HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

FOURTH SESSION—TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT

9-10 ELIZABETH II

VOLUME V, 1960-61

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE ELEVENTH DAY OF MAY 1961, TO THE FIRST DAY OF JUNE, 1961, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

ROGER DUHAMEL, F.R.S.C.
QUEEN'S PRINTER AND CONTROLLER OF STATIONERY

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 11, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, the President of the United States will speak to a joint meeting of the House of Commons and Senate on Wednesday afternoon beginning at 2.30. It occurred to me that the house might give some consideration to the order of business that day.

As usual the house will convene at 11 o'clock in the forenoon. We could then continue until one o'clock. Many preparations have to be made in order to make possible the joint meeting of the two houses, and by the time the afternoon proceedings have concluded and we are in a position to have the staffs clear away the chairs, radio, television equipment and the like, most of the afternoon would have passed away before any business could be done.

I hope the house might agree that at the conclusion of the President's address we would not reconvene. If that is accepted in place of a motion, I offer to the house the suggestion that on Wednesday next at one o'clock when the adjournment takes place the house be formally adjourned until the next day. I hope there can be agreement in that connection.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): The arrangements which the Prime Minister has outlined for next Wednesday are satisfactory to us on this side.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Agreed here, also.

Mr. Speaker: Then I take it that by unanimous consent the house orders that on Wednesday next when the house adjourns at one o'clock it shall stand adjourned until the following morning at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ARRANGEMENTS FOR PHOTOGRAPH OF HOUSE IN SESSION

Mr. Speaker: While we are discussing the arrangements for Wednesday, may I ask leave of hon. members—and if there is no dissident voice I take it I have leave—to arrange a photograph of the house. We shall have the facilities in connection with the President's visit and, the following morning, a good photograph, which does not exist today, of the house in session could be taken by leaving some equipment here for that purpose.

I would not consider making the arrangement if there were any objection raised in regard to it, but if there is not I think hon. members might like to have a good photograph of the house in session which we could use in our gallery pamphlet and booklets.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—TABLING OF COMMUNIQUE ON OSLO MEETING

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yesterday I stated that I would ask leave to table a copy of the communique which was issued at the conclusion of the NATO ministerial meeting which took place in Oslo from May 8 to 10. I should also like to make a statement to supplement the communique. The Secretary of State for External Affairs will, when he returns, give the house the benefit of the impressions he formed in the course of the meeting. However, there are some general observations which might be made.

The NATO foreign ministers usually meet in the spring each year to review the various problems confronting the alliance. Military problems are not excluded from the discussion, although the defence posture of the alliance is usually examined in greater detail at the December meeting, which is attended as well by the defence and finance ministers of the various member countries. It was the first meeting of the council under the chairmanship of the new secretary general, Mr. D. U. Stikker of the Netherlands.

In Oslo the foreign ministers stressed once more the defensive character of the alliance, but recognized that the menace which drew them together is now not only military but also has world wide political, economic, scientific and psychological aspects. They reaffirmed NATO's determination to help build a world free from war and also free from the false Marxist doctrine of continuing and inevitable conflict.

One of the main threats to world peace is the lack of progress in the solution of the problem of Germany, including Berlin. The foreign ministers re-emphasized that such a solution can only be found on the basis of self determination. They reiterated the determination of all to maintain the freedom of West Berlin and its people. As to the often repeated threat by the Soviet union to sign a separate peace treaty, they reaffirmed the statement in the 1958 declaration that the denunciation by the Soviet union of the inter-allied agreements on Berlin can in no way deprive the other parties of their rights or relieve the Soviet union of its obligations.

While Germany and Berlin may be the most immediate potential cause of friction between the Soviet and the west in Europe, the NATO council continued to be concerned about the need for progress toward disarmament. The council expressed the hope that the proposed discussions between the United States of America and the U.S.S.R. would permit the resumption of negotiations at the end of July, and reaffirmed the western objectives of disarmament by stages under effective international control. A major first step toward disarmament would be the conclusion of an agreement on the suspension of nuclear tests. The foreign ministers expressed the hope that the U.S.S.R. would revise its attitude and will agree to consider the draft treaty tabled by the United States of America and the United Kingdom.

The council also gave high priority to the question of assisting less developed areas of the world and of NATO in raising their standards of living.

The ministers stressed once more the need for close consultation between NATO members to develop an increased unity of purpose within the alliance. This question of consultation has been the subject of consideration throughout the years, and more and more it becomes mandatory that consultation shall be even closer than it has been heretofore.

The ministers also instructed the permanent council to keep under constant review NATO's military posture and to report to the ministerial meeting in December.

Sir, with the leave of the house I table the communique.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to receive this preliminary report from the Prime Minister on the NATO meeting in Oslo. We will no doubt be hearing in greater detail from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he returns, as to the results of the meeting. There is no doubt that this meeting took place at a very important moment in NATO's history, and that there were many problems and difficulties which had to be faced.

We all hope that the meeting itself, under the chairmanship of the distinguished new secretary general, Mr. Stikker, will help to ensure progress in the solution of these problems and difficulties. It is clear from the communique that many of these problems are concerned with issues strictly outside the NATO geographical area, but from which NATO members cannot isolate themselves. It is important that NATO should make progress, and it is satisfying to learn that this council meeting has made some contribution to that progress. At this time, of all times, NATO should be strong and united, not only for defence but in the building up of the North Atlantic community.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all listened with interest to the statement of the Prime Minister with respect to the communique issued at the conclusion of the NATO meeting. We in this group were very glad to hear of the change of direction, and that emphasis is not only being placed on the military aspect but on the psychological, cultural and economic aspects, as well as the desire of NATO to work to develop self determination. When we say that we must not forget that there is one country which is a member of NATO, Portugal, which has a colony known as Angola where there is slave labour and suppression of freedom.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the matters on which the hon. member is commenting do not arise from the statement of the Prime Minister. That statement was made for the information of the house, and does not give hon. members an opportunity to roam about the field of international affairs.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to wander, but was making those remarks as a prelude to my conclusion. We in this group are very pleased to know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is concerned with these matters.

HIGHWAYS

NEW BRUNSWICK—AGREEMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF ACCESS ROAD

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that under the roads to resources program, agreement has been reached with the province of New Brunswick for the immediate construction of an important road to develop the resources of that province. Construction of some 75 miles of road in the north central part of New Brunswick west of Bathurst, to provide access to a major mineralized zone, is involved in the project.

The first stage of construction provides for a road north from Heath Steele across the Nepisiguit river and thence westerly for two miles to the Wedge property of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. This will bring the mine into production and reactivate the smelter at Heath Steele by 1962. The cost of construction of this section of road will be divided among the province, the federal government and the company directly benefiting. In subsequent years this road will be extended north a further 16 miles to connect with an east-west development road of approximately 50 miles in length to be constructed under this program.

It is expected that the project will result in a mining complex which will make a real contribution toward stimulating employment and economic opportunities generally in the northern part of the province. I think hon. members will agree it is an excellent example of the kind of resource development contemplated in the roads to resources program.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—REPORTED EXISTENCE OF SOVIET MISSILE BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): May I put a question to the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Speaker. I apologize for not giving him notice, but I have been in committee since 9.30 and did not have an opportunity to reach him. Has the minister any information that would indicate the existence of a Soviet missile base on the island of Cuba? Would the minister care to comment on a press report over the radio this morning concerning this possibility?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Was the hon. member's question about a missile base in Cuba?

Mr. Carter: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I fail to see how the hon. member can bring that subject under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, would you not agree that a Soviet missile base in a neighbouring country would be a matter of concern and interest to this country and its government?

