken off and no one wanted to cultivate the land, thus leaving a vacancy in the community. If the minister says he will consider the classification of the unemployed, I shall be satisfied for the moment.

Mr. NEILL: Might I suggest to the minister that this evening he be prepared to make a statement in connection with unemployment insurance? I spoke on this matter yesterday and quite a number of hon. members on this side have expressed the desire to obtain some information on the subject.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN RAILWAY EMPLOYEES MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 17, to incorporate the Canadian Railway Employees Mutual Benefit Association—Mr. MacInnis—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. WHITE (London): As no explanation was given of this bill on the first or second reading, and as the sponsor's name has been changed in the meantime, I should like to hear an explanation of the bill from the present sponsor.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understood, Mr. Chairman, that on the introduction of any bill into the house the sponsor had to give an explanation. This bill is very simple. It is to incorporate certain persons as the Canadian Railway Employees Mutual Benefit Association, as a fraternal benefit society, carrying benefits and insurance for the protection solely of the members, their families and dependents, and not for profit. The bill as it is now before the house has received the approval, I understand, of the superintendent of insurance and has passed the banking and commerce committee without amendment. I do not think that there is any further explanation necessary at this time.

Mr. STEVENS: It is generally understood that the organizations of railway employees of Canada have very well established and well organized benefit societies, conferring upon their members certain privileges with respect to insurance and other matters of that kind. Glancing through this bill I am wondering whether it would not conflict with existing organizations. The point I am making from my long knowledge of and acquaintance with these organizations is that generally speaking they are very well managed, and some of them are quite powerful so far as their long standing and accumulation of funds is concerned. One of the main things that is necessary in an organization of this kind is the security of its funds. I am just wondering whether this new organization may not conflict with some of the existing well-established organizations. Perhaps the hon. member would give us some information on that point.

Mr. MacINNIS: As the hon. gentleman well knows, it would be rather difficult to form any new organization that might not possibly conflict with another already in existence; but as I understand the situation, from many years' association with trades union organizations, they are organized first of all as a protection for their members in dealing with their employers. The matter of insurance of various kinds is secondary. Most of these organizations, including the international organization to which I myself belong, give death benefits and old age and disability benefits. In our local organizations we go beyond that, although, being a local organization, we have not federal or provincial authority. But we have our own sickness and death and disability benefits. I do not know to what extent this organization might conflict with other organizations already established so far as insurance is concerned.

Mr. GRAY: I should like to follow up what has been said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should also like to hear from the chairman of the committee before which this bill was considered. It is my understanding that the railway brotherhoods are largely opposed to this bill. I agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he says that this society might infringe upon, or at least will add to, the brotherhood organizations already in existence. Just a few weeks ago there appeared before the Prime Minister and the cabinet a number of men representing railway employees no longer employed, and it was then stated quite plainly to the Prime Minister and the cabinet that the majority of the men appearing before them were men who had formerly been in brotherhoods and now found themselves unable to pay their dues and consequently were, so to speak, outside the pale. As a consequence of being unable to keep up their dues they found themselves in the unenviable position of not being able to get what they considered their just rights with the railway trades unions. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that before we proceed to incorporate another benefit society, if you wish to call it that, we should know very clearly whether it is the wish of the organized brotherhoods which have been in existence for a number of years, and which, I believe I am correct in saying, are having difficulty in making their organizations stand up, that another society of this kind should be incorporated.

Mr. SMOKE: If it is true, as stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that the railway employees already have a brotherhood, it seems to me that in these times when economy should be the watchword it is a mistake to incorporate another such society. For that reason I think this bill should be rejected, but whether or not at this stage I am not in a position to say. It does seem to me that in these times of stress and strain it is a mistake to incorporate another such federation as this, because obviously it will cost more to carry on two institutions of this sort than one.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is necessarily true that if this bill is passed and the organization is incorporated it will come into direct competition with organizations already in existence. However I do not believe I should be disposed to oppose the bill on that ground if, in other respects, it was sound. In organizations of the kind which I know something about, the insurance funds and the general funds are kept entirely separate. The premium on insurance is paid as such, and the assessments for general purposes are paid into separate funds and used only for the purposes of those funds. They are not allowed to overlap. Any sound insurance scheme necessarily must involve the payment of the premium into the insurance fund, and that it be kept there for the purpose of insurance and for nothing else. However, that is not what we find in this bill, and it is because of the different provisions contained herein that I voice my opposition.

In its present form I do not believe the House of Commons should pass the bill. I am surprised that the hon. member has proceeded with the bill as it appears before us. Manifestly, if he has read the bill he has not understood it, otherwise I do not believe he would have allowed it to come before us in its present form. The purpose of the bill is to bring into being a new association or organization for a variety of purposes, among others to organize, establish and carry on local branches of the society. Then, the second purpose for which it is incorporated is that of uniting its members in social and fraternal bonds. No one could object to an association of men brought together for the purpose of social and fraternal activities.

Then the bill proceeds to define a variety of classes of insurance which may be put into effect in regard to only a portion of the members of the association. The bill differentiates completely between this proposed society and organized brotherhoods which have been in existence for more than half a century. In these organized brotherhoods every member must take out an insurance policy. Not so in the present instance; they may if they wish. The first purpose of incorporation is to unite the members in social and fraternal bonds. Then, let us follow the provisions of the bill.

In subsection (c) of section 4 we find provision for a variety of insurance, among others sick benefit, old age pensions, annuities and health insurance.

Then the bill provides that the society shall have power to fix and refix the amounts of premiums. There is no stabilized premium fixed at all. If there are a thousand members in the society, thirty per cent may take out insurance, and the remaining seventy per cent may be there for social and fraternal purposes. Then what follows? As we read the bill we find provision for the establishment of different funds. Let me read paragraph 9:

The society shall have power from time to time to make, amend and repeal by-laws and regulations for governing the election of officers and trustees and prescribing and defining their duties and powers, the holding of meetings, the admission of members, fixing and refixing of the amounts of the premiums, dues and assessments to be paid by its members, and generally for the government and management of the society.

Note the expression "fixing and refixing of the amounts of the premiums". Then, let us follow on:

10 (1) The society may maintain a general fund to which shall be credited all dues and other sums intended to be used for the payment of expenses of administration and all expenses of the society shall be payable out of such fund.

That refers to the expenses of social and fraternal activities. It may refer to golf courses; anything, aside altogether from insurance, is embraced by this clause. Now we come to subsection 2 of section 10—and at this point to my mind we begin to touch the vicious principles behind the bill:

The society may make provision in its by-laws whereby in the event of there being a deficiency in the general fund—

Hon. members will note the provision is for a deficiency in the general fund, not the insurance fund. And in such circumstances what may they do?

—the annual meeting of the society may in any year provide for the allocation to the general fund of such portion as the actuary of the society may recommend of the premiums or assessments, falling due during the succeeding twelve months—

To the extent of one-sixth of the total premium. That is not all they may do. Assuming that there is a surplus in the annuities fund, or that the actuary makes a calculation that there is such a surplus at the end of one year, and finds at the end of the next year that he is short—in such circumstances subsection 4 applies:

If at any time the general fund or a surplus in any other fund becomes exhausted or is in danger of becoming exhausted, the board of trustees shall have power to make a proportionate assessment upon each member in the fund—

Note this: They exhaust the moneys in the annuities fund or life insurance fund for general purposes and may then turn around and assess the men in that particular fund. They use the funds of the man who takes out life insurance, or provides an annuity for his family, as a surplus for general purposes, and then assess him again to reestablish or replenish his own fund. Then we find in section 11:

The society may make provision in its constitution whereby—

And bear in mind there is no constitution or no set of by-laws attached to the bill—

—such portion as shall be approved by the actuary of the society, of the surplus above all liabilities in any benefit fund, may be applied to grant new or additional benefits to the members—

If I understand English at all, section 11 simply means that out of the surplus insurance fund which is being paid by a certain class of insurers or policyholders funds may be taken to place insurance on individual members of the society who have never carried any kind of insurance whatsoever.

Then the final clause, No. 12, is as follows:

Except as hereinbefore otherwise provided, the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, shall apply to the society.

By this bill we are asked to legislate right out from under the insurance law of the country, and to set up a special set of provisions for the society asking incorporation, a society the purposes of which are wholly undefined in the bill.

As the hon. member for West Lambton has said, this association would come into competition with organizations which are finding it very difficult to carry on. However I do not oppose the bill on that ground. I oppose it because from A to Z it is absolutely unsound, and because the parliament of Canada should not permit any group of men to sell insurance to railwaymen or any other class under conditions such as are set out in the bill. I am amazed that the hon. member should have proceeded with the measure as it stands without first having studied it and learned its exact meaning.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I believe that some of the statements made by the last speaker may have been made without full information.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT: It is a matter of indifference to me whether or not the bill before us passes. However I am a member of the banking and commerce committee which gave careful consideration to it. I believe the house need only consider whether or not a number of men who have complied with the law are entitled to become incorporated. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken need have no fear that this new organization will engage in the insurance business in a way that is unsound.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are they permitted under this act to engage in the insurance business on the side?

Mr. HACKETT: No. Section 12 of the bill reads:

> Except as hereinbefore otherwise provided, the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, shall apply to the society.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are on clause 1.

Mr. HACKETT: But I am drawing to the attention of the committee the fact that clause 1 as well as the rest of the bill—

The CHAIRMAN: The remarks of the hon. gentleman would be in order on the second or third reading, but in committee we must discuss the bill clause by clause.

Mr. HACKETT: But I am answering a question.

The CHAIRMAN: Even so I think at present it is out of order.

Mr. HACKETT: If the chairman had made a ruling when the question was asked I would not have endeavoured to answer it. However, the point I wish to make is that the bill itself and the clause under consideration have been carefully considered by the superintendent of insurance, who took no exception to it and assured the committee that the insurance business could not be engaged in unless the necessary deposits and guarantees and actuarial assurance were provided.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman is perfectly in order on clause 3, but clause 1 is the name only.

Mr. WHITE (London): Coming as I do from an important railway centre in western Ontario I have more than an ordinary interest in this bill. Quite a number of members of railroad organizations have spoken to me in opposition to it. I join with those who oppose it on the ground that it is not necessary, that there are already many organizations which can take care of the very work this is intended to do. On the Canadian Pacific Railway there are local and system-wide organizations; on the Canadian National Railways there is the Intercolonial provident fund, the Grand Trunk provident fund—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The question is on clause 1, whether these gentlemen named are to form this corporation; that is all.

Mr. WHITE (London): I am coming to that. Then there are the Canadian National Railways Pension Act and the Workmen's Compensation Acts of the various provinces. Negotiations are now being carried on with the railroads looking to a standard benefit association covering the entire government railways. Therefore I believe there is no need for this incorporation, not only for the reasons I have mentioned but also because there are less men by thousands now in the employ of the railroads than there were a few years ago. One hon. member made the statement in the debate on the railway bill that as between 1929 and 1931 there were 33,000 less railroad men employed. As between 1931 and 1933 the difference is impossible to say, but it strikes me that the total will run up to probably 50,000 less. So for that reason there is less need for this incorporation than otherwise might be the case.

As to the consideration by the committee of this first clause, I cannot find very much in the minutes. They merely state that the solicitor for those who wish incorporation was heard, and also the superintendent of insurance, and that it was passed without amendment. Evidently no representative of the railroad organizations appeared; possibly they were not aware of the bill coming before the committee.

Coming to the bill itself, I notice these men who seek incorporation are all from Vancouver. There is evidently no country-wide demand for such an organization; if there were, some of those who wish incorporation would have been resident in other parts of the country. It is true that in clause 1 there are listed several different trades, for example, three yard men, one conductor, two switchmen, one foreman, one fireman, two trainmen, one machinist, one hostler, one engineer and one motorman. But there are other things that I object to in connection with the incorporation. There are clauses which provide that all the offices can be given to those who seek the incorporation. There is another clause which deals with those who may be considered members of this society in good standing, confining it to those whom the society will admit. Anything of this kind should be open to all employees of all railroads. Other bills which have gone through in years gone by, back to 1874, had that provision. Then there are conflicting clauses as to premiums, assessments and dues and some other things to which I might object.

Now I come to the list of men who are seeking incorporation. The first name on the list is Mr. McConachie; he is about the only one concerning whom I wish to say anything. I have made some inquiry as to his connection with the railroad brotherhood and his work on the railroad with which he is employed. I find that in five years he has worked a total of 690 days; in 1928, 223 days; in 1929, 287 days; in 1930, 145 days; in 1931, 29 days; in 1932, 6 days; and in the year 1933 has not worked up to the present. It may be urged that on account of lack of railway business he has not been allowed to work, but that is not the case, because he has been in the Canadian Pacific Railway service since 1918, which would assure his seniority, so that he would have no difficulty in working steadily. I assume, therefore, from what I have heard, and I believe my information is correct, that he has been engaged in other activities. I am told that he was the prime mover in an organization which was started a few years ago called The Big Four. The Big Four scheme in Vancouver, started by this gentleman and some others, was called an insurance scheme. In railway parlance The Big Four is understood to comprise the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Firemen and Enginemen, the Order of Railway Conductors and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. The men who have spoken to me on the subject say that this name was appropriated by the people running this lottery—for that is what it really was—and employees of railroads were given tickets to sell, the name Big Four being used to give it a sort of standing so that the tickets would sell more readily. Tickets were sold which had an accompanying stub; the stubs and the cash collected were sent to Vancouver once each month, and a drawing was held each month on a certain date. The tickets sold at one dollar each. When the time arrived for the drawing the stubs were put in a container, stirred up, and a person was blindfolded and charged with the duty of withdrawing the stubs one by one. The first drawn carried a prize of $750, the second $500, and several others, perhaps about fifty different prizes of gradually lessening amounts. It is said that ten per cent was deducted from the receipts for the month for expenses, the prizes were paid and then claims for certain benefits were considered and certain sums paid to those who were thought worthy. That was so successful in Vancouver that an office was opened in Winnipeg; the Vancouver office looked after British Columbia while the Winnipeg office took care of the other western provinces. It is said that some $10,000 to $14,000 was collected at each office per month, but a year ago the Winnipeg office was raided by the police. The case came to trial; the court decided that this constituted a lottery, and a fine of $250, or some such figure, was imposed. After that the proceedings were carried on in a little different manner. I have one of the tickets here; on it appears the words "The Big Four relief fund, Manitoba and Saskatchewan railway employees, receipt for dues paid for January, 1933."

After the fine was imposed I am told that the same scheme was carried on from a Winnipeg hotel room. The drawings took place sub rosa, and were never carried on twice in the same place. I have here a list of payments for relief over a certain period, but I have not been able to find that any audited statement of receipts or of expenditures has been published. All that is made public is a statement of benefits paid, which is in the form of an advertisement for further sales; there is no accounting for these funds, and in my opinion the railway workers have been exploited. I see no reason why another organization should be built up, the expenses of which would have to come out of the pockets of the railway men. I do not think it is necessary to have such an organization; there seems to be no general demand for it; the reputation of those applying is not of the best, and the original sponsor of the bill has withdrawn. So there seems no reason why this bill should proceed further, and I therefore move that the committee rise.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to on division.

SECOND READING

Bill No. 49, respecting a certain patent application of Fred Charles Fantz.—Mr. Anderson (Toronto-High Park).

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) moved the second reading of Bill No. 46, to amend the criminal code (lotteries).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I thought perhaps the mover of this bill would have something to say, because I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have already explained the bill.

Mr. BROWN: When this bill was put on the order paper I thought it was one that should command some attention, and I have been giving it some thought. The bill purports to deal with a somewhat unsatisfactory situation in regard to money obtained by lottery. This proposal is that before a person is allowed to sue for such money the consent of the attorney general must be secured, but I propose to offer an amendment which, though perhaps not an entirely satisfactory way to deal with the matter, from my point of view it seems more satisfactory than the bill as it now stands or the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain). Before dealing with that matter, however, I think perhaps it might be well to place on Hansard the section of the code dealing with lotteries, especially in view of the fact that apparently before this session ends we will have before us a bill dealing with the whole question of lotteries in perhaps a more comprehensive way. So for the information of the public and perhaps for the information of many hon. members I propose to place on Hansard section 236 of the criminal code, even though it may take a few moments to do so. The section reads:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment and to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars who—

(a) makes, prints, advertises or publishes, or causes or procures to be made, printed, advertised or published, any proposal, scheme or plan for advancing, lending, giving, selling or in any way disposing of any property, by lots, cards, tickets, or any mode of chance whatsoever; or

(b) sells, barters, exchanges or otherwise disposes of, or causes or procures, or aids or assists in, the sale, barter, exchange or other disposal of, or offers for sale, barter or exchange, any lot, card, ticket or other means or device for advancing, lending, giving, selling or otherwise disposing of any property, by lots, tickets or any mode of chance whatsoever; or

(c) conducts or manages any scheme, contrivance or operation of any kind for the purpose of determining who, or the holders of what lots, tickets, numbers or chances, are the winners of any property so proposed to be advanced, loaned, given, sold or disposed of; or

(d) disposes of any goods, wares or merchandise by any game or mode of chance or mixed chance and skill in which the contestant or competitor pays money or other valuable consideration; or

(e) induces any person to stake or hazard any money or other valuable property or thing on the result of any dice game, shell game, punch board, coin table or on the operation of any wheel of fortune:

Provided that the provisions of paragraphs (d) and (e) of this subsection in so far as they do not relate to any dice game, shell game, punch board or coin table, shall not apply to any agricultural fair or exhibition, or to any operator of a concession leased by any agricultural fair or exhibition board within its own grounds and operated during the period of the annual fair held on such grounds.

2. Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty of twenty dollars, who buys, takes or receives any such lot, ticket or other device as aforesaid.

3. Every sale, loan, gift, barter or exchange of any property, by any lottery, ticket, card or other mode of chance depending upon or to be determined by chance or lot, is void, and all property so sold, lent, given, bartered or exchanged, is liable to be forfeited to any person who sues for the same by action or information in any court of competent jurisdiction.

4. No such forfeiture shall affect any right or title to such property acquired by any bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice.

5. This section includes the printing or publishing, or causing to be printed or published, of any advertisement, scheme, proposal or plan of any foreign lottery, and the sale or offer for sale of any ticket, chance or share, in any such lottery, or the advertisement for sale of such ticket, chance or share, and the conducting or managing of any such scheme, contrivance or operation for determining the winners in any such lottery.

6. This section does not apply to—

(a) the division by lot or chance of any property by joint tenants or tenants in common, or persons having joint interests (droits indivis) in any such property;

(b) raffles for prizes of small value at any bazaar held for any charitable or religious object, if permission to hold the same has been obtained from the city or other municipal council, or from the mayor, reeve or other chief officer of the city, town or other municipality, wherein such bazaar is held, and the articles raffled for thereat have first been offered for sale and none of them are of a value exceeding fifty dollars;

(c) the distribution by lot of premiums given as rewards to promote thrift by punctuality in making periodical deposits of weekly savings in any chartered savings bank;

(d) bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other securities recallable by drawing of lots and redeemable with interest and providing for payment of premiums upon redemption or otherwise;

(e) the Art Union of London, Great Britain, or the Art Union of Ireland. R.S., c. 146, s. 236; 1922, c. 16, s. 11; 1925, c. 38, s. 4.

Mr. LAVERGNE: The Art Unions of Great Britain and Ireland are exempted from the provisions of section 236—

Mr. BROWN: I am not discussing that matter.

Mr. LAVERGNE: It is very important.

Mr. BROWN: I have read the section as it appears, and if the hon. gentleman wishes to move an amendment he can do so.

Mr. LAVERGNE: There are two foreign countries that are exempted under the code.

Mr. BROWN: I have read the section of the criminal code dealing with the question of lotteries. Subsection 3 is the provision which it is proposed to amend by inserting these words:

—after having obtained the leave of the attorney general for the province in which the proceedings are taken.

It would seem that in order to protect his winnings, the winner of the prize gets his relatives to sue, thus precluding any outsider from suing. That seems to be the purpose of the amendment. It might however be a false assumption that the attorney general of a province would always wish to protect the winner; it might very well be that the attorney general, if he had a certain attitude of mind towards lotteries in general, would prefer someone else to sue.

I said I wished to propose an amendment and it is this. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysgorough (Mr. Duff):

That all the words after "forfeited to" in the twelfth line be struck out and the following substituted:

"the crown in the right of the province whenever any person, having secured leave of the attorney general, sues for the same by action or information in a court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. CASGRAIN: I rise to a point of order. I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman has the right to move an amendment on the second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has offered an amendment which is not in order, but he has the right to continue speaking on the second reading.

Mr. BROWN: Very well then. That will be the amendment which I shall move when we are in committee, and I presume it will be in order. Let me continue speaking on the principle involved in the amendment. The difference between the original bill and the amendment I propose to move at the proper time is that in one case the man who has come into possession of money or goods in an illegal manner is protected in his winnings, whereas in the other he is not. It is not altogether satisfactory to me that even the crown should come into possession of goods that are obtained illegally, but of the two alternatives I would choose the latter. It seems much more fitting that instead of the winner of a prize which is obtained in an entirely illegal manner being protected in the holding of his winnings, the crown should come into possession of the prize. That is the difference between the two.

Mr. LAVERGNE: There is something that strikes me as an anomaly in the criminal code in section 236 which the bill proposes to amend. Not coming from such solid Puritan stock as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), I have no objections personally to lotteries. I think on the whole they might prove to be a good thing in connection with our national loans and to help our hospitals and charitable institutions. If we are going to amend section 236 of the criminal code, why not strike it out altogether? Under this section it is a crime for any Canadian to hold a lottery, to sell or buy tickets or participate in a lottery, yet under paragraph (e) of subsection 6, the Art Union of London, Great Britain, and the Art Union of Ireland are exempted. Lotteries are either good or bad, and if they are bad, they must be just as bad for the Art Union of London, Great Britain, and the Art Union of Ireland as they are for the individual Canadian.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. LaVergne) has referred to the provisions of the criminal code which exempt from the operations of the law the Art Union of London and the Art Union of Ireland. I have not had time to send for the statute I have in mind, but lotteries had worked such havoc among the masses of the people in Great Britain that parliament intervened and made them illegal. If any hon. member is interested and takes the time to look up the speech made in the House of Lords by Lord Chesterfield, remarkable for the letters he wrote to his son, he will find the most powerful indictment of lotteries which could be made in any language. With every word he said I am wholly in accord. When lotteries were made illegal in Great Britain an exception was made in the case of the Art Union of London and the Art Union of Ireland in order to promote the distribution of paintings and works of art. Perhaps upon a later occasion I shall have an opportunity of bringing this statute into the house in order that hon. gentlemen may be informed as to why this exception was made. The provisions of that statute were applicable throughout the empire, but under the statute of Westminster, if we now desire to remove from our criminal code the exception in favour of the Art Union of London and the Art Union of Ireland, I do not think there is any doubt we have the jurisdiction to do so. I should like the hon. gentleman who has just spoken to realize that the genesis of that exception was to give an opportunity to these organizations to distribute paintings and works of art. The limitations imposed by the statute were such as to ensure that the prizes would not be money but works of art or the result of the genius of painters reflected sometimes in masterpieces. The exact date upon which this statute was passed is not in my mind. Possibly some better informed member will be able to give the house this information. My memory is, and I rely solely upon it, that it was somewhere about 1826.

I do not think that any good purpose would be served by leaving it in the power of any one man to determine whether or not action should be brought to recover the winnings of a lottery. That is my own personal opinion. As the hon. member for Lisgar has said, if there are winnings from a lottery and the law as it now stands makes lotteries illegal, the returns should be forfeited to the crown in the manner in which his amendment proposes. As the Minister of Justice points out, a burglar's tools are forfeited, on conviction, as well as liquor and the automobile in which it is being carried. It might well be that money won in a lottery should be forefeited to the crown rather than to an individual who might prompt action. It is something like a quantum action in which half the proceeds go to the informer. I must say reluctantly to the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) that I do not share his views as to the desirability of placing in the hands of an attorney general of any province the power of saying whether or not an action should be instituted by any person or persons for the purpose of recovering money won by some other person in a lottery. I have the strongest possible opposition at the moment to any effort being made to stimulate speculation by the Canadian people. During the last four or five years they have been gambling with various mining shares and other matters with a terrible result. I think that any benefits which might accrue to individuals through lotteries are more than offset by the ill that is done by having the savings of thrifty Canadians risked in purely speculative ventures.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUATION FOR ONE YEAR OF PROVISIONS OF RELIEF ACT, 1932

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Gordon—Mr. LaVergne in the chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to continue in force the provisions of the Relief Act, 1932, until the 31st of March, 1934.

Mr. VENIOT: In 1931 an order for 2,000,000 ties was placed and I should like to know if the full cost of that order was charged to unemployment relief.

Mr. GORDON: Under the 1931 act the cost of those ties was charged to unemployment.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand a further order for some 800,000 ties is being given by the Canadian National Railways. Are these to be paid out of the unemployment relief fund or are they to be chargeable direct to the Canadian National?

Mr. GORDON: That order wil be chargeable to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Reference was made last night to orders in council P.C. 2787 and 2171, by the first of which an amount of $1,447,222.71 was advanced to the Canadian Pacific Railway to pay the wages of men employed in the shops, and by the other the sum of $1,000,000 was advanced to the same railway also to pay the wages of the men employed in the shops. In both those orders in council there is reference to arrangements that have been made to maintain operations in the shops of the Canadian National Railways. I should like to know what arrangements have been made with the Canadian National Railways for the purpose of permitting the employment of their workmen in the shops.

Mr. GORDON: At the time the first order in council was passed authorizing the $1,400,000 odd in payment of the wages of the employees on the Canadian Pacific, the position of the shopmen on both railways was giving a good deal of concern, and it was felt that keeping those shops open for a short time would probably be as sound a measure of unemployment relief as the government at that time could well adopt. The Canadian National directorate did make arrangements and provide for keeping their shops open. They might have closed them, and a great many of their employees would then of course have come on relief. Having regard to the fact that the Canadian National Railways, receiving as they do their money from this parliament, were keeping their shops open, it was the opinion of the government, in view of the situation in which the Canadian Pacific Railway found itself, that provision should be made for the loaning to the Canadian Pacific of the amount of $1,400,000 odd in order that they might keep their shops open for a similar length of time. With reference to the authorization of a further $1,000,000, that money, while authorized, has not yet been spent, as the return of the wages paid has not yet been submitted to the government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Canadian National Railways did not get any advance from that relief fund?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps I might explain, as the hon. Minister of Labour was not then in that department. The former Minister of Labour, Senator Robertson, dealt with this matter, and under the arrangements made, the Canadian National shops were kept open on part time without a shutdown, but the Canadian Pacific shops had been closed, and it was a question as between giving direct relief and loaning the money to keep the shops in operation for the period of time mentioned in the order in council. But the order in council was not passed until long after the expenditure had been incurred, and with the application there were filed the vouchers signed by the workmen for all the moneys thtat had been expended for actual labour, as represented in the order in council.

There is one further thing to be said. The company thought that if there was an improvement in business it would not be essential that they should get a loan, but when there was not that improvement as expected, the order in council was passed. It will be observed that the order in council is dated September 30, 1932, long after the expenditure had been incurred, the expenditure being made in the month of December, 1931.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My question relates to the Canadian National Railways shops. What has been done about them?

Mr. BENNETT: They were not closed. Senator Robertson made an arrangement that permitted the Canadian National shops, by staggering employment, and with partial shutdowns, to continue open, and the recital in the order in council has reference to the arrangement made by Senator Robertson, with which the present Minister of Labour was not then familiar.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I refer my right hon. friend to an answer that he gave me this session on November 8, at page 924 of Hansard. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Jean) had asked a question which included this:

4. Did the government make similar advances to the Canadian National Railways?

My right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, did not reply at first to that part of the question, and I asked him what about part 4 of the question, reading, "Did the government make similar advances to the Canadian National Railways?" And the Prime Minister replied:

I thank my hon. friend for bringing that to my attention. Yes, the government did make similar advances.

That is not what my right hon. friend says now.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I wished to convey at that time, and if the hon. gentleman had so desired it could have been amplified. There were in point of fact larger advances to the Canadian National than to the Canadian Pacific, but the advances were made by not shutting the Canadian National shops down during that period. There was more employment and a lessening of unemployment by the shops continuing to remain open during that whole period under consideration. There never was a shutdown of the Canadian National shops during that period, whereas in the other case there was a shutdown.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But any aid given to the Canadian National Railways was not taken out of this vote?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no, none at all, so far as my memory goes, except the ties, as was mentioned by the minister a few minutes ago.

Mr. VENIOT: I brought this question up the other day, and to-night the Prime Minister leaves the impression on the committee that there was no closing down of the Canadian National shops, that there was continuous work.

Mr. BENNETT: Not continuous work, but not a continuous shutdown.

Mr. VENIOT: There was not an absolute shutdown in the shops at Moncton. The work was intermittent, the shops working sometimes four days a week, and so on.

Mr. MANION: That was true all over the country.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. But the point I wish to make is that while the Canadian National shops were kept open in an intermittent way for purposes of relief, the money so expended never came out of the relief money voted by this parliament; it came out of the earnings of the Canadian National Railways, and the earnings of the road not being sufficient to meet the expenses, that amount is charged up as part of the deficit of the Canadian National Railways. Now to meet that deficit we have borrowed money on which we are paying 4¼ or 4½ per cent. While we are charging interest to the Canadian National in that regard, we are loaning money to the Canadian Pacific at no interest at all, and in order to pay the Canadian Pacific the money that was earned under that order in council we floated bonds on which we are paying 4¼ or 4½ per cent interest. I claim that it is not fair. It is not treating the Canadian National system right, and especially the Atlantic section, which during last year in the reduction of operating expenses was cut down to the expenditure of one-half of the whole difference between 1931 and 1932, as compared with the total mileage of the Canadian National railways throughout Canada. If we are going to furnish money to the Canadian Pacific without charge, and we are going to say to the Canadian National, "Keep your shops open for a certain number of days in the week or a certain number of days in the month," and then charge that expenditure up as part of the deficit of the Canadian National and make them pay interest on it at 4¼ per cent, I claim that we are not dealing fairly with the Canadian National.

Mr. BENNETT: The only difficulty about the hon. gentleman's observations is that they happen to be inaccurate.

Mr. VENIOT: They are not.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the only difficulty, and I think I can satisfy him on that point—even the hon. gentleman himself. In 1931 there was a surplus of revenue over expenses on the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. VENIOT: Not on the Atlantic division.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me—on the system as reported; and the operating expenses include charges for the keeping open of the shops. The surplus was approximately $2,000,000.

Mr. VENIOT: How much?

Mr. BENNETT: $2,000,000. In 1932 there was also a surplus of approximately $5,000,000. So that no part of the deficit paid by this parliament had reference in any way, shape or form, directly or indirectly, to the operating expenses in which were included charges for the keeping open of the shops. The expense of keeping the shops open was charged against the operating expense of the road, from week to week and from month to month, and at the end of the year there was a surplus of income over operating expenses. The deficit was with respect to interest on capital, improvements and betterments.

Mr. VENIOT: I do this with some trepidation, but allow me to correct the right hon. Prime Minister. There was no surplus on the Atlantic region, and that is what I am talking about. There was a deficit of over $5,000,000 in 1931 on the Atlantic region, part of it being charged up to the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and the balance charged to operating deficit of 1931. I know whereof I speak. I rely on the records laid on the table of the house. I refer to the Atlantic region, and if the right hon. Prime Minister attempts to show there was a surplus which included the whole Canadian National railway system, he is wrong. I do not accept his word, because I know I am right. It is a matter of choosing between two facts; under the rules of the house I am not bound to accept the Prime Minister's word; knowing I am right I cannot accept it. In the year 1932 on the Atlantic region of the Canadian National railways there was a deficit of between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000. Those shops were kept open intermittently for the purpose of helping out the unemployed. At the time we were charging as a deficit the operation of the Moncton shops, we were loaning money to the Canadian Pacific Railway without interest.

Mr. BENNETT: I hesitate to trespass upon the time of the committee; I do not wish to waste the time of hon. members by talking about two incomparable matters. I was talking about the Canadian National railways system; the hon. member who has just taken his seat was talking about the Atlantic division. I am not talking about the Atlantic division. I have said that in the year 1931 there was a surplus of $2,000,000 on the operation of the Canadian National system. That is all I am concerned about. I could point out a dozen places where there were deficits in the Canadian National system, but at this time I have simply stated that there was a surplus of revenue over expenses. That is all I have to say.

Mr. VENIOT: I have more than that to say. The Prime Minister should know, and I am sure he does, that the Atlantic region, the old Intercolonial, the shops of which are at Moncton, is not under the Canadian National railway system. Their accounts are kept separately. The Canadian National directors are authorized by order in council to manage the road. As I said the other day, the Atlantic section represents a bond between the maritime and the central provinces which was arranged at the time of confederation. All governments have religiously safeguarded the status of the old Intercolonial by saying, through order in council, that the members of the directorate of the Canadian National system on behalf of the government of Canada shall manage the road, shall keep the accounts separate and submit them to parliament. Under that arrangement the Atlantic region has had a deficit during the last five or six years. Therefore I submit the Prime Minister's argument does not hold water.

Mr. HEAPS: I spoke a week or so ago concerning a matter which has just been mentioned. I addressed the Minister of Railways with regard to men employed at the railway shops as the result of a grant given by the government to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have in my possession a couple of letters concerning this important point. Some of the men employed in the shops of the Canadian Pacific Railway claim they have not received the amount of work they should have received as a result of the grant given by the government to the railway company. They claim the work they should have done was being done by the foremen on a monthly basis. Because the men who were employed on a monthly basis were doing a great deal of the work, those who were employed on an hourly basis did not have the opportunity for work they should have had. If such is the case it means that the advantages gained by the grant given to the Canadian Pacific have to a large extent been nullified by the action of the railway in giving work to permanent employees who, in any event, would receive their monthly cheques.

I believe the Prime Minister said to-night, as well as on a previous occasion, that some vouchers signed by the men had been presented either to the cabinet or to parliament. I am wondering whether those vouchers will be open for inspection, so that those who to-day are urging that the men on an hourly basis have not been treated fairly might receive some satisfaction. Could the vouchers be looked into so that we might ascertain whether the men received the advantages which they should have had from the moneys granted by parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: There are several volumes of vouchers respecting some 8,000 employees scattered across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Those vouchers are filed at the Privy Council office. I shall speak to the Clerk of the Privy Council so that it may be possible for the hon. gentleman to examine them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is this money advanced to the Canadian Pacific to keep all their shops open? Is there any specification as to what shops will be kept open? Because I know at the present time in my own city and my own constituency employees in shops are threatened with unemployment. I know that negotiations are being carried on between the city council and the company. If a million dollars was advanced to keep the shops open I suppose Quebec will have the same treatment as other places where there are shops?

Mr. BENNETT: All the shops were kept open, but it was a period of time during the Christmas season. It will be observed in 1931 the work commenced some time past the middle of November and continued up to the last work day before Christmas week. The same course was followed in 1932. The agreement was—and I have every reason to believe it was carried out—that there should be no discrimination, but that all the shops should be worked for the number of days the money would permit. But it was in November and December, 1932 that it was done.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But the moneys are to be paid in 1933?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: During the past few days we have heard a discussion concerning relief measures in the province of Quebec. Personally I do not intend to speak at length concerning points already covered by other hon. members. I am aware that some people find fault with certain legislation which has been in force in the province of Quebec. In the province from which I come I notice the law has been administered through the efforts of the Minister of Colonization, Game and Fisheries, the Hon. Hector Laferté. I hold no brief for him or for the provincial government in this matter, but I think it is fair to say that the law has been administered by the Department of Colonization, Game and Fisheries of the province of Quebec in a fair way, and that the people in the various districts where settlements have been made are satisfied. For instance in the district I have the honour to represent in this house I know that some new settlements were established behind Ste. Agnès and St. Siméon in the county of Charlevoix, also the north shore of the St. Lawrence, and in places called Mille Vaches, Les Escoumains, Cantons Latour and Laval and at Manikuagan. I have here the whole report of the Department of Colonization of the province of Quebec for the year 1932 and it is stated at page 88 that 71 families have been settled in one district and 44 the other.

But, Mr. Chairman, coming back to this movement, as was stated this afternoon by the hon. member for Kamouraska, while the government may claim this policy as its own, nevertheless I think it is not the policy of this government; it is not the Gordon scheme as we might call it, because long before this government ever had a back to the land policy we in the province of Quebec, the government that is to-day administering the affairs of that province, the Taschereau government, had started this movement of colonization.

Mr. SAUVE: Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN: My hon. friend the Postmaster General says "hear, hear." I know myself that since I have had the honour to represent the district I do represent in this house, on the river Outarde near Outarde falls great districts were settled. Families were brought from other parts of the province of Quebec, where there are good lands, and people were established there through the efforts of the provincial government as far back as 1926 to 1930. Therefore, I think the adoption of this back to the land policy by the government in Ottawa is due to the example and the good work of the government of the province of Quebec.

While on this subject I would like to say a word with respect to the hon. Postmaster General. I want to pay a tribute to him—for once we can agree: I can say that he has done some good, because in one of the districts I have just mentioned there was a new place called St. Isidore le Laboureur, behind St. Siméon, for which a post office and mail service was requested. I asked the Post Office Department to grant this favour to this new settlement, and I have received confirmation of the success of my efforts in obtaining the post office and mail service through the Postmaster General. I think that is a desirable thing he has done in helping these people, giving them the services necessary to make their settlement attractive. I think also, Mr. Chairman, it is a good way to make these people favourable and to minimize the evils for which this government have been responsible since they have been at the head of affairs in this country.

Mr. SAUVE: This is not my birthday!

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is one other point to which I wish to draw the attention of the acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization. The hon. member for Kamouraska this afternoon mentioned that last night the minister said that through the efforts of his department people to the number of 100,000 or more have been attracted and brought in to settle in these different places. With the hon. member for Kamouraska I take exception to that statement as indicating the number of people who have been settled in these various places. I have mentioned a few settlements in the district I have the honour to represent, and I think it would be well for the minister to advise the committee in detail respecting the other districts of Quebec and the other provinces of Canada in which people to the extent of 100,000 have been settled through the efforts of this government. I express the opinion that if a lot of people have been settled on the land it is due not so much to the policy adopted by this administration as to the policy initiated by the government of Quebec, and I dare say that in Ontario and elsewhere they may have had in effect a similar scheme long before the federal government started its activities along that line.

I think also that the remarks made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) should receive the careful attention of the minister. He said that only heads of families are entitled to the benefit of this plan. The sons of farmers in our province who are qualified to settle on land in these new districts ought to be encouraged just as much as heads of families, because it would mean that people would be encouraged to stay in our province to the benefit not only of the province of Quebec but of the whole of Canada.

There is also the point brought up by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) as to the classification of people who ought to go on the land. I agree with the remarks made by some hon. members this afternoon that it is better to attract to the land or keep on the land those who are accustomed to country life than men taken from the slums of cities where they have been for a good many years, idle maybe, people who for a long time have had no contact with the land and who therefore cannot have the same energy and courage to start anew, especially if they are advanced in age.

Mr. GORDON: We do not take that class of people at all.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I say that the efforts of this government and of the provincial governments should be directed to the settlement of the sons of agricultural families. In the report published this year by the Department of Trade and Commerce at page 184, it is stated that only heads of families can benefit from such measures. I take issue with the department on that point. I think the sons of farmers in the various provinces ought to be encouraged to avail themselves of the benefit of this back to the land scheme rather than people in the cities. And I think they ought to be encouraged as much as heads of families. I know in my own district there are many people who would be willing to take advantage of such a scheme. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this government is not entitled to take the full share of credit for what has been done, because it could not have been done without the assistance of the provincial government, which has indicated where the settlement should take place. And as I have said, the provincial government was away ahead of this administration in adopting the back to the land movement.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the present moment is an appropriate one for the minister to give us some information concerning the unemployment insurance proposals. I know he is straining at the leash and yearning to give us out of his wealth of experience and knowledge and ability a statement on the matter. He was present at the conference with the provinces and therefore is in a position to inform us in regard to this very important subject. The public will not be satisfied with any mere evasion of the subject. They had reason to believe that action would be taken on this matter, but the session is going on and I do not know of any other occasion when this question could be brought up. I think that in considering the question of relief it is quite appropriate for the minister to give us the fullest possible information on the prospects of having unemployment insurance put into effect in Canada.

Mr. GORDON: Dealing first with the observations of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, let me say at once that there is no intention, and I hope there never will be, of trying to take credit away from the province of Quebec with respect to colonization. If the work carried on by the province of Quebec along these lines in the past needed defence, I defended them in the house against the impeachment of the hon. member for Témiscouata. Anyone who have even casual knowledge of the history of the development of Canada should not be slow to commend the actions of the successive governments of the province of Quebec even before confederation, and in fact almost since the beginning of settlement, along this line.

Mr. BOUCHARD: If the minister would allow me, I think he should make a distinction between colonization and the back to the land movement. I think several hon. members have become confused. There are two systems in Quebec, but colonization before confederation has nothing whatever to do with the back to the land movement.

Mr. GORDON: I was endeavouring to reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, who referred—and I think very properly—to colonization and the back to the land movement. So far as I am concerned I see very little difference between the two, but perhaps my hon. friend may see some refinements that I am unable to distinguish. There is no question of who is to get credit for this or that. If I may use the word, Mr. Chairman, I do not care a continental who gets the credit so long as we either lead the way or supplement the efforts of those leading the way in order that the desired object may be attained, that is, that those who are ready and willing and desirable may take full advantage of this opportunity to make themselves independent and self-sustaining. If any success has attended the efforts of this government, in conjunction with the provinces and the railway companies; if any credit is due anyone with respect to any assistance this government has been able to give, I will hand that credit to anyone. I will give it to the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay. He can take it to himself with my blessing; it will be his very own, so long as we do what we are hoping to do. This business of taking credit one way or the other at a time like this does not give me any great concern.

Mr. POULIOT: Did the minister say I had impeached the province of Quebec? Were those the words he used?

Mr. GORDON: I do not know that I can recall my exact words, but in substance I said the hon. member for Temiscouata had criticized the colonization efforts of the government of the province of Quebec. So far as I know the efforts of that government deserve credit, and my contact with their officials certainly has been pleasant and profitable. I have found them desirous of accomplishing what has been my objective, and probably they had that end in view long before I came into public life.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but he said he had to defend the province of Quebec against the impeachment of the hon. member for Temiscouata. Those were his words; I was looking at pictures but listening to his speech, and my understanding is corroborated by those about me on this side of the house. Is it fair for a minister of the crown to use such language, especially after I repeated my complaints this afternoon? I was not complaining of the government of Quebec; I did not say a word against the government, against the provincial minister or against my hon. friend. Is it fair to give a false interpretation to my words? I ask the minister to withdraw his reference to the impeachment of the province of Quebec by the hon. member for Temiscouata; it would be only fair.

Mr. GORDON: I am quite content to let the words of the hon. member for Temiscouata, as they will be revealed in the pages of Hansard, speak for themselves. If I used words which were not exactly his I can only say that of course my memory is not so good that I can follow him exactly. Certainly I gathered from his remarks to-day and a few days ago that he roundly condemned the administration of the colonization department of the province of Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: By certain employees.

Mr. GORDON: The government takes responsibility for its officials, of course. The hon. member went so far as to say that the colonists who were sent out by the government had to eat grass and roots and so on, and I believe he even said they lived like swine. I do not come in contact with the provincial colonization men and I have nothing to do with provincial policies in Quebec, but I do know that this department is in touch with our committee, which consists of the representatives of the colonization departments of the railways, of our department and of the Quebec department. From my observations and from what I can gather I cannot conceive that those men would be parties to a colonization effort such as has been described by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

With regard to the situation in my hon. friend's own constituency I can only say that under the assisted plan we have placed only two settlers in that county, and I have been instructed by the head of the colonization department of the Canadian National Railways that from both of these settlers he recently received communications stating that they were getting along well, that they were very happy to be located where they are, and so on. Our locations are almost entirely in the Abitibi and Timiskaming district, and I have lengthy reports concerning the way those settlers are getting on. There is throughout a spirit of satisfaction with the locations upon which they are placed and with the conditions under which they are living, and a feeling of optimism prevails amongst these settlers. There were not housed together in buildings, men, women and children huddled together, as suggested. The hon. member for Témiscouata was not in his place this afternoon when I explained that the heads of families preceded the families. They were taken care of, their locations were picked out in a fertile section of the country adjacent to the mining areas of northwestern Quebec, and their families followed after them. A representative of the Canadian National Railways, because it is the Canadian National that runs through that country, has made many trips visiting these people. Their churches are being built and the general atmosphere is one of optimism.

I will not delay the committee by reading all the communications I have received, or even a number of them, from that locality, but I can assure hon. members that what I say is correct with respect not only to the feeling that exists amongst these settlers but with respect to their confidence in the future. Hon. members who represent city constituencies must bear in mind that it is difficult for them, if they have not been around a great mining area like northwestern Quebec and parts of northern Ontario, to visualize the opportunities that are there for the Canadian people. It is a wonderful thing for the country that we have such places in these parts of Canada. It is quite true that the farmers there are experiencing difficulties, just as the farmers throughout the world are; but they have excellent locations and their homes are largely unencumbered, inasmuch as their locations were crown lands; and while across the Ontario boundary the settlement is older than it is in Quebec, nevertheless wonderful strides are being made in the colonization of that country. I do not say this purely because the hon. member for Témiscouata doubts the soundness of the program that is being contributed to by the federal government; I state it merely as a fact, so that the committee will get a picture of the movement of these settlers

Since I have been a member of this house I have refrained from quoting from newspapers, but if I may be pardoned for doing so on this occasion, I would read what the deputy minister of the colonization, game and fisheries department of Quebec had to say with reference to a visit to that area:

In an interview accorded a Chronicle-Telegraph representative this morning, Deputy Minister L. A. Richard of the Provincial Colonization, Game and Fisheries Department, expressed his amazement at the unbounded enthusiasm which he had personally witnessed amongst the "back to the land colonists," who were only a few weeks ago settled on arable and wooded lots in the Temiskaming district.

Mr. Richard, who accompanied his minister, Hon. Hector Laferté, and a number of railwaymen and prominent citizens, has just returned from a visit to the newly formed settlement, not far from the banks of the "Lonely River," where these hardy sons and daughters of Quebec are going to wrest a home and comfortable living from mother earth who they deserted in their more prosperous days, but who has received them back again in the days of their adversity.

In prefacing his interview, Mr. Richard explained that when these heads of families were picked for the great experiment, it was with the knowledge that they were former farmers, and all of them knew a smattering of carpentry, that is, they knew how to put together a log cabin.

"The visit to these settlers of ours was a revelation to me," said the Deputy Minister. "I had been told they were satisfied, but I was not prepared to see all of them bubbling over with unbounded enthusiasm. They are! Everyone of them! There wasn't a kick anywhere, and I surely thought there might be, as they had been placed on the land so late in the year.

"I talked with many of them and their speech was just the same. Thankfulness that at last after many weary months of wrestling with the wolf at the door, they were their own masters. Living in houses they had built themselves. Their fate in their own hands; their immediate wants provided for by a beneficent government, or rather I should say beneficent federal, provincial and municipal governments. No taxes to pay; no irate landlords demanding their pounds of flesh; soil which will grow almost anything; brooks and streams teeming with all kinds of fish in season, also a pure water supply brought from the surrounding hills; a moose perhaps, and partridge and hares running around waiting to be bagged and put in the larder."

I am sure this part of the interview will be quite interesting to the hon. member for Témiscouata, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay and, I might almost venture to suggest, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni:

This picture is not exaggerated! These people are happy, and you would have thought so too if you had seen about a thousand of them, men, women and children, as they attended open air mass on Sunday last, and witnessed the first marriage in the settlement which by the way is to be called St. Monica de Rollet, after the wife of Louis Hebert, the first Canadian settler. Incidentally Hon. Mr. Laferté gave the bride away and kissed her heartily.

I have many such communications from these settlers. Now, I do not think they will be one hundred per cent successes; they never have been in the past. We do look forward however to a considerable and substantial permanent settlement, although there will unquestionably be disappointments.

With reference to the question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I do not think the measure now before the house affords the proper opportunity to discuss the matter of unemployment insurance, which is a very broad one. Many countries in the world have attempted some sort of unemployment insurance, and many private concerns have endeavoured to fashion a plan of some kind that would take up the slack in times when industry had failed to give that job security which is so essential to the workers in industrial centres. Plans have been instituted in certain countries in Europe, and in the United States industries have set up schemes—such industries as the General Electric Company—in connection with the question. The whole question of unemployment insurance is one of great complexity. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I take it, would like to know whether a measure of that kind will be brought before the house this session. I can tell him it will not. No government would be justified in hurriedly embarking on a project the success of which would be founded perhaps in very large measure upon a careful study of the various factors that enter into the consideration of it.

The matter is under consideration by the government, as it is unquestionably under consideration by many public bodies, and it is hoped that some solution will be found in order to give to the workers that security during seasonal unemployment, or unemployment for any other reason, which many people think the workers should enjoy. No government would embark hurriedly on a plan of that sort without having canvassed every possibility of success or failure. We had to take into consideration the necessity of establishing it upon a firm foundation so that it would not meet with disaster during the course of its operation. I think we were adopting a wise course with respect to so important a subject.

Mr. NEILL: Could not the minister tell us what progress was made at the recent interprovincial conference? The Prime Minister was very definite in his assurance last November. I quoted his remarks yesterday and I think he said that they might be able to introduce a bill at this session. I believe he used the word "guarantee" that steps would be taken at the coming conference to have arrangements made which would make it possible. I should like to know what progress was made or what obstacles were encountered at that conference. It has been stated that this is not an appropriate time to discuss this matter, but I would point out that it has a distinct bearing upon the question we are considering. We are going to vote $20,000,000 for direct relief and perhaps we would not have to spend so much if an unemployment insurance policy were put into effect in the near future. It would be a sort of alternative. No one is suggesting that the government should plunge hurriedly into this matter. The question was brought up on April 29, 1931, nearly two years ago and the Prime Minister then told us very distinctly what he proposed to do. I am not trying to harass the minister in any way but I do not think it is out of place to ask for some definite report upon the progress which has been made. There is no use talking about Europe or the United States; this is Canada and this thing has been hanging fire long enough. The Prime Minister was very definite last November and I think we are now entitled to a definite statement.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Chairman, I would not have taken part in the discussion on this resolution had it not been for certain words uttered by the Prime Minister on March 3 which to my mind reflected upon the province of Manitoba. As a member from that province I think I would be negligent in my duty if I did not put the facts before the house. On March 3, the Prime Minister said:

> In the province of Manitoba they had what they called a savings bank in which the people of that province had deposited some $12,000,000 in small savings accounts. When the cheques were being written to withdraw that money what did they have? They had the promises to pay, the I.O.U.'s of the province of Manitoba. The money was gone; in its place had been substituted I.O.U.'s of the province of Manitoba that could not be sold. . . . We guaranteed the $12,000,000 of those deposits to enable the depositors to draw out money with which to live. That was one of the guarantees we made under the statute, and the order in council was laid upon the table of this house.

I do not intend to read the order in council, but I should like to refer to the report of the committee of the legislative assembly of Manitoba which investigated the closing of the savings bank. This report shows that that bank had as guarantees for the deposits the following securities:

Railway bonds and registered stock guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada	$2,398,728 44
Dominion of Canada bonds	69,000 00
City of Winnipeg registered stocks and bonds	495,278 42
Province of Manitoba Exchequer bonds	6,615,000 00
Provincial and municipal stocks, bonds and debentures (most of which guaranteed by the province of Manitoba)	3,051,313 73
Province of Manitoba farm loans bonds guaranteed by the province of Manitoba	1,750,222 63

Mr. GORDON: What is the date of that report?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The investigation took place during the session of 1932. The savings bank had closed before the legislature met.

Mr. GORDON: I should like to know the date when it is said that these securities were in fact in the hands of the bank unencumbered.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The last report filed is for the year ended April 30, 1931. The report sets out in detail the investments held by the savings bank at that time, which were those I have just read. The report continues:

> The above amounts represent the book values of these securities. The estimated market value as of April 30, 1931, was $14,764,743.55.
> The deputy provincial treasurer in his evidence states that at the end of August there was no material change in the value of these securities since April 30 of that year; in fact their value remained about the same until England went off the gold standard.
> There was no material change in the nature of investments at the time the office closed. At that time the investments were as follows:

Dominion government guaranteed securities	$ 2,470,800 87
City of Winnipeg stocks and bonds	495,278 42
Province of Manitoba exchequer bonds and debentures and other municipal stock guaranteed by the province	11,514,528 36
Making a total	$14,480,607 65

> The evidence shows and the committee find that after England went off the gold standard the market for all classes of securities was in a very chaotic condition, in fact for a period following this time there really was no market at all at which bonds could be sold for reasonable prices. Such conditions continued until the office closed.
> The committee points out that the act contemplated that the moneys received by way of deposit were to be invested in the manner provided for in the act, and this particularly refers to the securities of the province. Notwithstanding this fact the trustees had, at the time the office closed, invested in Dominion Government of Canada guaranteed securities amounting to over $2,400,000.

There was filed with the committee the order in council, No. 3185, passed by the Dominion government on December 31, 1931. This order permitted the superintendent of insurance for the purpose of returns to be made by insurance companies and to enable him to determine the solvency of such companies, to accept such returns as sufficient evidence of such solvency when it appears that the common and preferred stocks included therein were valued in prices not exceeding the market prices of such stocks prevailing on June 30, 1931.

By order in council this government allowed the insurance companies and the banks to value their stock as of June 30, 1931, in order to show a better financial statement. There is no question that all securities have gone down to a certain degree but the provincial savings bank was in no worse position than any other bank. If a run had taken place upon any of our chartered banks and if they had been treated the same as the provincial saving bank was treated, they would have had to close. The provincial bank had mostly municipal, provincial and dominion bonds which were more negotiable than the notes of ordinary individuals which were held by the chartered banks as guarantees for deposits.

Mr. GORDON: Has the hon. member the total value of the bonds which were held unencumbered by the bank at the time it went out of business?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I did not catch that.

Mr. GORDON: I said the bonds and stocks which the savings office held unencumbered in its vaults as security against the deposits when the bank closed.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: According to this report the security was exactly the same then as it was before, namely:

Dominion government guaranteed securities	$ 2,470,800 87
City of Winnipeg stocks and bonds	495,278 42
Province of Manitoba exchequer bonds and debentures and other municipal stock guaranteed by the province	11,514,528 36
Total	$14,480,607 65

What are the conclusions of the committee which investigated the closing of the savings office? They are as follows:

In conclusion the committee finds:

1. That the savings office was in a sound position as of the 31st day of August, 1931, immediately preceding the precipitous decline in the world market for securities.

2. That the deposits of the savings office were invested in strict accordance with the statutes authorizing the office; that the percentage of provincial securities held by the office was in accordance with the purpose for which the savings office was established; and that the percentage of such deposits held in cash and invested in dominion government securities was such as to ensure the office being able to meet every emergency that could be foreseen.

3. Then following the precipitous decline in the securities market, the government secured a credit of $1,000,000 to meet any possible emergency arising from this circumstance, and this provision proved quite adequate for such purpose.

4. That the business of the savings office was normal up until about January 11, 1932, when the unusual withdrawals of deposits commenced as a result of rumours.

5. That the rumours which started the run which resulted in the closing of the savings office apparently were in part the result of a deliberate and organized campaign.

6. That any rumours relating directly to the provincial savings office, which were traced to individual citizens, were circulated by the following:—

The names are given but I shall not read them:

7. Your committee is of the opinion that had the Dominion government given the necessary guarantee as requested, the savings could and would have been saved to the province of Manitoba. If such request had been granted it would not have been necessary for the Dominion government to assume any greater responsibility than it assumed when it finally guaranteed the banks.

8. Your committee find that the action of the Dominion government in refusing the request of the province for such guarantees cannot be justified in view of the guarantee given later by it to the banks, and in view of assistance given to other provinces.

9. The committee finds that the suggestion made that Premier Bracken went east in company with any other person or persons for the purpose of selling the savings office, or that he or any person or persons associated with him at any time offered to sell the savings office, is without foundation.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that these facts should be put before the house. The Prime Minister referred to the I.O.U.'s of the province of Manitoba. We know that the province of Manitoba is going through some difficulties, and we know that this government also is going through some difficulties, but at the same time I do not think it gets us anywhere to throw reflections on the securities of the province of Manitoba. The province is doing the best it can in trying to meet the situation. I know that it is probably not as sound as it was a year ago or two years ago. I do not know anybody's securities that are as sound to-day as they were one year or two years ago. The government admits that itself when it allowed the banks and insurance companies to value their stocks as of a day six or twelve months previous to make a better showing at the end of their financial year. I think I have put the facts before the house, Mr. Chairman, in a true light.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the Minister of Finance made the following statement:

By order in council of April 28, 1932, P.C. 972, effect was given to an undertaking by which, in the month of February of that year, the dominion guaranteed the chartered banks doing business in Winnipeg from loss in respect of the assumption by these banks of all liabilities of the Province of Manitoba Savings Office. The banks received from the province of Manitoba as security for the assumption of such liabilities, $12,442,400 one-year 5½ per cent treasury bills, maturing February 27, 1933, and on the maturity of these bills the banks were willing to accept a renewal, less the sum of $334,098 paid on principal account, provided the guarantee was continued. This the governor in council authorized under minute of February 22, 1933, P.C. 318.

That is the transaction so far as the Dominion government is concerned.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It proves that the province of Manitoba was pretty fair. They paid something on it anyway.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think that that observation calls for any reply. That $2,470,000 of dominion securities to which reference has been made was hypothecated to the banks, to enable the province to secure cash with which to meet the demands of depositors. When that was exhausted and there came a day in February, 1932, when there was no longer anything left in the way of cash to meet the demands of the people who had put their money in the bank, then the bank either had to close its doors or get cash from some other source. It secured it from the chartered banks of Winnipeg, making its own bargain with the banks in that city, the bargain being a bargain made between the chartered banks and the province of Manitoba. The banks, as I explained in the statement I read to this house last year, stated that they were not prepared to become responsible for deposits aggregating $12,000,000 on the I.O.U.'s of Manitoba, and requested a guarantee which we gave to prevent the depositors from failure to get their moneys.

So far as the report is concerned, we all know about it. It was a report made before the last provincial election. It is partisan, it is incorrect, and what is more, it was made for a particular purpose. No good end will be served by discussing it here now, for this is not the tribunal that directed the investigation or held it. It was held by the province under the direction of its ministry. A report was brought in to the house just prior to the election. The report reflected upon a number of men who, it said, had started rumours with respect to the solvency of the savings office, and the names were given, one of them a member of the legislature. The result was, of course, an acrimonious discussion on the part of everybody connected with the transaction. It served its purpose, but it did not improve the condition of the province of Manitoba.

It is incorrect, for instance, to say that the province of Manitoba has not received consideration at the hands of this government as other provinces have. It has received more consideration relatively to its population, so the Minister of Finance told me the other day, than any other western province. That is the position as the Minister of Finance explained it to me the other day when I was going over the figures, and I believe them to be correct.

The letter to which I referred the other day which was sent to the province of Manitoba was sent to all the western provinces, and one province, Manitoba, has sent a reply in which in large measure they indicate the correctness of the views which were held by this government. To preserve the financial integrity of the province of Manitoba it will be necessary for the Dominion government to make very large payments, many millions of dollars, and no useful purpose can be served by discussing in this house a report made by a committee appointed by a provincial legislature, and which in the view of at least half the people of the province is unsound, incorrect and unwarranted in fact.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I say to the Prime Minister that no useful purpose can be served by the statement which he made in this house on March 3. When did we ever describe provincial exchequer bonds as I.O.U.'s? I have given I.O.U.'s, but they were always written on pieces of paper. In my view such a reference was a reflection upon the securities of the province of Manitoba. May I ask the Prime Minister this question: Suppose there had been a run on one of the large chartered banks, and the other banks did not come to its assistance, would there not be the same result as ensued in the case of the provincial savings bank?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think any good purpose is served by answering suppositious questions. But since the question has been asked perhaps the committee would like an answer. There was a run on one of the chartered banks in Canada. It was a run predicated entirely upon the failure of one of the great brokerage firms of this country. It was thought by many people that the bank might be a failure; $10,000,000 in deposits were withdrawn. No assistance was given by other banks, and there was no question of the government being asked for assistance.

Mr. POWER: This might be the proper time to read from an order in council P.C. 2693 dated October 27, 1931, about the time of the failure of the stock brokerage firm to which the Prime Minister has referred. I imagine this order in council applies to the situation in Manitoba. It is as follows:

His Excellency,

The Governor General in Council:

Whereas the acting Minister of Finance reports that, owing to the existing general depression, but more particularly the recent international monetary developments, quotations have been recorded in the security markets for many high grade government securities which would not seem to be normal or reasonable quotations, or such as might serve as a proper indication of the intrinsic value thereof, having regard to the fact that the security behind these obligations has undergone no fundamental change.

And whereas the chartered banks are required—

Not the savings banks.

—under the provisions of the Bank Act, to show investment securities in their monthly and annual financial statements at not in excess of market values;

And whereas representations have been made by the inspector general of banks that it is in the public interest that a reasonably stable basis of valuation be determined for such high grade security;

And whereas section 4 of chapter 58 of the statutes of 1931 provides that His Excellency the Governor General in Council shall have full power to make all such orders and regulations as may be deemed necessary or desirable for, among other things, maintaining peace, order and good government throughout Canada;

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council is pleased—on the recommendations of the acting Minister of Finance and under the authority of section 4 of chapter 58 of the statutes of 1931 aforesaid, and of all other powers and authorities in that behalf—to order and it is hereby ordered as follows:

1. That for the purpose of the return provided under section 112 of the Bank Act and schedule "G" thereto, and the annual report as directed by section 53 of the same act, the chartered banks of Canada shall, until this order is amended or rescinded, value the securities owned prior to the thirty-first day of August, 1931, at not more than the book value, or the current market prices thereof on the exchanges at the close of business on the thirty-first day of August, 1931, whichever may be the less, and the securities acquired since the thirty-first day of August, 1931, at not more than the cost price thereof.

2. This order shall come into force and effect on the twenty-sixth day of October, 1931, shall apply to the returns of the chartered banks as from September 30, 1931, and shall continue in full force and effect until the first day of March, 1932, unless sooner amended or rescinded by competent authority.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I was informed some time in May last year that this order in council had not been renewed, and I take it it has not been. But for the purpose of the point which has been brought up I should like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the preamble to the order in council it is recited that "the market for high grade government securities has fallen, although the security behind these obligations has undergone no fundamental change." In other words the preamble deals entirely with high grade government securities. But the executory portion of the order in council deals with all securities. I imagine that under this order in council the banks, in their reports, were entitled to value Brazilian, Nickel, Canadian Pacific and all other common stocks as of their value on August 31, 1931, although as a matter of fact, when this order in council was passed, these stocks had fallen considerably. To-day they are considerably lower in value on the security markets of the world than they were at that time. It seems to me that to a considerable extent this was giving government assistance to the banks. It was at least supporting their credit to a considerable extent and permitting them to make reports of their securities at other than their real value on the ordinary security market.

Listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) I noticed that the report of the committee of the legislature of Manitoba called attention to the fact that the government had permitted a revaluation of securities held by insurance companies. Apparently they were not aware that the banks had been permitted to revalue their securities. I suggest that if the savings bank of Manitoba had been permitted the same valuation of its securities as the chartered banks of Canada were, there might have been a chance of saving it. I also draw attention of the committee to another paragraph of that report in which it is stated that if the government had come directly to the support of the savings bank it would have assumed no greater obligation than it did by supporting the chartered banks. I am not aware of all the details of the transaction, but it would appear to me that the people of Manitoba have a fairly legitimate ground for complaint when they say they were not treated as well as were the chartered banks of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose, Mr. Chairman, it is within the knowledge of this committee that the savings office of Manitoba was not a bank. The observations to which we have just listened would leave the conclusion in the minds of the committee that it was a savings bank. The province of Manitoba has no authority to conduct a bank. It has a savings office, as has the province of Ontario. And there are grave doubts in the minds of many as to whether or not the provinces have power at all to conduct the form of office they were conducting, which consisted in receiving from the people deposits withdrawable by cheque. It has been contended, and is still contended by eminent legal authorities, that neither province has a legal right to engage in that business. The word "bank" is not used for that very reason; "savings office," and not "savings bank," is the term used. If they were banks they would come within the provisions of the Bank Act; they have sought no authority from this parliament to open savings banks. There would be no reason why the province of Ontario or the province of Manitoba, if they so desired, should not obtain from this parliament the right to conduct a bank, and if they did they would be subject to the requirements of the Bank Act with respect to paid-up capital, the obtaining of a proper and appropriate directorate, and the conduct of business under inspection.

The moneys that were deposited in the savings offices at Winnipeg and other points in Manitoba aggregated the sum of $12,000,000 or more. In the month of January the depositors began to withdraw their money. As the province had no money with which to meet these demands—and nothing more clearly indicates what the science of banking really requires than this very transaction—they were called upon to secure the money from some source. They borrowed it from a chartered bank and gave as security for the loan thus obtained the bonds of the Dominion of Canada in which they had invested a portion of the depositors' money. As I understand the science of banking—my knowledge is limited—it consists in the maintenance of an equilibrium between time deposits and time loans on the one hand and demand deposits and demand loans on the other. If a bank ties up in time loans money required to meet its demand deposits it becomes insolvent. If it ties up its assets in time loans to an extent that makes it impossible for it to meet the cheques of its depositors, you have exactly the situation they had in the United States of America the week before last. In that country four thousand banks failed during the last few months. Why? Because they had taken deposits from people and invested the money in real estate, mortgages, and other assets which could not be sold, and there was therefore no money with which the demands of the depositors could be met; being unable to pay they closed their doors and went into liquidation.

The province of Manitoba in the month of January had no money in its till—that is admitted. But it was able to borrow a certain sum of money from the Canadian Bank of Commerce by pledging its Dominon of Canada bonds, under an option agreement whereby the bank was entitled for a given time to buy them at a figure if the bank so desired. That was the source of cash for the province of Manitoba to put into its till to meet the demands of its depositors. When the run on the savings office began—and the committee of the legislative assembly reported that suspicion and rumour were largely responsible for it; I am not going to discuss that—they had to get money somewhere. Being unable to get further money from the banks they had nothing but their own I.O.U.'s. Objection is taken to the use of that term by me, but it is exactly what the security was—I.O.U.'s which could not be sold for the purpose of providing cash to meet the cheque demands of the depositors. Then it was that the chartered banks and the province made the arrangement to which I refer. That arrangement not being to the satisfaction of the banks, they said: "We will not do this with the security you offer us, because someone has to provide as much as $12,000,000, possibly the whole of it within the next thirty days"—because although the province claim they were entitled to notice of withdrawals, I think the maximum was thirty days and perhaps in some cases the term was as low as ten days. So that $12,000,000 was the possible amount that the banks might have to supply, and the banks divided this among themselves rateably on the basis of their business in the city of Winnipeg, each assuming its proportion of responsibility to meet the demands of the depositors. They said: "We will do this only on one condition, namely that the Dominion government give its guarantee." The banks had $12,000,000 and more of province of Manitoba securities, bonds and treasury bills, and with the guarantee of the dominion, they assumed the responsibility of meeting on demand the cheques of any depositors in the savings offices of Manitoba. I will not further traverse that matter.

The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has referred to the order in council of October 27, 1931. That had no reference, of course, to this transaction. The chartered banks have to make a monthly return to the government. On September 21, or thereabouts, the Bank of England declined to make further gold payments, and England went off the gold standard. The result was an immediate fall in prices of securities on this side of the Atlantic. Our banks hold investments under the provisions of the Bank Act, and they consist not only of such securities as Brazilian, Canadian Pacific and other corporation bonds and stocks, which are a very small proportion of their holdings, as the monthly returns show, but principally of bonds of the dominion and the provinces, which are regarded as liquid assets upon which the banks may realize at almost a moment's notice and thus be in a position to meet the demands of their depositors. When the monthly return had to be made up we availed ourselves of the provisions of the statute which authorized us to pass orders in council for the peace, order and good government of Canada, because it was apparent that the securities had not changed in real value, but that the market value was something impossible to ascertain. In other words there was practically no market value at that moment of crisis. Under the circumstances what was done was not, as has been suggested, to fix a value beyond the real value, but to fix a date as of which the value should be determined, not arbitrarily by the banks, but as the market value appeared on the 31st day of August, the last day prior to the month in which the crisis came. That is all. And that is what was done in connection with insurance companies, for instance, by all the states of the American union, except one that came in later, forty-seven having arrived at a certain basis first and then the forty-eighth followed. It became necessary to do it also in connection with the banks of the United States, and if the members of this committee have followed the trend of recent events in that country they have seen that just what was done by us has been done now by the government of the United States. There has been no attempt to give assistance to the banks more than to other organizations that have a public responsibility. What was done was to enact this clause, that for the purpose of the return required under the Bank Act the chartered banks shall until this order is amended or rescinded, value the securities owned prior to the 31st of August, 1931, at not more than the book value or the current market prices thereof on the exchanges at the close of business on the 31st of August, 1931, whichever may be the less; and the securities acquired since the 31st of August at no more than the cost price thereof. So that with respect to all the securities held by the banks in regard to which they had to make returns in September, 1931, it was provided merely that the market value thereof on the last day of the month preceding that in which the crisis came should be the price or value for the purpose of the return. If that price were more than the cost or the book value of the securities, then the book value had to be used. That is, if there was any difference between the book value and the market price on the 31st of August, the lesser figure was the price on which the valuation should be fixed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This has not been renewed?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is no longer in force?

Mr. BENNETT: No. With respect to the other matter, that is the securities acquired by the banks after the 31st of August, 1931—and I think it is only fair to say that the banks were not very much interested in acquiring securities after that; they were interested in providing cash with which to meet any possible demands that might be made by their depositors—it is a matter of satisfaction to say that even though we are but ten millions of people and our riches are relatively not great, there never has been a moment when any cheque presented by a depositor, whether for a small or large amount, has not been honoured by our chartered banks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I am assuming always, of course, that the drawer of the cheque was in funds at the bank himself. I was not contemplating the possibility of not sufficient funds being the answer, but apparently that has happened to us all, so hon. gentlemen were in good company with their province with respect to similar conditions and circumstances. I was pointing out, Mr. Chairman, that this is a great distinction when we consider some other countries. One does not want to be boastful of the institutions of one's own country, but up to the moment they have weathered the storm very successfully by reason of what I have just said, namely a proper appreciation of the fact that you cannot invest the money of the depositors in unrealizable assets beyond a certain margin and remain solvent. That is all there is to it. This order in council provided for a temporary necessity that arose by reason of a complete demoralization of the world's markets, but there was no change in the real value of the securities that were held, they being, as I have said, the class of securities that banks purchase in order to take care of conditions which, in the wisdom of those who manage them, may at any time arise. It is common knowledge that difficulties have arisen in some of the great countries of the world. Corporations have drawn their cheques to meet their pay-rolls and limitations have been placed upon the amount that might be drawn; so much has been set as the maximum for each workman, and so much as the maximum for each executive. Even great insurance companies have had to apply limitations and restrictions as to the payment of cash surrender values and the making of loans on policies. This action was taken to prevent any possible disruption or disorganization of our banking system and to maintain the confidence of the depositors so that, with few exceptions, there were no large withdrawals from the banks, and the integrity of our institutions has been maintained.

Mr. POWER: I would not venture to embark on a discussion of banking with the right hon. Prime Minister, but now that we are on this matter perhaps it might be just as well to clear it up. I gathered from the remarks of the Prime Minister that this order in council did not apply to securities such as those I mentioned, Brazilian and Canadian Pacific, but referred only to high grade securities.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I did not say that.

Mr. POWER: I have some recollection of having read a bank statement, or bank statements, in which I saw a column containing a list of railway and other securities held. I would assume that some of the chartered banks of Canada must have stocked up pretty heavily with Canadian Pacific, let us say, which was one of the best known securities, and which was considered almost as solid as the Dominion of Canada. If that were the case, Canadian Pacific stock, which was one of the securities they were permitted to value as of its market value on August 31 or its book value, most assuredly would be valued in the October statement at more than its real value in the markets of the world on that date. I hope if I am making any mis-statements I will be corrected, because I do not want to exaggerate the situation in any way or to say anything that is not correct. I would assume that when Canadian Pacific fell to 12, let us say, as it did some time early in 1932, in the report made by the banks to the government it could have been valued at let us say 25. That was one of the points I was endeavouring to make. Whether or not the banks took advantage of this order in council I am unable to say, but it permitted them to make their reports for the months of September, October, November and December of 1931, and their annual report for that year, as well as their reports for the following months until March, 1932, showing the value of their securities on the basis set out in this order in council. The right hon. gentleman stated that a large proportion of the assets of Canadian chartered banks consisted of provincial and federal government bonds.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a large proportion. But I should not interrupt the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POWER: Then I will say that a considerable proportion, if my right hon. friend will agree to that, was invested in provincial and federal government securities because, we are told, these were liquid. I do not know that we ever had a better example of when they were not liquid than in the case we have been discussing. I suppose the same observation could be made with justice in respect to the banks in the United States which unfortunately have had to close. A large number of banks, under the state banking laws, were permitted to value their securities at other than the market value, but apparently that was not sufficient to save them from the liquidation which resulted, which forced a large number of banks in that country to close their doors.

I very much regret that I used the word "bank" with reference to the Manitoba savings office. I quite understand that there is some discussion as to whether or not provinces have the right to call these institutions banks, but I am not particularly concerned with that. This was an institution which held the savings of the people and, as such, it was entitled to whatever protection could be afforded. Whether or not it could be properly called a bank or an office is not material to the discussion; the fact that it was an office and not a bank should not be made an excuse for not extending to it all the assistance this government could give.

Mr. BENNETT: I will not trespass upon the time of the committee beyond saying that the form of return provided by the Bank Act, which is chapter 12 of the revised statutes of Canada, calls for the bank to make a return of its assets and liabilities. Under the heading of liabilities it must describe:

Liabilities

1. Notes in circulation.. .. ..$
2. Balance due to Dominion government after deducting advances for credits, pay-lists, etc.. .. .. ..
3. Advances under the Finance Act.
4. Balances due to provincial governments.. .. ..
5. Deposits by the public, payable on demand in Canada.. .. .. ..
6. Deposits by the public, payable after notice or on a fixed day, in Canada.. .. ..
7. Deposits elsewhere than in Canada.. .. ..
8. Loans from other banks in Canada, secured, including bills rediscounted.. .. ..
9. Deposits made by and balances due to other banks in Canada..
10. Due to banks and banking correspondents in the United Kingdom
11. Due to banks and banking correspondents elsewhere than in Canada and the United Kingdom
12. Bills payable.. .. ..
13. Letters of credit outstanding..
14. Liabilities not included under foregoing heads.. .. ..
15. Dividends declared and unpaid..
16. Rest or reserve fund.. .. .. ..
17. Capital paid up.. .. ..

Under these seventeen heads the liabilities of the banks have to be stated. Now we come to the question of assets, which are listed under twenty-eight headings:

1. Current gold and subsidiary coin.
2. Dominion notes.
3. Notes of other banks.
4. United States and other foreign currencies.
5. Cheques on other banks.
6. Loans to other banks in Canada, secured, including bills rediscounted.
7. Deposits made with and balances due from other banks in Canada.
8. Due from banks and banking correspondents in the United Kingdom.
9. Due from banks and banking correspondents elsewhere than in Canada and the United Kingdom.
10. Dominion government and provincial government securities.
11. Canadian municipal securities, and British foreign and colonial public securities other than Canadian.
12. Railway and other bonds, debentures and stocks.
13. Call and short (not exceeding thirty days) loans in Canada on stocks, debentures, bonds and other securities of a sufficient marketable value to cover.
14. Call and short (not exceeding thirty days) loans elsewhere than in Canada on stocks, debentures, bonds and other securities of a sufficient marketable value to cover.
15. Other current loans and discounts in Canada.
16. Other current loans and discounts elsewhere than in Canada after making full provision for bad and doubtful debts.
17. Loans to the government of Canada.
18. Loans to provincial governments.
19. Loans to cities, towns, municipalities and school districts.
20. Non-current loans, estimated loss provided for.
21. Real estate other than bank premises.
22. Mortgages on real estate sold by the bank.
23. Bank premises, at not more than cost, less amounts (if any) written off.
24. Liabilities of customers under letters of credit as per contra.
25. Deposit with the Minister of Finance for the security of note circulation.
26. Deposit in the central gold reserve.
27. Shares of and loans to controlled companies.
28. Other assets not included under the foregoing heads.

With my limited knowledge of the situation, I cannot recall at the moment any substantial holdings of Canadian Pacific or other stocks by any banks in Canada. So far as my knowledge goes, that is not the form of investment that the banks make, for reasons that are obvious.

I speak now subject entirely to correction, for I have not taken the trouble to charge my memory with the matter; but so far as I know at the moment, if I were a witness in a cause, called upon to depose as to what my knowledge might be of any bank holding any shares of the two companies which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, I could not say I know of any bank holding any of them at any time during this troublesome period, because it was not with that class of security that we were dealing. We were dealing with a situation that had arisen by reason of the complete demoralization of the credits and prices on the markets of the world—that is, not only on our side of the world but in the old countries as well—as a result of Great Britain going off the gold standard, and consequently shaking the entire credit structure of the world.

I quite agree that the effect of this order in council was, as I have said, to permit the banks to fix, as of the 31st day of August, the then existing value as reflected in the exchanges of the country as the market price of their securities for the purpose of filling in under the proper heading the list of their assets—because their liabilities were not matters that we dealt with.

Mr. MALCOLM: Had the order in council anything to do with the valuation of securities held as collateral by the bank, as security against loans to customers?

Mr. BENNETT: I think not, because that was not the phase of it with which we felt we had authority to deal. That was purely a banking transaction, between the bank and its customers, and to interfere with the bank's transaction of business would involve on the part of the country the examination of the various accounts of individuals, which we declined under any circumstances to do or to accept the responsibility for. And it was because of difficulties that arose by reason of the very circumstances to which the former Minister of Trade and Commerce has alluded that I for one did not feel, and I do not yet think, that it was desirable for the dominion to become responsible in the way of taking over the savings offices in Manitoba. To take them over and to become responsible for cash and to deal with customers was not the business of the country. What we did was to use the collective credit of the people of Canada to make certain that over 40,000 depositors in the province of Manitoba, having aggregate savings of $12,000,000, should not lose those savings or should not be delayed in receiving their money by reason of the fact that the money they had paid in had been invested in something that could not be realized upon. That is the short way of putting it. In other words, you could not realize on a mortgage on real estate for the purpose of meeting a cheque; and when you substituted, for the money you took, a mortgage and then exchanged the mortgage for a treasury bill with the promise to pay, and could not sell that, you were no better off, because your treasury was empty of cash in either event; and because it was empty of cash, the situation developed as I have indicated.

I think, without trespassing further on the time of the committee, that what we endeavoured to do we succeeded in doing, namely, preventing shall I say suspicion and distrust undermining the confidence of the Canadian people in their financial institutions, so that they might be tempted to withdraw their money and hoard it, as has been done in other countries of the world during the great depression through which we are passing. It is a matter of satisfaction and for that reason I felt especially pleased with what was said yesterday by the leader of the opposition regarding the condition of this country as compared with other countries, because, whatever else may be said, we had met the demands that were made by the depositors in our financial institutions for their money in accordance with the terms of their contract of deposit, without any hesitancy or any request for delay or for limitation of the amount they might receive in accordance with the balance outstanding to their credit.

Mr. HEENAN: I think the minister might give more information with respect to the question raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni as to what transpired at the dominion-provincial conference in regard to unemployment insurance. It is a very important question, especially when we are discussing unemployment relief measures, and it is one that has been the subject of debate in this house for several years. I can recall its being submitted to the industrial relationships committee on two occasions, after which the provinces were canvassed to see what view they took of the matter. I think the files of the department will show that at least four of the provinces agreed to participate in a conference looking to the establishment of an unemployment insurance scheme in Canada. Certainly the Prime Minister of Canada gave the workers of the country hope, on April 29, 1931, that there would be introduced in this house an unemployment insurance scheme. His words are to be found at page 1103 of Hansard of April 29, 1931. After stating what was first to be considered with regard to the number of those who would come under the scheme, and so forth, he said:

> I propose, if we are spared as a government and as individuals, that the information we will have before our term of office is ended shall be crystallized into the form of legislative proposals to be submitted to this house.

I recall the large headlines that were carried in the newspapers of the country, to the effect that the government intended to introduce an unemployment insurance scheme in the House of Commons, and I also recall many of the labour men expressing the hope that it would come into existence at an early date. I realize of course that it was necessary to discuss the matter with the provinces, and that conference was called and met here not very long ago. I know that unemployment insurance was on the agenda and I think the committee has a right to know what took place at that conference. We have a right to know whether any serious attempt was made to get the provinces and the dominion together for the purpose of formulating an insurance scheme and—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member is wandering far away from the resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: We cannot discuss insurance and what took place at a conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We can discuss any possible remedy for unemployment.

The CHAIRMAN: This is a resolution to cover a vote of $20,000,000 for unemployment relief, and in my humble opinion the hon. member is wandering far afield.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Peace, order and good government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A blank cheque.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Surely unemployment insurance should be considered as unemployment relief.

Mr. HEENAN: There seems to be a lot of talk about banking, insurance, land settlement and everything else, but when we discuss unemployment insurance, old age pensions or anything of a social character we are immediately called to order.

The CHAIRMAN: That is probably the hon. gentleman's own fault.

Mr. HEENAN: I would say it was rather the fault of those in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is now entirely out of order.

Mr. HEENAN: As far as I am concerned, if I am ruled out of order I am prepared to appeal against the ruling of the chair. I think the government and the Minister of Labour particularly owe it to this committee, and especially to those who have been directly interested in the establishment of an unemployment insurance scheme, to tell what took place at the dominion-provincial conference. We should know whether or not a serious attempt was made to establish an unemployment insurance scheme. If there were no obstacles in the way of this scheme, why have we not an unemployment insurance bill before us at the present time?

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution reads:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to continue in force the provisions of the Relief Act, 1932, until the 31st of March, 1934.

This discussion does not relate to the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Relief Act takes in everything.

The CHAIRMAN: It does not take in insurance.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Relief Act gives to the government a blank cheque and the power to do anything it pleases to relieve unemployment.

The CHAIRMAN: Surely the right hon. leader of the opposition will not say that insurance is relief.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would mean the paying out of less money for relief purposes, and therefore it comes within the four corners of this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: What the right hon. gentleman has just said justifies me in my ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This afternoon we were told of innumerable purposes to which this money might be devoted. It is a blank cheque; the governor in council has unlimited authority to enact any measure to help to relieve any future situation. As a matter of fact the government, if it so desired, could establish an unemployment insurance scheme under this very legislation.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not covered by the Relief Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Peace, order and good government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is an amendment and an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HEENAN: The dominion-provincial conference was called for the purpose of considering unemployment relief measures and unemployment insurance was to be discussed at that conference. We are entitled to know what decision was come to with respect to unemployment relief. The Prime Minister aroused the hopes of the workers on April 29 when he said that this matter would be crystallized into legislation before the end of the life of this government.