Mr. Speaker: I agree that it is a matter of interest, but I do not think it is the administrative responsibility of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Pearson: Is it not part of the responsibility of the minister and the government to consider a missile base in an adjoining country?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps so, but it is not of such immediate consequence and urgency as to permit a question to be asked at this time. I think hon. members will agree that if I permitted the question it would be permissible to ask whether any of the republics in Africa were acquiring submarines for the purpose of attacking Canada, or a variety of questions on which obviously the house should not spend its time on the orders of the day; therefore, with all due respect to the hon. member who posed the question, I do not consider it appropriate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRANSPORTATION—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to inform the house whether legislation will be introduced at this session based on the MacPherson royal commission report on transportation? I wonder whether the Prime Minister could assure those communities in the country which are dependent on branch line railway service that there will be no wholesale abandonment of branch railway lines pending the introduction of legislation based on this report.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as one who knows something of the advantages of branch lines in the province of Saskatchewan in the early years, continuing until today, I am sure every consideration will be given by the railroads to assuring that in the years ahead the services rendered shall be those that are requisite.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

DORVAL AIRPORT—COMPLAINTS RESPECTING VACCINATION PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he received a communication from Mr. Woodrow Wyatt, United Kingdom member of parliament, or from any other passengers travelling from overseas by air complaining about the procedure involved in getting their vaccinations checked at the Montreal airport?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, almost simultaneously with the receipt of a letter dated the 8th of this month I heard the substance of that letter over the radio. That is just a coincidence, but it indicates that even before I had an opportunity to have the matter looked into the requisite publicity was given to it by someone not connected with my office. The Minister of National Health and Welfare may be able to give an answer with respect to the matter raised.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I was sorry to learn that Mr. Woodrow Wyatt experienced inconvenience during his medical clearance at Dorval. Because of limitations of space it simply has not been possible to clear passengers in a location other than the main terminal building. However, I have been trying to improve this situation, and a small office closer to the landing field will be opening very soon on a trial basis. This involved some construction and the provision of vaccination facilities, but all the arrangements are virtually completed.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a supplementary question. Is anything being done by the departmental officials concerning the long distances it is necessary for passengers to walk in order to embark or disembark at Montreal airport?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are always open to any good suggestions. We have received suggestions from time to time from the general public and from members of parliament, and I can say that at the present time my department has the matter under very serious consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: Has consideration been given to moving walks such as I understand are used in many other terminals?

Mr. Balcer: The information I have is that this would involve an expense of close to $300,000. I also understand that the experience with these walks has not been a very happy one. Before we do anything along this line we must make sure that we have the type of facility that will really render good service to the public and at the same time will not involve too heavy a burden on the taxpayers.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the case of persons who have vaccination certificates and are simply in transit, would it not be possible to have them checked right on the aircraft and only require those persons who do not have certificates to disembark?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am going to look into this particular case and one or two other complaints I have had along this line and examine them very carefully.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

THE CENSUS

BROADVIEW RIDING—POLITICAL AFFILIATION OF COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister tell us whether the four ladies appointed census commissioners in Broadview riding, and who are members of the Broadview-Riverdale women's Progressive Conservative Association have husbands and whether these men are gainfully employed?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, some have and some have not.

Mr. Garland: Would the minister answer the important balance of the question?

Mr. Hees: I did not notice that there was any important balance of the question.

Mr. Garland: It may not be important to the minister, but it is important to national employment.

(Translation):

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—PROPOSED YEAR ROUND OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Has the government received representations from the provincial government in Quebec concerning the possibility of keeping the St. Lawrence open for shipping on a year-round basis, and could the minister indicate what is the position of the federal government in this regard?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall having received any such communication from the provincial government in Quebec.

However, with regard to the second part of the hon. member's question, may I say that the Department of Transport is interested in any suggestion or any study that could lead to an improvement of shipping in Canada.

TRANSPORT

SOULANGES CANAL—LETTER FROM MEMBER FOR VAUDREUIL-SOULANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Has the minister seen a letter published in Le Devoir on May 8, 1961 over the signature of the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges, concerning the Soulanges canal?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the letter in question, but I must say I have had several exceedingly constructive talks on that subject with the member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges.

Mr. Clermont: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Minister of Transport indicate under what authority the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges prevented the Soulanges canal from being turned over to the province of Quebec?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, this government always pays close attention to responsible suggestions made by hon. members with regard to any such projects.

I think the offer we made to the province of Quebec to surrender for one dollar 13 miles of the Soulanges canal for the purpose of using it as a fish hatchery was reasonable and indeed generous; and our decision to temporarily set aside certain parts of the property in case some industrial concerns might be interested in locating there was justified in the circumstances.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): A supplementary question. Has the minister had occasion to prepare an answer to the question I asked him last week, in which I asked which chamber of commerce had asked the minister to set aside a mile of the Soulanges canal for industrial purposes?

Mr. Balcer: It is the chamber of commerce of Vaudreuil-Soulanges. I have in my hand a very well written pamphlet which indicates the industrial advantages to be found in this beautiful area close to Cascades, which, as requested by the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges, we are anxious to offer to Canadian or foreign industries.

P.E.I. CAUSEWAY—REQUEST FOR FINAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he expects to have available for the house before the end of this month the final report on the feasibility and cost of the causeway to Prince Edward Island?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): As you know, Mr. Speaker, this is a tremendous project and of necessity requires the most minute investigation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Walker: As to whether or not it will be available, I am not in a position at the present time to say. What significance can there be in wanting it by the end of the month?

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Does he not realize that the people of Prince Edward Island would like him to get on with this project as was promised?

Mr. Walker: For 22 years under the Liberal administration nothing was done.

Mr. Pickersgill: The usual answer.

Mr. Peters: You'll have to wait for the New party for that to happen.

Mr. Howard: I decline to comment on that last interjection, although I think it is a quite proper one.

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—STATEMENT ON MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate inquired concerning the spur line from Springhill to Springhill Junction. I might say that the hon. member for Cumberland recently came to see me with a delegation from the town of Springhill, and the additional representations put forward were referred to the Canadian National Railways. There have also been discussions with the provincial government, but all I can say at the moment is that the matter is still under very serious consideration.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

REQUEST FOR INCLUSION OF HIGHWAY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): While I am on my feet, I wonder whether I might ask if the Minister of Public Works is in a position to give an answer to my question of yesterday.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): In answer to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked a similar question of the former minister of public works. The answer was then and still is that the locale of the trans-Canada highway or its route was fixed by the province of British Columbia at the inception of the agreement, and on each renewal of the agreement the same route has been signified and was included in schedule A of the agreement last year, namely from Nanaimo to Victoria on Vancouver Island. The hon. member will therefore appreciate that there is no legislative authority which we could invoke under the Trans-Canada Highway Act to make any extensions.

As a matter of fact we would be very grateful if the province of British Columbia would undertake to complete as soon as possible the very large amount of highway which still has to be completed. To this end I wish to reiterate that the federal government has spent in the province of British Columbia upwards of $100 million on this highway.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question. I wonder if I may ask the minister, with respect to the questions asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni of the minister's predecessor, whether those questions were predicated upon telegrams or communications from the highways minister also, or whether perhaps this particular telegram to which he refers has some connection with events in Esquimalt-Saanich?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I certainly admire the perspicacity of the hon. member who has asked that question. I think the minister of highways in British Columbia is always flying a political kite one way or another.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PUBLIC RELATIONS OFFICER, HIGH COMMISSIONER TO U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I appear to have had a great deal of difficulty with the Hansard reporters. I wonder if I could ask for another correction. At page 4604, in a question to the Prime Minister, I am quoted as saying "the salary structure and promotion steps of Mr. Stepler". What I said was "the salary structure and expense allowance". I wonder whether the Prime Minister is in a position to answer that question?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will read further in Hansard he will find that I suggested that the question should be put on the order paper. May I say also that the time of the house is valuable, and that it should not be taken up in making unimportant corrections in Hansard. The opportunity is afforded to every member to go to the editor's office, read the script of what he has said, and make his corrections on the day the speech is made. There is also an opportunity to make corrections in the final revised copy. I therefore think it is incumbent on all hon. members to use restraint in using the time of the house for the purpose of making corrections in the reports of the debates.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege affecting myself and every hon. member of this house, while I cannot find the direct Hansard reference immediately I recall a statement by Your Honour on a previous occasion in which you admonished hon. members for making corrections in Hansard in the Hansard office and said the proper place to make them was in the house itself.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Howard: Yes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VISIT OF PREMIER OF ISRAEL TO CANADA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I revert to motions because of an announcement to be made respecting a visit to Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to inform hon. members of this house that the premier of Israel, Mr. David Ben-Gurion, has accepted an invitation to visit this country. He will arrive in Ottawa on May 24 for a two day visit and will thereafter spend a brief period privately in this country. He will be visiting the United States, of course, during the month.