While the minister is thinking about giving us an answer I should like to deal with the back to the land movement. This is not the first effort that has been made to get people back to the land, even in Ontario. I hope the minister has better luck with his scheme than Hon. Howard Ferguson had with the one he attempted when he was Minister of Lands and Forests of Ontario. A colony was established in 1917 east of the Kapuskasing river and a sincere effort was made to place people back on the land. The Ontario government gave a great deal of consideration to this matter but the scheme which was started in 1917 had to be abandoned in 1920. Mr. Ferguson was very careful in selecting a site on the Kapuskasing river and the soil on the site selected was considered to be of the best quality. The beauty of the landscape was even taken into consideration, and the Dominion government finally leased some land on the other side of the river.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 22, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION NOTES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 54, to amend the Dominion Notes Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for an amendment to subsection 3 of section 4 of chapter 41 of the revised statutes, the Dominion Notes Act, and provides that the provisions of that subsection can be suspended from time to time by order in council. It may be termed, in a sense, a companion bill, and one which necessarily follows the Gold Export Act which we passed last year.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CARLETON POINT, QUE., LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has Edward Martin been appointed permanently as keeper of the light house at Carleton Point, county of Bonaventure, Quebec?

2. If so, when was the appointment made?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Henri Joseph Martin was permanently appointed lightkeeper at Carleton, Quebec, by Civil Service Commission certificate dated May 27, 1932. It is understood this is the same person as Edward Martin, his name in full being Henri Joseph Edouard Martin.

2. Answered by No. 1.

JOE MERRYFIELD

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Is one Joe Merryfield in the employ of the federal government?

2. If so, what are his duties?

3. Do his duties necessitate his visiting the province of British Columbia?

Mr. STEVENS:

1, 2 and 3. Mr. J. E. Merryfield has been in the employ of the government as census commissioner (census of trading establishments), in which capacity he has been engaged recently in western Canada, including British Columbia, his employment terminating on March 31, 1933.

MAIL AND STEAMSHIP SUBVENTIONS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. What was the total amount of mail and steamship subventions given on the Pacific ocean for the last three years?

2. How much of the aforesaid subsidy goes to Canadian ships?

3. How many Canadian owned ships are in receipt of a subsidy?

4. How many British or other owned vessels are chartered on the Canadian Pacific coast, and in receipt of a subsidy?

5. Are any of the companies receiving subsidies employing Oriental crews?

4. There are under charter at the present time 3 ships.

5. In some cases stewards, deck hands, etc., employed in ships sailing to Chinese ports are orientals, under British or Canadian officers.

*BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Has the government taken any steps to secure repayment of the sum of $125,000 made by the Beauharnois Corporation Limited to John Aird, junior?

2. Has the government taken any steps to secure repayment of the sum of $150,000 said to have been paid by Mr. R. O. Sweezey out of the funds of the Beauharnois Corporation Limited to the National Press of Winnipeg?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to the question is, No, because the government had no jurisdiction in the premises.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RACE TRACK EMPLOYEES

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. At the present time, in a general way and in so far as the government has information, are Canadian citizens debarred from employment on race tracks in the United States?

2. Have citizens of the United States recently made application to the Department of Immigration for permits to enter Canada for the purpose of employment on Canadian race tracks during the coming racing season?

3. If so (a) who are the persons who have made such an application; (b) what are the reasons alleged in support of their application; (c) was their application recommended to the Department of Immigration in each case; if so, by whom; (d) what kind of work have these persons stated they intend to perform on Canadian race courses?

4. Have citizens of the United States been employed on Canadian race tracks during the last racing season under permits granted by the Department of Immigration?

5. If so (a) who are the persons to whom such permits have been granted; (b) what work has been performed by said persons on Canadian race tracks; (c) have the said persons paid income tax to the Canadian exchequer on the revenue they have earned by working on Canadian race tracks; (d) what reasons have motivated the granting of permits to such persons; (e) who recommended to the Minister or to the Department of Immigration the granting of permits to such persons, if any?

NATIONAL RESEARCH INSTITUTE

Mr. McGIBBON:

1. What was the cost of the site of the National Research Institute?

2. What was the cost of the erection of the National Research Institute?

3. What was the cost of the equipment of the National Research Institute preparatory to its inauguration in 1932?

5. What was the cost of transportation of Dr. Tory's household effects (and a motor) from Edmonton to Ottawa in 1928-29?

6. What was the total expenditure for assisted researches for 1926-33?

7. What was the total expenditure for salaried assistants in the assisted researches from 1926 to 1933?

8. What was the total amount of the travelling expenses incurred by members of the National Research Council in attending meetings of the council for each year (specified) from 1926 to 1933?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ADAMSVILLE, KENT COUNTY, N.B., POSTMASTER

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, petitions or other documents in connection with the appointment of the postmaster at Adamsville, Kent county.

SOUTH OXFORD ELECTION COMPLAINTS

Mr. ARTHURS (for Mr. Anderson, Halton):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, or other documents, exchanged between any person or persons and the chief electoral officer of Canada, relating to, or in any way having a bearing on complaints received by the chief electoral officer regarding the returning officer for the constituency of Oxford South during and immediately following the Dominion election held on July 28, 1930.

MR. SIDNEY J. WEBSTER

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

For a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of the Interior or any departmental official, and Mr. Sidney J. Webster, of Golden, British Columbia, regarding lot 10550, G.I. Kootenay district, on the east shore of Kinbasket lake, on Big Bend road.

BILINGUAL STAMPS

Mr. LAVERGNE:

For a copy of all documents, requests, petitions and correspondence, respecting bilingual stamps or currency addressed to the federal government or the House of Commons by citizens of Canada, in 1906 and 1907.

Mr. BENNETT: I trust the hon. member will not press this motion. It goes back twenty-seven years, and necessitates a very great difficulty in ascertaining whether or not there are any papers. Because, after ten years many of them are destroyed, and it will take a very long time to ascertain whether they are existent or not.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I do not wish to press the motion, but my recollection is that in 1907 I presented a petition in favour of bilingual currency, having the signatures of 1,700,000 Canadians.

Mr. BENNETT: I forgot to mention that some of the petitions presented to the house were in the archives of the old building and were destroyed by the fire. We are not in a position to say whether this petition was among them or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

VALUATION FOR DUTY

Mr. YOUNG:

For a copy of all orders in council issued since August 20, 1932, pertaining to valuations for duty on goods entering Canada from Great Britain or any other country; also a copy of all instructions, including confidential letters to customs officers affecting the valuations for duty or classification for duty purposes, issued by the Department of National Revenue since August 20, 1932.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Before this motion carries I think it should be brought to the attention of the house, as I am sure my hon. friend well knows, that it has not been the practice of this government or its predecessor to bring down confidential information. The Department of National Revenue cannot display even to the House of Commons the transactions which take place with private individuals. This notice of motion also asks for confidential letters passing between officers of the department. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the motion should be redrafted. I am sorry to put my hon. friend to any trouble, but if we are not asked for confidential information of the kind I have mentioned I shall be glad to give my hon. friend such information as I can.

Mr. YOUNG: It is not the intention of the question to seek information on confidential matters relating to the private affairs of any company. What the question asks for is confidential letters sent to customs collectors affecting valuations. When these confidential letters are sent out to the officers and are acted on and because of the instructions given in these letters valuations for duty are made, then public action has been taken and it is no longer confidential.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They become public matters.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member consider amending the motion?

Mr. YOUNG: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Or does he press it as it is?

Mr. YOUNG: As it is.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Young) which was negatived on the following division.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Now that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has brought down his budget I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to indicate to the house whether we now have before us all the legislation that will be introduced this session with the exception of what may arise out of the resolutions now before the committee of ways and means and anything that may come from other committees of the house. I should like to ask also whether the government intends to proceed at this session with the redistribution measure and if there is any possible way in which that measure might be expedited.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The shipping bill now in the other chamber will be proceeded with and the pensions bill will be brought down. The redistribution bill will be proceeded with, and I think every reasonable effort is being made to expedite the work of that committee, at least that is my advice in that regard. Amendments to some existing statutes probably will have to be brought down, affecting possibly the Post Office Act, the Public Works Act, the Judges Act and the criminal code. Owing to the great difference of opinion that has been expressed by different public bodies with respect to the proposed legislation arising out of the Gibb report I am not in a position at the moment to say whether or not that bill will be proceeded with. It has been printed, but a great many public bodies in the cities affected have been directing communications to the government suggesting that the matter be delayed until they can further consider it. At the moment I cannot say whether or not we will proceed with that measure at this session. I think two or three other statutes, the names of which I do not recall at the moment, will have to be amended as well. I will endeavour to indicate clearly on Monday, so far as one may do so with certainty, the legislation that will be proceeded with.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): As a matter of privilege I should like to state that during the course of some observations I made last week I stated in good faith that the Temiscouata Railway was held or controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the Quebec Central. I am informed by a telegram which I have just received from the president of the Temiscouata Railway that this is not the case, so I wish to correct any wrong impression I may have given.

PRIVILEGE MR. McINTOSH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. At page 2000 of House of Commons Debates, there appears the following statement:

> Mr. McIntosh: Is it not a fact that a lot of dead horse railways in eastern Canada have been taken over as part of the Canadian National?

I wish emphatically to deny that I uttered any letter, syllable, word, phrase or clause making up this statement; in fact I repudiate the statement and the sectional sentiment giving rise to it. Because of this attitude I ask that it be dissociated with my name in Hansard and accredited to the dead horse member, whoever he may be, who gave expression to such a deplorable spirit of small Canadianism.

UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, pamphlets have been issued entitled "Unemployment Among Wage Earners" giving the statistics for one or two of our large cities. I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) whether this information is available with regard to the country at large.

Mr. STEVENS: I will take it as a notice of a question and look into the matter.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUATION FOR ONE YEAR OF PROVISIONS OF RELIEF ACT, 1932

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 21, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Ross in the chair:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to continue in force the provisions of the Relief Act, 1932, until the 31st of March, 1934.

Mr. HEENAN: When the house rose last evening I was saying to the Minister of Labour that I hoped his back to the land movement would be more successful than previous schemes had been. This is not the first time that an attempt has been made in this country to establish a back to the land movement, at least in Ontario. I can remember that the Hon. Mr. Ferguson, as Minister of Lands and Forests in 1917, established what was known as a colony on the east side of the river Kapuskasing. I am not sure whether the minister was in that part of the country at that time, but I may tell him that Mr. Ferguson believed he had started a well laid out scheme. As I say, he began it in 1917 but it was abandoned in 1920.

Let us examine what was done in connection with that scheme. I want to impress upon the minister that too much care cannot be taken in trying to establish people on the land. Mr. Ferguson and his organization selected the east side of Kapuskasing river, and the land there was supposed to be one of the best pieces of soil for farming purposes. Moreover, the beauty of the landscape, the fact that a dominion experimental farm was about to be established on the other side of the river, and other favourable circumstances were all taken into consideration as well as the method followed to have the applicants properly selected for settlement on the land. A committee was appointed to pass upon the suitability of applicants; indeed, proper instructions were given to the applicants before they were allowed to go on the land. They were granted eighty acres of land which subsequently was increased to one hundred acres; each applicant was allowed $150 to go towards the erection of a house; and they were each loaned $500. At the outset of their training they were given certain allowances; $1.10 a day for unmarried men, and for married men, $5 for the wife and $6 for each child per month, not to exceed in the aggregate $50 for each family per month. This was later discontinued and there was a great deal of dissatisfaction in the colony.

I would point out to the minister that this well laid out scheme, after all these precautions were taken, ended in failure. The government appointed a commission in 1920 under the chairmanship of Mr. W. F. Nickle, who was later a member of this house and later still Attorney General of Ontario, and they recommended that the scheme be abandoned. So far as I can make out, it cost the province of Ontario something like $2,000,000 for the experiment. I hope that the minister's back to the land movement will prove more successful than that scheme. Now that the minister and the government are interesting themselves in the back to the land movement, especially so far as Ontario is concerned, it seems to me that they might do something to improve the living conditions of those now on the land in northern Ontario so as to keep them there, instead of having them leave the farms as at present.

[Mr. Heenan.]

There are many methods that could be adopted. I will suggest one to the minister. If he is now advocating a back to the land movement in cooperation with Ontario, he ought to take this opportunity of impressing upon the Ontario government the importance of making provision, either by way of regulations or law or in some other way, to compel or at least to require the pulp and paper companies in the north to purchase their pulpwood from the settlers, and at a fair price. That is one suggestion I have to offer and I hope that the minister, when he is discussing the matter with the Ontario government—I suppose the same thing will apply to Quebec—will see to it that the settlers now on the land get a better opportunity of making a living in order to keep them on the land.

May I ask the minister now whether he will give us the information we were trying to get last evening as to whether or not in this relief measure it is intended to establish an unemployment insurance scheme, because that is a method whereby, if we cannot cure, at least we can relieve unemployment. I do not want to repeat what I have said before, but I think the minister ought to tell us whether or not he intends to take any of the moneys which are to be voted for the purposes of this measure and apply something towards the establishing of an unemployment insurance scheme. Further, I think the minister ought to inform the committee whether or not at the late dominion-provincial conference such a scheme was discussed; whether or not this government had a plan prepared and laid before the conference; and whether or not any of the provincial governments had plans of their own to propose at the conference. I would like the minister to give us that information before we discuss the other angles of this resolution.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) has spent some time in commenting upon the colonization effort made in and about the Kapuskasing river valley in 1919. I happen to know a good deal about that effort. It was started as a relief measure in the hope that some returned soldiers could be settled in that area. As anyone who cares to visit that part of the country will see, the location was ideal. Some criticism might be made of the choice of settlers upon the ground that in many cases they had no previous farming experience. If there was any weakness in the scheme, it was in the method of selection. I followed closely the effort which was made. Even before the project was started it was faced with considerable political opposition from the political party then known as the United Farmers of Ontario. This opposition took place prior to the provincial elections of 1919. Whether the scheme was good or whether it was bad, it was opposed from the beginning. The effort got into politics and any effort of that character which gets into politics and is footballed around has very little hope of ultimate success. The government of the province of Ontario changed in 1919, and following true to political history, the new government under Premier E. C. Drury, which had previously criticized this scheme decided to discontinue the effort. Except with the one reservation in connection with selection to which I have referred, the whole scheme had a sound basis. Anyone who cares to visit the Kapuskasing river valley will find that it is settled with men who at least are doing as well as other farmers in this country. I suggest to the hon. member that the effort to open up that section of northern Ontario was not the failure which his remarks would seem to indicate.

The matter of unemployment insurance has been brought to the attention of the government of Canada on many occasions throughout a period of many years. The files of the Department of Labour indicate that resolutions have been coming into the department dating back as far as 1923.

Mr. HEAPS: Were those resolutions from outside bodies?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. I have before me some sixteen pages of typewriting containing names of labour and other organizations from which resolutions were received. The government of the day undoubtedly recognized that the subject was a most difficult one and that it was rendered still more difficult in Canada by reason of the constitutional setup of this country. The files contain a letter written by the then Minister of Labour to H. Little, secretary treasurer of the United Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees, acknowledging a resolution which had been received from that organization. That letter was dated February 22, 1924, and reads:

This particular question is, as you know, a matter that has been before us on several occasions for consideraton. The main point involved would appear to be as to whether, with the enormous tax burdens that have come to the people of Canada as the result of the war, additional financial obligations could be assumed.

A circular letter was finally adopted as an answer to the many resolutions being received.

Mr. NEILL: What is the date of that?

Mr. GORDON: A letter was drafted and in many cases the other answers follow the same language. The one I shall read is addressed to H. C. Needell, 145 Brunswick avenue, Toronto, by the then Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) and is dated February 10, 1930. It reads:

Your letter of January 4 addressed to the Prime Minister, in which you have written on the subject of unemployment conditions and the desirability of the public authorities establishing a system of unemployment insurance, has been referred to the undersigned.

The standing committee of the House of Commons on industrial and international relations has been giving consideration during the past two sessions of parliament to the question of insurance against unemployment. A number of witnesses have been examined with the object of ascertaining the facts as to unemployment existing in this country and also as to systems of unemployment insurance which have been established elsewhere. The report of this committee last session, which was adopted by the House of Commons, accepted and endorsed the principle of unemployment insurance based on compulsory contributions derived from the state, employer and employee. The committee report went on to observe that while it is highly desirable that such legislation should be uniform in all the provinces and that while social insurance has a federal aspect, nevertheless, according to the Department of Justice, under our constitution, legislative jurisdiction in relation to a compulsory system of unemployment insurance is vested exclusively in the provincial legislatures.

The committee further noted that the provinces, on being consulted by the federal Department of Labour with regard to their attitude towards the establishment of a general scheme of unemployment insurance, did not appear to be prepared to take immediate action. It was recommended that the federal government be requested to bring this subject matter before the next dominion-provincial conference.

Copies of the last report of the proceedings of the above-mentioned committee have been sent to the different provincial governments this fall and replies are now being received which will doubtless come before the committee on industrial and international relations at the coming session.

If you are particularly interested in the reports of the committee proceedings I will be pleased to have copies of the same sent to you.

That was the answer sent to all those petitioners.

On February 3, 1930, a conference was convened by the present hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. Perhaps, before I proceed with that, I might read to the committee a letter sent by the Deputy Minister of Labour on April 14, 1930, to many of the petitioners and directed to the attention of the then Prime Minister and in turn to that of the Minister of Labour:

In the absence of the Minister of Labour from Ottawa, I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 10th instant in which you inquire as to a declaration of the Prime Minister on February 26, in favour of the establishment of a system of unemployment insurance. In reply I would state that on February 26 the Minister of Labour received a deputation of representatives of certain municipalities in Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and of the provincial governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, on the subject of unemployment. On the following day the Prime Minister was asked in the House of Commons if the Dominion government was willing to take the initiative in calling a special conference of the provinces to consider the question of unemployment insurance. In reply to this question the Prime Minister spoke as follows:

"My recollection is that a special committee of this house considered this question last session and brought to the house a report to the effect that unemployment insurance was necessarily a matter with which provincial governments rather than the federal government would have to deal. I think I expressed the view yesterday that in my opinion a system of unemployment insurance would be a constructive way to deal with the unemployment problem, to which system not only the employer and the governments concerned would contribute but the worker also. If the provinces make a move in this matter and it appears that the federal government can be of assistance in helping to bring about uniformity as between the provinces of any plan proposed, or can cooperate in other ways in any discussion on the subject, we shall be glad upon invitation to take the matter under consideration."

Yours truly,

Deputy Minister of Labour.

As to the conference referred to in that letter, I find a report on the files of the Department of Labour. Before I deal with the report, I should like to make this observation, that a review of the files of the Department of Labour discloses the fact that for a number of years, back as far as 1923, this subject has been before that department. As I have already indicated, the subject is one of great complexity and difficulty; it is also a subject that, if embarked upon by any government, should be taken up and the structure established in such a way that failure will not follow the effort, because we have already in the world too many instances where ill-advised legislation setting up machinery for unemployment or social insurance was not based upon a firm and sound foundation, this apart entirely from the difficulty with which Canada is confined by reason of our constitution. To all the advances or petitions that were made to the late government the same answer—and I am not particularly complaining about this—was made by succeeding ministers of labour and by the then prime minister, in substance that the matter was one to which the provinces would have to subscribe—and that is very true—and that the government would give consideration to the subject.

As I say, a conference was held, and on the files of the Department of Labour I find a report of it. I can assure the committee that the report is very illuminating. The conference was held at Ottawa on February 3, 1930, and the report states:

This morning the Minister of Labour, Hon. Peter Heenan, in company with Hon. Dr. J. H. King, Minister of Pensions and National Health, and Hon. J. C. Elliott, Minister of Public Works, met a delegation from several municipalities in the province of Ontario, at which time a request was made that the federal government should cooperate with the municipalities in connection with unemployment relief—

The committee will note that this conference dealt, according to this report, only with unemployment relief.

—by assuming one-third of the expenditure in excess of normal cost where municipalities undertake special work for the purpose of providing employment.

The delegation was introduced by Senator Spence, who stated that fourteen municipalities were represented, and called upon His Worship Mayor Wemp of Toronto, who had been chosen by the gathering to be their spokesman.

Mayor Wemp, who opened the discussion, stated that it was not the intention of the gathering to criticize the administration but that they felt it was only proper they should present the problem, which he indicated was very acute, to the government in the hope that the government would see its way clear to adopt the policy of some former years and assist the municipalities in bearing a share of the expenditure in excess of the normal cost.

Mayor Wemp, in turn, introduced the following, all of whom reechoed his views:

Mayor Beckett, of Brantford; Doctor Bell, Hamilton; Mayor Kilpatrick, London; Frank Mitchell, the Border Cities (Windsor); Reeve Leslie, Township of East York; Reeve Dean, Township of York; Alderman Hughes, Welland; John Linden, Scarborough; a gentleman representing Reeve Marshall of Etobicoke Council, the same also representing New Toronto; also Controllers Somerville, Simpson, Pearce and Robins of Toronto.

At the conclusion of the presentation remarks were made by the Hon. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour, Hon. Dr. King and Hon. Mr. Elliott. The undersigned was present during the proceedings, also Deputy Minister of Immigration, Mr. Egan. In addition the following other officers of the Department of Labour were present, Colonel Schnarr, Mr. Rigg and Mr. Phelan.

H. H. Ward,
Deputy Minister.

That is the sum and substance of the effort so far as I have been able to learn—there may have been something else—from the files of the department as to getting the provinces together with the dominion authorities in order that out of the conflict of jurisdiction the problem might be gotten into shape where legislation might be introduced to advance some plan with respect to unemployment or social insurance.

I can only make this remark in passing, that the same difficulty which confronted the late government, confronts the present one. We have the added difficulty that industry in Canada to-day, in common with that of other countries, is passing through a most perilous time. I ask any hon. member of this committee, who gives careful thought to the subject, whether or not the difficulties which confronted the late administration in connection with problems such as the one we are now discussing, are not increased ten-fold at the present time. I am convinced that by hurrying through legislation which has not been considered from every possible angle we may defeat the object to be attained. That is, if such a plan is found to be workable, having regard to the complexities of the problem, then it should be initiated and founded on a sure and actuarially sound basis, and should be subscribed to by every province of Canada and by the industries affected.

It is also abundantly true, at least it is so proclaimed by hon. members who were in the house when the late government was in power, that if there was a time more than any other when the world was apparently prosperous it was during part of the period of office of hon. members opposite. Yet, a review of the files of the Department of Labour which were compiled when the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was Minister of Labour does not disclose anything but the expressions "Serious consideration will be given" or "The industrial and international relations committee have it under review." Nothing else was done. I suggest, and I think not unfairly, that as the late administration were in power at a time when people thought the world was passing through a period of prosperity, if they were unable during all those years to make any substantial advance towards procuring the object now so dear to the heart of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, then, I say it does not come with the best of grace at a time like this for the hon. member to offer condemnation of what this government is endeavouring to do by way of at least having the provinces come in with the dominion—and that means the overcoming of many difficulties—in order to bring about a plan of social or unemployment insurance which, once started, will be permanent and successful. At the moment that is as far as I care to go. I trust the accusation will not be made that my remarks have been made from a political standpoint, because I feel certain the great majority of members in the committee are thoroughly conversant with the difficulties and pitfalls ahead of any government which seeks to set up a scheme of social or unemployment insurance calculated to operate on a permanent basis, and to work in the interests of those affected by it, and in the interests of the country as a whole.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, the minister has succeeded very well in evading answering the question I asked. If he will look at my remarks of last evening or read what I said this afternoon he must be convinced that I am not criticizing the government for not making greater haste with respect to the establishment of an unemployment insurance scheme. There was no necessity for the heat just now displayed by the minister. What I asked him, and what we have a right to know is: What progress is he making? Was the matter discussed at the recent dominion-provincial conference? Did the government lay a plan before the conference, or had any of the provinces a plan to lay before the federal government? That is the question I have asked. I am not criticizing him. But apparently in his efforts to make political capital, notwithstanding the fact that he has said he does not wish to do so—has misrepresented the evidence on his own files—or at least, the evidence of the files he ought to have before him.

I did not raise the question of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the dominion. I realize as well as the minister that we have obstacles to meet in that connection. If the files were produced they would show that the late government, after the establishment of the Old Age Pensions Act, started in step by step to bring the provinces together. I notice that the minister very carefully evaded reading the files which would disclose that fact. In 1928 the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) moved a resolution asking that the matter be considered. If the government of the day had desired I believe we could have evaded the matter by attempting to have the Speaker rule the resolution out of order, on the ground that it was a provincial matter. However we chose to accept the resolution. It was submitted to the industrial relations committee, and they in turn made certain recommendations. Again in 1929—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member cannot discuss the Old Age Pensions Act on this resolution.

Mr. HEENAN: I am not discussing it.

The CHAIRMAN: It looks like it, to me. The hon. member is referring to a resolution about the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. HEENAN: I am answering the Minister of Labour.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member certainly cannot discuss the Old Age Pensions Act under this resolution.

Mr. HEENAN: I am not doing that; I shall not refer to it again. In 1929 the matter was again submitted for further consideration to the industrial relations committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: I am speaking about unemployment insurance.

The CHAIRMAN: Very well, go ahead.

Mr. HEENAN: The recommendations of the committee, while I have not them before me, were to the effect that at the next dominion-provincial conference the government would lay before the provinces the matter of the establishment of an unemployment insurance scheme for Canada. The government of that day did not wait until the next dominion-provincial conference. If the minister will refer to his complete files he will find that we canvassed the provinces; he will find on that file that many of the provinces acquiesced, and agreed to the unemployment insurance scheme for Canada. One of the reasons we did not go into it more thoroughly was that we were right in the face of an election. We did not wish to draw that question into politics. What would have been said, if we had called a dominion-provincial conference in the face of an election? We would quite probably have been accused of making a political football out of the unemployment insurance scheme. But we did promise, and had in the estimates for 1930 a provision for sufficient money, to hold a dominion-provincial conference, had we been returned to power.

That is the history of the matter, and I am satisfied if the late government had been returned to power we would have an unemployment insurance scheme in operation in Canada to-day. I do not wish the minister to evade my question; I am not criticizing him because he has not introduced an unemployment insurance scheme. But certainly the words of the Prime Minister as expressed on April 29, 1931, gave hope to the workers of Canada that an unemployment insurance scheme would soon be introduced. His words were:

> I propose, if we are spared as a government and as individuals, that the information we will have before our term of office is ended shall be crystallized into the form of legislative proposals to be submitted to this house.

The headlines of the newspapers instilled into the hearts of the workers hopes that the government was going to introduce such a proposal. Without criticizing either the minister or the government, all I am asking now is, what did they do at the last dominion-provincial conference to further this scheme? Was the matter discussed? Did they have a plan to lay before the provinces, or did the provinces have any plan to lay before the Dominion government? In other words I want to know, and I think I am entitled and the house is entitled to know, whether any serious effort was made to establish an unemployment insurance scheme for this country.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan). In order to fortify myself against your possible displeasure, Mr. Chairman, I would like briefly to outline the position at the present moment. We are discussing a proposal to vote a very large sum of money, in some respects an unlimited sum, for the relief of unemployment. A conference was held last fall between the dominion and the provinces. The main purpose of that conference was the consideration of steps to be taken to deal with the needs of those unemployed. There were four major methods suggested and discussed; one was the provision of public works to make employment; another the provision of direct relief; a third was the land settlement scheme; and the fourth was the suggestion of dealing with it by means of unemployment insurance. These various plans were put forward and discussed, some as alternatives, some as palliatives, some as substitutes. Now we are told—at least I have heard it suggested from the chair both last night and to-day—that we can discuss, as we have discussed for three or four days, three of those plans, but must not discuss the fourth. I would like to know why not. We know that the provision of public works has more or less failed and been abandoned—

Mr. GORDON: It did not fail; that was not the reason for its abandonment.

Mr. NEILL: Well, abandoned because it was found impossible.

Mr. GORDON: Because it was too costly.

Mr. NEILL: It does not matter whether because it was too costly or for some other reason; at any rate it was found undesirable, we will say, and was largely abandoned. The direct relief system, while it is the one largely used to-day, has very grave disadvantages, the debasing effects of giving people the dole and so on. The land settlement system is a mere fleabite, when we recall that the minister told us yesterday that in British Columbia less than one hundred families have been put on the land, while the records show over 120,000 getting relief there. So the first has ceased to operate, the second has grave disadvantages, the third is merely piffle. It is possible that the solution is to be found in the fourth, and that is why we think it desirable that we should be furnished with as much information as possible when we are discussing this very important question of dealing with the unemployment situation.

I note that the minister gave a report of sorts about a conference that took place on the third of February, 1930. It was a poor sort of conference, because it was attended only by representatives of a few municipalities in Ontario. It is not to be compared with the recent dominion-wide conference. Apparently the minister did get from his records—it must have been provided and presumably went to parliament—a report of that conference, and that is what we are asking for to-day, a report of the Dominion-Provincial Conference.

Mr. GORDON: That report never left the files of the Labour department.

Mr. NEILL: Well he gave it to the house to-day, and that is what I am asking for as to the conference last January. We want to know what took place at that conference. Surely when people have paid their money—for we all contributed to the expense of those delegates—we are entitled to know, at some time at least, what took place, what obstacles were met with, what progress was made. The minister took refuge in the well worn retort, et tu Brute; he said the late government did not do any more than he was doing, and he referred to 1923. But in 1923 we were not voting $46,000,000 for unemployment relief. The problem has become immensely graver since then. What might be a good argument ten years ago is entirely unsuitable to-day, in view of the present conditions. The minister said it would be improper—and I quite agree—to introduce a measure of that character without considering every angle, and pointed out that industry is in a deplorable condition now and less able to bear any burden than it was at that time. But there is a difference between considering a subject in all its angles and ignoring it in all its angles. The government may be considering—we do not know, and we want to know what has been done. We are asking that information. In default of that information we have to rely on such political gossip as we can pick up from members who were at the conference and who talked when they went home, which is not a desirable way to get information. What took place at that conference? Did some provinces prove belligerent and say: We will not do anything; we will not chip in with the dominion; we will not subordinate our constitutional rights? Did they take that attitude? If so we might hesitate about giving them the millions for relief in the future that they have had in the past. These are the things we want to know. Did eight out of nine agree, or was a reasonable proposal put before them and were they asked to say: Will you subordinate your constitutional rights and allow the dominion to carry out such a scheme? Or was no scheme put before them? In that case of course we could hardly blame the provinces for hesitating to give up their rights. These are all things we want to know. We are not attacking the government, because these things are only guesses, but we want to get outside the sphere of guesses; we want to know what the situation is. I cannot understand the reluctance of the minister and the government to give that information. Possibly the facts will redound more or less to the credit of the Dominion government; then why not tell us, take us into their confidence, let us know where we stand and what has been done and what we can look forward to in the future? I do not think the country will be satisfied with anything less, and I think this house is entitled to that information.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot see how that discussion can be relevant to this resolution. I think it is absolutely out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, you permitted the minister to go very fully into this whole question.

The CHAIRMAN: Well, I seem to be alone in my opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think you are.

The CHAIRMAN: But I still maintain it.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): It is useless to butt against everybody.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, I have taken a good deal of interest in this question ever since I had the honour of becoming a member of this house. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) this afternoon gave a resume of some resolutions submitted to the Department of Labour over a period of ten years. I would like to give a resumé of what action this house has taken in regard to this question of unemployment insurance.

Early in 1926 a communication was sent to the then leader of the opposition as well as to the hon. gentleman who led the government at the time. It dealt with the question of unemployment insurance as well as old age pensions, and requested their views on those very important subjects, dealing, that is, with the temporary question of providing for the unemployed at the time and also the question of unemployment insurance. Some action was taken by the government in providing relief for the unemployed for the winter of 1926-27, and when the session of 1927 came around a motion was introduced by myself asking that the matter of unemployment insurance be referred to a committee, I think of the house. But it did not pass in that session. A similar resolution was adopted in 1928 and referred to the committee on industrial and international relations, where the question was gone into very thoroughly. During that session, however, we did not have sufficient time to bring in a complete report, which later was done, approving in a general way of the principle of unemployment insurance but pointing out the constitutional difficulties standing in the way. In 1929 I do not think much action was taken, though I believe the question was raised, and in 1930 we were in much the same position. Then came the election of 1930, and unemployment insurance was discussed from many platforms in all parts of the country. The principle was accepted by both major parties; both agreed on the principle of unemployment insurance and both were prepared to do something if they were returned to office. In the early part of the session of 1931 I again raised the question, and the right hon. Prime Minister gave a definite understanding that within the lifetime of the present parliament legislation would be introduced looking towards the establishment of a system of unemployment insurance.

It is quite true, as the Minister of Labour has said, that a great many things have taken place since that time, and conditions have become greatly aggravated. I am very anxious indeed, even at this late date, to see a start made on some form of unemployment insurance, but it is a question whether legislation of that kind would even begin to remedy our troubles. The Minister of Labour has said that approximately a million and a third men, women and children, are on relief in Canada to-day, and when I say that there are at least eight hundred thousand people out of work the committee will have some idea of the problem we are facing. If we are to hold out any hope for those men and women out of work I feel that at least they should know the actual conditions. If we should have a scheme of unemployment insurance inaugurated at this time, I think even an optimist of the highest order would have to admit that it could affect only an extremely small proportion of those who find themselves out of work at present. I believe we have out of work roughly one-third of those usually gainfully employed, and from a financial standpoint, under the existing economic system I think it would be almost impossible to provide in anything like a reasonable way for those people. So if we are to deal with the unemployment problem in such a way as to provide reasonable relief I think we should attack the problem in a more fundamental way than merely by considering the question of unemployment insurance.

I should not like to be misunderstood, Mr. Chairman. I am heartily in favour of unemployment insurance even at this time, but at the same time I think we should look at the problem in a far more practical way than merely the consideration of this one method of dealing with it. I think we should realize that of the hundreds of thousands of people unemployed to-day a great percentage never will be reabsorbed into industry. That being so the question becomes far more important than the provision of a scheme of unemployment insurance. The man or woman out of work cannot possibly contribute to any insurance scheme, and those who are employed only on part time scarcely could be expected to do so. With the federal and provincial exchequers in a depleted condition and with the condition of industry generally it would be almost impossible to provide the vast sums that would be necessary to bring into operation any scheme of unemployment insurance that would be actually sound, so we must look in another direction for ways and means of providing work for those of our people who are unemployed to-day. In my opinion there is only one thing to do, and that is to provide work. I am bitterly opposed to the dole; I detest the very thought that in this country we have a million and a third of our people receiving public relief, and even that does not tell the whole story. In addition to this vast number there are many others who are receiving private relief, and I venture to assert that if all those in receipt of relief from other than public sources were added to the total I have mentioned we would have about a million and a half people receiving relief to-day. In other words, at least one out of every seven of our population is in receipt of some form of relief.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, the logical thing to do is to provide employment. Public works have been ruled out of the picture because they are too expensive. I quite agree, because the amount of work provided by the expenditure of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 by the federal government would only touch the fringe of the unemployment situation. During the past few years our army of unemployed has been growing greater and greater, and in spite of the optimism displayed by certain hon. members of the house I see no betterment at the present time. When I picked up the paper this morning I found that action was being taken by our railways which will have the effect in the near future of throwing thousands more of our working people out of employment, thus greatly aggravating an already difficult situation. So with all due respect to what has been done by the government in the last few years; with all due respect to those who even at this time advocate unemployment insurance which, at the best, is only a palliative and will not affect a very large proportion of those out of employment, I think if we are to deal with this question at all we must do so from a different angle altogether. The one way I see, and the method I have advocated in this house for a number of years, is to first reduce the number of hours of work so that we may absorb into industry large numbers of those who are now idle. To me that is the first remedy that should be applied. I know I will be told that the question of the hours of labour is under the jurisdiction of our provincial authorities. To a certain extent this may be quite true, but I believe that when the need is so great; when in our large industrial centres throughout the country we have a third of the employable population out of work, we should not balk at the constitution. I believe in having all respect for the constitution, but the need is urgent now, and I think our provincial authorities should be big enough to consider the welfare of the country as a whole and do something fundamental to deal with this ever-increasing problem of unemployment.

We are told that we are faced with conditions such as never have been known in the Dominion of Canada before. That is perfectly true. In common with the rest of the world we are faced with a serious economic crisis, but that crisis is man-made, and such a crisis we should meet ourselves; we ought to be able to overcome it by proper action taken in this house. The vast army of the unemployed in Canada to-day are looking to this parliament for redress, because this is the only body in the country they can look to for some relief. There is nothing more demoralizing to a man than to be out of work and to be without any prospect whatever of obtaining work either immediately or in the near future.

As a first step towards solving the unemployment problem, I suggest that some means must be taken by this house of considerably reducing the hours of labour in industry. But there is something else that must go along with that, because merely to reduce hours of labour and at the same time to reduce wages would leave us in relatively the same position we are in now. The next essential therefore is to provide purchasing power for the masses of the people so that they may consume the goods which they themselves help to produce. At present that purchasing power is lacking and consequently there is no effective demand for the goods which we have in superabundance.

I know that the solution cannot be found by any of the provinces; it would be unfair to ask any of the provinces to take the necessary steps towards a reduction of the hours of labour. There is only one body competent to legislate along that line and that is this honourable house. If we take these two steps which I suggest we shall have a complete change from the present situation in industry. Industry to-day operates not in order to serve the community as a whole but to serve the ends of those who own and control it, and industry must be made to realize that it exists to serve a much higher purpose than that. It must serve the needs of the community. There could be nothing more striking in the way of condemnation of our present industrial system than the spectacle of 800,000 people walking the streets unemployed and without any prospect of obtaining employment, while at the same time our factories are idle, although these very people are ready to start the wheels of industry going. And these people are in want of the very things the factories can turn out if they are given a chance to function.

This problem can be solved only by reducing very considerably the hours of labour, and secondly, by increasing the purchasing power of the great masses of the people. I do not attach much importance to conferences. Some hon. gentlemen who have preceded me have emphasized the last conference and others of the same kind, but personally I must say that I have lost a good deal of faith in any sort of conference, and so have the people. What the people are looking for is action, and they expect this house to take that action. I believe that the government itself is anxious to do something for the unemployed. It would be a splendid thing if the government could see its way clear, by proper action, to reduce the army of unemployed whom it is compelled to maintain, and I suggest that if we are to deal with the problem this government can deal with it in one possible way only, and that is by considerably reducing the hours of labour. If that were done we could absorb men and women into industry and start things going. And secondly, I repeat, we must increase the purchasing power of the masses of the people so that they may be able to obtain in large measure the goods which they themselves produce.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not agree with some of the observations made this afternoon with regard to unemployment insurance. In my opinion the government could very well set in motion at once the necessary machinery to bring about a system of unemployment insurance in this country. In spite of what has been said to the contrary, I hold that no matter what system we may live under, some scheme of social insurance will sooner or later be found to be absolutely necessary, and the enormous figures quoted with respect to unemployment insurance are, in my opinion, no reason for tardiness in introducing a measure of this description. If such a scheme had been introduced in 1928-29 it would have been necessary to pick out a certain number of specified trades or callings in connection with which the plan could have been tried. That can be done to-day. The same argument that would have been used at that time can be invoked at this moment. I believe it will be necessary for the government to study the systems in operation in other countries in taking the necessary steps towards the introduction of unemployment insurance. What I am most concerned about at the moment is to know whether the federal government had a plan drawn up for the introduction of an unemployment insurance scheme in Canada and whether it submitted that plan to the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. GORDON: There is no reason why the position of the government should not be made plain with respect to unemployment insurance. The facts were spread upon Hansard by the Prime Minister. A dominion-provincial conference was called because it was obvious that any scheme that might be advanced—not only the schemes that have been proposed since 1930 but those suggested before that time by those who apparently spoke for the late government—must be contributory. That being so, this government is immediately confronted, as every province in the dominion is confronted, with a preliminary barrier to the accomplishment of that purpose.

I do not want to harp on the constitution. I have been told that constitutional questions, in our past political history, if properly manipulated could change even the complexion of governments. I want to avoid that sort of thing, and the government wants to avoid it. At the recent dominion-provincial conference the question of unemployment insurance certainly was discussed; it was discussed primarily to see whether the apparently insuperable barrier to a contributory system could be removed, namely, the question of constitutional difficulties. Because of the fact that the subject matter perhaps would become a matter of great controversy within each province, it was agreed among the provinces that the attitude of each individual province would not be disclosed. Each provincial representative recognized that that barrier must first be overcome if contributory social insurance was to become a fact. That being the case, I can only go so far as to say that this subject was seriously discussed from many angles and that the whole matter is still under consideration by the provinces and by this government. I can assure the committee that if it is possible we will endeavour to introduce a scheme the foundations of which will be laid upon such sure and sound basis, actuarially and otherwise, that it will prevail and not meet with disaster because of hasty action on the part of this government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not a fact that the procedure with respect to any scheme of unemployment insurance is upon all fours with the procedure with respect to old age pensions, and that the question of jurisdiction so far as unemployment insurance is concerned is the same as the question of jurisdiction which arises in connection with old age pensions? Does the minister agree with that?

Mr. GORDON: In part.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With what part does the minister not agree?

Mr. GORDON: I cannot agree that the two matters are exactly alike, but in the main the same constitutional questions arise with respect to both.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Each is a form of social insurance; the one is insurance against dependence in old age, the other is insurance against unemployment. So far as the relations between the provinces and the dominion are concerned, the same class of question arises and the methods of procedure in bringing about an arrangement between the provinces and the dominion are the same. Broadly speaking, I think that is correct. May I ask the minister if the federal government placed any scheme before the conference or made any suggestion of a plan which it would wish to have considered? This is in contrast to the provinces bringing something to the attention of the federal government.

Mr. GORDON: In answering the first observation made by the right hon. gentleman, may I say that I do not subscribe to the view that these two questions are identical or even nearly so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As to procedure and jurisdiction.

Mr. GORDON: Possibly so. The question of unemployment or social insurance has associated with it many questions which do not arise with respect to old age pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister seems to identify unemployment insurance with social insurance. That is not my understanding of social insurance. Social insurance is a comprehensive term which includes as one form insurance against unemployment.

Mr. GORDON: I will confine it to unemployment insurance. That subject has associated with it factors which do not appear with respect to old age pensions. There are hours of work, rates of pay, industrial relations and other matters which enter into a contributory form of unemployment insurance. It will be seen that both subjects have their own peculiar difficulty.

In answering the second question asked by the right hon. gentleman, may I repeat that before any scheme could take form, the constitutional barrier would have to be removed. So far as the discussions at the conference are concerned, many forms of insurance and the difficulties which presented themselves in connection therewith were discussed. I think the representatives of the provinces left the conference with a much clearer idea of the difficulties which would have to be surmounted if a plan such as has been discussed in this house and in the press were to be invoked. It was realized that the barrier which confronted the provinces and the dominion must first be removed. This was the first conference to deal directly with a problem of this character and it was not expected that it would be able to solve the problems involved. I am sure the representatives of the provinces carried away with them a realization of the necessity of careful investigation as to how such a plan would work within their respective provinces and the realization that they must decide whether the representatives could commit their respective governments to a nation-wide plan on a contributory basis. I suggest that that is as far as this government could go at such a conference. If we had taken the attitude and said, "Now, provinces, here is our plan and you must accept it," we would have got nowhere.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not "must" but "what do you think of it?"

Mr. GORDON: That is one of the reasons why no hard, fast and rigid plan was laid before the conference. The effort of the conference was directed towards solving the obvious difficulties. There was a full, free and frank discussion of these difficulties in the hope that the subject might be renewed at another time and that we might go forward another step in attaining our ends within a reasonable length of time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister states that there was no hard, fast and rigid plan put before the conference, but is it not a fact that no plan at all was put before the conference? They talked about unemployment insurance, but no plan was offered or proposed by the federal government. That was the real position. The minister has said that there should not be undue haste in a matter of this kind and that the government is considering what it might do. Has the government taken any concrete steps to surmount in any way the difficulties to be confronted in dealing with a national scheme? I agree with the minister when he says that a national scheme of unemployment insurance presents more difficulties than a national scheme of old age pensions. Is the government doing anything, and, if so, what is it doing to get such light upon this subject as will be of service in bringing about a national scheme at an early date?

Mr. GORDON: The government is and has been gathering the necessary information in order that a plan which could meet with the views of the parties interested might be evolved. It will require to be done with extreme care and the government is progressing with that work.

The leader of the opposition suggested that the position was that the government had no plan; that we proposed nothing to the provinces. That is far from being the case. I am not at liberty to disclose the proposals, because it was understood at the opening of the conference, at the suggestion of the provincial representatives themselves, that the difficulties with which they would be confronted with respect to this very subject matter should remain without being published until they had further reviewed them and until further conferences were held, the reason being that to disclose those difficulties and the attitude of various provinces, whether for or against or partially for and partially against, or to publish suggestions coming from them during the course of negotiations, was not calculated to advance the position. That was the attitude assumed by this government and by the provinces, and I do not think anyone can very seriously complain of it, but I can tell the members of the committee that information is being gathered with respect to this very important subject and it is hoped that advance will be made toward bringing into being some kind of legislation that will accomplish the object sought.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister is coming along slowly. He may find in a little while that in spite of himself he is doing something. He says that the department or the government is gathering information. May I ask him this question: From what sources are they gathering information? What officers of the government are gathering it? What is the nature of the information they are gathering that they do not have already?

Mr. CASGRAIN: We want to know something.

Mr. GORDON: Yes, I think that would not be a bad idea.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Something of what the government is doing, so that we may understand the situation.

Mr. GORDON: The Bureau of Statistics is compiling information; the Department of Insurance and the Department of Labour are giving attention to it. The government itself has under review many phases of the difficulties that accompany the introduction of such legislation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As the department over which I have at the moment the honour of presiding is and has been for some time looking into this question of unemployment insurance, may I say a word in regard to the matter. The difficulties in the way of a federal system of unemployment insurance are very serious if such a system is to be carried out upon a contributory basis which, I believe, is the only method which would be approved by parliament, that is, contributions by employees, by employers, by the federal treasury and perhaps as well by the provincial treasuries. To inaugurate and carry out a scheme of that kind without provincial consent and without an amendment to the British North America Act would be impossible. Parliament cannot force employers to contribute, nor can it force employees to contribute. These are matters entirely within the jurisdiction of the various provinces, and unless the provinces are willing to surrender some of their rights, their powers, it is impossible without an amendment to the British North America Act to carry out any scheme under the jurisdiction of this parliament. I noticed the leader of the opposition stated in his opening remarks that it would be just as easy to carry out an unemployment insurance scheme as to carry out an old age pension plan.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I said the very reverse; I said that it would not be as easy to carry out an unemployment insurance scheme.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the corrected opinion of my right hon. friend after the Minister of Labour had spoken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not. With all deference to my hon. friend, if he will look at the record, he will see that I said that the same questions of jurisdiction and methods of procedure arise in each case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The same questions do not arise. In the old age pension scheme the question was simply this: the federal government will contribute certain money and the provincial governments will contribute certain money. The difficulty was overcome by a dominion act and a provincial act. That was all there was to the matter. This plan of unemployment insurance involves not only the question of government contribution, but compulsory contributions by employers and employees, which is a matter of purely provincial jurisdiction. I am disclosing no secret when I say that at the conference the provinces were not prepared to give up those rights nor to agree to any amendment to the British North America Act for that purpose. Very serious discussions took place, and while the question was advanced, it certainly was not advanced to the point of agreement, no agreement being reached on the subject. Until we have a solution of these two questions: the power to assess the employer and the power to assess the employee, I do not think there is much hope of a federal unemployment insurance scheme. If we can overcome those difficulties; if we can reach an arrangement upon those two questions, then I think the field is fairly clear and satisfactory legislation can be formulated. But until we have those questions cleared up, I do not think very much advance can be made.

The matter is being considered by a number of departments of this government, notably by the Department of Justice. It is also being considered by a number of provincial governments, I shall not say all of them. The hope is that some satisfactory scheme may be evolved within a reasonable time, but so far the basis has not been struck.

Mr. POWER: May I ask the Minister of Justice, who has just taken his seat and who has put forward the proposition of contributory unemployment insurance as it was put to the provinces, whether it was not the case that the proposition put to them was that they should abandon their claims over insurance generally; that what the federal government asked them to do was to recede from the position which the privy council had granted to them?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Nothing of that kind took place either in my hearing or to my knowledge. This was an entirely different matter from insurance which was very fully discussed.

Mr. POWER: It covers the same question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. POWER: As I recollect the matter, the privy council delivered the judgment in which it was stated that insurance generally should be under the control of the provinces. Am I right in that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That the business of insurance, fire, life, marine and accident, is under the jurisdiction of the provinces, but the two subjects were not discussed together; they were in no way involved in relation to each other. The discussion that took place on insurance was separate and distinct from that which took place in regard to unemployment insurance.

Mr. POWER: The question of insurance generally most assuredly covers that of unemployment insurance, and if the provinces, and I think quite rightly, believe that under the British North America Act and as confirmed by the decision of privy council, they and they alone have the right to deal with the business of insurance, it naturally follows that they should reply to the federal government: First of all get your right to deal with unemployment insurance established, and then we shall talk to you.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is very much to be said in favour of the opinion just expressed by the hon. member for Quebec South. I am inclined to think the question of unemployment insurance is far more a provincial than a federal one, but at the same time it has been, I believe, the sense of this parliament and probably of the country that it would be a good thing to have a federal system of unemployment insurance if we can get one. But if you come down to the fine point, the jurisdiction is within the provinces.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister allow me to ask this question? As regards the constitutional aspect, he suggests that it might be necessary to amend the British North America Act. Such a course would be complicated and delay the matter. The British Columbia government passed an act, I believe it is chapter 4 of the 1932 statutes, which seems to me to be a parallel case. It is an amendment to the Meat and Canned Foods Act. Passing the act as a sort of concurrent legislation, they took a position something like this, that "If any order in council or regulations have been made by the Dominion government under the Dominion Meat and Canned Foods Act we do hereby also enact them, in so far as they exceed the dominion jurisdiction, and come under our jurisdiction. And if in future they pass any more such regulations we again hereby enact them."

Would not legislation of that kind suffice in dealing with the situation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If this parliament has not jurisdiction now, no act of any province can confer jurisdiction upon it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask if this is not what actually took place when the conference was held: The Dominion government asked the provinces what they had to propose with respect to unemployment insurance, and the reply from the provincial governments was to the effect that they had been invited to the conference by the dominion and would like to know what it had to offer. Did they not say that if the dominion would place a plan before them they would express their views? But no plan was forthcoming from the dominion. That certainly is the current view entertained as to what took place. If it is not correct I wish the minister would say so.

Mr. GORDON: Of course the right hon. leader of the opposition has his views and his powers of deduction, which are most admirable. But I have already said the discussions on this subject were confidential between the provinces and the dominion, and stated to be so by both. I shall just have to reassert that position, and regret to say that in the meantime, until those negotiations have been concluded, the right hon. leader of the opposition, I am afraid, will have to speculate as to what did happen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One other point: May I suggest that when the next conference comes along, if the government is in earnest in its desire to further a national unemployment scheme, it should have a plan to present to the provinces which would indicate on what basis the federal government would participate in an unemployment insurance scheme. There is nothing to prevent that being done. Whatever the Minister of Justice has said about jurisdiction may be taken into consideration, but the test as to whether or not this government is in earnest about any national unemployment scheme will be their presentation to the next conference of some concrete plan about which they can tell this house and country. That will be the test.

Mr. MacINNIS: It seems to me we are giving this point more importance than it actually possesses. We seem to believe that if we have unemployment insurance there will be no further unemployment. I believe the experience of other countries would indicate that that is far from the truth. Since 1911 there has been an unemployment insurance scheme in Great Britain, and to-day unemployment in that country is as great a problem as it is here. True, unemployment insurance is a more scientific way of dealing with the difficulty than the method we are adopting, but it certainly is not a solution. If we had the best possible scheme of unemployment insurance we would still have an unemployment problem to solve.

In the last four sessions, including the special session of 1930, we have been discussing unemployment. When that special session was called the Prime Minister asked for an appropriation similar to the amount mentioned in the amendment to this resolution, such moneys to take care of the situation then obtaining. In that special session he pointed out that a special vote of money was not a solution of the difficulty, but merely a palliative. Again at this time, after the passage of three years, nothing but a palliative is offered. It seems to me that if we are to deal effectively with the unemployment problem we will have to do something of a more permanent character.

The condition with which we are faced is this: Every employing company, every industry, is trying to produce the greatest number of units of commodities with the least possible amount of labour time. With such conditions confronting us it is impossible under the present plan to catch up with the unemployment problem. We cannot do it, and for that reason, while, as the hon. member for North Winnipeg suggested, we might consider unemployment insurance as a means to an end, I suggest we must remember that unemployment insurance is not an end in itself, but that we must have a more fundamental and definite plan to deal with unemployment.

Mr. COOTE: I was deeply interested in the statement made by the minister this afternoon to the effect that information was being gathered from so many departments. However, there is one department he failed to mention which in my view must be brought into the scheme before we can go very far with unemployment insurance. I refer to the Department of Finance. The minister will find that upon introducing an unemployment insurance plan he will have to have money; he must know from where that money will come.

Mr. GORDON: I thought the hon. member would take it for granted that the Department of Finance was deeply interested in any such scheme.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee has been out of order all afternoon.

Mr. COOTE: The minister was quite right this afternoon when he said that when and if we establish an unemployment insurance scheme it must be on a sound actuarial basis. I say that we cannot be on a sound actuarial basis until in Canada we have a sound money system. I do not mean by that the present system, because it is anything but sound. It is sound, but very little more, to most people. Sound money would be stable money. When stable money is put to work properly it will bring about stable conditions, stable employment and stable purchasing power. When we have such conditions it may be possible to bring in an unemployment insurance scheme which would be actuarially sound. Had an unemployment insurance scheme been introduced and put into operation in 1928 or 1929 I am afraid by this time it would have failed, because there would not have been enough income in the hands of those administering the fund to pay the unemployment insurance. All that goes back to the fact that we have not a sound money system. We should have a money system whereby money issued has some reasonable relation to the amount of goods produced. Under such conditions we would not have all this unemployment. Until we deal with our money system we will have unemployment, and I am afraid we will have more than obtains to-day.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Finance announce yesterday that a royal commission will be appointed to inquire into banking and money. I hope one of the matters with which the commission will be specifically charged to inquire into will be the control of our money system so as to maintain stable employment in Canada. We can produce the goods but we have yet to solve the problem of distribution. That is the reason we have unemployment. I again suggest to the committee that before we can effectively deal with unemployment, we must deal on a scientific basis with the money problem.

Mr. REID: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the position that many municipalities find themselves in. We agree that governments to-day, both dominion and provincial, are carrying a heavy load in regard to unemployment. But so are the municipalities. I believe I am safe in saying that the municipalities to-day are carrying a heavier load than the provincial or the dominion governments. They are further crippled by the fact that municipalities have not the powers of taxation that the other governments have. In the province of British Columbia the municipalities for many years past have been in receipt of large grants from the provincial government. Now the provincial government, in an endeavour to balance its budget, has intimated to the municipalities that some of these grants will be cut off. A grant which has been given them in connection with the parimutuel and the liquor profits, amounting to some $640,000 is going to be cut off this year. In view of that condition there are three questions that I would like to ask the minister:

In the event of any municipality being unable to carry on financially will the Dominion government contribute a greater proportion than one-third to direct relief?

In the event that it does, will it be on the understanding that the province will bear one-half instead of one-third as at present?

If the province finds itself unable to bear the fifty per cent, or any further burden in connection with the municipalities, will the Dominion government bear a greater proportion, say two-thirds?

I feel sure that many municipalities are going to be seriously crippled by having these grants taken from them this year, so it is very important that these questions be answered. Many municipalities have gone into bankruptcy or receivership already, and many more will do so this year owing to the cutting off of these grants.

Mr. GORDON: The three overlapping questions asked by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) will have to be dealt with when the conditions arise. I do not want to keep reiterating what has been said so many times in recent years as to where the primary responsibility lies for taking care of those unable to take care of themselves. If it comes to pass that individuals are unable to provide for their own needs, and the municipalities and the province of British Columbia find themselves at the end of their resources, then we would have to review the situation at once and with care to see what the difficulties were. But this government does not intend to project itself into an investigation of the municipalities of British Columbia or any other province. If there is danger of the situation developing there that has been suggested, this government, in so far as it can assist, will have to wait and deal with the matter when it arises.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would like to ask this question arising out of the discussion of unemployment insurance. The Minister of Justice has said that the various governments were going to study the question of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the federal government, and that that was the cause of the delay in coming to an agreement. I would like to ask whether any arrangement has been made or any understanding come to for a future conference, with a view to introducing in this house a measure of unemployment insurance on a national basis?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, we did not get as far as that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Am I to understand then that the thing ended with the conclusion of that conference? Is it left up in the air?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Nothing was agreed to, but the matter is still being considered, not only by this government but, I fancy, by the nine provincial governments.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask then if the government has it in mind to call another conference at the conclusion of this session, similar to that held in January, to discuss the possibility of introducing a national unemployment insurance scheme?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot answer that, I do not know.

Mr. MITCHELL: Am I right in saying that the thing then is in the air?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it is not in the air.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where is it?

Mr. MALCOLM: Under the bed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In the cupboard.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): From the discussion last night, which largely centred around the province of Manitoba, I am afraid an inference might be taken from the statement of the Prime Minister that Manitoba has received proportionately to its population more than other provinces as far as relief is concerned. I do not know the facts and I do not propose to deal with that particular phase. But I do submit that there is one class in Manitoba that would hardly agree with that statement. I propose to deal with that point in a moment.

With reference to the closing of the Manitoba savings offices, which was dealt with last night, might I say that had the right hon. Prime Minister made the statement a year ago that he made last night the situation would have been greatly clarified at that time, and he would have escaped being drawn into the discussion in connection with, shall I say, the demands made by the banks, that the province convene its legislature within ten days and repeal a statute. I say, if the Prime Minister had at that time made the statement he made last night, it would have been very much better and would have relieved him of a lot of probably unfair criticism that has developed in the interval. That is all I propose to say in regard to that matter at present.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

The other matter that I wish to discuss at the moment I think is in order in that the minister in introducing this measure dealt with the payment of a bonus of five cents a bushel on wheat. Therefore I wish to discuss the dealings with the Canadian wheat pool.

When the wheat pool first got into difficulty in 1929-30 that year's operations were handled by the provincial government, and that is out of the picture altogether. That was uniform for the three western provinces. The Dominion government came into the picture in the negotiations carried on the next year. The pool started out with its initial payment on a certain basis. Unfortunately the price of wheat declined and the pool was obliged to reduce its initial payment. In southern Manitoba particularly we have two classes of wheat, durum wheat and common wheat. Ordinarily durum wheat sells at a lower price than common wheat, but owing to peculiar conditions in 1930-31 the durum wheat sold at a considerable premium over common wheat. Recognizing that ordinarily durum wheat sells at less than common, the initial payment by the pool on this wheat was less per bushel than on common, but we find at the end of the year that this durum wheat sold consistently at a higher price. The Dominion government came into the picture by subscribing to the appointment of Mr. McFarland as general manager of the Canadian wheat pool. Since January, 1931, he has had virtually complete control of pool operations. Now the wheat was received by the pool on a definite initial payment. Since that time no further payments have been made. In this connection I should like to present the figures indicating the amount of money paid for these two classes of wheat. When the delivery of the crop started the pool made an initial payment, basis Fort William, of 70 cents for No. 1 northern wheat and 64 cents for No. 1 durum. That price was reduced later to 60 cents for No. 1 northern and 54 cents for No. 1 durum; later to 55 cents and 49 cents, and still later to 50 cents and 49 cents. I have here the amount of wheat delivered under these various payments, but I do not think it necessary to place those figures on Hansard; it is sufficient to say that 3,520,675 bushels of durum wheat were received at various prices. Ninety per cent of the durum wheat handled by the pools was grown in Manitoba, and later it was shown that this wheat was practically all sold by the end of the crop year at a price considerably higher than the price on which the initial payments were made. The average price, in fact, was 67·9 cents per bushel.

The result, Mr. Chairman, is that a considerable amount of money is still due to the growers of durum wheat from the operations of the pool in 1930-31. The general manager, Mr. McFarland, has been approached; the government has been approached and I believe several of the ministers have been interviewed as well. Mr. McFarland has recognized the situation; he thinks it is unjust and unfair but he says he can do nothing in the matter without the consent of the Dominion government. If the durum wheat growers, most of whom live in southern Manitoba, were paid the full amount for which their wheat was sold they would receive roughly $500,000. I am not going to contend at the moment that this money should be paid them immediately; I realize that the whole operation of the wheat pools is involved, but I do contend that it is only fair and reasonable that the growers of durum wheat should be paid on the same basis as the growers of common wheat. If that were done the farmers who grew durum wheat, located mainly in the southern part of Manitoba, would realize about $200,000.

I am bringing this matter to the attention of the committee at this time and simply asking the minister if the government is giving consideration to this question and, if not, whether they will take it into consideration.

Mr. GORDON: I confess that I have not under my hand the details of the matter to which the hon. member has made reference. I do trust that the farmers of Manitoba will get every cent they are entitled to, and the matter will be looked into.

Mr. VALLANCE: Just in support of what the hon. member for Macdonald has said I should like to tell the committee that I am receiving communications almost daily drawing my attention to the position of the farmers who delivered their wheat to the pool, when Mr. McFarland became general manager. As the hon. member stated, we started out with one initial payment; then, because of the position in which wheat found itself some time after the market opened, the pool found it necessary to reduce the initial payment. What is really concerning the minds of the farmers to-day, especially in the portion of Saskatchewan from which I come, is this: They still have some equity in that crop, and many of them need that money to-day in order to start their spring operations. So I would urge upon the minister and the government the necessity of cleaning up this matter just as soon as possible.

Mr. GORDON: Who owes them the money?

Mr. VALLANCE: I think the minister will agree—and if he does not I hope he will correct me—that to-day Mr. McFarland is performing a dual function. He is general manager of the three central selling agencies and he is also acting for the government this year in the stabilization of the market. Undoubtedly the pools are responsible for that payment, but the portion of the money due the farmers is being held somewhere and the farmer wants to know why he is not being paid. Many farmers are in dire need of that money right now and it would be a great convenience to them if it could be paid before spring operations commence.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): With respect to the interjection of the minister may I say that so far as durum wheat is concerned, and I am particularly interested in that, there was quite an agitation when the government came into the picture not to allow durum wheat to come under that new arrangement. If this durum wheat had not been disposed of to the pool the farmers would have had a great deal more money than is due them now, and I think that point is important.

While I am on my feet I should like to add one statement. I know it to be a fact that quite a large amount of money has been spent for relief in southern Manitoba, where durum wheat is largely grown, and some time ago I mentioned the damage that had been done by grasshoppers. I think the minister can appreciate that these people are really in need of some extra money in order to start their spring operations. I appreciate the fact that the minister has not had this matter in hand; I think perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce has dealt with it and I will discuss it with him when the occasion arises.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just one further question to ask the minister. We are being asked to vote $20,000,000 for direct relief; in other words, so far as the government has a policy it is a policy of the dole, and in that respect the limit is placed at $20,000,000.

Mr. GORDON: What does the right hon. gentleman mean by the dole? I am not acquainted with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is direct relief, simply giving money for relief purposes and not providing work. I distinguish between direct relief, in the form of money given people who require aid, and money spent in order to return people to the land, putting the landless man on the manless land as someone has said, or the construction of public works or matters of that kind. Under this measure the government is asking for a blank cheque so that, apart from what is required for the purpose of the dole, they will have an unlimited amount available for the relief of unemployment in other ways. The minister has told us that in the last two years, during which the government has had this blank cheque, they have spent or loaned a total of something like $115,000,000. As I pointed out the other day that sum is equivalent to the total expenditure of Canada for one year in the period immediately preceding the war, and I suppose this year the expenditure will be proportionately the same.

I want to ask the minister whether, apart from the dole for the expenditures that may be made under this blank cheque, he has any comprehensive, constructive, coordinated plan which he can announce to this house as that of the ministry for dealing with the question of unemployment relief.

Mr. GORDON: It is so easy for an hon. member to rise in his place and talk about great big coordinated schemes; that word is a very euphonious way of describing almost anything. Let me point out that as far back as the years 1921, 1922 and 1923 and from 1926 on, as revealed in the files of the Department of Labour, the leader of the opposition himself recognized the difficulties that confront any dominion government in this country with respect to taking over the administration of relief for those in distress or those who are unable to look after themselves—difficulties in relation to provincial and dominion jurisdiction respectively. This government will pursue the same course as it has pursued during the past year. That is to say, the moneys will be devoted first to assisting the provinces where they are unable to take care of their own worthy needy people, and will assist the provinces in projecting any schemes or plans which they may conceive or which we may conceive and which will be satisfactory to them or to us, as the case may be, within the financial limits of the provinces and the dominion, to provide employment or to take care by way of direct relief of those who are in need.

What the future has in store for us I am not going to prophesy. I believe that the situation is certainly not getting any worse, in spite of what people say. I know there are certain people who would be gratified indeed to have their own prophecies come true and to see things become worse. There is that sort of mind. There are people who, having prophesied, desire to see their prophecy fulfilled, no matter what hardship may befall anyone.

The Dominion government will not invade the jurisdiction of the provinces. I hazard the opinion that, set up in every municipality in Canada, there is some commission or organization that is taking care of immediate needs and directing the efforts that are being made in this regard. Even when times are normal, when there is no financial distress, when business is as usual, there is not a municipality in this country that has not its indigents, persons who have had some misadventure and cannot get along. These agencies are extended and are working throughout Canada to supply those who are in need during this time.

I assume that the leader of the opposition had in mind a big cooperative national committee which this government should set up to take the place of all these various agencies in the municipalities and the various charitable organizations throughout Canada, and to take over the whole matter as a dominion effort. With that point of view I am not in agreement, not only because of the question of jurisdiction, but because there are many, many associations in Canada to-day, as there have been in the past year, who have devoted their time and money towards the aid and succor of those in distress. One of the reasons for not embarking on such a scheme as is suggested is that, in my view at any rate, these wells of charity will very soon dry up because unfortunately there is ingrained in the human makeup a desire perhaps to shift responsibility.

We will continue to do as we have done in the past year, and in spite of the criticisms that have been made as to the reduction in the amount of money that has been devoted to direct relief, I still say that this government and the provinces and municipalities are to be commended for having introduced system into the giving of direct relief throughout Canada, as well as in view of the fact that the cost, while perhaps the numbers have increased as they always have done in winter months in this country, is very materially reduced.

I hope that with the return of even a little better times and with the attention that is being paid towards sytematizing direct relief, the cost this year will be still less. I do not think any government can successfully ask commendation simply because it has spent huge sums of money on any project without regard to the efficiency of the organization that is spending the money, and without regard to the beneficial effect of such expenditure. This government, I say, will pursue the same course as it pursued last year, and if eventualities arise where some change in some section of Canada becomes necessary, the government will take such appropriate action as may be deemed desirable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister seems to take exception to my words because they suggest a nationwide scheme, and he says he assumes that I had in mind what has been proposed from this side as a national commission that would co-operate with the provinces and municipalities in an endeavour to deal with this great problem of unemployment relief. What I had in mind was what the government announced in the speech from the throne on March 12, 1931, as the policy which it intended to put into effect. On that date the speech from the throne made this announcement:

> The operation of The Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, has proved equally beneficial. While the grant authorized by this act could not immediately have checked unemployment arising from causes of which you have full knowledge, yet its careful administration by my ministers, ably aided by the provincial and municipal governments and the two great railway systems, has resulted in the institution of a nation-wide program of public undertakings, each one a unit in a scheme of national development, which have collectively provided work for the greatest number of men who have ever been employed through the direct efforts of the federal government.

That was the announcement of the government's policy—a great national scheme of development as a means of helping to solve the problem of unemployment—and to-day the minister tells us that to speak of a nationwide scheme is only to try to introduce something that will embarrass the whole situation. I just want to make clear to him that the government did begin by announcing its intention to deal with the problem in a nationwide fashion in order to help to solve the problem, but it has thrown that policy to the winds and the only policy it now has is that of the dole. It is not in a position at the moment to announce anything in the shape of a comprehensive, coordinated, constructive plan of dealing with this great problem.

Mr. GORDON: With reference to the observations of the right hon. gentleman, at the time of which he speaks there was a plan that contemplated the projection and anticipation of public works that were contributed to by this government, by the provinces, by the municipalities and by the railway systems, and which ran into huge figures. The soundness of that plan could perhaps be measured, in a way at least, by the duration of this depression, because it was obvious then, as it is now looking back, that such schemes could not be projected year after year. But it was carried on as the speech from the throne then indicated it would be. In my judgment all that the state—by state I mean the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion—can afford to do is to take care of those who for any cause are unable to take care of themselves. Suggestions have been made that we should build a factory here or a warehouse there, the claim being made that the amount granted to such a project would soon be eaten up in the granting of direct relief where nothing would be left to show for the money expended. The fact is that the money spent upon the erection of a factory, a dock or something else would employ perhaps only fifty or one hundred people upon a wage basis whereas the same money expended in direct relief would provide food, fuel, clothing and shelter to perhaps ten times that number of people and for a longer period of time.

Mr. DUFF: Haileybury wharf.

Mr. GORDON: When we are embarking upon any nation-wide scheme we must of necessity look to the treasuries of the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has interjected with "Haileybury wharf."

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: I wish the hon. member would get out of the atmosphere surrounding the docks in his own province and come up to my riding to see that little bit of airport breakwater to which he has referred several times. He would then be able to see the number of aeroplanes engaged in the mining industry in the northern sections of Ontario and Quebec. When he sees the service granted to tens of thousands of those engaged in the mining industry I am sure he will commend me for what I have done.

Mr. DUFF: I thought perhaps the minister was admitting his mistake in spending money for no useful purpose.

Mr. GORDON: That dock was built on a strictly relief basis.

Mr. VALLANCE: When a relief commission, say in Saskatchewan, issues a cheque in connection with direct relief is there any indication upon that cheque to show that it is being expended for direct relief? When a cheque is issued for the payment of material used in the construction of some public work under the relief measures, is there anything upon the cheque to indicate for what purpose it is issued?

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I have not the information with respect to those details.

Mr. VALLANCE: I will tell the minister my reason for asking these questions. I know of an hon. member who received a cheque which had inscribed diagonally across it the words "Relief No. 1."

Mr. COTNAM: We might all need it after a bit.

Mr. VALLANCE: This member received such a cheque from the relief commission of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GORDON: Is the hon. member sure it was not an indemnity cheque.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, it was not. I received that cheque, and I will tell the committee why I received it. The province of Saskatchewan has been building a number of highways and I had the good fortune to have one built right through my farm.

Mr. POWER: Shame.

Mr. VALLANCE: Certain land was expropriated and settlement was made upon the basis of $30 per acre. Five acres and a fraction were expropriated and I received a cheque from the province of Saskatchewan for $165 and some cents. Written across the face of that cheque were the words "Relief No. 1." I should like to know how many such cheques are included in the expenditure of $115,000,000 for unemployment during the past year.

Mr. GORDON: The Dominion government does not contribute to the expropriation of lands. I have no idea how the good fortune fell upon the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) but I assume that the province of Saskatchewan surveyed the field very carefully and came to the conclusion that the hon. member for South Battleford was entitled to relief No. 1.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is all very well for the minister to make such a glib reply, but the people of Saskatchewan would like to know how much money has been spent in that manner. That particular highway ran for seven or eight miles and the necessary land was expropriated. The whole highway was built with rented equipment and if the matter was probed into I have no doubt it would be found that less than ten per cent of the whole expenditure went for real relief.

Resolution as amended reported, read the second time and concurred in, on division. Mr. Gordon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 55, to continue in force the provisions of the Relief Act, 1932, until the 31st of March, 1934.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time on division.

On motion of Mr. Gordon, the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

Thursday, March 23, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. GORDON: I desire to lay on the table of the house orders in council passed pursuant to the Relief Act.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PRINCE ALBERT PENITENTIARY WARDEN

Mr. TOTZKE:

1. When was Mr. W. J. McLeod retired as warden of the penitentiary at Prince Albert?
2. Has any department of government sold an electric refrigerator and an electric range to the said Mr. McLeod; if so, when and at what prices?
3. Have any other articles of merchandise been sold to the said Mr. McLeod; if so, what articles, when and at what prices?
4. Is it a general practice of any department of government to sell merchandise to retired employees?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. January 1, 1933.
2. No.
3. No.
4. On several occasions the government contracts supervision committee has sold merchandise to retired employees with the distinct understanding that it was for their own use and not for resale.

COMMERCIAL ATTACHÉ—MEXICO

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Is Mr. Jose Maria Davila accredited or known to the government as commercial attache of the Republic of Mexico?
2. Is Canada represented in Mexico by any official and under what title?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Mr. Jose Maria Davila is not accredited or known to the government as commercial attaché of the Republic of Mexico.

2. Canada is represented in Mexico by the Canadian government trade commissioner and the protection of Canadian interests in Mexico, is, diplomatically, in the hands of the British minister.

MILITIA ACCOUNTS OFFICERS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. What were the travelling expenses, including transportation by rail and water, of Major E. G. Edwards, district paymaster, M.D. 11, from first of April, 1930, to first of March, 1931?

2. What were the travelling expenses, including transportation by rail and water, of Mr. J. E. Houghton, district accountant, M.D. 11, from first of April 1932, to first of March, 1933?

3. Is it customary to have an official who is not a member of the active militia, and who did not have any overseas service to inspect the books of the non-permanent active militia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. $71.69.

2. $195.95.

3. Several district accountants who were appointed by the Civil Service Commission and are employees of the Department of Finance carry out such duties at the direction of district officers commanding.

SOREL, QUEBEC, WHARF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on page 2983 of Hansard of March 14, will be found the record of a question addressed to the Minister of Public Works, which reads as follows:

Hon. P. J. A. Cardin (Richelieu): In view of an item I read this morning in the Montreal Gazette, repeating statements made on many occasions by persons connected with the harbour commission of Montreal regarding the port of Sorel, may I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) if it is true that the government spent $2,000,000 for building the wharf on which the present privately owned elevator is erected at Sorel, and if in fact that wharf was not in existence many years before the elevator was built?

To which I replied as follows:

As the hon. gentleman gave me no notice of this question I am not prepared to give the answer. I have not the information with me. I suggest it stand as a notice of motion.

I now desire to make a comprehensive statement, which I trust furnishes the information desired by the hon. member.

The construction at Sorel of what is known as the Grand Quai was commenced in 1902. The area involved is 240,000 square feet.

In 1929 improvements were undertaken in this area, including wharf improvements and provision for the construction of a grain elevator. An additional expenditure was then made for elevator foundations on the Grand Quai and for wharfage adjoining the elevator in the Lanctot basin. A fair apportionment of the cost of these improvements chargeable to the elevator would appear to be as follows:

Proportion of cost of original structure 63,000 x $1.13	$ 71,190 00
Cost of land occupied (lot 11) 45,675 sq. ft. at 46 cents	21,010 50
Cost of land occupied (lot 10) 17,325 sq. ft. at 30.5 cents	5,301 45
Cost of foundation	168,724 85
Cost of 225 ft. of improvements— 225 x $245	55,125 00
Trackage area	7,467 20
Total	$ 328,819 00

An order in council, P.C. 609 was passed on April 10, 1929, on the recommendation of the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. P. J. A. Cardin) authorizing a lease to the Engineering Projects Limited of Toronto of a site for a grain elevator on the following terms and conditions:

(a) that a twenty-one year lease of the area marked "A" on the plan attached hereto be granted at an annual rental of $6,000. This lease to be renewable for two further like periods at an annual rental of not less than $6,000 to be agreed upon, provided that the government may at the expiration of any 21 year period acquire the elevator at a price to be determined by arbitration.

(b) that the applicants be given a five year option for a lease under terms to be agreed upon of the area marked "B" on the plan attached hereto: and

(c) that the applicants be given a ten year option for a lease under terms to be agreed upon of the area marked "C" on the plan attached hereto.

Area "A" comprises 63,000 sq. ft.
Area "B" comprises 57,680 sq. ft., and Area "C" comprises 57,680 sq. ft.

This lease was subsequently assigned to the North American Elevators Limited, on April 24, 1929.

The total expenditure for harbour improvements at Sorel since confederation including all construction, dredging and repairs is $2,460,574.42.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Yesterday in giving an indication of the business before the house he said:

The redistribution bill will be proceeded with, and I think every reasonable effort is being made to expedite the work of that committee, at least that is my advice in that regard.

As I am advised, the representative of the opposition from the province of Quebec on that committee has not yet received any plan or proposal with regard to the province, in fact no work has been done at all as far as the province of Quebec is concerned. As the committee was appointed in November, and we are to-day on the 23rd of March, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he would not see to it that the work is expedited as far as the province of Quebec is concerned.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thank you.

WESTERN GRAIN RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) if he will be kind enough to use his influence to compel or induce the railway companies to put into effect the low rate on grain to British Columbia? The agreement is only for a year, and five weeks have gone, and I get letters from British Columbia dated five days ago to say that the rate is not available to them now.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): The hon. gentleman was good enough to mention this to me this morning, and I made inquiry. I am advised that the rate has been in effect since March 10, and that it is effective until March 9, next year. This statement is given to me by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. NEILL: This letter is dated the 18th, and they say they can get no rate.

Mr. MANION: I will make further inquiry.

PENSIONERS IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to inquire of the government if representations have been received by the Department of Pensions and National Health with regard to alleged conditions of starvation among the underpaid or low rate pensioners in Montreal and with regard to their eviction from their homes. If such representations have been received what action does the government propose to take?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I regret very much that my hon. friend spoke in such a way that I could not catch the full effect of what he was saying. I think perhaps the question had better stand until to-morrow so that I may read it in Hansard, unless the hon. member wishes to repeat his question.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would prefer to give the minister time to gather the facts, so I will allow the question to stand as notice.

VISITING COMMONWEALTH FORCES

The house resumed from Monday, March 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. 40, respecting visiting forces of His Majesty, and the exercise of command, discipline and attachments of commonwealth forces when serving together—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, this bill was partly proceeded with at the last sitting, during which the right hon. leader of the opposition raised certain questions which I indicated I would investigate in order to be in a position to answer at the next sitting. I have discussed these questions with the legal adviser of the Department of External Affairs in the interval. The only copy of the British bill in our possession is the one in the files, which I will now hand to the right hon. gentleman so that he may look it over. My information is that this bill has been passed, and that a bill in similar terms has been passed in South Africa as well. I observe from the debates in the British house that Sir Boyd Merriman, solicitor general, declined to make certain changes suggested because he said the bill had been agreed upon and had been enacted already in South Africa. In the House of Lords certain objections were taken as to the effect of the legislation being to deprive the British courts of jurisdiction which they had always asserted, but the House of Lords did not feel disposed to make the amendment suggested, and it stands in the form in which it appears in this bill.

I think the observations made by the right hon. gentleman the other day as to the preamble are not wholly without some merit, and in order that there may be no misapprehension I propose to move in amendment that the title be struck out and that the title of the bill be:

An act to make provision with respect to forces of His Majesty from other parts of the British commonwealth or from a colony when visiting the Dominion of Canada; and with respect to the exercise of command and discipline when forces of His Majesty from different parts of the commonwealth are serving together; and with respect to the attachment of members of one such force to another such force, and with respect to deserters from such forces.

I propose that this be made the long title of the bill, there being a short title within the statute itself, and that the preamble be eliminated.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What will be the short title?

Mr. BENNETT: The short title is contained in section 1 of the bill; The Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933. I think that meets the difficulty in that regard. Perhaps I might refer to the objections which were taken before we go on to consider them in detail. I think the objection taken as to the minister being the authority to take action is well founded; I believe that in a country such as this it is desirable that the governor in council rather than the minister should assume the responsibility, so I propose to move an amendment in that sense to the various sections of the bill in which the word occurs. Of course the next amendment that would take place would insert the words "His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada enacts as follows:"

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry I was not here when the matter was discussed previously, but would the Prime Minister say whether there is any change in the situation as it previously existed except that instead of being governed by an Imperial statute the matter will be dealt with by a Canadian statute? Will it be the same thing in effect as a result of this legislation or are there changes in the situation?

Mr. BENNETT: There are a few minor changes, with respect to visiting forces, dealing with points that were not adequately covered by any existing legislation, but the general principles of discipline, which as the hon. gentleman knows the provisions of the Army Act extended to every part of the empire, are adopted. This bill makes no change except that it makes clear beyond peradventure that the courts of this country would be the courts to which application for habeas corpus would be made in the event of any action being taken in consequence of a military decision. That position was challenged in the House of Lords, as I have said, and a discussion took place between Lord Hailsham, Lord Buckmaster and others, but in the end the section stood in the form in which it now appears.

There is one other matter to which I think attention should be directed. It was thought by the right hon. leader of the opposition the other day that possibly the last section effected some change in existing conditions. That is not intended, and I think in fact no change has been made. It became clear that the provisions of the act of 1911, which was passed by the Imperial parliament after the 1911 conference in connection with the government of naval forces, extended to every part of the empire, but of course it is competent for the parliament of any dominion to enact its own code. Until that is done, however, this act saves that power and makes it clear that there is no interference with the provisions of the statute as it stands.

I think those were the points to which attention was directed, and I would make the motion as to the cutting out of the preamble and making it part of the title of the bill, rather than an operative part of the act.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I would direct the right hon. gentleman's attention to rule 76, which provides that any change in the title of a bill must be taken up last.

Mr. BENNETT: I know, but this merely substitutes the preamble for the title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot see just what difference the change is going to make in the actual effect of the bill. It seems to me that all the Prime Minister is doing is to give the bill the preamble as a name, and strike out the preamble.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So that we are really not changing the provisions in any particular.

Mr. BENNETT: But the effect is considerable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to make it clear that as to the actual provisions of the bill they will not be affected one way or the other.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has indicated that he thinks it would be advisable to substitute "the governor in council" for "the Minister of Defence" with respect to certain powers given particularly, I believe, under section 6 of the bill. As I previously said, I believe that is a desirable change and I am glad the Prime Minister is of that view.

Mr. BENNETT: It is subsection 2 of section 6.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. May I return now to the point I raised at the outset, which in effect was this. I gathered at the time the bill was introduced that the Prime Minister was of the opinion that it related solely to forces from other parts of the empire visiting Canada, and what should be done with respect to command and control while they were here. I pointed out at the time that I believed the bill went further and that it had relation as well to forces from Canada which might be in Great Britain and might be sought for service together with the forces of Great Britain or those of other parts of the empire, at a time of war; in other words, that the measure was a war as well as a peace measure. I still entertain that view. The difference at the moment is that whereas under the act as it now reads the Minister of National Defence in Canada would have power to place certain forces under a single command in Great Britain, if he so desired, that power, when the Prime Minister's amendment is accepted, will reside in the governor in council. I still think there is some slight risk being run in leaving that power even with the governor in council unless it is very clearly understood that the policy with respect to having forces of Canada serve abroad will be that they shall be placed for service abroad only after this parliament has sanctioned their going abroad for the purpose of service. There is nothing in the law as it stands to-day which says that parliament must be convened in the first instance, but I think the Prime Minister made it clear that so far as he is concerned he would feel that parliament should be called in the first instance. There is nothing in this legislation, however, to necessitate that.

May I point out by way of a concrete instance exactly what I have in mind. In 1922 the government of this country was asked by the British government whether we would send a contingent to participate with the British forces in the near east in an effort to withstand aggression of the Turks upon Europe. The Liberal government of the day took the view that parliament should be called in the first instance and that its consent would have to be obtained before any forces should be permitted to go abroad to serve in conjunction with other military forces. We were criticized in some quarters for taking that view. We were told that instead of replying that parliament should be called in the first instance and give its consent, we should have said "Ready, aye, ready" and placed our forces immediately at the disposition of the British government along with other British forces. If that "Ready, aye, ready" view were accepted there would be power under the legislation we are now enacting for the governor in council to place Canadian forces at the disposition of His Majesty's government in Great Britain and under a single command in Great Britain before the parliament of Canada might have any say in the matter at all.

That is the feature which I wished if possible to guard against, and to guard against in this legislation. There is apparently no difference of view between the Prime Minister and myself as to the desirability of calling parliament in the first instance, but I think it would strengthen the position with relation to subsequent parliaments if we made quite clear that parliament itself should decide in the first instance upon the disposition of Canadian forces, where that involves their being placed under single command for service in other parts of the empire or of the world.

Mr. BENNETT: I asked the legal adviser of the Department of External Affairs, without reference to myself, to prepare a statement of what he conceived to be the correct position of the matter from the point of view of a lawyer, after he had looked through the discussion at the last sitting, and perhaps the right hon. gentleman will let me read these words:

> Mr. King was evidently under the impression that this clause enabled the Minister of National Defence to send a detachment from Canada in case of war, without the authority either of council or of parliament. The object of the clause is solely to make possible the interchange of officers and other ranks that has been the practice for many years. Legally, it would not authorize the sending of a detachment, and it would not authorize the sending of individuals to become a detachment or unit after they had gone to the other part of the commonwealth. The object of the clause, together with the following subsection is to enable an officer from the United Kingdom, when on temporary service in Canada, to carry on his duties. Without this section, it would be necessary to recommission him; otherwise, if he gave an order to a subordinate officer or other rank, there would be no legal obligation to obey the order.

It is quite clear that you would have to send a number of individuals, sufficient to constitute a detachment to be attached to the force abroad, to meet the case which the right hon. gentleman suggests. This statute is prepared for one purpose and one purpose only; that is, to enable individuals that are attached to the forces of the United Kingdom or of one of the other dominions to be properly governed without being re-commissioned. That was the understanding I had of the matter, but I felt there might be some doubt and I asked for a memorandum. I make this statement to the right hon. gentleman as frankly as possible because the legal adviser was of the opinion that it would not be possible for them to become a detachment after they had gone. He says:

> It would not authorize the sending of individuals to become a detachment or unit after they had gone to the other part of the commonwealth.

Further, he makes this statement:

> In one sense it is true to say that the provision would govern war conditions. When forces are cooperating in time of war, it is necessary to make temporary attachments occasionally. For example, I remember when I was serving in France, an English officer was attached for instructional purposes to our battery. Without such a provision, it would be legally impossible for an officer in his position to carry on during his temporary period of attachment.

I think that is reasonably clear. If the statute were one not agreed upon there might be some reason why the language might be clarified, were there any doubt about it. But I put this to the right hon. gentleman. It is quite clear that under no circumstances, as the law now stands, could we dispatch from this country any substantial number of men if we desired to do so because, as I have said, the statute now calls for parliament to meet in fifteen days after the country is at war, and I certainly agree that it would be impossible to send from this country any substantial number of troops under the appropriations as we now have them, without a governor general's warrant; and I cannot conceive of a government asking for a warrant and calling parliament together, as it must, within fifteen days from the date of hostilities or declaration of war. So that I do not think there is the slightest danger of any difficulty arising from the passing of this statute or in connection with its provisions. But in view of our commitments in 1929, followed by the resolutions of 1930 and the agreement arrived at with respect to the statute in the present form, I can only say that in my opinion we are in honour bound to enact the measure as they have done in South Africa and the United Kingdom. If there is the slightest likelihood of any difficulty, such as that to which the right hon. genleman has alluded, we can take the appropriate steps to provide against it. I would hesitate to accept the responsibility of making any substantial amendment to what has been agreed upon. The reasons are so apparent that it is almost unnecessary to state them. Sir Boyd Merriman made it clear in the British House of Commons that he could not take the responsibility of making an amendment to what had been agreed upon and enacted by one of the commonwealth parliaments, namely, that of South Africa. I regret that there is not a copy of the South African bill available. The only bill I have is the one I have just handed to the right hon. gentleman which is similar in terms, subject to the changes which had to be made as compared with the provisions governing the United Kingdom.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What the Prime Minister has said serves to meet in large part what I have in mind. I have no desire to embarrass the administration with respect to any obligation they may have with any other government of the empire, but I do want to safeguard against any unforeseen contingency which may arise sometime hence. I have in mind the Chanak incident which arose in 1922 when New Zealand and Australia were asked if they would place their naval services at the disposition of the empire in the near east. Before we in Canada even received the invitation from the government of Great Britain to participate in that particular matter, it was announced that the governments of New Zealand and Australia, either or both, I don't remember which, had placed their naval services at the disposition of the British government. Had we agreed to do the same, who can say what might have resulted? Canada's action steadied the situation. My feeling is that under this legislation power will be vested in the governor in council to place, for example, our naval services at the disposition of the British government and that for sometime before parliament can meet. It might well be that a regiment such as the Princess Patricia Canadian Light Infantry could be dispatched and sent overseas to be placed under a single command in Britain or in some other part of the empire before parliament could meet. From what the Prime Minister has said and from the legal opinion he has quoted, I know that such is not the object of this legislation, but nevertheless, this statute might provide the means whereby at some future time in a moment of excitement an object of that kind could be served. Having brought out this point, and having received such an emphatic and clear declaration from the Prime Minister as to the purpose of the bill, I need, perhaps, not say anything further.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the observations made by the right hon. gentleman, perhaps it might be desirable after the enactment of this legislation that I should communicate through the appropriate channels with the authorities in the other commonwealths and suggest that we desire to add to our bill at another session the following words:

Nothing in this bill contained shall be taken or construed as authorizing the dispatch of any forces from Canada in time of war otherwise than is provided by the laws of the dominion.

If the hon. gentleman thinks it desirable, I shall be glad to take up the matter with the proper authorities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would be most proper if the right hon. gentleman would do that and though it would not alter the provisions of the act, having in mind what he has said apart therefrom, I thank him for making the suggestion. I am sure it will meet with approval from all sides.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that sections 1, 3, 4, 5 and 7 have been passed. We are now on section 2.

On section 2—Definitions.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I would direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the words "order in council" which appears in his bill. This is more or less of a military bill and I think the words "general order" should be used. In every other bill of a military character the words "general order" are used instead of "order in council," both having the same force.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite appreciate the point raised by the hon. gentleman but this is a civilian bill. The governor in council, that is, the government of the day, is the authority and the bill refers to a civil order in council and not a general order by the military arm of government. While I am on my feet I think I should say to the right hon. gentleman that the rules of government with respect to naval and military forces are entirely different. He will recall the provisions of the Imperial statute of 1911 which, until we have formulated our own regulations, makes entirely different the government of the naval and military arms.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Application of section.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to move that subsection 2 of section 6 be amended by striking out all the words after the word "the" in the first line of the subsection and substituting therefor the words "governor in council."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to move that subsection 5 of section 6 be amended by striking out the words "Minister of National Defence" in the fourth line of the subsection and substituting therefor the words "governor in council."

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is the paragraph I had in mind. I think the words "general order" should appear instead of "order in council."

Mr. BENNETT: Under this section we are taking power away from the Minister of National Defence and putting it in the hands of the governor in council.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do the words "may be prescribed by regulations made by His Majesty" mean His Majesty as advised by the government of Great Britain, by the government of Canada or by the government in the part of the empire in which the forces may be?

Mr. BENNETT: That means His Majesty's government in the dominion that may be affected. I felt fairly certain about it the other evening, but I consulted the authorities and it seems to be quite clear. Perhaps I will state it again: As His Majesty's advisers in several dominions are affected, they must agree in order that any action may be taken. Hence it is not His Majesty in Canada or in Australia, but His Majesty who is common sovereign of all the commonwealths affected.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 8 has not yet been passed.

On section 8—Saving for other enactments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the meaning of the words:

Shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of such of the provisions of any act.

Mr. BENNETT: The other day I endeavoured to explain that the statute of 1911 passed by the Imperial parliament, which was a statute with respect to the navies of all the commonwealths, agreed to after the Imperial conference of that year, lays down certain rules for the government of those navies. This measure may be taken to modify to some extent that statute and the rules under it, so that it is to be taken in addition to that statute and not in derogation of anything therein contained, that is contained in the act of 1911.

With respect to the point raised by the hon. member for Rimouski, I desire to point out that the memorandum which I secured from the legal advisers of the department, and which is in accordance with my view with respect to the matter, reads as follows:

With regard to the suggestion concerning the use of the term "His Majesty" in clause (b) and in subsection (5), it is necessary to point out that, as a result of the resolutions of the Imperial conference in 1926, His Majesty will not act in a matter that concerns Canada, without the advice of his Canadian ministers. This matter concerns two or more parts of the British Empire, and the section compels the cooperating governments to agree in the advice given to the crown for the purpose of appointing the commander.

Therefore it is His Majesty as the common sovereign of all.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The only reason I called attention to the matter is that the Prime Minister has used those words at the end of section 2, paragraph (h): "His Majesty's government in Canada."

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it is His Majesty's government in Canada in that instance, but in the other it is the co-ordinating governments that are concerned; that is the government of the country to which the visitors came as well as the government of the country from which they had gone. His Majesty must act with the united advice of his advisers from both countries, so that you have a double check as to the question of there being unanimity of opinion as to any action that thus may be taken.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I thought it was an error.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be necessary to revert to the preamble.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): There is an amendment that the bill be amended by striking out the long title thereof and substituting therefor the part which is the preamble to the present bill.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason that was done was rather because of the suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman opposite. His colleague sitting beside him will at once inform him that as a matter of law there is a difference between putting certain words into the title and having them in the preamble of the bill. We are taking them out of the preamble, lest they be taken to have some force of enactment, and making them part of the title of the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: There is the further amendment by striking out the words of the preamble of the said bill and substituting therefor the following:

His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, enacts as follows:

Amendment agreed to.

Preamble as amended agreed to.

Bill as amended reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read the third time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not expect to have to object in any way to the third reading, but I should like before third reading to look over this British act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the house.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

JURISDICTION RESPECTING VISITING COMMONWEALTH FORCES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 44, to amend the Exchequer Court Act (exclusive jurisdiction).

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUATION FOR ONE YEAR OF PROVISIONS OF RELIEF ACT, 1932

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 55, respecting relief measures.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house has discussed the provisions of this measure at such length on the resolution that preceded it that I shall not take up more than a few minutes in restating our position with respect to the principle involved as we are considering it on the second reading. In a word, we are opposed to the measure now before us because in our opinion it is the negation of government by parliament. It is that in its two outstanding particulars. In the first place, it gives to the administration a blank cheque, the right to draw out of the consolidated fund of Canada unlimited amounts of money for any purpose whatever so long as the purpose may be said to be that of assisting in the relief of unemployment. As to how widely that power may be used, we had evidence yesterday after the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in listening to the interpretation placed by the administration upon the provisions of this bill in reference thereto. In introducing his budget, the Minister of Finance stated that there was to be created a stabilization fund in connection with certain agricultural products. It really is in the nature of a provision to subsidize the export of certain commodities from Canada to Great Britain. One would have felt that if such were the policy of the administration, the government, proceeding in the regular manner, would have brought in a bill for that purpose and made provision therefor, but we were told that the provision for that particular purpose was to be found in moneys that were being voted for purposes of unemployment relief. That certainly is not in accordance with parliamentary practice, nor is it constitutionally right. I do not see how we can approve the principle of a measure which permits a government to go that length. If a step of that kind can be taken with respect to subsidies, in matters of trade, it can be taken for almost any purpose for which the government may wish to use it. It will be seen that in such cases there is no control by parliament in any way over expenditure.

It has been shown also that when the government had this power before, it placed orders for a million and some odd dollars worth of railway ties which were not required by the railways, and that this amount was charged up to the relief of the unemployed, although as a matter of fact the unemployed came in for a very small proportion of the money spent in that way. To give to the government that unlimited power in the use of public moneys is simply to help create debts which it will take years and years for this country to meet. I think people have discovered by the proposals brought down in yesterday's budget that they are going to have to pay pretty heavily for expenditures being made at this time. The increased taxes are going to hit the average citizen throughout Canada fairly hard. That is something which the people at the moment are feeling very keenly. But they should realize that every time this parliament parts with its control over expenditures and gives the government the right to draw whatever moneys it pleases out of the exchequer on blanket authority, they are only helping to place a greater burden upon themselves with respect to taxation. In our desire to limit taxation as much as possible, we feel that we should very strongly maintain the control which ordinary parliamentary procedure would demand in these matters, and oppose whatever destroys that control.

In saying what I do may I again make perfectly clear that we on this side are prepared, as we have been all along, to vote for purposes of unemployment relief whatever moneys the ministry may decide to be necessary, so long as those amounts are named, their purposes specified and some substantial reason for what is proposed given to the house. So our objection to the second reading is in no way based on a desire not to do all that may be possible to cooperate with the government in a regular manner in providing what funds may be necessary for unemployment relief.

Our second objection to the measure, and it is one that has arisen since the resolution was originally introduced, comes out of the amendment made when the resolution was before the house in committee, the amendment giving to the government of the day power by order in council to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government. As has been stated over and over again, an authority as broad as that enables the government to legislate simply by act of the governor in council on almost anything at all upon which it may wish to legislate. When the British North America Act was passed, the power to legislate was placed not in the executive nor in the judiciary, but in parliament as represented by this House of Commons and the Senate and His Majesty's representative in this country, and we cannot for one minute countenance the transference of that power from parliament to the governor in council as is proposed to be done under this measure.

May I add that, in the light of the discussion that has taken place on the measure, there is a further reason why we should not countenance it. It has been stated from this side, and I think hon. members of the house as a whole believe, that the government has under the statutes as they exist to-day all the power that it needs to deal with any situation that may arise. The provisions in this bill itself are very broad. They give to the government all the power that is needed certainly to deal with any questions of unemployment; they give all the power that is necessary to deal with any emergency in the nature of a financial crisis or panic, or even an insurrection, and that being so we see no reason why the government should seek this further authority of the right to enact notwithstanding all existing legislation, whatever measures it pleases by order in council so long as that legislation may be designated as coming under the heading of peace, order and good government.

Objecting to the measure on both those scores, the blank cheque, on the one hand, and the blanket authority to legislate, on the other, we feel that this measure, as I have said, is the negation of government by parliament, and as such we are strongly opposed to the second reading of the bill.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Gordon) which was agreed to on the following division:

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) professed to be surprised the other day about certain facts that I submitted to the house. I quoted opinions expressed by His Excellency Monseigneur Ross, Bishop of Gaspé, by His Excellency Monseigneur Lapointe, honorary vicar-general of Chicoutimi, and by leaders of the church and state. What I said was what has also been said by many people. They were humble suggestions offered to the house and to the country with regard to colonization. The hon. gentleman told me that I had made an impeachment against my own province, the province of Quebec, which I love, and my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) asked me for more details. I have given ample notice and warning of what I intend to do. I did so on March 2 when I spoke of generalities. I did so last Monday, going a little more thoroughly into the matter, but to-day at the request of the Minister of Labour and my hon. friend from Bellechasse I will give more precise details. I will ask my hon. friend the Minister of Labour to listen to what I am going to say, and I am very sorry that the hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) is not in the house at the present time. I will tell you something about la Rivière Solitaire—and mark you, Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking against my own province, I am speaking on behalf of my own province and on behalf of my own fellow citizens who are there in the midst of the wilderness and whom I wish to defend in this house. I do not care about the insinuations that may be made against me concerning it by any one in this house.

This week there appeared in Le Devoir, of Montreal, an article signed by Mr. Rioux, the president of the Catholic Union of Farmers of the province of Quebec, mentioning the fact that the Rivière Solitaire is twenty miles from the railway. And may I take this opportunity to thank the press of my country, and all the dailies and weeklies, especially the great and well-known daily of Montreal, La Presse, which published an excellent three column report of my speech of Monday last. The attention of the public should be drawn to a subject which is of the utmost importance for all this country. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour should know more about Rivière Solitaire because it is hundreds of miles from Rivière du Loup but only about eighty miles northeast of Haileybury. It is on the Perrault highway, a good road in the summer time but in winter time inaccessible. Since September last 2,800 settlers, I mean men, women and children, have been living there. Some have settled along the highways; others are some distance from the highways with no roads leading to their camps. They must travel over stumps and through the trees and bush, and many of those people have no means of locomotion. They receive $600 in all, $200 from the federal government, $200 from the provincial government and $200 from the municipality. In most cases that amount has been nearly all spent for travelling expenses and for the construction of camps and so on; almost nothing is left now. These people are wondering how they are to live when this $600 is all gone.

These families are about twenty miles from Rouyn. In that town there are some doctors who are employed by the mining companies, but in this settlement there is no doctor and only one nurse, a young woman. She is full of heroism and devotion to the people; she looks after them as best she can in that vast area. It is very hard there for a young woman; in the winter time she has to travel in a covered wagon in which there is a stove, and she must go many miles in order to help those who are in need. There has been an epidemic of itch. The heads of those families in the main are young people of from twenty-five to forty, and there is the question of children. I believe some sixty or eighty babies are expected by the middle of April, and who is to take care of them? No doctor from Rouyn can go there, so it all depends on one young girl. I am sorry to see that the minister is laughing. I am not laughing at all; I am very serious. The minister has a good heart; he knows that I am not making these remarks for any personal reason. I am interested in the health and welfare of these people. This settlement is not far from where the minister lives, and he can verify what I say.

These families are away in the midst of a wilderness, and I say it would have been much more sensible if they had been placed on the farms which are for sale in the old parishes. In the second place I submit that a medical attendant should be sent there at once. If a man takes the risk of a long aeroplane journey and loses his way the papers are full of it and no government refuses to spend hundreds and perhaps thousands of dollars to search for him. Only one human life is concerned in that case, but here we are considering hundreds of human lives that are endangered. Those camps are surrounded now by snow and in the spring there will be slush and mud, and these people will not be able to leave the camps. The melting snow and ice and mud surrounding them will be a source of contamination and disease, and when that has dried up they will be exposed to forest fires. If there should be a fire after the snow goes, those men, women and children would all be burned to death just as those poor girls were burned in Hull some days ago. I do not wish to cast any slur upon anyone; I am discussing this matter because I want someone to go at once to the rescue of those people. They are entitled to medical attention. Certainly if the Minister of Labour has listened to my remarks, if the Minister of Health reads Hansard to-morrow and if the Minister of Colonization of Quebec sees what I have said they must agree that a government that can spend so much money to look after those who take the risk of long aeroplane trips can afford to spend a few hundred dollars each month in order that these people may receive the medical attention and care to which they are entitled. I say it is a mistake that this has not been done. If the work had been in charge of a private organization that organization would have provided a doctor to look after that large number of people. That is done by the lumber companies, who employ only men, but here we have a situation much more serious because it involves women and children as well. I think it is time something was done in this regard. I hope the minister will take what I have said into consideration and that he will not dare suggest that my remarks in this house on behalf of my own people are an impeachment against my own province.

Mr. GORDON: I am sure the committee now understands that the administration and the selection of the locations where these colonists are settled is entirely under the control of the province. There is a committee upon which the Canadian National Railways, in the section to which reference has been made, is represented by Mr. Laforce, who acts under Doctor W. J. Black. I do know very well the section of country to which the hon. member for Témiscouata has made reference; I do not say this by way of complaint, but I am sure the hon. member has never been anywhere near that district or he could not have made the statements he has made.

Mr. POULIOT: I would say that I know it better than the minister does.

Mr. GORDON: Perhaps so, but my hon. friend would have to know it very well indeed. In order that the observations of the hon. member for Témiscouata may not go abroad unchallenged and bring about fears and anxieties which I do not think should result from the efforts that have been made I must take the time of the committee to read the report made by Mr. Laforce on this very locality to which reference has been made. I will hurry through this report as rapidly as possible. It is directed to Doctor W. J. Black, Canadian National Railways, Montreal, under date of March 10, 1933, and is as follows:

As requested, I am giving you a summary report of the activities of the back to the land movement in the province of Quebec during the year 1932. During the year 523 families were accepted by the committee, and have been established mostly in Temiskaming and Abitibi districts. The selection of these families was conducted with as much care as was possible. After interviewing the future settlers, recommendations were requested from parish priests, religious ministers, aldermen of the wards in which the settlers resided, and from charitable institutions or associations which were assisting them.

This information was then submitted to the municipal council and afterwards to the back to the land committee. A few errors may have been made, but very few.

Each group of settlers was accompanied in order that they might not meet with difficulty. The family heads—

Remember that the heads of families, the fathers, preceded the women and children.

—who went to Abitibi, for example, upon reaching Amos—

Amos is on the Canadian National Railways in Quebec.

—were received by Mr. V. Villeneuve, escorted to an "accommodation house" where they spent the night, and the following morning were conducted to the settlement where they chose their lots. Generally about two days after their arrival they were starting to build a temporary shelter which permitted them to remain on the lots whilst putting up their camp. These camps were mostly built of logs, squared inside.

To hon. gentlemen who have no experience of pioneer colonization in this part of northern Canada I may explain that a house of logs is the first house which the settler invariably builds where timber is so plentiful.

It was understood that the floors were to be made of planed planks, tongued and grooved. The house was to be fitted with windows in order that it may be well lighted, and was to be one and one-half stories high, with room in the top part. The necessary lumber for floors and roof was brought to a central place where a general store also was put up, the operation of which is under the effective supervision of the government.

That is the Quebec government.

After the houses or camps were constructed, and then only, the families left for their new homes. Special cars (colonists) were placed at the disposal of these families. These cars were well ventilated, and all precautions were taken to see that the families met with the least possible difficulties. Each group was accompanied. On their arrival in Abitibi the families would get off the Canadian National Railway train and get on another train made of small houses on sleighs which were drawn by a tractor. Eighty persons could sit in two of these houses and be comfortable. On a third sleigh was the baggage, and then this new train left for the colony. These houses on sleighs were well lighted, supplied with fresh water, hammocks had been set up to permit the babies to sleep, and even a toilet room had been fitted out.

As you see the persons were treated with care. Land of the highest quality was selected for them in districts where the clearing is rather easy, not far from the railroad; another advantage offered in the districts where settlers were established in Abitibi is their proximity to the mining centres. The demands from these enterprises will supply the settlers with a ready market for all they are able to grow.

One of the factors that contributed most to the success of the back to the land movement in Quebec in 1932 was that in each of the colonies a minister of the religion actively occupied himself to assist the settlers, to encourage them, and direct them.

To demonstrate how well satisfied the settlers are, permit me to give you below extracts from some of the letters we have received from new settlers of the district.

Perhaps it is unwise to give the names of these people settled on these lands, but I presume that those who write these letters would not object. I may add that these people are settled in communities and not scattered here and there through the wilderness.

Mr. Joseph Pichette, for example, who has selected a lot in the Villemontel township, writing to his brother, states: "If I have delayed writing to you it is because we have had much work to do. We have built our camp, and everything goes well. I have a very nice piece of land, good soil, easy to clear. I am happy and satisfied with my lot, and so are the others."

Mrs. Paquin (a widow) writes to her daughter in the following terms: "Here everything goes smoothly. We are well treated, but we must take care not to squander, and work with intelligence. We cannot ask for anything better. Those who are criticizing would like us to be treated as though we were rich, and doing nothing. We have everything we need."

Another, Mr. Wilfrid Richard, who settled at LaMotte, writes us as follows: "I assure you that we are happy. My camp is 24 x 25 inside, with 7 rooms, 1½ storeys high. While I am writing you my son is making a cupboard. We have put up a little stable 12 feet square, temporarily for this winter. My son in law, Raoul Robidoux (another back to the lander) is living with us. He is well satisfied and much encouraged."

Mr. Ephrem Larivieres, located in the Villemontel township, states: "I have a very fine lot and am satisfied with my present situation. We have been well treated and those who, through newspapers or elsewhere are complaining, are wrong." He adds: "They are shamelessly lying."

Mrs. Jean Gaumont, of Villemontel, writing to a relative, expresses herself as follows: "I am very happy. I have made a beautiful trip; we made a joyous voyage, and still more happy to be here. You should see how nice it is. My husband has a good lot. He has put up a log camp, the joints of which have been packed with straw and moss.

That is the usual method of chinking-up a log cabin.

These things are so new to me that I spend my time laughing. I like it so much that I would not return to Montreal."

Mr. Joseph Bellemare, who in the name of a group of fourteen families who have selected the district of Authier to establish themselves, writes to us under date of December 28, stating: "I wish to thank you most sincerely in my own name and that of the group, for sending us to such a good country."

Another settler of Villemontel, Mr. Joseph Dulude, writes: "I have had all the time necessary to look over the district and take information. From my little inquest I have come to the conclusion that in my case, and the experience I have with things of the land, being a farmer's son, I have every reason to believe that here I will succeed."

Mr. Joseph Lamothe, on January 29, writes: "I am writing these few words to let you know how we are, as well as my father in law, Mr. Ed. McCrea (another back to the lander). I want to tell you that we are all very satisfied to be in Abitibi. . . ."

Mr. Joseph Lambert, on December 12, wrote the following: "Just a few lines to let you know we are getting settled in our new home fine, with which my wife and I are very much satisfied. Both my wife and I sincerely thank you for your trouble in getting us settled on a good farm on the highway, which we believe in a few years will mean good to us."

From the same place, Mr. Euge Therrien, veteran, writes: "To my knowledge all the settlers in the double range VI-VII are in perfect health and everyone has completed his camp, and to my information are all well satisfied with their lots, and as to myself I thank you gratefully."

Mr. Joseph Gingras writes: "We are very happy to be here, nobody is lonesome, and I can assure you, as far as I am concerned, it is the best move I have made in coming here. I have a very nice lot, half made, fire burnt everything.

He means the bush fires.

I have about twenty-five acres cleared around my camp, ready for seeding in the spring. I built a good camp. We call it a camp, but it is more like a house. I built 25 feet long by 22 feet wide, with a pointed roof, which makes two storeys. I made four rooms upstairs and two downstairs. We are better lodged than we were in Montreal. I dug a cellar, deep enough to walk in. I am two miles from the general store, it is not far, and when the church is constructed it will be near there. The road to the mines also passes that point. I am very confident that within a short while, without being very rich, we will be in a position to live without anxiety for the future."

Mr. Auguste Barbotin on the 18th of January writes: "We are all well satisfied with being here. We have had our first mission service this morning in front of my camp. It was very impressing." This Mr. Barbotin also wrote to the Travellers' Association, expressing his satisfaction, which letter was published in the newspaper "Le Devoir."

From another district where families were established, Belcourt, Mr. Ferdinand Lupien declares, in a letter, that he is much pleased with his present situation. Other settlers from the same district also wrote to us thanking us for what we did for them.

Mr. A. Gagnon, from Uniacke, wrote us on the 18th of January: "I left Montreal on the 3rd of October to come to Uniacke to establish myself on a colonization lot as settler, and with the idea of remaining here. I cannot let this occasion go by that presents itself to me to-day without taking advantage of it, and from the bottom of my heart offer you my sincere thanks, feeling that if I am here to-day I must be thankful to you. . . . ."

Mr. Joseph Camirand, of Villemontel also, wrote to the St. Vincent de Paul Society to thank them, in which letter he says: ". . . have arrived safely and have put up my camp. I am very much satisfied with my lot and hope it will never be necessary for me to go back to the city of Montreal."

Everyone of these persons left during last fall to settle in Abitibi and declare they are satisfied, not only with the manner in which they have been treated by the C.N.R., but also of the way in which they have been treated since settlement, because they have been given first class land, and care was taken for their establishment in a good district.

J. E. Laforce,
General Agent.

These reports are indicative of those we have received from the committee and the other agencies which are working, not to solve unemployment but to offer an opportunity to people who are ready, willing and able to place themselves or be placed in a position where they may be self-sustaining.

Hon. members will recall that not so many years ago Mr. David Lloyd George stated that the land was not playing the part it should at that time, and not so many days ago the President of the United States made reference to the same thing. I feel sure that the hon. member for Témiscouata has not made the investigation he should of the work carried on under the joint auspices of the agencies to which I have referred. I do not charge him for one moment with making statements which he knows are not founded upon fact but I feel sure that he has obtained his information from sources which might be almost looked upon with anxiety.

Mr. POULIOT: The letters which the minister read came mostly from people on the double range, those who have settled on highways. But the case is entirely different with those who have been placed away in the wilderness. I notice that most of the letters read were written just after these people had left the Canadian National agents.

Mr. GORDON: The letters were written in January and February of this year and the people writing them had been upon the land since last fall.

Mr. POULIOT: How many letters did the minister read?

Mr. GORDON: I should say I read twenty.

Mr. POULIOT: Were those letters written by people upon the highways, the double range, or by those who have settled in the midst of the forest?

Mr. GORDON: The descriptions they gave of their locations would indicate that they are from both sections. Being twenty miles from a railway is not an impossible situation for a settler. I know of settlers who opened up the Timiskaming district in Ontario who are to-day prosperous farmers and in full ownership of their locations. Many of these settlers had to carry their provisions upon their backs for over thirty miles, and they did it without complaining. In spite of present conditions these men are very prosperous. With respect to the reference made to women having to ride in covered sleighs containing a stove, I may say that I have done that hundreds of times and I found it quite comfortable. In fact, I have ridden in open sleighs when it was fifty below zero, and I did not freeze to death.

Mr. POULIOT: I submit that reports received from the employees of the government should be received with a grain of salt. The employees in the colonization departments of the Canadian Pacific or Canadian National have to show results in order to retain their jobs when reductions in staff are made. I think the minister should be careful in accepting the statements of such employees. They have to show results and those results are not based upon the selecting of settlers but rather upon the number of settlers placed upon the land, whether or not they possess the necessary qualifications. I have no ulterior motive in bringing up this matter, I did it because I thought it to be my duty. Unpleasant things may be said to me but I do not care. I am doing what my conscience tells me I should do and what I have done has been done as a representative of the people of Canada. Should similar circumstances arise in the future I shall follow a similar course.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister will remember that last year I took objection to the methods adopted in the spending of federal money for unemployment relief in the province of New Brunswick. I instanced a case where the federal government had been committed to an expenditure of some $57,000 for the construction of a power line. I claimed that that was a revenue producing enterprise controlled by the power commission of the province, and therefore the Dominion government money should not be used. Not only was it a revenue producing enterprise, it was a profit producing enterprise. The province of New Brunswick was well able to build the line under the direction of the power commission and thus provide employment for the unemployed.

I have another complaint to register this year, and I should like the minister to give his strict attention. I think it was in 1928 that the legislature of the province of New Brunswick passed an act granting a bonus to farmers who cleared more acres of land than they had previously under cultivation. I think the bonus amounted to $8 or $10 per acre but it did not go to the settlers or colonizers under the old colonization scheme of the province who did not have a title to their lands, it was paid to farmers who had been established a long time and who had from 35 to 125 acres of land already under cultivation. In 1928, 1929 and 1930, the farmers entitled to this bonus received it direct from the provincial government. This scheme was not intended to assist unemployment as there was no unemployment at that time among the farmers. I am informed that the records brought down in the legislature of New Brunswick show that last year some $41,000 was paid out in these bonuses, and that fifty per cent of that amount was paid by the Dominion government. Last year I complained that the federal government was not paying sufficient attention to the methods adopted by the provincial government in the expenditure of relief money, and I make the same complaint to-day. Money paid to the farmers by the province of New Brunswick for clearing extra land should never come out of the relief fund voted by the federal parliament, because those farmers are not unemployed, and this money is not given to them in the way of unemployment relief. They have already large quantities of land under cultivation; they have their crops, their cattle, their horses and their means of living without being helped from the unemployment relief fund. The sum of $20,000 given to the province of New Brunswick to help it to meet its ordinary expenditures should have been expended by it in assisting the unemployed to greater extent. I do not know whether that amount has been paid or not, but I know the information submitted to the provincial legislature only a couple of weeks ago was that they expected to get about $20,000 from the federal government under the Unemployment Relief Act. I protest against this, because the money is going to men who do not deserve it. They are not unemployed; they have every means whereby they can live and live comfortably and we have no right in the federal parliament to vote money that will go to men of that class. I would ask the minister, before that sum is paid to the provincial treasury of New Brunswick, to investigate the matter carefully and I am sure he will find that the statement I make here to-day will be borne out by such an inquiry.

Mr. GORDON: If the money has not been paid, I shall be glad to investigate the matter. That was two years ago, I believe, under the 1931 legislation.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: If the money has not been paid I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me go a point further; If that money has been paid and it is discovered that it has not been given out to deserving parties, I would ask the minister to have it returned to the federal treasury.

Mr. GORDON: Of course, if it is disclosed that any money which was paid to any province, was not utilized by it in accordance with the act, the government would, as it has in a number of other instances, ask for the refund of the money. In certain cases such moneys have been refunded.

Mr. HOWDEN: Regarding the back to the land movement which has received a good deal of consideration by the hon. member for Temiscouata, I should like to say a word. There appears to have been a good deal of difference of opinion as to the value of this movement in Canada at the present time. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that the back to the land movement is the only permanent step that the government has taken so far towards the relief of unemployment and to end the present depression. Inasmuch as I was one of those who early advocated this policy and on the floor of the house entreated the Minister of Labour to extend some consideration to the city of Winnipeg and province of Manitoba in the matter, I am happy to say that in my province to-day we have been able to place around 400 families on the land with entire satisfaction and success. In that number of placements, there have been only two failures, and I think that is a pretty good record. I believe the government is to be commended and congratulated upon the action it took in uniting with the provincial governments to place these families back on the land. I sincerely hope the movement will be continued, because I believe we have room for many thousands of families on the land. If they go upon the land, they can feed themselves. They do not need to take up farms. Considerably smaller plots than have been taken up in the past would, I think, be decidedly more advisable. I sincerely hope the federal government will see its way clear to continue this work and we shall be able to place many more families on the land.

Mr. NEILL: It is not usual to discuss the details of a bill on the title, but if that suits the minister, I suppose it is all right.

Mr. GORDON: It suits me.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask my hon. friend a question. This morning I sent him a copy of a wire I had received from the board of trade of the town of Port Alberni. I shall quote one or two sentences from it so that the minister and the committee may understand the situation. It reads in part as follows:

> Board of trade has wired Premier urging prompt and effective Dominion government action to avert crisis imminent due to decision of all municipalities this province to withdraw all relief as means of forcing issue of respon sibility. We believe full responsibility rests now and always on Ottawa. Municipalities and provincial government obviously financially unable continue relief finance. If relief stops, looting sure to occur here. Merchants cannot finance essential food shipments without relief funds and stocks on island good only for few days. Majority of unemployed loyal and decent but certain proportion await first excuse to institute violent action. We anxiously await assurance that relief payments already too small will not cease even for short time.

What I should like to ask the minister is this: In view of the very definite statement made there and indicated at least in recent dispatches from British Columbia, that the municipalities are proposing, as a means of forcing the issue of responsibility, to withdraw all relief, has he information of that character from any other municipality than the one to which I have referred?

Mr. GORDON: I have no information from any municipality indicating the condition outlined. Even if I had, we obviously, as has been stated and restated, can and will act only upon the recommendation of the provincial authorities. If we did otherwise, endless confusion would result and of course I do not think we have any authority to go into a province and take over these matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister received any information as regards the situation in Vancouver about which I spoke in the house last Friday?

Mr. GORDON: Nothing.

Mr. NEILL: While I admit, on the face of the matter, so to speak, the party with which the Dominion government deals is the province, I do not think that is a sufficient argument in every possible contingency. Is the minister going to sit down under a very definite statement that looting is imminent in British Columbia, saying that he is going to wait until it happens? I would not like to be offensive, so I will put the matter in this way: He has some idea of the irresponsibility of the provincial government at the present moment and the way in which it has acted in the past in that regard. I understand this matter originates to some extent in a side issue. What has happened is this: the provincial government is practically bankrupt and it issued a budget by which it takes $650,000 away from the municipal revenues. The council of the whole body of municipalities, not merely this isolated one, got together and threatened—and this appears to be a development of the threat—that they could not go on financing owing to the lack of those funds. They took the attitude: If you are going to so seriously reduce our revenue we will force the issue by stopping relief, and we will put the responsibility for relief up to the province. I suggest that as the minister is informed that there is danger of a situation like that arising, it might be well for him to wire the province and find out from people in whom he has confidence what the situation is.

I have this one further point to make. It may be suggested that it will be time enough to do something by and by. But these people who are now on relief in British Columbia are getting very small sums. It cannot be denied that a single man getting six dollars a month certainly has no reserve left, and that has been going on for a year or two. If these cities are suddenly compelled to stop giving relief, what are these single men to do? As this wire says, there is a certain section of the unemployed who are fomenting trouble. Their ideas are those of the communists, and they are always at the ears and at the elbows of the unemployed men, saying, Why don't you help yourself? The result may be that these really decent men, Canadian citizens, confronted by their wives and children going hungry, will listen to the voice of the communists and go and help themselves. I shudder to think of them taking action of that kind, while the minister takes refuge in the statement that he will wait till it happens and then put the responsibility on the province. A situation did arise some years ago in Victoria which, without going into details, resulted in looting and cost far more in a couple of hours than the whole matter at issue on that occasion. It ran up to hundreds of thousands of dollars for which the city was responsible. Would it not be better for the minister to take steps to inform himself what the situation is? I do not ask him to take my statement, but this wire comes from a reputable board of trade, and it would not be difficult for the minister to inform himself what the situation is, instead of waiting until the troubles happen.

Mr. STEVENS: I think, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps the hon. member is not fair to the Minister of Labour in presenting the case as he has done. The fact is that for many years, under the ordinary system followed in British Columbia, the provincial government has made certain grants out of provincial taxes to municipalities—grants to hospitals, grants towards education and matters of that kind. In more recent years, since government control of liquor has come in, there has been a share of the profits from liquor distributed amongst the municipalities upon the basis of the amount of liquor sold within the municipality, and other matters of that kind. But what this committee must bear in mind is that that is purely a local, ordinary situation, and has nothing to do with relief. It has no relation to relief whatever.

It is quite true that British Columbia, in common with other provinces, the western provinces perhaps more so than parts of eastern Canada, has been confronted with difficult problems in connection with relief. No one questions that at all, and no one other than a person who was completely indifferent to local conditions could do otherwise than feel more or less perturbed about this problem. But it is not fair to say that the province of British Columbia is bankrupt or that the government of British Columbia is wholly indifferent. It is neither fair nor correct to make statements of that kind. The province of British Columbia is not bankrupt. At the same time unquestionably, like many other governments, the government of British Columbia is finding it very difficult to make ends meet with its depleted revenues, and this is not to be wondered at in a province like British Columbia where in years gone by one of the main sources of revenue was the returns from the timber trade, royalties on timber and so forth. Those royalties have fallen off as well as royalties on every other natural resource, and there is no question that the revenues of the province have been very seriously depleted. Nor would I or anyone else hesitate to say that, in the past, in British Columbia, as in all other places, the present government and other governments, have been perhaps unduly extravagant, or to put it in the kindest way, have been perhaps over-optimistic, and expenditures have run into very large figures. But that does not concern this committee dealing with a relief bill. What this committee is concerned about is this: In its administration of the Relief Act is this government dealing reasonably fair with the province of British Columbia as compared with other provinces? That I think is a fair subject for debate. I am quite certain from what I have been able to gather from the Department of Labour and the minister that British Columbia has been equitably and reasonably well treated in the matter of relief.

May I take this opportunity of pointing out to the committee this fact, and I do it with great earnestness because personally I feel very much perturbed over it. It is this, that there is altogether too much tendency for our people in Canada, starting with the individual and going on up to the municipality and then the province, to lean too heavily upon governments. It is not necessary to blame people or denounce them for that, but the fact is there. Over a period of time we have grown into the habit of leaning upon governments. The individual in the smaller localities has been looking for the municipality to provide all the relief he requires, without perhaps making that degree of individual effort which would contribute measurably towards his own relief; and the municipality has the tendency to lean entirely upon the provincial authorities, and so with the provincial authorities the tendency has been to pass the responsibility to Ottawa. That is something for which we cannot blame this man or that man; it is very common. But it is the duty of the Minister of Labour, as the minister responsible and charged with this very, very difficult task, to resist in a measure at least simply passing the responsibility up to him. What he has done, and I think done admirably, in the last three years of very trying times, has been so to direct the appropriations for relief from this government that there will be a maximum of returns. I think that he and the rest of us who are associated with him would be quite ready to admit that in handling this new situation which was thrust upon us errors have been made. I have no doubt that if we were to start all over again, faced with the situation of three years ago, we would find things that we might have done better. But that is only human, and hon. gentlemen opposite, while quite within their rights and within their duty in criticizing the government, I am quite certain would at least recognize that necessarily there must have been some errors made. But I do submit, and I am speaking now about British Columbia about which I know a good deal, that the minister and his department have treated that province with very, very great consideration, and he and the rest of us who assist him from time to time in studying these matters, are pretty well alive to the needs. At the same time it would be mere folly for him to give way at once when any municipality wires or writes in, as they do frequently to myself, as the minister representing that province, seeking direct contacts. It would be very foolish to give way to appeals of that kind.

I do not apprehend any very serious disturbances from this new situation which has arisen in the province. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said, there are certain persons, commonly known as the red element, who work amongst the unemployed and those on relief, capitalizing their distress and urging them on to deeds of violence. While we know there is a certain amount of that, I have sufficient knowledge of the sound common sense of the bulk of the people of British Columbia, unemployed or employed, on relief or not on relief, to be confident that there will be no very great difficulty in that regard. There may be, is bound to be some, I presume; there has been in the past. But I notice that these disturbances that are foretold with great foreboding often do not amount to anything very serious. This we can say with confidence, that the members of the provincial government having to do with this matter—Hon. Mr. Bruhn, Hon. Mr. Jones, Hon. Mr. MacKenzie and others—are making strenuous efforts to deal with their local problem. Undoubtedly they are meeting with difficulties, but they are doing a great deal more in the way of effective work than I think is generally realized. I know from my own personal contacts with the Minister of Labour here, that the federal department responds to the appeals that are constantly being made—not immediately giving what is asked, because that would be sheer folly; but making a generous response in the way of funds, taking a sympathetic attitude toward the problems involved, and seeking by combined effort and joint knowledge of the situation to work out their solution. I would say to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that the minister would be ill-advised to take up appeals from individual municipalities. If he does that; if he abandons the principle we have followed of dealing with this matter through the provincial authorities, he will be called upon to establish duplicate organizations here and there throughout British Columbia; and if he did it there he would have to do it elsewhere. And I am reminded that the act itself, and all our powers hitherto asked for, provide only for dealing with provinces. I submit in all earnestness that it would be shear folly for this house to authorize the minister to deal with municipalities, cities or localities; it would entail the erection of an organization that would simply duplicate that of the provinces. I suggest to the hon. gentleman who put this forward, and to other hon. gentlemen speaking for British Columbia, that we should endeavour as far as we can to impress upon those in authority in the municipalities, as well as upon private citizens, that they must bear a larger share, not so much of the cost but of the effort to solve the problems with which we are from time to time confronted. I feel very strongly that if the people of Canada—we were speaking of British Columbia, but it can be made general—would realize that, and give a larger measure of personal effort to a solution of the difficulties, much better progress would be made.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. NEILL: The minister has suggested that I was asking the Minister of Labour to take up the problem of an individual municipality, that which I mentioned or some other. Nothing was further from my mind. What I said was that he should take cognizance of the situation that has been at least suggested, and that it would cost very little for him to inform himself of the actual facts and of the day to day features of the danger of suggested looting that I have referred to.

He has also said that in his opinion—and he says he is in a position to judge—the Dominion government have treated the province of British Columbia, I think he said, very well. All I can say is that that is not the expressed opinion of the government of British Columbia nor of the council of municipalities, a very large and important body; they have expressed themselves very definitely to the contrary. I would just say this: some years ago I was in—well, in fact, in the bar of an hotel—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEILL: —and a man ran in and said: "Neill, your house is on fire." I did not stop to ask that man his name and age and station and pedigree, nor did I say: "I recognized my wife as the mistress of that house, and until you get authority from her I cannot take cognizance of your declaration that my house is on fire." No; I took immediate steps to deal with the situation. I did not even ask him to prove that the house was on fire, but I got a move on. The minister, however, refuses to credit that the house is on fire or in danger of becoming so.

The minister also says that he trusts to the common sense of the people, the unemployed, not to go too far. That is all right; I appreciate the fact that that will go a long way, but there is a limit. There is a point where common sense ceases and the dictates of despair take control, and that is what I am afraid of. All I ask is that the minister make use of his sources of information and find out if the situation in British Columbia, either present or threatening, is as bad as I have suggested. In addition to this telegram the press bears out the situation, because I read a few days ago that the council of municipalities were to have a meeting to decide whether they would throw up their hands, refuse all relief and put the blame on the province.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) for his remarkable change of heart since 1930. I have in my room upstairs an extract from an address my hon. friend made, and while I do not want to introduce the slightest suggestion of partisanship into this debate—on the contrary I want to assure the Minister of Labour that as far as we who come from British Columbia are concerned we are prepared to cooperate to the utmost with him in anything he can do to alleviate the situation—at that time the hon. minister said that it was not a case of provincial or municipal responsibility but the whole fault lay with the inherent policies of the King administration. It was very refreshing to see the evolution of political sagacity evidenced on the part of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. STEVENS: That may have been true then.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By that one observation my hon. friend has ruined all the good he did by his constructive remarks a little while ago.

Mr. STEVENS: You must give us a little latitude for humour.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce quite missed the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. It is not a case of one municipality; we have the organized union of British Columbia municipalities deciding in the last two weeks to send a representative to Ottawa to bring before the government this situation that is affecting all the municipalities. We also had the other day the mayor of the city of Vancouver using language similar to that used in the board of trade telegram read this afternoon by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. All we desire to know is, if there is an emergent situation in British Columbia, if the municipalities are not able, and I believe they are not, to cope with the present situation, having been deprived this year of $640,000 revenue which they had last year; if the local authorities are unable to meet the situation, is the Minister of Labour going to wait until he gets official representation from the provincial government before dealing with the question? I am vastly surprised that the government of British Columbia, if the representations I have received from Vancouver are true, and I believe they are, have not acted upon those representations, being in touch with the situation, and made direct representation to the minister, in order if possible that by some supplementary grant or otherwise we may relieve what may be a very serious condition. If the members from British Columbia on this side of the house can be of the slightest assistance to the Minister of Labour, our services are absolutely at his command. We do not want to treat this matter as a partisan issue. The situation in British Columbia two years ago was damned by that. The auditing committee investigated the accounts of British Columbia. He knows that Mr. McGeough, who has been a Dominion government inspector assisting Mr. Hereford, asked the lieutenant governor of British Columbia for a royal commission to investigate the misappropriation of funds in the province—

Mr. GORDON: He intimated to me also that if he did not get a job he was going to do that very thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That may be quite true, but these things never have been thoroughly gone into, and I think it is only fair to the minister himself as well as to the provincial government and the public of British Columbia that there should be an impartial investigation into the charges which have been made. During the session of 1930, when the first appropriation of $20,000,000 was made for unemployment relief, we on this side of the house asked for a national audit, but our request was refused. What has happened? We find that quite recently the government adopted the very suggestion we made at that time; according to my information they have been conducting an investigation into the situation in British Columbia.

Mr. GORDON: That was started last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Exactly, and we asked for it in 1930. My hon. friend was not Minister of Labour at that time, but the Prime Minister refused to give us a national audit of the expenditures of public moneys in the different provinces of Canada. The Prime Minister said at that time that this government accepted responsibility for the expenditure of every single cent of public funds, but two years after this scheme of unemployment relief was put in operation the very thing we requested was conceded. The minister has not yet told the house what has been the result of that investigation into the expenditure of unemployment relief funds in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. GORDON: The Auditor General's report will show.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, and I will be very glad to see it.

Mr. GORDON: We have not received it yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am quite prepared to accept the minister's statement in that regard, but we have a duty to perform. We are getting these wires day after day from responsible officials, municipal and provincial, and if there should be any trouble or any outbreaks we must accept part of the responsibility. This is a national crisis, a national duty, as the Prime Minister told us in 1930 in Montreal, in Winnipeg and in Vancouver. He stated in this very House of Commons on the 17th day of September, 1930, that this was a national responsibility. I do not say that the Minister of Labour is seeking to do so, but I suggest in the strongest possible way that he cannot evade or escape the responsibility which is his as a minister of the crown of meeting any situation which may develop in British Columbia in a national way. That responsibility belongs to him and to this government, because they told us this was a national question and a national responsibility; they made that statement both on the hustings and in this house.

I wish to conclude my remarks by assuring the minister that we will do everything we can in any way to cooperate with him in meeting the very serious situation which exists in British Columbia.

Mr. GORDON: I thank the hon. member for the attitude he has assumed in offering his assistance, because I really believe he means what he says. But in order that the position may be made very plain let me remind the committee that rightly or wrongly the government has hitherto placed no limit upon what shall be spent in any province of this dominion for direct relief. We promptly pay the bills, after looking them over to see so far as possible that the moneys are not spent improperly, and that applies to British Columbia as well as to every other province. I receive communications from various provinces in regard to the situation in various districts and consideration is given to all submissions that are made. This also applies equally to British Columbia. I have heard a good deal about the possible looting of stores in certain sections of Canada, but on inquiry of the provincial authorities I have found that they had the matter in hand. I am not going to urge upon a province that they have not the matter in hand, that they should do this or do that within their legislative competence; I do not think any member of the committee would suggest that I should do so.

Let me say, however, that as these matters arise I am aware that there is an acute situation here or there within Canada, and if it is a question of providing funds we do confer with the provinces and take such action as is necessary to relieve such situations. But I cannot too strongly urge that there is an agitation—I do not know how great it is in this country—absolutely to refuse to do any useful work. Some people seem to have made it their objective in life to wreck everything, and the refusal to do anything is one method of accomplishing that end. That is a difficult class of people to handle. Fortunately I believe it is a very small class, but there are many people in this country who are trying their utmost to improve their position. If we were to lay down a rule that in a certain province we would give so much per month to a family of two, so much to a family of three, and so on, in my view that would not be a proper course to adopt. It is human nature not to persist in trying to go upstream; it is such a comfortable thing to go down with the current. If people are taught to believe that the rather indefinable institution called the state can take up the slack, no matter how great it may be, which may come about by reason of misadventure or the desire of the individual not to exert himself, then things will have come to a pretty pass indeed. It is part of my duty as Minister of Labour administering this act to see on the one hand that injustice and suffering shall not prevail and on the other hand that the malingerer is not permitted to follow that course if measures can be adopted that will prevent him. This is not an easy act to administer, but I can assure the members of the committee that so far as it is humanly possible the course I have indicated is being followed. I am sure hon. members know from their personal interviews with me in connection with matters in their particular ridings that the department is doing everything possible to endeavour to make the position of the worthy Canadian as easy as possible until better times come.

Mr. REID: I should like to stress just one point in view of what the minister has just said with regard to those people who are determined to do as little work as possible. I would point out that one cause of this discontent is the fact that I think in nearly all the camps we had men who were not working and who were not asked to work, but who were provided with food, clothing and shelter. Nearby there were municipalities which required men on relief to work for the relief afforded them, and naturally they pointed to the men in the camps who did not have to work. I think that policy should be changed; I think able-bodied men should be made to do a little work for their food and clothing. Many of the men in those camps were quite willing to work and there was useful work to be done, but they were not asked to do anything. I believe this did cause some discontent in many districts, and I think that policy should be changed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it would be most unfortunate indeed if any word of the minister's should lead the general public to believe that a large proportion of the unemployed in this country desire simply to drift along and depend upon the state, being merely malingerers. I have heard that word malingerer half a dozen times from the lips of the minister. I have no doubt there is an occasional man who will not work, but anyone who knows intimately the unemployed in this country will admit that the great majority of them have done useful work in Canada and are prepared to do useful work again as soon as it can be provided. But there is no use expecting the poor individual workingman to be able to discover work when there are 750,000 like himself who cannot get it, and when the state itself cannot find it. It seems to me almost a cruel way to talk; it is not a fair way of putting the situation of the unemployed worker.

The state, for three years under this government, has had all its agencies at work in an endeavour to find work, to make work. The state has not been able to do this with all its resources and now, when it has failed, it looks to me as if the minister and the government generally are trying to escape responsibility by turning round and calling the unemployed workman names, malingerer and so on. I say it is not fair. I do not see how the government can possibly evade responsibility for the situation. I am not speaking now in any narrow political sense because I would say the same whatever government might be in power. Within limits the minister has been carrying out the act, and I am not complaining in respect to details; but I am protesting against the general attitude of the government, which seems to be that we should get by as easily as possible in a matter of this kind. The whole policy is predicated on the idea that this is a very temporary emergency. The government has taken that point of view for the last three years. We have been told again and again about the prosperity which is coming to us but which has not yet come, and we are still exhorted to wait patiently a few weeks or a few months longer, when the promised prosperity will come. There is no indication immediately in sight of anything of the kind and it is not unreasonable therefore for us to ask the government to face this question fairly with regard to the continuance in considerable part of this unemployment situation. This they are not doing at the present time.

The minister told us the other night that one of the reasons why it was not wise for the state to do anything was that possibly the springs of charity might dry up. That is a ridiculous position to take; that is all I can say. It is absolutely absurd for a minister to take that position in view of the tremendous responsibility that rests upon the government. Undoubtedly the springs of charity are drying up, but it is not because men are becoming harder hearted. Among the poor at least there never was a time when they were so willing to share what they had with one another. It is not, I say, because the springs of charity in the human heart are drying up but because the resources of the people are becoming so depleted that they cannot give to charity as they have done in the past.

The whole problem has become so vast in its extent that the ordinary private charities which might handle a few individuals or a few score of individuals in normal times are no longer sufficient to meet what is properly termed a great national emergency. When we remember that anywhere from twenty-five to fifty per cent of the population of a great many of our communities are unemployed, it is ridiculous to think that ordinary private charity can take care of these unfortunate people. It cannot be done. Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that if the ordinary people of the country should pay a little more attention to this phase of the matter they would solve the problem. Yes; I suppose that if a great drive were put on by the Rotary club a few more men could get work carrying out ashes and doing odd jobs in the way of cleaning up backyards. I had sympathy with that kind of thing five or six years ago when unemployment was relatively a small matter and we thought it would be over in a few weeks. A few odd jobs provided at that time would, it was thought, see the situation through. But it is extraordinary that this government, having been in office for three years and having recognized the necessity for putting on big schemes of public works, and after spending tens of millions of dollars in this way, and with the number of unemployed steadily growing, should come to us now and suggest that we should let the individuals exert themselves a little more. We are further told that we should allow the local community to exert itself more and things would be looked after better. It does not seem to me that this position is worthy of a government.

I have not taken very much time in this debate because, frankly, it seems to me that in the last few years I have said everything there was to say again and again; but I cannot let this opportunity go by without once more pleading with the government to take action. It may be that some of us are taking a gloomy view of the matter; it may be that there may not be riots. Undoubtedly there is a great deal of common sense and good judgment among the masses of our people, but I do think that the people have been wonderfully patient during these years. I have often wondered how most of us would behave if for weeks and months and years we had to live as hundreds of thousands of our fellow Canadians have been living. If we do get by without serious riots—and the very fact that the government is taking extraordinary powers would indicate that it is itself not at all sure that we shall—we shall still have to face the very serious deterioration that is taking place in the homes of the hundreds of thousands of people affected. I had word from the part of the country I represent in which someone says, "I can hardly keep from being bitter when I consider the needless suffering and demoralization of the people in this district." Surely we cannot ignore such facts.

People will put up with things for a little time when there is hope for the future; but when they realize that their little earnings are slipping away if they have not already disappeared; when they see their clothing getting shabby and they cannot replace it; when their bedding and household utensils are worn out; when they have not the wherewithal to pay their rent and are months behind; when they see no hope for their children, and there must be thousands whose children, after getting through high school, have nothing to do but roam the streets—when we think of all this, I say the situation becomes wellnigh desperate and we have the right to look to someone for a lead. Yet the minister gets up again and again and says, "There is the province." But the provinces, as I myself have said so often, and especially the western provinces as everyone knows, are on the verge of bankruptcy and cannot act. Indeed, some of them are bankrupt, just as the municipalities are. Well, what is to be done? We look to the minister to take action, but he shifts ground and says, "We cannot afford it." I urge that so long as there is as much wealth in the dominion as there is to-day, so long as there are large numbers of people drawing enormous revenues from our bonded indebtedness and from other sources, then we have no right to state that there is no money in Canada to do things. We have no right to say so. If there were war, we could carry on that war and the money would be forthcoming. In his budget speech delivered the other day, the Minister of Finance referred to the great variety of natural resources in this country. He referred also to the resourcefulness of the Canadian people. Our Canadian people are resourceful. They have been so in the past, but the fact is that to-day they have not the opportunities which were to be found in the past. It is not possible for them to do as the pioneers did, and there is no use in our fooling ourselves by going back fifty or seventy-five years and saying that the people of to-day can fend for themselves just as well as the people of that day. They cannot. The fact remains that to-day they are facing a serious situation.

I am not urging what has sometimes been called direct action; I am not urging violence, but I must confess that I hardly ever address a meeting either in eastern or western Canada at which the people do not get up afterwards and ask: What are you going to do? What can we do about it? When such a question is asked, my mind comes back to this house and to the thought that month after month and year after year we have played this game back and forth and no action has resulted. I confess that I have hardly the courage to continue to speak about these things in the house because of a sense of the futility of it all. Can I go back to my friends in my own constituency in the city of Winnipeg and say to those who have been out of work for several years and who are desperate over it all: "Oh, well, you must wait for another two or three years, there will be an election and perhaps we will put Mr. Bennett and his crowd out and there may be some improvement in the situation." Is that all we can do? Regardless of what government may be in power or what particular party they may represent, it seems to me that we as the elected representatives of the people have a right to demand that the government should help to solve such a great national problem as unemployment. They turn to us and say: What alternative have you to offer or what do you propose? It is not for us to propose the details. We have stated some of the principles on which we believe policies should be based. Both in this country and in the old country the erection of public works has been suggested as a means of increasing the purchasing power of the people. We suggested that here and the government replied: We cannot afford it. We are supposed to swallow that reply, and the people can continue to suffer. We are told that certain works have been carried on because they could be carried on as relief works where ordinary wages do not have to be paid. Such a course has resulted in the gradual lowering of the standard of living of great sections of our people.

Is not any government elected for the purpose of administering affairs in such a way as to provide a decent living for the people? I do not want particularly to rub it in, but if ever a government was elected with a mandate to do that, it was this government. After being three years in power we find them receding from their position and simply saying to these poor people: A lot of you are malingerers; if the local communities would only get out and rustle, things would go better; you must not load everything upon the state. That is not the way to handle this problem. I do not believe that we can expect that the people will continue much longer to be patient; they should not be patient. They see their homes going to pieces and their families degenerating, and yet they know that if there was an efficient government, the situation would be altered.

We are told that we cannot do anything before the world economic conference. All that conference will do will be to pass resolutions and if those resolutions are to mean anything, they will have to be implemented by the people at home. The implementing of these resolutions by Canada would mean a complete reversal of the policy which has been advocated by this government for the last two or three years. Is that likely?

Even at this late stage of the session, I think there should be a reconsideration of this whole matter by the government. We ought not to be asked to go back and tell our people that the government refuses to accept responsibility, that it merely talks about questions of jurisdiction while knowing perfectly well that the provinces and the municipalities are not capable of taking care of the situation. The most unkindest cut of all is when the minister accuses people who are so unfortunate as to be out of work of being malingerers and not desirous of taking a job when they have it placed before them. I do hope that the government will take action even at this late stage.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, there is a word or two I should like to say in connection with this problem of unemployment. This problem has two aspects; first, there is the question of giving direct relief to those who find themselves out of work, and, second, there is the matter of deciding what we are going to do with the number of people who are out of work. The depression first came upon us in the fall of 1929 and since that time the unemployment situation has been gradually going from bad to worse. As I have often said in this house, I do not accuse either the present or the past governments for being entirely responsible for the situation. They were the victims of economic circumstances over which they had no control. But that does not absolve the powers that be from the responsibility of taking care of the situation. The present government has done a great deal to alleviate the sufferings of many people here in Canada. According to the figures submitted by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), the government has been feeding about one and one-third millions of people in the Dominion of Canada. That is a staggering figure; it gives some idea of the magnitude of the poverty and unemployment which exists in this country.

I think it can be said without fear of contradiction that at this time there are in the neighbourhood of 800,000 people out of work. Figuring each unemployed as representing three persons this gives approximately twenty-five per cent of the population of Canada. I believe the figure is much higher, but if twenty-five per cent of our population is suffering from unemployment, we ought to have some other method of meeting the situation than that of giving relief. The average person, I do not care who he happens to be, would prefer work to being the recipient of direct relief. I think the average person, not only in Canada but in other parts of the world, would prefer to give some service in helping to build up what we might term the state.

The question arises: What are we going to do with these 800,000 people who are out of work? What is going to happen to these people? Let us assume for the sake of argument that conditions will improve in the next six or twelve months, that there is a revival of trade. Even though this does happen, there are hundreds of thousands of men and women who are out of work at the present time who will never be reabsorbed into industry. Hundreds of thosuands of our people are faced with the situation of being permanently out of work. We must find some means of dealing with such a serious situation. A man may be able to stand being out of work for three months, or perhaps six, but ultimately demoralization sets in. Those people who have been unemployed for six, twelve, eighteen months or two years, become unemployable as a result of conditions over which they have no control. I know the minister has taken the question of relief seriously, but what I want him and the government to do is to try to find some means of providing useful work for the hundreds of thousands of people who are at present unemployed.

The government appointed a commission to investigate the railway problem. Now we are going to have another commission appointed by the government to investigate the banking situation. Some time ago when I suggested that we might have a commission to investigate the unemployment situation, the government thought that was hardly deserving of consideration. In my opinion the unemployment situation is far more serious than either the banking or the railway problem. Further, I am trying to distinguish between the question of relief and that of a permanent solution of the problem of unemployment. Unless the government can do something in the latter respect, we are building a generation of unemployables and I hate to think what will become of these people in the years to come. Many of these young people who through no fault of their own are unable to secure employment on leaving school at eighteen or twenty years of age and become useful citizens are driven to a life of crime. Our gaols and penitentiaries are filled to overflowing as a result of our unemployment situation. We wish to do away with such a condition, and the only body before which the people of this dominion can place their claims is the federal parliament. When the unemployed in our cities come to the provincial government, the reply is: We have no money. The provincial governments pass the buck to the federal authorities and the federal government in turn says that this is a provincial matter. The unemployment problem is neither municipal nor provincial; it is federal, and if it is a federal problem, it ought to be a federal responsibility. When I speak of its being a federal responsibility, I do so with the idea of dealing not with the question of relief but with the problem of what we are going to do with the vast number who are at present out of work. I know when we come to deal with the more important aspects of the case, we may be told that the federal government has no jurisdiction. But the government has been gathering a vast amount of statistics from the census of 1931 in regard to the wealth and industries of the country. I feel, as I have stated in the house on many previous occasions, that if we are going to deal with the problem of unemployment—and I want to see it dealt with by the house—we must do away almost entirely with the idea of giving relief to these men and women who are out of work, because I believe by giving them relief, we are in no way even beginning to solve the problem. The only way in which we can do so is by attacking it at its very foundation.

I pointed out yesterday that within the next few days our two main railways are going to amalgamate certain services. Some hon. members may prefer to call this cooperation, but the first result of this amalgamation of services will be that hundreds, if not thousands, will be thrown out of work. Surely that is no way of dealing with the unemployment problem. If we are to deal with it properly, the first thing we must do is to try to fit in the men who are available to perform useful services in society and to find out what services they can perform. That means making a survey of the whole of the national life of Canada. We have not as yet done that; there has been no attempt to do so, even though we may have a research council. This will mean a great amount of planning by the government, but I think it ought to undertake that planning so that people who have been out of work for years may have some hope; at present they have none.

We have been told in the past few days that we have natural resources, wealth in abundance, all of which is quite true. We have in this country enough wealth, actual and potential, more than to satisfy the needs of the entire population; yet our resources are lying idle and men by the hundreds of thousands are walking the streets who would be only too anxious to render useful service if they were given the opportunity of doing so. I would impress upon the minister, whose heart I know is as big as that of anyone in the house, the need of doing something to deal fundamentally with the hundreds of thousands who are out of work, the main body of whom are and want to be good citizens.

The unemployment problem practically began in 1929 and when it became a little more severe in 1930 some hope was held out that by certain legislation the problem would be solved. But in 1931 it became worse, it was still worse in 1932, and now in 1933, when it is becoming even more acute, very little encouragement is being given to men out of work. About three months ago we were told there were 800,000 people in receipt of relief, and a few weeks ago we were informed that this number had increased to 1,350,000. This gives some indication of the seriousness of the situation with which we are confronted. I hope when we meet after the recess to-night the Minister of Labour will tell the house, the unemployed and the people of Canada generally, that the government has a method of dealing with the question that will hold out to our people at present unemployed some hope of having their condition relieved in order that they may become useful citizens.

Mr. POWER: Just before six o'clock I should like to ask the minister a question to which perhaps he will have an answer for me after the dinner recess. I have endeavoured to get from the orders in council which have been published a statement of the amount of money which has been lent to the different provinces. I know that is published somewhere, but I have not been able to get it in the form in which I think it would be most intelligible, at least to me. I have compiled a kind of table which I shall send over to the minister, but which is not for use in Hansard, and I would ask him if he would have it corrected by his officers in order that I may be able to put it on Hansard in corrected form later during the course of the debate.

Mr. GORDON: It would be difficult between now and eight o'clock to have that done, but I shall have it done just as rapidly as possible.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross): Shall clause 1 carry?

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister the figures for the province of Manitoba for last winter?

Mr. GORDON: Those figures have been put on Hansard.

Mr. HEAPS: If they are on Hansard I will not ask the minister to give them again. Has there been any request that the Dominion government should contribute more than 33⅓ per cent of the cost of relief?

Mr. GORDON: I have no specific request for an increased percentage. The matter was discussed with representatives of the province some time ago but no specific request was made. It was more in the nature of a general discussion as to the position in Manitoba.

Mr. HEAPS: In regard to the other western provinces as well, has not the question been raised that the federal contribution should be more than 33⅓ per cent?

Mr. GORDON: The matter came up some months ago, and as a result the Dominion government has assumed 100 per cent of the cost of taking care of single homeless men and women. That is as far as the matter has progressed.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the government consider, particularly in regard to the western provinces, where the burden of maintaining the unemployed bears heavily on the funds of the municipalities and provinces contributing a larger percentage than the 33⅓ per cent—raising that say to 50 per cent?

Mr. GORDON: A matter of that kind would of necessity be a matter for negotiation after this legislation passes the house. The western provinces have problems that are probably a little different from those of the eastern provinces, but at the same time I have already drawn the attention of the house to the fact that in the city of Winnipeg about two or three months ago jobs on farms in Manitoba at current wages were offered to upwards of eight hundred men, and those jobs could not be filled. The same thing applied to Saskatchewan. We are confronted with problems of that kind. It is most difficult getting a certain class out to work. However, with respect to what the hon. member has said, after this legislation passes the house, if it is made to appear to the satisfaction of this government that the three western provinces or four, or any other provinces, acknowledge their inability to carry on their legislative functions, that matter will have to be reviewed, of course, by this government and some conclusion arrived at.

Mr. HEAPS: In reference to the jobs which the minister claims were waiting for individuals who would not accept them at the going rate of pay in Manitoba, as I understand the administration of unemployment relief in Manitoba persons who are not willing to accept at the going rate of pay jobs that are offered them are cut off from relief.

Mr. GORDON: They should be, but it is most difficult to cut them off because there is in that province and elsewhere in Canada a studied effort to consolidate that state of affairs and raise difficulty and trouble. It is a difficult problem to handle.

Mr. DONNELLY: What has the back to the land or back to the farm movement cost the government during the past year or since this government took office?

Mr. GORDON: In the province of Saskatchewan, accounts have been received for $19,000, which have been paid.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am not surprised that the minister and some of the members on that side of the house are rather optimistic about this back to the farm movement. In every back to the farm movement in this or any other country the experience has always been the same. For the first two or three years everybody would be optimistic about it. For example, the soldier settlement scheme in this country was hailed for two or three years as a great success, but even in good times soldiers settled on the land have not been able to make a success of it in western Canada.

Mr. GORDON: All of them?

Mr. DONNELLY: Practically all of them.

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. DONNELLY: The large majority of them have been unable to make their payments and have had them written down two or three times, and the settlers generally are in great distress and difficulty at the present time. I do not know how it is in eastern Canada, but the chances of these soldier settlers in western Canada being able to make their payments under present conditions are very slight. They have had difficulty in doing so even in the best years. With farm conditions what they are, how any government can expect to take people out of the city, transplant them on the farm, and make them successful farmers overnight, is more than I can understand. It is all very well for professional men, for lawyers, to talk of taking people out of the city and making successful farmers of them, but the farmers know that to-day it is absolutely impossible. Why, in western Canada to-day the municipalities do not even sell the land for taxes because they cannot get any bidders. They go out and seize the crop for taxes, but they do not attempt to sell the land because it would not raise the price of the taxes. But this government imagine that they can take this land that has been sold for taxes, on which some other farmer has not been able to make his payments and so has had to let it go, and settle on it a man from the city and make him a successful farmer. To my way of thinking such a procedure is bound to fail. No doubt the man will take the $500 and go on the farm; he will go to the backwoods and stay there a year or so until the $500 is spent, and then he will come back to the city. I do not blame him; he has to live somewhere. But how the government can expect to establish men from the city on these farms—they have to buy horses and machinery and live a year or so until they get a crop—I do not know; certainly it cannot be done in western Canada.

There is another scheme that might be successful in some sections of the country. You might go two or three miles outside some of our cities, for example Ottawa, buy five or ten acres of land, take a man from the city, who may be a plumber or a painter or a carpenter, put him on that land, and let him have a little home there, keep in touch with city affairs, and supplement his earnings in the city with what he can produce on the farm. He could have a little garden, a cow, a pig, a few chickens, and in that way make a living. But it is useless to put him away out in the country two or three hundred miles from civilization—and in western Canada he will have to go out from the centres of population; you cannot pick up farms within five miles of Regina. We had people coming from Europe a few years ago expecting that they could get a homestead within a mile of the city hall in Regina. But the homesteads were all taken up within forty or fifty miles of the railroad—

An hon. MEMBER: They were not sold for taxes then.

Mr. DONNELLY: No, but they are not being sold now because no one can be found to buy them. Only the municipalities were buying, and cannot do it now. I know people in my district who are anxious to get out, but they cannot get any help from the municipalities, because the municipalities are broke. We are keeping our schools open by having the teachers board from house to house and take notes for their pay. The municipalities cannot put up their one-third to send these people out; our province is broke. It may be able to borrow money from this government to pay its third, but it does seem to me that people in that district should get some help from the government if they wish to get out into other districts. This scheme of taking people from the city and sending them long distances into the country is bound to be a failure. The Canadian Pacific Railway had an irrigation scheme some years ago, and those who were in the agriculture and colonization committee heard Mr. Beatty say it was an absolute failure. We know that the same was true of the soldier settlement scheme, and it is bound to happen to this. It appears to me that the idea of this back to the land movement is simply to get the people away from the towns—get them out of sight. They imagine that anybody can be a farmer who cannot do anything else. That is wrong; farming to-day is just as much a skilled occupation as carpentering or plumbing or any other. Only those who have been brought up to it can make a success on the farm, and even they are not able to make anything to-day. No occupation in the dominion is as hard hit by present conditions as farming.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, section 2 provides for agreements with the provinces, "upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon," I was wondering if there was any uniformity in these agreements. The act contemplates that the province shall take the initiative in presenting its case to the Dominion government. Last year I drew the attention of the minister to the fact that the Minister of Lands and Forests for Ontario had gone to the town of Kenora and there made the statement that the only direct relief that would be given by the Ontario government would be dollar for dollar of contributions made by private individuals. Last summer I was home and I found that it was carried out in that way. The population of the town of Kenora is composed chiefly of working men. We have no people there who can contribute large amounts; they are chiefly railroad and paper mill and flour mill workers working part time. The business of the railroads is very slack, and the railroad men have given up a large proportion of their mileage so as to divide it up, therefore they have nothing to contribute. When some of the unemployed went to the town office they were told there was nothing in the fund because the provincial government or the federal government had not made any contribution, no fund having been raised by the citizens. I was wondering if the minister would not consider arranging that in the event of the province not complying with the provisions of the act, the town council or some local body could apply to the federal government for relief.

Mr. GORDON: The same policy is pursued with respect to Kenora as in the case of other towns.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Some time ago I had a communication from Prince Rupert, British Columbia, saying that they had been unable to meet the payment on their bonds owing to the fact that the provincial government was unable to come through with the relief money, and the city had been obliged to use the money to meet the relief demands in the city. I wonder if the minister knows anything about it, or if any representation has been made to him, and if the difficulty has been settled by now. As the previous speaker said, if the province is unable to meet such demands there should be some way by which the municipality could approach the federal government directly.

Mr. GORDON: As far as the Dominion government is concerned, the accounts that come in are reviewed, audited as far as they can be, and paid promptly. With respect to the municipal bonds the Dominion government of course knows nothing.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I realize that, but as it was presented to me, Prince Rupert was unable to meet this bond interest payment because the bank refused any further advance and the money had been used for relief purposes while awaiting relief funds promised by either the federal or the provincial government and which failed to come through.

Mr. GORDON: I can only reiterate what I have said, that as far as our contribution under the arrangement is concerned, it has always been made promptly to the province. We have no intimation concerning the subject matter of the hon. member's observations.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Speaker, it came to my notice last week that the Ontario legislature voted only $3,000,000 for the northern development branch. I say "only" purposely, because it is the first time since the inception of that department that such a small amount was voted by the Ontario government. In other years the minimum sum has been $5,000,000; in fact in 1930 the Ontario government voted $10,000,000 for that purpose. In my section of the country the people are asking why the provincial government is curtailing the amount of money voted for the northern development branch; there is more unemployment now and more work is needed this year than ever before. Of course the only answer that can be given is that the Ontaro government is loading some of its responsibilities on the federal government under this act, and that they expect the federal government to spend more money in northern Ontario in unemployment relief than was spent in previous years. I do not think this is a proper attitude for the provincial government to adopt, and I say that because I believe the two governments work closely together. Some of the higher officials of the northern development branch are even handling the relief in that part of the country at the present time.

This brings me to the question of the trans-Canada highway. I am sure that this sum of $3,000,000 will not be sufficient to provide necessary roads in the north, which may affect some of the men placed on the land under the back to the land movement, and there is the other fact that it will be impossible to continue work on the trans-Canada highway. This is a matter of great importance in northern Ontario. I should like to ask the minister if he would be kind enough to say what is the intention of the federal government with regard to making up the difference between the usual vote of $5,000,000 and the vote this year of $3,000,000 for the northern development branch. Then I should like to know what amount of money has been spent in connection with the construction of the trans-Canada highway. Only a few days ago here in Ottawa one of the engineers of the northern development branch said that a good deal of work had been done along the north shore of lake Superior, but in my section of the country, which is the most logical route for the trans-Canada highway, there has not been a bit of work done in the last two years. The Minister of Labour was most emphatic in his statement with regard to the trans-Canada highway during the last election campaign.

Mr. GORDON: Surely the hon. member does not mean that not a cent has been spent; surely he knows that many hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent on what is known as the Ferguson highway. Why, one bridge alone that was built last year cost over $100,000.

Mr. BRADETTE: If my information is correct, the bridge that was built at Englehart was paid for by the northern development branch and not by money voted by the federal government.

Mr. GORDON: Quite so.

Mr. BRADETTE: But I understand there is an agreement between the federal and provincial governments that the cost of the trans-Canada highway is to be divided equally. We have no grudge against any other section of the country, but in the Ottawa valley section, from Mattawa to North Bay, a great deal of employment has been given to a number of young men during the last two years. I have no quarrel with that, but I think the same thing should be done in my part of the country. I am told also that thousands of men have found employment in the construction of the trans-Canada highway along the north shore of lake Superior. We maintain that the only logical route for the trans-Canada highway is over the Ferguson highway, and if that route were followed a tremendous amount of money would be saved. The minister does not seem to agree with me, though we agreed during the last election campaign; even my opponent said that the trans-Canada highway should go over the Ferguson highway. We are not parochial in our ideas; we realize that the southern section of the northern part of the province is entitled to connection with the trans-Canada highway, but we think our case should be considered also. This work should be started now. Two roads will converge some place west of Hearst, south of lake Nipigon, and work should be proceeding now, but I am sorry to tell the house that not a bit of work has been carried on with funds provided by this government so far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned in my section of the province.

I wonder if the minister would be good enough to let me know, if he has the documents before him, what amount of money was spent last year and the year before on the construction of the trans-Canada highway in Ontario.

Mr. GORDON: The construction and routing of the so-called trans-Canada highway have been subjects of some interest to all members of this house and of the assembly at Toronto for many years. At one time I believe the hon. member for North Timiskaming was not a very enthusiastic supporter of that scheme; there has been some doubt as to whether he voted for or against a certain resolution, but at any rate since the change of government the hon. member has been most active in his support.

It has been said in this chamber that I was a supporter of that projected road. Let me say that I have advocated the construction of roads in northern Ontario for over a quarter of a century, and I still advocate it. Of necessity, however, the location of the trans-Canada highway must be determined by the provincial authorities; the Dominion government has no right to go into a province and say that a road shall be constructed by the dominion here, there, or elsewhere unless it is on land owned by the dominion. So far as I am aware, and I believe I am correct, the province of Ontario has not yet indicated where in its judgment that road should cross the part of northern Ontario to which the hon. member has referred. I do know, as I am sure my hon. friend knows, that the northern development branch has constructed a very splendid highway from North Bay to the home town of the hon. member and west for a considerable distance, passing through a splendid territory from the standpoint of both agriculture and mining. Under the various relief measures the Dominion government has contributed towards the cost of the construction of the trans-Canada highway where the route has been determined by the provincial governments; to date our contribution under the successive acts totals about $4,020,000. I believe those figures to be accurate; I have just abstracted them from the books. There may be some slight change, but approximately that amount has been contributed for that purpose.

Let me reassure my hon. friend who in these later years has been a sturdy advocate of the construction of a trans-Canada highway, though at one time—and I have no doubt he had reason for his action—he was not so anxious to see that road projected. At all events I offer him my congratulations now on his agreement with what I always considered to be a sound public undertaking, and I can assure the hon. member that as soon as the province indicates where the balance of that road should be located, this government will implement any promises made—although personally I made none—with regard to the construction of that road. I can well understand that Ontario as well as the other provinces must go a little slowly in the matter of expenditures, but I would point out to the hon. member for North Timiskaming that, if we can rely upon the press, and generally speaking we can, the present leader of the Liberal party in Ontario has said repeatedly that the expenditures in northern Ontario should be curtailed. I have read these speeches many times in the Ontario press of all shades condemning such expenditures in season and out of season. Now, one cannot blow hot and cold in these matters. So far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned, I can only reassert what I said a moment ago, namely, that so far as this government can carry out its promises, having regard to the financial situation, this will be done. The number of men who were actually employed in that part of northern Ontario in the month of February this year was 13,442, so that the hon. member will see that there is a good deal of activity looking towards the completion of the road.

Mr. BRADETTE: I appreciate some of the information given by the minister, but I cannot allow a personal attack upon myself to pass without offering some defence. The minister said that in this house I voted against a certain resolution with respect to the trans-Canada highway. I challenge any member of this house to prove that such a resolution has at any time been introduced in this house while I have been a member. It is true that on one occasion a resolution was brought forward but it had no reference to a trans-Canada highway; there was no mention whatever in that resolution about such a highway. I am referring to the Kellner resolution. The resolution in question was simply one asking the federal government to grant certain sums of money to the provincial government for the building of roads. I repeat, because this is important, that there was no mention either directly or indirectly, of a trans-Canada highway so far as that resolution was concerned. I can assure the minister that had there been any proposal with regard to the trans-Canada highway in that resolution I would have voted for it; I would have raised both hands for it. I do not want statements of this kind, a statement such as the Minister of Railways also made two years ago, to go unchallenged, for I certainly never did vote against such a resolution. I have always been in favour of that road and I do not think it is fair for the minister to make such a statement. In the year 1926 no resolution was brought forward dealing with the trans-Canada highway or I would certainly have supported it.

May I point out that the Minister of Labour was as strongly in favour of a trans-Canada highway passing through his section of the country when he took part in the last general election; he was for it as much as I have ever been, or as much as my opponent or any Conservative candidate in that part of the country at that time. He cannot get away from that responsibility now. I hope that as a minister he has been using his influence with the cabinet to have the highway routed through that section, but the federal government is now shifting the responsibility on to the provincial government. We have the statement of Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Henry that in the last three years there have been parties of surveyors working west of Hearst and south of lake Nipigon, and it would have been just as easy for those parties during that period to investigate the route through my section as to investigate the route along the north shore of lake Superior and make a definite report.

I am sure the minister wishes to be fair to me and to the house, but I must tell him once more that there never was a measure introduced in this house which had anything to do with the trans-Canada highway and which I voted against. I challenge any hon. member who has been in this house during the last six years to prove that I have ever voted against a proposal of that kind. As regards expenditures voted in connection with the northern development branch, let me say that while I hold no brief for the present Liberal leader in Ontario, I certainly do know that he has never decried any money spent in northern Ontario. He did urge the curtailing of certain governmental expenditures but he never said a word against any moneys spent in connection with the northern development branch. I want to have that also clearly understood, because it is not fair for the minister to insinuate that it was due to the influence of the present Liberal leader in Ontario that the expenditures for the northern development branch were reduced by $2,000,000.

Mr. GORDON: It is $3,000,000.

Mr. BRADETTE: The reduction is from $5,000,000 to $3,000,000. The vote is now $3,000,000. The minister implies that this reduction came about through the influence of the present Liberal leader in the province.

Mr. GORDON: I did not mean to imply that.

Mr. BRADETTE: Anyone who listened to the hon. gentleman will have inferred just what he meant. He seemed to me to imply that the responsibility rests entirely with the Ontario government, and I must take issue with that statement. I sincerely hope that the minister will find it possible to be as determined in his advocacy of the routing of the trans-Canada highway through that section, now that he is in the cabinet, as he was during the last general election. For my part, I am as much in favour of it to-day as I was ten years ago.

Mr. HEENAN: I had not intended to discuss this matter until the minister mentioned the Liberal leader in Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: Which one?

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Mitchell Hepburn, who will be Prime Minister of Ontario after the next election.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): What will Mr. Sinclair be?

Mr. HEENAN: I have been on the platform with Mr. Hepburn as much as any other man in Ontario and I hope to be with him until we get the Tories cleaned out of the province.

Mr. McINTOSH: That will not be long.

Mr. HEENAN: I have never heard him say that he proposed to cut down the expenditures in northern Ontario. The statement I have heard him make over and over again is this, that he proposes that the money that will be spent in northern Ontario shall be spent in the interests of the people instead of building up a dirty, rotten Tory organization. These are his words and I second the motion. With respect to the highway, I recall that I was in the maritimes when the Prime Minister promised a highway to be paid for entirely out of the federal exchequer. More than that, I have in my room a copy of the Halifax Herald, dated between the 10th and the 15th of July, 1930, in which there appears a letter which he actually wrote to the people of the maritimes, declaring that if elected on the 28th of July he would begin the immediate construction of a highway to be paid for entirely out of the federal treasury. So that I do not think the minister is doing himself justice in trying now to shift the responsibility to the province.

We all know what difficulties there are in relation to the question of jurisdiction, but I suggest that when a gentleman appears before the public, especially a gentleman aspiring to the office of Prime Minister of Canada, and gives a definite pledge, he ought to keep that pledge; he should regard it as sacred. I recall another thing he said in the maritimes. He said, "I here and now ask every member elected in the maritimes to vote against me in the House of Commons if I do not carry out these pledges."

An hon. MEMBER: How about reforming the Senate?