Canada will welcome Mr. David Ben-Gurion as the distinguished leader of a young and vigorous state whose energy and guidance have been so important in the rapid progress made by his country. It is the hope of the government and people of Canada that the close and friendly relations which have existed between our countries since the founding of Israel will continue to grow. The visit is regarded as a further step in that direction.

This will be the premier's first visit to Canada as premier of his country. During the visit matters of common interest to our two countries will be discussed, and I feel sure both countries will benefit by the exchange of views which will be made possible by the visit.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in recent years Canada has received many very distinguished visitors, but I am sure none has been given a warmer welcome than will be given Premier Ben-Gurion, not only because of the distinction of his own achievements but because he represents a state which has become a bastion of progressive democracy in the Middle East and which has very close and friendly relationships with our own country and our own people. We hope this visit of Premier Ben-Gurion will make those relationships even stronger.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the announcement of the Prime Minister is most welcome. We are very pleased that the premier of Israel has agreed to come to Canada. We acknowledge his great efforts in building a democracy in Israel. We acknowledge the great social experiment that is being conducted there, and I am sure the ties between Canada and Israel will become even stronger because of this visit.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

National parks branch—

290. Canadian wildlife service—wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $823,390.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, under this item concerning the Migratory Birds Convention Act I should like to make a few remarks and ask the minister some questions. These questions concern the damage done to farmers' crops each fall by thousands of sandhill cranes in an area in my constituency at the northern end of Last Mountain lake.

I brought this problem of crop damage to the attention of the committee of supply last year. Because the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has assumed his portfolio since consideration of last year's estimates, perhaps I should review the situation briefly.

I should first like to congratulate the minister on the presentation of his first estimates, on the way they are passing through the committee of supply and on his direct and straightforward answers. I also wish to congratulate him on the fine work he is doing in guiding the operations of a department which covers so many fields of activity that the items of expenditure require five pages in the blue book. As well as being very large, the minister's department is very important in the government's national development program.

I imagine the minister has heard of the problem of the sandhill cranes in the Nokomis district and other areas around Last Mountain lake. I know the files in his department contain resolutions and suggestions in the matter, including appeals for an open season on the birds when they land in thousands in grain fields to feed before continuing on their way south for the winter.

I agree with the department's policy of protecting the birds from open season shooting because of the danger of killing one or more of the nearly-extinct whooping cranes which sometimes accompany flocks of sandhill cranes on their flight south. Last August the minister's department conducted a three-week survey of the sandhill cranes and their feeding habits around Last Mountain lake. A news report in the Nokomis Times provides some interesting details, and perhaps I may just refer to it:

> The study was concentrated in an area of some 400 square miles bounded by highway 2 on the west, an east-west line through Lockwood on the north, highway 20 on the east and a line from Govan to Stalwart on the south.
> Several methods and techniques were used to gather information on crane habits and movements and to explore the possibilities of controlling those movements.
> Information on the numbers of cranes and their distribution in the area was obtained from both ground and aerial observations. The crane population was estimated to number some 1,000 birds when the survey was initiated. It increased to some 5,000 birds at the end of the second week and by the end of the third week, had reached at least 15,000 birds.
> An 80 mile survey of some 285 seeded fields on August 31—

That is when the test was under way:

> —showed 24 per cent standing crop, 7 per cent swathed and 69 per cent harvested.
> Acetylene exploders were used on several crane roosting areas to try to restrict roosting and thus feeding activity to the area adjacent to a small sanctuary.
> Attempts were made to herd cranes by the use of a single aircraft, also by two and by three aircraft. The experiments were planned to test the effectiveness of aerial herding of feeding cranes from crop areas to adjacent water-roosting grounds and also to see if the cranes could be pushed southward along their migration route.

I might point out for the information of the minister and his officials that although there is complaint in the district because of the damage done by these sandhill cranes, there are also many people who wish to see that the birds are given all the protection possible. I have seen the losses to crops when the cranes land for a few days' feeding on their way south, and I do not wish to minimize this loss in any way.

I think some action should be taken to reduce this destruction. I am passing on a suggestion made to me by some residents of the district, that the bird sanctuary already established near Last Mountain lake be extended. Incidentally, I have a letter from Mrs. J. M. Rutherford of Govan in which she states that this Last Mountain lake sanctuary was the first wild fowl refuge in Canada, being established by the federal government in 1887. Without too great an expense it should be possible to acquire adjoining acreage and make the present sanctuary into a large self-contained protected area on one of the main flyways of migratory birds on this continent, where wild fowl could feed without encroaching too much on farmers' land. Crops could be planted in the sanctuary and the marsh areas maintained accordingly.

Dealing with this suggestion, the Manitou Times states that such a scheme would be beneficial to the local economy because it would attract a large number of people to the area.

I noticed in the Free Press Weekly of May 3, 1961 a reference to what the government of Alberta is doing in respect to crop damage by wild fowl. I realize this is a provincial matter; nevertheless I thought I would draw the attention of the minister to it because he may be able to work with the Saskatchewan government in the same way. This reference was as follows:

> This year hunters will pay a special $1 fee into an insurance fund when they buy their provincial licence. The fund will be used to compensate farmers for crop losses caused by game and migratory water fowl.

I should like to ask the minister if he would outline his department's policy with regard to the crane problem during the present year.

Mr. Herridge: I have a few brief remarks to make on this item because I have always been interested in wildlife, as are many of my constituents. The conservation of our game birds, fish and other wildlife is a matter of great interest and local concern.

There has been considerable concern expressed in the Kootenays over the prospect of dams being built on the Columbia river, and at a recent meeting of all the rod and gun clubs in southern British Columbia, representing 3,225 members, a resolution was unanimously passed expressing opposition to the building of what is known as the High Arrow dam.

I have risen particularly to deal with the fact that last year they asked for co-operation between the federal and provincial governments in connection with a study of this whole problem—the impact of the development of these water resources on the fish and wildlife of our district. This was a topic of discussion at a meeting held in Creston and at a meeting held later, two or three weeks ago, in Vernon, and I should like the minister to tell us when he speaks what has been the result of that request, not only on the part of the rod and gun clubs but on the part of the British Columbia federation of fish and game clubs. Perhaps he will tell us what has been done in respect to research as a result of co-operation between federal and provincial agencies in respect to this matter which is of such serious importance.

There has been a long continued interest in the constituency I have the honour to represent in the preservation of Duck lake, an area at the end of Kootenay lake adjacent to Creston flats. This question has been discussed during the year between federal and provincial authorities, local rod and gun clubs and other persons interested, and I am pleased to note that Dr. Munro, who is a well known advocate of wildlife conservation, has been interested in this project for many years and supports wholeheartedly the views of those who are anxious to preserve Duck lake for the nesting of the transient ducks passing through that area. Research into this problem has been requested, and when the minister speaks I should like him to tell the committee what are the latest developments so far as wildlife conservation is concerned, what meetings have lately taken place, and the situation generally with respect to Duck lake.

Some of the farming interests and primarily commercial interests in the area are anxious to drain this lake. This sheet of water was left as the result of a compromise between those concerned with agriculture and those concerned with the preservation of wildlife. It was believed the matter had been settled. Now there are those who would like to see this whole area drained. It was of great importance as a flyway for ducks, and I should like the minister to bring us up to date on this situation and tell us whether any further research has been undertaken in connection with this subject. I should like him also to tell the committee, if he can, the number of prosecutions in the last five years of persons who have violated the Migratory Birds Convention Act by either shooting or keeping egrets or by wearing hats or adornments made from egret feathers.

Finally I should like to support the remarks made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat with respect to the need for preserving the whooping cranes. I notice that an article in the Leader Press of June 16, 1960 deals with this question and mentions that the Audubon society of Canada has expressed concern that the proposed Great Slave lake railway might disturb the only whooper nesting ground yet found in northern Canada. It advocates the selection of the more westerly of the two possible routes, and adds that under the migratory birds convention the United States could protest if wildlife officials there felt the Canadian nesting grounds were being violated.