Mr. HEENAN: It will never be reformed until my friend gets into it, and the sooner the better for the House of Commons. I asked the minister a question with regard to a matter of which I have personal knowledge. The unemployed workmen in Kenora went to the mayor's office and asked for relief and were told that there was no money in the fund; the Minister of Lands and Forests had said that there would be no money forthcoming for the assistance of unemployed workers in Kenora unless private persons contributed, and then they would pay dollar for dollar. The minister got up and made a statement which I could hardly catch, but his answer, as I am informed by some hon. gentlemen sitting around me, was that Kenora would get the same treatment as every other part of the country. Is that the treatment being handed out in all parts of the country? Is there no direct relief or anything else given out unless private individuals contribute to and build up a fund to which the dominion and the provinces contribute dollar for dollar? I am sure that that is not the treatment being handed out all over the country.

The minister has limited this vote to $20,000,000 for direct relief, and has stated that at various periods there have been upon direct relief a total of 1,357,000 men, women and children. Does he expect that that number will be reduced next year when his government is putting through a railway bill which will throw thousands and thousands of railway employees out of work? Dividing 1,357,000 into $20,000,000 gives about four and one-half cents per head per day. Surely that is not enough to ensure the unemployed food, clothing and shelter. Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I am disposed to say that I do not know what to say when I face a labour audience or when I meet the people in my own riding.

Mr. GORDON: I venture the opinion that whatever it is, the hon. member blames it upon this government.

Mr. HEENAN: There is no one else but this government to blame. When my hon. friends went through the country in 1930 there were 117,000 unemployed and they claimed that that unemployment existed because of the fiscal policies of the Liberal party. The number of unemployed to-day is nearer to 800,000 than it is to 100,000.

An hon. MEMBER: How about giving up your engine?

Mr. HEENAN: If my hon. friend is ashamed to put on overalls, I am not.

What did my hon. friends promise during the last elections? They said that if they were elected they would end unemployment or perish in the attempt. They made the specific promise that they would take over the question of unemployment as a national obligation. They said if they were elected they would bring the boys and girls back home. The boys and girls are back home, but what are we going to do for them? Are we going to send them up into the northern Ontario camps and pay them $5 per month and their board?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HEENAN: That is about the only thing a Tory can do, cast ridicule upon the unemployed and their misery.

An hon. MEMBER: Rot.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I never knew a Tory that did it.

Mr. HEENAN: They put into effect tariff policies which cut the trade of this country by more than fifty per cent, they throw thousands of railway men out of work and then offer a policy of unemployment relief. When one of us on this side refers to the misery which exists in his own particular riding, he gets nothing but the usual "ha! ha!" from the Tory ranks. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that if some of the hon. members to your right would prefer to laugh and snort and sneer, they would be better in the smoking room where they belong. Last night we asked some civil questions of the minister and after a great deal of trouble we obtained some of the information we required but not all.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): They ought to be intelligent questions.

Mr. HEENAN: When we mentioned unemployment insurance the minister did something which I did not think any minister of the crown would attempt to do. He read a letter which I had written in connection with unemployment, and then took another letter from another file dealing with unemployment relief. He then said: "That is what the former minister said with regard to unemployment." I have files in my office which will show that the former government petitioned or canvassed the provinces in connection with a scheme for unemployment insurance. This file shows also that some of the provinces were willing to join any federal scheme in this connection. It does not do the minister any good to adopt such tactics. Whether I am in or out of this house, I do not intend that the Minister of Labour or any hon. member on the other side shall misrepresent the position taken by myself or by the government of which I was a member.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): In or out, it will not make any difference.

Mr. HEENAN: It would be better if some people were out.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You are the first; start it.

Mr. HEENAN: I say to the hon. member; it won't be long now.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You are right, why not go now?

Mr. HEENAN: If the government cannot give more encouragement than they have given to the unemployed, they ought to resign like men and go to the country and let a government be elected which would do something.

An hon. MEMBER: Not a five cent piece.

Mr. HEENAN: If you divide the money you are voting by the number of unemployed you will find you are not giving even a five cent piece, you are giving about four and one half cents. The minister says that we are on the upturn and it is encouraging to know that we are pulling down the cost of unemployment relief from $46,000,000 to $20,000,000. But he admits in the same breath that the number of unemployed is increasing. Apparently we all should be tickled to death at the fact that while the number of unemployed are increasing, the government is spending less upon them. But that is the usual Tory policy.

We always have unemployment when a Tory government is in power. I advise my hon. friends who are sneering and laughing to call another convention to meet in the city of Winnipeg and change their name from the Liberal-Conservative association to the hard time party of Canada. I recall a member of the government standing up in 1921 and saying: "Mr. Speaker, why have we unemployment in this country? We have unemployment because the labouring men will not give a fair day's work for a fair day's pay." He said that the men were malingering in the industries, the same words as used to-day by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. GORDON: I never said any such thing.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister used the word "malingerer." If I had stood up in my place while I was Minister of Labour and used that word as the present minister has been using it, I do not know what would have been said about me. In 1921 a member of the government said that these men were malingering in the industries of the country which were going bankrupt because the men were not giving a fair day's work. He said that it took such a period as was then being faced by the country to bring the men to their senses and induce them to give a fair day's work. That was said in 1921, and I do not think the Tory psychology has changed since.

We ought to have the required information from the minister. We ought to know whether or not the government are going to build the trans-Canada highway, which the Prime Minister promised to do, not only in his speeches but in letters written to the newspapers. If they are not going to do it, or if they are going to postpone it, we ought to know something about the matter, but at least we ought to know what their intentions are.

[Mr. Heenan.]

As under section 2 there is provision for making agreements with the provinces, I should like to ask the minister this question: Will the agreement contemplate that private organizations shall disburse money and then be reimbursed by the province and the dominion? For instance, take the air force, branches of the Canadian Legion, sailors' unions, labour organizations and so on. Would they have the right under the agreement made with the provinces, to disburse their money through their membership, and then be reimbursed by the province and the dominion?

Mr. GORDON: I will read the arrangement with respect to the matter to which reference has just been made. It is contained in the instructions to the Auditor General, P.C. 2163:

> And that, further, the commissioner of unemployment relief and the Auditor General be authorized to accept accounts from the provinces under clause one of the agreements entered into under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931,—

And this continues and applies to the present legislation.

> —and to pass for payment the accounts for the dominion contribution to the expenditures reported by the provinces as having been made by the municipality, including in such municipal expenditures amounts voluntarily contributed by individuals, business firms, or associations, to the municipality, providing that such amounts have been utilized solely for relief purposes, and have been expended under the jurisdiction of the municipal authorities, and provided that such funds have not been raised by arbitrary deductions from wages payable to those engaged on relief work.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to find out from the minister whether organizations mentioned in section 2 will have to secure their payments through the agency of the province or directly from the federal government.

Mr. GORDON: Section 2 of the bill contemplates that the federal government shall enter into agreements with the provinces and, as in the past, payments will be made to them. We of course could not pay to the municipalities because, if we did, the task would become hopeless.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The clause to which I refer reads:

> Upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon,—enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein; grant financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise; loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking.

I note the remainder of paragraph (a) gives the government power to do anything. But my question is this: Would the payment to such body or corporation as is mentioned in the section have to be made through the agency of the province?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then the government, in addition to guaranteeing as provided for in paragraph (a), undertakes to deal with anyone in or out of the province. Is that the interpretation?

Mr. GORDON: The paragraph is exactly the same as the one in last year's legislation.

Mr. HEENAN: The question I wanted to ask the minister is this: Under P.C. 1423 of June 20, 1932, there were paid out for direct relief some moneys which had been disbursed by the Navy League of Ontario. At the moment I am not objecting to this, but will the minister recognize payment of moneys through the heads of the labour unions or the air force or the returned soldiers' organizations? Is that what is contemplated under this legislation?

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I do not just follow the hon. member.

Mr. HEENAN: I will send the minister a copy of the order in council.

Mr. GORDON: I see now the hon. gentleman's point. A payment of that character would be made through the province.

Mr. HEENAN: I know that. That money is disbursed by the Navy League of Ontario, which is a Toronto organization, to unemployed sailors and ex-sailors and their dependents. Then the provincial government no doubt gives the navy league the money and the Dominion government reimburses the province to the extent of one-third. Is it contemplated that the same thing would be permitted through other organizations, that is trade unions, branches of the Canadian Legion, the air force, or any similar organization that has a body of unemployed persons in its membership?

Mr. GORDON: If a province made representations to us along the lines suggested, and if the need were apparent, I would be prepared to give the matter very serious consideration, because it might easily be that that agency to which the hon. member has referred might be the best and most efficient one to disburse such money. But at the moment I cannot say that that would be the general policy.

Mr. HEENAN: When I noticed the order in council, I thought—and I see the minister agrees—that one of the best methods of looking after unemployed workmen might be through their unions.

Mr. GORDON: It might be; that is a matter which might be considered.

Mr. HEENAN: In many countries there are similar schemes whereby the government contributes through the labour unions. When I saw that order in council, it gave me encouragement to think the minister might adopt the scheme in a more general way instead of just through one particular organization.

Mr. HEAPS: I know some of the organizations that have been in receipt of the grants just mentioned and I know they have been doing very good work for the money received. Is the minister in a position to give the committee information as to the private organizations that have been in receipt of such relief as a result of grants from the federal treasury? Would the minister also give the amount expended up to date through private organizations?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the information before me. There have not been many such organizations. Whatever disbursement has been made, has been made through the provinces, but I think some of the provinces have adopted certain organizations which have a structure set up in the municipalities and which help to take care of needy people within their boundaries. Some of the provinces have used such organizations for the purpose of disbursing unemployment relief to families.

Mr. HEAPS: If I understood the minister correctly, the government have no objection to such services being given by private organizations under the jurisdiction of the local authorities?

Mr. GORDON: I think that is a fair way of putting it. If the local authorities consider that the organization has an efficient staff accustomed to taking care of these cases, and that its services can be utilized for the purpose, I cannot at present see any reason why those services should not be enlisted in order that the system of distributing relief may be more easily carried on, and probably at less expense.

Mr. REID: We have an organization in the municipality of Burnaby named the Army of Common Good, eight or nine hundred strong, composed of people who have gone out to help themselves, and I do not suppose there is a finer organization in the whole of Canada. They have gone out cultivated vacant parcels of ground, cut wood, et cetera, which they sell for firewood. Last year they comprised with their dependents some 3,000 altogether. They have not been dependent entirely on relief, but they require a little wharf or float on which to land their wood. This is an organization that should be helped. Would they have any chance of getting assistance from this government in view of the fact that they have gone out to help themselves?

Mr. GORDON: I am glad that the hon. member is able to report an organization of that character doing so well. I think their effort is to be very highly commended. If during the course of their work, and until they can get into some more paying vocation they should fall on misadventure I think the attention of the proper provincial authorities should be called to the organization and what they are doing so that if the organization needs any assistance in carrying on its work, it can be given consideration.

Mr. REID: They have, I believe, drawn the attention of the provincial government to their need for this wharf, but up to now they have not received any help at all. I repeat, these people are not on direct relief; they are out to assist themselves, and I do not believe there is another organization in the whole of Canada that has accomplished and endeavoured to do what this one has done. Their whole object is to maintain themselves and to keep away from relief, and so they are cultivating gardens and sawing firewood, doing any kind of work to help support themselves. In view of the fact that they are in need of and have asked the provincial government for a wharf and been refused, I am now asking would they receive consideration from the federal Department of Labour?

Mr. GORDON: Again I have to reiterate that I could not make or recommend any payment directly to that association, although I may say that I have heard of the work of these people to whom the hon. member refers, and in my view it is a fine illustration of what people can do if they set their minds to it. If they do fall on misadventure and cannot carry on or are unable after this work is finished to get into some other activity, I would urge them again to present their case to the provincial government, because I feel that their case should be given every consideration and that they are entitled to commendation for what they have done.

Mr. REID: They are not asking for financial help, but for a wharf or float on Burrard inlet so that they can land the wood which they cut and deliver to the homes of people purchasing it. They have not the money to pay for it themselves. Such an undertaking I understand is a dominion responsibility, and I would ask the minister if these people will receive consideration in the matter of this wharf.

Mr. GORDON: So far as I am aware there has been no request for a work of that character. Now that the circumstances have been explained to me a little more fully I would think that that work could probably be undertaken by the federal government, although we might be criticized, and perhaps justly so, for having invaded the time-honoured procedure of providing for the work without placing a vote in the estimates. But if it is made to appear that this wharf is very closely associated with relief work—

Mr. REID: Yes, it is.

Mr. GORDON: If the wharf is necessary in order to make that work a success which these eight or nine hundred people are carrying on in order to sustain themselves, I think at the risk of doing violence to that time-honoured procedure I might consider torturing it a bit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Listening to the minister read the order in council a moment ago, I thought I heard him say that it applied not only to corporations and organizations but to individuals; that any individual who had made a contribution for relief purposes might have his money paid back to him.

Mr. GORDON: No, that is not the construction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It said something about individuals.

Mr. GORDON: The clause contemplates that where individuals have contributed voluntarily to the coffers of the municipality for the purposes of relief—because there are a few cases in Canada where the municipality as such has been unable through its regular tax collections to take care of its obligations with respect to unemployed and needy or indigent persons within its boundaries—we have treated that as a contribution by the municipality, thereby enabling the province and the dominion to contribute their share.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is making the community contribution synonymous with a municipal grant?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. MALCOLM: Might I ask just what is meant by the word "corporation" in section 2? Does that mean an industrial firm?

Mr. GORDON: I would say that it did. While "corporation" is a very broad term when used as such, yet a public corporation to which this government would be justified in subscribing moneys must not in my view be such that its failure would have a widespread effect upon the general business of the country. I do not think this government would be at all justified in making indescriminate grants to corporations. At least I would not subscribe to it.

Mr. MALCOLM: My reason for asking the question is that it would appear that under clause (d), section 2, which permits the government to lend or advance money to corporations, a province might very well subsidize the pay-roll of an industry within its borders. If that were done, would the minister make a contribution towards subsidizing the pay-roll in order to lessen unemployment in the community? Or has the minister any knowledge as to whether that practice has ever been followed in any of the provinces, other than the grant made to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. GORDON: I have no knowledge of its having been done; in fact I am sure it has not been done in any instance. The only exception in the past under the other relief act was the first advance of about $1,400,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and then the $1,000,000 which has been authorized but not yet paid.

Mr. MALCOLM: Has the minister any knowledge, or can he deny, that advances have been made by a province to industrial firms to subsidize pay-rolls?

Mr. GORDON: I am not in a position to state whether or not a province has done that, but I know we have not contributed to it.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would submit to the minister that subsidizing the pay-roll of an industry in order to relieve unemployment within a municipality might have very far-reaching and disastrous effects on competition in another province. Inasmuch as it has been suggested—I can find no proof of it; nevertheless it causes some anxiety—that in some cases the provincial government has actually subsidized the pay-roll of an industry in order to keep men employed rather than have them go on relief, it seems to me the minister should have some control over a practice of that kind. If not, he is putting industry in other provinces at a very unfair disadvantage compared with the industry to which such treatment is given.

Mr. GORDON: I think I can assure the members of the committee that this government would not be a party, and certainly has not been in the past, to any contribution for the purpose suggested. I can readily see that it would result in exactly what the hon. member has pointed out.

Mr. EULER: If such a practice were indulged in by one province, would the minister's department necessarily know about it, and has he any check upon it?

Mr. GORDON: We would not know unless we were asked to contribute. But if application were made to the government to contribute we would immediately inquire into all the ramifications of that industry, and I can assure the committee that this government would not make a contribution that would result in the situation suggested by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm). Of course we do in effect subsidize some industries in this country, like the coal industry, but that is covered by legislation.

Mr. EULER: That is statutory; we understand it.

Mr. MALCOLM: I have no objection to the statutory subsidy to which the minister refers. But I would like to ask the minister if he can secure information from the provinces as to whether or not they have through their own treasuries subsidized the pay-rolls of any industry.

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I will have to answer by saying that I have enough trouble on my hands without going on a prospecting trip to find what the provinces are doing.

Mr. EULER: Following that a step further, may I ask whether, if the provinces did enter upon that practice of subsidizing industries, it necessarily follows that they specify all the expenditures they make when they apply to the federal government for its share of the cost? Does the dominion know exactly what the money is being expended for?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. The department knows what the money is being devoted to. The information that accompanies the certificate of expenditure from the province discloses the purpose for which the money is asked. And of course the Auditor General again checks the expenditure to see that it falls within the agreement and the statute. This part of the legislation referring to corporations I can well understand must be given the most careful attention, and it would be with great reluctance that advances would be made to public corporations, such as the advance to the wage earners on the Canadian Pacific Railway. It would have to be a very special case. The danger that has been pointed out by the hon. member for North Bruce would be one of the first questions that would have to be looked into, because undoubtedly if such a practice were adopted, in even one instance, it might easily result in very unfair competition, and dislocation of industry, which would be regrettable, and for which, of course, this government would be held directly responsible.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am very glad the minister has made that statement. Inasmuch as this relief money is voted jointly by the federal and the provincial governments, there should be some understanding between the federal and provincial authorities that such a practice shall not obtain. The fact that one province might subsidize an industry within its borders by granting it so much money towards its pay-roll would simply mean that that industry would be enabled to cut prices to the disadvantage of like industries in other provinces. It is a practice from which no good could come, but only strife, both for the wage earners and the manufacturers in other provinces. As the federal and provincial governments are carrying on this relief work jointly, I think the minister should have an understanding that no such unfair practice can possibly be allowed in the future, even though it may not have taken place in the past. I base my remarks on rumours that are current that such a practice has obtained. I do not confirm them; I know nothing of their truth, nevertheless such rumours are current.

Mr. MacLEAN: Although a great many figures have been quoted by the minister in this debate, it is difficult to find from those figures the amount that has been advanced to the different provinces under all the different schemes. I think it would be only fair for the minister to give the house, before the bill goes through, a tabulated statement setting forth in detail: first, the amount given for direct relief; second, the amount that has been expended under unemployment relief for public works; third, the amount of money loaned to farmers and farmers' organizations; fourth, money loaned to the provinces; and fifth, money loaned to corporations; also the total of all payments, with the percentages in relation to population for the different provinces. I know that the minister has been very patient and has given a great many figures, but I defy anyone to find out what has been contributed to any one province under all these different heads. If the minister has not the information here to-night I shall be glad to put my question on the order paper, but I think we should have, in percentage to population, the full amount contributed under the different schemes in the different provinces.

Mr. GORDON: The information sought by the hon. member was given to the house by me on February 24 of this year. I regret that the hon. member has had difficulty in identifying the amounts with respect to the various provinces, but to avoid the necessity of going over the whole picture from coast to coast I should be very glad, if it will suit his purpose, to have a statement prepared showing just what the hon. member has asked, and furnish it to him.

Mr. MacLEAN: I should be very pleased to have it in any form at all, because I believe we should have the per capita figures for the different provinces, and I do not think any percentages according to population have been given.

Mr. GORDON: Just what does the hon. member mean by percentages? Does he mean the per capita expenditure in each province?

Mr. MacLEAN: Certainly.

Mr. GORDON: I think that could be worked out easily. The hon. member means the per capita expenditure under each item indicated?

Mr. MacLEAN: Quite so.

Mr. GORDON: I will have a schedule worked out and furnished to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POWER: In connection with section 2, which provides that notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking, may I ask the minister if any such loans or advances or guarantees have been made to private corporations or to undertakings, whatever that may mean, since January 1, 1932, except the advance made to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. GORDON: As has been indicated already, there was a payment made to the Canadian Pacific Railway. There was also a guarantee given which has been referred to and explained in the house in connection with the Manitoba savings office. So far as my recollection serves me, no other guarantees or advances have been made to corporations. I think my recollection is correct in that.

Mr. POWER: Then may I ask the minister if the government is committed to any other guarantees, and I use the word "committed" advisedly. I intend to come back to this under section 7, because on reading over certain orders in council which have been produced I find that with reference to the first Canadian Pacific loan of $1,147,221.71 the government entered into an agreement with that company under the terms of which the Canadian Pacific was to keep its shops open from the 17th day of November, 1931, until the 31st day of December, 1931. Parliament was in session, I think, from about February 10, 1932, until well into the month of June, if my memory serves me aright, and during all that time we were not informed of this agreement between the administration and the Canadian Pacific. As a matter of fact the order in council was passed only on September 30, 1932, whereas the agreement or guarantee was given almost a year before, and the money was actually expended. I submit that it is bad enough to have the government take all the powers given to it under this act, by means of which parliament is absolutely ignored and the government is permitted, notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law, to do anything they think should be done; at least there is some kind of implied obligation to tell this house what has been done, and I submit that arrangements made verbally or over the long distance telephone between the minister and any corporation at once should be put in writing and placed before parliament. It is useless for us to have in this act section 7 which says:

> All orders in council and regulations made under the provisions of this act shall be laid before the House of Commons forthwith after the making thereof if parliament is then sitting, or if not, said orders in council or regulations or an abstract thereof disclosing their essential provisions shall be published in the next following issue of the Canada Gazette.

We may as well remove that section if the government can deal in millions of dollars without informing parliament. As a matter of fact I am informed that in the Beauharnois case it was months after the arrangement was made to guarantee the bonds that anything was placed in writing; everything was done by telephone. I have great respect for all the members of the government and for the Prime Minister but I submit that it is not fair to the contracting parties or to the government that at least some memorandum binding the government should not be made. No private business in the world would be carried on in that way, particularly when dealing with millions of dollars.

While I am on my feet I might as well refer to another order in council dealing with wheat, which I think I have in my desk. In the very preamble of the first order in council, dated November 15, 1932, providing for the guarantee to the banks to cover the gambling operations of the wheat pool, it is stated:

> The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 11th September, 1931, from the Minister of Finance, recommending that, in pursuance of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and of an undertaking on behalf of the government, made before the session of parliament at which said act was passed, to implement by legislation the recommendation hereinafter set out, the governor in council guarantee repayment to the chartered banks hereinafter mentioned:

The reason I asked the minister if anything had been done by way of a commitment is that we might be sitting here, and in fact we were sitting here, for months without being informed of undertakings, obligations, guarantees or contracts made by the government. So I say the section in question is absolutely useless; we might as well take it out of the act altogether unless we add something making it apply when agreements are made or decisions arrived at or legislation passed, because each order in council has the force and effect of an act of this house. Unless we have some assurance from the government that some such action will be taken I believe this section of the act might just as well be taken out. Having given the minister my reasons for the question, I now ask whether the government is committed in any way to any private corporation, to any province or to any private person for the expenditure of money or the guaranteeing of any expenditure of money in any way other than in the orders in council which have been produced in this house within the last few months.

Mr. GORDON: I do not believe that any guarantees have been made under this part of the section other than the ones with which the committee has dealt, namely, to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the guarantee against loss in connection with Beauharnois—I am not sure whether that was dealt with under the Relief Act—

Mr. POWER: Yes, it was.

Mr. GORDON: —that with respect to the wheat pools, and the Manitoba savings office; and the Dominion government is not obligated to any provincial government, corporation or individual in connection with any guarantee under the provisions of the act still in force. With respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the fact that the assurance was given in the fall of 1931, and the order in council was not in fact passed until the following year, the circumstances in connection with this matter were explained by the Prime Minister. The situation was this. The Canadian Pacific Railway approached the Dominion government and outlined the difficulties which they were in, and the government was also approached by the head of the labour unions. After the matter had received consideration the assurance was given in the fall of 1931 that, for the period of time indicated by the hon. member, the advance would be made to the Canadian Pacific Railway to pay the wages of these men, and of course the advance would be made only after the wages had been earned. Proof of the payment of the wages was not received by the government until the following year, and of course the order in council was not passed until the proof that the wages had been paid and that the men had been employed was furnished to the government. That is the reason the order in council was delayed after the assurance had been given in the fall. That was the situation with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway guarantee.

Mr. EULER: I understand there were two loans to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. GORDON: The first was a guarantee of wages of $1,400,000 odd, and there was authorization of a further $1,000,000 to be paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway when the wages were earned. That money has not yet been paid.

Mr. EULER: The loan has really been made in two parts. I believe the first loan was made without interest, and it was not to be repaid until such time as the railway again paid in excess of five per cent in dividends. Was the second loan made under the same terms and conditions, and if not what were the terms and conditions?

Mr. GORDON: There were two orders in council. The first one dealt with a loan of $1,447,222.71 and was a loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway repayable without interest when the earnings of the company enabled it to resume payments of dividends at not more than five per cent per annum. The second, passed on December 22, 1932, is to be paid back to the government without interest before any further dividends on any stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway are declared or paid.

Mr. DUFF: Listening to the ex-Minister of Labour, I was astounded when he made the statement that this government had advanced a certain amount of money to the Navy League of Ontario. Before dealing with that matter, however, there is a more pleasing duty to perform, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Spotton) and that is to wish you, sir, many happy returns of the day, and may your shadow never grow less. I preface my remarks with that compliment so that you will not call me to order in the course of what I have to say.

I can understand that under this subsection (a) of section 2 of the bill before us, very wide powers are given, and it seems that under this clause almost any person can ask the provincial or the federal government for money and get it.

Mr. COTNAM: Glad to hear it.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend gets some wisdom listening to me. It seems to me that "Navy League of Ontario" is rather a misnomer; I do not understand how that body can apply to this government or to the provincial government for relief. I could understand, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, that there might be an application from the egg circle of West York, if it spent money for relief purposes and wanted assistance from the province or the dominion, or an application from the potato growers' association of Lambton county, or from the organization known as the Grange, or even from the Ku Klux Klan or the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. I could understand it if the application came from any of these organizations. It seems to me however that there is something wrong in the distribution of relief by this government and the province when they allow an organization known as the Navy League of Ontario to distribute moneys and expect the taxpayers to pay for it. Again, I could understand that from any of the cities of Vancouver, Halifax, Montreal and Quebec an application might come and the navy league in any of these places might have something to do with the distribution of relief, under agreement with this government or with the province interested. But if the yachtsmen of Toronto and places on lake Ontario want to put on a little swank and, instead of calling their organization the yacht club of Toronto, they decide to call it the Navy League of Ontario, that is no good reason why the federal or the provincial government should allow them to spend money and then ask the taxpayers of the country to foot the bill. If that is the way the money is being distributed, then it is high time a halt was called. I should like to have a detailed statement from the minister in connection with the $2,174.12 which was distributed by the navy league under order in council passed on June 20, 1932. I realize there are certain organizations which are doing good work in the distribution of relief money but it seems to me that it is going too far when an organization on lake Ontario or in the city of Toronto known as the navy league is permitted to distribute money. I should like to know how this money was distributed and who received it.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): A Lunenburg navy would be much better, wouldn't it?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, much better.

Mr. GORDON: The money was not paid by this government to the Ontario navy league; it was disbursed by the navy league and the province of Ontario paid a portion of the cost while the Dominion government contributed its percentage. I have not before me the details of the actual expenditures and the names of the persons to whom relief was granted, but if it is not in the department I am sure it can be obtained from the Ontario government. I shall obtain it and give it to the hon. member, if he so desires.

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand that when the government receives a request from an organization like this navy league of Toronto it pays the money out without knowing what it is to be used for, who is to receive it and so on? I can understand that in a city like Toronto there must be many people who are receiving relief, but surely the different churches, the different labour unions and other organizations are better qualified to do this work than a little two by four, freshwater organization which comes and asks for money from the dominion treasury.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF: Although my hon. friends may laugh, I am serious about this. There must be something loose in the organization looking after this relief when a so-called organization known as the navy league must step into the breach in the great province of Ontario and the great city of Toronto. There must be hundreds of organizations looking after relief in that city, and I do not think the government should countenance an organization like the navy league coming in and getting money from this dominion. I hope the minister will note my remarks and will see that relief is given through sources other than the navy league.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I should like to refer to the latter part of subsection (a) of section 2 of this bill and ask the minister if I am right in assuming that from now on no notes will be taken from people in the province of Saskatchewan who are recipients of relief.

Mr. GORDON: The taking of notes in the province of Saskatchewan has been the subject of discussion upon a number of occasions. I believe it is clear in the minds of hon. members that these notes were taken because the people themselves did not want charity. I assume there were some who in their extremity were not very anxious to repay, but a great number of the people did want to pay back and are paying back. Therefore, the Saskatchewan relief commission took notes from them all. Our future course will have to depend upon the situation existing in each individual instance. It is remotely possible that a situation may arise similar to that which arose in Saskatchewan where the people were destitute because of the total failure of their crops. Those people were not without assets but the assets they had could not be converted into money. I would not care to give the assurance that in a similar instance a similar course would not be adopted. I am sure the hon. member will recognize that many of the people in the dried out areas of Saskatchewan have an earnest desire to pay back the amounts advanced to them. As the statement which I spread upon the records discloses, they are paying them back.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): There are a great many people throughout the province of Saskatchewan who, like myself, have wondered just why it was that the recipients of relief in that province were called upon to give notes for the relief they received. We have been wondering this because of the statement made by the Prime Minister on July 29, 1931. At that time the Prime Minister said:

During the last few days I have received telegrams from the province of Saskatchewan suggesting that it was not desirable that direct relief which might be regarded as charity should be accorded to those hardy settlers who have lost their all for the third, and in some instances the fourth succeeding year, but rather that they would like to execute some document which would indicate that they regarded the help given as an obligation which they might sometime be able to pay. I would say to my good friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) that that indicates at least the attitude of most of those who at the present time are without crops and who have had the third succeeding crop failure.

In view of that statement, I asked for a return of all the correspondence which had been received from people in the province of Saskatchewan in connection with the giving of notes by farmers in that district. My request was placed upon the order paper early in the session of 1932 and was passed by the house on March 23, 1932. On May 4 the return had not come down and I asked why it had not been brought down. At that time the Prime Minister said that he thought it had been brought down. I made an inquiry some weeks after and I was then told it would be brought down before the end of the session. On May 23, the Prime Minister made this statement:

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) has asked me a question on several occasions. I thought he had misread what I said on the 29th July, 1931, I find on looking up the record that I then said:

"During the last few days I have received telegrams from the province of Saskatchewan suggesting that it was not desirable that direct relief which might be regarded as charity should be accorded to those hardy settlers who have lost their all for the third, and in some instances the fourth succeeding year, but rather that they would like to execute some document which would indicate that they regarded the help given as an obligation which they might sometime be able to pay. I would say to my good friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) that that indicates at least the attitude of most of those who at the present time are without crops and who have had the third succeeding crop failure."

I observe the hon. gentleman read my remarks as indicating that I had received communications from the province of Saskatchewan, and he was seeking information as to what member of the provincial government had communicated with me. It will be observed that my language did not mean that I had received communications from the provincial government, but from persons residing within the province. While some of the communications were marked "personal," the one that gave me the most information was from a loan company manager, who, I knew, had travelled over the territory and found a disposition on the part of the settlers not to take charity but to make a contribution in the sense indicated.

That was not by any means a satisfactory reply. I never at any time indicated that I thought the communication came from a member of the provincial government; that was not in my mind at all. But people in Saskatchewan are still asking who it was that was so much concerned about the business as to telegraph to the Prime Minister that they should be allowed to give notes for the relief they received. We are still wondering who it was, and I think, in fairness to the many other managers of loan companies in Saskatchewan, the Prime Minister should tell us who this particular gentleman was who knows so much about the farmers. I have discussed the matter with many farmers and they say that they would like to know who it was, because they are sure that no farmer in Saskatchewan requested permission to give a note for the relief he received. If there are any such farmers, we would like to know who they are and who this loan manager was. We would like to know who it was that was so busy as to send these requests to the Prime Minister that the farmers should give notes for their relief. Can we have an answer to this?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows quite well it would be impossible for me to make any statement as to names, although my memory is fairly good. I looked up the matter at the time and gave an answer before the end of last session for the very reason that the hon. gentleman asked for the information and I endeavoured to supply it. The telegrams were marked "personal." The gentleman was a manager of a loan company who had just completed travelling over the territory. I had stopped at Regina and discussed the matter at that time. When we were sitting around the table it was said that a number of the farmers desired to give notes, and as a matter of fact the commission did prepare notes which were signed by those who received relief.

That a number of farmers would ask about the matter seems passing strange in view of the fact that they gave notes in large numbers. All that received relief gave notes for the relief they got and I did not think anything more about the matter. The hon. gentleman asked for the correspondence. Perhaps he is not aware that between August 7, 1931 and February of 1932, according to the file clerks, as many file boxes were filled as during the term of office of my predecessor, so it is a little difficult to carry all these things in mind. I did at the time endeavour to give an answer to the hon. gentleman. I do not now recall the name of the gentleman, but he said that he had just completed a tour and his statement only confirmed what had been told to me at the meeting held in Regina where we were all sitting round the board together and discussing these matters. While we did not arrange the notes, they were given by the farmers and I understood, although not until after my explanation in the house, that they were taken in favour of the crown in right of the dominion, which was not our understanding of the matter at the time. That, however, was done. The Premier of Saskatchewan was reported as saying that some $400,000 had been returned of loans that had been made for relief purposes. That was with respect to seed, as I understand the matter. That the farmers gave notes, there is no doubt in the world. That they agreed to give notes, was, as I understood the situation, a matter of arrangement. From what was said to me at the time of my visit to Regina as well as from the communications to which I referred when I looked them up something like a year ago now, it will be apparent that the farmers who were receiving relief desired to return it. Moreover, I received many communications stating that it was highly desirable that that should be done, because nothing was worse than that relief should be distributed without any idea of its ever being repaid. A number of citizens speaking from an organization standpoint said that if we desired to prevent the evil consequences that might flow from giving direct relief, every man who received it should sign for it, indicating not only the receipt of it but a willingness to repay it if he ever were in a position to do so.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I think the farmers were not averse to giving notes for the seed grain that they received, but they feel there was an injustice because they were compelled to sign for every pound of tea and everything else they got and give a note for them, whereas in the cities that was not done until very much later. It looks as if the farmers were not given a square deal in having to sign notes for everything they got in the way of relief.

Mr. BENNETT: It is only well that the hon. member should bear in mind that the provinces had control of the distribution of relief in the cities and that the dominion undertook full responsibility only with respect to those seventy odd municipalities in which there had been a complete loss of crop for three succeeding years. Even then a commission was appointed by the province at the request of the Dominion government, and the Dominion government dealt with the province.

I might say to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough that there was no dealing with any navy league or any other organization by the Dominion government; it dealt only with the provinces and the provinces made the arrangements, because, as I read the constitution—and I may be entirely in error—the dominion does not deal with organizations or communities except through the province. The province alone is the medium of communication and contact between those who receive relief and the Dominion government.

Mr. DUFF: But the fact remains that this government and the people generally had to pay this money which, as the Prime Minister said, was paid out under the arrangement made by the province with the navy league. When that request to pay this money came in from the province, the federal government should have turned down the request and not paid the money. There are navy leagues in different parts of the country and their officials go out and collect private subscriptions to look after sailors who are not able to take care of themselves. I object to the federal government paying this money. It seems to me that if other sums are paid by the government in the same way, it is time we had a royal commission to investigate the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman, despite his prejudice, does not desire to be unfair. May I say to him that the province of Ontario selected the navy league as an instrument to distribute relief amounting in the aggregate to $2,000. The distribution having been made and the vouchers for the payments having been obtained in accordance with the agreement with the province, the Dominion government repaid to the province the share which under the agreement the dominion was liable to pay for relief distributed to needy persons through the instrumentality selected by the province.

Mr. DUFF: I can assure the Prime Minister that I have no prejudice. All I am endeavouring to show him—and I am sure in his heart he must agree with me—is that if relief is necessary in the city of Toronto or on the great lakes, there certainly must be other methods of arranging it and distributing the money than through the so-called Navy League of Ontario. When the Prime Minister admits and the record shows that only some $2,000 have been distributed by this organization, that completely proves my point that it was absolutely unnecessary for this organization to distribute the money, or for either the province or the dominion to repay it. There were other means of looking after distressed sailors, and there was no need for this small organization, the Navy League of Ontario, to spend $2,000 and then go back to the province and the dominion and ask for the money. I say this, that the officials of the navy league in Toronto ought to have had pride enough either to put their hands into their own pockets and pay this small amount, or get subscriptions from the white-duck trousered men who belong to the organization.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to make one further observation to the hon. gentleman. If he will look at the votes and proceedings, page 314, he will note a reference to the tabling of the second order in council, dated March 15, 1933, authorizing payment to the province of Ontario of the sum of $75,056.19 for direct relief distributed in the municipalities, in unorganized districts and by the Ontario Navy League. The second order in council covered payments to the province for direct relief not only in unorganized districts but by the Ontario Navy League. The first order in council covered a payment of $2,200, to which the hon. gentleman directed attention a little while ago.

That raises a very nice question. I put it to the hon. gentleman and to the committee, if a province in the exercise of its discretion and as an autonomous unit responsible for the distribution of relief selects an instrument for that purpose, and the distribution of relief is made and the vouchers produced, is it competent or is it within the spirit of the act that the dominion should say that the instrument chosen was an unfit instrument? The hon. gentleman's complaint is that the instrument chosen by the province was an unfit instrument to distribute relief. I am bound to say from what I know of the Navy League of Ontario, that it is composed of men with a high sense of public duty anxious to assist in times of stress and strain, and their contributions in the past—I am not speaking about this particular matter now—have been very generous. But whether or not the dominion should say that the instrument thus chosen was a fit one is a question that has been discussed in this committee from time to time. My opinion up to this moment has been that when a province charged with responsibility to its citizenry makes payments and selects its own instrument to make distribution, we, having bound ourselves by agreements to repay the portion of the money so distributed or expended, cannot be too critical of the instrument chosen and allege it to be an improper one, provided always that the audit discloses that there has been a distribution of moneys in accordance with the representations made by the province in connection with the expenditures in question.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure the Prime Minister does not want to misquote me. I do not think I said that this organization was unfit to distribute this money. What I said or meant to say, and think I did say, was that the organization was unnecessary; and I repeat that. With all the organizations in the great city of Toronto, the charitable organizations, church organizations, labour unions and everything else, I think this organization was unnecessary particularly when the amount was so small. If the Navy League of Ontario was a great organization and had distressed sailors coming in every night to be looked after, I could understand why it might be necessary under the broad clause in this act that both the province and the dominion should pay money to this organization. But surely the Prime Minister must agree with me that when the amount is only $2,000, divided between the organization itself, the province, and the dominion, the money, spent for distressed sailors I presume, might very well have been spent by some other organization.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire only to say that the navy league itself did pay 33⅓ per cent of the sum expended.

Mr. DUFF: I said that.

Mr. HEAPS: Coming back to the question of the notes, I understand that quite a large sum has been paid back on account of notes given by recipients of public relief.

Mr. BENNETT: Seed grain, I said I believed it was. That is my information.

Mr. HEAPS: I understand that those also who have been receiving public relief have paid back some of the moneys that were handed to them for relief. If such is the case, the funds which enabled them to receive relief were funds granted by the federal authorities. If the municipalities and the provinces are collecting money from those who in the past have received relief, I should like to know if any of that money has been returned to the federal authorities.

Mr. GORDON: With respect to the notes, a comparatively small amount, $10,016.78, has been paid back. With respect to seed grain loans, $410,000 has been returned. I believe that more has been paid back in connection with relief notes not yet reported but which we expect will in due course be reported.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister tell us which of the provinces have paid back that $10,000 odd?

Mr. GORDON: The province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. HEAPS: That is the only one?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Nothing from Manitoba, Alberta or any other province?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before this clause carries, Mr. Chairman, I think it ought to be read into the record so that anyone interested in perusing this discussion later on will see exactly what it is we have been discussing. I am inclined to think that this section will acquire a certain historical interest before very long. I would ask the chairman if he will please read the section.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Spotton): Section 2 reads:

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may,—

(a) Upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon,—enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein; grant financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise; loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking; and in respect of such loans, advances and guarantees, may accept such security, enter into such agreements and generally do all such things as the governor in council may deem necessary and expedient in the public interest.

(b) Take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada, and to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I noticed that some hon. gentlemen opposite thought it very amusing that I should ask that this section be read. I hope they did not think that I was referring particularly to them when I said that it might be well to have it on the record in order that persons reading the record later on might be made fully aware of what the section as it appears in the bill is. I assumed that hon. gentlemen opposite had some idea of what we were discussing, but the reader of Hansard a year hence may have some difficulty possibly in appreciating the full significance of some of the references to this particular section, if the section itself does not appear on the record.

May I make doubly clear what does appear in this section, and what I think will be of increasing interest and concern to the people of Canada as they are asked in budget after budget to pay out more in the way of taxation? When the public understands that the section we are now passing gives the government of the day the right to dip into the treasury to any extent it pleases with respect to meeting obligations of all kinds which the government may incur, and to loan the funds of Canada in a dozen and one directions, they will begin to think that perhaps there is something in this section worth having on record and paying some attention to. In order that some of my hon. friends opposite may appreciate something of the extent of what in the way of parliamentary control they are so ready to part with, may I direct their attention to just what the section says:

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may,—

(a) . . . loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking; and in respect of such loans, advances, and guarantees, may . . . generally do all such things as the governor in council may deem necessary and expedient in the public interest.

If that is not an authority that ought to give this house occasion to pause before it is granted, I would like to know what words in a proposed statute could possibly occasion hesitation.

Let me read the next section:

(b) Take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada, and to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

In other words this section is the means taken by this government to set up a dictatorship in Canada. A few years ago we saw how a dictatorship originated in Italy. Those who have seen this evening's papers have seen how a dictatorship within the past two days has been set up in Germany. Some day, students of political developments in Canada may be interested to see where, in a British country, dictatorships first got their rise. They will find it in the section I have just read to this house.

Mr. COTNAM: How about Roosevelt?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Roosevelt has not anything like the powers given here. And let me say to my hon. friend that I prefer to take my examples in matters of government from Britain and British institutions rather than from the United States. May I point out further what my hon. friend apparently does not know, that in the United States the president is the executive and has autocratic powers that it has never been assumed in any British country would be given to any executive. In this and in other self-governing British countries, parliament controls the executive.

Mr. COTNAM: Isn't it a British country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; if my hon. friend does not know, I will tell him.

Mr. COTNAM: You were over there long enough to know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Probably it would have been a good thing for my hon. friend if he had had some knowledge of any community outside of the one in which he has spent most of his life. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into an unnecessary discussion with back-benchers on the other side, and perhaps my hon. friend who is so fond of interrupting, will just mind his own business for a few minutes.

Mr. COTNAM: That got under your skin. Your skin is pretty thin.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice some hon. gentlemen in the back seats who had great difficulty in getting into them. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may have order—

Mr. REID: If they are sick why don't they go outside?

Mr. ILSLEY: If they are shot why don't they disappear?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it may be of interest to those following political developments in this country to see the sort of example which is being set by the Conservative party to those members in the far corner, whom they are continually condemning because of their desire to set up a cooperative commonwealth federation in this country which will control all the natural resources and the socially necessary means of production. If the day ever comes when these gentlemen in the far corner should have occasion to ask themselves or should be asked how they propose to do it, I do not think they will have to go further for their answer than to refer to section 2 of bill 55, the one which is now before us, which shows how a government may take to itself absolute authority for any purpose. Let me substitute the words of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the other day for some of the words which appear in this section. It would then read:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may generally do all such things as the governor in council may deem necessary and expedient in the public interest, take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada, and to set up a cooperative commonwealth which shall control all the natural resources and socially necessary means of production to be used in the interests of the people and not for the benefit of the few.

You have the whole situation there. The Conservative party by this section shows the country how a dictatorship may be established with the governor in council in the role of dictator. Hon. gentlemen in the far corner advocate a dictatorship not of an individual but of a class. Both are carried out in exactly the same way, the way set forth in this section. I say it is an astounding thing that the parliament of Canada, of all countries in the world, should have been the first British community to set a precedent for a possible future government of that character.

Mr. HEENAN: Before the clause is carried I want to point out to the minister that when we first entered into these relief agreements we had the assurance of the Prime Minister and the government that the money would be administered in a non-partisan way. I am not going into all that has taken place in northern Ontario; that has been dealt with to some extent. But I have in my hand the public accounts of the province of Ontario, and I will give just one example of what is going on. In the town of Kenora, which is not a large town but is a very important one, there are two hardware stores.

One is an old established firm kept by a family that has been Liberal for many years. The other one, not very long established, is conducted by the president of a Conservative association. In 1931-32 the public accounts show that there was spent in the last mentioned hardware store by the province of Ontario, from moneys which we contributed here, approximately $30,000, and in the other store, the Liberal store, $125. I know it is difficult for the minister to do business with the Ontario government and make them toe the mark; I have been trying to do it for the last fifteen years and have not succeeded. But I think he should insist that the pledge given by the Prime Minister of Canada and the government of Canada that these moneys would be expended in a fair and equitable way should be carried out.

Mr. MITCHELL: Reference was made to the government coming to the assistance of the Navy League of Canada, Ontario branch. I know many other organizations carrying on work of a like nature, for example the Typographical Union in the city from which I come. Not one member of that organization, notwithstanding that many of them have been out of work for a long time, has yet applied for relief of any description. The organization has carried those men by weekly assessments on the pay of the members. I do not think distinction should be made between one organization and another. I know other labour organizations which are carrying on work of a like character. If it is good policy for the government to come to the assistance of one organization—and I am not finding fault with the policy at the moment—it is just as logical that they should come to the assistance of these labour organizations. I would like to know what is the attitude of the government, should an application be made by one of these labour organizations for the same measure of assistance as has been rendered to the navy league.

Mr. BENNETT: Apparently the hon. gentleman entirely misunderstood what has taken place. The navy league distributed relief, one-third of which they themselves provided; another third was provided by the province of Ontario and the remaining third by the dominion. If the organization to which the hon. gentleman refers is distributing relief—and he says it is not—then it would come within the rule that was adopted in this case. There has been no suggestion of discrimination; a public body desiring to afford assistance in a time of stress and strain to a number of people, the public, who sought relief, has distributed that relief as the instrumentality selected by the province, not by this government. Under its agreement the province was entitled to secure from the dominion one-third of the cost of such relief, the other two-thirds being provided by the province and the organization itself.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not suggest that there was any discrimination; I want that thoroughly understood. I think the Prime Minister must have misunderstood me. I did not listen to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman; I based my observations on the remarks of the Minister of Labour. Nevertheless I am glad the Prime Minister made his statement in this connection; I take it that this organization will be entitled to the same measure of relief if they act as this other organization has acted. This is relief; it is money raised by the members themselves by an assessment on the wages earned by those who are employed. I am glad that policy has the blessing of the Prime Minister and I understand that provided they adopt the practice followed by this other organization they will be entitled to the same measure of assistance from the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Among others the following organizations have been selected by the provinces to distribute relief: the Ontario Navy League, the Red Cross Society, the St. Vincent de Paul Society, the Jewish Federation of Charities and the Protestant Relief Committee. I merely name these because it happened that the navy league was one of the agencies selected by the province. I doubt whether, on the statement now made by the hon. gentleman, the organization to which he refers could be selected as an instrument of government to make a general distribution of relief in the community.

Mr. HEAPS: I believe in some cases the municipalities have endorsed organizations which have been given the assistance which was given the organization mentioned by the Prime Minister. Would not a union, carrying out work of a charitable nature among its members, come within that category?

Mr. BENNETT: I would say not.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to say just a word, Mr. Chairman; I have checked a few notes I made with regard to the agreements entered into with the provinces. On March 3, Rev. Father Bilodeau wrote a letter which appeared in Le Soleil, and the date and location mentioned in that letter are very important. On March 8 Mr. Laforce of the colonization department of the Canadian National Railways wrote me a letter, which I answered on March 9. Then on March 10 he wrote a letter to Doctor Black—in which he quotes fifteen other letters from settlers. Two of those letters bear neither date nor location; three bear no location; eight bear no date, and only two have a date and a location. I want to place those facts on record, Mr. Chairman, to show that directly after my speech of March 2 Father Bilodeau wrote me from Quebec. Then on March 14, eleven days later, he wrote again, and translated into English, the first paragraph reads:

I have received the declarations which were sent me after coming back from the mission, where I probably was more fatigued than you are as a member of the House of Commons.

The French is as follows:

J'ai reçu les déclarations que vous m'avez envoyées à un retour de mission où j'ai eu probablement plus de fatigue que vous en avez à la Chambre comme député.

To conclude, the facts were placed before the house on March 2, and on March 3, Father Bilodeau was in Quebec. Then he left for places unknown, and on March 14, he was back in Quebec saying he had visited those colonization regions. It took him eleven days; he said he was very tired. I am not positive, of course, but I wonder if he did not go to collect the letters which were sent to Laforce and afterwards to Doctor Black, most of them without location or date. At this time of year I cannot leave my sessional duties and go to that district, but I will surely go there this summer to see conditions for myself.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 3—Further powers of governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Subsection (b) reads:

Without restricting the generality of the terms of the next preceding section hereof and not withstanding the provisions of any statute or law, the governor in council may,—
(b) assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of the products of field, farm, forest, sea, river and mine.

We were told yesterday that advantage would be taken of this section to provide whatever may be required for the agricultural stabilization fund mentioned by the Minister of Finance in the budget speech. Can the minister give an estimate of what amount he thinks will be required in that regard?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. GORDON: I would not care to estimate the amount that may be required. In the judgment of the government the step outlined in the budget speech was very desirable from the standpoint of agriculturists and others named in this section. I do not think the right hon. gentleman will disagree with me when I say that it is very desirable that the course outlined in the budget speech should be adopted, because we believe—and I doubt if many hon. members of this committee will disagree—that the assistance which will be rendered these primary producers will go a long way towards stimulating trade and enabling them to get their products on the markets particularly of the United Kingdom. It would be quite impossible for me to estimate the amount of money that may be necessary to meet the requirements of that fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely in preparing the budget the government must have had some idea of what amounts of money would be required for different purposes. My hon. friend as Minister of Labour must surely have some idea, in a general way, of what will be required in connection with the expenditures under this act. Can he not give us some sort of estimate?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The press gave an estimate of about $6,000,000, and I was wondering whether they had received information from an official source that confirmed the basis of that estimate.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the leader of the opposition will undoubtedly realize that the amount desired will depend entirely upon the value of the pound. This is a relief measure which expires on March 31, 1934, and the volume of business that we would transact would of course be the first determining factor, the second factor being the fluctuating value of the pound sterling on exchange. If the pound increases in value, then obviously, with the volume of business increasing, the amount payable would be smaller than would be the case were there a wider margin. The figure of $6,000,000 mentioned is a figure which I have not seen, but which the hon. gentleman says appears in the press. My own estimate would be higher than that, but I would put it at less than $10,000,000 as a maximum, assuming that there were a very much larger volume of business than there is now, and that the pound sterling in exchange value were less than it is at present.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister this question. He estimates that $10,000,000 will be spent—

Mr. BENNETT: No; I said that would be the maximum.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, in the nature of a bonus on exports; that is what it is, and exports, I presume, by persons who must be employed or they would not be able to export their commodities. How does my right hon. friend justify having this amount provided for in an act which is intended to relieve those who have no employment?

Mr. BENNETT: The title of the act, as the right hon. gentleman will recall, was originally an act for the relief of unemployment and for farm relief as well, and we combined the two, providing for relief for unemployment through the direct action of the provinces, acting with their instrumentalities, the bodies they themselves created by the legislatures, the municipalities and so on, and farm relief, which has become essential by reason of the low price of farm commodities. If the condition of the agrarian population is as indicated with respect to the commodities that have been mentioned, then it is indeed a relief when the farmer is saved from the disastrous consequences of a continuance of existing conditions, and stabilization will result in his having first of all certainty as to what his prices will be, as reflected through that stabilization, and secondly the knowledge that he is not going to be subject to a sudden fall by reason of exchange values depreciating at a later part of the season, for instance, in connection with a matter like poultry or any other commodity of that type. The whole theory of the matter is that it is a relief measure consequent upon the low price of agricultural commodities and the depreciated value of the currency of the country with which the export business is largely carried on. It is neither a bonus nor a bounty in the sense in which that term is correctly used, and is treated as I have indicated for the very reason that it expires on March 31, 1934, and is intended to be—in fact it will be—a relief measure for the agricultural population of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that the section relates not merely to certain classes of agricultural products, for it speaks of assisting in defraying the cost of sale and distribution of the products of field, farm, forest, sea, river and mine. Is the Prime Minister making similar provision with respect to the exports of minerals and other products of mines, so as to assist those who are working in the mines? Is he making similar provision for the assistance of fishermen, with respect to the products of sea and river, also with respect to the products of the men working in the forests, in the export of lumber, which is a large and important industry, and in connection with the field also, the export of grain, the most important of any of our exports, cattle, and apples, which are also very important?

Mr. BENNETT: I thought that would be mentioned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are all these to receive assistance through funds similar to this one? If not, why not?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps this is the appropriate place to discuss this matter. So far as products of the sea are concerned, I fancy they are covered by the word fish used by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday last.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Cod liver oil and whale oil as well.

Mr. BENNETT: Fish and fish products, I believe, were the words used.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Fresh fish and canned fish.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Each case has thus far, since these words were in the statute, been determined upon its own merits. For instance, if you used the word grain, it would cover all forms of grain; but when parliament two years ago voted five cents a bushel for wheat, that covered one specific kind of grain only, and the result was that $12,500,000 was expended at a time that was most opportune in assisting in the payment of taxes and for other obligations which the farmers had to meet. So far as the products of the forest are concerned, that is a matter which has not engaged the attention of the government; nor was lumber included in the items mentioned yesterday, for reasons which I fancy commend themselves to the house at once. There are other avenues of effort through which we think we can attain the end, by some means other than the means indicated by the statute. With respect to mines, there has been no suggestion that the government should take any further action at the moment in this regard, except in connection with coal, and that has been dealt with in another way, by provisions of statutes that have been passed by this house.

The mining situation is still one of extreme difficulty for reasons which I think are known to every member of the house. On the Pacific coast difficulties have arisen by reason of coal being brought as ballast in ships that return with cargoes of wheat, and the competition of that coal has been felt very keenly by the coal producing companies on the west coast. It is equally true upon the east coast, equally true with respect to the collieries of Cape Breton. "Bonus" is undoubtedly the correct term to apply to the coal subventions that have been granted by this government and by the previous government in an endeavour to save the coal industry under very distressing conditions, such probably as that industry has never experienced in Canada, not only because of the circumstances to which I have alluded but because of the substitution of oil fuel to a very considerable extent for coal by domestic users, owing to the ease with which it can be used and its cleanliness as a fuel. That is one of the difficulties. In connection with steam power, the use of electricity has of course supplanted steam-driven machinery in the great central provinces of the dominion, and this has resulted in a diminished use of coal. That is a matter that has been dealt with by this government, and by the preceding government on another basis altogether. The last commodity mentioned, apples, was one about which I would have judged there would be considerable discussion in the house. Apples are protected in the British market by a preference of four shillings and six pence per hundred pounds, which happens to be a full shilling more than the preference requested by the apple growers of Nova Scotia, for instance. A combination of circumstances made it possible to secure a preference of four shillings and six pence which is the rate now standing. Whether or not a further assistance should be given will depend upon what might be disclosed as to its properly being said to be relief to industry.

Every hon. member who is familiar with the situation confronting the cattle industry will admit at once that it becomes a matter of relief because of the existing currency depreciation and the situation generally in connection with cattle and cattle products. Duties which have heretofore existed and now exist in the United States make the exportation of cattle from Canada to that country practically impossible. The slight difference in the price of a steer selling, let us say for the sake of argument, at £15 will make the difference between confidence and the lack of confidence and between success in attaining some profit out of operations and a loss which might have to be assumed. I believe that every hon. member who is familiar with the industry will realize that as a relief measure it is certainly justified.

I fancy it is not the desire of the committee that we should traverse these various items, but I merely mention that the principle that has governed was not a bonus or a bounty, it was relief for the year ended March 31, 1934, granted in the most effective and efficient way it was thought such relief could be granted, having regard to the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I recall, the United Kingdom-Canada agreement contained a clause about not subsidizing exports from one part of the empire to another. There was something which referred to subsidized imports.

Mr. BENNETT: That was a resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my right hon. friend received an assurance from the British government that what he is granting in the way of bonus or subsidy in these cases will in no way affect the terms of the agreement as understood in Great Britain?

Mr. BENNETT: No, the government has not received any such assurance from the British government and so far has not asked them about it. It is not believed that this will in any sense contravene the provisions of the resolution. It must be remembered that that was not part of the agreement; it was one of the resolutions adopted by all the countries—Great Britain, Australia, South Africa, Canada and New Zealand. We do not believe that the steps we have taken as a relief measure to deal with this situation will be regarded by any of the governments as a violation or a contravention in any sense of the terms and provisions of the agreements. It will be recalled that the United Kingdom-Canada agreement provides for a domestic price for wheat and also for quotas with respect to many other commodities, and that principle is being extended. That is a purely domestic matter which could hardly be regarded as a subsidy or a bounty. It is our considered view that there is no likelihood of the British government regarding unfavourably this relief measure which has been upon our statutes in terms for two years but which we thought desirable to mention specifically in the course of the budget the other day in order that it might not be said that the house had not been apprised of our intentions.

It was suggested the other day that we should be able to anticipate any contingency which might arise. At that time I expressed grave doubt that any government would be able to anticipate what might happen upon this continent or in any other part of the world even twenty-four or thirty-six hours ahead. I gave an illustration predicated upon the experience of some of the leading men in the city of New York gained in the space of thirty hours. Availing ourselves of the provisions of this statute, we thought it desirable that we should make known to the house in the budget the intentions of the government in connection with relief measures to deal with a situation which confronted our agricultural production.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Most of the products, the export of which are likely to be assisted, will be dairy products. As I recall the United Kingdom-Canada agreement, the preference given to dairy products in the British market is for only three years.

Mr. BENNETT: Three years certain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. The British government has reserved to itself the right to revise the terms upon which dairy products will be admitted to Great Britain after that time. May I ask the Prime Minister if he has considered if the effect of this subsidizing of dairy products for export purposes may not increase the protectionist sentiment in Great Britain in so far as it concerns agricultural interests in that country and in the long run result in the probability of our dairy products being pretty effectively shut out of the British market?

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman is quite correct in assuming that there is a provision in the agreement to give dairy products a preference for three years certain, but he will recall that it was not a question of the loss of preference, it was only a question of the method by which the preference would be granted, that is, the preference might be by quotas or by percentages of duties payable by the foreigner. It might be decided whether there should be an allocation of quotas to Canada or a continuance of the preference with respect to dairy products.

One of the risks which all governments must take is that attendant upon conclusions that a certain line of action will enure to the benefit of the people of the country in question. Weighing the situation from the standpoint of advantages and disadvantages to be derived and having regard to existing conditions in agriculture in this and other countries, we believe that the results to be derived from the exercise of the powers contained in this relief measure will be of benefit to agriculture and all its various ramifications. I claim no omnipotence or omniscience with respect to matters of this kind. As I have said, we know of the difficulties of foreseeing in a world such as this what will happen within twenty-four hours. We know that tonight in some great cities with populations as great as this there is but one bank functioning. These things could not have been foreseen by any human judgment a month ago. Weighing the advantages and disadvantages with the best judgment we have and applying the principle which I fancy has governed all governments desiring to do what is best for their own populations consistent with their obligations, contractual and otherwise, we have arrived at the conclusion I have indicated. We thought it desirable that these matters should be mentioned in this way in order that we might make known to the house everything upon which we believe that action should be taken. That does not indicate in any sense that conditions will not arise which may necessitate in the very nature of things action of a like character being taken in connection with other matters not now mentioned.

Mr. LUCAS: Will any provision be made in regard to the stabilization fund to ensure that the producer derives the benefit rather than the exporter?

Mr. MALCOLM: I listened with some interest to the observations of the Prime Minister in the course of which he stated that the relief granted by paying the difference between the existing rate of exchange on the pound sterling and $4.60 was to be treated as a relief measure. It strikes me that the very limitation of the list which the Minister of Finance gave in his budget condemns the scheme entirely. I quite appreciate the fact that had Canada followed the course of Australia and gone off the gold standard with Great Britain so that the dollar would be on a parity with the pound, Canadian agriculture would not be at the disadvantage it is with regard to the export of dairy produce or of wool, a commodity which was promised all sorts of protection by my hon. friends opposite and which is not to have even the advantage of the assistance of the difference in exchange. The question was asked a moment ago by somebody as to what this would cost. The minister did not seem to be able to give a very definite answer. The trade returns, I might say, show on the list of commodities given by the Minister of Finance that the volume of trade in the past year was a little over £6,500,000, which, on the basis of sixty cents being the existing difference in exchange, would mean a bonus of only $3,900,000 or $4,000,000, whereas the bonus on wheat, the Prime Minister told us yesterday, was over $12,000,000.

I should like to submit to the Prime Minister that if parity of exchange should be established by bonus between Canada and Great Britain for the benefit of agricultural production, it should also be established clear across the board on all products going from this country to Great Britain. I can see no reason for neglecting apples and lumber, or why the same advantage should not be given to the miner of asbestos, copper and nickel. I can see no reason why the producer of milk should get the benefit and the producer of wool should not. Suppose there was a difference of fifty cents, this would be a matter of about $20,000,000 on our total British exports of last year. If the exporter to the United States receives the twenty per cent advantage of exchange when he sells his gold, I do not see why the miner of asbestos, copper or nickel who wants to do business in Great Britain should not be assisted by the government to the same extent as the dairy farmer or any other producer of agricultural commodities. I am not at all in disagreement with the idea of trying to rectify the exchange situation in some way for the benefit of the Canadian producer. I do not think the unfavourable exchange situation can help being injurious when we are trying to cultivate trade with the British Empire. If we say in one breath that we are out to develop British trade, then we are entitled to say in the next that the government is quite prepared to take away the disadvantage of exchange. If, in its wisdom, the government thinks it advisable to let parity of exchange exist, I am not going to advise the Prime Minister with regard to the desirability of depreciating the Canadian dollar until it reaches parity with sterling; that is his responsibility. But the moment the Prime Minister decides to rectify the exchange situation, whether as a relief measure or not, in regard to any class of Canadian production, he invites for himself very serious criticism when he does not give the same advantage right across the board to all Canadian products exported to Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: Has the order in council been passed extending the benefits of the agricultural stabilization fund to the thirteen products?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it anticipated that it will be passed in the near future?

Mr. BENNETT: That depends upon the action of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: The government has power, under the present relief legislation, to pass it, has it not?

Mr. BENNETT: Inasmuch as the present act expires on March 31 of this year, it is hoped that this bill may be enacted before that date. If it is, then we would have the power.

Mr. ILSLEY: But the government has it under the present act?

Mr. BENNETT: We have not done it under the present act.

Mr. ILSLEY: The same clause is in the present legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, there is no change in that. The power is there, but as the present act expires on March 31 and this is the 23rd, eight days from now the act would expire and it is hardly desirable to pass an order in council in respect to stabilization fund for that short time.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Would the order in council expire the moment the act did?

Mr. ILSLEY: If there arise in other industries conditions that make it advisable in the opinion of the government to extend to them similar relief, would other orders in council be passed from time to time covering other commodities than the thirteen mentioned by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday last?

Mr. BENNETT: I was trying to say to the committee that the government did reserve to itself the power to deal with a situation as it might arise, but that as regards a relief measure it was thought desirable that the house should be made acquainted with the view of the government with respect to those commodities mentioned as being the ones which the government felt, with the best information at its disposal, were entitled to the benefit of such relief.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to mention very briefly one industry, that is the apple industry of Nova Scotia. The Prime Minister said that it received a protection of four shillings and sixpence in the British market, and that is correct, but the information I get from the apple interests of Nova Scotia is this, that so far as they can see there have been practically no benefits during the present season. The second remark I will make about the situation is that if there is in Canada one industry that requires and deserves relief under the provisions of the act, it is the apple industry of Nova Scotia. I do not want to go into the matter any further now; there is not time for me to do so, but I shall have something to say about it later.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was one question asked the Prime Minister and I do not know whether he heard it, but it seems important: it was whether the government had provided any means or guarantee whereby the benefit of the proceeds of this agricultural stabilization fund will go to the producers and not to the exporters?

Mr. BENNETT: It is obvious that the benefits will first of all accrue normally to the importer, whose invoices will be the determining factor with respect to the matter, but unless the benefits are reflected in better prices for the producer, we realize we shall not have accomplished the object we desire to attain. Under the legislation now under consideration there will be ample power in the government to deal with that situation; but I think it is clear we did succeed in seeing that the benefits in connection with the bonus on wheat went directly to the producer.

Mr. MALCOLM: Not on canned fruit.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Or canned fish.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman may be able to speak with authority on the subject, but we believe the benefits can be made appreciable to the producer, and that is the object of this legislation. When we have endeavoured with all our power, such as it is, to bring the benefit to the producer, we have usually managed to succeed.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 24, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

NIPISSING CENTRAL RAILWAY

The report of the examiner of petitions for private bills was read, recommending that the petition of the Nipissing Central Railway Company be not received.

Mr. A. C. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas) moved:

That the petition of the Nipissing Central Railway Company praying for an extension of time to complete its railway, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE AND CANADIAN NATIONAL WEST INDIES SERVICE

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I table herewith the annual report of the Canadian National Railways system, in English and French, for the year ending December 31, 1932, as well as the annual report of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the Canadian National West Indies Service for the same year. Hon. members will find these reports distributed in their post office boxes. In case some hon. members might care to see it I will table also the questionnaire sent out by my department some time ago in regard to motor traffic.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). It is being stated in Montreal and even published in some newspapers favourable to the government that the harbour commissioners of Montreal, being dissatisfied with the findings of the Gibb commission, have sent a memorandum to the minister and the Prime Minister together with their resignations. May I ask the minister if there is any truth in this statement?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): A report containing suggestions and representations was made by the harbour commissioners of Montreal, but there is no truth in the statement that it was accompanied by their resignations. They did say if my memory serves me well that in order to help the government in any reorganization of the administration of national harbours they would be ready to send in their resignations at any time, but that is all.

WESTERN GRAIN RATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Yesterday the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) asked about the grain rates from the prairie provinces to the province of British Columbia, and I told him they had been put into effect on March 10. That did not agree with a letter the hon. member had, but I have checked my statement and I find that the rates were put into effect two weeks ago to-day, on March 10.

SOLDIERS' PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in connection with his remarks regarding pensions, which appear at page 3223 of Hansard. I should like to ask what effect this will have on disability pensions, the pensions paid under contribution and the pensions paid under the non-contributory system.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I am indebted to my hon. friend for having intimated that he was going to ask this question, but I did not know the specific nature of the question. I was very much engaged this morning and in fact did not have an opportunity to even look upon Hansard, so I prefer that this be taken as a notice, and an answer will be forthcoming at an early date.

Perhaps in this connection, however, I might be permitted to say one word, as there would appear to be some considerable misapprehension with regard to what is in the mind of the government in respect to pensions. The last thing in the world that we had in mind was any interference with the sanctity of the contract concerning pensions. Whatever merit there may or may not be attached to the suggestions contained in the budget speech with respect to pensions, it was never intended to interfere with pensions as such. Perhaps I should also add for the information of the house that this morning we had a long conference with the heads of the various veteran organizations. That conference is to be renewed, and at its conclusion an announcement of a specific character will be made to the house which will embrace also an answer to my hon. friend the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier).

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): In answer to a question asked by my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) yesterday I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the select committee on redistribution is calling a meeting of the full committee in order that there may be no misapprehension as to the desirability of expedition in concluding their labours. Sub-committees have been working steadily, I understand, for the various provinces.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Ex parte so far as Quebec is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: When I say sub-committees, representatives of the provinces have been endeavouring to work out schemes acceptable to all, and the full committee will meet and consider them.

An hon. MEMBER: Schemes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, schemes is the word I used, and the correct word too—schemes that will be acceptable to all parties; and the full committee is called now, or is being called, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend has kept his word, because last night the government's representatives from Quebec, for the first time, gave some information to our own representative. I may add that if the rest of the work is as bad as the beginning there will not be much agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: That is rather bad.

PENSIONERS IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) yesterday inquired whether representations had been received by the department with respect to the statement that starvation existed among some of the pensioners in Montreal in receipt of small pensions. In answer to the question I wish to state that representations have been received by the department on this subject. The department is now pursuing a thorough investigation of the matter but it has not yet been completed. It will be so at an early date. The matter is being looked into carefully having regard to the serious nature of the complaints that are made in these representations.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUATION FOR ONE YEAR OF PROVISIONS OF RELIEF ACT, 1932

The house resumed from Thursday, March 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 55, respecting relief measures—Mr. Gordon—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

On section 3—Further powers of governor in council.

Mr. POWER: I have a suggestion to offer with respect to the phraseology of section 3. Subsection (c) reads:

Take all such other measures as may be deemed necessary or advisable for carrying out the provisions of this act.

Section 5 reads:

The governor in council shall have full power to make all such orders and regulations as may be deemed necessary or desirable to carry out the purposes and intention of this act.

I know that the government is anxious to take full power to itself, but it is not necessary to have this provision twice in the same piece of legislation. I am not particularly desirous of making this legislation any better, but having some respect for parliament and for the kind of laws we put on the statute books, I suggest that one of these sections be dropped or altered. I am not insisting on it, but I think the minister himself will see that it is unnecessary to have both sections in; one or other may be dropped.

Mr. GORDON: Subsection (c) of section 3 has reference to any other measures that are not included in (a) and (b), and section 5 has to do with the regulations that the dominion prescribes, in so far as it can prescribe regulations for the actual carrying out of relief measures which the province heretofore has approved of.

Mr. NEILL: I take advantage of the presence of the Prime Minister to make a few observations When the Minister of Finance introduced his budget I naturally assumed, with regard to what he said about the stabilization fund, and I think every other member did the same, that it would be promulgated by legislation during the passage of which we might have a general discussion of the whole matter. I find now, from what took place last evening, that the fund is going to be organized and administered under this relief act, and therefore there may be no special legislation introduced in connection with it. Consequently this is the only opportunity we shall have to discuss it. We might discuss the subject on going into supply, but any debate that might take place then would have to be confined to general principles and one could not ask any questions of the minister. It is one thing to have the precise language of a statute and quite another thing to have the more or less general terms which the Minister of Finance used in speaking of his policy with regard to the stabilization fund. I should like to get some definite advice as to just how far this goes.

The Prime Minister last night, speaking of course from memory, said he thought the words fish and fish products were the words used in connection with fish. That of course is a mistake, because the words used are fresh fish and canned fish. If the right hon. gentleman is in a position to say that he intends it to mean fish and fish products, then what I have to say is practically at an end, and it will be a source of gratification to us in British Columbia.

I wish to plead particularly for an industry that exists solely in the district I represent; that is, the reducing or processing of pilchards. They make pilchard meal and pilchard oil and I do not think there is any other district in Canada where this business is carried on. This industry came into existence—I speak from memory—six or seven years ago, and at that time it was confined entirely to white men, something which is true of very few of the fishing industries in the west. There was a large outlay of capital. There were at one time, if I remember rightly, twenty-seven reduction plants on the west coast of Vancouver island, each with a capital investment of from $5,000 to $8,000. They would each employ perhaps one hundred men, between the men on the plant and the men engaged in catching the fish. That would mean a total employment of some three thousand people, and then as a side line, depending on this, there would be employment for perhaps another five hundred. Owing to the distressed market conditions, instead of twenty-seven stations as there were a few years ago, last year there were, I think, only three in operation. I think they were run more with the idea of relieving the unemployment situation than with any hope of making a profit, in fact I think that they ended up in the red. This industry could provide employment for a large number of white men, at least it used to provide employment for white men before the British Columbia government fell heir to certain jurisdiction, after which they permitted orientals also to be employed. The cost to the government would be comparatively small but the employment would be quite large. I ask if the government could see its way clear to include pilchard oil and pilchard meal within the terms of the stabilization fund? I received a wire the other day from one of the largest operators. They state that they are disappointed that these commodities have not been included. They told Doctor Found, the Deputy Minister of Fisheries, when he was out there last December, that it was impossible to carry on the reduction industry unless either the cost could be cut or a subsidy provided. They then go on to point out that a sales tax has been placed upon fuel oil which adds very considerably to their working expenses and makes it all the more necessary that they should come under this stabilization scheme. The telegram continues:

> Would ask your earnest endeavour secure inclusion fish oils under stabilization plan particularly as without some such help the industry must be further curtailed whereas by inclusion we can reasonably look to increased operations and improved employment.

Would the Prime Minister be kind enough to state what his attitude will be in regard to this matter?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I can add very little to what I said last evening. I said that we had indicated the items or commodities to which the stabilization would apply but that the door was not closed for representations with respect to other agricultural and fish products. The hon. gentleman has presented a case on behalf of the pilchard oil industry but he has not stated the extent to which this commodity is sold in Great Britain and where the surplus not used domestically finds a market. I followed him closely but I do not think he said anything with respect to that. I do not think it would serve any useful purpose to repeat what I said last night.

Mr. MUNN: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister made a statement yesterday evening in connection with the products of the forest. He is quoted on page 3349 of Hansard as follows:

> So far as the products of the forest are concerned, that is a matter which has not engaged the attention of the government; nor was lumber included in the items mentioned yesterday, for reasons which I fancy commend themselves to the house at once. There are other avenues of effort through which we think we can attain the end, by some means other than the means indicated by the statute.

Would the Prime Minister indicate at this time what he had in mind when he made that statement and whether or not we will have an opportunity later on to discuss this particular item?

Mr. BENNETT: The market in Great Britain for lumber which has been subject to competition from a foreign country will assume an entirely different position next month. Other efforts are being made to permit the export of lumber more freely from Canada to foreign markets. These efforts cannot be discussed at the moment other than to say that they are being put forth to create a wider market for lumber and its products.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was very much interested in the Prime Minister's explanation last night as to why certain commodities were put upon the preferred list so far as the adverse exchange on the British market is concerned. If I understood him correctly, he indicated that each commodity had been dealt with upon its merits and I was wondering what particular demerit was attached to butter to have it excluded from the intended benefits of this exchange adjustment. I might also mention wheat as another excluded commodity.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman is aware of the fact that the production of butter in Canada barely meets the consumption; there is a very small available exportable surplus. This is a relief measure and the evidence which the government had before it was not sufficient to warrant action being taken with respect to butter similar to that taken with respect to cheese, for instance. As a matter of fact, butter is selling at a higher price upon the Canadian market than that prevailing upon any other market of which I know. At the moment the Canadian price is much higher than the British or American prices. In fact, it has been so attractive that our friends in New Zealand have endeavoured to secure this market.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The dairy industry will be upon an export basis as soon as the full flush of milk comes in the summer. It has been usual for this industry in the past half century to go on an export basis around the first of June in each year. It is usually off the export market in the winter but on in the summer. What will happen after June 1? Unless something happens, I anticipate that the price will be lower than it ever was during the first quarter of this century. That is what the present indications point to. This will happen within two or three months, possibly before this house prorogues, and that commodity should be put in a position to take advantage of this intended exchange benefit. This government should be the last to turn a cold shoulder to butter because it owes its position of power in this house largely to the import of butter problem and the export of whiskey. From a sense of gratitude, this commodity should not be overlooked by my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: The committee will find it rather difficult to understand the hon. gentleman's reference to the export of whiskey. The measure prohibiting the export of whiskey was introduced by the government of which he was a member and supported by the opposition which I had the honour to lead. I take it that the injustice should be attributed to hon. gentlemen opposite while the support is attributable to ourselves.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That means that the hon. gentleman has no explanation to offer as to why butter is not included in preferred lists?

Mr. BENNETT: Not beyond what I said last night.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My right hon. friend did not say anything specific last night and does not want to raise the question of butter. That is the reverse of the position which prevailed in 1930. Our hon. friends opposite do not like the spectre which faces them in connection with this commodity and their promise to give dairymen forty-cent butter. What about wheat? Surely that commodity is as important as honey. The busy bee gathers up the honey from the prairies at no cost so far as the supply of nectar is concerned, yet it is given a preference under this exchange adjustment. Apparently the comparatively small interest of growing wheat is overlooked, but it strikes me it is nearly as important as the busy bee's processed product honey.

Mr. HOWARD: I was quite surprised at the statement made a minute ago by the Prime Minister. I had always understood that milk products included butter, but does the Prime Minister now say that they do not? What does the Prime Minister include in milk products? I am in a dairy section of Quebec and I thought this included butter. I am surprised to-day to get the information it does not. I would like to know what milk products really include.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not at the moment in a position to define the term.

Mr. HOWDEN: But it does not include butter.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. The former Minister of Agriculture asked why butter was not included. Last evening I said that when the order in council is passed after April 1, if this bill carries, it will be quite clear what is covered by the various items mentioned in the statement of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the Prime Minister has nothing to state as regards the question asked by the hon. member for Melville, what position is wheat in, because it is not mentioned as one of the items?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is by a violent stretch of imagination included in meat products possibly.

Mr. VALLANCE: I really think we should have an answer.

Mr. McINTOSH: Let us have a Canada first answer.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is hardly fitting for the Prime Minister to take the position he has just taken on this question. He said in effect: As soon as this measure passes and when the orders in council based upon it are prepared, then he would say what this legislation really means. Frankly, I think the committee is entitled to know just what, in the mind of the government, are milk products.

Mr. MALCOLM: Before the bill passes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, we should know that before the bill passes.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought last evening I made as reasonably clear a statement as could be made with respect to the matter, and I do not desire to repeat. As regards wheat, I did deal with it and there is a statement on record with respect to it. As to the elaboration of the meaning of the words, if there is any doubt about them, of course they will be clarified. Milk products as the term appears in the statement of the Minister of Finance, certainly did not mean butter; it referred to powdered milk, condensed milk and things of that kind regarding which our milk producing population is having difficulty in finding a market. At present there is an ample market for the Canadian production of butter, in fact so much so that there have been some importations to meet the present demand.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not said very much about this matter yet, and I am interested in it. As regards meat products, meat sometimes means all kinds of food, and if we take that interpretation in that broad and charitable sense, meat products should cover wheat. Therefore with that hope in our minds, I am willing to proceed with this relief bill until we reach the budget if that will help my hon. friends opposite in any way out of their very apparent dilemma.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not intend to discuss the butter question for fear of slipping on it, but I wish, for the sake of information, to ask the Minister of Labour a question. Under this bill I understand money may be advanced to certain corporations, or institutions. For instance, money might be advanced to the Canadian Pacific Railway for continuing work in their shops or perhaps for the purchase of supplies where it could be shown that this is necessary in order to help out unemployment. Can money be advanced out of this fund to the Canadian National Railways for the same purpose, for example, the purchase of different kinds of supplies? What I had in mind was the purchase of sleepers. Supposing the Canadian National Railways had on hand at a given time, according to them, sufficient sleepers for their purpose, if the government deemed it necessary, for the purpose of relieving unemployment, to make a contract for the purchase of sleepers, would the Canadian National Railways be entitled to receive out of this fund sufficient money to purchase those sleepers?

Mr. GORDON: I do not think there is any question that under the terms of this legislation that course could be followed if it were found desirable and expedient.

Mr. REID: Paragraph (a) of section 3 reads:

Provide for special relief, works and undertakings in the national parks of Canada and elsewhere.

In British Columbia, in those camps which have been established for single men, there are some 5,000 who have been provided with clothing, food and shelter. Is it intended under this clause to provide useful work for those men?

Mr. GORDON: That was the main reason for inserting that phraseology; it was in order to give authority to do just such things as those to which the hon. member has referred.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Payments for direct relief not to exceed $20,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If section 4 is carried, it will have to be carried on division and I should like the Chairman to read the section so that it may appear on the record. It will show of itself why we take exception to it. Under section 2 we establish a dictatorship. Section 4 provides the wherewithal for the carrying on of that dictatorship. There is no limitation to the amount that may be taken by the government out of the public treasury, no longer any control by parliament.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Section 4 reads:

The governor in council may pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such moneys as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of this act, but the amount paid for direct relief for the fiscal year ending the 31st day of March, 1934, shall not exceed the sum of $20,000,000.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. IRVINE: Would the minister indicate on what basis the government arrived at this estimate of $20,000,000? If my memory serves me aright, when the minister was dealing with the resolution, he pointed out that there were in Canada at present some 1,300,000 persons on full or part relief. This amounts to about four cents a day for those on relief. It is well within the realm of probability that next year the number requiring relief will be greater and that those now receiving relief in part may require to have it in full. That being so, it appears to me that the sum required next year might be very much larger than the amount expended this year. Therefore I would like to know on what basis the sum is arrived at and what the government will do provided the amount of $20,000,000 is not sufficient to carry them along until parliament meets at the next session?

Mr. GORDON: The dominion's share of direct relief for the fiscal year 1932-33 will not amount to $25,000,000. The sum required for the coming fiscal year will not, in my judgment, amount to $20,000,000. Of course I shall have to match my judgment in the matter as against that of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. If the sum does exceed $20,000,000, parliament will certainly be in session before this amount is by any means expended or commitments made amounting to it, and resort if necessary can be had at that time to parliament for legislation to supplement the bill now before the committee.

Mr. POWER: May I make just one observation before the clause carries? Under this bill entitled The Relief Act, 1933, and under this clause, the government may spend all the money they like on any conceivable thing they may think of, but when it comes to relieving distress they can spend only $20,000,000. That is all I have to say.

Mr. BRADETTE: I wish to refer to the moneys spent on direct relief in my own section, and I think the same condition applies all over Ontario. A number of storekeepers who have advanced money on scrip are kept waiting for their money from the government for as long as two and a half and three months. I have protested against that, and I would ask the minister to see that this condition is remedied. I do not know if this is one of the ways adopted for avoiding proper expenditure during the year or for the government to make a better financial showing, but three months is entirely too long for a retailer to wait who has been taking scrip in exchange for goods. There is not a single retailer or merchant who should have to wait that long for payment of his goods.

The minister knows that the wholesale houses will not sell goods on terms of three months, and I believe it is within both the jurisdiction of the minister and of the provincial government to see that these bills are paid more promptly. There is one complaint which has been attended to; the scrip has been made negotiable, but nevertheless the time for payment is altogether too long. I think thirty days should be made the utmost limit.

Mr. GORDON: The province pays the bills in the case of Ontario, and I presume it is to that province the hon. member refers, just as soon as the bills are received from the municipalities. If there are cases where a merchant has had to wait two or three months for payment, it is certainly not because of any undue delay so far as the contribution from Ottawa is concerned, because our contribution is made after the province has paid the bills. It may be that in some instances delay has occurred, but this is not the first time that retailers have had to wait a month or two for accounts to be paid; at least that is my experience, and I am not a retailer.

Mr. TETREAULT: If the hon. member for North Timiskaming lived in the province of Quebec, in my county for instance, he would know of municipalities which have had to wait ever since 1930 to get their accounts paid, and they are not paid yet.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Go and fight it out with the provincial government.

Mr. TETREAULT: I would not get any results.