I have raised this question at the request of a number of persons, and I was pleased to note the importance attached to the subject by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. I trust that when the minister replies he will inform us what is being undertaken by his wildlife survey branch and what the branch proposes to do to protect these very rare birds.

With those few remarks I resume my seat, much, I presume, to the pleasure of a number of members.

Mr. Dinsdale: I will reply to the specific questions which have been raised before this item carries. Perhaps I should deal first of all with the question raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate last evening when he discussed the problem of sea ducks in the province of Newfoundland. On investigating this matter I discovered that there are various names for the birds which come into the general category of sea ducks. I also recall that the hon. member for Trinity-Conception was in touch with me recently concerning this same difficulty.

There is an open season provided in Newfoundland which extends from November 14 to February 28. I also understand that the Newfoundland director of game has been requesting a change in the migratory birds protection program. I think that is about all the information I can give the hon. member at this time. We are aware of the problem, but because it involves various species of birds it is difficult to produce one simple solution. However, we do appreciate having this question brought to the attention of the committee at this time.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre has raised a question in respect of the perennial difficulty regarding sandhill cranes. I have been personally acquainted with this problem over the years. The hon. member has outlined the difficulty from his own knowledge of the matter. The lesser and greater sandhill cranes are protected because of the possibility of their being mistaken for the whooping cranes. The population of lesser sandhill cranes, sometimes known as the little brown crane, has now reached approximately 200,000, whereas the population of greater sandhill cranes is down to about 2,000, which is hardly substantial enough to remove the threat of possible extinction.

For these reasons, and because of the similarity among these three types of birds, it has not been possible to allow any open season. I can assure the hon. member, however, that depredation studies are in progress. He has outlined some of the procedures that have been tried, but I can inform him that during 1960 a co-operative study program was undertaken to determine the usefulness of exploders for scaring these birds. Exploders will be tested during 1961 to determine their usefulness in respect of sandhill cranes. Most of this program will be carried out in the Last Mountain lake region of Saskatchewan.

The hon. member for Kootenay West has asked for some information concerning studies going forward regarding the possible impact of the High Arrow dam project on wildlife. I am informed that our wildlife branch made an offer about a year ago to the director of the British Columbia game branch to co-operate with British Columbia in a study of this problem. A reply has been received, but at the moment no specific program has been launched and this subject is still in the discussion stage. Our wildlife people are aware of the difficulties and have been assured of co-operation from their counterparts in British Columbia.

I have received some information in regard to the Duck lake question which was raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West. I understand that British Columbia has taken no action and will make no decision regarding the land use at Duck lake until all details of the Columbia river development program are settled. The area concerned is British Columbia crown land; therefore we can do nothing without the concurrence of the British Columbia government.

The hon. member for Kootenay West raised a third question regarding the number of prosecutions under the Migratory Birds Convention Act in respect of the taking of egrets or egret feathers. We have no knowledge of any prosecutions, with the exception of the one case which was under discussion some time ago. I do not know whether the hon. member has any other information in this regard which he could bring to the attention of the committee, but I would invite him to do so in the event that he has.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have no further information, but simply asked the question because I wondered whether the example set by one very important person had been followed by others.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the minister for his explanation so far as birds in Newfoundland are concerned, but I should like to ask him whether the reason has resulted from written agreement or treaty with the United States, or is simply an agreement arrived at in Canada?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I understand in respect of this matter that the outer limits are determined under international agreement, but that details are worked out in the provinces themselves.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would take advantage of the visit next week to bring this matter up in the highest quarters with the President of the United States to see whether the necessary consent could be obtained so that Newfoundlanders could exercise their ancient rights.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact I discussed this matter in a preliminary way at a relatively high level—not quite at the summit—with the secretary for the interior who was in Ottawa during the early part of this week. All the international aspects of the problems involved regarding the migratory bird conventions were discussed. I realize that migratory birds are becoming increasingly important and, because the treaty goes back to 1916, I believe, it is felt the time has come for some streamlining and modernization.

Item agreed to.

Water resources branch—

291. Administration, operation and maintenance, including Canada's share of the expenses of the international executive council, world power conference, and authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the shares of the province of Manitoba and of the province of Ontario of the cost of regulating the levels of Lake of the Woods and Lac Seul and the amount of the shares of provincial and outside agencies of the cost of hydrometric surveys, $1,754,455.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on vote 291 I feel I ought at least very briefly to press the minister a little further regarding this question which, as he knows, is regarded in Manitoba as a matter of utmost importance. I refer to what is to be done on the Red river floodway, which we were told in the speech from the throne was to be embarked upon this year. It seems to me that once this item is passed there will be no other occasion, under the rules of the house, to speak on this subject, unless the government itself brings forward some legislation or other measure in this regard.

I do not want to hold up the minister's estimates or delay their passage in any way, but this will be a very big project. It is not a small matter at all. I am sure the minister knows that I am very pleased regarding the small project which has been undertaken on the Fairford river. I have had a great deal of personal interest in this situation over the years. I do not mean personal interest in any monetary sense because, I am sorry to have to say, I do not own a square inch of land in Manitoba, nor have I any interest in any. However, I was raised alongside lake Manitoba and realize how important it is that the level of that lake should be properly regulated.

This is a very small part of a big program for the protection of metropolitan Winnipeg against flooding. I am not going to labour this question, because I realize the minister is familiar with the problems and it is conceivable that he knows more about it than I do. However, the provincial legislature prorogued without anyone in that legislature being able to find out from the government of Manitoba when this matter was going to be brought to a conclusion. By next week six months will have passed since the speech from the throne was read in the other place. When this project was considered to be of sufficient urgency at that time to be mentioned in that speech from the throne surely it is about time the government told us precisely what it intends to do, and particularly —and this is the most important factor—what the cost sharing formula will be.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, there is very little I can add on this subject to what I said during consideration of the first item. This matter is going forward, and a committee of engineers from the government of Manitoba and from our own department has been formed to consider the engineering aspect of the matter. The engineering data will, of course, be available when negotiations are completed with respect to the financing terms, and that is the only part of the whole project which remains to be settled.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister says the financial division is the only part of the project that remains to be settled. Does that mean the two governments are completely agreed upon the nature of the scheme to be carried forward; that there is no longer any difference of any kind, in other words that the whole of the engineering details are settled? I do not mean the details of construction, but that the plan is definitely agreed upon?

Mr. Dinsdale: I can assure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that there is general agreement on the engineering aspect of the problem. No doubt, however, there will be some amendments resulting from the report of the committee of engineers which is now giving consideration to the project.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say what effect the carrying out of this project will have on the St. Andrews rapids and the locks there?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, whether this is in the original engineering data; I have not studied the engineering report in detail, but I can assure the hon. member that our own engineers as well as the provincial engineers will give due to consideration to this aspect of the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I make one more brief observation on this point. I just wish to point out to the minister, in case this matter has not been fully considered, that I understand—and the minister probably has far more information about this than I have, or at least his officials may well have—there are many engineers who feel that this problem could be dealt with most effectively simply by removing the St. Andrews locks and dredging the river where that obstruction is located. I am sure this point has been considered a good many times before, but if the minister has any views on the subject—I know it is a subject of controversy among engineers—I think the committee would appreciate hearing them.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am assured, Mr. Chairman, that this point has been considered thoroughly by the advisory group of engineers, and they have come up with the firm report that this would be no substitute for the floodway. If there is a difference of opinion on the part of engineers, the engineers would appear to differ as much in their respective opinions as do politicians, although I think they are a little more definitive.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not so sure.

Mr. Herridge: At the request of a number of organizations in southeastern British Columbia and a good number of individuals, I have been asked to make a few remarks on this item to indicate the many contradictions among statements of federal and provincial government officials and other important persons with respect to the proposed development of the Columbia. I must explain, Mr. Chairman, that this will be a strictly non-partisan speech. I have the support of prominent C.C.F. people, members of the legislature, the support of well known Conservatives, well known Liberals and well known members of the Social Credit party. Therefore I can say I am speaking without any suggestion of bias but in the interests of the people of British Columbia and particularly of those of the Kootenays.