Mr. MacINNIS: When we discussed this resolution previously, I drew attention to this section of the bill under which the amount that may be expended by the government for direct relief is limited. I would point out in connection with the answer given by the minister to the question by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin that all the information which the minister gave him in reply was based on his own opinion that more than a certain amount would not be necessary, and that if the amount should exceed $20,000,000 the house would be in session before then. I would also point out that the government have abandoned practically every means of dealing with relief except direct relief measures. I think that the number of persons now unemployed, and consequently the number on direct relief, is increasing daily. The government is reducing its expenditure on constructive work of all kinds and also in other ways. Our provincial legislatures are in session at the present time, and they are doing the very same thing. Our municipalities are on the verge of bankruptcy, and consequently they cannot engage in any constructive work. The result must be that more and more people will come on direct relief, and will have to be taken care of in that way. Because we are giving the government the right to make unlimited expenditures in every other direction is no reason why we should limit it in its expenditure in this particular direction. I have every confidence that this government will not spend on the unemployed any more than is absolutely necessary. As a matter of fact, I am quite willing to give them a free hand, particularly in regard to expenditure for unemployment relief, and I think the minister should reconsider this section and leave it on the same basis as other parts of the bill and as it was last year.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to give some explanation on the vote I shall cast in connection with this bill. First, I am opposed to a dictatorship. We had a dictatorship in 1930, and also in 1931. The measure, in 1932, was somewhat different, however, the bill under discussion is nevertheless equivalent to a dictatorship. The government, first, introduced an amendment to the effect that the outlay, pursuant to this bill, should not be over $20,000,000. Then, a second and third amendment were introduced annulling the first. Consequently, we are faced with a dictatorship. Under the circumstances, sir, owing to the present situation of the country, it is impossible to approve of this bill and I reserve the right to comment later on in this respect. All I wish to state for the moment is that this bill was not given the full necessary consideration while it was being prepared. The entire legislation introduced by the government, since 1930, has had most disastrous results and, basing myself on past experience, I have my fears for the future and therefore cannot approve of this bill.

Mr. IRVINE: Supposing the amount of $20,000,000 should be inadequate and that it runs out before parliament meets again, what will the government do in dealing with those requiring relief?

Mr. GORDON: I do not anticipate at all that such an event will happen, but if it does, I presume that there is a number of courses that may be adopted. I may be incorrect in this, but I suppose we could get a warrant for more money, or we could call parliament together. I feel confident, however, that the fears which have been expressed by the hon. member are groundless so far as the question of direct relief is concerned, and of course the government will have to take the responsibility.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not like to see a limitation upon this particular expenditure, and therefore I move that all the words after the word "act" in the third line of section 4 of the bill be deleted.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is out of order. It obviously contemplates an expenditure of money beyond that which the government contemplates by this measure. For that reason I think the motion is out of order, as it is not sponsored by the government.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald), Cape Breton): I think the objection is well taken, and I declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I point out that the carrying of this amendment does not necessarily in any way entail the expenditure of any more money.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): It may.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the basis upon which it is put.

Mr. GORDON: If not, it has no meaning at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It may have. The object of the amendment is undoubtedly to free the hands of the administration in the event of a necessity arising. I agree with the mover of the amendment that this is perhaps the most important part of the bill. Under existing conditions I do not believe the government should be limited to any stated amount. I have never agreed with that principle since the unemployment crisis struck the country. The government has every opportunity to give employment and to carry on the necessary relief; I am not sure that it has lived up to its promises in that regard. I am certainly opposed to this committee fixing any limitation upon the government doing what it desires to do or considers to be necessary in any event.

Mr. IRVINE: May I point out that the deletion of the fixed sum of $20,000,000 might mean that they wanted to spend less than the amount mentioned. I do not believe the minister would be right in assuming otherwise. The minister has just said that if this was not sufficient the government would find means of making it more. Therefore in any case it would appear that the money would be spent. So I think we ought to be careful before giving a ruling such as the one now given, or declaring it final.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: On the point of order: Apparently the point raised is that the deletion of this clause would, in effect, mean an increase in public expenditure. Well, if the deletion of the clause means an increase in public expenditure it is obvious that its deletion must take place if we are not to interfere with the proper carrying on of this work. Because if it must necessarily follow that more money will be expended, I would say then it must also necessarily follow that the limitation is too small, and that the amount named is insufficient.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the chairman be good enough to give the house the basis for his ruling. I have always been under the impression that any amendment that had the effect of decreasing an amount would be in order. This amendment does not name any larger sum. Therefore I should like to know the basis for the ruling.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the house has really dealt with this matter already—once—and therefore I think the amendment is out of order. The resolution was amended to enable the minister to place this clause in the bill. Special notice was given when the resolution was in committee asking for an amendment to the resolution to enable the minister to add this clause. Therefore the matter has been dealt with.

Mr. IRVINE: If it has been settled, then the addition is out of order because it has already been considered by the house.

Mr. BENNETT: No, dealt with.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The rule is:

> No increase may be considered either of an existing, or of a new or temporary tax for the service of the year, except on the initiative of a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

The amendment moved by the hon. member is open to that construction. I understand his objection is that the amount is too small. For that reason I rule the amendment is out of order.

On section 5—Orders and regulations.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the section carry?

Mr. VENIOT: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 6—Enforcement of orders and regulations.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the section carry?

Mr. VENIOT: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 7—Orders and regulations laid before parliament.

Mr. POWER: I merely wish to repeat the suggestion I made last night to the effect that section 7 should be amended in order to cover any agreement, enactments, arrangements or contracts which may be made with the government, to avoid the situation we have now whereby orders in council dealing with certain matters are brought before us almost a year after the actual arrangement or agreement has been made. I make the submission with all deference and in good faith, but I am not going to insist upon it.

On section 8—Report to parliament.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the section carry?

Mr. VENIOT: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 9—Duration of the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to propose an amendment to section 9, as follows:

That section 9 be amended by adding the following words thereto: "Provided also that subsection (b) of section 2 shall be inoperative during the time parliament is in session."

Subsection (b) of section 2 reads as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may:

(b) Take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada, and to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that unless this section is amended in the way I have indicated we will be in the anomalous position that even while parliament may be sitting and may be enacting laws deemed to be necessary by the peoples' representatives the governor in council may overrule and override any law which parliament may pass. I think if we in this House of Commons, as legislators, are to be asked to commit harakiri, we ought to have, at least, one clause which will help to save our faces during the time parliament is in session. The purport of the amendment is to ensure that at least for the time that parliament is actually in session it will be supreme in the matter of any enactment which may be necessary for the purpose of maintaining within the competence of parliament peace, order and good government throughout Canada. I hope the Prime Minister will find it possible to accept the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the right hon. gentleman was good enough to indicate to me a moment ago what he had in his mind and has just expressed. The only difficulty is that as the amendment is drawn it would limit the power of the governor in council to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion and any of the provinces thereof, which is a matter which might arise during a session of parliament. I am wholly in accord with the suggestion with respect to maintaining within the competence of parliament peace, order and good government throughout Canada, and I shall endeavour to have subsection (b) redrafted in such a way that when the third reading of the bill is taken it will be referred back for the purpose of adding a clause which, I think, will meet the right hon. gentleman's views. These words "and to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof" have been in the last two bills, and such an amendment would make it impossible to exercise authority under that provision at a particular moment, for instance, when it might be desirable to act because of a condition which might arise between eleven o'clock and three o'clock next afternoon. I therefore suggest that the right hon. gentleman accept my undertaking that we will submit a reconstruction of subsection (b) which, I believe, will meet his views, and which I shall send to him before the bill finally leaves this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the clause with respect to peace, order and good government with which I am particularly concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite agreeable.

Section agreed to on division.

VISITING COMMONWEALTH FORCES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 40, respecting visiting forces of His Majesty, and the exercise of command, discipline and attachments of commonwealth forces when serving together.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, as a fellow Nova Scotian it is to me always a pleasure to listen to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). His long parliamentary experience, his knowledge of public affairs and his voice and pleasing presence makes it a matter of gratification to hear him speak on almost any subject. Last year I had the pleasure of congratulating him upon his accession to the honourable post of Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada, and I was at least able to congratulate him upon his manner of presentation and the distinction he had received even though I could not go far in congratulating him upon the tenor of the budget speech which he delivered.

My hon. friend, after one year, has had experience which I am sure must lead him to realize that there are onerous as well as honourable duties in connection with the Department of Finance. When listening to him the other day, knowing the outstanding position he occupies among his colleagues, I could not help thinking that if this was the best my hon. friend could do in the way of a budget surely this country is far from well off under the government which at present sits opposite.

In discussing the budget to-day the question which I put to myself and to the house is this: Will this be the budget when we get through with it in this house? I recollect that in years gone by, while my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was Minister of Finance, budgets were brought in which indicated that the main policy of this government was one of being able to right about face should the exigency require, and I shall be very much surprised if some of the terms of this budget are not dropped before this session is over. I do not know of any government in Canada since 1867 which has shown the ability to start and stop as readily as this government has. I remember that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister announced in no uncertain terms that we were to have sound money in this country, and he decried the use of the printing press. It was not so many weeks after he made that statement in this house and on the platforms of this country, however, that he put through the neatest little bit of inflation with printing press currency that we know of anywhere, in the issue of $35,000,000 of Dominion notes. How was that money secured? It was secured by treasury bills which the government first gave to the banks in order to secure a loan from the banks to the government; the banks then promptly handed back the government's own treasury bills and got $35,000,000 in Dominion notes for them.

I mention this instance to indicate that one cannot be certain that the assurances one may receive from the treasury benches, even from the right hon. Prime Minister, will verily come to pass. There are other instances I might mention. I remember distinctly that in one budget introduced by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister there was a headliner by way of an amendment to the Income Tax Act, but we all know what happened. It fell by the wayside; it never was put through. There was a tax on cheques under $5 which was abandoned, and certain exemptions under the sales tax which were to be struck out were left in. In introducing that budget my right hon. friend had the opportunity of his life to carry out the idea which he had so strenuously advocated and so forcibly expressed when he was on this side of the house, that is, to conscript portions of the deposits in banks and the insurance companies, but nothing whatever was heard of that proposal. Finally, in connection with that budget I remember my right hon. friend singing his swan song as Minister of Finance and expressing the regret he felt that he had been unable to carry out those policies which were so near and dear to his heart. Here is what he said, as it appears at page 3307 of Hansard for July 2, 1931:

> I believe my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) was sincere in his suggestion with regard to taxation, because on more than one occasion he has done me the honour to talk about the matter privately. Probably he will realize that the disappointment to me is far greater than it can be to him and in fact greater to me than to any other hon. member. Realizing those facts he will appreciate my position. I should like to have seen applied in Canada some new system of taxation, and he is quite right when he says it is not at all probable that I shall ever have a chance to try a new form of taxation, because it is not at all likely that I shall ever again submit ways and means to this house. I am not without hope, however, that some Minister of Finance—

I commend this to my hon. friend who now occupies that portfolio.

—reviewing the means by which taxes may be raised will realize the values and benefits accruing from a turnover tax.

Then he went on to say:

Sir, it has not been my privilege to introduce any new forms of taxation to this country at this time.

If he has not introduced new qualities certainly he has introduced them in quantities; there is no doubt about that.

I do not for a single moment disguise the fact that I would like to have done so. I should like to have written a budget which would have expressed my views with respect to taxation in Canada. That privilege has not been given, and it never will be.

And women wept and strong men bowed their heads. Then we had the spectacle just last fall of my right hon. friend rising in his place and intimating, if ever a Prime Minister intimated anything, that there was to be a measure brought down providing for unemployment insurance, that the matter had been considered and was to be placed before the Dominion-provincial conference, and that there were indications that it would go through. That made splendid newspaper publicity, but once more the constitution, my right hon. friend's bulwark, got in the way and as a result unemployment insurance is not to be introduced. Why? Because the provinces do not want it he says.

What I want to know is whether the government will stick to this budget or whether, when one speaks about it, he will be speaking about something which will be discarded before the budget is finally adopted.

There are some things that are sure, however, and of those things I want to speak first. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has had a good many weeks to consider this budget. It was coming down the first week in March; then, due to events which were taking place south of the line, it was delayed. Naturally I have not had the opportunity which the minister has had to consider the various subjects dealt with in the budget, and therefore of course my treatment of them must be cursory as compared to his—and I mean cursory in the strict grammatical sense of the word rather than what it sounds like. There is one point I should like to mention, however, in dealing with the matter of time; I feel that I should put it on record. I am sorry that the Prime Minister is not in his place. Were it only a personal matter I would not mention it, but I think it has to do with the usual procedure of parliament and with the practice which has been long established in connection with the reply to the budget. The right hon. gentleman the other evening, in replying to my right hon. leader, intimated that a somewhat longer time than usual was being given to the representative of the opposition who had moved the adjournment of this debate—I presume he referred to myself. I have looked up Hansard and I find that when my hon. friend the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) was to reply to the budget he had four days. I find that when the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) replied to the budget he had four days. I find that when the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) replied to the budget, when he was leader of the opposition in 1930, he had five days. I have been given three days. I just put that on record so that my right hon. friend—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let me correct my hon. friend. Four days were forced upon me; I was ready the day following.

Mr. RALSTON: I can assure the hon. gentleman that four days were not forced on me.

As I have said there are some things in this budget which will not be changed and of which one can be sure regardless of what may take place in relation to the proposals contained in the budget. The Minister of Finance comes into this house representing, let us say, the board of directors of Canada Incorporated, and making his report upon the fiscal administration for the year. He is asked immediately, and he asks himself in making his report: How about what the Prime Minister calls the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure—has that been maintained? What is his answer? His answer is that unfortunately the equilibrium has not been maintained, but that there is a deficit on ordinary account of $53,000,000. Someone speaks up and says: Is that all? He says: No, that is not all. In addition to that there are special expenditures, less special revenues, of $38,000,000; capital expenditures of $9,000,000; loans and non-active advances of $2,000,000, making a total of $102,000,000 short of the amount of revenue collected. Again he is asked: Is that all? And again he says: No, it is not all. In addition we have the Canadian National Railways requiring $53,000,000; in other words, he is $156,000,000 short of having kept within his income.

Immediately the question is brought up: Did you tell us that this is what was going to be the result of this year's administration? You brought down a budget last year, and in the budget, according to the Prime Minister, it is necessary for the Minister of Finance to predict and to predict accurately what the results are going to be. I have looked back over the records and I find that my hon. friend did make a prediction. He predicted that if the taxes which were being levied were imposed there would be, not a deficit of $53,000,000 but a surplus of about $5,000,000 on ordinary expenditures. As reported at page 1766 of Hansard of April 6, 1932, he said:

> Without building too greatly on help from this source—

That is, returns from customs and excise taxes.

> —in the present year, it is the considered view of the government that reductions in expenditures, on the one hand, and proposed additions to the taxation revenues on the other, will in the final outcome represent a complete balancing of the budget on the usual current governmental services.

May I remind the Minister of Finance of what the Prime Minister said when he was chiding the former Minister of Finance with regard to the same matter. As reported in Hansard of 1931, at page 2168, speaking of the obligation of the Minister of Finance to forecast the results of his budget proposals, the present Prime Minister said:

> It is the basis of responsible government. It is the basis upon which representative institutions have been established, and that responsibility can only attach when there is some estimate as to what is being received by the country from the taxation imposed and as to what expenditures are to be made.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance may say that he at least made an estimate even if it was $53,000,000 out, but I go further in connection with what the Prime Minister said. At page 1244 of Hansard of 1928 he made this statement:

> The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in delivering his budget address in the British parliament, is always held to the strictest account to the extent to which he has been able to realize his expectations; and the extent to which his representations agree with the facts of the year under review.

I can only leave my hon. friend to the tender mercies of his leader, but I want to comfort him with this information, that his leader, in predicting the net financial operations of the year 1932, was not $53,000,000 but $81,000,000 out.

I say to my hon. friend: You are out this money; you have not been able to balance the budget or to live within your income. Where did you get the money? He says, "I borrowed it." Very well; we come to look at the public accounts and we see what increase there has been in the public debt. I find the net public debt, as shown in my hon. friend's budget speech, to be $2,599,000,000 odd—I will not give the odd thousands.

May I point out to the house that "net debt" is not the term we have been using in this house, at least according to some authorities. Net debt is not the proper term at all, because net debt allows for certain questionable assets, certain matters as to which it is doubtful whether they can be collected. And I have authority for that statement. I find in Hansard of 1928, at page 1244, that the Prime Minister had no doubt about this point, that you should not speak of net debt, but that something else entirely different should be indicated. He said:

> May I venture to point out, sir, that it should not be difficult to ascertain what the debt of the country is, and I say further that there is no need to talk about "net" debt or "gross" debt. The proper term to apply is funded debt, and the funded debt of Canada means "the mortgage on the farm." Now if the mortgage on the farm is $5,000, payable the 1st of January, 1929, and you have in your current account at the bank $1,000 which must be used to pay taxes, for seed grain and various other demands, at the end of the year the $1,000 may be partly or wholly exhausted, but the mortgage on the farm still remains $5,000 and must be treated as such.

When, therefore, the Minister of Finance shows the net debt, I would point out to him that it means nothing either to us or to his leader. We must look at the funded debt, the unmatured public debt of Canada, which I find in another statement in the budget speech. On March 31, 1930, the funded debt of Canada was $2,194,746,563.57. In two years that had increased by $307,000,000 odd; and, taking the present figures shown in the public accounts, the present funded debt is, not $2,599,000,000 shown as the net debt in my hon. friend's statement, but $2,649,908,882.73; and there has therefore been an increase in the public debt since 1930, under the administration of my hon. friends opposite, of $455,162,319.16.

Now once more—though this is an old story to the house, it is not to the country—I would remind hon. members that in the last five years of the former administration the debt of this country was reduced by $257,000,000, and I point out to this house that the $257,000,000 which was saved is now gone. And with it has gone $200,000,000, and in addition to that, as my hon. friend's estimate indicates, there will be at least $90,000,000 more for the coming year, even though he balances the budget so far as ordinary expenditure is concerned. May I recall to my hon. friend the words which the Prime Minister quoted a short time ago from the late Calvin Coolidge: "Anybody can spend the money that somebody else has saved."

That is not the only thing with regard to this matter of increased debt. The right hon. the Prime Minister has laid down some pretty definite rules with regard to financial accounts. One of the rules upon which he laid a great deal of stress but which I notice he did not follow in the accounts which he submitted himself, was that you must show accrued interest. He is reported on page 1247 of Hansard of 1928 as follows:

The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that when you endeavour to indicate what the debt of your business is, you must always have regard to the accrued interest upon your outstanding obligations. I ventured, during the short time that I was at the Department of Finance, to look into this matter with some degree of care and it will be found that no where in that record as a liability is accrued interest even mentioned. When I say that $2,000,000,000 matures between 1933 and 1937 and that a half year's interest upon that sum alone amounts to more than $50,000,000, it will be easy for one to understand why the form and the system that prevail in connection with making out these returns should be altered and we should show what the accrued interest is from month to month in respect to our funded debt.

He continues:

When the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) the other day indicated that it was just such systems of bookkeeping that brought wreck and ruin to the Home bank, he was stating the case exactly. You cannot make financial returns of the country's business and ask the people to believe them if you make no provision for accrued interest from day to day. In six months it amounts to $50,000,000 alone on these $2,000,000,000 of obligations, to say nothing of other amounts as well, that means a total of over $10,000,000 a month. Accrued interest must be taken care of in those returns if they are to be at all accurate.

Bearing in mind this fundamental principle as laid down by the present Prime Minister when in opposition, may I point out that there is not a dollar of accrued interest mentioned in the accounts which were brought down by the Minister of Finance the other day. According to the Prime Minister, that is the sort of bookkeeping which brought wreck and ruin to the Home bank. I leave the Minister of Finance again to the tender mercies of his right hon. leader, comforting him once more with the statement that those are exactly the sort of accounts his leader brought down himself.

I have mentioned what the total debt is, but that total debt does not include all the liabilities of this dominion. As I said a moment ago, the funded debt in round figures is $2,649,000,000 and there are guaranteed railway securities amounting to $996,000,000, making a total of approximately $3,646,000,000. In addition, the Dominion of Canada, under the powers alleged to be given by the unemployment relief act, has given guarantees with respect to the 1931 wheat crop, the 1932 wheat crop, the 1930 wheat crop, the province of Manitoba savings bank, the Beauharnois project and in connection with interest payable by the government of Newfoundland. Perhaps I have no right to include it, but from what the right hon. the Prime Minister said the other day I should think that we might anticipate a possible loss of $20,000,000 in connection with the flier in wheat with respect to the 1930, crop. These all make a total of $3,714,663,000. While the Dominion only actually guaranteed $996,000,000 of railway securities, the total outstanding obligations of these other roads is $1,276,000,000, leaving $380,000,000 which are not guaranteed strictly by the Dominion of Canada but which are in connection with roads most of which are part of the Canadian National Railways. These obligations may quite possibly be found to be liabilities, whether legal or otherwise. These are the indirect liabilities of the dominion.

Now I come back once more to another cardinal principle which was laid down by the right hon. the Prime Minister.

It is easy for a man to be strict when he is on this side of the house and feels that he is not going to have to assume responsibilities of office. I remind the Prime Minister that in 1928, he referred to that great financier Pitt, and said:

—the British people have always maintained a sinking fund. They have suspended the operation of that sinking fund at times when it was essential that they should do so, but look, if you will, at the operations of British finance to-day, and you will see that no matter how hard they may be driven, no matter how difficult may be their path, no matter how onerous their burden of taxation, they have always imposed upon themselves the providing of a sinking fund with which to discharge the national debt.

He continued:

Is this country to continue to be menaced by this economic evil, by this debt hanging over our heads? Are we to continue, of all countries in the world, to make no provision for the future? Are we to be content to expend our patrimony day by day without putting anything aside to take care of the long days of the future that are before us? I say it is unfair to posterity, and still more, it is unfair to ourselves, it is unfair to the taxpayers of this country to extract from them each year these increasingly large sums of money and make no provision for the retirement of our national obligations. The sum to be set aside is not large. I can only say this, that if we on this side of the house were entrusted with power, we would not hesitate a single moment to make provision for the retirement of the national debt of this country.

Since that was paid, $445,000,000 have been added to the public debt of this country and not only has not one dollar been set aside to take care of that debt but there will be another deficit of $90,000,000 this year even though we balance the ordinary expenditure and raise all the money my hon. friend expects to raise by taxation. That statement that his party would not hesitate for a single moment if they came into power to provide for the retirement of the national debt sounds very much as though it came from the same gentleman who in 1930 undertook to end unemployment.

Mr. McINTOSH: And did not.

Mr. RALSTON: I have faced my hon. friend with a good many of his leader's statements but I come now to what is in the minds of the public of this country perhaps more than anything else, that is, the fact that my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance does not propose and is not attempting to live within his income for the next year. I want to place upon Hansard a brief resumé of the record of my hon. friend and his predecessor in office. This is the record which they have with regard to living within their incomes and making both ends meet. In 1931-32 there was a deficit on all accounts except railways of $114,000,000. I thought it was $119,000,000 but the Minister of Finance gave the other figure and I accept his statement. Adding the railway account to that, we find a deficit of $176,000,000 in the first year my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was Minister of Finance. In the year 1932-33, which my hon. friend reviewed a day or two ago, we find a deficit on all accounts excepting railways of $102,700,000 and on account of railways of $53,000,000, or a total of $156,000,000. Next year, even though we are able to collect the new taxes amounting to $70,000,000 and are able to balance ordinary expenditures, we will still have a capital expenditure of $7,000,000, special expenditures and advances amounting to $35,000,000, a railway deficit of approximately $48,000,000, or a total deficit of $90,000,000 for next year. That will make a combined deficit in three years of their administration of $422,000,000.

I should like to point out to my hon. friend his record with regard to expenditures, because he referred to the dead hand of past lavish expenditure still weighing heavily upon all public bodies. I should like to put upon Hansard a record of the expenditures since 1927, not including railways. They are as follows:

	Ordinary expenditures	Total expenditure
1927	$319,000,000	$358,000,000
1928	336,000,000	378,000,000
1929	350,000,000	389,000,000
1930	357,000,000	398,000,000
1931	389,000,000	440,000,000
1932	372,000,000	448,000,000
1933	364,000,000	417,000,000
1934	355,000,000	397,000,000

Let me point out that in 1927 the exports alone of this country was valued at $1,267,000,000 while our total expenditures were only $358,000,000. In 1933 the export business of this country was $494,000,000 and our total expenditure was $417,000,000. My hon. friend talks about the dead hand of lavish expenditure. I shall give him just that sample to indicate where we are getting in this matter of trade and of expenditure, and to back up, if I may, the persistent call which is going up all over the dominion in newspapers and public bodies for my hon. friend to reduce expenditures. I point out to him that last year, without taking the railways into account, there was an expenditure of $417,000,000, the railway deficit was $53,000,000, making in all $470,000,000, and yet the total goods exported from Canada amounted to only $494,000,000. In other words, practically all our goods for export are going to pay the expenses of government, and yet my hon. friend talks about the dead hand of lavish expenditure.

I know his difficulties; I know he has on his hands the question of relief and other matters of that sort, and I intend to deal with one or two of them in a few moments. He knows what we think of the way in which relief money has been administered in this country. I think $113,000,000 or $123,000,000 have been spent in one way or another in connection with relief. I wish I could say that it had solved the problem and had afforded the employment which was promised, but I find there has been this expenditure and to-day we are faced with unemployment more widespread than ever and with a budget which does not pretend to be balanced, while at the same time we are confronted with taxation the like of which has not been known in Canada since confederation.

Let me point out to my hon. friend what was done in Great Britain with respect to balancing the budget. My hon. friend of course realized, as the year progressed, that his expectations regarding revenue were not being fulfilled. It was commonly reported in the newspapers that there was going to be a deficit of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. What did the British government do when they realized that there was going to be a deficiency in revenue in the old country? They did the obvious thing; they cut down expenditures. My hon. friend, on the other hand, maintains his expenditures just as they have been voted by parliament, regardless of the fact that he knows that his revenues are not coming up to expectations and the result is that he appears before us to-day with a tremendous deficit. Let me give the facts in regard to the British budgets. The first budget of April, 1931, had an estimated revenue of £885,000,000 and an estimated expenditure of £884,000,000. The second budget of September, 1931, had an estimated revenue of £866,000,000 and an estimated expenditure of £864,000,000; it was balanced again. But when they came to get in their receipts of the revenue for which they had estimated, they found they were falling off and they got only £851,482,000 in revenue, but on the other side of the sheet, instead of going ahead and spending what had been voted, they cut down their expenditures as they went along and at the end of the year they had actually spent only £851,118,000. In other words there was a balance to credit of £364,000, notwithstanding the fact that there was a reduction of £15,000,000 in actual revenue from the estimate. That is the way in which financing is done in Great Britain.

Two years ago the Prime Minster, speaking in the house, intimated that he was not responsible for the large expenditure in the year ending March 31, 1931. We pointed out that he had taken office in August, 1930; that the estimates had been voted, but that that was all that had been done; that he had a right then to put the blue pencil through any estimates he wished and to pass orders in council curtailing his expenditures. But the government went ahead spending regardless of the fact that the revenue was not coming in. The same thing happened in 1931 and again in 1932. Now my hon. friend is faced with an agitation throughout the country which is becoming more audible and stronger every minute, that he must and ought to balance the budget; that there should be, as is said in some of the telegrams I have received, some equality in sacrifice; that further taxation should not be imposed upon the people until the government makes some real sacrifice with regard to public services. Before I finish I am going to deal with one or two instances of that.

With regard to the attempt to balance the budget not by increasing taxation but by reducing expenditures, which is the first way to balance a budget, the effort has been pitiful and halfhearted, and by the way, it has also been somewhat that of an opportunist. By the wording of the budget I doubt whether my hon. friends opposite a couple of weeks ago had any idea of cutting anything off expenditures. That 10 per cent cut sounds as if it had been inserted at the last minute. Is that the way to balance a budget? When my hon. friends know they are not going to get the revenue and they are going to require increased taxation, is the way to balance the budget simply to cut 10 per cent off the public services without any reference to what the services may be, to tell parliament nothing about the amounts that are to be left out? Is the usual course not to come before parliament, to go over in a deliberate manner the expenditures which are to be made and to strike out items which are not to be expended? Instead of that we have the usual full bill of fare so far as estimates are concerned, with no sugegstion that they are to be cut down, and suddenly the Minister of Finance, in the middle of the session, after the other ministers have been allowed to submit their estimates, comes to the house and says that there is to be a general cut of 10 per cent. Parliament has the right to know where these cuts are to be made and it is not fair to ask us for a full vote and then simply take off 10 per cent as my hon. friends may see fit. That is one remark I want to make with regard to the 10 per cent cut.

Let me give an illustration or two with regard to relief expenditures. Last year my hon. friends paid out for relief $35,000,000; they loaned $38,000,000; they guaranteed what I mentioned a moment ago to banks in Manitoba and others and they made loans to the Canadian Pacific Railway, one of $1,400,000 and another of $1,000,000. One of these is not paid yet.

Mr. VENIOT: The amount of $1,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: The $1,000,000 item is not paid yet.

They have also entered into a guarantee with regard to the marketing of the 1930 wheat crop. I do not intend to spend much time on that subject this afternoon, but it is being discussed in the public press of the country. While I am prepared to admit that the Prime Minister did not deliberately mean to mislead the house, he certainly left an impression which was different from the facts with regard to the marketing of the 1930 wheat crop and the guarantee that was given. He left on the house the impression that the operations which were being conducted by Mr. McFarland were in connection with the wheat which was being taken over from the farmers. Instead of that, what was done, as I am informed, was this: they took the wheat purchased from the farmer and converted it into "futures" from time to time. This may or may not have been good policy, because it was betting against the future, but it had this in its favour, that the "futures" represented wheat actually purchased from the farmer, and it might be legitimately a matter which the government might, to save carrying charges, turn over and over in the hope that a loss might eventually be saved. But I say it is absolutely wrong for the government to guarantee that marketing operation and permit it not simply to deal in wheat purchased from the farmer but to speculate in futures which have nothing to do with the wheat purchased from the farmer originally, and to do this in order to accomplish two objects: first to bolster up the market, that is, Mr. McFarland or his agency, having attempted to sell find the market low, and adopt the simple expedient of themselves buying "futures" in order to create a demand. That is the way they bolster up the market. Secondly, faced with a situation where there is a drop in the "futures" which they hold, they go into the market, but not simply to handle the same quantity of wheat they had before, but to speculate and to cover their loss by making a bet in July for instance that the price of wheat in October, say, will have gone up by that time, and they buy more wheat in the form of futures. While my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) calls it hedging, it is no more hedging than it is for me, if I am in the market holding Montreal Light, Heat and Power and find it going down, to go and buy Consolidated Gas to endeavour to recover my losses. That is not hedging at all. It is just plain, ordinary speculation, or what is more properly called gambling in the wheat market. My hon. friend and the government have backed up an organization which is doing that. They say it is in the interests of the western farmers. I say that they should cut their loss in connection with the respectable transaction of buying the farmer's wheat and should not keep on trading back and forth, in "futures" transactions that have nothing whatever to do with the quantity of wheat that has been purchased from the farmers themselves. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance last year gave us the impression that there was going to be no loss from that operation. Let me read what he said, at page 1759 of Hansard of 1932:

[Mr. Ralston.]

> The house will recall the problems which the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited, faced in financing its operations in connection with the 1930 crop. The government, believing that it was in the national interest to protect the credit of the marketing agencies in such a way that the grain might be marketed to the general advantage of growers, had given an undertaking to the seven chartered banks concerned, which then made available the necessary credits. The undertaking was given status by order in council P.C. 2238, dated September 12, 1931. This undertaking—

This was in the budget speech of a year ago:

> —has served its purpose, and without cost to the treasury. Based upon present market prices the expectation is that, when all accounts are settled, the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited, will be able to settle all advances without recourse being had to the dominion's guarantee.

Even if that had been so, it is no justification for this government going into wheat speculation with the money of the people of Canada. Let me go further and give the statement of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister last fall, at page 1093 of Hansard. He is speaking of the different people who are in the grain business, and he says that the second class, the speculator, has disappeared, and he gave the impression that the government had taken the speculator's place. He said:

> Under these circumstances, Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, to which I have referred, became the only available hedging organization left in western Canada, and the government is faced at the moment with the issue as to whether or not, under these circumstances, it would give its support as provided by the Relief Act passed in 1931 and 1932 as well—this being a product of the field and the farm,—by guaranteeing to the banks such sums as might be necessary to enable these operations to be carried on by this organization. But before that was done the government had to consider whether or not the interest of Canada as a whole would be best served by continuing the bonus which we granted last year or by taking the steps I have just indicated for the purpose of protecting the general situation in connection with the marketing of wheat.

That is where my right hon. friend, perhaps unconsciously, misleads people. He says that it is done to protect the general situation. What that means in plain, ordinary language is that they were buying wheat in addition to what was purchased from the farmers in order to support the market, in the hope that some day the price of wheat would go up. It is exactly as the farm loan board did in the United States, with this exception, that this organization in this country goes further and trades in wheat "futures" that do not at all represent what has been taken over physically. The Prime Minister went on:

I hasten to assure the house that on a balance of financial benefits it is clear that in respect of any obligations which might be incurred—it is not possible that any heavy obligations will be incurred unless something very unforeseen happens—the amount involved will be less than would be involved by the payment of the bonus requested. Weighing the situation as a whole, the probabilities pro and con, the effect upon the dominion, the business which would be secured and the chaos which would result from the absolute failure to sell wheat except as a distress commodity, the steps which I have indicated were taken.

If I might say so, I do not think any good purpose would be served by going into the details of the operations which we have entrusted to the organizations I have mentioned under the management of Mr. McFarland. However, the closest supervision has been exercised and we believe and we have had no reason to change our minds at the present moment, that the steps taken will be more beneficial to the dominion as a whole and will secure for the country as a whole greater advantages than if we paid the producer the bonus which was paid last year and which we are pressed to continue this year. Except for the mention of the exact financial amount involved, which obviously it is difficult to give, I think I have answered all the questions asked.

Those are the Prime Minister's words. Now what was said in the budget speech of 1933? Last year there was going to be no financial commitment. What does the Minister of Finance say this year? At page 3220 of Hansard he says:

The guarantee of advances to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited in connection with the 1930 crop remains in effect, and it was necessary during the past season for the company to increase its liability as a result of stabilizing transactions which it was considered expedient in the public interest to support. To these operations the government gave its guarantee. The steadiness which has developed in the wheat market has undoubtedly vindicated the action then taken—

Note this:

—and the question of ultimate liability will depend entirely upon the future course of wheat prices.

How naive! Could it be anything else but that? Of course it will depend on future prices. How much had the government's action to do with stabilizing the wheat situation? On account of the situation in the United States recently there was a flurry in wheat in Winnipeg and the market went up. I do not think the government's action had a great deal to do with that. It may be that my right hon. friend may pull out of this transaction with a whole skin, and certainly everybody hopes he will, but it will not be because of his business administration but simply because he happened to be lucky, just the same as I might be if, having purchased a ticket on the Calcutta sweepstake, I drew the grand prize. That was done under the Unemployment Relief Act. I need not say what everyone realizes—my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) himself pointed it out in a speech not long ago, how important the wheat market is to this country that our farmers should sell their wheat, but our farmers themselves I am sure do not want this government to go into gambling in wheat to support the market, and the government should take its loss and get out and be rid of that transaction.

With regard to relief moneys generally, there has been a good deal said in the debates which have just closed, and in previous years, with regard to the expenditures. I believe it will be found that there has been absolutely no considered, deliberate policy with regard to relief. When our descendants, supposing they enter a time of stress and strain, which God forbid, such as we have had, look back and find out how we handled unemployment, I do not believe they will be able to find very much light in the darkness in order to guide them in evolving a policy in that respect. They will find that we spent money, and spent it lavishly, but they will not find any enlistment whatever of national effort; they will not find any national organization. They will find a blanket vote, money paid out for this, that and the other, and guarantees on all sides. But they will find no deliberate, ordered policy in connection with this great question of unemployment.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that they will find that what happened was this: We started out with a vote of $20,000,000, which was supposed to be in part for public works and part for direct relief. They will find that we got into public works and that we forced on the provinces and the municipalities in this dominion an expenditure of $100,000,000, which is a noose around their necks to-day. Now we have come back again to direct relief because, forsooth, of constitutional difficulties. That is going to be the record which is going to be read by our descendants when the time comes for them to look over what we have done and the policy that we have adopted in connection with relief.

With regard to other expenditures, on the Canadian National Railways, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, speaking at Hamilton a short time ago—I have not the speech here but I read it last night—indicated in no uncertain terms that it was the Liberal party which built and guaranteed two transcontinental railways and set them out to compete with one another. My right hon. friend, if he knows anything at all, knows the history of those roads. He knows that the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental were voted for in 1904, and that the building was commenced at that time. He knows that at that time there was a policy on the part of the Conservative party for a second transcontinental railroad, except that it was to take the form of completing the existing railroad to the coast. He knows, further than that, that in 1911 the Liberal government refused a grant to extend the Canadian Northern to the Pacific coast and in 1912 the first vote was made by the government he supported, a vote of $6,000,000 to extend the Canadian Northern railway through the Yellowhead pass to Vancouver; and he knows that not until 1914 was the large grant made of $45,000,000 in order to make the Canadian Northern a transcontinental railway with a terminus on the Pacific coast as stated by Sir Robert Borden at that time. That is the early history of the railroads.

He knows that in 1917 there was an opportunity to take over those roads as bankrupt concerns. He knows that instead of that $10,800,000 was paid for the stock of the Canadian Northern railroad, that we took the railroad over, and that we have its bonds to-day. He knows the Grand Trunk was taken over also by the Meighen government, and at that time, after arbitration, although nothing was paid for the stock the bonds were assumed, because we took the road. There was no attempt made to write down the bonds, but operation was taken over and, as the Duff report states, in 1917, government ownership of the railroads was adopted.

Yet at Hamilton my right hon. friend stated it was the Liberal party which built two transcontinental railroads and set them to compete with one another.

Mr. BENNETT Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: He says, "hear, hear." I have given him the facts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will you repeat it?

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly will, because I happen to know the facts.

Mr. McINTOSH: He is still in the woods.

Mr. RALSTON: I am making a statement; I am saying what the records show. My right hon. friend at one time was very anxious to take credit for the Canadian National Railways, as was the Minister of Justice. I state that the Canadian National operation was fairly successful under the late administration. There was an average of $24,000,000 a year earned towards payment of interest. I have not the actual figures for the deficits before me, but the deficits from 1919 to 1921 averaged $22,000,000 a year, while from 1922 to 1930 there was an average yearly amount available for interest of $24,000,000, and in 1931, the first year of office of hon. members opposite, there was again a deficit of $5,000,000. That is the record of the Canadian National Railways as they functioned in the hands of hon. members opposite and in the hands of the party on this side of the house. I think it ill-behooves my hon. friends to throw this national railway system into the maelstrom of political strife, and to show, or to attempt to show, as was done a few nights ago, that the other party is solely to blame for the Canadian National Railways.

As I have said before the Canadian National railway system is the result of policies which were put into force in 1917; the principle of government ownership was accepted in that year. Then, in 1922, when the King government came into power, they found the roads under a committee of management which supervised each road which was administered by separate boards of directors. The Canadian National Railways Act, passed in 1919, was proclaimed in 1922, in order to coordinate the management of the roads.

With regard to the Canadian National Railways I wish to say this, and to repeat what I said the other night, that it is no use to talk about the Canadian National Railways as having a certain capitalization and as paying interest on the total capitalization of what is really a combination, or conglomeration of roads. The capitalization is $2,300,000,000. It consists of a lot of roads some of which, as I have said, were bankrupt, and some of which as my right hon. friend admitted, were in poor shape. Those are roads on which certain expenditures have been made but we cannot possibly charge up, or expect those roads to pay, interest on those moneys, and the sooner the Canadian people come to the conclusion that it is necessary to put the Canadian National Railways in a sound capital position in order that it may be self supporting, and in order that it may have a fair chance to live, the sooner it will have a good railroad and the sooner the finances of the dominion will show a true picture of actual conditions. It is not fair to set aside Canadian National expenditures by themselves and expect this combination of good, bad, and indifferent roads to pay the interest on all the money which was originally paid for their construction. I would not wonder if my right hon. friend will impose some sort of tax which he will earmark "Canadian National Railways." It would not be fair to the Canadian National Railways, it would not be fair to the Canadian people to expect them to pay interest on the amount of capital which is invested in the railways.

So much for special expenditures. What about ordinary expenditures? What reductions have my hon. friends made in that connection? I have already mentioned the ten per cent reduction in expenditures. We now find that my hon. friend has given an indication of a certain class whom he purposes shall contribute towards that reduction. I am glad to hear from what has been said in the house by my right hon. friend the Minister of Finance that it looks as though there would be some likelihood of a reconsideration of the proposals to deduct from pensioners the amount of their pensions. I wish to point out to the house as strongly as I can that pensions have always been given to ex-service men because of the disabilities they suffer. It is on account of his lessened earning power, not in the particular profession in which he is engaged at a particular moment, but on account of his loss in earning power as a common labourer, because all soldiers were reduced to that common denominator when it came to the question of disabilities.

But it is for something else. It is to make up as well as we can in money for the inconvenience, for the suffering and hardship which a man endures by reason of having an amputation or because of other physical disabilities. I have in my constituency two postmasters, one of whom has a leg off close to the hip and another a leg off close to the knee. Those men are getting pensions. They are also receiving their salaries as postmasters. I undertake to say there would be a most scathing denouncement by members of this government against any employer who took one of those men on as a bookkeeper in his office, and attempted to deduct from his salary the amount of his pension. I believe when the government realizes what this action would mean as a breach of contract, it will reconsider that item in the budget, to which reference has been made. We have too long recognized the fact that ex-service men were entitled to preference in connection with civil service positions to suddenly repudiate it now. We knew they were getting pensions. In fact, the man who got a pension was the one who had first preference for a position. Can we possibly say now that although we knew you were entitled to a pension, yet in view of the fact that you took that position, we will take the pension from you? I say, Mr. Speaker, that it simply amounts to a direct discriminatory levy against this particular class in the community, against men who have served overseas and who are receiving pensions for physical disabilities. It is a discrimination against those men. Do you think it is fair that this particular class, of all classes, should be picked out by Canada, at this time, and be subjected to the loss of their pensions, which may be equal to a fifty per cent assessment on the incomes they are receiving?

Further than that, the dependents are entitled to those pensions, as well. Commitments have been made; men have got married have taken houses or have undertaken other obligations on the faith of those pensions. Is it fair to take pensions away from them at this particular time just because of the fact that the country is in a difficult position, financially? Is it fair to pick them out and to have, as I say, a direct levy made upon that very class in the community, a class which I would think would be the last to be asked to contribute, except in a time of greatest stress, in view of the contribution which they have already made overseas. I think, Mr. Speaker, that that is another case where, although long consideration was given to the budget, sufficient consideration was not given. Some one suggested on the spur of the moment that somebody was getting two salaries, as they put it, and as a result this proposal went into the budget. I think it will be found that these are not two salaries, and the public will realize that; the one is compensation in connection with a physical disability, and the other is the usual pay a man gets for performing a day's work, or whatever work may be required in connection with the government job he may hold. I have not the slightest doubt but that there will be a substantial change in connection with this particular item in the budget before the budget passes, and I invite an announcement from the Minister of Finance in regard to this matter just as soon as possible.

There have been some other reductions made. Announcement is made in the budget speech to the effect that a committee has been appointed in connection with the cost of printing and stationery. I say that is a comparatively minor matter. It might even amount to a million dollars, I do not know, but it is rather a pitiful and puerile way for the government to attempt the tremendous task of cutting down these expenditures by millions of dollars. I say that the very fact that this is mentioned indicates how little real attention has been paid to this vital matter. The Gibb report is mentioned also as perhaps giving some promise of a reduction in expenses. The Minister of Finance had hardly said his last word before the right hon. Prime Minister rose in his place and indicated that because of representations that had been received from various quarters it was doubtful whether the legislation based on the Gibb report would be brought down. So I say it is very difficult for one to tell exactly whether this will be the budget we will finally consider.

Now let me mention one or two other matters that are in the minds of the people, though hon. gentlemen opposite may say they are minor matters. I imagine there were very few people in this country, when they saw the contents of this budget, with the taxes which are being imposed and the lack of any real reduction in expenditure, who did not immediately think of the radio commission, for which we are being asked to vote $1,000,000 at a time like this. I think the very first day the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) were brought down I took occasion to say a word with regard to a salary which was being increased in his department. That salary is being paid to a man who I understand is a returned soldier and who, I understand, is in every way well equipped for his job. It did seem to me, however, that it indicated an attitude of mind on the part of the government which they should not have at this time; it seemed to me they had not gone over the estimates and pruned them as they should have. I remember a research item of $21,000, I think in the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce again, which could have been cut out just as well as not. It was there as usual; we were asked to vote it as usual. Apparently no real consideration has been given by the government to the question of really pruning these estimates and cutting the coat to fit the cloth. These are matters the people of this country have in mind at this time; these are matters which are going to cause more of an uproar than there already has been if some real attempt is not made by the government to reduce expenditure.

On the other side of the picture the income tax is to be increased, not in the way that was proposed by the right hon. Prime Minister two years ago but at least to some extent. Here again the small taxpayer is being brought in; exemptions are being lowered and there is to be an increase of 650 per cent imposed on the man earning a salary of $2,500, with only a 14 per cent increase imposed on the man with an income of $50,000. Those are matters about which the people are wondering. I do not think any more illuminating document could have been published—and I say this to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), who is not in his seat—than the chart which recently appeared in the National Revenue Review, which shows the collections of income tax from certain classes of the community, and in certain income brackets. I say that publications such as this give information a great deal more quickly than long rows of figures, and I want to congratulate the minister on having published this statement.

I have no doubt the income tax will bring in a large amount of money; at least I hope it will, but at the same time I believe in his own heart the Minister of Finance is convinced that he is making a mistake in going to perhaps ten thousand, fifteen thousand or twenty thousand people and getting small contributions of $2, $5 or $10. I believe the cost of collection will almost equal the amount of money he collects. Perhaps this is being done with the idea of equality of sacrifice, but if all this time my right hon. friend has left out this class I do not think that when he brings them in he should at the same time increase the tax on small incomes so greatly while the tax on an income of $50,000 is increased by only 14 per cent. I shall not deal at greater length with matters of income tax generally, because they can be discussed later on when the bill is brought down.

Let us consider for a moment the other taxes. There is to be a tax of two cents per pound on sugar, and I understand that molasses is taken from the exempted list under the sales tax. We are told that $20.000,000 is expected to be raised from the tax on sugar. That amounts to $2 per head for every man, woman and child in this dominion and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this tax, bearing as it does upon a necessity of life that always has been regarded as an essential, coupled with the removal of molasses from the list of exempted goods under the sales tax, imposes a very great hardship on the poorer people of this dominion. So far as the sugar industry is concerned I have no fault to find with my hon. friend. That industry is well protected; in fact it is too well protected, but this tax is not going to be paid by the sugar industry. This tax of two cents a pound will be paid by the individual householder who, with sugar at the present price, will have to pay a 50 per cent tax on all the sugar going into his house.

The removal of other foodstuffs from exemption under the sale tax will bring about the same result. I have not gone over the list of exemptions carefully enough to know how many commodities are included, but I do know that generally speaking it is foodstuffs that are affected.

Then we come to the nuisance taxes, and first there is the tax on cheques under $5. Two years ago the Prime Minister abandoned that idea, but now he takes it up again. With regard to the tax on bonds and on payments made out of Canada I have no doubt that my right hon. friend has received representations long before this from companies all over this dominion who have had their corporation tax increased by one and a half per cent and who now will be forced in addition to absorb this tax on interest payable in the United States. Why do I say that? Because of the fact that the trust deeds, in almost every case, under which bonds are issued provide that the company must absorb any tax that may be levied except Canadian income tax, and as a result instead of taxing the foreigner receiving this bond interest my hon. friend is taxing the Canadian company. As I say, I have no doubt that representations have been received by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance before this, and if he has received telegrams similar to those I have received I have no doubt he will have to give serious consideration to this further taxation of Canadian companies.

With regard to the taxation of foreign investments in this country, the Prime Minister knows the argument that was advanced two years ago as to foreign capital coming to Canada. He knows whether or not that argument is effective; he knows far better than I do. Two years ago the Prime Minister abandoned this tax after it was proposed. Whether he will do the same thing now remains to be seen. I do point out to him, however, that this is a debtor and not a creditor country, that we are a borrowing and not a lending nation, and any tax on capital coming here to help our industrial development must be considered very carefully. With regard to taxation generally, however, I have no doubt my right hon. friend is saying that the opposition have nothing to do with taxation anyway. This is what he said in 1928:

> There is not much to be gained by an opposition suggesting anything with respert to the income tax nor indeed, for that matter, respecting taxation generally. Taxes must be imposed by the government and under our institutions proposals in this regard must originate with the administration of the day. The government only can take the necessary action in this respect.

My right hon. friend has made the proposals, but I miss my guess very much if those proposals are not considerably changed before this bill gets out of the committee of ways and means.

My hon. friend, as one headliner in the budget, indicates that he is going to establish what he calls a stabilization fund. Stabilization is a better word than bonus—agricultural stabilization. It means, according to the hon. gentleman, that there is to be paid to the exporter of certain products which are named in the budget the difference between the current rate of exchange and $4.60 in connection with goods shipped to Great Britain.

Now, no one can tell how it is going to work out until he sees the result next year. I said the same thing about the wheat bonus and I repeat it now in regard to this matter. In principle I am opposed to this sort of legislation, because I do not believe it is sound but if bonuses are going they ought to extend to every natural product and, as someone suggests, factory products as well. I cannot see how you can pick out some part of the community shipping to Great Britain and say to that class that they will have a certain amount made up on what they lose in shipping to Great Britain, while other exporters are given no such consideration. Take for instance the fresh fish producers. According to this they will get a bonus, but the preserved fish man does not. Why, I cannot understand. Again, the canned fish man receives consideration, but the man whose product is pickled fish does not. I have no idea what the reason for this discrimination can be. Take lumber, coal, wheat —they are left out altogether; and the same applies to butter, apples and all these other products. What the reason is, we do not know. One could name numbers of natural products that fall into the same category. After all, Mr. Speaker, I ask you: Is there any guarantee, except what the Prime Minister said last evening to the effect that the government were considering the matter of machinery, that the man who actually produces the goods will get the benefit of this bonus? The exporter is the one who will get it, according to the budget speech. Is this going to be the practical working out of it—that perhaps the people of this country are to pay $2 per head of a tax on sugar in order to subsidize the British consumer? Is that going to be the practical outcome? The benefit may never accrue at all to our producer, because this is a buyer's market. The buyer may say to him, "Yes, but you are getting so much from the government and you must take that off the price." The result is that the British consumer will get his goods that much lower. How is the Prime Minister going to prevent it? I hope he has in mind some means whereby he can prevent this occurring, but I would point out that very often schemes of this kind miscarry. My right hon. friend has to watch two individuals in connection with such a scheme—not only the British consumer but the exporter as well.

Let me make a few observations with regard to fish. I say to my hon. friend that he will not get very far in assisting the fishermen of the east in shipping fresh fish to England. I believe there was about $300,000 worth of fresh fish shipped last year to England whereas the shipments to the United States amounted to something like $6,000,000. If this provision is intended to assist the producer of fish, why does he not get the bonus for the fish he ships to the United States as well as to Great Britain? What is the difference? He ships $300,000 worth to one market and $6,000,000 to the other. I am afraid this will not do our Atlantic coast fishermen any good. I shall be very glad to see them get it, and I advocated it when the wheat bonus was brought up. But the fact is that you will not find any large shipment of fresh fish to Great Britain.

I say to the Minister of Finance, who was formerly Minister of Fisheries, that if he wishes to help the shore fishermen of the maritime provinces all he has to do is to refuse licences to trawlers when they expire on March 31. That would be more helpful to that class of the community than this stabilization fund can possibly prove. I say that to the minister in all seriousness. I mentioned this last fall, and now is the time to act. The provision of the order in council is to the effect that if the shore fishermen can supply the market then the trawler licences are not to be granted, and I say that the time has come when trawler licences should be refused, inasmuch as the shore fishermen are in a position to supply more than the market which they have. Moreover, the price is only about three-quarters of a cent per pound and at that figure they can hardly make a living wage; they must have the maximum of production to make even a fair portion of a day's wage. Last fall I put on record the receipts of the fishermen from day to day, and the situation revealed then has not shown any improvement. I say to my hon. friend therefore that he would do far more for the shore fishermen by refusing licences to trawlers off the Nova Scotia coast than he can possibly do in connection with the stabilization fund.

This idea of trying to assist an industry by simply having one part of the community contribute to another section is something I do not agree with. We are not getting anywhere by pursuing that policy; we are simply lifting ourselves by our bootstraps. That, I submit, is not the sort of policy that will revive trade and produce tonnage for our railways and revenues through the Customs department. It cannot be done that way. We must find some means whereby exports will be encouraged and revenues will be obtained, not through increased prices to be charged the people of Canada but from the people who are buying in the markets of the world.

Mr. MANION: Does my hon. friend apply that to coal? Does he take that attitude with regard to coal?

Mr. RALSTON: I have taken the same attitude straight along. My hon. friend knows that we do not export coal.

Mr. MANION: But we give it a bonus.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; we pay subventions.

Mr. MANION: It is the same thing.

Mr. RALSTON: No, it does not amount to the same thing.

Mr. MANION: I thought my hon. friend would change his position.

Mr. RALSTON: In connection with the carriage of coal to upper Canada we pay subventions with respect to freight rates. I advocated it and it was put into force long before my hon. friend came into power.

Mr. STEVENS: It is still lifting yourself by your bootstraps.

Mr. RALSTON: We do it because it is a Canadian industry which we want to preserve and we are not thereby assisting foreign consumers. My hon. friend knows what the difference is. He will realize perfectly well that in this case the man who gets the ultimate benefit from the action which the government proposes is the British consumer.

Mr. STEVENS: I don't know anything of the kind.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Suppose we have a little order.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, on both sides.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We did not interrupt the Minister of Finance.

Mr. STEVENS: We are not interrupting.

Mr. RALSTON: I come now to what might be a helpful suggestion to my hon. friend in regard to the way in which he might balance his budget after he has reduced his expenditures and has done what he can in the way of increased taxation. He must stimulate and encourage trade in this country and the sale of the goods we have to sell. I would point out to him that the revenue policy of the Liberal party has had as its keystone receipts from customs revenues as a revenue tariff. Let me give him the proportion of revenue which has been received from customs levies since 1926. These are the figures:

Year—	Percentage
1926	42
1927	43·7
1928	45
1929	49
1930	49
1931	46·7
1933	28

What is the reason for this decline? It is due to the fact that my hon. friend put on higher tariffs. An average duty of twenty-four per cent has increased to twenty-nine per cent; and twenty-nine per cent when figured on the pound at current rates of exchange instead of on $4.86\frac{2}{3}$ has become practically thirty-five per cent of a duty on dutiable goods coming into the country. This amounts in large degree to an embargo, so that my hon. friend is cut off from the revenue he expected.

What has happened? The Prime Minister two years ago guessed as to the amount of revenue he would receive from customs tariffs, and he guessed $22,000,000 wrong; he got $22,000,000 less than he expected. The Minister of Finance last year guessed $100,000,000 and he got $80,000,000. He was $20,000,000 out. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not realize that high customs tariffs simply mean the cutting off of revenue.

I should like next to place on record the trade figures since 1928. They are:

	Imports	Exports	Total
1928	$1,108,000,000	$1,250,000,000	$2,359,000,000
1929	1,265,000,000	1,388,000,000	2,654,000,000
1930	1,248,000,000	1,144,000,000	2,393,000,000
1931	906,000,000	817,000,000	1,723,000,000
1932	578,000,000	587,000,000	1,166,000,000
1933	442,000,000	494,000,000	937,000,000

But my hon. friend says that there is a favourable balance of trade. There was a small favourable balance of trade it is true but it was due—not to our selling more but—to our having to buy less. Imports totalled $442,000,000, only $42 per capita, the lowest since 1905. Our population is being starved for goods, which are necessary and desirable, in order that we may worship this god, the balance of trade. $442,000,000 in imports as against $494,000,000 in exports! Our total trade is down nearly fifty per cent from 1931 and over sixty per cent from 1928. That is the trade record. What caused it? Duties were imposed in the special session and more in 1931. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance rather gave the impression that we had put on our tariffs after England had gone off the gold standard. Our tariffs were put on in May, 1931 while Britain did not go off gold, until September 1931. Canada was one of those who started the parade, not one of those who came in after England had gone off the gold standard. Down went imports and down went customs revenues, with the result that our customs revenue in 1931 was only $145,000,000 and for the eleven months of 1933, only $69,000,000. That shows the vicious circle and why my hon. friend is unable to get his revenue. In the first place, we shut out the goods; in the second place we cut off revenue, and in the third place, we shut in our own goods and then tax the man who can not sell his goods in order to make up what has been lost in customs duties. I think the Prime Minister gave the neatest possible example of that when he was discussing the imperial conference arrangements. This is something about which we happen to know down east. He is quoted on page 121 of Hansard as follows:

> Under normal conditions Canada exports annually about 1,800 million board feet of lumber valued at $50,000,000, of which 1,445 million feet, valued at $39,000,000 has been going to the United States and 186 million feet valued at $6,474,000 to the United Kingdom. The recent United States import tax of $3 per 1,000 board feet has practically closed that market to Canada. New markets are essential. This applies to lower and common grades which comprise from 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the lumber sawn.

What caused the United States to put on that $3 per thousand board feet tax? The Bennett tariff of 1931. There was a retaliatory measure of $3 per thousand feet and then another $1 per thousand feet was added. My hon. friend had to bring a conference over from Great Britain in order to see if we could not sell them the 1,445 million feet which we lost in the United States because of the tariffs put on by my hon. friends in 1931. That is how high tariffs work out, that is the result of the red-blooded policy of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion).

If my right hon. friend has learned anything, I think he has learned from the difficulties which have presented themselves in connection with markets. We are trying to find revenue and at the same time endeavouring to find markets. Here is what my right hon. friend predicted when he spoke in Vancouver:

> If Mr. Mackenzie King thinks I will not so build up our agricultural and industrial life that its strength will drive our products into the markets of the world, then he is wrong. For that I will do. If he thinks I will not establish new markets for these products, strive with all my heart to retain them, drive our products with all my power into new markets, into old markets, into reluctant markets, he is wrong. For this I will do.

I am sure that when the Minister of Finance counts up the amount of duties received from the customs tariffs he will wish that the Prime Minister had used some other kind of dynamite than that which he has used for the purpose of forcing Canadian goods into these markets. He is now seeking frantically to make up the revenues which he has lost from customs duties by imposing a duty on sugar and by depriving pensioners of their pension. He is trying to make up what legitimate trade would produce. After all, the remedies are simple—cut your expenditures and increase your trade. This matter of a trade policy which will increase foreign trade, while I know it is not as new as some of the policies being advocated these days, is I think vital. Speaking in Winnipeg, in 1930 the Prime Minister told us where he got his trade policy. He said:

> The United States learned a long time ago that to become a great nation it must first look to itself. It therefore began to build up its home market by keeping out of it the goods of other nations. There was a time if when foreign countries had had their way, they could have smashed its youthful industries, dried up its revenue, wrecked its transportation systems and left it a country of idle workmen, of starving agriculturists, of futile manufacturers. Look at it now, marching to the slogan of America first.

If my right hon. friend will read the evidence of Mr. Frank H. Simon given before the United States Senate committee only a few weeks ago, he will find that that slogan of America first is regarded as a rather dangerous one. I suppose my right hon. friend got the idea of Canada first from the idea of America marching to the slogan of America first. I think it will be found that the buy British policy has also been found to be one of doubtful utility. People are beginning to realize the truth of what appeared in a Canadian publication just the other day. This article reads:

> A realization that no nation can live unto itself alone and that a spirit of international economic cooperation will usher in a return to more normal business conditions is steadily gaining ground.

Signed "Arthur Meighen". That article appeared in the Financial Post of November 5.

As my hon. friends apparently are not convinced, as we shall endeavour to keep on preaching the gospel to them, I may perhaps have to traverse some old ground. I want to point out that this slogan of Canada first, this raising of tariffs, has not attained that end to which my right hon. friend referred in Winnipeg as being the great objective of the American people and that which he desired to attain by his tariff policy. Let us see if it has developed production in our industries to supply the home market which my right hon. friend set such store by. I give just a very few figures:

Volume of Industrial Production

Year—	Index figure
1928	120.4
1930	....

When my right hon. friend was making his promises.

——	106
September, 1932	71.9

Let us take manufacturing production, and these are industries which are being protected by the policy of my hon. friends. Surely they ought to be benefited:

Year—	Index figure
1928	117.4
1930	100.5
September, 1932	74.3

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce had a lot to say about pig iron in, I think, 1927 or 1928. The figures are as follows:

Pig Iron

Year—	Index figure
1928	151.9
1930	104.1
September, 1932	9.9

Steel Ingots and Castings

1928	137.4
1930	113.4
October, 1932	27.1

These are some of the figures. What has happened with regard to prices? The prices of manufactured goods have been maintained beyond all proportion to those of farm products. The figures are as follows:

Farm Products

Year—	Index figure
January, 1930	79.8
January, 1933	43.6

A reduction of 36·2 per cent.

Manufactured Products

January, 1930	85.8
January, 1933	67.5

A reduction of only 18·3 per cent.

What about employment? The figures are as follows:

Employment in all Industries

Year—	Index figure
July, 1930	118.9
July, 1931	103.8
July, 1932	87.7

And taking the comparable months:

February, 1930	111.6
February, 1931	100.7
February, 1932	89.7
February, 1933	76.8

In manufacturing where this tariff should have taken hold, where the home market should have afforded employment for all our men, where those Canadian workmen about whom my hon. friends talk so much should have found work, what was the situation?

Employment in Manufacturing

Year—	Index figure
July, 1930	111.3
July, 1931	97.2
July, 1932	85.4

And for the comparable months:

February, 1930	110.2
February, 1931	96.1
February, 1932	85.9
February, 1933	75.0

Do we need any figures to-day to prove that there is unemployment in Canada; that unemployment has not been ended? The figure of 800,000 unemployed has been mentioned, and it has been stated that $123,000,000 has been spent on relief. The Prime Minister, when he came to the house in 1930, said that as regards curing unemployment, if the measures which he submitted were productive of the good which he indicated they hoped for, the number, which was 117,000, would steadily decrease and the maximum anticipated number of 177,000 would not be reached. Is there any doubt that the policy of high tariffs and economic isolation has failed?

This brings me to what I submit is the most serious defect in the whole budget. That is, that while it does not reduce expenditures, and while it imposes more taxation, it provides for nothing whatever in connection with the fundamental improvement of conditions in this country. Let me read a passage from the first part of the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. I feel that I ought to take the time of the house to put it on Hansard, because it is indicative of the attitude of my hon. friends opposite. He said:

> There are those who decry the possibility of an international solution and who insist that we should seek remedies at home for present conditions. I do not wish to minimize the difficulties and delays which are involved in any program based on international agreement, or to overlook the plain duty which rests upon every nation to keep its own house in order and to strive to the utmost by domestic action to accelerate the processes of business recovery. However, one cannot fail to observe that the present crisis is international, both in its causes and its effects, and that the remedy must be sought in international understanding and cooperation. Slowly, but nevertheless surely, the world is approaching full realization of the fact that the day of national self-sufficiency is past, that an international disease can only be cured by an international remedy.
> Therefore, I look forward hopefully to the World Economic and Monetary conference which is expected to meet in London in the near future, and to which we propose to give our whole-hearted support. Members of this house have already had an opportunity of studying the agenda of that conference prepared by an able committee of experts. I am hopeful that on the basis of this agenda—

Note this:

> —a program can be worked out for the relaxation of exchange controls and other excessive restrictions on international trade, for the stabilization of currencies and for the stimulation of a rise in the world level of wholesale prices. The success of this conference assumes a prior or simultaneous settlement of the war debt question and some appeasement of political fears and rivalries as a result of progress in disarmament discussions or otherwise. If these prerequisite conditions can be achieved, it should be possible to reach agreement upon a program which would be effective in restoring world confidence and initiating an early recovery of business activity. The world has this solution within its grasp and in my opinion there is no other—short of prolonged and painful liquidation, if this indeed can be called a solution. Events are moving rapidly, driven by the urge of economic necessity. On this fact may rest the basis for a greater degree of optimism than has obtained in many months.

No self-reliance! No leadership! No courage! No suggestion of anything that we in this country may do, but we are leaning altogether on the world economic conference if, as or when there is one, and we are not even yet sure that there is to be one! If we can get a relaxation of exchange controls; if excessive restrictions on trade can be removed; if there can be a stabilization of currencies; if the world level of prices rises; then if prior to or simultaneous with this, there is a world debt settlement and if there is an appeasement of political fears and rivalries, we are on the road to economic recovery; otherwise liquidation.

I am reminded of the classic phrase of the Prime Minister because it has become a classic now: "Mr. King promises you conferences; I promise you work. Which plan do you like best?"

This is what Mr. Beaudry Leman, general manager of La Banque Nationale, has to say of the world economic conference, rather indicating that it is doubtful whether we are going to have definite action from that body. He said:

It would be difficult to conceive how any government would surrender to a body of representatives chosen from seventy nations the power to control its economic policies. One may hope, however, that the delegates to the conference may agree on some broad policy which would promote the economic recovery. The nations of the world depend upon one another to such an extent that agreements that are international in scope are necessary, but—

And I impress this on the Minister of Finance—

—this necessity in no way absolves each country from establishing sound policies within its own boundaries.

That is where, it seems to me, the Minister of Finance completely falls down, if I may use the expression, in connection with this budget.

Reciprocity with the United States has been mentioned, and I refer to it now. The Prime Minister, in the debate on the resolution which was moved by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), had something to say about the matter. I think the house and the country have reason to congratulate the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough on having brought this resolution before the House of Commons. I want to point out that in connection with that as with other matters, this government is simply supine, listless, lethargic, and proposes to await the turn of events. Let me point out how my right hon. friend received this proposal. One would have thought it would provide some means for an extension of our trade. I have already mentioned with regard to the fishing industry the millions of dollars' worth of exports that we send to the United States, and that is our natural market for these products. In 1911 my right hon. friend the Prime Minister said:

One of the strongest reasons I had for opposing the reciprocity agreement was—

Not that it was an indefinite agreement, not that it could be changed at any time, but——that it threw into the melting pot for solution a question that involved a problem of patriotism.

That is what he said in 1911, at page 23 of Hansard. In this house the other night he said:

On more than one occasion I have in this house indicated clearly the reasons I for one was opposed to that measure. First, it was an agreement incorporated into the statutes of both countries for that year, and it mentioned a limited number of items. But it was so framed that the change by this dominion of its tariff with respect to any one of those items terminated the agreement; secondly, the agreement was for no period of time, or for no definite length of years.

A different reason from that which he gave in 1911, when reciprocity involved a question of patriotism. But he said the other night that he earnestly desired some arrangement with the United States. What does he and the Minister of Finance propose to do about it? This a time when action is required. This is what my right hon. friend said the other night.

In my judgment all we can do is follow the course that has been followed by successive governments and indicate clearly our willingness to negotiate on terms that are fair and reasonable, to quote the words that have been used by both Liberal and Conservative prime ministers and ministers of finance. We can only be ready and willing to avail ourselves of any proposals that are fair and reasonable and are not of such a character as will involve injury to this country if they are speedily terminated.

An hon. MEMBER: No blasting.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no blasting in that. My right hon. friend is very docile in a matter of that kind. He is not going to disturb the people on the other side at all. There is nothing even red-blooded about that. Of course the situation, as my right hon. friend knows, is that he has pretty well tied his hands so far as making a reciprocity agreement with the United States is concerned by the agreements he made at the imperial conference, and he has to soft-pedal now in connection with negotiations with the United States. I hope that my right hon. friend will pursue the negotiations with the United States which it is rumoured are taking place, and that we may see a reciprocity agreement or a reciprocity arrangement of some kind consummated with the United States in view of the accession of the new administration over there. One particularly from Nova Scotia cannot mention reciprocity in this house or any other place in Canada, without associating with it the name of the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, because I believe that that arrangement was the greatest of the many achievements in the public life of that very distinguished statesman.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask this house, is there any doubt in these days of the necessity of getting rid of the strangling trade restrictions and of endeavouring to widen our markets? I have made it my text so far as the increase of revenue is concerned, but I make it my text on account of the prosperity of our people as well. I quote here the statement made by Sir Herbert Holt, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, in his address at the last annual meeting:

Civilization itself has been built upon the exchange of goods between nations. In the course of time, such exchange produced a steadily rising tide of prosperity, increased productive capacity, and increased the volume of consumption in every part of the world. With the abnormal conditions which followed the beginning of the present depression, each country in turn has made enormous efforts to increase its exports, to decrease its imports, and to make itself less dependent on the outside world. Almost without realizing the nature of their acts, they have, each in turn, taken measures which have undermined their own prosperity. They have sought payment in gold, rather than payment in goods. . . . In a vague and almost aimless manner the world has permitted itself to drift into a state of economic warfare, more destructive than was the great war of 1914. Each country is engaged in a campaign of attrition. If the futility of this were recognized an armistice could be declared, but before there can be sufficient goodwill to establish satisfactory terms of peace, the necessity for mutual concessions must be recognized by all combatants.

Further he says:

There should be a demand from every city and town throughout the world for the re-establishment of world trade. . . . Holland, Denmark, Belgium, and Luxemburg have reduced their tariffs in order to facilitate greater freedom in the exchange of goods and have left the door open to other countries to join them.

Apropos of the imperial conference agreements he says:

We must hope that more doors will be open to trade both inside and outside the empire.

Sir John Aird, a banker of note in this country, the president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, speaks of the "recognition in several quarters that extreme protectionism has proved a boomerang." This from a leading banker. He speaks of "nationalistic mania," a phrase which I commend to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and of "trade restrictions which must have taxed heavily the ingenuity of tariff makers." I believe that Sir John Aird must have had in mind the exchange dumping duty which for some time past has been used so effectively by this government to restrict trade.

I shall not take time to quote from a late monthly report of the Bank of Nova Scotia, which in pretty much the same terms indicates that the strangulation of trade is at the bottom of all our troubles.

Let me say one thing more with regard to the exchange dumping duty. I am glad indeed that the Minister of Finance has seen fit to alter the rate of exchange and at least to make the fixed rate at $4.25 instead of $4.40. That indicates two things, that he is recognizing, I think, the representations which have been made in this country, and also the representations which have been made from Great Britain; but I say to him that I do not think there is anything more fundamentally wrong than that exchange dumping duty which he and the government of which he is a member pledged themselves to remove as soon as possible after the imperial conference. For a short time in 1931 it might have been justified. When England went off the gold standard it took a while for prices to stabilize themselves, but they stabilized themselves long ago. As a matter of fact, prices in Great Britain to-day are something like fourteen per cent higher than they were at that time, so there has been more than an evening up by reason of the increase in prices there, and yet my hon. friends maintain the exchange dumping duty which has enabled them to do anything at all in the way of a jumping-jack tariff over the last two years, up and down and in and out, with the rate two weeks ago $4.16, to-day $4.40, a month afterwards $4.12, two weeks later $3.90, then back to $4.10, and so on. The importer does not know where he gets off in the melee of regulations and cross-regulations and rulings and orders which go out from time to time from the Minister of National Revenue.

I have brought to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue so often that I do not want to go into it again in detail to-day, that sections 36 to 43 of the Customs Act give more power to this government than any other government in the world ever had with regard to the changing of tariffs. I got a list the other day from the Department of National Revenue, and I find that my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue, instead of being busy making reductions in his own department and trying to find some way out of the economic dilemma in which this country finds itself, is busy making valuations for duty purposes of beets and cabbages and berets—I do not mean berries, but the things the ladies wear—and wool jersey cloth, cotton stockingette, and wood lead pencils. That is one among many of the occupations in which my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue is engaged. The exchange dumping duty, plus these sections of the act, have given an opportunity to this government to make more changes in tariffs and harass the people of this country more I think than anything since the Spanish inquisition.

Let me read for the edification of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) what he said in 1924, and let me commend it to him especially the next time he goes to council and discusses the powers which the government has for fixing valuations for duty purposes. He said:

> Furthermore, the tariff should be stable in its character, not subject to constant change and variation. Nothing is so harassing to a business or a financial man as to be constantly faced with the apprehension that overnight the tariff may be changed and large quantities of goods on hand or on order, seriously affected by such tariff changes. Nowadays a firm dare not issue a catalogue, for it does not know from hour to hour what tariff changes may be made. Tariff stability, voiced so eloquently by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding)—whom we miss so much from this debate—is what we require to-day.

If ever there was a government that had tariff instability, and if ever there was a government about which tariff instability is more firmly written on the records of the Department of National Revenue, the records of the importers of this country and the records of the consumers, I should like to know it. There has been absolute instability. There has been no chance in the world for people to know from day to day or even from hour to hour what the duty was going to be upon the goods with which they were dealing.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken longer than I expected to take, I have dealt with figures, a good many of them; I have dealt in some detail with a great number of the factors which affect our situation, and I want now to go back to plain, everyday fundamentals. Conditions of business in Canada, Incorporated, as I called it a few moments ago, are disturbing. By the end of the next fiscal year we will have added, since 1930, considerably over one half a billion dollars to the "mortgage on the farm". We are not living within our income and, in fact are not trying to. We are deliberately planning to have at the end of the coming fiscal year a deficit of nearly $100,000,000. We are pretending to reduce expenditures, but the way we are going about it is like chipping at the side of a mountain with a hand pick. The worst of all is that at the root of it our trade in basic commodities has dwindled to pitiful proportions, and yet we have the goods the world needs and must have. The government in one breath admits we ought to do something to help ourselves, but in the next it falls back supinely on the prospect of a world economic conference and, in the meantime, I submit with all due deference it is in a state of blue funk. The Prime Minister in a speech recently, referring to representations which had been made regarding a change of policy, asked "dare we do it?"

[Mr. Ralston.]

The other night in this house he made the declaration that the Canadian National Railways could be considered as being in receivership. Now we have the Minister of Finance suggesting that unless the world economic conference does something there will be nothing but liquidation. These are new words in respect of Canadian affairs, but their novelty does not make them any more welcome. The budget all the way through reflects this static, hopeless state of mind. It says "lop off a little expenditure, tax a great deal and wait until prosperity reaches us" instead of taking resolute measures to reach prosperity. I wish to protest against this static, fear-stricken attitude, but I bring the government this hope, not for itself—after the administration of the last two years it could hardly expect that—but I do bring to this government from the people of Canada hope for the Dominion of Canada.

When the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance talk about receivership and liquidation I remind him that the people of Great Britain dared to risk the financial leadership of the world by going off the gold standard. I remind him that the people of the United States only a few weeks ago, despite the inconvenience and humiliation in connection therewith, turned the key in the door of every bank from Massachusetts to California and from the forty-ninth parallel to the gulf of Mexico; because they believed it was necessary so to do, they did it. These people dared to do these things because of the greater good which they hoped would come. I say to the Prime Minister—

Mr. BENNETT: Do you suggest we should do that?

Mr. RALSTON: The people of Canada are impatient and irritated and determined, and they will dare do what this government dare not do. If the government will not lead the people, the people will lead the government. I tell the government that the people of Canada are willing to endure any fair measure, whatever it may be, which would be necessary to put our national house in order, and set the wheels of industry moving in the factory, the forest, the farm, the mine, and on the sea. But they are not willing to keep on as they have for the last two and a half years, holding the trenches with the fire of the enemy becoming more gruelling and devastating as the months go by and allowing the government to confine activities to putting barbed wire in the shape of trade restrictions in front of their own advance.

Canada must attack—not simply stay in the trenches—it has to attack, not markets but depression. If the government does not initiate the attack soon, they need not be surprised if there is a change in command. The people of Canada will stand casualties but it is not like the people of Canada to stand inaction, and there is plenty of that to-day. What the country wants is the same courage on the part of the government as the government asks of the people. This country calls to the government to come out of the dugout of fear and inaction and resignation and give the leadership which the people deserve. The government is asking the people to make further sacrifices and to carry additional burdens. The people expect the government to make sacrifices, and what our government needs to sacrifice at this time is a good deal of its pride and a good deal of that self-assurance which has made it so intolerant of any other policies than those propounded by itself. I refer to its attitude which up to now at least refuses even to examine seriously the currency question, the exchange question and the monetary policy, and which has treated the banking system of this country, good as it is, as something sacrosanct and practically incapable of improvement. They have gone around slamming doors in the faces of good customers and have then found that the so-called home market was not a place where we could dispose of our wheat and other grains, lumber, fish, furs and copper which are on the shelves of Canada's shop waiting to be disposed of. But in order to give some appearance of trade they are undertaking to handle the wheat crop and are now gambling to try to cover the losses.

These are policies which have to be changed, and changed quickly. Times change. New conditions arise which have to be met with new remedies. Some of these involve questions which have not seriously been discussed in Canada before, but the trade policy I have suggested is the policy which has given to Canada the happiest and most prosperous days she has ever known. It is because this budget lacks any practical attempt to grapple effectively with the problems that are at the root of our difficulties, and because it commits this country to another year of temporizing futility, that I beg to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie):

That all the words after "that" be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

"The proposals of the government as set forth in the budget presented to this house by the Minister of Finance make no provision for the fundamental changes in existing policies regarding trade, credit and employment which are required to cope with the present economic situation. They imply a continuance of fiscal and other policies which have not only signally failed to afford any solution of our national problems, but have been proven to have the effect of diminishing trade, of decreasing revenues, of increasing unemployment, and without any corresponding reduction in expenditures, of increasing taxation, and debt, thereby aggravating the existing depression and distress.

The increases in taxation proposed in the budget resolutions will fall most heavily upon those least able to bear the burden thereof, and, combined with other unjust exactions, will serve to intensify the distress already experienced in many homes throughout the dominion.

The absence, at this time, of any provision in the budget indicative of Canada's desire to negotiate trade agreements with countries willing to trade with Canada on a reciprocal basis is further evidence of the lack of a definite constructive policy in meeting the needs of the present situation.

For these and other reasons, this house is of the opinion that the present government no longer possesses the confidence of the country."

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 50, to amend the Railway Act (rate structure).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. REID: This bill contains two sections, an amendment to section 320 and a new subsection. I may say that this is practically the same bill I introduced last year, though that bill had three sections, the third dealing with domestic freight rates to British Columbia. This year I introduced two bills in an endeavour to clarify the two appeals I am making; I wished also to remove any objections that might be raised, some of which were raised last year by different hon. members including, I think the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion):

In passing, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I regret that the Minister of Railways saw fit to go out of his way to read me a lecture on my duties and activities as a member of parliament when I introduced the bill on freight rates a few weeks ago. I consider that I am responsible only to the people of the constituency of New Westminster with regard to my activities in this house, and even though I am a new member I do not take it very kindly to be lectured by the minister in that regard.

I do not intend to say more on that subject, Mr. Speaker, because it does not help any when one is endeavouring to present a bill containing an appeal on behalf of the people of British Columbia. To come to the bill itself, the Minister of Railways and many other members have said that the Board of Railway Commissioners and not the House of Commons is the place for freight rate adjustments. I think the recent document brought down by the Minister of Railways bears out that contention; I find that it rather definitely states this to be the case. I am not going to read the whole record; neither am I going to pick out any particular part to try and bolster up my argument. The minute of the privy council states:

> . . . one of the duties, if not indeed the principal task, of the Board of Railway Commissioners, is to determine upon application, what are fair and reasonable rates to be charged from time to time for the various services performed by public utilities under the jurisdiction of the board. (Order in council, P.C. 2434, dated the 6th day of October, 1920.)
> Further, that in appeals to the governor in council from the Board of Railway Commissioners a practice has grown up not to interfere with an order of the board unless it seems manifest that the board has proceeded upon some wrong principle or that it has been otherwise subject to error. Where the matters at issue are questions of fact depending for their solution upon a mass of conflicting expert testimony, or are otherwise such as the board is peculiarly fitted to determine, it has been customary, except as aforesaid, not to interfere with the findings of the board. (Order in council, P.C. 1170, dated the 17th day of June, 1927.)
> The Railway Act of 1903, under which the board was created, constituted the board a court of record with all the powers of such a court as to the hearing of witnesses and obtaining of evidence. The members of the board, in addition to their own long and varied experience, have available for the purposes of their investigations a permanent staff of expert officers and a complete system of records, which render that tribunal peculiarly qualified to deal with the intricate and highly technical subjects such as those involved in the said judgment from which the appeals were taken.

While it may be true, Mr. Speaker, that the board is constituted to deal with all matters of freight rates, I do not entirely agree that in every such matter we should be precluded from coming to parliament or the governor in council, especially in exceptional cases. I do not believe in setting up any board that is above parliament itself. It may be true that in connection with general rates it is not to be expected that parliament should deal with individual cases, but when one has a case of special appeal where an injustice has been done—such as we in British Columbia firmly believe has been done—I think it only fair and right that we should be allowed to come to parliament or to the foot of the throne with our appeal. If, however, all the rates are to be settled by the Board of Railway Commissioners parliament should carefully examine the powers of that tribunal and see if the board has all the necessary regulating powers.

In the course of the appeals made on behalf of British Columbia in regard to freight rates, those appealing have stated that as the Crowsnest pass rates were put into existence giving the districts from Calgary and Edmonton to Fort William a sectional tariff, we in British Columbia are equally entitled to the same consideration. However, the Board of Railway Commissioners has made it abundantly clear that we are not on solid ground when we base our appeals solely on the Crowsnest pass rates. They have told us plainly, during the course of various appeals to that board, that the Crowsnest pass rates have no bearing at all on British Columbia, and in fact that those rates are so set by statute that they cannot be used even as a yardstick in making other rates.

That decision and that reasoning have been given at various times by the Board of Railway Commissioners. They did make one decision, however, to which I should like to take some exception. Speaking of the export and domestic rates they said that the export grain does not compete with grain transported for domestic purposes, and in consequence no comparison between the two rates can be properly drawn. I do not entirely agree with that. While it is perfectly true that the grain itself going for export does not actually conflict with the actual grain going for domestic purposes, the fact that those in China or Japan or elsewhere can purchase that grain on the prairies and have it transshipped to that country, and then turn it into poultry or dairy products, which in turn compete with the products of the poultry or the dairy farmer in British Columbia, proves conclusively, I think, that the grain for export certainly has a relationship, so far as price and freight rates are concerned, with the grain and grain products used domestically by the poultry farmers of British Columbia; and we have in turn to compete with those countries.

With regard to the powers of the board, my bill proposes that if the board deem it advisable requests for appeal shall be granted on much broader lines, and in this connection I shall again have to quote from the report of the royal commission that investigated the maritime claims, generally known as the Duncan commission. That commission's report was submitted to the house in 1926, and I use it as one of the competent authorities in support of my endeavour to have this bill accepted by the house. I am afraid I shall have to quote extensively from the report because that commission went fully into the matter of enlarging the powers of the Board of Railway Commissioners so as to enable that body to deal with freight rates on a much broader basis than is provided for in the present Railway Act. I quote from page 24:

In addition, the cases which the maritime provinces have already submitted to the railway commission also raise the question of handicaps arising from the geographical position of their natural products, and their distance generally from central markets. If we were satisfied that under their present power the railway commission could adequately deal, on appeal, with the broader aspect of the maritime cases before them, we would make no further comment. Previous judgments of the railway board, however, lead us to fear that they will not feel competent to deal with such broad considerations as are still involved in these maritime claims. We cite, in particular, the following extracts from the board's judgments:

"The board under the Railway Act has no profit and loss responsibility, and its intervention in the matter of rates must, as has been indicated, be concerned with matters falling within the categories of reasonableness and unjust discrimination, and not with a policy of the development of industries through rate adjustments."

"The board has no power to regulate tolls, for the purpose of equalizing cost of production, or geographical, or climatic, or economic conditions."

The conclusion to be drawn from these extracts seems to us to be that the railway commission does not feel itself empowered to pass under its review, when appeals are made to it, the same wide range of business considerations which railway companies themselves can take into account in forming a judgment as to the extent to which they should develop trade and business.

We are far from suggesting that there should be arbitrary interference on the part of the railway commission with the business judgment of the railway companies, or that there should be any confusion between trade development that can reasonably be expected from a railway rate structure, and trade development that must be a matter for public or government responsibility quite apart from rate structure.