In order to be accurate, and unless I otherwise state, I am quoting from a text because this speech will go out to thousands of people when it is published, you know. Are these developments in the national interest? Well, let us have a look first of all at what General McNaughton has to say concerning it, with his obvious devotion to the development of the Columbia on the basis of equity to all governments and people concerned. I may say that the people of my district and of the Kootenays as a whole have a great respect for General McNaughton. I get dozens and dozens of letters saying "We support General McNaughton; we do hope the government will listen to him finally". This is what he had to say in the external affairs committee last year.

Mr. Payne: What page?

Mr. Herridge: I have not the page number here, but this is correct. My stenographer omitted the page number, but I never quote anything unless it is exact.

Mr. Payne: Are we not entitled to the page reference, Mr. Chairman? I have General McNaughton's remarks before me, and I should like to follow what the hon. member is quoting.

Mr. Herridge: This is taken from the record itself, but I notice my secretary omitted the page number. With respect to the building of this proposed High Arrow dam General McNaughton said:

> It has become evident, I think, that from the point of view of power production, Canada would obtain no advantage whatever from flooding out the territories along the Arrow lakes to give the increased storage represented by the High Arrow project. The advantage powerwise in that project goes entirely to the United States. The only advantage which could come to Canada would be in recompense for power produced in the United States.

Later the same day General McNaughton said:

> Of course, I will grant you that I may be looking at this whole business through tinted spectacles, but I cannot reconcile myself to the thought that people would be thrown out of their homes for an advantage which is transient.

What does the Minister of Justice have to say about the treaty that provides for the building of the Libby and High Arrow dams? I quote from the text of his speech delivered to the Canadian club in Montreal on February 13, 1961 of which I have a copy:

> We are proud of the treaty we have negotiated for British Columbia and for Canada and I am satisfied that you will agree with me that the outline I have given you of its advantages and its tremendous potential as a stimulus to the economy of this province justifies the effort that has gone into it and the desire to get on with the job at the earliest possible moment.

What does the Milwaukee Journal have to say about this proposed development?

> The vast amount of additional cheap hydro-electric power will be shared equally with Canada. Canada will also be paid in cash for flood control at the rate of one half of estimated annual savings. If this seems to be extreme liberality on our part, it should be remembered that Canada could have chosen an all-Canadian project which would have meant more and cheaper power for that country. So Canada is being a good and generous neighbour in the deal.

I have received an interesting letter from Sacramento, California, from Lieutenant-Colonel George Anthony, retired, who is a registered professional electrical engineer, and whose life work has been in the management of power systems and resources studies in the United States. He just retired from the United States service; otherwise he could not write me this letter. In his lengthy letter he had this to say:

> There may be occasions (and this appears to be one) where political expediency will magnify marginal benefits out of all proportion to their worth, in an effort to justify an otherwise uneconomic international agreement. If successful and if the costs are carefully hidden, the success may add some glamour to giant storage systems and power pools, while the property owners along the Arrow lakes take the beating. Also, the public will be denied the right to enjoy one of the most scenic and most beautiful natural lakes yet untouched by a questionable economic power philosophy.

Then again in 1959 Hon. Ray Williston, minister of lands and forests for the province of British Columbia, gave the assurance at a public meeting in Nelson—I have listened to the tape recording of that address—that the Kootenay district would benefit directly from this development. However, in a letter the minister wrote later to the secretary of the associated chambers of commerce of south-eastern British Columbia, he suggested the only benefits the Kootenays might expect from the Columbia treaty would be those accruing to the area as a result of the building of the dams, or other construction. In fact I have the minutes of the meeting of the associated chambers of commerce of south-eastern British Columbia, dated February 25, 1961. In these minutes is a comment on the minister's letter, as follows:

> It was pointed out that our association's official position is opposition to High Arrow storage dam unless proven beneficial to southeastern British Columbia. A letter, dated December 2, 1960, from the minister of lands and forests indicates that, other than the building boom, no benefits will accrue to this area.

When speaking in reply to a question asked by me in the house on March 2, the Minister of Justice said, as reported in Hansard of March 3, at page 2622:

> A reference to the treaty and the annexes will show that the utmost precision possible at this stage has been introduced for the determination of precisely these matters at the only time they can be determined with complete certainty—

This in effect means that the Minister of Justice considered that the necessary and essential facts were known before the treaty was signed. However, in contrast the British Columbia energy board has stated, and I quote from their report—

> The British Columbia energy board recommends delay in the signing of any agreement with the government of Canada because certain aspects of each project require clarification before realistic cost estimates can be established.

Another contradiction. What about the cost of power? The Minister of Justice, in his speech before the Canadian club in Montreal from which I quoted previously, said:

> With the treaty we can embark immediately on a tremendous series of developments which, taken together, will produce, not only initially but over many years to come, a greater quantity of power at lower cost than is available from any other presently known source.

But what has Mr. Williston, the British Columbia minister of lands and forests, said about this? When speaking to the legislature on February 8 this year he said:

> I should like to emphasize that the present agreement with the United States will not provide an abundance of cheap electricity at this time, and that the agreement between the federal and provincial governments will not be ratified for some time.

Another contradiction. Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, I might mention at this point that last fall, when speaking in Nelson, the minister of lands and forests of British Columbia said that speed was essential in the development of the Columbia. When speaking to a public meeting in Castlegar, as reported in the Trail Times on September 6, 1960, Mr. Williston criticized the C.C.F. policy with respect to bringing the British Columbia Electric under public ownership, and said:

> Taking over the B.C. Electric would not provide cheap electricity because the B.C. Electric hasn't got any cheap electricity.

Then he went on further to say, and I quote again from the Trail Times of the same date:

> The first cheap electrical energy we are going to have is that which will come from the Columbia River development.

Now Mr. Williston tells a different story. Another contradiction. Again, only a few weeks ago we read in the press that Mr. Bennett is giving consideration to bringing the B.C. Electric under public ownership. After Mr. Williston's statement in Castlegar on this question, this appears like another contradiction. Speaking in Castlegar, as reported in the Trail Times on the same date, Mr. Williston said:

> The High Arrow dam would not be built until public hearings had been held under the water rights act; that the High Arrow dam would never be built if the preponderance of evidence produced at these hearings shows the project not to be in the best interests of British Columbia and Canada, and that no agreement would be signed with the Americans or anyone else until public hearings had been held.

Well, what has happened? All hon. members know that no public hearings under the water rights act have been held. You all know that the treaty has been signed regardless of Mr. Williston's promise that no agreement would be signed with the Americans until public hearings had been held. Another contradiction.

The Minister of Justice also states that the treaty with the United States was signed with the full understanding, knowledge and agreement of the government of British Columbia. However, it is generally known that the storage of 8 million acre feet of water in the Arrow lakes will make possible the irrigation of additional thousands of acres of land used for the production of fruit and vegetables in the United States. This development has caused some concern in the Okanagan valley. Mr. Perrault, leader of the Liberal party in the provincial house, later dealt with this action and said that British Columbia is already feeling the impact of farm produce from the Columbia valley in Washington state, where taxes and water rates are lower than in British Columbia. Mr. Perrault said that British Columbia now imports $125 million worth of farm produce a year, and that the total annual income from agriculture in British Columbia is lower by $5 million than in 1951.

What did the minister of agriculture of British Columbia have to say? We must remember that he comes from the Okanagan valley and fully appreciates the danger of this further competition from the United States. I now quote the minister of agriculture of British Columbia:

> Competition from the United States farm produce is likely to be assisted by the Columbia development and will affect other parts of Canada besides British Columbia.

He further said:

> I think it would be a matter of tariffs that we will have to consider.

He said the matter should be discussed at the national level, and that he would take up the whole issue at a conference of the provincial ministers of agriculture later this year. What does this mean? It means that in order to overcome the damage done British Columbia agricultural producers the minister of agriculture for British Columbia proposes to ask the federal government to increase the tariffs on fruit and vegetables. When you think of all the implications of this situation you will realize that this is another contradiction in the approach of the different ministers of the different governments.

Again, we have been told repeatedly that there is a shortage of power in British Columbia, yet in the March 11 issue of the Canada Gazette I note an application by the B.C. Electric Company to the national energy board to export surplus power for a period of 25 years to the United States. This appears to be another contradiction. The Minister of Justice hopes that this project will start in 1961. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has published some literature saying that it will start in 1961. There is no sense of certainty or similarity of approach in these statements.

These contradictory statements by federal and provincial cabinet ministers clearly indicate that the Columbia treaty has been signed hastily, without a knowledge or understanding of all the facts and without an agreement in writing between the two governments. In order to indicate the situation and the benefit of this project to the United States, I want to quote briefly from the Victoria Colonist:

> Before the Columbia river treaty was signed last January its U.S. sponsors unleashed a veritable barrage of information in the Senate and around the election hustings to show that the harnessing of the Columbia river for hydroelectric development was a magnificent deal for the United States.

There is the booklet that was sent all over the United States. It was issued to every senator and representative. It was distributed all over the United States, and it clearly indicates the benefits to that country. I continue the quotation:

> In the Senate where the treaty was up for approval, one speaker assured Senators that "The United States has driven a hard bargain—a very hard bargain—with Canada." Even President Eisenhower campaigning for Mr. Nixon declared on more than one occasion that the Columbia development was extremely favourable to the United States.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that as the member for Kootenay West I have, like a good many others, given this question most careful consideration. After listening to General McNaughton in the external affairs committee and the Minister of Justice and reading all the evidence available, I am convinced that I am representing the views of my constituents when I say that the treaty in its present form is not in the national, provincial, Kootenays' or local interest. Recent developments strengthen my conviction in that regard. A nation wide interest in this matter is developing. The newspapers are interested. One only has to refer to the articles in various papers, and there are going to be more. There was one in the Family Herald of April 27, another in the Western Producer of April 20, and others are appearing in various national magazines. I have heard recently that one national magazine has sent representatives into the area.

Here is the sort of thing one sees. I have here the Kimberley News, a newspaper owned by a Conservative and financed by Conservatives. The heading of the article is "Kootenays May Be Sold Out". This is the sort of opinion we are getting from all quarters because people have been studying this question. In the first instance people thought it was only natural that the group of 1,500 or 1,600 small farmers who would be flooded out would object. That is understandable, but this is not the whole case. These objections are being raised on a wide basis by people who have given the question the most serious consideration, not only people in the Kootenays and in British Columbia generally but in other parts of Canada as well.

Delay in signing an agreement with the federal government is urged by the British Columbia chambers of commerce and by the British Columbia research council. These groups have studied the Columbia river treaty from four angles, national interest, provincial interest, Kootenay interest and local interest. They are completely non-partisan in their objectives. They include the Arrow lakes committee and the Revelstoke city committee composed of people from all parties and chambers of commerce whose members are supporters of all parties.

The facts coming to light indicate that this problem has not been properly assessed. Our local people are communicating with the energy board in British Columbia. They are glad to get the information. The cost of the High Arrow dam is going to be millions of dollars more than was anticipated. The cost of getting logs through to the pulp mill below the dam is going to be in excess of what was contemplated, and the problems are going to be greater. The sociological impact is going to be much greater than was anticipated. The cost of compensating for the loss of public facilities and private investment in the district over a period of 60 years is going to be much greater than was anticipated. We have had the co-operation of various engineers, including civil engineers and hydro engineers, who have offered their services free because of their interest in this problem.

The treaty has been studied from various angles by competent persons who have presented their views to the government of British Columbia and to the water commission, and who are presenting them to the energy board from various angles such as economics and engineering; the impact on agriculture; the impact on forestry; the impact on fish, game and wildlife; the impact on the tourist industry; the sociological impact and the impact on the city of Revelstoke where the opposition to this High Arrow dam was led by one of the old time Conservatives, whom I have known for many years, and one of the old time Liberals, a friend of mine, who both make it a point to attend, when possible, any meeting where this question is being discussed. They are opposed to this project at the present time.

To indicate that it is not a local matter or a matter of people objecting to certain circumstances, may I say this. No one would object if this was absolutely necessary, or if there were not another way of producing this power. These people object because they think it is an unnecessary destruction of Canadian natural resources. Those opposed include the Arrow lakes and the city of Revelstoke water resources board, the city of Revelstoke municipal council, the West Kootenay farmer's institute, the West Kootenay women's institute. In that connection may I say that I received a very nice letter from the women's institute of Kaslo, the birthplace of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. They inform me that they are strenuously opposed to the building of the High Arrow dam.

I get such letters every day from such organizations and others. The British Columbia federation of labour; the mine, mill and smelter workers union and other unions in the Kootenays; the Vancouver and lower mainland council of unemployed and rod and gun clubs in southeastern British Columbia all are unanimously opposed to the building of the High Arrow dam, as are the Arrow boat club, the Nakusp launch club, the Nakusp stock breeders' association, and the chambers of commerce of Revelstoke, Arrowhead, Nakusp and lower Arrow lakes. The chambers of commerce of southeastern British Columbia are opposed to the High Arrow dam until it is proven to be beneficial to the Kootenays. Only recently the leader of the provincial Liberal party was speaking in Revelstoke and he expressed his strong views. I quote from the Revelstoke Review of May 4:

> In respect to the Columbia river development, Mr. Perrault said the government never gave even a few minutes to the delegates from this district protesting the High Arrow dam—

He is speaking of the provincial government.

> —and these gentlemen had to be content with discussing their problems with the parties in opposition. Mr. Perrault made it perfectly clear that the Liberal party in B.C. wants the Columbia developed as soon as possible—

So do we all.

> —and that it wants the plant proposed by General A. G. L. McNaughton, not the High Arrow which is only the Kaiser dam under a new name. He said General McNaughton should be brought to testify before the B.C. energy board and given a chance to defend his plan against Mr. Williston's so-called experts.

I have indicated the study that has been given to this question, and I am receiving letters now from various parts of British Columbia. There is one here from a lady in Saskatchewan who read the article in the Western Producer. Letters of this kind continue to come in.

We wish to see the Columbia developed in the national, provincial and local interest. The people whom I represent—and they are people supporting all parties—are sincere about this matter. I might explain that the members of these committees who are doing this work are, with one or two exceptions, persons who will not be flooded out or who will not suffer material damage or inconvenience because of the proposed building of the High Arrow dam, but are persons who are long time residents and competent engineers in various fields who know the impact this will have on our civilization on the Arrow lakes.

As to the forest industry, we have no idea, Mr. Chairman, what this will do. There has been no assessment. We have no estimate in that direction of the millions of dollars of extra costs that will be imposed on the forest industry, as well as the destruction of some of the finest land in British Columbia. One farmer wrote recently that he had $1,500 gross income per year per acre. This land is located where we grow peaches and high cost agricultural products, where there is intensified farming. There is also the matter of the disruption of public facilities, investment in wharfs and things of that sort.

This is an appeal on my part on behalf of the people I represent. I am getting letters from a good many parts of British Columbia now. This is an appeal that we take advantage of this delay, that we reconsider this whole question in order to secure a modification of the treaty so that we have a low Arrow dam instead of this High Arrow dam. There is no objection to a low Arrow dam, except that there would possibly be some protest from the United States having regard to the fact that the High Arrow dam is of great advantage to them. It can store water in great quantities and very quickly.

However, in the national interest and in the interests of the people whom I have the honour to represent, and who write me so continually about this problem about which they are so greatly concerned, I ask that we use this period of delay to reconsider this whole problem and work for a modification of the treaty so that it will provide us with power and development without unnecessary destruction of British Columbia's natural resources.

The Chairman: Shall vote 291 carry?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman. We have listened in the committee with some interest, I think, to the statement just made by the hon. member for Kootenay West with regard to the Columbia development treaty. I should like to say a few words about this matter, especially in view of the confused situation that now exists as to whether this treaty will or will not be brought before parliament this session.