I will skip part of it, curtailing somewhat the argument put forward in the Duncan report.

An hon. MEMBER: Read the whole of it.

Mr. REID: If the hon. gentleman insists, I can very well read the whole of it because it further strengthens my ground. To continue:

Much of the evidence we heard in the maritimes left the impression on our minds that witnesses thought the railways should be operated to the advantage of the trader irrespective of the financial results to the railway. In other words, what a railway administration might concede, in the exercise of its judgment on what was good business or might ultimately be good business for itself, seemed to us to be demanded as a matter of right by the trader so that his own business might be profitably developed whether the operations of the railway were remunerative or not. Even if there were no privately owned railway company, the business interests of which must be fairly considered and safeguarded, we cannot conceive of a national system being efficiently administered on such a principle as that. On the other hand, from a public point of view, in return for the statutory and other public privileges which railway companies enjoy, it may not be unreasonable that there should be a responsible review of their policy (as interpreted in their rate structure) in its relation to the natural basic products of the country, and the development of these products and associated enterprises.

At present the work of the railway commission is circumscribed within the two considerations, viz.:

(a) Reasonable compensation to the carrying company, and

(b) No unfair preference or unjust discrimination as between traders.

Whenever the board has dealt with a question on appeal as to what must be regarded as fair and reasonable terms, it has always considered not only the operating costs to the railways but also a fair return on the amount of capital invested, and in the case of the Canadian National it is impossible for any branch to contribute to any great extent to relieving the burden of debt of the system. The same is true of the Canadian Pacific:

Section 320 of the Railway Act seems to give the wider powers that we have in mind to the railway commission, so far as the question of undue preference or unjust discrimination may be involved:

"320. In deciding whether a lower toll, or difference in treatment, does or does not amount to an undue preference or an unjust discrimination, the board may consider whether such lower toll, or difference in treatment is necessary for the purpose of securing, in the interests of the public, the traffic in respect of which it is made, and whether such object cannot be attained without unduly reducing the higher toll."

Even there we feel that, if the intention was to have larger national interests in mind, the section should be made clearer, and instead of the words "in the interests of the public" (which might be interpreted as in the interests of the "consuming" public), the words should clearly state that it is national interests (both "producing" and "consuming") that are in mind. If this was not the original intention of the section, we suggest it is the intention which should now be imported into it.

That comprises the first section of my bill, and of the two sections perhaps the second one is the more important.

We feel further that a similar extension of authority should be imparted to the railway board in regard to the question of reasonable compensation. It would then be competent for the railway board to make a survey of just the very character that the president of the Canadian National Railways testified as being part of his function (as the business head of a railway); and if from public policy they felt that an experimental rate should be conceded, they should be free to constitute the rate, even although it might not, at the time, or of itself, give reasonable compensation to the railway company.

We recognize, however, that amongst the business considerations which must always be taken into account in a review of this kind are:

(a) A proper balancing of the structure of railway rates so that on the whole (though not in a particular item of business) there would be not only reasonable compensation to the railway company for the carrying services it renders but such reasonable compensation over all as to permit of a certain amount of trade development.

(b) A means of ascertaining whether, in fact, the rate asked for is necessary to the producing or trading interest, bearing in mind that a reduced rate may be pressed for when trading results might show it was not required, or on the other hand, when trade could not be very much developed even if the rate asked for were conceded.

If the railway board is to be vested—as we think it should be—and we recommend that it should be—with the somewhat fuller supervisory responsibility that we have indicated, we think it should also be vested—and recommend accordingly—with power, in weighing an application that raised these considerations, to order an accounting investigation at their own hand, into the incidence of the railway charge on the costs of production of the commodity, and its relationship to other costs, and to the general trading results of the interest involved.

Another paragraph reads:

We wish to emphasize that this is a field of thought into which we have not carelessly wandered. It has been forced upon our attention by the geographical and other difficulties which the evidence we received in the maritime provinces made it clear parts of the country at long distance from central markets were bound to suffer from; and we had the advantage of hearing from the chief commissioner, who met us at our request, as to the powers of the railway commission at the present time.

That report covers fairly well the two sections of this bill. It will be seen that the powers asked for are not mandatory; the bill simply asks that the board give further consideration to general appeals and the efforts to build up trade through the sale of grain from the prairies to the poultrymen, the dairymen and the stockbreeders of British Columbia. These producers in British Columbia of eggs, butter and so on, can use the cheap grains for which the farmer on the prairies must find a market.

This bill is not sectional in character. While it is proposed to assist British Columbia, it would also assist other sections of the country, the maritimes included, in going before the Board of Railway Commissioners to appeal on general grounds. It has been amply proven that the board has not the power to allow appeals based upon broad lines. What I am asking for has been recommended by the Duncan commission, so this bill is not entirely my own idea. Unless the board are given these further powers, in my opinion it will be of little use for the province of British Columbia to spend any more money in appealing to the board for a reduction in freight rates.

Further, no one can tell what may happen when the railway bill now before the house goes into effect. If certain main lines are abandoned and all the traffic going into Vancouver is sent over the Canadian Pacific lines, the question of freight rates would be made that much more difficult. I am in hopes that the powers proposed to be given to the tribunal by the railway bill will in no way take away from the powers of the Board of Railway Commissioners in so far as freight rates are concerned. Surely parliament is not going to block every avenue of appeal. Hon. members of this house have appealed at various times for a reduction in freight rates and they have always been told that parliament is not the place to come to ask for a reduction in freight rates, that they should go before the Board of Railway Commissioners. If that is so, then the board should be allowed to go a little further in the matter of decisions. I am asking that further power be granted under the Railway Act so that this can be done. I think it advisable that this board should have sufficient power to be able to order that a certain lower rate on grain and grain products shall apply between the prairies and British Columbia. Such a rate would benefit not only the stock raiser, the poultryman and the dairy farmer, but the railway companies, as well, because it would include also the transporting of incubators, eggs, wire and many other commodities. I ask the house to give its favourable consideration to this bill which if adopted will grant further powers to the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to address the house in connection with this particular measure, but perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words. This matter was before the house last year and also I believe at the beginning of this session. It is very interesting to note that the hon. gentleman who has introduced this bill (Mr. Reid) has changed his attitude somewhat. In the first bill which he introduced he took the attitude that freight rates should be set up by statute or, in other words, made by the members of parliament. Now in this bill he asks that certain powers be taken away from parliament and given to the Board of Railway Commissioners. In other words, he wishes to make the commission a political or governing board rather than a judicial board.

It is not necessary for me to go into the history of this board. As the house will recall, in 1903, Sir Wilfrid Laurier in his wisdom saw that it was necessary to set up some organization to take care of the very intricate and complicated matter of freight rates. Therefore by statute he set up what is known as the Board of Railway Commissioners, with powers similar to that of our exchequer or supreme court. This board is so constituted that any citizen of Canada can appear before it and receive a hearing.

The hon. member says that the passage of this bill would facilitate matters. I think it would tend to complicate matters a great deal if this board were made a governing instead of a judicial board. This country is three thousand miles wide and other sections of the country might consider that they had interests just as important as those of British Columbia. What we in British Columbia want is a board similar to our courts before which we can appear, present our case and receive justice. That is all that we expect and all that we are entitled to. I assure the hon. member that all of us from British Columbia are anxious that something should be done to lower the rates on feed grain. This is a matter that we have all advocated, and further, we have tried to keep it out of the political arena. We have always realized that we had a case and felt that we were not being dealt with justly. Unfortunately, the hon. gentleman has drawn this matter into the political arena. Some of the smaller Liberal papers in our province have pictured my hon. friend as the real Kingfish as far as advocating lower freight rates is concerned. I have come to the conclusion that he is more interested in the votes of the farmers than in securing a lower rate.

As regards freight rates, as I said before, anyone can go to the Board of Railway Commissioners and discuss this matter; he can place his grievance before them and he will receive consideration. I discussed the matter with the chairman of the railway board some six months ago and I know that if proper representation were made by our province, justice would be received at his hands. The obstacle in the way at the time was that an appeal was pending and therefore they could not hear the case until the appeal was disposed of. Now that the appeal has been dismissed, the way is open and I think my hon. friend would accomplish a great deal more for the people of our province and particularly of the Fraser valley if he would initiate something in the way of an appeal and present it, not as the appeal was presented before, but along the lines of our claim for cheaper feed grain.

Some people have said that this is not a matter for parliament to deal with. When I was speaking on this subject last year I referred to that and to the fact that I was astonished at some hon. gentlemen, for instance, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the ex-Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) supporting the hon. gentleman's bill. At that time I referred back to the session of 1925, where I find at page 4439 of Hansard the words of the then Prime Minister, now leader of the opposition. This is what he said:

> I have been looking over some of the speeches which I made in western Canada last fall, and which were quoted, in part I think, by the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) in his remarks the other evening. I notice in speaking on the prairies I intimated very clearly that my view was that the railway commission was the right body to fix freight rates and should be given a free hand in the matter, but that I felt it should expect to receive directions from the government on matters of national policy. When speaking in Vancouver and Victoria I made similar statements.

Then I find that the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) spoke during the same debate as reported at page 4420 of Hansard of that year. He said:

> The railway board is charged with the duty of making rates fair and equitable to all. We have set up the board to do that work. Why then not let the board perform that duty? They are infinitely better qualified to make these rates than are members of parliament. If parliament has no confidence in the railway board—and that sentiment has been expressed by some hon. members—then the remedy is not to throw the business of rate-making into this house; the remedy is so to constitute your board that you will have confidence in it.

That was the opinion of the then government. We had the spectacle last year and again this year when the bill came to a vote, of hon. members opposite, in order to try to help out politically their good colleague from New Westminster, forgetting all about the principle in which they believed in 1925 and supporting him on the division.

I just wish to repeat what I have said, that we could do a great deal more to secure these reductions in feed grain rates by going directly to this court which has been set up rather than by introducing impossible legislation, legislation that my hon. friend knows could never be accepted by any parliament. The other parties have so expressed themselves.

Mr. NEILL: Oh, no.

Mr. BARBER: The Liberal party did so when they were in power. Of course, if the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) were leader of a government he might adopt this bill, but the Liberal party have on more than one occasion expressed themselves as against it. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the present leader of the opposition and the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) have so expressed themselves. I wish to compliment the Minister of Railways for securing for us the reduction in feed grain rates which came into force, I believe, on March 10. This credit goes entirely to the present minister. I have been informed that the hon. member for New Westminster has stated that it was through his efforts in the house that the government was forced to do something; that he was not satisfied and that he was going to persist in his attempt to force them to do something better. All that I can say is that to my personal knowledge the Minister of Railways has been so much interested in this particular question that some two years ago he called in the president of the Canadian Pacific and the president of the Canadian National and asked them if they could not do something in the way of an agreement between the two lines to give a reduction on feed grain rates to British Columbia. I have on my file a joint letter from these two gentlemen giving their reasons at the time why this could not be done. The minister persisted in the matter, and at the time of the provincial conference, when we found the representatives of the four western provinces could not agree to go ahead with the appeal, he called in the traffic managers of the two railways and they agreed to a reduction in feed grain rates. I would like to have seen this extended to bran, shorts and middlings, but the arrangement was agreeable to and accepted by the representatives of the four western provinces, so that if anything is lacking the blame cannot be laid on the present Minister of Railways. As one deeply interested in securing better rates for the dairymen and poultrymen of British Columbia, I feel that I would not be voting in their interests if I supported this bill.

[Mr. Barber.]

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I know a number of other hon. members wish to speak on this bill and I do not intend to take more than about five minutes merely to put myself on record as opposed to the bill, as it is possible I shall not be able to be in the house next Tuesday should the discussion proceed until nine o'clock, which it may do in view of the fact that a number of members desire to speak.

The bill as drawn by the hon. member is, as has been expressed by the last speaker (Mr. Barber), to my mind an impossible measure. In the first place the clause as he draws it, subsection 2 of section 320, is not clear. I do not know what the clause means and I have read it many times, but even taking the parts that one does understand, one cannot agree with them in view of the known duties of the Board of Railway Commissioners. The hon. gentleman inserts in the clause a provision that the Board of Railway Commissioners——may establish a rate structure in the interests of trade development.

It is not any part of the duty of the railway board, as has already been stated by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), to interfere in the trade development policies of any government. I do not think the late government would have agreed to any such policy any more than would the present government, because the railway board would then be deciding the policy of any government in power at the time. That is not part of the duties of the railway board. I do not think it would be desirable to put into effect any such legislation. The Board of Railway Commissioners might under these circumstances decide on a trade policy which would be contrary to that of the government in power or of the best interests of the people of Canada. That to my mind is not any part of the duties of the board.

The hon. gentleman speaks of putting into effect "experimental rates." That is not part of their duty. Their duty is to make the best rates to which they can agree in a judicial capacity, considering all parties; but I do not think as a general rule, at any rate, it is their duty to put into effect experimental rates. Then he says in the bill:

Though such experimental rates may not at the time or of themselves give reasonable compensation to the railway companies.

As Minister of Railways and knowing perhaps even better, if that is possible, than some other members, the financial difficulties confronting both railway companies at the present time, I do not think it would be any part of the duty of the Board of Railway Commissioners to ignore the financial needs of the railway companies in fixing rates. It seems to me that trade, for example, is a matter for the government and the Department of Trade and Commerce, which is established distinctly for the purpose of fostering trade between Canada and other countries, and between different portions of Canada. The setting of experimental rates, I repeat, is not, generally speaking, a duty of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

The points I have made are sufficient to show my attitude and that of the government in regard to this legislation, which I think is not well thought out. I am not questioning the hon gentleman's right to introduce it, nor am I questioning his sincerity, but I do not think the legislation as introduced would be of any use to the people of western Canada, and it might be of very great harm to this dominion. It might be contrary to the policy of the government then in power, and it would be introducing principles which were not meant to be included in the Railway Act as it applies to the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Finally, as was pointed out a moment ago, there have recently been obtained for the four provinces, certainly for three of them, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, special rates on feed grains, a decrease in rates which was acceptable to the three western provinces most affected, and also to Manitoba, which is not so much affected. It seems to me to be sufficient for this year to have established those rates.

Further, in view of the legislation now before the house to implement the recommendations of the Duff report, I do not think it is wise at this time to introduce other legislation which may be contradictory to or to some extent interfere with the legislation which the government and parliament think it wise to bring in at this time. I merely wish to put myself and the government on record as opposed to the legislation as introduced in the bill sponsored by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): One thing we can compliment the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) upon, and that is his persistence and courage. He has introduced a number of bills with regard to the railway rate structure in this country, but to my mind this is the most remarkable of them all. I do not know why he did not content himself with presenting just one brief paragraph eliminating freight rates altogether because in reality the proposed amendment to section 320 of the Railway Act means that if the Board of Railway Commissioners deem it necessary in the interests of trade they can do just that very thing. May I read subsection 2 of the new clause proposed:

> The board may consider the question of what should be reasonable compensation under the circumstances, and may establish a rate structure in the interests of trade development and public policy, though such experimental rates may not at the time or of themselves give reasonable compensation to the railway companies.

My hon. friend quoted from the report of the Duncan commission, if I understood him correctly, that "it is the duty of the railway commission to fix rates to provide a reasonable return on the capital invested," and he followed that up by saying that it was not possible to fix such rates on the Canadian National Railways or on the Canadian Pacific Railway. My hon. friend quoted further from the report of the Duncan commission, that "it was the duty of the Board of Railway Commissioners to maintain a proper balancing of the rate structure to allow of reasonable compensation." This bill ignores altogether the factor of reasonable compensation; it even goes to the extent of ignoring any compensation whatsoever. The duties of the Board of Railway Commissioners now include a consideration of the rates the railways may levy, and my hon. friend by this bill would have the board fix rates, not from the point of view of whether the railways shall be permitted to operate or not, but in the interests of trade development; and he refers to wheat, fish, poultry, and so forth. He did not refer to lumber. I might tell him where there are many thousands of cars of lumber in British Columbia and in other provinces which, if freight rates were wiped out, could all be exported to Europe and from which a return would be received that would at least compensate for the cost of production, and that is exactly what might be done if the Board of Railway Commissioners were given authority to consider the development of trade rather than a fair and reasonable rate.

The cost of producing an article and delivering it to the point where it is going to be consumed must take into consideration every factor involved in putting the goods on the market, and a part of the production cost of lumber or wheat delivered on the Liverpool market is the cost of transporting it to Liverpool. But my hon. friend ignores that altogether. He says in the first part of the bill, with regard to experimental rates, that they need not be at the time sufficient to provide adequate compensation. But he goes further than that and says that the rates in themselves need not be sufficient. The meaning of that, if I understand it at all, is that the Board of Railway Commissioners may in the first place establish experimental rates, and in the second place maintain them on a basis that will not provide an adequate return for the service that is rendered. Every consideration of what the railway must pay in wages, for the maintenance of lines, for the purchase of coal and other supplies, for rolling stock and all that sort of thing, must be left entirely out of the picture, and the only consideration must be the development of trade and the marketing of goods.

If that is to be the case, I would ask my hon. friend how he expects the railway companies to carry on. Who is going to pay the bill? For a couple of weeks in this house we have been discussing the problem with which this country is faced by reason of the position in which the railways now find themselves. The people of Canada to-day have to provide directly or indirectly, through advances made to the government railways and to the Canadian National Railways a sum of $100,000,000, which must be raised by taxes, because the returns from the earnings of the railways are in themselves entirely inadequate. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the finest transportation system in the world, is carrying its commodities at lower rates than any other transportation system in the world except its competitor the Canadian National Railways. My hon. friend may search the rate structure records the world over and he will not find anywhere commodities carried at a lower rate than they are in the Dominion of Canada. In the country to the south, in Europe, Australia, and any other country where he may go he will find higher commodity rates, higher mileage rates, higher rates in every respect than are granted on the commodities of Canadian farmers, Canadian manufacturers, Canadian lumber producers. Every producer in this country can market his commodities at lower rail costs than a producer of similar products in any other country of the world. Yet my hon. friend suggests that we should put into the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners a power that will make it possible for them in every part of Canada, in relation to every commodity that Canada produces, and in relation to every producer who has goods to transport, to fix a rate which, as the bill itself deliberately states, may not yield a reasonable or adequate compensation. Who, let me ask again, is going to provide the money to carry on the railways?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. NEILL: The increased traffic may provide it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If you eliminate the rates, an increase in the traffic will only increase the burden. You put commodity rates at a level below the cost of carrying them, and the more the railway carries the worse off it is. There are commodity rates of that type in force in Canada to-day. There may possibly be compensating advantages arising out of some special rates; at the moment I shall not argue that point. I have taken the position ever since I have been in this House of Commons that these matters should be discussed before the Board of Railway Commissioners. One of the best pieces of legislation ever placed upon our statute books was that constituting the board of railway commissioners, because it took out of the political arena matters which should not be discussed politically, and made a general law applicable to all parts of the country. It eliminated sectionalism and all other considerations than those related to sound business policy. The formation of the board enabled the railway companies to give to John Smith and to everybody else service on an equal basis and without discrimination.

Under the suggested change I could go to the Board of Railway Commissioners and say: "If you will give me a certain rate I will establish a new industry, and undertake to give you ten, fifteen, thirty or forty cars of goods to carry each month." I do not suggest a rate which will make it possible for them to earn any money,—no; but it will enable me to build up a business. My neighbour may do the same thing. They could give me a rate entirely different from that given to another person at another point in the country who might be carrying on a business similar to that which I propose to create. There is no question whether we are being treated on an equal basis. They give me an entirely new rate, because it is in the interest of what they conceive to be trade development.

I submit the Minister of Railways was quite right when he said that the business of trade development, and the policy the country should follow in building up trade, is not the concern of the Board of Railway Commissioners. It is the duty of that body to act judiciously and to maintain a proper balance between all persons who are trading or developing trade, who are the producers or distributors of products in Canada. This House of Commons should not say to the Board of Railway Commissioners: "It is your duty to ignore every element of sound business policy concerning the products railways are to carry; all you have to do is to consider whether the creation of a rate, whatever it may be, may double trade in one direction or another."

The basis upon which the bill is founded is utterly vicious. It attempts to establish a principle which the parliament of Canada should not countenance. The proposed subsection 2 begins as follows:

> The board may consider the question of what should be reasonable compensation under the circumstances—

That is the first statement in the subsection. The remainder of the subsection is a complete contradiction of the opening sentence. It is as follows:

> . . . and may establish a rate structure in the interests of trade development . . .

On what basis? Whether the experimental rate for the time being, or in itself, gives a reasonable compensation to the railway companies for the services they are to perform. In the face of the difficulties which confront railways, I submit that the house should not accept the bill, and should never give favourable consideration to the principle involved.

The purpose of the Board of Railway Commissioners is to maintain an even balance between the man who has goods to transport and the companies transporting them. This bill does not help to do that. If parliament does anything, it should introduce legislation which would wipe out all the political rates which from time to time have been established, and should say to the Board of Railway Commissioners: "Your job as a judicial body is to establish a rate structure which will give fair treatment to all parts of Canada, to all people in Canada, to the railway companies themselves and the men operating the railways." I have some interest in the men operating the railways. The wages of many of them have been reduced, and others have been put out of the service because the railway companies could not earn enough to pay the wages they had formerly paid, or to maintain their staffs in full force.

The hon. member was right when he said that the provision contained in the bill was permissive, but not mandatory. However, the mere fact that parliament enacts a statute indicates its desire that the railway commission shall accept the statute as an instruction. The mere fact that the provision is permissive and not mandatory does not mean that parliament has not expressed its will. Parliament, if it passes this bill, clearly indicates its desire that the Board of Railway Commissioners shall do certain acts. If not, why would the bill be introduced at all? If not, why would parliament pass it? Why should we consider it if we did not expect the Board of Railway Commissioners to act upon it? The mere fact, therefore, that it is permissive and not mandatory does not for a single moment take away the fact that it is an instruction, and that it is an expression of the will and desire of parliament. I submit that the Canadian people, represented in parliament, do not want this legislation passed. Their railway burden is already all that they can carry. To add this additional burden would simply be saying that parliament wants the railways to struggle along as best they can, to find the means for operating their systems as best they can without any regard for the returns in respect of services they perform. If the hon. member does not desire to withdraw the bill, in the light of what has been stated I submit the house should, in the event of a vote, reject it.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in the debate, but owing to the fact that a year ago I supported a bill concerning domestic freight rates I felt in duty bound at this time to say a few words. In my view we should compliment the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) upon the pressure he brought to bear upon the two railways to get for us the help we have been given. I endorse what the previous speaker has said, namely, that we should consider this matter in the light of the fact that our railroads are running at a loss. As a producer and an exporter I am interested in rate structure. There is no doubt that the help already given will be in the interests of the consumers in British Columbia and the exporters in Saskatchewan. When I am informed that at the interprovincial conference there was an agreement between representatives from Saskatchewan and British Columbia upon a fifty per cent reduction in the domestic rate, I think we have reason to be well pleased.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the debate on the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, since I am allowed only forty minutes in this debate I can deal with the budget only in a very general way. I hope that some of the speakers following me from this corner of the house will deal more definitely with some of its details.

It is clear from the address of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that the government has no definite policy for dealing in a fundamental way with the extraordinary conditions now existing in the country. It seems to be drifting along, waiting for conditions to improve; but that conditions are not improving is evidenced by the fact that the number of unemployed receiving direct relief had increased from 800,000 last fall to 1,357,000 at the present time. The government seems to be living in hope and pinning its faith on the world economic conference which is to be held some time this year. I am afraid that may prove a vain hope. I think there have been more than thirty world conferences since the war, and I think almost each could be classified as a failure. At any rate, the world economic conference cannot deal with Canada's problem. We have a problem of our own, the problem of distributing among our citizens that surplus which we are so well able to produce. The world economic conference cannot deal with that question; it is a matter for Canadians and the Canadian government. I think the policy of drift is indicated in these words spoken by the minister:

> But I do wish to warn against too gloomy an interpretation of current happenings. . . . Events are moving rapidly, driven by the urge of economic necessity.

Where is the government being driven by this urge of economic necessity? That is the tragedy—that the government must be driven by economic necessity. Then the minister said:

> On this fact may rest the basis for a greater degree of optimism than has obtained in many months.

I think it is to be regretted that two years ago the government did not adopt a different policy, instead of drifting along with this policy of deflation. If they had taken a more courageous attitude in regard to the money question and had adopted a distinctly Canadian monetary policy we might be in a very much better position at the present time. It seems fair to say that the inference to be drawn from the minister's statement is that since in effect the United States has been driven off the gold standard we may hope for a rise in commodity price levels. It is common talk on the street that the United States now will embark on a policy of inflation, and that is what we are pinning our hopes on. We have too long followed at the heels of the United States, like a little boy tied to his mother's apron strings or a youngster taken out in the park by his nurse, who ties a string to him so that he will not get away. Too long the government have been turning their eyes to the New York bankers; too long they have held them as their idols. Those idols have proved to have feet of clay. The recent revelations regarding some of those New York supermen have shocked the entire world. On the day of his inauguration President Roosevelt found all the banks of the United States were closed. In his inaugural address he said:

> . . . our distress comes from no failure of substance. We are stricken by no plague of locusts. Compared with the perils which our forefathers conquered, because they believed and were not afraid, we have still much to be thankful for.
> Nature still offers her bounty and human efforts have multiplied it. Plenty is at our doorstep, but a generous use of it languishes in the very sight of the supply.
> Primarily, this is because the rulers of the exchange of mankind's goods have failed through their own stubborness and their own incompetence, have admitted their failure and abdicated. Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.

I regret to say that these are the men whose advice we seem to have been following, or at least whose money policy we have been following, and apparently we will continue that policy as long as it is continued in the United States. It seems our only hope is that the United States may now adopt a more enlightened policy. In the face of all that has happened the minister says that the inevitable result of inflation would be a flight from our dollar, a withdrawal on a large scale of the capital invested by foreigners in this country. I should like to know where the capital would fly. Like old Bill, I would say, "If you know a better 'ole, go to it." Why would capital fly from this country to the United States or any other country in the face of the revelations which have been made recently and the admission of the president of the largest bank in the United States of practices for which I think any man should be put in gaol? This foreign capital invested in Canada has been a curse to us. It has furnished the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) with an excuse for keeping our dollar at such a high level and, as a consequence, our commodities at such a low level. It seems to me that the monetary policies of our government always have been framed with an eye to New York, and the result certainly has been injurious to Canadians generally. That Canadians engaged in industry are still able to carry on under these conditions is a wonderful tribute to their resourcefulness and endurance. Finance, which should be the servant of industry, has become its master, and a pretty hard master at that.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that during the last two years the financial policy of this country has been a burden and a hindrance rather than a help to industry. That there has been a policy of deflation carried on is evidenced by the fact that the total amount of bank loans and currency is $700,000,000 less than it was three years ago. So in spite of the words of the Minister of Finance I say that we must have inflation. I want inflation to replace the $700,000,000, or part of it, by which we have been deflated. We need it; we must have it in order to raise price levels. To make my position clear let me say that I want only controlled inflation, controlled for the express purpose of raising and maintaining price levels at a decent level. Professor Irving Fisher said a short time ago—and I quite agree—that we want neither inflation nor deflation; we should keep the car in the middle of the road. The proper place to drive this car is in the centre of the road, not in the inflation ditch on the right hand side or the deflation ditch on the left hand side. At present he says, the car is in the deflation ditch. It must be steered out of that ditch and back to the middle of the road, but we must be careful that we do not steer it into the inflation ditch. I have been warned lately by one or two of my friends that I should set myself right with the House of Commons with regard to inflation. They say we are liable to get uncontrolled inflation soon if this government remains in office because the policy they are pursuing may result in the necessity for wild inflation. Should that happen I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not now advocating and never have advocated that policy.

Just here I should like to commend the government for their announcement that they intend to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the whole question of our banking and monetary system. It is very important that the government should get the right type of men on this commission, because if we should have a group of orthodox Canadian bankers we might just as well not have the commission and save the money. I would suggest to the government that they secure on this commission men of the type of John Maynard Keynes, Lord Macmillan or Mr. Reginald McKenna, and with these a few Canadians, some of whom could be found capable and unbiased and not in any way connected with our banks. As regards this announcement by the government, although I commend them for it, I must express my regret that they did not see fit to take this action two years ago or even a year ago. For the past two years we had resolutions on the order paper asking for an investigation into this matter. If we had had such an investigation we might now have a central bank in Canada, and if we had a central bank properly operated it would be very useful to us in financing our operations at this time. Perhaps I had better make it clear that in advocating the establishment of a central bank I want a national bank owned one hundred per cent by the state, a bank whose policy should be laid down in black and white in its charter. The principal thing that should be outlined in the policy of such a bank would be that it should maintain stable price levels when they had been raised to a point approximately on the 1926 level. Though I regret, that the government is two years late, still it is better late than never. A good deal has happened in the last two years; some provinces and a good many municipalities are on the verge of bankruptcy and thousands of citizens have also gone into bankruptcy in that time.

I was glad to hear the minister assure us that our banks were sound. Nearly every Canadian believes that the government would not allow one of our banks to fail, and consequently thinks that the banks are sound. Although I am glad to hear that statement from the minister, I must point out to him that it is not the banks that the country lives on; it lives on its industry and production. In reality, the banks are a secondary bit of machinery. They have become, I suppose one might say, almost a necessary part of the system under present conditions, but the fact is that too much thought has been given to the soundness of the banks as compared with the soundness of industry. As a matter of fact, sound industry is more important to us if we have to make the choice. We can maintain a much sounder banking system if we see to it that industry remains in a sound condition, because the main purpose of the banks ought to be—perhaps it is not but it ought to be—to finance industry and to keep it at work.

One of the chief matters for investigation by the royal commission should be this question: How can the Canadian banking system be improved so as to serve the needs of industry? I hope that when this investigation is held and the report is brought down there will be recommended a distinctly Canadian national money policy. Money is distinctly national in character, and one of the chief causes of present world conditions is the attempt to carry on a lot of national economic units with an international currency. The two do not go together. Money, I say, is national and we want a money system suited to our own needs.

I wish to quote two or three sentences from a recent review issued by the Midland Bank of England:

> The brightest hope for revival of prosperity in Great Britain and the world lies in our complete freedom to pursue a monetary policy of our own devising, aimed at the recovery of commodity values to a level at which business in general becomes profitable again.
> It is desirable that the people of this country pay more and more attention to the course of sterling commodity values, and to be undisturbed in the face of exchange movements even when they involve further external depreciation of the pound. The value of the pound in terms of gold is far less important than its value in terms of goods. Happily, mankind is coming to realize, though only slowly, that exchange stability is not enough, but that to subserve economic welfare the currency must divest itself of the extreme variability in commodity value which has proved the source of most of our troubles in the years just passed.

That puts the case very clearly.

One of our great troubles comes from the fact that we have given more consideration to finance than to humanity. After all, the greatest asset of the country is its people. We must take care of our people, and if humanity is to be sacrificed to the banking industry, then the banking industry will not profit in the long run. The fact that we have been more concerned with money than with humanity is the reason for so many people in Canada being unemployed. There is a market in Canada for industry—I regret that we have not very good statistics on this point; they are meagre—there are thousands of people in Canada who need houses; thousands who need furniture; thousands who need furnaces or central heating systems in their houses; thousands of homes without any water system, without refrigerators, pianos or radios; and there are thousands of people in need of food and clothing.

Here are just a few statistics I have been able to obtain to indicate the market available in Canada. I find from a recent bulletin issued by the bureau of statistics that there are in Canada 728,000 farms—I omit the hundreds. Of these, 116,000 have radios. That means that there is a market for 612,000 radio receiving sets. There are 321,000 farms with automobiles and 407,000 without; and 233,000 farms with telephones and 494,000 without. Remember, these are 1931 figures, and in some districts one half the rural telephones have been taken out in the last year. Of all the farms in Canada only 60,000 have running water in the kitchen. There is work for plumbers to install water systems in 668,000 farm homes. The number of farm homes in Canada with running water piped in the bathroom is 36,000, or about five per cent. There is a wonderful market in Canada for all our industries. I am sorry I have not the statistics for the cities, but they are not published by the bureau. If every building in Canada that needs a coat of paint were painted this year it would give employment to 100,000 men making the paint and putting it on the buildings. I am impressed with this fact every time I make the trip from here to Montreal. I am sure there is plenty of employment in Canada for all our people for the next ten years, and in that period we would have a breathing space to make comprehensive plans for giving employment to the people and supplying them with the goods we know we can produce.

Coming to the financial position disclosed in the budget, it is clear to me that the deficit is the result of this government's policy of deflation. Perhaps I am wrong in speaking of the government's policy; perhaps I should say, lack of policy. The decreased revenues are the result of a deflation of money, which causes low commodity price levels with stagnation of trade and unemployment and declining railway traffic. There you have the cause of the budget deficit. Our whole internal economy is upset; our standard of living, our incomes, wages and salaries, and even the chance for employment are all sacrificed to maintain the fetish called sound money—mostly sound and very little money, so far as most people can see. We have been blindly following the moneychangers of New York. Professor Gustav Cassel, one of Europe's greatest economists, and for many years financial adviser to the League of Nations, in a lecture last summer, speaking of the money policy of the United States, described it as a policy of deflation which is grinding to pieces their entire national economy. We are following exactly the same policy and it is grinding to pieces Canada's entire national economy. There is no need for it; it seems to me it is the height of folly. Words fail me when I attempt to state what I think of such a policy. The cost of the deflation to Canada was estimated by the Ottawa Citizen last year at $4,800,000,000. If it were only half that, deflation has cost Canada enough to pay off the entire national debt about which we are so much worried. Why will the budget not balance? Because taxes and interest are paid out of production. Last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) said that interest could only be paid out of production. According to the Canada Year Book the total production of Canada in 1922, was estimated at $4,500,000,000; by 1928, it had grown to $6,342,000,000. If we had had a proper money policy, by 1932, it should have grown to something over $7,000,000,000. I could not get the figures from the bureau for 1932, but I have heard it estimated at $4,000,000,000. If we had produced the same quantity in 1932, as we did in 1928, it would have been valued only at a little over $4,000,000,000. The real value of production should always be the same. Why should the money value of production change? It is due to the fact that our money is a dishonest measure of value. In my opinion it is a rotten measure of value: it is like a concertina, it stretches out our national debt to such an extent that we cannot pay it. The government should take the same percentage of our production each year for purposes of government. This year it is taking about forty per cent more of our production to pay the costs of government, and yet our budget is not balanced. Why? Because our money is an unstable measure of value. There have been some reductions in government expenditures but there has been no relief in debt charges. If I had time, I would show just how unfair that is.

In 1928 the net debt of Canada was $2,296,000,000 and by 1933 it had increased to $2,599,000,000. In 1928 the wholesale price index figure was 96·4 but in 1932 it had fallen to 64. In terms of wholesale commodities, and that is what we have to pay with, the net debt of $2,296,000,000 in 1928 now becomes a debt of $3,061,000,000. The debt of 1933 of $2,599,000,000 now becomes a burden of $3,466,000,000. Taking the gross debt of all public bodies in Canada, that is the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities as $6,539,000,000, this works out upon the basis of the 1928 price levels as $8,718,000. The gross debt of the provinces totalling $1,578,000,000, on the same computation becomes $2,095,000,000. The debt of the western provinces has been doubled because their revenue comes mainly from agriculture, and agricultural commodities have fallen on the average about sixty per cent. I am sorry that I have not the time to pursue this phase of the question a little further.

Speaking of the western provinces brings to mind the proposal of the government to establish an agricultural stabilization fund. As I understand it, this fund will provide for the payment to the exporter of the difference between the exchange value of sterling and a price fixed at $4.60. This proposal is to apply to animals, meats including bacon and hams, poultry, fresh fish, canned fish, tobacco, cheese, milk products, canned fruits, canned vegetables and maple products. In reality this makes the pound sterling legal tender at $4.60 for a selected list of commodities. But why the discrimination; why the selected list? Why does this not apply to apples and to lumber; why should it not apply to the export of this selected list to other countries? We lose just as much through the high value of our dollar when we export to the West Indies or to any other country as we do when we export to Great Britain. This is a belated recognition of the discrimination which the farmers and other exporters have suffered from for the last eighteen months because of the low value of the pound or the high value of our dollar. I think this action justifies the stand which we have taken in this house for the last two years. Two years ago I urged the government to abandon the gold standard in order to raise our price levels and relieve us from this terrible deflation which was carrying commodity price levels lower and lower. On almost every occasion which has offered since that time we have stressed the necessity of raising the value of commodity price levels by monetary action such as the bringing of our currency to a parity with the pound. This proposal of the government is a poor substitute, or it might even be termed a poor excuse. I think it should apply to every exporter whether he is engaged in the exporting of forest, mine, fish or agricultural products. If we were to bring the value of our currency more in line with the currencies of other countries it would not cost the treasury anything and it would raise prices in Canada to a point where the Minister of Finance would find that he could balance his budget without raising the rate of taxation.

Our exporters have to compete with all the world. We compete with Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, Denmark, Sweden and Norway. In Australia and New Zealand the British pound is at a premium of twenty-five per cent and although I have not the latest figures in connection with the Argentine, I do not think it is far from twenty-five per cent. Action has been taken recently by the Danish government to bring their exchange to practically the same level as that prevailing in New Zealand. I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the London Times of February 1, headed Danish Labour Troubles and Inflation of Currency. It reads in part as follows:

—the government has agreed to allow the krone to fall to 22.50 to the pound.

It gives a statement by the Prime Minister of Denmark as follows:

The decline in the krone rate which has taken place in a few days proves that it has not been possible to maintain that relation between Danish and British currency which has been aimed at. In sympathy with the legislative assembly, and with the support of the National bank, the government announces that the rate of exchange fixed to-day—that is, 22.50 kroner to the pound—will be maintained.

That works out at very nearly the value of the New Zealand currency. When we export wheat we compete with Australia and the Argentine, but how can we compete when the pound brings us only $4.10 while it brings $6.10 in Australia? How can we compete with New Zealand in butter and cheese and with Denmark in bacon? How can our lumbermen compete with Sweden and Norway where the pound is at the old parity? This stabilization proposal will not give us anything like an equal chance to compete.

About a week or two ago, when the Prime Minister was speaking upon the Unemployment Relief Bill, he stated that in the opinion of many observers outside Canada, conditions in this country were better than in any other in the world. He surely, when he made that statement, had not got in touch with the right people. I want to say that conditions in Canada are not as good as they are in many other countries. Conditions are better in Australia, Sweden and Denmark than they are in Canada. I have under my hand a few clippings taken from the Melbourne, Australia, Herald of January 17 of this year. In that paper they point out that Australia's exports have largely increased during the past two years. May I read just a few sentences from this clipping. It states:

World prices for Australia's exports fell to low levels. This left a big gap between costs and prices. The gap was lessened by a reduction in interest charges. The most important adjustment which helped was an increase in the exchange rate.

In January, 1931, the rate was raised to (Australia) £130—(sterling) £100.

The redistribution of income which resulted from this movement was further strengthened by the suspension of the gold standard by Britain and the depreciation of sterling in terms of gold.

In December, 1931, the Australian rate was reduced to (Australia) £125—(sterling) £100 and has been held at that point since. The effect of these exchange movements has been to keep Australian export prices fairly steady over the year, while gold prices have continued to fall.

An accompanying chart in the paper shows the export price index figure as being Australia, 54; sterling, that is Britain, 44 and gold, 30. Australian exporters were getting a much better price than their competitors in gold standard countries. This has been the greatest factor in increasing Australia's exports, securing the solvency of her producers, raising commodity price levels and enabling the government to balance the budget. That is the one sentence I want to repeat for the benefit of the Minister of Finance. It has enabled the Australian government to balance the budget. Why all this effort in Canada to balance the budget by drastic economies and drastic increases in taxation, and in the end being $100,000,000 away from a balance? Australia has shown us the way if we are not too blind to see it.

I shall have to hurry over the other points, but may I state that Australian four per cent bonds are selling in that country at a premium; that a £100 bond is worth £101 16s 3d on the market. This table also shows that their exports have very largely increased. Their exports of flour for the year 1931-32, as compared with the average of 1926-29, show an increase of practically 22 per cent, while comparative figures for Canada show a decrease of 47 per cent. Their exports of wheat increased 82 per cent while ours decreased 32 per cent. Their exports of butter increased 116 per cent while ours increased 12 per cent. This paper says that there is an improvement in retail trading; turnover is increasing; costs are down and many retail stores show improved profits.

I should like to point out that the wholesale price chart shows that the price level in Australia during 1931 and 1932 has not fluctuated more than three points, being at about eighty-one in January, 1931, and standing at eighty in the fall of 1932. In Canada the index figure fell from seventy-six in January, 1931, to sixty-four in December, 1932. Australia has escaped a lot of the tragedies of deflation from which the United States and Canada have suffered. May I again remind the Minister of Finance and the house that Australia has balanced her budget and last fall I read in the press that Argentina had also balanced her budget.

I regret to see that my time has almost expired, because there are in the budget a lot of items to which I should like to have referred, for example, the income tax, the tax on sugar, and the proposal to take pensions away from members of the civil service who are in receipt of them. I have not time to deal with those except to say that I trust the minister will give the most sympathetic consideration to the representations that are being made to him by the representatives of the returned men. In most cases it would be very unjust to take away from a civil servant the pension which he is receiving. There may be some cases where this is justified, but I am not at the moment prepared to say definitely.

In the few minutes left to me I want to suggest to the minister that he is really not very wise in attempting to balance the budget at this time. This will need too drastic increases in taxation, and taxation has already been carried to the point where it is hampering if not destroying business. Our first task should be to raise price levels. May I point out to the minister that this year our ordinary expenditure is about $364,000,000; unemployment and special expenses, $49,000,000; Canadian National Railways deficit, $53,000,000, or a total of $446,000,000. In 1928 the revenue collected was practically $460,000,000, or more than equal to the amount the minister needs this year. If he will take the necessary action to raise the price levels within a reasonable distance of the 1928 point, we can increase the revenue, reduce the unemployment relief payments, reduce the Canadian National Railways deficits, and in that way we shall have a balanced budget. It will take only a couple of years to do that; and I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he drop some of these nuisance and burdensome taxes, for instance the tax on sugar, and direct his taxation system in a way that it will not dry up the buying power of the people, because after all business depends upon that buying power. The amount of trade and commerce carried on in Canada will determine the revenues of the government. We are making taxation much too heavy and the minister would be well advised to allow the deficits to stand for a year or two. When we get back even to the 1926 or 1928 price level, the government can create surpluses to cover these deficits which are now accumulating. To do this will necessitate the establishment in Canada of a national money policy. I know some people say that we dare not do this. I ask: Dare we not do it? Can we wait any longer? If Christopher Columbus had been as timid as are some of our Canadian bankers and public men, America would still be in the hands of the Indians. Let us be courageous enough to initiate a national money policy for Canada, one which will enable us to restore price levels and give our people a chance of employment and to earn their own living, thus enabling us really to raise the standard of living in Canada higher than it has ever been before. This is possible if we are determined to get it.

On motion of Mr. Stevens the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house in committe of supply, Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur-Thunder Bay) in the chair.

Royal Canadian Air Force—all expenses in connection with the general maintenance of the air force, including training personnel for civil aviation, and provision of the necessary facilities therefor; also Civil Aviation—all expenses in connection with civil aviation, including the control of commercial and private flying, construction and maintenance of airways and aids to air navigation, airship bases and flying clubs, etc., $1,600,000.

Mr. ROSS: When this item was previously under consideration I had a few remarks to make on this subject in general. I think we are agreed that a certain amount of money must be spent on defence, and if that money is to be spent I think the house will spare a few minutes to consider what is the greatest necessity in the way of defence.

I am not putting myself up as an expert, but I think we should consider what progress has been made in aviation, and how it is likely to affect us. The old conditions which existed at the time of the last war will never recur. Men are not going to be placed in great masses and be stalemated without any result. I should like to bring to the attention of the committee a few of the important changes that have taken place.

During the great war Germany had at most thirty-eight aeroplanes with which to make a raid on London; to-day she can mobilize one thousand aeroplanes. Moreover, these aeroplanes can now fly a distance of from one to two thousand kilometres, carrying a load of bombs weighing up to three or four thousand kilograms.

The committee may also be interested in the number of aeroplanes available in the different countries. It is said that France has some 2,500 aeroplanes; England, 1,550; Italy some 1,100, the United States 1,947, and Canada very few.

I should like to point out what my object is in giving these figures. To-day the only useful expenditure for the defence of a country is upon the air force. The bombs which we used in the war would weigh from twenty to fifty pounds. To-day the French Goliath aeroplanes carry bombs weighing 500 kilograms, and they have super-bombs weighing from 1,000 to 1,800 kilograms. In addition there is the small incendiary bomb weighing about one kilogram. During the war it is estimated that the enemy poured upon London about three hundred tons of bombs. To-day they could pour that amount on the city in one day.

Having dealt briefly with the great increase in the development of aeroplanes and bombs, I shall speak very briefly on the development of gas. The first gas used in the war was chlorine, which caused some six thousand deaths on its first use. This gas is produced in a cloud which could easily be detected, and in such a way that we could defend ourselves against it. But the next development was a gas that could not be detected. It was a derivative of chlorine, carbon oxychloride, fifteen times stronger than chlorine, which was known to us as phosgene, and against which we developed gas masks as a protection. In addition there was the development of "mustard gas." In addition to those two gases there had been produced for use in war, chloropicrin. It is now ready for use, and if I could do only one thing, make people shudder at the horrors of the next war so that they will do all they can to help prevent future wars it will be time well spent. Another gas, diphenylchlorarsine—three drops will kill—causes oedema of the lungs, dropsy of the lungs, oedema of the spleen, necrotic changes in the vascular walls, particularly in the aorta. It also produces changes in the blood and the hoemoglobin becomes methaemoglobin. It is a gas against which our masks would be no protection whatever. The gas will penetrate the mask and cause its removal, making available the use of a more deadly gas with which it may be mixed. One part of this gas combined with ten million parts of air will put a man out of action in one minute. In 1918 this gas was used on a herd of goats and it killed all but four, which were in such agony that they smashed their skulls against a fence. This gas can be used in five-pound generators, six hundred forming a load for a commercial aeroplane. One thousand of these generators can gas an area of sixty kilometres. Two planes could carry forty tons, sufficient to destroy the population of London.

[Mr. Ross.]

The next is cacodyl isocyanide. One breath of this gas is absolutely fatal to human beings.

The next is lead tetraethyl. It is a bromine. It cost the lives of thirty-eight workmen at the time it was being manufactured in the factory in New Jersey.

There is another gas called diethyl telluride which will penetrate the skin without injuring it. This gas is one hundred times greater in its effects than strychnine.

Then there is a bomb, the electric incendiary bomb, which dropped from an aeroplane will set free a substance known as thermite. It develops a heat up to three thousand degrees, which will pierce through iron, steel and earth to gas mains, which would be set on fire, adding to destruction. Two pounds of this gas in bombs would be sufficient to destroy the whole city of Ottawa. Water has no effect on this substance except to intensify its action.

I think these facts will be interesting to the house and the country. They show the great development that has taken place since the war of 1914-1918. They help to show the great dangers there will be in the next war. The attack will come from the air with bombs carrying these fatal substances I have mentioned, against which we have absolutely no protection. The only defence we have is in our air force. A bombing aeroplane could put a whole nation out if it wanted to, and the only defence in war at the present time is fighting aeroplanes which we are not producing. These aeroplanes will not guarantee to us perfect protection, but they drive the bombing planes to such a height that the certainty of the direction of the bomb is not assured. Further, the bombing plane may be driven away from its objective. In any future war the attack will not be against the men at the front, but upon the industrial areas, the defenceless men, women and children in the areas back of the lines. Aggression will be so speedily carried out that unless protection is afforded, the people will have no way of shielding themselves against invasion. Therefore I believe the house might well agree that the air service represents the most important part of the estimates for the Department of National Defence. I am not asking for an increased expenditure upon air protection, but I do not believe the air defence should be crippled, and when we do vote moneys for defence the country and parliament should know wherein our true defence lies.

Mr. BRADETTE: Last fall when the statement was made in this house that the government contemplated building the trans-Canada airways, and landing fields in connection therewith in the different sections of the country, involving the employment of many single men in several parts of Canada, the news was well received in my section of the country. I was pleased to learn from the minister only a few weeks ago that a considerable amount of work had been done in northern Ontario We knew that it would be necessary from a geographical standpoint to establish landing fields in the northern section of northern Ontario, for reasons which I shall not now enumerate. To some extent, however, we are disappointed that in the districts of Cochrane and Hearst, at which points I believe the government had planned to establish landing fields, no work has been started. In fairness to the minister may I say I realize that the task of expropriating or buying the land and attending to all matters concerning the landing fields entails a good deal of work. I urge upon him, however, that at this time of the year and later in the spring many of our rural single population are out of employment until the ground is uncovered, and if it were possible for his department to begin work in our section of the country conditions would be relieved. This may appear to be a purely local matter, but when we consider that in nearly every section of Canada people are working on these airways, the committee must realize that my request is practical and logical. I know the minister well enough to realize that he will give fair consideration to my suggestion.

Mr. SPENCER: Could the minister give some reason for this decrease?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The decrease of $150,000 is distributed throughout the vote. The chief items are, first, that we are making no provision for new aircraft; second, there will be a lesser amount of flying, thereby necessitating fewer major overhauls; and third, there will be very little new work done at the Trenton aerodrome.

Mr. BRADETTE: Would the minister kindly answer my question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes. As the hon. member has said, the scheme of opening up landing fields to complete the Trans-Canada Airway was recently embarked upon. One very important link in that airway runs through northern Ontario where difficulties have been experienced in landing the machines flying from eastern to western Canada. During the summer months, on account of the many lakes in northern Ontario, landing is not difficult, and in the summer season flying boats are used. To obviate the difficulty of landing in all seasons, for several years the department have had plans in preparation for the establishment of intermediate landing fields in that part of the country. Under this scheme when we had the opportunity of doing some work we decided to establish the intermediate aerodromes at Diver, Gillies, Nagogami, Pagwa, Nakina, Camp Creek, Armstrong, Sioux Lookout, and Amesdale in that section. At present we have work going on at Amesdale, Armstrong, Nakina and Gillies. Nagogami and Pagwa are apparently close to Cochrane, and work will be started at those points. As the hon. member has said, it is impossible to get the whole scheme in operation at once. However the preparatory work is being done, and before long we hope to get the work under way in the intermediate fields nearer to Cochrane. In that event doubtless the single, homeless, unemployed men from Cochrane will be employed.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister will be courteous enough to answer a question concerning a matter which does not refer strictly to this item. I notice we have gone into estimates to-night, in defiance of the usual custom of announcing the night before what will be considered on the following day. Last night we were told we would go on with the debate; estimates were not mentioned.

The matter I have in mind was taken up with the minister by letter a few days ago, and the substance of it is this: I am told that an official ruling has been given by the Department of Justice that where a soldier dies having due to him military pay for services while overseas or pay and allowance while sick in hospital, such moneys are not recoverable from the government. The language used is, "such pay being nothing capable of being regarded or secured as an asset of the estate." If this is correct—it seems almost silly to suggest that it is correct, but there is every reason to believe that it is—it is so patently unjust that it certainly ought to be a subject of legislation. I am told the theory is that there is no contractual obligation, and that payment to a soldier is entirely a matter of grace by the government. I think such a theory has only to be stated to show its absurdity, and, if a fact under the law, indicates the necessity of a change in the law. I should like to ask the minister—he has had notice of the question before—if he has looked into the subject, and if he could give me any information in the matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have looked into the matter, and my information is that there must be a difference in the pension law with regard to soldiers. With regard to our permanent force, that is not the case. If a member of the permanent force dies, any pay which may have been coming to him forms part of the estate. With regard to the case of which we are both aware, I am informed it was not a question of his pay not forming part of the estate, but one of legitimacy. The other parts, with the exception of pay and allowances which were coming to him, have been paid to the province from which he came. I am informed that it was only because of the question of legitimacy that the other money was not paid, and had it not been for that matter it would have gone to his legal heirs.

Mr. NEILL: Of course I was not discussing the question of the pay of the permanent force. If the minister says this is the decision of the department, that it only applies to the specific case about which I wrote, in which the question of the man's legitimacy did arise, I suppose I must accept that, but if that is so his department has an unfortunate way of stating a case. The letter contains this statement:

> The unpaid balance of pay and allowances credited to the account of the deceased, which amounts to $62, represents moneys not properly comprised in the estate.

Then I took up the question with the Department of Justice, and I have read the answer I received, that this was regarded as military pay and was not capable of being secured as an asset of the estate. In conversation with the official I interviewed in the Department of Justice I was told that the decision was based on broad general lines and that it applied to all soldiers. If the minister now says he has been advised by the Department of Justice that it applies only to a specific case where the legitimacy of the man is in question, of course that sheds quite a different light on the matter. Might I ask if the minister obtained his information from the Department of Justice, or whether he obtained it from his own officials?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I obtained it from my own officials. There has been a good deal of correspondence and after my discussion with the hon gentleman the other day I went over the file very carefully and obtained all the advice I could get. I was assured that this was the reason, and that when the Department of Justice gave that decision they referred to this particular case. I am told, however, that in all the cases with which we have to deal such pay and allowances do form part of the estate.

Mr. NEILL: The ruling of the Justice department was given years before this case came up, and could hardly refer only to this specific case. Letting that go for the moment, however, I would suggest that this man's estate should receive this sum. As the minister has been advised, the estate consisted of three amounts. There was $200 left in a savings bank account in Winnipeg, of which the department here very improperly took possession. They held that amount for thirteen years; they paid no interest and are not going to pay any interest, though they had no more right to the money than I have. That amount has been wrested from them and returned to the province; in due course it will find its way to their heirs. Then there were two cheques, each for $70, found in his possession after he died. I suppose they were cheques for pay and allowances, but that sum also was kept for over thirteen years. Finally that has been handed over to the province, and in time that amount will find its proper destination. The other sum of $62, however, for accrued pay, was money due the man, and no matter whether or not he was illegitimate he left a destitute mother and sister, and some of his heirs are on relief now. He earned this $62, and outside the question of legal interpretation, on general principles of equity does Canada want it to be said that we did a dead man's relatives out of a few dollars because of some fine spun theory that we did not have a contractual obligation to pay? He went to the war and we undertook to pay him $1.10 a day, but apparently we are trying now to renege on the bargain on the excuse that the man was illegitimate. That seems to me absolutely foreign to all sense of fairness. I do urge that instructions be given to pay this money as a matter of compassion, if you wish to call it that, though I would call it very bare equity.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to amend the Indian Act—Mr. Murphy—Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur) in the chair.

On section 7—Enquiry as to fitness for enfranchisement.

Mr. MURPHY: I have a further amendment to this bill, Mr. Chairman, and I would ask for leave to withdraw the present amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): Is it the pleasure of the committee that the amendment be withdrawn?

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Then I beg to move that section 7 be amended to read as follows:

Section 110 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(14) In respect of an Indian or Indians of any band who has not or who have not made application for enfranchisement under this section or under section 114 of this act, the Superintendent General may appoint a board to consist of any judge of any superior court or any judge of any circuit, district or county court, an officer of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation belongs or belong, to make inquiry and report as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised, and such report shall have the same force and effect and shall be dealt with in the same manner as if the same had been made upon the application of an Indian or Indians under this section; provided, that no enfranchisement of any Indian or Indians shall be made under this subsection in violation of the terms of any treaty that may have been entered into between the crown and the Indians of the band in question.

Mr. POWER: May I ask if this implies that an Indian may be enfranchised without his consent?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Then I am "agin" it.

Mr. GRAY: So am I. May I ask if the minister received a protest from the Indian band on Walpole island, in the constituency of West Lambton, urging that this legislation be not proceeded with and, if so, what action the minister took?

Mr. MURPHY: No, I received no communication from the Indians on Walpole island.

Mr. McINTOSH: How can an Indian be enfranchised without his consent if there is a member of the band sitting on this board and that member is representative of the band? It must be a peculiar type of Indian government without much responsibility to it, I would imagine.

Mr. MURPHY: The board is to consist of three members, a judge of any superior court or any circuit, district or county court, an officer of the department and a member of the band to which the Indian or Indians under investigation may belong, and the board makes inquiry as to the fitness of any Indian or Indians to be enfranchised. The Superintendent General may appoint a board to make the investigation.

Mr. McINTOSH: I should imagine, from what the minister has said, that the representative of the department and the judge in question possess the superior weight in the court and overrule the representative of the band, so that an Indian who does not want to be enfranchised will be. That does not look good to me. The board is more representative than ever, and in that respect I endorse the idea; but I do not think we are getting over the difficulty if we enfranchise an Indian who does not want to be enfranchised.

Mr. MURPHY: It does not necessarily follow that the Indian does not want to be enfranchised.

Mr. McINTOSH: That question was asked by the hon. member for Quebec South.

Mr. MURPHY: No. The question asked by the hon. member for Quebec South was whether an Indian could be enfranchised against his will. The Indian under investigation might be quite willing to be enfranchised.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Can the minister tell us what the effect is of the various treaties entered into with the Indians—the treaties referred to in this amendment?

Mr. MURPHY: There are various treaties entered into between the Dominion government and the different bands of Indians throughout Canada, eleven in number.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What are the dates?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know that I can give them all. I have these dates: August 3, 1871; August 23, 1875; August 23-28, 1875; September 8, 1875.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is that the list of treaties providing for surrender of land to the crown by the Indians?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes; under these treaties areas were surrendered to the crown.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Those are not the treaties that have any bearing whatever upon the amendment that is now before the house. There are a great many treaties that have been entered into from time to time by these various Indians, sometimes individuals, and always assented to by the band, providing for surrender to the crown of certain areas, sometimes one hundred acres, sometimes enough for a right of way, and sometimes the whole reserve. With the assent of the Indians provision is made for handing over these lands, but the Indians that are vitally affected by this legislation are those whose lands have not been handed over, who still have them, and who are known as treaty Indians. The minister is no doubt familiar with these treaties. Can he tell us what they are?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know of the existence of any such treaties as my hon. friend refers to. I thought at the beginning of his remarks, when he spoke of surrenders, that he referred to certain surrenders that are made now and that have been made during the past number of years from time to time of certain lands for sale or lease. Apparently however he has in mind some treaties of which he has knowledge under which the Indians possibly claim that they hold their lands, and that their rights are violated by this amendment. I know of no such treaties myself, unless the hon. member can give me some further light on the subject in regard to which he wishes to have information.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I point out to my hon. friend that the proviso here means nothing if there are no such treaties:

> Provided, that no enfranchisement of any Indian or Indians shall be made under this subsection in violation of the terms of any treaty that may have been entered into between the crown and the Indians of the band in question.

If my hon. friend will direct his attention to this proviso he will very readily see that it means nothing unless there is in existence some treaty to which it may apply. The treaties to which I refer are treaties referred to by the minister. They are certain treaties providing for surrender of certain lands, and there are a couple of volumes of them; and every band has from time to time surrendered certain lands. As I said before, some bands have surrendered all that they had and taken money, annuities in some cases and in other instances a lump sum. I assume that when the department draws up an amendment of this kind containing the proviso I have quoted it must refer to some treaty or treaties. If there is no such treaty then this proviso means nothing. Can the minister tell me whether there is such a treaty?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The last time the bill was under discussion it was stated by a good many hon. members that there were certain treaty rights and that they should be sacredly protected, and the clause has been drawn with the idea of protecting any rights which the Indians may have under any treaties. Hon. members opposite spoke of this and referred to treaty rights. No one wishes to violate any rights and if there be such rights they are protected by this clause. It was to meet the objection advanced in this respect that the clause was drawn.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does the Minister of Justice mean to suggest that neither the Department of Justice nor the Department of Indian Affairs is able to tell us what treaties exist between the Indians and the government to which this amendment, so carefully drafted, may refer?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If there are any treaties the rights thereunder are all protected; the provision has been made broad enough to protect every right that arises under any treaty.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do I take it that the minister knows of no such treaties?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know of none, apart from those mentioned to-night.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend know of none?

Mr. MURPHY: When the bill was last before the house my hon. friend claimed, if I am not in error, that the previous amendment did violate certain treaty rights and I asked him to name the treaties and give particulars as to what rights were being violated. That question was not answered.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When did the hon. gentleman do that?

Mr. MURPHY: The last time the bill was before the house. As I said a few moments ago, there are certain treaties entered into between the Dominion government and the Indians of Canada, and there are certain other treaties in which the Indians are mentioned. In my reading I have been unable to find any place where this enfranchisement clause conflicts with or violates any of the rights of the Indian under their treaties. Hon. members opposite claimed that certain rights were violated and this amendment has been drafted to meet that contention. My personal opinion is that no treaty rights are being violated, but that question can be decided by the law officers of the crown. If the hon. member so desires, I can read one of the treaties entered into with the Indians. Treaty No. 1 entered into by the Dominion government with the Chippewa and Swampy Cree tribes of Indians, reads as follows:

> The Chippewa and Swampy Cree tribes of Indians, and all other the Indians inhabiting the district hereinafter described and defined, do hereby cede, release, surrender, and yield up to Her Majesty the Queen, and her successors forever, all the lands included within the following limits.

Then follows a description which I do not need to give:

To have and to hold the same to Her said Majesty the Queen, and Her successors forever.

Her Majesty the Queen, hereby agrees and undertakes:—

1. To lay aside and reserve for the sole and exclusive use of the Indians, the following tracts of land for the various bands—

Then comes the description of the lands.

—160 acres for each family of five or in that proportion for larger or smaller families;

2. Makes the Indians a present of $3 for each individual belonging to the bands here represented;

3. Agrees to maintain a school on each reserve hereby made, whenever the Indians of the reserve should desire it;

4. Prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors on reserves;

5. To take a census of the Indians and annually hereafter pay to each Indian family of five persons the sum of $15 Canadian currency or in like proportion for larger or smaller family, such payment to be made in such articles as the Indians so require of blankets, clothing, prints, twine or traps or currency if Her Majesty shall deem it advisable.

That is a sample of the treaties entered into with the Indians. I am unable to find within the four corners of that treaty anything which would prevent the enfranchisement of an Indian as provided for by this amendment. Certain references were made during the last debate to the violation of treaty rights, but so far no hon. member has stated in what way those rights would be violated. This amendment provides that if any treaty right is violated, the provisions of this bill shall not apply.

Mr. POWER: The stand I took was not based upon any particular treaty or upon any particular treaty rights; it was based upon the higher ground that as we had taken property from the Indians we had to treat them as wards of the government and we had no right to force them into a position which they did not wish to occupy. I have not before me the Treaty of Paris of 1763, but I have an idea that either in the treaty itself or in the resolutions, the Indians allied to the French—I use the word "allied" advisedly because they were not French subjects—were given certain rights. The Huron Indians now upon the reservation at Lorette were in alliance with the French settlers. They had waged war upon the Iroquois but had been defeated and decimated. The King of France decided that they should settle at Lorette near Quebec. The French government granted them certain rights and I believe those rights still exist. They are not Canadian citizens in the full sense of the word and I do not know that the Dominion government has ever made a treaty with them. They have always held that traditional position of having been allies of the original French settlers and of the French crown. They did not become British subjects but rather inhabitants of Canada who had entered into, if not a peace treaty at least an agreement not to wage war upon the British government. Their rights go much further back than any document or any arrangement which might have been entered into between the Dominion of Canada and the band to which they belong. In my view they are inhabitants of this country who have certain rights which have been sanctified by custom and we are not entitled to take those rights away. As I say, I have not the documents in connection with the treaty before me but I expect to have them before the debate is over. I protest that this parliament should not take away rights which they have held since the beginning of the British possession of this country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am taking exception to the clause from another angle altogether. I do not know of any law that compels a white man to take out naturalization papers and I cannot understand why the department should be anxious to enfranchise Indians by compulsion; whether under the auspices of a judge or under the provisions of section 110, it is the same thing. The government is saying in effect that if an Indian is fit to be enfranchised, he shall be enfranchised. I submit that that is taking very drastic steps in dealing with the Indians. Heretofore the Indian has been enfranchised upon his own application and by his own free will.

Mr. MURPHY: A similar amendment to this was upon the statute book for two years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I know, but we had to take it off for the very good reason that it would have caused a lot of trouble. If this bill goes through and my hon. friend attempts to carry out its provisions, I am afraid he will have very serious trouble in certain cases. If an Indian is a non-treaty Indian living outside the reserve and does not desire enfranchisement, I do not think the state should force it upon him. That is the privilege the Indian has always enjoyed and I do not know of any good reason why it should be taken away. It may be said that Indians are taking advantage of the fact that they are not enfranchised, pay no taxes and have no responsibility, but for the life of me I can see nothing but trouble in connection with the enforcement of this particular clause. I do not think the department will find more than twenty-five or thirty Indians that they feel should be enfranchised. I never heard of any serious difficulty in this connection. A white man who migrates to Canada must be here five years before he can become a citizen of this country. By becoming a citizen, he becomes enfranchised. But if he does not do that, nobody is going to compel him to do it, nor does the law compel him to do it, so that it is certainly not handing out preferred treatment to the Indian wards.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do I take it that the minister states that there are in the department no treaties that protect the franchise, of which this legislation is a breach? Is he in a position to say that there is no such treaty in existence?

Mr. MURPHY: I make no such statement, but this amendment amply covers that point in case there is any such treaty. I am not giving my judgment upon treaties which may have been in existence for one hundred or two hundred years or a longer period of time. I do not feel that I am competent to pass upon this point, but I do not think that enfranchisement will be found mentioned in any treaty.

Mr. POWER: I never said so.

Mr. MURPHY: I am answering the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. This amendment certainly covers the point and the department will be governed in such cases by the opinion of the law officers of the crown. I do not feel myself competent to pass upon the question the hon. member has just asked as to whether these treaties will be violated by the provisions of this section. That is a question to be decided by the Department of Justice.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister is drafting an amendment to provide that there will be no violation of any treaty that may have been entered into, and he is doing this without looking up the treaties and knowing whether there is any such treaty that comes within that category, and, if so, what the terms of that treaty are. I would suggest that if we are going to discuss this amendment intelligently, the minister ought to do the committee the courtesy, if I may respectfully so suggest, of ascertaining what the terms of those treaties are. I have received from various Indians, Indians of different reserves, representation as to the terms of treaties. They think they have treaties; as a matter of fact they are firmly of opinion they have. The minister, however, is the man above all members of the house who is in a position to ascertain what treaties there are. There is no question that there are treaties between the Indians and the crown.

Mr. MURPHY: I have so stated.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Before we proceed with this legislation we had better ascertain the terms of those treaties instead of simply inserting a clause of this kind.

Mr. MURPHY: I have read one of the sample treaties to the committee.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That does not bear on the matter at all.

Mr. MURPHY: There are many other treaties in existence. I have read some of them; I have not read them all. As I have stated, I shall be governed by the opinion of the law officers of the crown.

The hon. member for Quebec South has made the remark that the Indians are not in his opinion British subjects and that under the terms of some of these old treaties they possess certain inalienable rights that should not be taken away from them. I have a judgment which was given by Mr. Justice Riddell in March, 1921, on a question of fishing rights or the violation of fishing regulations in Ontario. The Six Nation Indians of Brantford and of Tyendinaga take the same position as that taken by the hon. member for Quebec South and I think it would be very pertinent if I read the judgment to the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which court was that?

Mr. MURPHY: The Court of Appeal of Ontario. I will not read all the judgment, but I will read the part that I think is pertinent to the subject under discussion, as follows:

It is well known that claims have been made from the time of Joseph Brant that the Indians were not in reality subjects of the king but an independent people—allies of His Majesty—and in a measure at least exempt from the civil laws governing the true subject. Treaties have been made wherein they are called "faithful allies" and the like and there is extant an (unofficial) opinion of Mr. (afterwards Chief) Justice Powell that the Indians so long as they are within their villages are not subject to the ordinary laws of the province.

As to the so-called treaties, John Beverley Robinson, Attorney General of Upper Canada (afterwards Sir John Beverley Robinson C. J.) in an unofficial letter to Robert Wilmot Horton, Under Secreatry of State for War and Colonies, March 14, 1824, said:

"To talk of treaties with the Mohawk Indians residing in the heart of one of the most populous districts of Upper Canada upon lands purchased for them and given to them by the British government is much the same in my humble opinion as to talk of making a treaty of alliance with the Jews in Duke street or with the French emigrants who have settled in England." Canadian Archives, Q. 337, pt. II, pp. 367, 368.

I cannot express my own opinion more clearly or convincingly. The unofficial view expressed by Mr. Justice Powell at one time, he did not continue to hold.

The question of the liability of Indians to the general law of the land came up in 1822. Shawanakiskie of the Ottawa tribe was convicted at Sandwich of the murder of an Indian woman on the streets of Amherstburgh and sentenced to death. Mr. Justice Campbell respited the sentence as it was contended that Indians in matters between themselves were not subject to white man's law but were by treaty entitled to be governed by their own customs—Canadian Archives ,Sundries, U.C., September, 1822. It was said that Chief Justice Powell had in the previous year charged the grand jury at Sandwich that the Indians amongst themselves were governed wholly by their own customs: Powell, when apllied to by the lieutenant governor, denied this and sent a copy of his charge which was quite contrary—do, do., October, 1822, and all the Judges Powell, C.J., Campbell and Boulton, JJ. disclaimed knowledge of any such treaty, and concurred in the opinion that an Indian was subject to the general law of the province. The Indian was, however, respited that the matter might be referred to England, do. do. October, 1822. It was referred to the law officers of the crown who reported in favour of the validity of the conviction: the Lieutenant Governor, Sir Peregrine Maitland, was instructed that there was no basis for the Indian's claim to be treated according to his customary law, that the offence was very heinous, the prisoner bore the reputation of great ferocity and there appeared to be no ground for clemency—but as Maitland might be in possession of further facts, he was given discretionary power to mitigate the punishment—the warrant sent distinctly recognized the legality of the conviction and authorized the execution of the sentence, but left the discretion with the lieutenant governor. Canadian Archives, Q. 342, pp. 40, 41, 1826.

The law since 1826 has never been doubtful. I may say that I have myself presided over the trial of an Indian of the Grand River when he was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced. I can find no justification for the supposition that any Indians in the province are exempt from the general law—or ever were.

And this is the point which is, I think, most pertinent to the subject under discussion:

But whatever may have been the status of the original Indian population the law as laid down by Blackstone in his Commentaries Bk. 1, p. 66, has never been doubted: "Natural-born subjects (as distinguished from aliens) are such as are born within the dominions of the crown of England..and aliens, such as are born out of it." He adds (p. 369): "Natural allegiance is therefore a debt of gratitude, which cannot be forfeited, cancelled, or altered by any change of time, place, or circumstances, nor by anything but the united concurrence of the legislature": Eyre V. Countess of Shaftsbury (1722) 2 P.W. Ms. 102, at page 124. Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 1, pp. 302, 303, says: "Persons born within the allegiance of the crown include everyone who is born within the dominions of the crown whatever may be the nationality of either or both of his parents," with certain well defined exceptions not of importance here. See the Imperial Acts (1914) 4 and 5 Geo. V. c. 17: (1918) 8 and 9 Geo. V. c. 38; and our Dominion Act (1919) 9 and 10 Geo. V. c. 38, c. 1 (Dom.).

I think, Mr. Chairman, that that very effectively answers the observations made by the hon. member for Quebec South, that the Indians are the subjects of the dominion and liable to our laws and to any legislation we may pass.

Mr. POWER: I thought I would have to take issue with the minister. The case he refers to was that of a Mohawk Indian, but if he will recall his history he will remember that the Mohawks, on account of their service to the British at the time of the rebellion in 1775, because of the outrages they committed on the American colonies at that time, were rewarded by the granting of lands in Ontario. That is the situation described by the minister, that they had obtained a grant from the British crown for having fought alongside the British in the American rebellion. But the case of the Hurons is altogether different. They were allies of the French, and I find—it does not clear up the whole point, I will admit—in the Constitutional Documents of Canada, the Articles of Capitulation of Montreal in 1760. It is to be found in Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759-1915, W. P. M. Kennedy, where at page 12, in article 40, I find this:

The savages or Indian allies of His Most Christian Majesty, shall be maintained in the lands they inhabit if they choose to remain there; they shall not be molested on any pretence whatsoever for having carried arms and served His Most Christian Majesty; they shall have, as well as the French, liberty of religion, and shall keep their missionaries. The actual Vicars General and the Bishop, when the Episcopal See shall be filled, shall have leave to send to them new missionaries when they shall judge it necessary.

There is this note at the time of the capitulation:

Granted, except the last article, which has been already refused.

The last article referred to the exercise of the Catholic religion, which was granted, as is well known, in so far as it was in accordance with the laws of England. The article preceding says:

None of the Canadians, Acadians or French, who are now in Canada, and on the frontiers of the colony, on the side of Acadia, Detroit, Michillimaquinac, and other places and posts of the countries above, the married and unmarried soldiers, remaining in Canada, shall be carried or transported into the British colonies or to Great Britain, and they shall not be troubled for having carried arms.

It says that they shall become British subjects, but it nowhere says that these Indians shall become British subjects. These are the Indians who were the allies of the French, and I do submit that unless there is something else in this bulky volume which I have not had time to read during the course of this debate, they still preserve some of their original status, and that this parliament has no jurisdiction over them.

Mr. MURPHY: Does my hon. friend contend that these Indians in Quebec are not British subjects?

Mr. POWER: I do not think they are unless they want to be.

Mr. MURPHY: Then my hon. friend disagrees with—

Mr. POWER: With Blackstone? Oh yes, he has been dead a long time, almost as long as the minister.

Mr. MURPHY: As dead as the arguments of my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAY: While this discussion is very interesting, I should like to place on record something practical for the consideration of the minister. This matter has been discussed at great length, and I think the minister has now introduced three or four amendments, but I have yet to hear any real reason for the introduction of this particular clause enforcing upon the Indians compulsory enfranchisement. If these men are intelligent enough to have this forced upon them, they are intelligent enough to have their petitions seriously considered by the minister and the government. The minister has stated before that he had not received these petitions.

Mr. MURPHY: No, I said that I had not received a certain petition mentioned by one hon. member. I did not say that I had not received any petitions.

Mr. GRAY: I was referring to the reply which the minister made to the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay a week or so ago. I hold in my hand a copy of a petition dated Walpole Island, Ontario, March 8, 1933. It is addressed to the Hon. T. G. Murphy, Minister of the Interior, Ottawa, and it is signed by over one hundred members of the Chippewas and Pottawatamies of that island. I am going to place it on Hansard, and before this section passes, or before we consider it further I think the minister should give to this house the real reason for forcing upon these men an enfranchisement which they do not desire. The petition reads as follows:

Dear Sir,—

On report in the press that the government of the Dominion of Canada are in consideration of enacting an act of parliament to force the Indians of the Dominion of Canada into compulsory enfranchisement,

We the Chippewas and Pottawatamies of Walpole Island do herein make our humble protest to such an enactment of act of parliament for the following reasons:—

The Indians of this part of the province of Ontario are not in a position or qualification to enter into such enfranchisement, by education, or temperament as borne out by the fact that the smartest ones of our race who have taken enfranchisement have in a few months or years lost all their property, and in most cases have had to receive help.

Outside of one or two, who are graduates of universities, the majority of the Indians have not even a common or public school education, and therefore cannot compete with the white people.

Therefore we, your humble petitioners, who are descendants of the loyal subjects or allies of the Brtish crown, who have fought for the rights of the British crown, and also rose as one man to the call of the Dominion of Canada, and have volunteered and fought side by side with our white brothers in the great war, do herein request your favourable consideration of this, our humble petition:—

Signed:

F. A. Ermatinger, chief.
Joseph Sampson, chief.
Walter Sands, councillor.
Frank Day, councillor.
Allan Isaac, councillor.
Raymond Nahdee, councillor.
William Nahdee, councillor.
Earle Sands, councillor.
Elijah Blackbird, councillor.
Ebenezer Greenbird, councillor.

I would ask the minister now what he has to say to these petitioners. Does he still insist upon enforcing enfranchisement upon these tribes?

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member is not stating the case fairly. He states that I am going to force compulsory enfranchisement upon these people. In their petition they state that they are not ready for enfranchisement because they have not the necessary education, but if the hon. member has read the amendment he will see that a court is set up to determine whether or not the Indians are fit for enfranchisement, and unless they are considered fit they will not be enfranchised.

Mr. GRAY: May I ask this question? Who initiates these proceedings? Is it not the minister?

Mr. MURPHY: The Superintendent General may.

Mr. GRAY: The minister or the Superintendent General. That is what I object to very, very seriously.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member has also stated that no reasons have been given to the committee as to why this action has been taken. I have endeavoured to give to the committee on one or two occasions at least my own personal feelings in the matter, and I would refer the hon. member to Hansard of February 21, when I spoke as follows:

Through the years the Canadian people have recognized their responsibilities for the welfare of the Indians of this country. In furtherance of that recognition they have spent vast sums of money in order to raise the status of the Indian. In cooperation with the churches they have established a very comprehensive educational system comprising both residential and day schools. They have also provided medical and hospitalization services for the Indian and have spent large sums of money, notably in the west, in order to make the Indian self supporting upon our agricultural lands. This constant endeavour throughout the years to raise the status of the Indian has been for what purpose? What has been the ultimate object in view in the expenditure of these moneys and the providing of these services for the Indian? It has been to raise the Indian to full status where he can take his place as a citizen of Canada. I believe this policy is the correct one but so far we have failed to take that final step which, in my opinion, should be taken, namely, to make the Indian a full citizen of this country when he has obtained that degree of advancement which entitles him to the full responsibilities and privileges of citizenship.

Those were the reasons I gave to the committee on that occasion. I am still of the same opinion, namely, that Canada has spent large sums of money for the advancement of the Indians, and again I ask: For what purpose, if not for the purpose of raising the Indian to the full status of citizenship? When he has attained that status in my opinion he should accept the responsibilities and privileges of a Canadian citizen.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I believe the minister is entirely mistaken as to his views concerning the relationships hitherto existing between the government and the Indians. His views concerning the treatment they have received are contrary to the actual relationships which have existed for generations between the crown and the Indians. I have received a protest from the Indians of the Chippewa band of the Thames who are strongly opposed to any form of compulsory enfranchisement of Indians. I believe they are preparing a petition to be presented to the government, in which they will object strenuously to any change in the rights which through certain treaties they have enjoyed through the years. Then I have from the Stregis Indians of Quebec the following telegram:

The Stregis Indians strongly protest against amending the compulsory enfranchisement to Indian Act due to conditions on the reservation, lack of work, lack of education, therefore not able to be self supporting and government would be breaking the faith of our Indian treaty.

This is signed by the Stregis Indians of Quebec. Then I have an appeal from the Caughnawaga Indians. Apparently they seem to believe they have treaties about which the minister does not know.

Mr. McDADE: Is not the hon. member referring to the St. Regis Indians? He has named them the Stregis Indians.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The word on the telegram is Stregis; I assume it should be St. Regis. May I direct the attention of the committee to what the Indians on the Caughnawaga reserve say:

We the councillors of the Caughnawaga reserve, assembled in council this twenty-fifth day of February, 1933, do beg to approach you relative to the passing and adoption by the House of Commons making it compulsory for the Indians of Canada to be enfranchised.

It would be severe calamity to our Indians at this present time should we be compelled to follow the laws of the white man in that we were not given the advantages of seriously studying and comprehending the difficult problems and laws of the British commonwealth.

In dealing with those treaties between Great Britain and the United States wherein the independence of the Indians of the Six Nations, both Great Britain and the United States have confessed that the Six Nations were an independent people. The Supreme courts of both countries furthermore recognized those treaties as inviolable.

In the life of Sir Frederick Haldimand, the question of the sovereignty of the Indians was very embarrassing, in that it would have been impossible on any theory of the laws of the nations for Great Britain or the United States to establish a prerogative in themselves to enforce the laws of the white man upon owners of this country.

In dealing with the Jay Treaty of Amity, Mallory p. 590 in 1794 the rights of the Indians was recognized. Moreover the language used there treated those tribes as being outside the circle of British subjects in relation to citizenship and sovereignty.

To make this admission still stronger that article was amplified by amendment of 1796 Mallory, p. 607 . . .

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member is quoting Malloy; will he tell the committee who the commentator is?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I assume the book will be in the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MURPHY: What authority is Malloy? Is he a member of the judiciary?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; I assume he has made a compilation of the treaties, and I should have expected the minister to have that compilation.

Mr. MURPHY: If the hon. member's knowledge of Malloy is not greater than it was of St. Regis I am afraid it is not very wide.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can guarantee it would not be less than the minister's.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, it is very much less.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am reading a petition from the Indians who apparently know more about their rights than do the people who are trying to look after them. The appeal from the Caughnawaga Indians continues:

To make this admission still stronger that article was amplified by amendment of 1796, Mallory, p. 607, which provides that no treaty made or to be made by either party with another nation or with any other Indian tribe should be construed to deny those tribal rights. We therefore beg and pray that those treaties be maintained and recognized by Great Britain and her commonwealth and that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs take into serious consideration our request that those laws dealing with the enfranchisement of the Six Nation Indians be not adopted and enforced upon him.

This document is signed by Mayor Joseph M. Lefebre, and councillors.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie, the house adjourned at 11.02 p.m.

Monday, March 27, 1933

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the first report of the select standing committee on standing orders and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FIRST AND SECOND READING OF PRIVATE BILLS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That for the remaining period of the session, all private bills, when presented, be read a first and second time forthwith, and that standing order 105 respecting the posting of private bills referred to the house be suspended.

[Mr. Murphy.]

This is the usual rule, made in like circumstances, having regard to the date which we have reached in the session.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Hackett be substituted for that of Mr. Sproule on the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL—FIRST READING

Bill No. 56, respecting The Nipissing Central Railway Company.—Mr. Casselman.

TAX ON SUGAR

ALLEGED APPLICATION OF NEW RATE TO STOCKS ON HAND

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I have received many representations in protest against the alleged unfair action of wholesalers who are said to have anticipated the budget and in consequence have it is alleged reaped substantial profits through raising prices immediately on the stocks of sugar they have in hand.

The question of forestalling is a very difficult one to deal with. It has proved difficult and baffling to all governments, and up to the moment I know of no effective remedy which has been discovered to meet the situation. There is this to be said, that while there can never be an exact balance, the fact remains that when a tax is removed the reverse of this picture holds good, and the wholesaler on that occasion is out of pocket the amount of tax which is remitted, to the extent of the stock he has in hand.

I may say that all wholesalers have not been quite so fortunate, if the sugar wholesalers have been, because I know of one instance where one firm in one city borrowed $18,000 for the purpose of paying the duty to take tea and coffee out of bond, in anticipation of this very thing happening, and in that instance they will be losers to the extent of the overstock in hand and the carrying charges in the meantime.

While it is doubtful whether a remedy can be found, I wish to take this early opportunity in the session to say that the matter will be most carefully inquired into, and if a remedy is available to meet the justice of the case it will be applied.

Mr. POULIOT: There is the peace, order and good government bill.

Mr. DUFF: Has the minister received any complaints with regard to the six per cent sales tax on molasses? People who cannot now afford sugar must use molasses, on which there is a sales tax of six per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I think I can answer that question offhand and be absolutely accurate. I doubt whether there is any commodity on which a tax is placed with respect to which there will not be some protests.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

GRANBY, QUEBEC, POST OFFICE

Mr. TETREAULT:

1. Was a heating system installed in the post office of Granby, Quebec?
2. If so, when?
3. What was the total cost of installation?
4. Who sold the heating system to the government and who did the installation thereof?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1, 2, 3 and 4.—

A hot water heating system was supplied and installed by Alex MacKay & Co. Montreal for $1,080 at the time the building was constructed in 1903. When the addition to the building was erected in 1921, the two old boilers were replaced by new ones purchased from Steel & Radiation Ltd., Montreal for $781 and installed by R. A. Butterworth of Granby for $172. In March 1929, an oil burner was installed on these boilers by Alonzo Lemieux of Granby at a cost of $900.