Yesterday we learned from the Minister of Justice that there could be no assurance that this work would be done in 1961. However, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, being more exuberant and less cautions than the Minister of Justice, has issued from his department a booklet which deals with capital investment projects in Canada in 1961. In it he makes the flat statement that the work will begin or is to begin—I think that is the expression used—in 1961.

It is rather important to know which of these ministers is correct in his assumption, because this is one of the most important international arrangements for the development of Canada that has ever been entered into by a Canadian government. One may have differing views about the relative advantages to Canada and to the United States of the contents of this arrangement, but there can be no difference of opinion over its importance in the development of British Columbia and indeed of the whole country.

The negotiations leading up to this treaty began many years ago, of course, and the preliminary studies, the engineering and technical studies, which I think began in 1943 took many years to complete, if indeed they are completed now. It was, of course, quite impossible to work out a diplomatic arrangement, a formal international treaty between the two countries, or indeed to discuss these diplomatic arrangements until the preliminary technical and engineering surveys by the joint commission had been completed. That was not done, I believe, until—the Minister of Justice will know the date—some time in 1954 or 1955. Anyway, they were not completed until well into the 1950's.

When the discussions took place between representatives of the two governments, initially through the international joint commission, there were many difficulties, of course, which were encountered before an agreement could be reached. Perhaps the most important difficulty in the earlier stages of the discussions was that concerned with the sharing of downstream benefits. I recall that when this matter was before the international joint commission some years ago the position taken by the United States side of the joint commission was such as to make agreement virtually impossible, largely over a difference of opinion on this question of sharing downstream benefits. I think all Canadians must be very grateful to General

McNaughton for many things, but more particularly for the way he stood up for Canadian interests and Canadian rights at that time and later.

The negotiations were transferred back to government representatives at one stage. Then they went back to the international joint commission, and I believe there was a change of membership on the United States side of the commission which made those discussions a little more constructive than they had been earlier.

As we all know, eventually the treaty was signed by the plenipotentiaries of the two governments. It was signed in the dying days of the Republican administration of the United States with what appears to us over here, in the light of what has happened since, unnecessary haste. I say that because surely it is unwise for any Canadian government, in diplomatic negotiations with a foreign country, to put its signature to an international agreement which cannot be implemented without the co-operation of one or more provinces of Canada until it is absolutely certain that this co-operation as been achieved. Once a plenipotentiary acting on behalf of Canada does sign an international agreement, Canada as such accepts an international obligation to carry out that agreement. Our word as a country is pledged to the extent of accepting the obligation and implementing the treaty once that treaty, of course, has been ratified.

Therefore any federal government should be very, very careful, to say the least in accepting that kind of international obligation on behalf of Canada until it is certain the obligation can be implemented. In this case, and in many other cases, because we are a federal state implementation will require the active and specific co-operation of the provinces concerned, in this case British Columbia. I recall—and this will be in contrast with the way this particular treaty was negotiated—that when the St. Lawrence waterway agreement was negotiated there was no difficulty with the province of Ontario in implementing that treaty.

I know perfectly well that the representative of British Columbia took part in the Columbia negotiations. I know there may have been reason to believe during those days that this representative was in accord with what was going on. Perhaps there was some reason to assume that he and the provincial government of British Columbia accepted all the details of the treaty as eventually signed. There may have been some reason to assume that, but we know there was not sufficient reason, because the assumption was certainly based, as we know now, on a false premise.

The treaty has been signed. The United States Senate has approved it by an almost unprecedented majority so far as a treaty of this kind is concerned; I think the vote was 91 to 1. As my hon. friend from Kootenay West pointed out, there has been a great deal of satisfaction in the United States over the negotiation and ratification of this treaty. Presumably the states of the United States which are involved have been very happy about it, because apparently there has been no difficulty with them in the discussion of the matter in the Senate and in ratification. Indeed, the United States and the interests concerned in that country seem to be entirely satisfied with this treaty.

The fact that the United States is satisfied does not necessarily make it a bad treaty from the Canadian point of view. The difference is that in this country there are apparently many doubts raised about the relative advantages of this treaty to Canada, and the province of British Columbia is showing no desire at the present time, as far as one can gather, to co-operate with the federal government in a way which will make the implementation of this treaty immediately possible.

We on this side assumed that when this treaty was signed, before ratification the normal constitutional procedure would be followed and it would be submitted to the House of Commons for consideration; and only after that consideration and approval, if it were given, would the act of ratification take place. We were given some reason to believe in the early days of this session that the submission of this treaty would take place not long after signing and would go before the committee on external affairs. There it could be given the searching kind of examination which its importance warrants, and the members of the committee could ascertain whether Canadian interests had been safeguarded in all possible respects in the terms of this treaty as it was signed.

So far as the terms of the treaty are concerned, we on this side will reserve our views on that point until the treaty has been submitted to the committee on external affairs, after we have listened to experts and especially General McNaughton, whom I am sure the committee will wish to examine. However, this cannot be done now because of the lack of co-operation between the federal government and the provincial government of British Columbia; because British Columbia is now raising doubts about this treaty; because the financial arrangements which are necessary as between the province and the federal governments before it can be carried out have not been made; because the provincial government apparently has doubts as to whether the price of power indicated in the treaty is realistic, and for other reasons which I suppose are more familiar to the Minister of Justice than they are to me, because he has been concerned with these discussions with the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Chairman, all this surely proves that it is unwise for a federal government to sign a treaty of this kind until it has the precise approval of the province concerned to the details of that treaty, as was the case with the St. Lawrence waterway agreement. So far as we can gather on this side, that approval has not been obtained. That is no doubt why there has been delay in submitting the matter to the House of Commons, because quite clearly it would be futile and perhaps inappropriate to ask this house or a committee of this house to consider a treaty of this kind in the absence of agreement with the province directly concerned.

There are other considerations arising, it seems to me, in British Columbia, which have developed as this treaty is subjected to scrutiny and examination. There is the whole question of the relationship of this development to other power developments in that province, and the feeling in certain quarters of that province that if both developments—I am thinking about the Peace river development and the Columbia river development—go forward at the same time in the same decade this would be imprudent unless some assurance could be obtained that it will be possible to export some of the resulting power which may, in the eyes of some people, not be required by the province.

In the past we have had a good deal of experience of the dangers and the difficulties encountered when the question of the export of power from this country arises. The Liberal government has, in the past, taken steps to ensure that the interests of Canada are protected by legislation designed for that purpose. It is true, naturally, that any application for the export of power made by any corporation in any part of Canada would have to be considered. Indeed, the present government considered such an application in New Brunswick two or three years ago, and I think permits have been granted down there for the export of power on the understanding that it is to be recaptured when developments in New Brunswick require that power for provincial purposes.

We have learned in the past, however, that one has to be particularly careful about granting permits for the export of power of any kind, however carefully guarded the provisions might be with respect to recapturability, if I may use that word; because experience in the past has shown that when the time comes when you wish to get that power back from the United States, obstacles are created which make such a course almost impossible.

Therefore, while it would be natural to consider any application for the export of power from British Columbia or any other province in the future, one would hope there would be no departure by any government in Canada from the policy which has been laid down in the past and, I think, accepted now by governments representing both parties; that the national interest with regard to power must be protected; that the national interest must be protected for a good many years ahead, and that no steps should be taken to export any power without every kind of assurance that the national interest is completely safeguarded.

These are some of the questions which have been raised in recent months in consideration of this whole matter. Our position is that we in this country should not have got ourselves into a situation where the federal government has signed a treaty and accepted an international obligation in signing that treaty before it was certain that it would have the co-operation of the provincial government concerned, without which co-operation the treaty cannot be carried out. The United States is not in this position. The treaty has been ratified down there and approved by the Senate, and they are very eager indeed, apparently, to proceed with it and are pressing hard, as we have learned in the last few days, for progress to be made by Canada. Such progress is not possible because the federal and provincial governments have not been able to get together in respect to the steps to be taken before this treaty can even be considered in this house.