RADIO SUPERVISOR, PICTOU

Mr. DUFF:

1. Who is radio supervisor for the county of Pictou?
2. When was he appointed?
3. Who recommended him for the position?
4. What is his salary or compensation?
5. What are the duties and position of D. R. Sutherland of Pictou in connection with radio matters?
6. On whose recommendation was Mr. Sutherland employed?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. George Brownrigg.
2. 7th October, 1932.
3. The honourable member for Pictou.
4. Ten cents commission on each licence he was responsible for selling in Pictou county.
5. Vendor of radio receiving licences.
6. Mr. George Brownrigg.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GLACE BAY HARBOUR BREAKWATER

Mr. DUFF:

1. What was the cost of the material supplied for erection of breakwater on south side of Glace Bay harbour in March, 1932?
2. Were tenders called for the supplying of that material?
3. What lumber dealer or dealers supplied the material, and at what price?
4. Did the contractor, the late Neil N. MacDonald have full authority to purchase material, or was it supplied by orders of the Department of Public Works, or was it supplied without consulting Mr. MacDonald?
5. What portion of the proposed breakwater was completed, and is a further extension proposed?

DREDGE, NEW WELLAND

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Who are the owners of the dredge, New Welland?
2. How long have they owned it?
3. What work has been done by this dredge, directly or indirectly for the government (a) before July 28, 1930; (b) after July 28, 1930?
4. What payments have been made for such work?
5. To whom were these payments made?
6. On what dates were these payments made?

J. P. PORTER & SONS—DREDGING

Mr. GARDINER:

1. What dredging work has J. P. Porter & Sons Limited done directly or indirectly for the government from April 1, 1928, to July 28, 1930?
2. What amounts have been paid for this work?
3. To whom were these payments made?
4. On what dates were these payments made?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

POINTE AU BARIL, ONT., MAIL SERVICE

Mr. HURTUBISE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions, reports and other documents in the possession of the government, respecting the mail service between Pointe au Baril, Ontario, and railway station, since 1930.

GARSON, ONT., POST OFFICE

Mr. HURTUBISE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions, reports and other documents in the possession of the government, respecting the post office of Garson, Ontario, since 1930.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide that money paid by the provinces for services of the force may be utilized for its maintenance; and for the disposition of moneys earned by any member of the force over and above his regular salary, pay and allowances; and to authorize the governor in council to determine by regulation the amount of allowance for pension purposes; and to make further provision respecting the counting of service in South Africa by officers and constables for the purposes of pension.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TRAWLER LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries, as to whether or not any decision has been arrived at with regard to the refusal of licences to trawlers after the present licences expire. If any decision has been arrived at I should like to know what it is, and if not I should like to know when we may expect an announcement in this connection.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): The matter is still under consideration, and a decision will be arrived at before the end of the month.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I promised the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that I would advise him with respect to other business that might engage the attention of this house during this session. In addition to what I mentioned the other day, that is, the amendments to some existing statutes, there is only one measure, which I do not think it necessary to name at the moment, that may require the consideration of the house, but I do not think it will come up. As soon as I have definite information I will advise the house.

[Mr. Hurtubise.]

INQUIRY AS TO LENGTH OF EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister has just said a word with regard to the business of the house. Perhaps it is a little early to put a certain question to him, but I should like to ask him to have it in mind: A number of hon. members desire to know the plans of the government with regard to the Easter recess, and if these plans could be announced at an early date, it would, I think, meet the wishes of many hon. members of the house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The right hon. gentleman is quite correct in his suggestion that no definite conclusion has been arrived at with respect to this matter, but so far as it is possible to say at the moment I think we will adjourn over Friday and continue our proceedings as usual the following week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On Tuesday?

Mr. BENNETT: I say this, of course, subject to any change that may be made, but I fancy it will be from Thursday evening until Tuesday afternoon. That is the intention at the present moment.

PRICE OF SUGAR

REPORTED INCREASE ON STOCK HELD BY WHOLESALERS AT RIVIERE DU LOUP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for the statement he made a moment ago, and I should like to direct the attention of the government to the fact that on December 6 the price of sugar at Riviere du Loup was $4.85 per hundred pounds.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid that is not a proper statement on the orders of the day. If the hon. member wishes to direct a question to the government he should do so.

Mr. POULIOT: That is what I am doing. Now the price has been raised to $7; there are several cars on the siding at Riviere du Loup, but no merchant can get sugar from the wholesale store which is owned by a profiteering company, which was well known during the war for the sale of still born calf sausage. I hope the government will take some action to see that sugar is sold to the stores of Riviere du Loup.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

DOMINION NOTES ACT AMENDMENT

POWER TO SUSPEND PROVISION FOR REDEMPTION IN GOLD—DISCUSSION OF GOLD STANDARD

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 54, to amend the Dominion Notes Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this bill is very brief; its purport is to give the governor in council power to suspend that section of the Dominion Notes Act which sets forth that dominion notes shall be redeemable in gold on presentation at branch offices established or at banks with which arrangements may be made for the redemption thereof.

I believe it is a fact that already the government has been exercising the power for which it is now asking. If that is the case the government must have had some authority for so doing, and if it had such authority presumably that authority was sufficient and is still sufficient. So under the circumstances I do not see why this measure need be introduced at all. I might add that the introduction of a measure of this kind, unless it is absolutely necessary, would seem to injure rather than aid the credit of the country. Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) who has the matter in hand has good and sufficient reasons for further taking away from parliament its control over this all-important matter, together with the other matters that we have been considering of late. It would seem that the parliament that laid down the special conditions under which this power should be exercised took a safer and sounder view of the authority and wisdom of parliament in the matter than the minister is taking at the moment. However, the minister may have special reasons for asking that this authority should be given at this time, and if so the minister might give us the reasons before we are asked to vote on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. RHODES: Technically I exhausted my right to speak when I made this motion, although I did not speak at that time, due entirely to the belief which I perhaps mistakenly held that no exception could be taken to the principle of the bill, and that any questions that might arise could be dealt with more properly in committee of the whole. I have, however, no objection to saying a word or two. I have not any doubt that this bill legally follows the one which was passed last year and which prohibited the export of gold. It is really a companion bill and if it had been introduced at that period, I do not think any exception would have been taken to it. That it was not introduced at that time is due largely to the fact that the provision for redemption in gold was, in view of the fact that the gold could not be exported, an empty one.

I do not agree with my right hon. friend that by my bringing in this bill any question could be raised which would be prejudicial in any way to the credit of the country. It means merely that we recognize in the statute laws a situation which is virtually in effect. There can be no good object in an individual seeking to have notes redeemed in gold if he may not export the gold, and the measure is largely of advantage in preventing frivolous attempts to invoke the provisions of the statute as it at present exists. My right hon. friend is aware of the fact that under the Finance Act there is power to suspend the redemption of notes in gold, but the conditions there are so rigorous that the mere application of them would occasion a critical situation. The words used in the Finance Act are:

> In case of war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended, and in case of any real or apprehended financial crisis.

Certain powers rest with the governor in council, amongst others being:

> (d) Suspend the redemption in gold of dominion notes.

In the case of this bill, that should apply under conditions far short of those which are provided in the Finance Act. We do not for a moment admit that there is any financial crisis or that one is apprehended, but at the same time, as a matter of proper conservation of our gold supplies for the country's purposes, we propose asking that this bill should be enacted and in doing so I may say that we are only doing in effect precisely what has been done in Great Britain and in the United States. I have under my hand if, when we are in committee, it should be desired, the exact wording of the statute so far as the United States is concerned and also so far as the law in England is concerned. This is a measure decidedly in the public interest and I do not think any reasonable objection can be taken to it. My right hon. friend has intimated that there seems to be a desire on the part of the government to take more power unto itself. Necessarily a provision of this kind should be elastic unless we are prepared to take the ground that for all time we shall do away with the redemption of dominion notes in gold. That perhaps is a debatable question, but it need not arise at this stage. Certainly, we are seeking no more power in this bill than, as I have intimated, already exists in both the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have no idea of objecting to the bill now before us which, I think, is long overdue, except to say that I believe the section which is intended to be amended, should be struck out altogether. I am informed there is today no country in the world where legal tender notes are redeemable in gold and I do not see why we should continue any longer to keep this section of the Dominion Notes Act on the statute books. While it is there, I am in favour of the amendment moved by the minister to the effect that the government should have power to suspend it. It has actually been suspended since September, 1931, and it was suspended perhaps two years before that time. I think it was Professor Curtis who said that the test of a gold standard is the foreign exchange rate and when a premium on foreign exchange as high as two per cent obtains in Canada, this is a clear indication to me that we are no longer redeeming our notes in gold. In September, 1931, Great Britain was forced to abandon the gold standard. The action taken in Great Britain at that time, and taken by act of parliament, I may say, was to relieve the Bank of England from liability to redeem their notes in gold. I might quote Mr. Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said, in introducing the bill:

> This will not affect the free gold market in London. There will be no restrictions on the importation or exportation of gold and any gold sent to London for sale, for example from the South African mines, will like any other commodity fetch its market price whatever that may be.
> All that is changed is that the right under the subsection of the 1925 act to take from the Bank of England gold bars, is suspended. Finally and I only say this because of an unreasoning fear that appears to prevail abroad where we are under obligations to make payments in dollars or other foreign currencies, as for example some of the war bonds that were issued in New York, we shall of course continue to meet our obligations punctually in those currencies.

That was the action taken by Great Britain when she abandoned the gold standard. She suspended the redemption of notes in gold. She did not take the action now proposed by the Minister of Finance of giving the governor in council power to suspend redemption, but she did actually suspend it by law, and I think that is the action which should be taken in Canada at this time. This should have been done in September, 1931. At that time the government had power, under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, to pass an order in council suspending redemption in gold. That action was not taken, but so far as I can find out, the government have refused almost consistently to redeem on presentation dominion notes in gold. We have done extra legally that which we would not do legally. Although bound by law to redeem these notes in gold the receivers general have refused to do so. To make sure of that I applied on two different occasions to the Assistant Receiver General at Calgary for gold and I was refused. I was handed an application form. Such action could not by any stretch of the imagination be taken as compliance with the law and I think it is regrettable the government has waited eighteen months to do this thing legally. The government, however, should go further and suspend that section of the act. We have no intention of redeeming notes in gold; it is impossible to do so and no country in the world is doing so. In fact, dominion notes should not be convertible at all, because when the public or any large section of it desires to make our notes convertible, they become inconvertible. Every existing currency becomes inconvertible when any large section of the public attempts to convert it, so why continue to pretend that our currency is convertible. There is only a small amount of legal tender in the country compared with the total deposits in the banks. The situation is sound while the people have confidence, but as Lord Melchett said in a recent book Modern Money: "Confidence is suspicion asleep," and whenever confidence is shaken, suspicion wakes up and the bankers always get suspicious first. They curtail our credit and they bring about the very terrible depressions one of which we are now experiencing.

I did not intend to say very much about this measure until it got into committee, but I might quote Sir Basil Blackett who, when speaking at a meeting of the members of the Royal Institute of International Affairs at London in 1931, on the international gold standard, on this very question of convertibility into gold said:

> The question, why do banks keep gold? can be answered, I think, frivolously, in several ways. I think the first and perhaps the most important answer is because other central banks keep gold. Perhaps another answer would be because the banks think that people think they ought to keep gold, or even because the banks think that people think and the banks think they ought to keep gold. Possibly another answer would be because the central banks are not clever enough to manage any system other than the gold standard, or they are not clever enough to persuade people to think they are clever enough to manage any such system.

He says further:

The amount of gold that is required ought not to have any direct relation to the amount of currency that is out.

Gold is only used, he points out, not for the purpose of converting internal currencies, but to meet exchange balances with foreign countries. He says further:

The amount of gold that a central bank requires, if we could persuade public opinion to see the truth, is the amount that will make it perfectly safe for meeting an external balance of payments against it at any given moment. That ought to be the sole purpose in a peaceful world for which a gold reserve is kept,—to meet an external balance of payments that is against that country.

In the last paragraph he says:

The main purpose I had in rising to-night was to say that I believe the first and foremost principle that we ought to get driven home, and on which we ought to concentrate, is the truth that no currency note in the world is convertible, and that no sensible central bank ought to regard it as such.

Sir Basil Blackett, I think, is one of the best-informed men in regard to monetary matters in the whole British Empire. He is a director of the Bank of England. He says:

No currency note in the world is convertible and no sensible central bank ought to regard it as such.

If no sensible bank ought to regard it as such, why should a sensible country regard its currency as convertible? The reason it is not convertible is I think pretty well known, but perhaps a quotation from Doctor W. H. Coates might help to exemplify that point.

There are probably twenty thousand millions' worth of transactions carried on in Great Britain each year on a base of one hundred and fifty millions of gold. That fact gives some measure of the credit structure the whole world uses. The central banks determine how much credit there is to be. They look in a cupboard to see how much yellow metal they have got! They might as well look to see how much coal they have. Gold should be put in its proper place.

While I am on my feet I should like to quote a paragraph from the report issued by a joint committee of the Federation of British Industries and the British Economic Union last year:

Make it clear we are not in disagreement with the view of the Macmillan committee referred to below that in a stable and financially highly developed community neither gold nor any other metallic backing is required to support an internal note issue and that a metallic reserve is needed for no other purpose than to meet a foreign drain and provide an international standard of value.

I would suggest that as our dominion notes are used only for internal purposes we should strike out altogether the subsection referred to in this bill so that the amount of legal tender which we might have in Canada is not dependent on the amount of gold which we have in a cupboard over in the east block. I know that some people think that this would make it more difficult for us to meet our obligations in New York, but so far as this house is concerned I do not think there are very many members who any longer put much stock in that theory. I know that on February 29 of last year the Prime Minister said:

Now, if I ship down to New York nineteen one million dollar Canadian bills, would that pay the debt? Obviously it would not. Because those nineteen one million dollar bills could not be converted into nineteen million dollars of gold, there being no free market in respect to it. That was the position. It put upon us the tremendous obligation of making the necessary arrangements to carry over.

I think the Prime Minister was indulging in a little flight of fancy there because I do not think there are any one million dollar notes issued; if there are I hope the minister will correct me. But we can take it from the Prime Minister's own words that we do not meet our obligations in New York with our dominion notes, and therefore the question whether we have gold behind our dominion notes or not, or whether we are willing to convert dominion notes into gold, does not affect our ability to meet our obligations in New York. I wish we could dispose once for all of that fallacy which is in the minds of some of the people of this country, but which I hope by this time has disappeared from the minds of the members of this house. If it has not, I hope that when we are in committee this afternoon the minister will assure us that this change in the act would not in any way interfere with meeting our obligations in foreign countries.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the minister explain whether a bank can be called upon to give up its gold for its bills?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) will not think me discourteous, I shall be very glad to attempt to answer any questions when we are in committee. My hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) was strictly in order in his discussion, but he raised the whole question of the gold standard which I submit is one which does not of necessity have to be dealt with in connection with this bill, and therefore I hope he will not think me discourteous if I do not follow the general lines of his discussion. I rise merely for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension under which my hon. friend is labouring. If I understood him correctly I understood him to say that in England they had eliminated from their law the provision for the redemption of notes in gold. But if my hon. friend will refer to the Gold Standard (Amendment) Act, 1931, chapter 46 of the statutes of Great Britain for 1930-31, he will find that section 1 provides as follows:

> Unless and until His Majesty by proclamation otherwise directs, subsection (2) of section one of the Gold Standard Act, 1925, shall cease to have effect, notwithstanding that subsection (1) of the said section remains in force.

Put in layman's language that simply means that the governor in council may by proclamation restore the provision for the redemption of notes in gold. The provision that we are seeking by an amendment to our act is that if the occasion should arise when we wish to revert to the previous position, it will be competent for us to do so by order in council.

Just one more word which I might have said in answer to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) with respect to the governor in council taking authority by statute for such a course. I might point out that it is the logical step to take in view of the fact that the act respecting the export of gold which we passed at the last session contains this paragraph:

> The governor in council may prohibit, from time to time and for any period or periods, the export of gold, whether in the form of coin or bullion,—

And so on. Parliament in its wisdom granted that authority to the governor in council. It follows, I think, as a logical consequence that in respect of the redemption of notes in gold the same course should be pursued; otherwise we should find ourselves in an impasse.

I have nothing more to say, Mr. Speaker, because as I intimated when I first rose, my sole object in speaking was to reply to the one phase of the matter, namely the point raised by the hon. member for Macleod.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon. Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur) in the chair.

On section 1—Redemption in gold.

Mr. RHODES: Would the hon. member for Bonaventure be good enough to repeat his question; I did not hear it.

Mr. MARCIL: What rule applies to the banks, as to whether they are required to redeem their bills in gold or by legal tender?

Mr. RHODES: By legal tender.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. COOTE: Since September, 1931, I take it for granted that the department has been refusing, on most occasions at any rate, to pay out gold for dominion notes. I should like to ask the minister to tell us, if he will, what steps have been taken at different times since September, 1931—using the language of the department—to preserve our gold supply. What orders have been issued to the Receiver General?

Mr. RHODES: The licences for export, in the great majority of cases and involving the preponderant amount of gold, have been issued only in those cases where gold has been exported for the purpose of meeting our payments abroad. Individual instances have been few in number, and the amount of gold involved has been comparatively trifling. In the main those individual licences have been granted in the case of certain types of jewellers' and dentists' sweepings which were of such a complex character and mixed with other valuable metals to such an extent that there was not any provision in Canada for their being properly refined. Consequently, in the main, they have been exported to the United States where there are refining facilities.

Mr. COOTE: My question is this: How many applications for gold have been received by the department? At least, have not applications been received by the department which were refused?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I should not like to answer that question either by direct negative or affirmative. But I shall answer it by giving a concrete illustration. A request, which came before me for review, was made to the department by a corporation which wanted to present legal tender and receive a substantial amount of gold. The intimation which came in the letter was to the effect that they wanted to export it to pay their bondholders in foreign countries. It was pointed out by the department that if the redemption had taken place it would be of no value to the recipient for the reason that they could not export their gold, except under licence, and that under those conditions a licence would not be granted. The effect of the answer was that while the application was not withdrawn, no action was taken. I hope the illustration I have given will serve as an index. I do not believe we could go so far as to say that the department has refused to redeem notes in gold. It always has been at pains to point out the circumstance that the redemption would be of no value inasmuch as the gold would not be exported.

Mr. EULER: Would you have refused, if permission had been asked?

Mr. RHODES: I say to my hon. friend from North Waterloo that the department has endeavoured jealously to guard our gold supply.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I had intended to ask the minister a similar question. If that is the case, the department were refusing not on the ground that they refused to redeem in gold, but on the ground that they would not allow export. So it is not a fact that during the period of suspension of export they have actually been refusing to redeem their notes in gold.

Mr. RHODES: That has been largely the effect, Mr. Chairman. Of course, the committee will readily understand that if there were not an embargo on the export of gold, and were it not for the fact that it could only be exported under licence, our gold supply in Canada would not last one day; there would not be a dollar left.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But we are not discussing that point. The point I wish to get clear is this: During the period of suspension of export were the government refusing to redeem their notes in gold? I understand the desirability of prohibiting export, and having the government control the gold supply. On the other hand, the government have a contract with the holders of the notes. And whether or not export would be allowed does not appear to me to be an important factor. The point is: Did the department refuse to redeem notes in gold, according to contract set out in the Finance Act?

Mr. RHODES: As I said to the hon. member for Macleod, I should not like to answer the question categorically. I know that in one instance not long ago we redeemed notes to the extent of some $5,000, but the circumstances were regarded as rather unique. Even if we did not refuse, the operation of the Gold Export Act is sufficient to render nugatory the provisions of the statute for the redemption in gold, because it would be of no use to the individual to carry gold if he could not export it.

Mr. YOUNG: Could he not sell it at the market value?

Mr. RHODES: Not in the form of coin.

Mr. EULER: Ordinarily I would judge that people do not demand gold. Ordinarily if they have federal currency or bank currency they never question it, and would not demand gold. But I was going to ask the minister—perhaps he does not desire to answer the question—whether, due to recent difficulties in United States banking operations, people in Canada holding federal currency did not feel quite so certain that our currency, that is, bills, bank notes or federal notes, were absolutely reliable and had any value? They might think that gold would be a much safer commodity to hold. I was wondering whether at that time applications had been made to the Department of Finance to pay in gold or to redeem in gold some of the federal notes?

Mr. RHODES: I am very happy indeed to answer the question of the hon. member. As a matter of fact I am glad he has asked it, because in the answer will be found a tribute not only to the sanity of Canadian people but to their absolute belief in the stability of conditions in Canada. I am happy to answer that I came across no evidence of any kind indicating the slightest change of attitude on the part of any indivdual or company arising out of or even coincident with the situation which developed in the United States. I am speaking from memory, but I think with accuracy, when I say I do not recall a single request for the redemption of notes in gold during that period.

Mr. MALCOLM: Can the minister inform us if his gold reserve represents one-fiftieth of an ounce of gold for every dollar of dominion currency in circulation?

Mr. RHODES: The figure I have in mind —I am not speaking from the record—is that we have the full gold cover. With respect to our total issue we have that figure which is generally regarded as adequate, namely, about forty per cent.

Mr. EULER: In connection with the gold reserve, I understand that, under our act, for the first $50,000,000 of federal currency there must be twenty-five per cent gold backing; and above that, dollar for dollar in gold. I would like to ask the minister upon what principle that percentage is fixed. Is it purely arbitrary? Why, for example, is it twenty-five per cent up to $50,000,000; why is it not twenty per cent, or thirty per cent, or some other percentage? And why at the $50,000,000 point does the requirement become dollar for dollar? These are questions which a great many people are asking. I have wondered about them myself; perhaps the minister could give us a little lecture on monetary economics.

Mr. RHODES: The minister admits in all humility that neither as an individual nor as a minister does he feel capable of giving a homily upon the gold standard. I can only say to my hon. friend and to the committee that that provision has remained in the statute for many years, presumably because it crystallizes in the form of legislation the best judgment of the best brains of the country as to what cover there ought to be for our note issue. I am the first to admit that it may be a debatable question. It may be subject to variation. I think that subject may be one which could with advantage be considered by the royal commission on banking, and no doubt will be. But the answer I have given, which I admit is perhaps inadequate, is the best answer I can give in the circumstances.

Mr. EULER: Then supposing the government decided to issue federal currency beyond what is allowed under that provision, it would be called inflation?

Mr. BENNETT: It could not validly be issued.

Mr. EULER: I would like to ask whether the basis of our currency, that is the percentage of gold reserve, is in accord with the basis in other countries, Great Britain, for example, or the United States?

Mr. RHODES: Our total issue to-day in its relation to gold is, I understand, in proper orthodox proportion according to the opinion of bankers and economists.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is as far as the federal issue is concerned?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister referred to the gold coverage which is considered orthodox as being forty per cent of the note issue. In other words with gold at $20 an ounce, forty per cent coverage would mean one-fiftieth of an ounce of gold for every federal dollar issued. It is said that if we got away from that orthodox ratio it would disturb our foreign exchange. In other words, if Canada issued a dollar for every one-hundredth of an ounce of gold in reserve it would injure our foreign credit? Can the minister explain why, if we are not to redeem our notes in gold. We have not enough gold in the treasury to redeem more than forty per cent, and it is purely an internal matter as to how much currency we issue, that should have any bearing at all upon our foreign credit, so long as we agree to redeem our foreign held securities in gold?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I should find that a very difficult question to answer. I have no doubt that the value attributed to our dollar by foreign countries may be governed by various factors. But I am quite certain that one of the first things they would look at, apart from their faith in the credit and integrity of Canada, would be our set-up with respect to gold coverage.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is admitted. But I submit that 75 per cent of the thinking people of Canada to-day are asking the question why our position respecting our foreign obligations, which we certainly agreed to pay in gold and which we intend to honour, should be injured by any internal arrangements as to the percentage of currency we issue to meet our domestic needs. That is the point on which I wish the minister would give the house some light. I see no connection, providing we are willing to recognize our foreign obligations in gold.

Mr. RHODES: That may be so.

Mr. EULER: I may be exposing my ignorance but I am willing to do so if I can get an answer to this question, which I think is in the minds of a great many other people. Say, for example, that we are up to the full coverage with our present gold reserve; we have issued as much federal currency as we may under the present regulation, but the government decides to issue, say, an additional $100,000,000; that would be called inflation. I daresay our exchange with the United States would immediately suffer.

Mr. COOTE: It might improve.

Mr. EULER: But suppose, instead of issuing more currency, the government decided to issue short term treasury notes, or even bonds, which would have the disadvantage of calling for the payment of interest, I suppose that would not be called inflation. I would like to know why it is not inflation in the one case and is in the other, because they are both obligations of the government.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) realizes that he is putting a purely hypothetical case when he speaks of our issuing $100,000,000 new currency.

Mr. EULER: You might choose to do it.

Mr. RHODES: Not without coming to parliament and getting the necessary authority.

Mr. EULER: We are in parliament now.

Mr. RHODES: At the moment we are absolutely restricted and limited as to the method of issuing currency. If I understand the remaining portion of the question, to the extent that a country over-extends itself in the matter of credit, to that extent it is inflation, if you choose to call it so. If a country borrows more than it can pay it is getting itself into the same position as a country which does unduly inflate, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. EULER: I do not desire to embarrass the minister, but the point I am getting at is, why call the one inflation and not the other, when they are both obligations to pay? In the one case you issue currency, promises to pay by the government of Canada; in the other case you might issue short term treasury notes, which are also promises to pay. They are both obligations of the people of Canada; why is one inflation and the other not? Having issued bonds to the extent of $2,000,000,000 and more, if we issued another $1,000,000,000, and were able to sell the bonds, would that be inflation? If not, when would it become inflation?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that any good purpose can be served by following this discussion—

Mr. EULER: A lot of people would like to know.

Mr. RHODES: —even if I felt competent to pursue it with any degree of authority. For the purpose of this measure I am prepared to admit at once that my hon. friend may be quite right, but with all deference I submit it has no bearing.

Mr. MALCOLM: I quite agree with the minister that it has no direct bearing on the question whether or not the government is to be given authority to refuse to redeem our currency in gold. At the same time may I point out that there are in this house a great many members who are trying to remove the stage setting surrounding the whole monetary system and get at the naked truth of what it all means. Our currency is simply a promise to pay by the government, without interest, and it is not backed by gold to the extent of one hundred per cent but only to the extent of forty per cent, or one-fiftieth of an ounce per dollar in circulation. If a show-down were called for, we would get one-fiftieth of an ounce of gold for every Canadian dollar. And I quite agree that that is the orthodox ratio. As my hon. friend from North Waterloo puts it, the government could issue another $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 of securities if they could be marketed and New York would not consider that Canada had inflated, although the securities would cost the Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars a month in interest, and eventually would have to be redeemed as to principal in gold; whereas, if Canada wished to do some constructive work in the dominion, and the minister, under the Finance Act, issued currency on which he did not have to collect interest from the taxpayers, and which by statutory enactment he could redeem over a period of years, why that action should be considered inflation and our dollar should be discounted further in New York is a question which is worrying many hon. members here.

Now this bill provides that we give the government power to suspend the redemption of notes in gold. If the government does that, then our currency has nothing behind it except the promise to pay—the promise to pay in what? In another bill which likewise has no metal behind it. As my hon. friend from North Waterloo has said, a dollar bill is a promise to pay without interest while a bond is a promise to pay with interest; and so far as these bonds are redeemable in New York we must pay them in gold.

The minister is faced with the problem of taking out of business the taxes he needs; he has no other way of getting it. He has no resources which he can sell, because the resources of the dominion belong to the provinces. Every promise to pay which he has issued in New York or in Canada is predicated upon the ability of the business men of the country to pay taxes to him in the future. He can assess by business profits tax, by excise, by customs, by income tax and by sales tax, and these five cover practically the whole field of his taxation. Federal revenues depend on the success of business and must come from business in some form or other.

Suppose the minister wishes to construct a federal building to-morrow. It is perfectly legitimate and will not interfere with the standing of our credit in New York if he issues bonds and sells them. Supposing he puts up a $6,000,000 building this year and issues $6,000,000 worth of bonds at five per cent. He will need $600,000 a year of the taxpayers' money for twenty years to pay for the building.

An hon. MEMBER: $300,000.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, $600,000. He will spend $300,000 for principal and $300,000 for interest for twenty years. In other words, he must load Canadian business with $12,000,000 worth of taxes in the next twenty years to pay for the building. If he issued $6,000,000 worth of treasury notes redeemable through taxation by statutory enactment—I am not advocating inflation, far from it; nor am I advocating fiat money—if he issued $6,000,000 worth of treasury notes, and by statutory enactment redeemed them at the rate of ten per cent per annum, he would have the notes redeemed and out of circulation in ten years and the taxpayers would pay $6,000,000 instead of $12,000,000. If the minister suspends gold, as called for in the act, the dollar bill has nothing behind it except the promise to take from the taxpayers that amount of money. Why should the issuance of $6,000,000 of treasury notes to erect a federal building, which would save the taxpayers another $6,000,000, be considered inflation? It is a purely internal matter in no way relating to the minister's promise to pay any foreign obligation in gold. Yet the hon. gentleman fears that the moment he withdraws the provision with respect to the redemption of notes in gold we shall have inflation and our dollar will sink further in value in New York. I wish he would explain this to the house. Hon. friends to my left, most members on this side of the house and some hon. members opposite, are wondering why, when only one-fiftieth of an ounce of gold is held for every dollar—and by this legislation the minister proposes to remove even that guarantee—it should not be possible for us to treat our own currency as good, based on our faith in our dominion, and proceed to use our currency for the upbuilding of Canada and for the relief of the taxpayers.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not propose to enter into an elaborate discussion this afternoon of the matters raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Malcolm). His remarks will certainly be received with favour in some quarters, but not in any quarter where men have regard for obligations or a desire to conduct the business of the country on a sound basis.

Mr. MALCOLM: The Prime Minister will appreciate the fact that my remarks were in the form of a question and not of an opinion.

Mr. BENNETT: The last part of the hon. gentleman's remarks expressed an opinion.

Mr. MALCOLM: I asked why.

Mr. McINTOSH: He wants information. Give it to him.

Mr. POULIOT: Put a question mark.

Mr. BENNETT: The impertinence of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) is again in evidence—

Mr. McINTOSH: No worse than yours.

Mr. BENNETT: —but it is so commonplace that it is now regarded as one of the attributes of debate.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. McINTOSH: With you starting it.

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend will look at page 2161 of the Canada Gazette he will find that we already have outstanding $67,000,000 that has behind it no metal coverage. It is not a new thing that there should be currency issued without metal coverage in this country. This is the state of the finances of the country on March 13, 1933:

Dominion Note Circulation and Gold Holdings
Provincial	$ 27,591 83
Fractional	1,281,175 86
$1	17,797,116 00
$2	12,300,136 50
$4	30,803 00
$5	5,035,130 00
$50	650 00
$500	2,491,500 00
$1,000	6,506,000 00
Legal tender notes for banks—
$1,000	1,000 00
$5,000	8,430,000 00
$50,000	121,800,000 00
	$175,701,103 19

That makes a total outstanding of $175,701,103.19 of promises to pay, on demand, by the Dominion of Canada, as indicated in each case on the face of the bill itself.

Mr. MALCOLM: Will the Prime Minister segregate the amount that is used purely as treasury notes from the amount used as circulating currency?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall come to that.

Statutory Authority for Issue
Chapter 4, 1915	$ 26,000,000 00
Finance Act, r.s. 1927, c. 70	41,944,000 00
Dominion Notes Act, r.s. 1927, c. 41	107,757,103 19
	$175,701,103 19

Under our Currency Act the banks are called upon to hold in legal tender a certain proportion of their liquid assets. The exact figure I have not in mind at the moment—

Mr. SPENCER: Forty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it was fifty, but my hon. friend says it is forty. That is included in the items to which I have already referred:

Gold held by the Minister of Finance—
Against savings bank deposits (10 per cent on $22,335,022.24) under the Savings Bank Act.	$ 2,233,502 22
Against notes as required by Dominion Notes Act, r.s. 1927.	70,257,103 19
In excess of statutory requirements	91,222 41
	$72,581,827 82

The $70,257,103.19 is made up as follows: First, $50,000,000 at twenty-five cents on the dollar; that is $12,500,000. Then the $50,000,000 deducted from the total outstanding, exclusive of the special sums authorized by statute, leaves a balance of $57,757,103.19 for which there is put up dollar for dollar. This gives a total of $70,257,103.19 which is covered by gold. But there is no gold deposited for the purpose of securing the $68,000,000, in round figures, issued under conditions exactly similar to those mentioned by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) though not for the purpose he indicated. That money in part went to pay loans and advances to the railway companies during the war and in part to the banks under the Finance Act and has no metal coverage. Therefore, so far as this country is concerned, there is now outstanding some $68,000,000 of money that has behind it no metal coverage at all, nothing but the promise to pay of this country. That has been so since the days of the war, and that was one of the factors that had to do with some of the difficulties experienced by this country in the depreciation of its dollar in foreign markets, to which I shall presently refer.

If any of the hon. members of this house are interested in reading the story of gold they will find it in the library in a book published about twelve years ago. I am not going into that question except to say that, gold being the rarest and most valuable metal for its weight and volume, by universal consent has become the yardstick by which to measure the issue of paper money. Without going into details I think that is a fair statement. Practice and custom have determined just how much gold should be held to meet the situation. Roughly speaking, as the hon. member said a moment ago, forty per cent is regarded as a reasonable coverage for the issue of paper money. All paper money issued, as will be observed by looking at the paper itself, says that the Dominion of Canada promises to pay to the bearer on demand the face value of the bill. We will take a hundred dollar bill; the promise is that on presentation of the bill at a particular point the country will provide $100 in gold. The practice of the banking world has established beyond question that if we had the normal movement of trade and exchange there would be no difficulty in meeting every demand that might be made upon the central authority for gold. That is the reason the coverage is not dollar for dollar. If money is circulating and revolving in the hands of traders and discharging its normal and proper functions there is no inclination on the part of the traders to ask for gold except for specific purposes, such as for use in the arts, or where tenders must be made, or where international obligations must be met under terms of contract that compel the production of gold either in bullion or in coin to discharge the obligations. Forty per cent is regarded as a reasonable ratio of metal coverage for the paper money issued, and it is believed that if normal conditions prevailed this process could be kept going interminably.

The very essence of the value of the promise on the bill that the dominion will pay on demand is convertibility into something that has a known international value. If that thought is once in our minds I think we will have no difficulty in following what I desire to say during the balance of this short statement. Convertibility into what? Into gold, because gold is a medium of international exchange that can be relied upon as a universal and fixed standard in every country of the world. That is what is meant by the fact that all countries have had what in theory we call the gold standard, because it is the standard that thus far has been fixed by mankind for universal values between nations. Convertibility, therefore, has become the essence of the issue of paper money, and convertibility means convertibility into something available to meet international charges or obligations however they may arise, whether in the form of contracts by the nation itself or in the form of trade balances that may arise by reason of an excess of purchases over sales.

I forget how long ago this was started, because I have not looked into the matter carefully for some time, but we gradually provided that our metal coverage should be what it now is, namely par over $50,000,000, and that amount of $50,000,000 was an arbitrary figure. The hon. member for West Edmonton asked whether that was so. It was not always $50,000,000; that figure was fixed by parliament, and it was felt that having regard to the practice of banking and the call for conversion that figure would meet any demand that might be made on the basis of convertibility, and of twenty-five cents on the dollar to convert. It might have been, and at one time it was, a smaller figure, but with the expansion of the country, the undesirability of men carrying gold instead of bills, the undesirability and practice of keeping gold in safes instead of bills, and what you might call convenience in business, it was felt that the figure might be fixed at $50,000,000, and that twenty-five cents on the dollar in gold up to that figure would meet what you might call the reasonable demands of trade and commerce.

Mr. MALCOLM: Would the Prime Minister state whether or not it had an adverse effect upon our exchange at that time?

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to say that this was a gradual change. I dare say my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer), who has been giving a good deal of attention to this question, could trace that change better than I could. There came a time when, having fixed $50,000,000 as the maximum for which a coverage of twenty-five per cent, which is a very low coverage, should be provided, the question was asked, what about more if it is required? We did what the great banks of the world have done since time immemorial; we decided by statute that there should be a gold dollar behind every paper dollar issued in excess of that amount; that is, that every paper bill should have behind it full coverage for its face value.

That is the history of the currency issue, but during the war we were confronted with difficulties and the government of that day, with the aid of the War Measures Act and subsequently by statute, issued $26,000,000 of paper in payment of obligations, just as my hon. friend mentioned, for which there was no coverage at all, and for which there is no coverage now. In that regard let me direct the attention of the committee to the fact that in the post office savings bank the coverage required is only ten per cent. Why do we require only ten per cent for a savings bank and either twenty-five per cent or full coverage in our ordinary currency? The reason is that one is a savings bank and the other is not. In the one case notice is required and time is given thereby in order to provide whatever money may be necessary for the purpose of meeting the obligations. That is the real reason why it is ten per cent in the one case and twenty-five per cent and one hundred per cent in the other case.

Of course I can only speak from the inferences that others have drawn, because obviously I am not an authority or an economist, but the right hon. leader of the opposition will remember that his old preceptor, in his book on tariffs, said that it is very difficult for anyone to say that a given result followed from a given cause when dealing with tariffs. He says that you can say inferentially that this is so, but that it is very difficult to prove it.

Mr. YOUNG: We have the proof now.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, there are differences of opinion as to that. But with respect to the $26,000,000 of paper money issued by this country, naturally I have inquired, as I fancy other hon. members of this committee have inquired, as to what has been the general effect of that action. I am informed that this at once had an injurious effect upon our credit, but that owing to war conditions the full force of it was not felt, though it was a substantial factor, as I shall presently show, in fixing exchange values for our money. I give that obviously not as an opinion of my own that has any value, but from information I have ascertained from sources to which one looks for real information with respect to a matter of that kind. Therefore all these years our currency is inflated by $26,000,000 under the authority of the statute of 1915. Every fall, during the grain crop movement, we have inflated our currency.

Mr. MALCOLM: The 40 per cent coverage does not cover that amount.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I tried to make it clear that the $67,000,000 paper money is not covered by gold deposits. During the fall we have sometimes, under the provisions of the Finance Act, issued money to the extent, if my memory serves me correctly, of upwards of $100,000,000. What did that mean? It meant merely that under the provisions of our statute by which the Dominion of Canada becomes a central bank, the banks of the country, by depositing with the Minister of Finance or with his agencies in the cities in which agencies are maintained, bonds, usually of the dominion, or securities to which a fixed value has been attached by order in council, were lent by the dominion in paper, promises to pay of the dominion, sufficient money to enable them to meet the situation. The movement of this money in normal times never suggested any demand for conversion into gold, but in the narrow sense of the term it was inflation; in the wide sense of the term it was fiduciary currency issued upon the security of the securities held by the banks, namely, bonds or whatever they might be. Commercial paper might be and is permissible.

There is a conflict of opinion among bankers in this and other countries and individuals as to the value of a central bank as distinguished from the Finance department for the purpose of making such an arrangement. The arrangement, whether it be by a finance department or a central bank, is the same, that by deposits with the central authority, whether it be a central bank or the dominion, of certain approved securities, the central reserve authority, or the nation, as the case may be, issues its notes which at once go into circulation for the purpose of discharging the real function of money. That is the story prior to this moment.

Mr. COOTE: In most cases is the security which the banks give to the government not the government's own bonds?

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member for Macleod was following me, I said the bonds of the country or of the provinces, sometimes municipal bonds and sometimes commercial paper. There is a regulation which, of course, is embodied in an order in council, whereby fixed values for the purposes of advances are established upon these securities. For instance, securities of the dominion are fixed at, let us say, ninety-five; those of the provinces, say at ninety-two; other securities at ninety, and so on. These are the determining values upon which the appropriate advances are made by the central bank or by the nation in this case under the Finance Act. My colleague, the Minister of Finance, directs my attention to section 5 of part II of the Finance Act which provides:

> At any time when there is no proclamation in force under the authority of paragraph (a) of section 4 of this act, the minister may make advances to the chartered banks and to the savings banks to which the Quebec Savings Banks Act applies by the issue of dominion notes upon the pledge of the securities hereinafter mentioned:—
> (a) treasury bills, bonds, debentures or stocks of the Dominion of Canada, Great Britain, any province of Canada, and of any British possession;
> (b) public securities of the government of the United States?
> (c) Canadian municipal securities;
> (d) promissory notes and bills of exchange secured by documentary title to wheat, oats, rye, barley, corn, buckwheat, flax or other commodity;
> (e) promissory notes and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes and which have been used or are to be used for such purposes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any limit to the amount that may be so issued?

Mr. BENNETT: Section 6 reads:

> Such securities shall be deposited with the minister or with an assistant receiver general; and the minister may request the trustees of the central gold reserves to make a valuation of and recommendation as to the amount which in the judgment of the trustees may properly be advanced on any securities offered in pledge under this part.

That I think is the answer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No limit?

Mr. POULIOT: Not exceeding 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the matter with which the hon. member is dealing. The test, of course, is the value of the securities deposited and there is provision that the valuation may be made by an independent source.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister say who the trustees are?

Mr. BENNETT: I am not at the moment in a position to say who they are, but I think one of them is the Deputy Minister of Finance, and if my memory serves me aright, there are three or four of them. I do not carry their names in my head, but I shall ascertain so that the hon. member may have his question answered. I am not now as familiar with their names as I was a couple of years ago, but the Deputy Minister of Finance is one and I am not sure, but my memory is that there is some officer connected with the banks and other officers whose judgment is supposed to be independent with respect to valuations. The valuation is established by order in council issued in the first instance on a recommendation from the treasury board. The real contest in this country between individuals as to whether or not we should have a central bank is predicated entirely upon whether the machinery that is now provided by which the nation itself becomes a central issuing authority, is equal to every demand that may be made upon it, or as might be provided by a central bank, such as that set up, for instance, by the United States under their Federal Reserve Act. In that act you have the various twelve divisions in which there are central reserve banks and those banks have power to issue national reserve bills which all of us have seen, instead of those we issue, namely the promise of the nation itself to pay. Under our central bank authority the Dominion of Canada issues its bills to the banks that deposit with it their securities pledged for the support of the advances thus made. Under the other authority you have your securities pledged or lodged with the central reserve bank in Cleveland or New York or Chicago or Minneapolis, and against that the governing authority issues the bills of the central reserve bank. Up to that point the distinction, and difference, if I might say so, are merely this: that in the one instance the question is whether a purely political body, namely, the government of the country, which is purely a political body, should have a control of the central bank or whether such a bank should be divorced entirely from what one might call political control and be placed in the hands of what, after all, are officers named and appointed by the government itself, for the governor of the central reserve bank is in the last analysis a political appointee; he is appointed by the president and his appointment confirmed by the Senate. Therefore, in a broad and general sense he is selected by the dominant political party.

In England the governor of the Bank of England is elected by the court of directors; the court of directors is elected by the shareholders and the shareholders are anybody who may desire to purchase shares of the Bank of England on the open market. But the relationship between the Bank of England and the treasury are so close by reason of the operation of statutes, some of which are hundreds of years old, there has grown up a practice, that you might almost say that the Bank of England is always close to the government of the day. Its operations are, if not controlled by, usually in conformity with the general views entertained and maintained by the government of the day. It will be recalled that Viscount Snowden, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Bank of England went off the gold standard in 1931, indicated that payments should continue on Saturday until closing time at noon or one o'clock, although it was clear that the bank was unable to meet all demands on Friday afternoon. It was felt that that would give a breathing space before Monday morning in which to deal with the situation. It will be within the memory of this house that the Bank of England statute to which my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) referred went further than I think at the moment he indicated, because it indemnified the Bank of England for the illegal action taken during that period. The reason was obvious.

The question put by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) is the question that will always be put as long as you have a system which is based upon universal experience and practice. Why is it that we ever had any idea of maintaining gold coverage at all? I endeavoured to say that the reason was that the creditor always decides how his debt is to be paid, and when he says that his debt is to be paid in gold, you have to pay it in gold or you do not meet his terms, which means that you do not do business with him, or if you do not pay the debt, you default. The creditor has the right to determine how his debtor shall discharge his obligation, it being the duty of the debtor, our courts have said, to seek out his creditor and discharge his obligation.

If you do not have a universal standard of value, some one commodity that is worth one hundred cents on the dollar in China and worth one hundred cents on the dollar in Australia, unless it is worth one hundred per cent in every part of the world in terms of the currency of that particular part of the world, it is not a medium of universal value. Now gold has been selected for that purpose.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. COOTE: Might I ask the Prime Minister if he is now speaking of international creditors or internal creditors?

Mr. BENNETT: I am just starting to deal with the international side of it to show its relation to the internal side.

That being so, it follows—this is the experience of the commercial world at any rate—that if within a country you have no such common standard, no such universal measuring yardstick, you are bound to have a greatly depreciated currency, depreciated from the value of the standard, and depreciated in terms of the currency of your creditor if you have to pay him in accordance with the terms of the standard. That looks so reasonable as not to require much argument.

What Canada might do with respect to her currency if she did not owe a dollar outside of this country is a matter for Canada to determine, and nobody else. One of the reasons the United States can do what she pleases with respect to gold at the moment is that she has no external creditors to whom she must pay. People owe her; she does not owe them. But when you reverse the process and have a country that has to provide for the payment of its debts in other countries a different situation arises. I am going to point out to my hon. friend from Macleod that he is not right in saying that they provide payment of the debts in gold because if they did there would not be enough gold to go around for very long, but they pay in terms of gold; I think that is the position he intended to take. Now that gold is provided either by services which must be payable in terms of the currency of the creditor country and therefore go at par to satisfy the debt, or it is provided in goods payable in the same terms to satisfy the debt due by the debtor to the creditor country, or it must be paid in gold itself. That is the reason we have been shipping one million dollars' worth of gold at one time and another million dollars' worth of gold at another time to New York. That is the reason why the sixty million odd dollars of gold in this country played so large a part last year in sustaining the credit of the country. The Dominion of Canada paid for the gold the price it would bring in the United States, and then we shipped the yellow metal itself down to the United States where it went to the central reserve bank, and from that bank issued gold certificates which paid the debts of this country, the interest on our debts, the interest owed by the provinces, and matters of that kind.

You might ask, why should what we do here as to metal coverage have any effect upon our international situation? That again is a question that you can only answer in the light of what the experience of the world has been. I cannot answer that; I do not know anybody who can. But we know what the experience of mankind has been when you use a currency in your own country that has no convertibility into any standard that is useful in discharging your obligations in other countries. Your currency can then only be used in your own country, and what it is worth in any other country is a matter of conjecture and guess. That is the story. Whether there is anything in it or not, whether, as my hon. friend says, if you come down to the ultimate analysis you find that that is all nonsense, I can only say in reply that the history of mankind has been this, and you do not have to take my assertion—you can read any standard book upon the history of it—that if there is no value that can be put upon a Canadian one dollar bill in terms of a universal standard or yardstick of measurement or value, at once there is a direct reflection upon the value of the obligations of a country that owes money in other countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is all a matter of confidence.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. My right hon. friend has anticipated what I was going to add. It therefore follows that it is confidence plus something. I heard Sir Josiah Stamp say here what most of you will remember, that mankind had not yet reached that state of confidence in one another where they were prepared in one country to accept in confidence the promise to pay of another country at par of the country in which the debt was being discharged, and he said it would probably be some time before that condition came about. I dare say that some hon. gentlemen will remember what he said in that connection.

I am sorry to be so long about this, but I put this to the committee. There, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has said, is a dollar bill which in Canada passes for one hundred cents. When it goes across to the United States they say, "We are not prepared to give one hundred cents for that dollar because we have not confidence in the mere promise to pay unbacked by security that it will pay one hundred cents for that dollar."

Mr. MALCOLM: In gold.

Mr. BENNETT: No, gold does not come in at the moment. I am just trying to establish my position by steps. Gold has been selected as the universal standard of measurement. It might have been platinum, but gold has been selected as what is to be deposited in the country of issue to give value, in confidence, in the country that accepts your money in payment of your obligations. I go to the United States to pay a one thousand dollar debt, and I produce a one thousand dollar bill of the Dominion of Canada and hand it to my creditor. He has a bond of this country, and the time has come to pay. I hand him my one thousand dollar bill. Every Canadian says that that one thousand dollar bill is just as good as his one thousand dollar bill.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Better.

Mr. BENNETT: There you have it at once. I have been trying to point out, and I am afraid that I have not succeeded as I should have liked, that confidence in the Dominion of Canada by a people who are not Canadians is essential to make our one thousand bill worth one thousand dollars to them. If their confidence is lacking, then the bill is worth just what their lack of confidence gives as its value—nothing more or less. We must remember that this is not so old a matter as to be lost in the cloudland of doubt and conjecture—this fixing of the value of gold is of comparatively recent origin, and in my judgment there is nothing to hinder nations meeting together and determining that gold should have a different value from what it now has. Remember that the value of gold was fixed when the population of the world was less numerous than it now is, and when the conditions of trade and commerce were entirely different from what they are to-day. But there must be some universal recognition of a standard. There must in addition be something more than that. There must be a recognition by confidence that a mere inconvertible promise to pay, of a people, expressed on a piece of paper has equal value to the people to whom it is tendered as has their own promise to pay of an equal amount.

Mr. MALCOLM: Will the Prime Minister answer this question: If it is based on a metal coverage, and not entirely upon confidence, why in heaven's name should we accept eight silver certificates for one ten dollar Canadian gold bill?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not get the question.

Mr. MALCOLM: On the exchange market to-day we accept eight American one dollar bills, which are simply promises to pay in silver, silver certificates, for a ten dollar Canadian bill, which is a promise to pay in gold. It must be a matter of confidence, altogether.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is not confidence altogether. The question of silver has something to do with the practice. It will be within the memory of hon. members that by statute of the congress of the United States it is provided that either $360,000,000 or $420,000,000—I am not just sure of the figure—could be minted in silver for which there would be a paper certificate issued indicating on its face that there has been deposited in the treasury of the United States so many silver dollars as against that paper. I made inquiries in that connection. Certainly anyone who receives a silver certificate in times like this would ask himself why it is that a silver certificate should be worth $1.10 in Ottawa, when the silver dollar for which you would exchange it in the United States was only worth something like forty-three cents in actual metal value.

My informant in the United States told me that in practice they redeem them in gold.

Mr. MALCOLM: They are not bound to, though.

Mr. BENNETT: But he said they were bound to retain their gold standard position. That is the answer, or that is the story as told to me, because I desired to have the matter cleared up for my own satisfaction.

Now let us get back to the point we were discussing. If a country issues paper money in which it promises to pay the sum indicated on the paper that is issued, and that is without security, it is worth in your own country just what you determine—probably the face value of the paper itself. It is worth abroad just what the confidence in that inconvertible promise to pay gives to it. Sir Josiah Stamp said—and I can but repeat what he said, because I do not pretend to know, that man had not reached that stage of perfection in which he was prepared in one country to have such confidence in that inconvertible promise to pay as to value it at its indicated value in all countries.

Mr. EULER: Who fixes the degree of confidence of the other country? Isn't it the bankers?

Mr. BENNETT: Recent events seem to show that is not so.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is trusting metal rather than men.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. BENNETT: Undoubtedly that is so. And, undoubtedly, as the hon. gentleman has said, that has been so for ages. Not for twenty-five, thirty, fifty or even hundreds of years, but it has been so for ages. That is the reason we have our whole banking system. The whole basis of it is that. And the fact that man was moving from place to place, and for that reason must carry with him his own currency—doing that has created that measure of lack of confidence which induced, for instance, the paymasters of the British army always to carry gold sovereigns in their chests and not paper money. Why? Because the sovereign was worth in the country in which it was paid out to soldier, sailor or anybody else its par value always, or more, in the currency of the country in which it was paid. That is the reason.

We cannot get beyond the fundamental basis of the whole business of currency, and that is this, that mankind saw fit to issue paper as being more convenient to handle and deal with than metal, for the purpose of disposing of obligations and debts, and for trade facilities. He did not base it entirely upon confidence. If he had based it entirely upon confidence the trade of the world would have been sadly disturbed by now, would it not? History has taught at least that you cannot rely upon confidence alone. And it is international agreement and arrangement among nations of the world that determine to what extent confidence shall be supported by something else. Confidence plus is what gives value to my dollar in New York to-day.

Mr. MALCOLM: How much good was the "plus" in the case of Russia?

Mr. BENNETT: What does the hon. member mean?

Mr. MALCOLM: How much good was it? Russia had gold behind her currency before the revolution.

Mr. BENNETT: Her money before the revolution was good money, in London, Paris or anywhere.

Mr. MALCOLM: What good was the "plus" when Russia upset its government?

Mr. BENNETT: She destroyed the "plus"; that is the reason, exactly, that it had little value—because she destroyed the "plus." I wish to make clear to the committee that I am only voicing my own conclusions which have been based on fairly extensive inquiries that I have made when I have met men who were in a position to give me information. I have been told by a great many men from many countries, and it is my own conclusion, for what it may be worth, that so far as a country's own domestic currency is concerned, it is true that if we were on an isolated island and had no one to think of, except our own people, so far as currency is concerned we could use iron ringers. But as the loud applause by hon. members opposite in this house indicated the other day, we realize no man liveth unto himself, and no people can live entirely unto themselves. Therefore, the iron ringers have sometimes to go into other countries. And when they go into other countries, while they may not be in the form of iron ringers, but in the form of an oblong piece of paper containing the words "Dominion of Canada will pay to the bearer on demand" so much money, what does it mean? How will they pay it? If the answer is "I will give you another piece of paper," the reply is: "My confidence is not sufficiently strong for that, and although I like that country well, and like its people, I have got to have something more than that, because there are times in which nations have been known to repudiate their obligations." That is the reason that even those in this committee who are not capitalists—and I take it there are very few—if they desire to lend money they very often require an endorser on the back of the note. And if they go to borrow from a friend very frequently it is suggested that an endorser would not be out of place, and that guarantors might be of assistance. Sometimes they have been known to ask for the deposit of securities for the purpose of securing obligations. That is what is meant by the "plus" to confidence. The plus enables us to expect our paper money to be worth something more than its mere weight of paper in the markets of the world.

Mr. COOTE: In regard to obligations payable in Canada from one private person to another, if they are stated to be payable in gold, would dominion notes be legal tender for settlement of that obligation?

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say to the hon. member for Macleod that it is difficult for one to become an adviser on a doubtful question of law. I prefer not to express an opinion until the courts determine exactly what it does mean. This is a matter which has to be litigated by the courts? I am only a lawyer, not a judge, and therefore I am unable to speak with authority upon the point.

The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) has handed me a statute showing the change from 1886 to 1933:

> The amount of dominion notes issued and outstanding at any time may, by order in council, founded on a report of the treasury board, be increased to, but shall not exceed twenty million dollars, by amounts not exceeding one million dollars at one time, and not exceeding four million dollars in any one year: Provided that the Minister of Finance and Receiver General shall always hold, for securing the redemption of such notes issued and outstanding, an amount in gold, or in gold and Canada securities guaranteed by the government of the United Kingdom, equal to not less than twenty-five per cent of the amount of such notes,—at least fifteen per cent of the total amount of such notes being so held in gold; and provided also, that the said minister shall always hold for the redemption of such notes an amount equal to the remaining seventy-five per cent of the total amount thereof, in dominion debentures issued by authority of parliament.

That was passed in 1880. So that between 1880 and 1933—or as a matter of fact the last amendment I think was made in 1927—you have a statement of the gradual change that has taken place in what I might call the necessity for adding to confidence something other than confidence.

Mr. MALCOLM: But the Prime Minister does not answer the question. I may have expressed myself badly, if so I am sorry. An interest bearing security which has no metal coverage, namely a bond, having nothing but the confidence of the holder of the bond in New York that we will fulfil our obligation, seems to be more valuable than that which has the metal coverage.

Mr. BENNETT: But the one is a promise to pay in gold at 100 cents on the dollar, the other has a metal coverage which amounts to about 40 cents on the dollar. That is exactly the reason. The reason our bonds sold in New York had to be expressed in terms of gold was just what the hon. gentleman has now drawn attention to. A dollar bill, which is a demand bond we will say, has behind it forty per cent of gold, but the promise of the bond is to pay the whole amount at maturity in gold coin of the current weight and fineness.

Mr. EULER: But the dollar bill is a promise to pay the whole dollar as well.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the confidence in the one is in the good faith of the promissor to pay in terms of his promise.

Mr. EULER: In terms of New York funds.

Mr. BENNETT: And in the case of bonds you have the history and practice of centuries, which have given to them a value dependent upon what people regard as the general condition of the country that emits or issues the bonds. This country at the present moment has reached a margin of borrowing which under the ordinary rules that govern, according to the books, is almost its maximum borrowing power, unless you have a rapidly increasing population or great natural resources that are being rapidly developed. That is the reason that the increase in gold production in this country has added relatively so greatly to confidence in the country. And the reason is obvious.

Now take the case of constructing the building. I have very little doubt that the issue of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 additional paper currency by this country would not greatly prejudice its currency.

Mr. EULER: Under statutory control.

Mr. BENNETT: Issued under statute, as this was. But it will be observed that on the very threshold of the issue of paper we are not keeping to what is called sound banking practice. That practice, not national, but international, is that there should not be paper issued unless there is some provision for its payment. That is the reason why sinking funds were so strongly urged by Pitt as being a sound basis of the country's borrowing, and the reason that sinking funds in domestic issues of bonds are regarded so highly. If we issued $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 of our promises to pay by statutory authority I do not think it would greatly hurt—

Mr. MALCOLM: We have issued $67,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, $68,000,000.

Mr. EULER: May I ask a question at this point? The Prime Minister has stated that there was some $67,000,000 of federal currency issued during the war for which there is no gold coverage whatever. I would like to ask whether the $67,000,000 so issued is identifiable in the hands of the public, and if it is not, if it is merely part of the general issue, whether our coverage is not a great deal less than forty per cent?

Mr. BENNETT: Last year I pointed out that fact to this committee. There is no difference between the thousand dollar bill issued under the act of 1915 and the thousand dollar bill issued under the Currency Act. And as bankers put it to me, one of the factors that reduced the value of our currency is the effect of these outstanding obligations in lessening the amount of metal coverage. But there are differences of opinion about that. There are gentlemen in this committee who say that that cannot be so. I am only saying that the inquiry I have made—and like everyone else in this house I am dependent for my information on the inquiries I make—my information is that the depreciation in value of our dollar is traceable to the fact that we had inflated our currency by $68,000,000, which reduced the coverage beyond the point mentioned in the statute, so that instead of it being twenty-five per cent up to $50,000,000 and dollar for dollar thereafter we have an average coverage at this moment of forty per cent.

Mr. EULER: But since that $67,000,000 was issued some fifteen or sixteeen years ago our money has been at par.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely it has.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Before the Prime Minister continues, may I ask this question: for the past twelve or fifteen years at least, every fall banks come to the treasury and secure additional currency on the deposit of securities. That has had no appreciable effect upon exchange.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is entirely right about that. And I have tried to indicate the reason why. It is all predicated upon—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The requirements of business.

Mr. BENNETT: Not only upon the requirements of business, but as the business is completed the withdrawal of the money from circulation is ensured. Therefore it is a temporary movement of money, and it is secured by such ample security that no question as to its value could arise.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In that connection I want to ask this other question; that security, or the proceeds of it have been in circulation before?

Mr. BENNETT: No, not the proceeds of the security.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, yes. These securities that are deposited by the banks are securities against which currency has been issued.

Mr. BENNETT: No, they are bonds that the banks buy. If the hon. gentleman will take the bank returns, the last one, and look at the assets he will find under the appropriate column the amounts of dominion government and provincial government securities; Canadian municipal securities; British, foreign and colonial public securities other than Canadian; and railway and other bonds, debentures and stocks; in all some $700,000,000 odd.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am speaking particularly of Canadian securities. But I do not want to divert the discussion in that direction, I merely ask whether or not the inflation, if you may call it such, affected our exchange?

Mr. BENNETT: It affected our exchange in this sense. As long as we were doing business necessitating the release of currency in order that the business might be transacted there was no question of depreciation because it was largely an internal matter, and the balances that arose took care of the situation at the time of maturity. But I was going a step further. What happened in 1929? We had $40,000,000 due in New York. How did we pay it? The late Mr. Robb paid it with gold shipped from this country, substantially that. And from that moment this country ceased to be on the gold standard. That is the position.

Mr. YOUNG: Because we paid in gold?

Mr. BENNETT: No, because we depleted our gold coverage, lessened the amount of gold we had for the purpose of meeting our obligations, under the Finance Act or otherwise. I can only say this, that as far as the issue of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 in paper money by statute is concerned, it would not affect the credit of this country, technically. In reality it would greatly affect it, as it did in 1915. If one will take the trouble to look at what happened during the war, when enormous quantities of goods were being sent out of this country, creating favourable balances, one will realize how easy it was to emit these sums of money at that time without affecting the national credit structure. But when there is a depression throughout the world, such as there is to-day, you have exactly that situation developed that curbs and lessens your ability to do it without affecting the whole credit structure. I had a letter the other day from a gentleman who said this to me: "I have this matter completely arranged. All you need do is just simply tell everyone holding the $2,500,000,000 of Canadian bonds that you will hand them Dominion of Canada bills, and that will stop interest at once." The committee smiles; but as you see, this man had in his mind the same idea, carried to the extreme, as the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Bruce.

Mr. MALCOLM: Quite a different idea.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly the same.

Mr. MALCOLM: No. The Prime Minister will pardon me if I say that it was a different idea that I advanced, for this reason. We issued $68,000,000 of treasury notes for the complete destruction of property. There was nothing left of the property for which the notes were issued—no assets whatever. In the case of using the credit of the nation to issue currency instead of bonds for construction you decrease the cost to the taxpayers of the public building, and when you have spent the money you have a physical asset, the property of the dominion, which represents something for the money that has been spent and which will be redeemed through taxation by statutory enactment over a shorter period of years than if interest rates were charged.

Mr. BENNETT: It is entirely erroneous to say that the issue of money in this country was for non-physical assets. I think it should be at once explained that the money issued in connection with the expansion of our currency in 1915 was to the railways; and so far as—

Mr. MALCOLM: I thought it was war purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that was for railways. When you come to the question of money issued for war purposes, I think the hon. member for West Edmonton, who made the statement, will realize that instead of being injurious so far as we in this country were concerned, it was the basis of expansion of our industrial development. Every shell order that came to this country served that purpose, and so did every munitions order and every order for wheat. Everything of that kind meant a permanent addition to the wealth of the country.

Mr. EULER: Over-expansion in many cases.

Mr. BENNETT: I wholly agree with the hon. member in that regard, but it did represent tangible assets. Now, I was going to answer the question which the hon. gentleman put to me—the last question—with regard to putting up a public building for six or seven million dollars. I dare say it will come as nothing new to him when I say that I discussed with the Minister of Public Works the question whether it might not be possible under certain conditions to do the very thing that has been suggested. Then I discussed it with others, not in this country but in other countries, and they informed me that in their opinion—it is an opinion of course—a small sum of money would not perceptibly affect the credit of this country; but, to use the words of the right hon. gentleman opposite a moment ago, reflecting the same thing Sir Josiah Stamp had said upstairs, the minute you do that you have lessened the degree of confidence which people have in this piece of paper.

Mr. MALCOLM: You have improved the farm on which they have a mortgage.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not so. All these cases consist of adjustments between advantages and disadvantages. In the ultimate analysis, whoever is responsible for the government of this country has to weigh every advantage that would come from carrying out the course suggested. There are these disadvantages: the effect in lack of confidence; the effect in depreciation; the effect in deteriorating the values of the things with which we have to pay in terms of creditors' demands upon us. On the other hand, you have the accumulation of the advantages that accrue to the nation: non-payment of interest; the effect of the retirement of securities over a given period of time, resulting in the asset created by money being free from encumbrances after the expiration of a certain number of years. And after you have weighed all the advantages and the disadvantages you must come to a conclusion, which in my judgment must be a conclusion that is consonant with general world currents of thought.

I do not believe that the ten and a quarter or ten and a half millions of people on the northern half of this continent, living side by side with the richest nation in the world, carrying on business in a given way, can afford to depart from generally orthodox views with respect to financial matters, when we have obligations aggregating so large an amount payable abroad. One of our insurance companies has a billion dollars at risk in the United States. We have, in the Canadian National, guaranteed securities amounting, not to millions but hundreds of millions, all held by people on this continent in the United States. Our own national debt to the extent of hundreds of millions is thus held.

The problem is one that is simple yet complex; simple because the factors are known, complex because you cannot value those factors. I cannot place a value in terms upon the injurious effect which there would be upon the issue of new dollars by this country, upon all the hundreds of millions of bonds outstanding. I cannot say with absolute certainty, nor with anything approximating such certainty, just what destruction of confidence would come about through emitting bills of that character in Canada. Can anyone? Has anyone the vision to make such a prediction?

I have been fair enough to say that I am not one of those who believe that there are not honest doubts in the minds of some people. There are doubts in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, who entertain an entirely different opinion from mine. But weighing the advantages against the disadvantages, the benefits against the injuries, it is my conviction, and my profound conviction, that if we are to maintain our structure intact against any attacks that may be made upon it from all sides, not purposely, but attacks in effect, we cannot do so unless we maintain to the uttermost that confidence in our promise to pay which is involved in our attorning to the general principles that have governed man in seeking security when he asks for payment, whether it be in his own money or in the money of another country, and insists that there shall be something more than the good faith of individuals to support his confidence, and that his confidence is placed in something tangible rather than in mere faith in mankind itself.

Mr. POULIOT: I have listened attentively to the Prime Minister and I understand that, according to the figure he has given the house, the promises of the Dominion government to pay in currency amount to $175,000,000, and that in rough figures $70,000,000 of these promises are covered by gold. The Prime Minister said also that $68,000,000 had no coverage in gold. Therefore we have legalized our statutory inflation, because if, according to the law now in force, dominion notes shall be redeemable in gold, there must be a sufficient amount of gold in the treasury to redeem every one of them; and if it has been accepted by the law that redemption should be made only on the basis of forty per cent, then we have inflation to the extent of sixty per cent. I will ask the Minister of Finance to correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that theoretically and practically we are now on the gold basis, whereas if this bill passes I am under the impression that while theoretically we may remain on the gold basis, that will not be so practically. As soon as the governor in council suspends the operation of the existing subsection for any such period or periods as he may deem desirable, dominion notes will be no longer redeemable in gold. So I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether dominion notes will be redeemable during such periods of time and, if so, how they will be redeemed.

Mr. RHODES: Assuming this bill passed and an order in council were passed by virtue of it, it would mean that the individual with a dominion note would not be able to demand gold. My hon. friend will realize that even under our legislation as it exists to-day, by the provisions of the Finance Act we can make notes legal tender. So a man would merely change one kind of note for another kind.

Mr. POULIOT: But if I understand the minister correctly those notes are issued for circulation and not for redemption. They are issued as a convenience in business, so that they may be easily transferred from one individual to another or from one firm to another; they are backed by the credit of the dominion but have no gold behind them.

Mr. RHODES: We will still have to provide the amount of gold called for under our existing legislation.

Mr. POULIOT: That is forty per cent?

Mr. RHODES: We have that to-day, and under our statutes we would have to keep that amount, but assuming that this bill becomes law and we pass an order in council under it, then an individual could not come and ask for gold for legal tender; he could only get dominion notes.

Mr. POULIOT: He would get other dominion notes?

Mr. RHODES: That is all.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I imagine we have had inflation in this country since parliament approved of the issue of $68,000,000 in notes with no gold coverage. With regard to inflation, as the Prime Minister has said there is usually some sort of inflation every fall, due to the fact that the law authorizes the banks to issue notes, during the movement of the wheat crop, to the extent of fifteen per cent of their total note issue. Bankers have told me that last year the banks did not ask the minister for permission to issue those extra notes, that the money in circulation was sufficient to meet the need. The right hon. Prime Minister also said that if the Canadian dollar is not on some international basis some difficulty might ensue. I am not familiar with all the economists who have written on this subject; I try to keep a clear mind, but it strikes me that gold is used to regularize the exchange of trade, and if, as the Prime Minister has said, we have reached the limit of our borrowing power, it means that other countries have lost confidence in Canada, which is very serious. The Prime Minister in his speech also said that if we cannot pay in gold we must pay in terms of gold. As the right hon. gentleman spoke in rather a low tone I could not catch the first definition he gave in regard to terms of gold, but in the second place he mentioned goods.

Mr. RHODES: The first was service.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. The first was service, the second goods, and the third gold. The Prime Minister may be quite right in this respect, but gold is used to regularize exchanges, and when there are no more exchanges and our foreign trade is falling, the value of currency falls accordingly. May I remind you, sir, that during a debate that took place some days ago I asked the hon. member for Macleod if inflation would be necessary if the tariff were not so high. The hon. gentleman, who is the official financial critic of the group in the corner, answered that if tariff barriers were lowered to normal there would be no need for inflation. The right hon. gentleman spoke about normalcy. When our trade was normal the Canadian dollar was above par.

I will not discuss the question at greater length, but I would suggest to the right hon. Prime Minister and the government that they reconsider their tariff policies, and then there will be no need for legislation such as we have before us to-day.

Mr. IRVINE: A few minutes ago I directed a question to the Prime Minister, and I should be glad if he would be kind enough to answer it now, because I want to make sure I understood exactly what he was saying in this connection. I understood him to say that our Canadian bonds were worth more than our Canadian dollars, because there was only 40 per cent of gold behind the dollar and the bond was worth 100 cents. I wish to make my question a little clearer. Canadian bonds held by citizens of the United States amount to a great deal more than all the dollar bills we have in this country, and we have only 40 per cent of gold behind our dollar bills. How then could we have 100 per cent behind our bonds? It seems to me that in that case the bondholders would have confidence in neither our dollar nor our bond.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid my hon. friend misunderstood me if he understood what he indicates he did. I said that they had 100 per cent confidence in our ability to pay the bond in conformity with its terms, which meant payment in gold.

Mr. IRVINE: My point was that we have less chance of paying these bonds in gold than we have of redeeming the dollar in gold; because we have only 40 per cent gold behind our dollar and not nearly that behind the bonds.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact that so far we have paid fully all our obligations in the terms of the contract is in itself sufficient reason for the confidence that we shall continue to do so, and to the extent that that confidence lessens, to the same extent does the value of the bonds lessen in the markets of the world. But because thus far that confidence has not been destroyed, our bonds have been selling on the terms to which the hon. member has referred, plus of course the interest provision which naturally adds to the value of the security.

Mr. SPENCER: Has a dominion bond payable in gold in Canada been paid in gold during the last eighteen months?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a question which, as I indicated to the hon. member for Macleod, I would prefer not to endeavour to answer. There is a decision of Judge Farwell in Great Britain in the last few months and another decision of an English court indicating clearly that the exact words of the instrument will determine the question of liability. In the case before Judge Farwell, the wording was such that, in his judgment—and I do not know whether it has been appealed or not—it enabled the obligation under the bond to be paid in English pounds of depreciated value. I cannot express a legal opinion on a matter of that kind.

Mr. REID: I have listened very attentively to the information given to the committee, not that I am interested in what the people of the United States get on exchange from this country, but because I think, like other members, our dollar is just as good as that of the United States. Last fall a United States citizen came into Vancouver and for his $10 bill, which was a promise to pay, he received $11.88; for his silver money he received a premium of nine per cent. But when he tendered a $10 gold piece, all he was offered was ten Canadian dollars. I have always been puzzled why the promise to pay was worth 18 per cent and the silver dollar worth nine per cent, while the article itself was worth only par in Canadian money. Could the Prime Minister explain that?

Mr. BENNETT: That is very easily answered. Let me tell the hon. member for New Westminster of my own experience. On one occasion I went to Geneva to attend a convention and under the circumstances I thought it highly desirable that I should have some gold with me. Accordingly I took a few $20 gold pieces. I found, however, much to my surprise, that £5 Bank of England notes were worth relatively more than the gold. Naturally I began to ask why. The answer in the first instance was that it was much more costly to convert the $20 gold piece into the value into which the bank or commercial house might want it to be converted for use than it was to put a £5 note into an envelope and mail it away. That is one reason; but as regards the incident in Vancouver last fall, referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Reid), the answer is this: You could not send the gold out of the country without a licence, and the cost of a licence at that time was the premium on gold. Therefore there was no force in giving more for the gold than its face value.

Mr. REID: That is what the banker told the man; he said: "You might as well leave it here, because we have a law against exporting gold."

Mr. COOTE: The story related by the hon. member for New Westminster shows the absurdity of the present situation. It all arises because the Prime Minister in September, 1931, refused to suspend redemption in gold, but chose to prohibit the export of gold, and through arbitrary measures, I think extra-legally, to refuse to pay out on demand, gold for dominion notes. The law clearly entitled the holder of a dominion note to get gold for it, but certain instructions were issued from the office of the Minister of Finance at that time to the receivers general throughout Canada that they were not to pay out gold on demand without permission from Ottawa. A friend of mine went to the Assistant Receiver General in Calgary in October, 1931, and asked for $500 in gold to send to the United States to meet a liability which he owed there. So far as I know, there was at that time no prohibition by order in council of the export of gold, but the man was refused the gold. For that reason I think it is a proper move on the part of the Minister of Finance now to take authority to suspend redemption in gold, although the government did have authority in 1931 and refused to exercise it. One of the objections I have always taken to the policy pursued by the government under the very wide powers which were given to them under the act of 1931 is that they did not exercise this power when they should have done so.

One important question which has arisen here this afternoon is that of meeting our foreign obligations, and to what extent, if any, the value of our dollar in gold countries affects our ability to meet those obligations. First of all I want to say that the value of our dollar in New York is determined by the supply of and the demand for foreign exchange. It is decided for all practical purposes on the New York exchange market; it goes up or down according to the supply of and the demand for this exchange. The supply arises from several different sources, mainly our exports of goods which are sold for foreign exchange. The proceeds of our exports are always available to purchasers of foreign exchange. The supply of and demand for our foreign exchange are of course affected by the sale of foreign securities by Canadians or the purchase by foreigners of Canadian securities or the sale of our securities by foreigners. We have no way of controlling this. So far as confidence is concerned and the extent to which confidence affects the value of our dollar in New York, this is mainly in connection with the transfer or investment of capital, the sale and purchase of securities by people in Canada and outside, the transfers which must be made because of such transactions. Confidence after all depends upon our record in meeting our obligations. If we meet them in gold, regardless of whether we have gold behind our internal currency, that will largely determine the confidence of investors in New York. As was stated by Viscount Snowden, when England abandoned the gold standard, although they abandoned redemption of notes in gold—and I say to the Minister of Finance that he is quite correct in what he said regarding that act—they simply suspended the act until such time as the government of England might take further action by order in council. Mr. Snowden said they would continue to meet their foreign obligations in the terms in which they were due. But they did make a definite suspension of redemption in gold, so that legally the Bank of England the next day was not required to redeem its notes in gold. Canada, on the other hand, has been legally in the position of being liable to redeem its notes in gold, and we have refused to do it. If the government would grant a fiat to anyone to whom they have refused to pay out gold on demand, or if we were in the position to go to the court and get an order compelling the Receiver General of Canada to obey the provisions of the Dominion Notes Act, then I think some of the officers of the Receiver General would have to submit to imprisonment or something of that kind, or pay over the gold. The government has simply overridden the law in that respect, and it is well that the law should be changed; it should have been done eighteen months ago. Mr. Snowden in his speech said that it was not the intention of the government in England to evade meeting their foreign obligations in gold when expressed in terms of gold, and England continued to meet her obligations in terms of gold. So has Australia. Australia has abandoned gold. She has invested part of her reserves in sterling and she has met all her foreign obligations and the interest on them in gold.

Mr. BENNETT: She has ninety million pounds of floating debt.

Mr. COOTE: But her bonds are selling at a very high rate in England in spite of it.

Mr. BENNETT: The last issue was not successful.

Mr. COOTE: Australian government bonds, as I quoted from an Australian paper the other day were selling at more than par in their own country.

Mr. BENNETT: In New York Australian five per cents are 74 and comparable Canadians are between 95 and 100.

Mr. COOTE: That is not assisting Canadians to meet their foreign obligations because, as I said before, our foreign obligations are met by the export of goods which are sold for gold or foreign currency, and discriminating investors in the United States or anywhere else must look to the future to see whether we are going to continue to meet our liabilities or not. Now in order to meet our liabilities we must maintain internal prices at a level where producers can produce at a profit or at all events get the cost of production. Otherwise they will go out of business, and when they cease to produce we have just that much less to export and sell and we can buy just that much less foreign exchange with which to meet our foreign obligations. If we are going to pay interest and principal on our debts outside this country we must export the goods in order to get the gold to pay over to the holder of the bonds.

We might change our currency, change the name of our monetary unit from the dollar to something else, to clear up the confusion that is in the minds of some people. We might amend the Currency Act and change the name of the dollar to crown or shekel or some other name. To have a Canadian "crown" quoted in the United States at less than an American dollar should not alarm the people of either country. If the Canadian crown was worth only fifty cents in the United States that would not give them so much concern as if our dollar was worth only fifty cents there. Our dollar is worth one hundred cents in this country because the law makes it legal tender for that amount, but once the Canadian dollar or any other monetary unit gets outside of Canada its value is fixed in the foreign money market. It becomes a commodity, in other words, and the price of our dollar goes up and down in New York according to the law of supply and demand, just as the price of wheat in Winnipeg goes up and down depending on whether the supply or the demand is the greater.

Money is distinctly national in character. Every country has its own monetary laws and establishes its own monetary unit by law. Quoting John Maynard Keynes, from memory: "Money is that which the state may from time to time fix as legal tender for all money contracts." That is the substance of what he says, and the same idea may be got from any other writer on this subject. Knapp says in his State Theory of Money: "The soul of currency is not the material of the pieces but in the legal ordinances governing their use."

In Canada on the present basis we can have inflation amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars without issuing another dominion note. The inflation the world has suffered from in the main, the inflation from which we suffered in Canada from 1925 to 1929, and the deflation since, has all been done on practically the same amount of gold, with comparatively little change in the amount of notes issued. The thing that varies so much is the credit. On the same amount of gold we may have an increase of 25 or 30 or 40 per cent in credit, and credit is 90 per cent of the money we do business on. An inflation of 30 per cent in credit is greater than a 50 per cent increase in note circulation. Notes are a very small percentage of our money.

I am sorry that this debate came on before a return that I had moved for was brought down. It asked for the total bank loans in Canada, the total deposits, bank notes outstanding, dominion notes outstanding, advances under the Finance Act, and gold reserves in Canada. If I had that return I think I could show that the amount of bank credit outstanding, which is the bulk of our money, has varied by hundreds of millions of dollars with very small variations in the amount of gold in the treasury.

Mr. YOUNG: What caused it to shrink?

Mr. COOTE: The action of the banks.

Mr. YOUNG: What action?

Mr. COOTE: Because we were on the gold standard, and the world's goldmongers, or the world's big bankers, decided on a deflation policy, and as soon as they practised deflation we had to follow suit in Canada, or else we go off the gold standard immediately because we could not meet foreign demands for gold if we refused to deflate to the same extent that they did.

Mr. YOUNG: We are off the gold standard.

Mr. COOTE: Yes, because we cannot maintain the convertibility which the Prime Minister says is so necessary.

Mr. YOUNG: Then why the contraction if we are off the gold standard? You cannot blame the gold standard for the contraction.

Mr. COOTE: We contracted long before we went off the gold standard, and we have continued to contract ever since because we have been endeavouring to stick to the gold standard. We have not legally been off the gold standard except that we have prohibited export of gold. Our notes are legally redeemable in gold on demand, and as long as that is so we are on the gold standard, and the government is liable to deliver gold to anyone who presents notes at the office of the Receiver General. That is in the Dominion Notes Act. Of course, the government is above the law. I do not think it should be; it should obey the law. In 1914 the government was faced with a similar situation, but of course the banks were pressing the government at that time. They came to Ottawa on a Monday afternoon. The cabinet held a special meeting that night, and suspended the redemption of notes in gold, relieving the banks of the liability of meeting their obligations in legal tender, and giving them power to meet their obligations in their own notes. That was all done by order in council passed that same night. A special edition of the Canada Gazette was issued, with the printing bureau working all night, and next morning the banks were relieved of the liability of meeting their obligations in either dominion notes or gold.

Here we have gone a year and a half since England went off the gold standard, without removing that obligation to pay gold for dominion notes, and legally we have been on the gold standard all that time, but actually we have not because the government decided that they would override the Dominion Notes Act. I know that that is true, because, as I said before, I went to the Assistant Receiver General and asked him for gold, and I was refused. The minister said this afternoon that he did not think it was right to say that the government had refused gold, but a little later on I understood him to say that if the government were willing even to-day to hand out gold to everybody, the supply of gold would only last one day. The two statements do not go very well together. The Receiver General refuses to pay out gold. They handed me an application form to fill out. I regret I have not got it with me, but I hope the minister will lay one on the table so that it will be available to all the members.

Mr. YOUNG: We can all fill it out.

Mr. COOTE: Before I sit down I should like to ask the minister what reason there is for retaining this gold as a reserve for dominion notes that are issued, if we tell the people of the world: "You cannot convert these dominion notes into gold."

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must not wander too far afield.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, I am sure my question is closely connected with the subject matter of the bill. The bill has for its purpose giving the government power to suspend redemption of notes in gold. I shall take this opportunity to read it:

> Dominion notes shall be redeemable in gold on presentation at branch offices established, or at banks, with which arrangements are made for the redemption thereof as herinafter provided. The governor in council may from time to time and for such period or periods as he may deem desirable, suspend the operation of this subsection.

The question I am putting is this: If the minister is now asking for power to suspend redemption in gold what is the use of keeping the gold in the treasury? Why not take some of the $70,000,000 and meet some of our obligations with it? What is the use of keeping it there?

The CHAIRMAN: The fact that gold is kept does not alter the law. Gold has to remain there just the same.

Mr. COOTE: I am not sure whether I heard the chairman correctly, but it seemed to me that he was making an argument rather than stating a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to curtail the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. COOTE: A year ago in this house the Prime Minister, speaking of the gold held as reserve for our dominion notes, and speaking of our outside obligations, said something to the effect that we had to meet practically a million dollars a day of obligations of governments, municipalities and public corporations. I believe his words as they appear in Hansard are as follows:

> There is not enough gold to pay those all at once, but gold being a medium of exchange circulates, and in its circulation lies its value.

Referring to the hoarding of gold in Europe he said:

> Gold therefore must circulate in order to be useful. When it does not circulate the value disappears and it is no longer a medium of exchange.

As I understand it, this gold in Canada is not going to be allowed to circulate, and therefore it seems to me its value will really disappear. It will not be valuable because it will not circulate. I am asking the minister whether now, when he suspends the redemption of notes in gold, he will use some of this gold to meet obligations in New York, thus keeping our credit good and allowing the gold to circulate and become useful, as suggested by the Prime Minister.

Mr. RHODES: I believe the answer is obvious. It is that under the statute or the law as it stands to-day, we must keep a certain reserve of gold. If the hon. member wishes to go beyond that and suggest that we should amend the Currency Act, that is a question which could be raised in the consideration of another measure. I submit however with all due deference that it does not arise in connection with this amendment.

Mr. COOTE: May I suggest to the minister that he consider the advisability of amending the next subsection so that we might issue up to $100,000,000 in dominion notes against a twenty-five per cent gold coverage, instead of $50,000,000 with the twenty-five per cent coverage, and release about $37,500,000 worth of gold. I believe we would still have as good a percentage of gold coverage as some other nations of the world, the credit of which is still good. Especially if we are not going to allow anybody to get this gold out, the twenty-five per cent gold reserve for the first $100,000,000 would be quite ample, and I believe would lighten the burden which now rests upon the Minister of Finance when he is faced with the necessity of meeting his obligations in New York. Would the minister consider that matter, or has he given it any consideration?

Mr. RHODES: I should be only too happy to consider it, and as a matter of fact have already given it a very considerable amount of consideration. However I do say to the committee in all humility and with the utmost frankness that I attach very little importance to my own views on this complex and intricate question. It is not one which can be juggled lightly by any individual, even by a Minister of Finance with one year's experience. It is a matter to which men have devoted a lifetime of study, and even they are not in agreement—men of the utmost erudition. It seems to me that the best we can do, upon balance, is to accept the experience, wisdom and judgment of individuals who have devoted time and study to it. Then, upon balance, it is for us to find out the best course to pursue in the circumstances. I have no doubt that we would do well to review many phases of our legislation with respect to banking and currency. That is one of the matters we had in mind when we suggested the appointment of the royal commission. Among other subjects I have no doubt they should and will consider this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is not the Minister of Finance aware that one of the findings of the Macmillan committee in England was that we should dissociate gold as a basis of internal currency from gold as a means of meeting maturing external obligations?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is quite the opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And also that was one of the recommendations of the committee of the League of Nations. I shall produce my authority for the Prime Minister any time he wishes it.

Mr. BENNETT: I looked it up the other evening after the hon. member had spoken.

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have not the report of the committee before me, but I am almost sure my hon. friend is in error. However, whether he is or not is immaterial to the point under consideration. The royal commission to be appointed to inquire into our currency will have its own problems to deal with.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Indeed, the recommendation made at the 1930 imperial conference was the same as that made by the joint committee of British industries in Great Britain, to the effect that the two should be dissociated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the hon. members are attaching different meanings to the term "dissociate". The Prime Minister said this afternoon that so far as domestic trade was concerned we could use iron rings, but as an international currency, we would have to use something else.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is true.

Mr. SPENCER: In this bill the House of Commons is asked to give the government power to suspend the payment of dominion notes in gold. It has always seemed to me an extraordinary thing that we should have two pieces of legislation on our statute books, one the Dominion Notes Act and the other The Finance Act, each practically contradicting the other. Under the Dominion Notes Act, as we read it, we can issue $50,000,000 of dominion notes against a twenty-five per cent backing of gold. Then we are supposed to keep dollar for dollar in gold for any balance. Under the Finance Act the banks may bring a most varied supply of securities to the treasury board, and have advanced to them dominion notes. So far as the total amount is concerned, I have yet to see any limit named. As the Prime Minister has said, a dominion note issued under the Finance Act against securities is just the same as a dominion note issued under the Dominion Notes Act. Therefore the more dominion notes we issue under the Finance Act, the more the gold basis of our currency is reduced.

One thing it seems to me has been overlooked in this very interesting discussion, and that is the amount of private bank notes that are issued. I know this bill does not refer to private notes, but a client of a bank has a right to ask for dominion notes in place of bank notes, the bank note not being legal tender, I understand, except at the bank of issue. Under the Bank Act the private banks of this country have three different ways of issuing notes. I do not know that it is necessary for me to enumerate them; most hon. members know the situation as well as I do. First, they may issue an amount equal to their paid up capital, which is called the free issue. Then there is an excess issue, for which they pay five per cent, this issue can be equal to fifteen per cent of their paid up capital and unimpaired reserve, from September to February. A third way is by taking securities to the treasury board, getting dominion notes, and lodging those dominion notes in the central gold reserve, in lieu of gold, and issuing their own notes against them. As I said before, people holding these bank notes may demand dominion notes. It has often occurred to me that it is very misleading to say that we have forty per cent gold behind our dominion notes, rather intimating that we have forty per cent behind all the dominion notes people might need, whereas it is only forty per cent behind those dominion notes which happen to be printed and issued. But every depositor in a bank has a right to ask for dominion notes in drawing from his account, and as we have deposits in our private banks to an amount of nearly $2,000,000,000 it stands to reason that not only is there not sufficient gold to cover the notes which might be demanded, but there is not sufficient gold in any country in the world to meet the calls of depositors if the depositors really made a run. So the gold basis is really a fair weather basis, perfectly all right when it is not wanted, not called for, but if a run occurs it is never there. I am not saying this to create suspicion, because I think most people realize to-day that gold as a basis for our internal currency is not necessary, it is only a myth; some people believe in it, but it is not necessary if you have an educated public, and I am rather of the opinion that we have a sufficiently educated public in Canada to be perfectly open with them.

It seems to me that in suspending the payment of gold in September, 1931, the government laid itself open, as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) has said, to be brought into court if it would allow individuals to do so. Therefore I am delighted that even at this late date they bring this measure before the house to legalize what they have been doing illegally, in refusing payment of dominion notes in gold.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This does not change it very much.

Mr. SPENCER: It openly says that they are not going to pay gold, which I think is a very wise statement to make. I would prefer to delete subsection 3 entirely and not pretend to pay gold, because if there is a run it is not there. Our financial soundness does not depend on the one commodity, gold; our total assets comprise many other things in Canada, of which gold is only a small part.

A question has been asked as to the difference between issuing say $100,000,000 in bonds and $100,000,000 in notes: whether the notes would be considered inflation and the bonds would not. It seems to me that it depends entirely on how the purchase of the bonds is financed. If it is financed by savings I would say there would be no inflation at all. But if financed, as most bond purchases are, by the extension of credit by the banks to enable the buyers to buy the bonds, then I say it is just as much inflation as the direct issue of paper money.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Do you mean to say that most bonds are bought with borrowings?

Mr. SPENCER: The bonds issued from 1916 to 1920, I think the hon. member will find, were very largely bought on credits extended by the banks to enable their clients to buy the bonds.

Mr. MATTHEWS: That is during the war?

Mr. SPENCER: Yes.

Mr. MATTHEWS: You are confining your statement to that period?

Mr. SPENCER: Not entirely, but I think the hon. member will find, if he takes the loans of the banks from 1914 to the end of 1916, that there was very little difference in the level of loans, but from the end of 1916 to 1920 the amount of bank loans went sky-high at a very rapid rate.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COOTE: The section of the bill which is intended to amend the Dominion Notes Act deals with the convertibility of notes into gold, and on that point I wish to quote a couple of sentences from Planned Money by Sir Basil Blackett, a director of the bank of England and an acknowledged monetary expert, whose remarks on this point will, I think, be of interest to the committee. He says:

> The notes are money. They give the holder a claim to goods and services within the country; they represent a stated amount, measured in money, of internal purchasing power, exercisable at the bearers' option anywhere within the country at any time present or future that he may choose. They represent nothing more and nothing less, and their value in terms of commodities depends, as already stated, solely on the relation between the quantity in circulation and the work which it is at any moment required to perform.

That is the point I would emphasize before this committee. The work which our money is supposed to do, and the purpose for which it is issued, is the purchase of goods, and I see no reason why the people of the country should expect it to be convertible into anything but goods and services. If they expect it to be converted into gold they will be disappointed, for the reason, which I have already pointed out, that when the majority of the people desire to exercise the right to convert their currency into gold it becomes inconvertible.

Another point raised this afternoon, which was not cleared up, has reference to inflation. We believe that inflation is not through the note issue but is more often through credit issued by the banks. At page 138 of the report of the Macmillan committee the following statement appears:

> Long before 1914 the first stages of credit inflation had ceased to be marked by an increased issue of notes, inflation or deflation being initiated not by changes in the note circulation but by changes in the amount of the bank's deposits.

The amount of bank deposits is decided altogether by the policy of the banks in regard to loans. I know there is a misapprehension in the minds of hon. gentlemen in this regard, and I regret that the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) is not in his seat tonight, in view of certain remarks he made with reference to a speech I delivered in this house some time ago. In this connection I wish to quote two or three sentences from the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, to the ordinary general meeting of the Midland Bank, Limited, on January 25, 1924. On that occasion he said:

> What is meant by monetary policy? Before I answer this question let me define the sense in which I shall use the word money. I understand by it all currency in circulation among the public and all bank deposits drawable by cheque. Usually when we speak of anyone having so much money we include the value of his land, securities and other property. It is a convenient form of expression, but it is not a strict use of the term. The meaning I am giving it is confined to what is immediately spendable by the owner and does not cover the saleable value of property. In this sense it is limited to the total of bank balances both on current and deposit account, together with the total currency in active circulation. . . . The amount of money in existence varies only with the action of the banks in increasing or diminishing deposits. We know how this is effected. Every bank loan and every bank purchase of securities creates a deposit, and every repayment of a bank loan and every bank sale destroys one.

I think it is quite clear from these statements of Mr. McKenna that the amount of money on which the public has to do business depends upon the policy of the banks in the making of loans or the refusal to make them, or in their demand for the redemption of loans. Let me quote further from the report of the Macmillan committee at page 138:

> The somewhat anomalous position arises that while the bank is not regulated by law in respect of its deposits it remains so regulated in respect of the note issue which was a hundred years ago the initiating cause of inflation but to-day is the factor which is the latest to be affected by the forces of expension or contraction.

One other sentence from that report is interesting in this connection, with regard to the metallic or gold reserve for internal note issue:

> Formerly, when the bank's gold was held for two purposes, partly to meet an external drain and partly to meet an internal drain, it may have been reasonable to earmark a substantial part of it for the latter purpose. But now that the second purpose has disappeared, and has in fact been abolished by law, so that the gold reserve of the Bank of England is held for no other purpose than to meet a foreign drain, the effect of enforcing the principle of the fiduciary issue is to forbid the Bank of England to use by far the greater part of its gold for the only purpose for which it is held or could be used. . . .
> We cannot regard as satisfactory a system under which so high a proportion of the gold stock is locked up in such a way as not to be available for export if the Central Bank should so desire.

These opinions are quite applicable to the situation of Canada to-day and the question we are now considering. Why should the dominion continue to hold in its vaults $70,000,000 of gold as a basis for internal note circulation which is intended for use only within Canada? That gold cannot come out and therefore is of no use; in other words, that $70,000,000 is sterilized and I submit it should be used to assist in the payment of our obligations in New York. The Minister of Finance should be empowered to use it for that purpose. It should no longer be held as a reserve for internal note issue.

I do not want to delay the passing of the bill but I do hope that the minister will put the suspension of the gold standard into effect. Is it the intention of the government to suspend the redemption of notes in gold when this bill passes?

Mr. RHODES: I would not wish to give a yes or no answer to my hon. friend. The government will take such course as it deems wise in the circumstances. That is the best and the only answer I can give at this stage.

Mr. SPENCER: Before six o'clock I was referring to the effect on price levels when bonds were issued against savings, and also when credit was advanced by banks to help to buy the bonds. Many people think that inflation is connected only or largely with the issuance of notes, but I would remind the committee that it is no more inflation for a bank to hand $500 in bills over the counter to a customer than to credit $500 to his account against which he draws by cheque. We found only two weeks ago that the country with the largest stock of gold in the world was obliged to close every bank within its borders because when a real run was made it was found impossible to supply gold against the notes that might be presented. This afternoon the Prime Minister, in a very able speech, mentioned that the dollar was of value only as one could depend upon gold being paid for it. I would say that the dollar is of value according to the goods you can buy with it. During the last eighteen months I have not been able to get any gold for dominion notes, and therefore I say that dominion notes are of value only in proportion to what I can buy with them. I have found them perfectly good because the assets of Canada were good, whether or not she had gold behind her dominion notes. In looking through the evidence given before the banking and commerce committee in 1923 I found what I consider rather a good statement as to the basis of credit. I should like to read it to the committee; it is as follows:

> The basis of a nation's credit is the number, intelligence and industry of its people, plus the capital equipment and natural resources within its boundaries.

Gold therefore is only one small part of the assets of the dominion, and I think we should give due credit to those vast assets other than gold.

Mr. BENNETT: Who said that?

Mr. SPENCER: That was said by Mr. George Bevington in the course of his evidence before the banking and commerce committee. I believe I attended practically every meeting of that committee and I did not hear that statement contradicted. We are told that gold is the most valuable of metals, but I think if we took away the statute giving gold its fictitious value it would become one of the most useless metals.

Mr. ERNST: I wonder if the hon. member can answer a question, just for information. Dealing with any year previous to the war, I do not care what year, can he tell me the gold coverage for currency and the amount of paper issued as compared with the gold coverage and the amount of currency issued to-day? And for the same pre-war year for which he gives me the gold coverage and currency issued could he give me the volume of trade as compared with to-day, so that we may see how they compare?

Mr. SPENCER: I am sorry I have not the figures with me, and I should not care to make a guess.

Mr. ERNST: I asked for only one purpose. I believe that the amount of paper money was quite out of proportion to the growth of trade.

Mr. SPENCER: I do not know whether or not the hon. member was in the house just before six o'clock, but I mentioned then that the statement that Canada has forty per cent of gold behind her dominion notes simply means that she has forty per cent behind what dominion notes are printed and what we think are necessary. If there should be a real run of depositors asking for their money—and every depositor has a right to dominion notes—naturally we could not meet that run, and no country could do so.

Mr. ERNST: My purpose in asking the question was to see whether the increase in paper money coincided with the growth of trade.

Mr. SPENCER: From time to time there have been attempts made to limit our paper money to the amount of gold we have in reserve, and that is one of the criticisms I have to make in connection with gold. I believe that often it has placed a country in a straightjacket in regard to trade development, because there was not sufficient currency or credit for needed development. In support of what the hon. member for Macleod had to say I noticed that Sir Basil Blackett, speaking in Canada about eighteen months ago, said very plainly that it was quite unnecessary to keep gold behind internal currency. In that connection I should like to quote another eminent banker, Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, who, speaking to the shareholders of the Midland bank in January, 1932, said:

> The time has gone by for the childlike belief that as long as a country is on a gold standard all is well.

And again:

> For upwards of six years our monetary authorities fought a losing battle on ill-chosen ground.

Referring to Great Britain going off the gold standard he said:

> There has been no inflation in Great Britain through her going off the gold standard. The cost of living is about the same.

Just here I should like to make my stand clear in reference to money being put into circulation. Often it has been charged by hon. members, I believe quite innocently, that we in this corner of the house want unlimited inflation, unlimited amounts of money put into circulation. I want to say quite plainly, speaking for myself and those around me, that in not one single instance in the past ten or eleven years has any member of this group advocated uncontrolled inflation. However, I do stand very definitely for sufficient money to be put into circulation to carry on business and enable all goods and services to be exchanged that are made and needed.

Mr. ERNST: Hear, hear; hence my question.

Mr. SPENCER: Until we do get that condition we have not sufficient money in circulation. Referring again to the circulation of gold and the fact that those debts payable in gold can be met, I have only to point to the world debts which are payable in gold. These debts total something like four hundred billion dollars, whereas there is only eleven billion dollars of gold in the world. Sometimes it is necessary to point out that money, or credit, is made largely in three ways; we have the mint, the printing press, and the banker's ledger. From the mint we have only about $32,000,000 or $34,000,000 of subsidiary coin; from the printing press we have obtained only a small amount of the money or purchasing power compared with the total in Canada. But, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Macleod, there is practically no limit to the extent to which the banker may go in extending and controlling the credit of the nation. We impose very severe penalties indeed upon anyone who tries to increase the amount of money in circulation, whether it is by way of one dollar bills, five dollar bills or twenty-five cent pieces; we call such people counterfeiters. A bank, however, through its bookkeeping system, can bring into existence thousands or millions of dollars of new money, drawable by cheque, simply through taking securities as collateral, and nothing is done about it. But when this new money is put into circulation it must have the effect of altering price levels, and this is where we base our complaint with regard to so much power being placed in the hands of private corporations. I think this is why we need a federal bank in the worst way. The other day someone said to me that the Finance Act is like a slot machine; there are ten banking houses in Canada who can bring securities at any time and get in return dominion notes. In so doing the price levels must be affected, and this is something that should not be left to private institutions.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to put on record a statement by Professor Soddy of Oxford, a well known critic, with regard to the financial problem. He said:

> Another and most important fact to be emphasized is that virtually all the money in the hands (or banking accounts) of the community originally came into existence in the form of loans from the banking system. It can come from nowhere else, nor otherwise than as loans. This fact, which reverses all the old concepts of loans as money taken out of preexisting deposits is demonstrated fully in Major Douglas's works, and, in fact, has since been endorsed by Mr. McKenna, the chairman of the Midland Bank.

The CHAIRMAN: Are we not wandering very far from the subject of the bill?

Mr. SPENCER: I will be through in a moment. Professor Soddy goes on to say:

> The order of procedure is as follows:
> (1) Money is printed or written into existence by the banks;
> (2) It enters circulation as a loan to somebody;
> (3) It is then spent, and then becomes a "deposit" in the name of the receiver.

I think I am in order in reading that, because we are asked in this bill to give the government the right to suspend the payment of gold for dominion notes. I shall support the bill but I would support with better grace the elimination of the whole subsection 3 of the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Before the six o'clock recess I made a statement to the committee to the effect that the committee in England had come out for the abandonment of the gold standard as the basis for internal currency. I take as my authority for that the report of the Federation of British Industries to which I referred the Minister of Finance. I wish now to place upon Hansard the actual quotation from the Federation of British Industries in analysing the Macmillan report.

Mr. BENNETT: It was the Macmillan report with which I was dealing and nothing else; I did not deal with the Federation of British Industries.

The CHAIRMAN: This is a bill giving the government power to suspend the redemption of dominion notes in gold. I do not think the hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver) I am discussing the bill. I know what it means. The report reads:

> The Macmillan committee has come out boldly for the complete abandonment of the theory that gold is required as the actual basis of internal currency, for the maintenance of an entirely disconnected gold reserve for exchange purposes. The rigid linking up of gold and currency which compels the contraction of domestic credit is an objection to a system no longer required to maintain public confidence.

I wish to refer my hon. friend to the quotation just made by the hon. member for Macleod directly from the Macmillan report. I find also on page 66 of the Macmillan report the following:

In the third place, it is not necessary that the volume of note issues should continue to be regulated, as it is now, by reference to the amount of gold held in reserve.

Again on page 123, subsection (iv) of article 289:

There is also a further principle of central banking of a somewhat different character which must be observed if central banks are to be in complete control of the situation, namely, that central banks must not be unduly limited in their power to expand their deposits otherwise than against a corresponding increase in their holdings of gold or the equivalent of gold.

The sense of the report all the way through, as I have read it—and I have read it more than once—is practically as advocated by Sir Basil Blackett, that gold is no longer required as a basis for internal currency, but only as a basis for meeting maturing obligations.

As regards the bill, to my mind it is a complete anomaly. It provides:

Dominion notes shall be redeemable in gold on presentation at branch offices established, or at banks with which arrangements are made for the redemption thereof as hereinafter provided. The governor in council may from time to time, and for such period or periods as he may deem desirable, suspend the operation of this subsection.

In my opinion the governor in council, under this bill, is taking power to do something that has been in actual operation for several years. I regret I missed some of the debate this afternoon, but the Minister of Finance suggested that this was a bill that was more or less hand in hand with the Export of Gold bill of last year. I fail to see any close alliance between the export of gold and the suspension of the redemption of dominion notes in gold. I wish to differ from my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) who said this afternoon that this was the final abandonment of the gold standard. If he means the gold standard in the technical sense as it is known to economists and technicians, we abandoned it in the autumn of 1929. We abandoned the parity of gold with currency and when we inferentially, by arrangement with financial institutions, prohibited the export of gold, we were off the gold standard. It is quite true that since that time we have been on a gold exchange basis with regard to the alleged gold backing for our currency, which is supposed to be a 40 per cent backing, but was 39.3 when I got the last report from the department; but here we have in practice an actual abrogation of the terms of the statute because dominion notes have not been redeemable in gold since we went off the gold standard, since before October, 1931. Now the Minister of Finance is asking the house to give to the governor in council power to do something they are doing now without any authority whatsoever, just as the government in 1929, without availing themselves of the provisions of the Finance Act, effectually prohibited the export of gold by arrangement with banking and financial institutions and without an order in council under peace, order and good government legislation. So we have had a violation of this section in practice possibly by both administrations for the last three or four years. Now the government by this bill is asking the house to give the governor in council power, at whatever time it sees fit, to suspend the redemption of dominion notes in gold. We should do one thing or the other: keep the statute in force as it used to be and see that it is legally observed, or eliminate the clause altogether and do what the hon. member for Macleod suggests, namely, effectually abandon the gold standard in so far as gold is required as a basis for our internal currency. We must separate fundamentally the gold exchange standard as a basis for our internal currency and our monetary gold stocks as a basis for meeting with goods and services our external obligations as they mature.

Mr. COOTE: I should like, in reference to what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has said, to say that I do not think I said this afternoon that we were now abandoning the gold standard legally. Prior to this time we had been legally on the gold standard except for the export of gold, but actually we had been off it. I would like to see us actually and legally off it; I would like to see legal conditions brought into accord with actual conditions.

If I might, I should like to come back to the practice in force since September, 1931. In a return brought down lately, number 239A, I find that the following telegram was sent by the Department of Finance to all assistant receivers general in Canada:

September 22, 1931.

Make no payments in gold more than $1,000 without instructions from Ottawa. Wire daily amount of gold paid out and forward names and addresses of those receiving it. Urge banks when applying for notes to take small legals during present crisis.

The question I would like to ask the minister is whether the department had any legal authority to send out such an order to its assistant receivers general and, if not, why was not payment of gold for dominion notes suspended by order in council? Did the government at that time not have power under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act to suspend the provisions of the section which it is proposed to amend by this bill?

Mr. BENNETT: The present Minister of Finance was not then in charge of the treasury. The question is one of weighing again the effect upon our external situation in a moment of crisis and we took the course which we thought would do us the least harm, namely, prevented the export of gold. It was that action which was taken in September, 1931, to meet the then situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was it not October?

Mr. BENNETT: No, September, 1931, when England went off the gold standard and we passed the order in council preventing the export of gold.

Just one word that I think may be useful to the committee. The hon. gentleman quoted from Sir Basil Blackett's Planned Money as to what money was, and he said: "notes were of value for what they would buy in goods or services." That is exactly the point so far as our notes are concerned. We have so large an obligation to meet in New York that we have to buy United States notes or bills, gold certificates or gold, and it is just my point that that is a service which has to be bought and paid for; that the value of our dollar depends upon the service it will buy in the way of exchange on New York, and that unless metal coverage were behind our dollar to the extent it is, it would sink more and more in value to a point where it would take too many of our dollars to buy a United States dollar in exchange for the purpose of liquidating our obligations, thus rendering it impossible for us to meet the situation. A better illustration of the reason we are trying to maintain our dollar amongst the currencies of the world could not be given. Just as Sir Basil Blackett says, it is an exchange service. We have to buy American dollars to the amount of about one million dollars every working day for which we have to pay in Canadian dollars, and the simple problem is how many Canadian dollars do you need to buy New York exchange for the obligations we have there to pay?

[Mr. Coote]

Mr. COOTE: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether you will consider me in order if I once more discuss the possibility of buying New York exchange with Canadian dollar bills. The Prime Minister told us last year, and he said it very well too, that we do not buy American exchange with Canadian dollar bills.

Mr. BENNETT: We do in part.

Mr. COOTE: But these Canadian dollar bills come back the next day. If we are going to continue to meet these foreign obligations, and we have been meeting them with 25 cents a bushel wheat, which is ruinous to the producer, and similarly to the producers of pulp and paper and lumber and fish and cattle and hogs, it is time the producers got a better price. If they do not, their production is bound to drop off, and it is only out of the proceeds of that production that we can get foreign exchange to meet our obligations in New York. To continue meeting our foreign obligations, our exports must be kept up because it is from that source that we get the bulk of the exchange we need to meet these obligations.

It was pretty hard to hear exactly what the Prime Minister was saying. I cannot understand why it would not have been better for the government to suspend the redemption of notes in gold by order in council than by letter to the assistant receiver general. Surely it is better to do these things in a legal way than in an extra-legal way—I do not know if that is the correct term. We should follow the same method that was adopted in England where the law was amended. We do not yet know whether the minister will suspend the redemption of notes in gold after he is given authority. The government had this authority in September, 1931, I understand, and if I am wrong I hope the minister will correct me.

I, as a Canadian, am concerned to see government action in this matter. It is very important to us that the law governing legal tender should be lived up to. Is the government going to continue to override the law, as I am sure they have been overriding it? I think we should be given some good reason why that has been done or we should be given the assurance that from now on the government will take the necessary action to bring the legal situation into line with the actual situation. We know that the act requires the paying out of gold for dominion notes. If we give the government this authority, will they suspend redemption of notes in gold? I think we ought to have that information.

There is one other question I would put to the minister: Has the government out of the proceeds of gold which it has sent to New York establishing credits there, given exchange to certain persons or corporations, provincial governments, municipalities or anyone else, at rates of exchange more favourable than the prevailing rate? I think the committee would like to have that information. I have met many people in Canada who think that we should have that information. I do not know whether the minister can give it or not.

Mr. RHODES: As I told my hon. friend this afternoon, in the great majority of cases our export of gold was for our own purposes, but we have made gold available on occasion to provincial governments in part. Sometimes we have had to assist them by way of the purchase of exchange depending on the amount of gold available, but in all cases we have charged them the going rate.

Mr. POULIOT: If I understand correctly what was stated this afternoon, there is a certain amount of gold held in reserve as backing for dominion bonds, quite a large proportion of which are not guaranteed except by the resources of the dominion. Would it not be possible for the government to adopt bimetallism so that in this country we could have both the gold standard and the silver standard working together? That would be very easy in this country where we produce both gold and silver. Then the dominion currency would be fully backed not by something mythical but by something real, by gold and silver. This is a question which has been widely discussed. It is one with which I am sure both the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are familiar, and every member of the house will recall that the Minister of Trade and Commerce dwelt at great length with this question in the early part of this session and also last year. In times like these, if the only backing of the dominion notes was confidence, could there be much trade? I do not believe that confidence means so much in trade. Confidence in trade is the sentiment of one party that good business can be done with another party, but when one party gets practically nothing in return how can that kind of unilateral trade bring prosperity to a nation? I would therefore ask the Minister of Finance to study this important question of bimetallism with his distinguished colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce in order that we may have a backing of both gold and silver for dominion notes.

Mr. IRVINE: We have had one of the most interesting discussions on the financial question which I have heard in this house for ten or twelve years. I have been very much interested in this question both since I came here and before, and I am glad that at last it has become of such interest as to be discussed by hon. gentlemen who occupy the front benches of the opposition and to be answered seriously by hon. gentlemen on the front benches opposite.

We have had from the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) one of the ablest defences of the gold standard which I imagine could be put up. I do not wish now to prolong this discussion and weary the house with a dry as dust debate, but while the Prime Minister's speech was very able indeed, and while he raised every point that it was possible to raise in defence of the gold standard, I want to register my objection to his conclusions. I do not agree with them. I believe that in every fundamental point which he raised he was vulnerable. I believe that his argument could be not only successfully challenged by the facts but successfully refuted.

During the course of his remarks the Prime Minister pointed out that practically all countries of the world had adhered to the gold basis, and so forth. But it does happen that we have come to the time when nearly all the countries of the world have abandoned the gold basis because it has been discovered to be entirely impracticable. No matter how well it may have answered at certain times in the past, it has been unable to keep pace in its volume with the increase in the production of wealth in the various countries of the world. To imagine that you can increase your wealth and production ad lib, and not increase your gold correspondingly, and still have a gold basis, is on the face of it ridiculous. I cannot see why gold cannot be used for international balances as it has been used in the past without at all affecting our currency in Canada. I think that matter was involved in the question raised by the hon. member for North Bruce. In my view we are indebted to him for having brought up a matter which resulted in such full discussion. He spoke concerning the difference between the dollar and a bond, and answered his own question in that regard by saying that as far as he could see the dollar bore no interest, and the bond did. I am not satisfied with the Prime Minister's statement in reply to the hon. member for North Bruce. As a matter of fact, so far as the obligations of Canada are concerned there is no difference between bonds and dominion notes. She must pay a dollar for the dollar, and a dollar for the bond, just the same. But there is the difference of interest charges the bonds being interest bearing. I cannot see how an increase of currency in Canada, regardless of a gold basis, will affect what we have to pay abroad. In spite of the Prime Minister's argument that is not clear to me.

If, for instance, we have to pay $100 in New York and our money is depreciated by twenty-five per cent, we pay the $100 in gold. If on the other hand we have to pay $100 and our dollar is at par, and if we still pay in gold, we pay exactly the same amount of gold in one case as we do in the other, regardless of whether or not our money is at a depreciated value. Then I venture to suggest that the Prime Minister's interpretation of how we pay our obligations abroad was somewhat misleading, inasmuch as we do not pay our debts in New York with Canadian legals; we pay with goods, or with gold, if we pay at all. We would not affect the payment of our obligations abroad by an alteration in our money value, since we pay them in goods. We would not affect it if we paid in gold, because we do not affect our amount of gold by changing the value of our dollar. Therefore in either case I cannot see how we would be jeopardized at all in the payment of our obligations in gold by making an alteration in our currency at home.

The Prime Minister stressed the point that confidence of people abroad in our bonds made our bonds more valuable than our dollar, and that confidence had been established through the years by the fact that we had paid when the bonds were due. But we paid in what? We paid in goods when the bonds were due. And unless something has occurred which has impaired the wealth of production of this country there is no reason why any foreign debtor should lose confidence in Canada, because as long as she can produce wealth Canada can meet her obligations abroad in wealth—and I imagine that is all any country in the world can do. If they cannot do it that way, certainly it cannot be done with gold. People abroad are not such fools as we imagine. The fact that we have only forty per cent of gold to back our notes in circulation in Canada is known abroad, and to think that they imagine that we can reedem our bonded indebtedness in gold is to attribute to them imbecility. They know perfectly well we cannot do it, and neither do they expect us to do it. But we can do it in goods, and I suggest it is a sound theory that credit and currency in our own country should be based upon the wealth of the country.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Irvine.]

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUATION FOR ONE YEAR OF PROVISIONS OF RELIEF ACT, 1932

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of Bill No. 55, respecting relief measures.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I promised the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that before this bill was finally dealt with a provision would be inserted to prevent the possibility of orders in council being passed under the provisions respecting peace, order and good government while parliament was in session. This matter could be dealt with in another chamber, or we could deal with it here, whichever the right hon. gentleman prefers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe it would be better to do it here.

Mr. BENNETT: I would move, seconded by Mr. Rhodes:

> That the said bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending as follows:—
>
> "That subsection (b) of section 2 be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:
> "When parliament is not in session, to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada; and at all times to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof."

I have given a copy of the proposed amendment to the right hon. gentleman opposite, and I believe it covers the point he made.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The Prime Minister has moved an amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, as the Prime Minister has said, this amendment does meet the point I raised the other day, namely, that unless an amendment were made we would be in the anomalous position of giving the governor in council power to pass orders in council which would override while parliament was actually in session any legislation this house might pass. It seemed to me that that was going a bit too far. While the amendment does meet the one point raised I should not like it to be assumed that in its present form the bill is by any means acceptable.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is far from that. Even with the amendment now proposed we are giving to the governor in council powers with which that body should not be entrusted at any time. May I make my point clear in this way; this amendment gives to the governor in council, notwithstanding the provisions of any statute, power to——take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada, and to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

This afternoon we have been enacting legislation which would place the governor in council in a position to meet a financial crisis. I believe that is the proper way to proceed, namely, that parliament shall pass what enactments are in its opinion necessary to meet each and every situation. When parliament has done that it seems to me parliament has done all that can be expected of it, and the governor in council has all the powers he needs. At any rate, if while parliament is actually sitting, the governor in council needs any additional power to meet a financial crisis or any other situation, he has in parliament the agency at hand to give him that power at a moment's notice. The other evening the Prime Minister said that something might happen between eleven o'clock at night and three o'clock the next afternoon which would require immediate action on the part of the government. If a situation of that kind did present itself I venture to say that if the governor in council took action which he thought necessary, though not wholly in accord with some statute, the Prime Minister with the majority he has could come to the House of Commons immediately with the utmost confidence that the house would at once legalize the action which had been taken. In fact this afternoon the Prime Minister referred to the Bank of England having taken at one time to meet an emergency, a step that was illegal, and parliament forthwith passing an act indemnifying the bank against loss for its action, and protecting the situation in that way. My thought in all this does not spring from any desire to be querulous over the powers to be given to the governor in council, but is rather due to the regard I have for the pride and security which the people of the country have in their parliamentary institutions, and for the wisdom of preserving in all things the power of the commons, and of parliament to the greatest extent possible.

The Prime Minister this afternoon in speaking of financial matters laid great stress upon the place that gold has in maintaining the credit of a country. He spoke of the metal coverage as being all important in internal and international relations. If I may apply the parallel which comes to my mind at the moment, I would say my thought is that the brains of this House of Commons are after all the real asset of this nation in dealing with its problems, and that the common sense coverage of hon. members of the House of Commons as a whole is a much better security for the nation than the action that the governor in council may take at any particular moment in endeavouring to deal with a particular situation. I do not believe that we in Canada need these arbitrary powers, or anything resembling the dictatorships of other lands. I believe every step we take in that direction is leading us towards the abyss that we want to escape. After all the great security of British countries lies in their free institutions and in the free expression of opinion in their parliaments by the representatives of the people with regard to all questions that may arise. It is on that ground in the main that I do not like this legislation, and that I take exception to the particular section we are amending. I wish nevertheless, to thank the Prime Minister for helping to save the face of the entire House of Commons by providing that while we are actually in session the governor in council shall not be permitted to override by orders in council the legislation which we may be passing at the same time.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Mr. BENNETT: With the consent of the house, now.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Before the bill is read the third time, I do not wish to repeat the arguments that have been put forward so emphatically in the different stages of the measure up to the present, and with equal force and emphasis in preceding sessions of this parliament when similar measures were enacted. Especially would I refer to what was said on April 1, 1932, on the third reading of the relief bill of that session. But I do feel that inasmuch as everything that is done here counts later as a precedent, and particularly as hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to this very measure have urged that one of the reasons it should be allowed to pass now without obstruction of any kind is that the house has passed similar legislation on one or two previous occasions, it is important that we on this side who take such strong objection to it should again register our protest against the measure in the form in which it is going through. I want to make it perfectly clear, as I have said over and over again, that we are ready to vote any sum that is needed for unemployment relief, provided the minister will name the amounts he requires for that purpose and will give reasonable grounds for naming such amounts. But we take very strong exception to violating the very foundation on which in its constitutional aspect the English system of finance, and the rules of financial administration are based, namely, the principle of supreme control by the House of Commons over taxation to which the right to control issues is a natural corollary. Viewing this bill as we do, as the negation of government by parliament, we cannot countenance its passing a single stage that it is within our power to prevent. It is the negation of government by parliament, in the first place, asking as it does this House of Commons to give the governor in council a blank cheque; giving the governor in council power to dip into the treasury for any sum of money he wishes, and, in the terms in which the bill as it now stands, for practically any purpose he wishes. That is entirely contrary to the proper procedure of parliament in dealing with expenditures and taxation. The practice should be that the objects for which the moneys are required should be named, appropriations should be definite in amount, should be voted for specific purposes, and the House of Commons should have the right and be in a position to follow every appropriation to its destination and make sure that the moneys appropriated are applied exactly as they are intended to be applied, and accounted for to the smallest detail.

In the second place, the measure gives to the governor in council blanket authority in the matter of legislation. Here again it is the negation of government by parliament. The power is given to legislate on everything respecting peace, order and good government. That might be shortened by dropping out all the words except the word "government," giving the governor in council power to do anything he wishes with respect to the carrying on of government. That is what it means. And that notwithstanding any statutes that may exist. I think that is entirely wrong. We have had recently the suggestion of giving to the war veterans the choice between continuing to receive their salaries as civil servants, where they are civil servants, and retaining their pensions. Sir Arthur Currie the other day took strong exception to parliament dealing with a matter affecting war veterans' pensions except under the Pensions Act. Sir Arthur was perfectly right in that, but I am amazed that those who, like Sir Arthur, take exception on that score, which relates to but a single enactment, are apparently prepared to stand silently by and see the House of Commons part to the governor in council with all of its enactments, and allow the governor in council, under the guise of legislating for peace, order and good government, to pass, notwithstanding any statute of this parliament, whatever orders in council he may please when parliament is not in session. After all to legislate is the function of parliament; legislation is not the function of the executive. The constitution gives certain powers to the executive for administrative purposes, to the judiciary for judicial purposes, and other powers to parliament for legislative purposes. Legislation is the function of parliament, it is not the function of the executive, and when the executive seeks to take from parliament the power of legislation it is taking away practically the whole basis on which parliament itself rests.

There is a third objection to this legislation from the point of view of its ignoring the established practices and methods of procedure of parliament. It gives to the provinces grants in aid out of the public treasury in a manner which precludes any proper supervision of federal expenditures.

We have had this legislation, or enactments substantially the same, for considerably over two years now, and while our objection to it at the outset was based principally upon what it would mean in the way of extravagance and waste of public money, we were overruled in our objection on the score that it was likely to be but for one year, and that the end would later on justify the means that had been taken. The country has had opportunity to see whether the end does justify the means. I think the people are now discovering that the free hand given the administration, combined with its method of dealing with the unemployment problem has been a very expensive one. The people are beginning to realize what it is going to cost them in the price of sugar, in income tax, and other taxes. It is all very well for the nation to become aroused over the additional taxes put on, over increases in expenditure and over the fact that we are not balancing the budget. But here is where the increases are taking place. They are occurring primarily because of the method which the government has adopted in dealing with the unemployment problem.

Anyone who listened to the minister as he was explaining how money had been spent under the act must have felt that the whole business was very slip-shod and haphazard indeed, and that so far as the minister and the government were concerned there was no real control at all over expenditures. What happened? We questioned the minister time and again as to how such and such expenditures came to be made—how it was, for example, that the navy league in Toronto got a contribution from the federal treasury to help it out. The minister's answer was that the Ontario government had decided to give the navy league a particular power. In another instance the explanation was that some municipality had decided upon a certain method of spending public money, the province had to help the municipality, and the dominion was committed by its system of dealing with these matters to help the province. And so it has proceeded from the start.

The ministry recognize no responsibility in the matter of expenditures beyond seeing that the money gets out of the federal into the provincial treasury. Now that is a thoroughly bad principle. It is bad in two ways. In the first place, it induces the municipalities and the provinces to engage in expenditures which they would never think of incurring except on the strength of a percentage grant from the federal treasury; and in the second place it is bad because it does not enable the federal government to follow up the expenditures of its own moneys, the moneys of the people, to see whether these expenditures have been made in the most economical manner possible.

I believe, from what we have heard in the last day or two, that many of the provinces and municipalities have pretty well reached the limit of their capacity to carry on their own business. Indeed, we have been told that part of this money which we are voting is used to meet current expenses of at least one of the provinces. The government is loaning money on the one hand to the province and on the other advancing the province the wherewithal to pay back to the federal treasury the interest on its own loans. That is the sort of thing that is being done under this legislation. So long as that practice keeps up it simply means that in Canada we are heading towards bankruptcy.

The Minister of Finance may come and plead with the house that on ordinary expenditures he has pared things to the bone; but this expenditure is as much a charge upon the treasury as any other, and it is running wild with the taxes of the people of Canada to have money spent in the fashion it is. At the very beginning we on this side of the house urged as strongly as possible that a conference should be held between the dominion and the provinces, looking to some financial readjustment; we insisted that there ought to be an arrangement whereby the provinces woud secure what they were entitled to in the way of federal subsidies, and that a stop should be put to grants in aid in addition to subsidies. Grants in aid I believe were never intended by the fathers of confederation; I do not think they contemplated that such grants in aid should be made in addition to the regular subsidies.

It is perhaps not too late yet, and this is the only opportunity that may be available to urge this upon the ministry, to effect the necessary readjustment. I do say that while further borrowing is going on on the part of the provinces and municipalities the government ought to see that some arrangement is made whereby these moneys which we are voting to the provinces for relief purposes will not be made the means of enabling the provinces to continue carrying on a number of services which they are really unable to carry on by means of their own taxation. I venture to say that one of the effects of the money paid out of the federal treasury for relief purposes has been to cause the provinces and the municipalities in different parts of Canada to carry on a number of services which they would have abandoned long ago had we not been supplementing their treasuries in the way we have done; and if the federal government goes on supplementing provincial treasuries ad libitum in all parts of the dominion, then I say we can never hope to get out of the morass into which we are sinking financially as a consequence of such expenditures.

If parliament will designate the uses to which this money is to be put, and will exercise its own supervision over federal expenditures, I believe this House of Commons will be prepared to do its share to as large an extent as could possibly be desired in the endeavour to solve the unemployment problem. But the practice of having one authority raise the revenue and another authority spend the money thus raised is absolutely wrong. It is not a sound principle, and so long as it continues it will spell disaster to the financial operations of this country. The only body that has the right to expend moneys is the body that raises what is required by taxation, and vice versa.

May I say to the minister and to the government that in my view, another strong objection to the measure is that it gives no evidence of any comprehensive, coordinated, constructive policy on the part of the administration in dealing with this great problem of unemployment. It should have afforded the basis for a truly national people's movement which would have linked up the activities of individuals or organizations, municipalities and provinces in one great national endeavour to provide work and sustenance for all. After all, unemployment is the greatest problem before the people of Canada at the present time. The ministry to-day is simply washing its hands of any direct obligation in the matter apart from contributing money out of the federal public treasury for other public bodies to spend. That has been the mistake from the beginning. The government at the outset should have had its own policy and, in so far as federal moneys were being spent, they should have been spent under the direction of a commission which would have accounted for every cent to the ministry, and through the ministry, to parliament.

I intended, when speaking about the extent of controlling expenditures, to observe that an anomalous feature of this act is that the only limit that is stipulated anywhere with regard to any amount is that which is fixed in one of the clauses of the bill as to what is to be paid out in direct relief. What irony there is in the fact that in a relief measure which covers expenditures for almost everything the only thing limited in amount is the money that is to be spent in actual direct relief. As regards everything alse—and the ministry is practically free to use a blank cheque for any purpose—there is no limit whatever.

Another objection that comes to my mind is this. While this measure purports to be an act to aid in the relief of unemployment, it is in reality for two other purposes as well, purposes that are anything but justified in the light of existing circumstances. One of these purposes is to enable the ministry to carry out some of its policies in other directions, policies which are apart altogether from relief. For example, the ministry has a certain policy under the Canada-United Kingdom trade agreement. We were told that agreement would promote trade between the United Kingdom and ourselves. As a matter of fact, that agreement has not promoted trade to the extent which the ministry expected or hoped it would. What are they now preparing to do? They are going to use part of these unemployment moneys to subsidize the export of commodities from Canada to Great Britain; when the Minister of Finance comes down with his financial statement a year hence we will not be told that the cost of subsidizing this export trade is part of the ordinary expenditures of Canada, expenditures chargeable to the promotion of trade; we will be told that it is part of the expenditure on unemployment relief. That is wrong. More than that the minister knows, as I know, that included already in amounts that have been named for unemployment relief, so-called, there are charges that ought to have been made against the mounted police vote, representing money required for the purpose of increasing the mounted police force; there have been expenditures for railway ties amounting to over a million and a quarter dollars which should have been charged to the railway account. There has been legislation respecting amendments of the Bank Act and the Insurance Act and matters of the kind which should never have been dealt with under relief, but rather under the appropriate enactments, and discussed in parliament in relation to that legislation. So I say the act commits us to a number of objects which we should not be asked to be committed to at all in any measure relating to the relief of the unemployed.

The other great objection, Mr. Speaker, is that under the guise of dealing with a condition of distress, and largely because of existing fear that out of this distress some critical situation may arise, we are being asked to establish a dictatorship in this country. This power given to the governor in council to do anything at all in the name of peace, order and good government, with an open treasury at hand, would enable the governor in council if it was so desired, as I mentioned in a previous discussion, to bring an army here to overawe parliament. That could have been done legally under this measure but for the adoption of the amendment which was passed a moment ago, even though parliament was in session at the time, no matter how parliament might protest under its own laws. They may wish a Mussolini in Italy, a Stalin in Russia or a Hitler in Germany, but we do not need a dictator in Canada; we do not need anyone exercising that sort of arbitrary autocratic authority in this country, nor do we wish Canada to be placed in the same category as those other countries in dealing with any domestic situation. I cannot repeat too often, Mr. Speaker, that the pride and security of British peoples with respect to all such matters lie in their parliamentary institutions, and this parliament is the body to which the people of Canada must and have a right to look to have taxation controlled, and for peace, order and good government in the true sense of the words. The less we get away from relying upon the will of parliament as a whole, rather than upon the individual will of a few men, no matter how well intentioned, how earnest or how anxious they may be, and the more we rely upon the common will, the better it is going to be for everyone concerned.

It is little short of a tragedy, Mr. Speaker, when we consider that this parliament has been meeting now for almost three years, and that during all that time we have had this great unemployment problem before us as the most urgent of all problems and that there has been hardly any general discussion of that problem in this House of Commons. I refer particularly to hon. members on the government side of the house. How many members on the government side have given this House of Commons and the country the benefit of their knowledge of conditions in the communities from which they come? How many suggestions have we heard from across the way which would help meet the situation or assist in bringing about a constructive, comprehensive, coordinated policy? For the most part hon. gentlemen opposite have been wholly silent; they have left everything to the ministry, which has obtained from this parliament these absolute powers to do as it pleases. Now we are beginning to discover the cost; we are beginning to find that the moneys we have been spending are running up into colossal figures. I think the minister told us that in two years and two months which had elapsed at the time the estimate was made they have spent or loaned to provincial governments, with very little chance of being repaid, something like $115,000,000. I suppose if we keep on for another two years another $115,000,000 or more will have been spent in the same way. What does $115,000,000 represent? It represents more than the total expenditure of Canada in any one year prior to the war. We cannot go on spending $115,000,000 every two years under these blank cheques and this blanket authority and not expect the financial condition of this country soon to reach a point where the whole credit of the nation will be threatened, if indeed that point has not been reached already.

For the reasons I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, including the fact that apparently the government has no policy except the dole to the extent of $20,000,000, no constructive way of dealing with this all-important situation, we on this side of the house must strongly oppose the third reading of this bill.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, some of us are opposed to this bill but for reasons altogether different from those expressed by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). The right hon. gentleman feels very strongly that the constitutional aspect of the question is the important point. When the second reading of this measure was under consideration I voted with the leader of the opposition, not because I agreed as to the constitutional side of the question but because I objected to the limitation of $20,000,000 as the amount to be spent for direct relief. It seems to me that the constitutional point may be easily overdone. I recognize that there is a danger of giving the government very great and indeed almost dictatorial powers, but may I submit that to a large extent the government has those powers to-day, though they are not so complete as those to be conferred under the bill now before us.

The right hon. leader of the opposition spoke of parliament having been sitting for three years, and he said it had been almost impossible to get a full discussion of this matter. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is what we must expect under our present party system. The government has a clear majority of twenty or thirty; of course they can carry through any measure they may desire, and we are reduced to nothing much more than a debating society. I think we must recognize the actual position. We get up and utter our protests; we repeat them again and again, but we all know perfectly well that when all the protests are finished, under the present system the will of the government must prevail. So I do not think there is any use trying to deceive ourselves in the matter. The trouble is that as it is constituted to-day parliament is ineffective, and it seems to me that we must either reorganize our way of doing business in this country or if the business of the country is to be carried on we shall have to put up with some sort of dictatorship. I agree that to a considerable extent we have that dictatorship now, but by this measure we are simply taking another step in that direction.

Let me suggest, Mr. Speaker, that matters were not so very different before this government came into power, particularly with regard to unemployment. Some of us did our best to get the late government to act, but they sat tight and refused to do anything month after month and indeed year after year, though unemployment was gradually growing worse. I would rather give dictatorship to a group who would go ahead and help solve the problems facing the country than simply discuss matters here indefinitely and get nothing done. It is not so much the dictatorship I object to as the fact that the dictatorship is under a group of people having the ideals of the present government. I find that during these days the government is worrying about the protection of our credit and the financial position of Canada. I am not oblivious to the need that our credit and financial position should be protected, but I think there are other things a great deal more important. If we give great powers to the Dominion government and they proceed to use those powers in order that the banks and insurance companies may write up and keep written up their assets, and in order that loans may be made to the railways, I would say that the result will be disastrous indeed for this country. That is one consideration which makes me hesitate in giving more powers to a government that is so definitely committed to the priority of the financial interests of this country and that has so far so sadly neglected the interests of the great masses of our people.

There is, however, one consolation I have in the government taking this power of peace, order and good government, and that is that it effectively removes the objection that has been given us for weeks and months past, namely, that the government could do nothing in this matter because of lack of jurisdiction. We have been told again and again that this problem of unemployment was primarily one for the municipalities, secondarily for the provinces, and that only in the last remote contingency should the government of the dominion step in to do anything in regard to the matter. On the government's side constitutional questions were raised that they could not interfere with the jurisdiction of the provinces; that the latter might resent this kind of thing and so forth. I am glad to think that with these powers being taken over by the dominion government, there is absolutely no further excuse for inaction on their part.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will direct his attention to the statute, he will observe that this is within the legislative competence of parliament; there is no destruction of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but these are practically war measures, and in time of war almost anything comes within the legislative competence of parliament. These are the residual powers of government. I hope the Prime Minister will not try to evade the responsibilities of the power that he is taking by this legislation.

There is no reason why under this bill the Dominion government cannot give relief directly and on any scale it likes to individuals in any province of Canada. I would, however, point out that as far as we can ascertain, the purpose of securing powers of this kind is not primarily that we may provide for the needs of the unemployed. As the leader of the opposition has suggested, these powers may be used for repressive measures, for instance, still further to increase the mounted police force or of any other body of that kind. That is what I fear. I suspect the government is intent on repressive measures rather than on definite, constructive relief schemes. I would point out, as I have done before, that apart from the comparatively small provision that is being made for the movement back to the land, construction camps and camps under the jurisdiction of the military, the only plan that at the present time the government has put forward is that of providing doles. Several years ago, the Prime Minister said, and I think quite rightly, that what was needed was not the dole but work. That position has now been abandoned and the government says: We do not propose to provide work; we propose merely to provide the dole, direct relief. The only provision that we have at this time is this $20,000,000 to provide for the direct relief of a vast body of people.

Again let me repeat—and I think I shall put this in a way that is correct this time—that in the last year there have been 1,357,000 people receiving relief. As one moves up and down across the country, one cannot but be struck with the very large number of others who are receiving aid through private agencies and many in their own homes, for instance, relatives who are being supported and helped by their families. I should imagine the number who are really affected by unemployment to-day is nearer the 2,000,000 than the 1,300,000 mark. That is an appalling situation and we are proposing to meet it merely by means of the dole, and a very haphazard method, not the regularized one of unemployment insurance, not one by which those who work can directly help those out of work, as under a possible insurance scheme, not a plan that would in any sense give adequate maintenance, but one that gives the least possible assistance with which people can get along.

I do not think I would again have spoken on this subject to-day had I not received this morning a letter from the city of Montreal in which reference is made to a quarrel between the metropolitan area and some outlying suburban district on the question whether one pint of milk should be provided in a given case and whether a child of six or eight years should get or was too old to get the pint of milk that was allowed. It is disgraceful when we do not know whether we can get sufficient milk to provide for the young children of the country, and yet these are the low standards that generally prevail in many of our communities. It is very easy for the government to reply that this is entirely a provincial or municipal matter; that they do not set these standards; that they have set no limits to what they will do. In practice those limits are already set because the municipalities are so near bankruptcy that they cannot provide anything more than they are at present doing. Under such circumstances, so long as we maintain anything like the present arrangement of the federal government giving one-third, the provincial government giving one-third and the municipality giving one-third, this means inevitable hardships on our people. If we are going to give the dole at all, we should give it on an adequate scale; we should give relief in such a fashion that our people can maintain something like a healthy and decent standard of living.

Mr. YOUNG: Can we do that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am surprised that the hon. member for Weyburn should ask: Can we do it? Does he mean that the babies of this country have to suffer because we cannot finance an adequate relief scheme?

Mr. YOUNG: That is not what I mean.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does he mean that we have not the finances to do it? We have under this legislation the power to do it. The next question comes: Have we the finances to do it? I think there are certain possibilities even now of remunerative work. If the babies have not milk, why can we not put certain people to work on farms to produce more milk? If the children have not shoes, why can we not run some of these idle factories and provide shoes for the children? If we are having large numbers of people in our population wretchedly housed, why can we not put at least a certain number of mechanics at work to rebuild some of our slum areas? That is quite possible. There are other works that will not directly supply commodities, great public works that might be undertaken which would supply work to the people and at the same time distribute greater purchasing power among the population generally. I do not think the question to-day is primarily one of producing more necessities, it is rather one of distributing more purchasing power. Under our present wage system, the only way in which we can do that is to employ people and give them wages and then they can buy back what they produce. If people were getting steady wages to-day, they would not need to come to the municipal depots to get milk; they would buy it. If they had decent wages, they would not have to go to charitable institutions for shoes; they would buy them. If they were getting work, they would build their own homes. The trouble is that the people have not purchasing power. They cannot get money without working for it. Under these circumstances it seems to me that what should be given is work that will provide men and women in this country with wages. I do not think that any large majority of the people want to continue on charity, although if we keep on in this way very much longer we shall undoubtedly develop a class of people who will be lazy and look to the government for everything. At the present time most of our people want to work for what they get, but under our present arrangements we are not providing the work.

I think the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) in his question suggested the real answer so far as the government is concerned, that they cannot finance an adequate relief scheme. The budget however would seem to show that every cent in the form of interest that is demanded on the bonds outstanding has to be paid. The Prime Minister would tell us that that is a part of our national obligation. He would tell us that we must keep faith with the investors, and so on. Well, I should like to stand by all our obligations and keep faith with the investors, but, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we should keep faith with the people of this country who migrated here in order to make a living for themselves and their families, and we should keep faith with the sons of the pioneers who sacrificed one or two generations in order that their children and their grand-children would have a heritage in this Canada of ours. We are not keeping faith with the ordinary people of Canada. We are keeping faith, if you like, with the investors scattered all over the world, as is especially the case with those who hold railway bonds. We must keep faith with them, but what about keeping faith with our own people? There is nothing whatever said about them. We must protect our bondholders. Yes, I would say so, if we can do both, but undoubtedly if we cannot do both the welfare of the men, women and children of this country have priority over that of the bondholders.

Almost every class in the community is taking its loss. The business men have been taking their losses right along for some years now. The wage earners have been taking their loss in lower wages and in unemployment. The civil servants have been taking their loss in having their salaries cut and their positions in some cases abolished. Now the returned men are having to take their loss if the proposition as put forward in the budget goes through; their compensation is to be cut down more or less by the extent of their pension, or they are given a certain alternative. The effects of the depression are general. Everybody in this country is taking his loss with one exception, and that is the people who hold a mortgage on this country, the bondholders. Up to the present day they have not taken any loss whatever. Other investors have largely taken their losses through the depression in stocks. But not the government bondholders. They must be protected at any cost. I would say that as long as we have in this country as much wealth as is represented alone in the possession of government bonds, there is no reason why this government ought not to undertake adequate relief, and better still, why they should not undertake to provide work through which people would be able to provide for their own needs. In doing that they would provide greater purchasing power and start the wheels of industry going again.

The present bill gives the government practically war-time powers. I submit that if another war came on, we should readily find money to carry on the operations of that war. There is no doubt however that it would be quite possible to transport soldiers to the front. There is no doubt whatever that it would be possible for us to set a great many of our industrial plants going in order to manufacture munitions. There is no doubt whatever that we would set our textile mills and our shoe factories working again to provide the equipment necessary for the soldiers at the front. All that could be done. That in itself is an indication that in this war against poverty, if we took it seriously, we would be able to provide for the needs of the people. There is not the slightest doubt about that. I want to impress upon the government, and if I could upon the country at large, that the government having powers such as are taken by this bill there is no further excuse for not using these war-time powers in order from now on to provide for the needs of the Canadian people.

Just one other word. May I suggest that matters should not be allowed to drift on from year to year? As I said the other day, it seems to me that our whole policy of drift, because that is all you can call this hand to mouth policy, is the result of our impression that the depression was to be of very short duration. I suppose the government would not have taken these emergency powers except with the idea that we are in the midst of an emergency, and yet this emergency has already stretched out for several years and no one has been able to point to any reason why it should cease within the next few years. Unless there is a war or some world calamity of that kind it would seem as if this depression might readily extend for several years more. Even if there should be a little upward move it will mean several years before the vast majority of the people who are now unemployed can get back into remunerative work. Therefore I do plead with the government that there should be some constructive plan by which on a very large scale we can provide public works and stimulate private enterprises as long as they continue to exist, and thus in some measure increase the purchasing power of the people. Only thus can we prevent great masses of our population from being degraded as they are to-day by being kept on the dole, and prevent families from being broken up as they are to-day.

I hardly know how to vote on this bill if it comes to a vote. It is the only measure before us, and I suppose we might be expected to vote in favour of it because it is the only measure. But I do not like it. I think it is absolutely inadequate. I do not like the limitation of $20,000,000, and although I do not object to giving the government great powers I do feel, in view of their expressed sentiments and the record of the government during the last two or three years, that in giving these great powers we are running the risk of giving powers that will enable the government, as they would put it, to protect the credit and financial position of the country rather than to carry out what is the ostensible purpose of this bill, to provide for the needs of the people. I would urge upon the government, and I am sure that in this they can rest assured of the support of the whole house, that even during the remaining part of this session they should deliberately set out to plan some arrangement by which this great problem would be looked after in a more adequate fashion.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, had a commission been appointed to look after the expenditure of federal moneys for relief purposes, it would have served to bring out what the Prime Minister and the members of the government at the outset stated was their intention, that the moneys voted by the federal government for relief would go towards wages. I recall that at the time I asked the question, whether the money was intended to be for wages or to assist the provinces in purchasing machinery, and the reply I got from the government benches was that the moneys voted by the federal parliament were intended for wages. The other evening I pointed out to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) that there was also another intention of the federal government, so stated by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour himself, and in fact the regulations themselves provide for it, and that was that the moneys should be expended in a non-partisan manner. I pointed out to the Minister of Labour the other day where it was shown in the public accounts for the year 1931 that in the town of Kenora there were two hardware stores, one operated by a Liberal and the other by the president of the Conservative association. They were both good citizens; I have no complaint against either of them. In the Liberal store there was spent during the year the magnificent sum of $125, and in the store owned by the president of the Conservative association the sum of about $30,000.

This afternoon I received the public accounts for Ontario for 1932, and I believe the figures I am about to disclose will open the eyes of the Minister of Labour. I am not blaming him any more than that I believe he should have evolved some method whereby federal moneys should be spent in the way the federal government stated they would be spent, namely in a non-partisan manner. In the store owned by the Liberal only $373.76 was spent whereas in that owned by the president of the Conservative association $176,652.06 was spent. That is not fair; it is not right. If there is anything which would make me vote against this bill, it is the fact that I know the moneys are being spent by the government of Ontario in a partisan manner. We find the proof of it when we review the amounts spent in the stores of these two gentlemen. The Liberal has been in business for years, and his father was in business before him. He got only $373.76 because he was a Liberal, and it is quite evident that he had something the Conservative store could not supply, or he would not have got that much. On the other hand the store owned by the president of the Conservative association got business to the extent of $176,652.06. I ask the minister if he thinks that is fair, and if he is going to take steps to see that a square deal is given by the provincial legislature.

Mr. GORDON: For what year are those figures?

Mr. HEENAN: These figures are in the public accounts for 1932, which I just received to-day. I am not suggesting the money was not spent properly, or that proper value was not given. Other times in this House of Commons I have taken up the case of the ordinary labourers against whom there had been discrimination. I have stopped talking about them because I find that there are now hundreds of men in different parts of the country pleading their cause. I drew their case to the attention of the country, and the result is that others have taken the matter up, and consideration is now being given to it by the Ontario legislature.

However, the condition has spread to businessmen. We find that while in one store owned by the Conservative over $176,000 was spent, only $373 was spent in a similar store owned by a Liberal. I do not believe it is right to punish a man because of his political beliefs. The regulations under which the provincial legislature got this money were to the effect that it would be spent without either political or religious discrimination.

Mr. GORDON: There has never been any complaint.

Mr. HEENAN: What is the use of complaining? He would not have got the $373 if he had complained. I know there have been complaints, because time and time again the provincial government has been approached. Further, I would not mind if the workmen were getting what the government promised. Let us take, for example, the general work on the trans-Canada highway. We find that there was spent the sum of $10,839,688.74. Out of that amount $3,817,820.73 was spent for wages. The other amount is for the purchase of supplies, and one thing and another. Then, $12,622.56 was spent for police patrolling the highway. We paid the provincial police department a share of that amount of money. Surely the federal government ought not to pay the provincial legislature for policing of provincial highways.

I could go on, but I do not wish to be accused of being too narrow. In connection with the supply of provisions I shall refer to two Conservatives, because I do not believe there is a Liberal supplying provisions. Of the two Conservatives in question, the one who I believe is on the executive committee of the Conservative party supplied $17,565 worth of provisions, whereas the other one, who is not on the executive, supplied only about $2,000 worth.

Mr. GORDON: I understand camp supplies are arranged by contract.

Mr. HEENAN: I am only going by the record shown in the public accounts under the heading "provisions." I am satisfied the goods were purchased, and proper value was given, but I am suggesting that there was not a square deal. I know the minister must have his hands full directing the affairs of the Department of Labour, to say nothing of his other duties. Had he had a commission, that body could have seen that the moneys were spent in the proper manner. There might have been some kind of arrangement whereby the provincial governments could supply machinery and camps and the Dominion government pay wages. A division of expenditures could have been arranged so that we would have known what we were paying.

I have before me this book containing the public accounts and I defy any lawyer or auditor in the world, in fact I defy any person except the man who compiled the book, to gain very much information from it. Here we find page after page containing the names of hundreds of men who received payments ranging from $1 up to $176,000. The book does not show whether the men in question lived in Kenora or in some other part of the province. That is all the information we have before us, unless the minister could give us more. I do not believe he has it in his department. Even if he had he could not take the time to tell us just where the money went. Had there been a commission the minister would have known by this time how many men were unemployed, and how many were on relief. He could have known the trades those men had followed. For instance, he could have told us how many miners, carpenters and machinists were unemployed. I agree with the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) when he says this is the information we ought to have for future reference, because, as stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, even when we come to an end of this depression, unless there is a great change another will follow. With our new machinery and our added ability to produce more speedily and in larger quantities, unless our markets are enlarged it will not be many years before we have another period of depression, and my thought is that each succeeding depression will be more severe. So we ought to provide for that; we ought to know how many railway men we have out of work. I could tell you now pretty nearly how many you are going to throw out of work with the bill at present before the house, and those the railway companies with the encouragement of the present government have thrown out. We have a maximum of $20,000,000 to take care of those on relief. Where are you going to put all these railwaymen and their families? They have been working part time now for a number of years; they have no money put by. What are you going to do with them and with all those who are on relief at the present time—1,357,000? With $20,000,000 you would not give them five cents per head per day.

Mr. GORDON: That is five cents more than your party would give them.

Mr. HEENAN: We were giving men work at proper wages; we were not giving them doles. If the province had followed our lead and put on public works at proper wages the country would not be in the position it is in to-day. But you established this dole, and you see where it is leading. Having this information you would have known how many of various callings were out of work, would have been in a position to make provision for the future, would have known how these men could be fitted into occupations that we might be able to find for them.

As far as the provision relating to peace, order and good government is concerned, and having regard to the statement the Prime Minister made when he first introduced it, that its purpose was to take care of those who sought to disrupt our peace and harmony, and were not law-abiding citizens, I claim that provision has no business to be connected with an unempolyment relief measure. I consider it is an insult to the labour men of this country, who have shown the greatest of patience. I agree with our leader that there is time yet to appoint a commission; I think the government could get real value from it. We have had commissions on railways and commissions on radio and we are going to have a commission on finance; we have had commissions on the tariff, on the civil service, on almost everything in the world except the most important thing before us to-day, and that is the unemployment problem. I appeal once more to the government to appoint a commission so that we shall at least have some information on which to base our policy in the future. I appeal to the minister—I want the Finance minister to listen to me; the Minister of Labour cannot—he is occupied in talking to someone else. When the government first asked for $20,000,000 the Prime Minister said it was for the purpose of giving wages, and that it would operate in a non-partisan manner. I suppose we could bring up all sorts of cases from Nova Scotia, Quebec, British Columbia or somewhere else, but I am dealing only with the province I know and am here representing, and I say that when the president of a Conservative association in the hardware business in a little town like Kenora can get $176,000 of business while a Liberal in a similar store gets only $373, it is not a square deal; it is not what this parliament intended. I oppose the third reading of the bill.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Before this bill is read the third time I wish again to bring to the attention of the government a matter of which I have already spoken on a number of occasions, and I take this last opportunity to discuss it again. Perhaps the minister in charge of the bill will remember that when it was in the resolution stage, just before the Speaker left the chair, I mentioned the matter of potatoes. To some it may seem a small thing, but it is very important to the people affected, and although I have already stated the situation two or three times, it seems necessary to repeat it.

Last fall I received communications from my people requesting the privilege of bringing in potatoes free of duty from North Dakota. The first report was that they could get them for ten cents a bushel; indeed I think one telegram said six cents. To my request the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) replied by a question; he asked me if I thought ten cents a bushel was fair market value. I received further communications; this time my people could get these potatoes for nothing. Again I approached the Minister of National Revenue, but he told me there were better ways of dealing with the situation than by creating sectional tariffs. When I mentioned the matter on the last occasion I wanted to know what better way the government had in view to provide for the wants of these people than that of allowing them to get the potatoes in free. I received no answer on that occasion. I had decided that it would be necessary to let the matter drop, but since I last spoke of it in the house I have received another communication, which I propose to read. My first impulse was to read this letter to the house immediately on receiving it. I felt however that courtesy demanded that I again approach the minister. I did so and have waited until this moment to receive an answer, but so far none has been forthcoming.

The following is the letter I received:

Morden, Man.,
March 17, 1933.

Mr. J. L. Brown, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Brown,—

As I am the reeve of the municipality of Stanley now I am everlastingly asked why we cannot get potatoes from across the line as they are so cheap there. As I know, you have tried your best last fall to get the duty removed and failed, but now comes the time when people want a few bushels for seed and we wonder if it would be any good to try again. Dr. Wiebe—

Doctor Wiebe is the local member in the Manitoba house.

Doctor Wiebe said he would try and get a resolution through the provincial house regarding this. People have gone through the winter without any potatoes, or nearly so. We got a fine lot of vegetables donated by a society of Birtle last fall and we distributed them as fairly as we could. The largest family with fourteen at the table did not get any more than three small bags of potatoes and this is all they had all winter.

Hoping that you will try again and that you may succeed, I am,

Yours very truly,
J. H. Martens.

As I said, my first impulse was to bring the matter up when we were in the committee stage on this bill. However, I delayed, and I wrote this letter on March 22nd to the Minister of National Revenue:

Dear Sir,—

I am enclosing a copy of a letter from the reeve of a Manitoba municipality. In view of the communication that has passed between us in regard to this matter, there is no need for me to enter into further details. My first impulse on receiving this letter was to immediately read it in the house, and, if my sole desire were to make political capital out of the situation, I assure you this would afford me a good opportunity, as there is nothing that this government has done or failed to do, that has aroused greater resentment among the people of Manitoba than has this particular matter.

I shall be glad to hear from you at the earliest possible moment that you have decided to grant the request of these people with reference to the tariff on potatoes. If you cannot do this, then I want to know what is the better way that you suggested in a former communication.

Having refused to allow these people to supply their own needs in a way that would have cost the government nothing, I feel that their case demands special treatment and that some provision should be made for supplying them with the seed for the coming year. I do not know what the price of potatoes will be in Dakota this spring but naturally they cannot expect to get them as cheap as they could have last fall.

I bring this matter again to the attention of the minister directly in charge of this bill and I urge on him that he do something to implement the promise—perhaps it was not a promise, so I will say suggestion—that there was a better way of dealing with this question than by granting sectional tariffs. It would not have been an unheard of proceeding had the request of these people been granted. On two different occasions the government of Canada allowed seed to come in from Dakota to serve a community only a little further west than the community referred to in this communication. On one occasion I brought the matter to the attention of the Liberal government and action was taken in less than two weeks. I had occasion to bring the matter to the attention of the present government and it took them about six months, when finally the request of the people to be allowed to import hay and straw free of duty was granted.

Now this is a serious matter to these people. I think the government has already received a resolution that was passed in the Manitoba legislature dealing with the same matter, and I may add that when it was being considered last fall the Manitoba government undertook to see that the privilege, if granted, would not be abused; that is to say, they undertook to see that no person should be allowed to make it a commercial transaction but that the people would supply only their own needs.

I again ask the minister in charge of this relief measure this question: What better way has the government in view to meet the situation than by creating a sectional tariff, according to the statement of the Minister of National Revenue? I call this to the hon. gentleman's attention now. I would have deferred making further reference to it, and giving the Minister of National Revenue a chance possibly to reply to my last communication. However, having waited some days, and no reply having been received, I deem it necessary, since the bill is about to get its third reading, to bring the matter once more to the attention of the government.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I have one suggestion to offer to the Minister of Labour. When the bill was being discussed in the house he intimated that it was the intention of the government to try to provide useful work for the thousands of single unemployed men in the camps in British Columbia. In that connection I have a suggestion which I think has merit. As the hon. gentleman well knows, our forests are being gradually depleted. In New Westminster we have a plant which is used for the extraction of seeds from coniferous trees such as spruce, firs and balsam. These seeds are shipped to practically every country in the world but we in Canada are not using any of them. We have also dominion national parks as well as the provincial parks, and I would suggest to the minister that when he is looking around for useful work for the thousands of single homeless men who have been fed and looked after during the past winter, the question of reforestation be given serious consideration. I do not think we should wait until all our forests are depleted. Why should Canada provide seed for every other country while we in this country do not take care of our own forests, looking to the future? I offer this suggestion to the minister in all seriousness. I submit that it is meritorious and should be carried out, in view of the fact that we have seed and we have land which originally grew forests and which is ready for another crop.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Much as I should like to assist the government and give them a free hand in dealing with the problem of unemployment, I shall be compelled to vote against the bill in its present form. I had long an opinion that as far as giving relief to the unemployed was concerned, the reason the government wanted this power was not in order that they might have a free hand to give as much relief as possible to the unemployed but to give as little as possible. I am strengthened in that feeling by a statement made by the Prime Minister last year, when he said that having the bill in this form, without a definite figure for any particular need, the government had saved millions of the taxpayers' money. I am further strengthened in the conviction by the fact that this year the government have fixed a limit to the relief to be granted to the unemployed, notwithstanding that they have reserved the right for every other purpose, to spend as much as they wish.

Unemployment is increasing rapidly in this dominion. I am in constant touch with the unemployment situation in the city of Vancouver, from which I come, and the unemployed families on relief there now total almost ten thousand. The cost of relief in that city for the first two weeks of March, up to March 15, was $96,000 as compared with $74,000 last year, or an increase of $22,000. If we take the official weighted index of employment for the month of February and compare that with the weighted figure in the month of June, 1931, when the census was taken and when we got the most reliable figures with regard to unemployment conditions which we have yet had placed before us, we find that in June, 1931, the weighted number was 103·6, and the number of people in employment was 2,172,000. In February of this year the weighted index number was 76·8, a decline of 26·8. On the same basis the number of employed in February would be 2,172,000, less the 26·8 per cent, or 1,590,000. So that on this basis the unemployed in the dominion at the present time number 1,025,400. In the face of this, and in view of the amount we have spent this year in direct relief, the government is placing a limit of $20,000,000 to meet such a situation—a situation which, as I have pointed out before, is constantly getting worse because the provincial governments and the municipalities are less able to take care of it than they were a year ago.

I am sorry I cannot give my support to the government in passing this measure as it stands at the present time, with a limit set to the amount which may be appropriated for direct relief.

Mr. BROWN: Has the minister any statement to make in reply to my question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister, on the third reading, has no right of reply.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house resumed from Tuesday, January 31, consideration in committee of Bill No. 11, to amend the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur) in the chair.

On section 10—Application of sections.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): I am told that all the sections have been passed with the exception of section 10. Shall section 10 carry?

Section agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: I have one amendment to propose which I think will not be questioned. I wish to add section 11, to correct an error in the French version. My hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue will move the amendment. This is to make the French version conform to the English version, which was amended in 1926. That amendment was not inserted in the French version in the revised statutes of 1927, and this is merely to correct that error.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move that the bill be amended by adding at the end thereof the following section:

11. Section 79 of the French version of the said act is amended by inserting the words "au moins" after the words "d'une amends de vingt-cinq piastres," in the said section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just for the sake of information I should like to ask the minister if there is not some general rule or law which covers the translation of statutes that would render this amendment unnecessary?

Mr. RHODES: There is some such rule but apparently this was a pure omission in the codification of the law in 1927. This is merely to make the law conform to the actual bill that was passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It does seem to me that somewhere there is a statute that governs. If a bill passes this house in one language to all intents and purposes it is passed in both. Surely it is not necessary to bring in an amendment to the French translation of an English bill which has passed the house.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman has overlooked the fact that this was a revised statute. When the revision was made some words were omitted and there is no provision by which they can be added unless an amendment is made to put them into the French version. The same thing happened in one or two other measures, only the words were left out in the English version. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman will recall that we had to amend the English version of one of the revised statutes because in the revision words were left in that should have been deleted and in one case words were added that should not have been there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The revised statutes?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. In an ordinary statute, as the right hon. gentleman says, the matter would have been covered by the ordinary rule.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur-Thunder Bay) in the chair.

Immigration and Colonization—salaries and contingencies, $228,042.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is under civil government, is it?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister, ever since this session opened, has been inveighing pretty strongly against immigration, but he does not seem to have reduced his staff to any extent. How does he reconcile his view that we ought to end immigration with the fact he is still maintaining such a staff?

Mr. GORDON: If the right hon. gentleman will look at the figures for 1929-30, 1930-31, 1931-32, and 1932-33 and note the comparison, he will see that there has been a very large reduction in expenditures, but the reduction this year is not so large because I find that the inspectional service along the international boundary is unquestionably a much more difficult task at the present time than it has been for many years past. For some reason—and perhaps this may be an indication of the fact that Canada is not as bad a place as we paint it in this chamber—many people are seeking admittance. Of course at any time undesirables should be excluded, but at this time even people who under normal conditions might be desirable, have to be inspected with a good deal of care in order that our labour market may not suffer by the admission of persons who will enter industry and other activities, thus rendering the position of our own workmen more difficult. That is the main reason why very little decrease is shown in civil government this year.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should like to ask rather a general question: When the Minister of Finance introduced his budget, he indicated that there would be a further cut in all the estimates averaging about ten per cent in each department. These estimates of course, do not indicate that cut. Are we to understand that each of these estimates will be cut by ten per cent, or are we voting the full amount without that deduction, the government, while having that full amount voted, in the budget pledging themselves to spend only ninety per cent of the money voted?

Mr. GORDON: The decrease that is indicated in item 18 is by reason of a reduction in salaries and of not filling positions that have become vacant.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is not my question.

Mr. GORDON: There is a ten per cent deduction from the vote as indicated, the details of which are found on page 74.

Mr. SPENCER: With regard to the Canadian doctors who were sent to Great Britain and Europe when immigration was coming to this country in good volume, has it been found possible, now that immigration has been reduced considerably, to cut down that staff of doctors?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, the staff has been reduced very materially. Right now we have about six doctors, while prior to, say, three years ago, we had something like fifteen or sixteen.

Mr. SPENCER: Where are they stationed?

Mr. GORDON: Three are stationed in Great Britain and three on the continent, one at Paris, one at Antwerp, and one I think at Rotterdam.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I do not think the minister quite caught the gist of my question; I may not have put it clearly. It was this: When the budget was presented, the Minister of Finance made the statement that in addition to the reduction in expenditures as shown in the estimates as they now appear, a ten per cent flat deduction would be made in the interests of economy. That deduction does not, of course, appear in the estimates because they were prepared and presented to the house before the Minister of Finance made his statement. Are these estimates to be considered as being voted less ten per cent, or are we voting the original amount and does the government then in effect pledge itself to expend only ninety per cent of the money now voted, in order to comply with the statement of the Minister of Finance that an additional cut would be made in the estimates of ten per cent in the interests of economy?

Mr. GORDON: With respect to at least the item at present under discussion the decrease as shown, plus the ten per cent statutory deduction, is all that the government has in contemplation unless during the course of the year some further reductions can be made. This vote, as I have indicated, covers salaries for officers on the boundary and in Europe, and there will be no further ten per per cent cut.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The further ten per cent reduction as intimated by the Minister of Finance will not apply to the salary votes but only to the other votes?

Mr. GORDON: That is the way I understand it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was wondering just where it did apply.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is hard to determine exactly what the salaries are under the Department of Immigration and Colonization, as they are spread over so many votes; for instance, under vote 18, the details of which are shown on page 74, and then under vote 63 we have immigration, salaries and contingencies, $1,417,000. Can the minister tell us what salaries would be included under vote 63 in addition to those detailed on page 74?

Mr. GORDON: The item we are now discussing is for salaries at Ottawa generally speaking—

Mr. MALCOLM: The permanent staff?

Mr. GORDON: Generally speaking, and the others are outside of Ottawa, in Europe and on the boundary.

Mr. MALCOLM: Under item 18, according to the details set out on page 74, the total staff cost $228,380, from which is deducted the statutory ten per cent, leaving a balance of $205,542. I undertood the minister to say a moment ago that the promised economy of the Minister of Finance in his budget speech of a few days ago will not have any effect on this vote. Might I ask the minister, in view of the desire of the Minister of Finance to effect economies, why he needs to retain at this time, when he is not encouraging immigration, a director of publicity at $4,320, and an assistant director of publicity at $3,000? What publicity are we engaging in to secure immigration at the moment, when it has been intimated we are trying to discourage it?

Mr. GORDON: The publicity branch, when I took charge of the department, was quite a large one. Now it consists of the officers as indicated, a director of publicity, with an assistant and, I think, one or two stenographers. Their work consists of answering communications from the United States, because it will be recalled that up until two years ago we had some sixteen officers, if I remember correctly, in various parts of the United States, and we had many forms of advertising in Great Britain and on the continent, showing the opportunities and attractiveness of Canada to people who might come to this country and colonize. That staff was entirely done away with following the policy inaugurated in the fall of 1930. The designation of the position, director of publicity, is hardly a correct one, but it was the designation given by the Civil Service Commission when the office was created, and it has been retained. The activities of these four officers are in assisting the attempt that we are making to do some colonizing at home, a matter which has been discussed very often in this house, and I can assure the committee that these men are working and earning their money. It is, comparatively speaking, a very small staff.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In regard to the ten per cent deduction of $22,838, as shown on page 74 of the details, I presume that that cut applies to certain ex-service men on the staff. Will the proposed pensions deductions referred to in the budget the other day apply to these men, plus the ten per cent reduction referred to in the item, amounting to $22,838?

Mr. GORDON: I prefer to let the Minister of Finance answer the question, but if my information is helpful I would suggest that it would apply.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So that we may have the ten per cent reduction applying to all, and the special pension reduction under the terms of the budget?

Mr. GORDON: I should think so, yes.

Mr. LUCAS: Have we any immigration officials in the United States at the present time?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. POULIOT: As the Department of Immigration is a minor department, and as the Department of Labour is one of the important departments, would it not be more appropriate for the minister to be called the Minister of Labour and acting Minister of Immigration, instead of Minister of Immigration and acting Minister of Labour?

Mr. GORDON: I do not know that it would make much difference—"A rose by any other name...."—but the fact is that I have been appointed Minister of Labour and am acting Minister of Immigration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How many immigrants have come into Canada during the last year, and from where?

Mr. GORDON: I shall have that information in a minute, if the right hon. gentleman would let the matter stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are there as many immigrants as there are members of the staff?

Mr. GORDON: In 1931 there were 27,530 immigrants admitted, and in 1932, there were 20,591.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What countries were they from, chiefly?

Mr. GORDON: In 1931: British, 7,678; United States, 15,195; all other countries, 4,657. In 1932: British, 3,327; United States, 13,709; all other countries, 3,555.

Mr. BENNETT: Canadians coming home.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the minister any way of telling whether any of these immigrants have received relief since coming to Canada, or whether they have been self-supporting?

Mr. GORDON: I think I am safe in saying that the great majority of these immigrants are the wives and children of men who have been legally admitted. In each case before the wives and children are admitted investigations are made to see that the heads of the families here are established ready and willing to support the people coming in. I have heard of no case where any immigrant admitted since 1930 has had to accept relief in any way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of the total sum of over $1,641,000 for the Department of Immigration, what is the estimate of the amount that can be saved by the suggested pension legislation contained in the budget address? Has any estimate been made?

Mr. GORDON: I presume the hon. member is speaking of the vote contained under civil government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, vote 63 plus the civil government vote.

Mr. GORDON: I think it will be found that very little, if any, further reduction can be made. An extensive reorganization of this department took place about eighteen months ago. A great number were retired and I seriously doubt if any further reductions can be made and the necessary efficiency maintained.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think the minister understands my question. Would he make an estimate of the amount of money which would be saved to the treasury out of this $1,641,000 as a result of ex-service men having to forego either pensions or salaries?

Mr. BENNETT: Not their pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Their salaries.

Mr. GORDON: No estimate was made with respect to that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to ask whether the government has in mind compliance with the convention of the International Labour office with respect to the exchange of the publication of information and statistics on immigration and emigration?

Mr. GORDON: I have not sufficient material before me to answer the hon. member, but I believe the question might better be put when Labour estimates are under consideration. It would seem however that this and the preceding government endeavoured to carry out all their obligations and commitments with respect to the matter to which the hon. member has just referred. I shall look into the matter and when the Labour estimates are under review shall be glad to give any information I have.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is definitely an immigration matter. I have long felt that there should be some statistics on record concerning immigration. I do not believe it should be necessary to put a question on the order paper to learn about the flow backwards and forwards of the various nationalities. That information should be available to hon. members, and possibly could be made up twice yearly, or at some other definite period.

Mr. GORDON: Each month a statement covering the information to which the hon. member has referred is issued to the public press by the Department of Immigration, and annually a very detailed statement is printed, published and laid upon the table of the house in which all the information to which reference has been made is set out in detail.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has the minister the number of immigrants who have left the country during the past year, voluntarily and involuntarily? I was wondering how they balanced.

Mr. GORDON: The only figures available would be with respect to cases which have come under review by the department. I do not think we have any record of those who left voluntarily.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In other years the minister has had the information,—obtained, I imagine either from the border officials or from officials of the country to the south. From time to time reasonably close estimates have been made of the numbers who had left the country during the year. I was wondering if the Minister has such figures at hand, because these questions are asked annually, and usually are answered.

Mr. GORDON: No record is kept of those who leave the country voluntarily. I am fairly certain that the number is comparatively small.

Mr. MALCOLM: Has the minister a record of the number of Canadians returning from the United States during the past year

Mr. GORDON: A statement of that kind we get from the American authorities.

Mr. MALCOLM: Surely we keep those figures ourselves?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figures before me at the moment, but I will get them.

Mr. MALCOLM: I submit that the figure it is difficult to get is the number of Canadians going across the border outward bound. But we do through our immigration officials have the figures of those coming in.

Mr. GORDON: Before the estimates are finally disposed of I will investigate and have a statement made.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order

END OF VOLUME III.