We hope these difficulties can be resolved without delay, at least to the point where we can examine this treaty in parliament; where it can be submitted to the committee on external affairs where the doubts which have arisen in certain quarters about the feasibility, the advantage, of this treaty to Canada can be considered and where experts such as General McNaughton can be consulted. We would then be able to give these arrangements the careful scrutiny which their importance to Canada and to British Columbia in particular warrants. At that time, if that time comes, we shall have to make our position clear with regard to the advantages or otherwise of this treaty to Canada, if we are to approve it.

That time has not yet arrived, however, and the reason is that the federal government which signed this treaty in haste has not been able to work out arrangements with the province concerned, for lack of which the treaty cannot be implemented.

Mr. Fulton: I enter the discussion at this point for one purpose. That is to deal with the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that this treaty was signed in haste, and to refute that suggestion completely. There was no haste in signing the treaty. The Leader of the Opposition has himself pointed out that the discussions dealing toward the ultimate co-operative development of the Columbia river began 17 years ago, and it is not my interpretation of the meaning of words that taking 17 years to conclude a treaty represents haste.

Certainly progress was very slow in some of the previous years. I could perhaps make some partisan comments on that point, but I shall not do so. I will say, however, that there was plenty of time taken in working out the details with regard to this treaty. It is not my intention to enter now into a discussion of the treaty itself because, first of all, these are not my estimates and, second, I agree that the proper place to do that is before the committee on external affairs when there will be the fullest discussion and the fullest vindication of the terms of this treaty, and the fullest explanation of the enormous advantages to Canada and to British Columbia which the treaty secures.

I am concerned at this time to discuss only this question of the situation surrounding the signature of the treaty, the circumstances concerning the negotiation of the treaty, and the care which was taken to ensure the knowledge and the co-operation and the consent of British Columbia, all of which makes it difficult indeed, to say the least, to explain the extraordinary position which the government of British Columbia is now adopting.

Just before one o'clock, or before the lunch hour intervenes, I should like to put this to the Leader of the Opposition. There was nothing improper or unusual in Canada signing this treaty even before complete and detailed arrangements had been made with British Columbia and before final agreement between Canada and British Columbia as to the things that our respective governments would do, because there was so much which depended on the form of the treaty itself—so many things which would have to be done the nature of which could not be ascertained until the treaty itself had taken shape and was in being. It was recognized on both sides that it would be perfectly appropriate to sign this treaty and leave those matters to be worked out, and to take care of this situation by the provision which was inserted in the treaty that the obligation arises only on the exchange of instruments of ratification.

That is the situation. That course was worked out because we both recognized that we could not get all the details settled; the experts could not go to work on them; the necessary applications could not be made with respect to the location of dams and so on, until there had been a determination in the form of a treaty of what were to be the rights and obligations of both sides. So the treaty was worked out and was given formal expression by the signatures of the two countries, and the treaty itself provides for the situation which I have just described by saying that the obligation arises only after it has been finally approved by both countries and formal instruments of ratification have been exchanged. In the United States the approval of congress is necessary. Here the Prime Minister has said the approval of parliament would be asked for. So there was nothing imprudent or in the least improper or untoward in our signing this treaty, even though the detailed provisions which have to be worked out had not been worked out at that time because it is only the exchange of ratification which brings it into effect.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, just before one o'clock I had dealt with the suggestion that it was somehow an unwise procedure for Canada to have signed a treaty with the United States in respect of the Columbia river development in advance of the final settlement of all details with British Columbia. I had explained that this suggestion is not well founded because there were many things that could only be settled after the form of the treaty itself was determined, although it is also true that these things which require to be settled include some things which it is essential to dispose of before the treaty becomes effective. They are such things as the physical location of dams, the issuing of licences authorizing the dams under the British Columbia water act, and details of the relationship between Canada and British Columbia.

Because these things could not be finally settled until the form of the treaty was agreed to, and because, before the treaty came into effect, it was essential to have them settled, the device I referred to was used. That is, the treaty itself contains a clause the effect of which is that the treaty does not become operative or effective, and no obligation arises thereunder, until there has been formal exchange of instruments of ratification.

This provision was fully understood by the United States. Their negotiators understood the nature of the domestic law in Canada, and they were apprised that these things would have to be done after the treaty was signed and before there could be a formal exchange of ratification. There is therefore no foundation to the suggestion that it was unwise or in any sense imprudent to sign the treaty under the circumstances in which we did.

The other point I want to deal with is the question of the domestic situation, and the implications of the statement that it is unfortunate that there now appears to be a divergence of opinion between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia, notwithstanding the fact that we have a treaty. I think those were the words used by the Leader of the Opposition.

It is not easy to say how much of real difference there is between the governments of Canada and British Columbia and how much is only apparent. What appears on the surface to be a real difference is the result perhaps of some attempt to establish a bargaining position on the part of the government of British Columbia.

Negotiations with regard to financing are still going on; therefore I feel it would be improper for me at this stage to go into details in this connection. It is true that financial arrangements between the two governments have to be settled. We have made a very generous financial offer, but I suppose it is natural to assume that the province should want an even more generous offer. I make the suggestion, at any rate, that part of the reason why the government of British Columbia has adopted attitudes that would otherwise be impossible to understand may be that they are indulging in a little bargaining. All I can say is that I hope they will realize that the important and numerous benefits to be secured by this treaty should not be jeopardized by an unreasonable position on their part.

The fact of the matter is, however, that on the surface at any rate, there is justification for the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition that there appear to be divergences between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia. I wish, therefore, to let the house know what are the facts in this respect, and to advise the committee of the steps taken to ensure that there would be unanimity between the governments of Canada and British Columbia at every stage surrounding the negotiations and implementation of this treaty.

The government of British Columbia was brought into the discussions at every stage and on every level; in the negotiations, in the policy making by ministers, and at the level of expert advisers. A short summary of the negotiations will serve to demonstrate the reality of what I say. It should of course be borne in mind that the government of British Columbia, as well as the officials in British Columbia, were relatively well informed about the Columbia river development in its technical aspects, as well as about the general thinking of the government of Canada, even before the detailed negotiations of the treaty started; but I should like to confine these remarks particularly to the negotiating stage.

You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that in January of 1959 the governments of Canada and the United States agreed on a reference back to the international joint commission of the specific question of the policy or principles which should govern any co-operative development of this river. From January of 1959 through to December of 1959 the international joint commission examined this problem in detail, and in December, 1959 they came up with their unanimous report which included recommendations as to the general principles, the power principles and the flood control principles, that should be incorporated in any treaty for the co-operative development of the river.

When we got the agreement of the United States to make this reference to the international joint commission we knew we had made an important breakthrough, because this was the first occasion on which the United States had ever agreed to sit down and study this question of the division of benefits and the entitlement of the upstream country to a portion of the power generated downstream.

Having made this significant breakthrough, we lost no time in taking the necessary steps to initiate discussions with British Columbia so that when we should receive the international joint commission report we would be in a position to commence negotiations with the United States without delay on the basis of a position agreed with the government of British Columbia. Accordingly, in March of 1959 we took steps to set up what is known as the policy liaison committee. This committee consisted of two ministers of the government of Canada and two ministers of the government of British Columbia —on their part the minister of lands and forests and the attorney general. This committee had as advisers officials of the government of Canada and of the government of British Columbia, as well as engineers of the British Columbia power commission and officials of the international joint commission.

The purpose of this policy liaison committee was to ensure that in working out the policy which should be carried forward, the policy on which the position of the government of Canada would rest in negotiating the treaty, we would be certain that we had the agreement of British Columbia to that policy, because we felt it essential—and I am sure the committee will agree with me that it is essential—in dealing with a resource of this nature which lies in the province of British Columbia, that the government of that province should be in agreement as to the policy to be followed and as to the steps to be taken in the development of that resource. Although it was an international negotiation, the responsibility as well as the authority for which rests with the government of Canada, we took the unusual step of associating the government of British Columbia with us from the very outset when we began to develop the detailed policy which should be followed in the negotiations.

That policy liaison committee had then, as advisers, officials of the two governments and of the international joint commission who were constituted as a technical committee comprising officials of the British Columbia water rights branch, the British Columbia power commission and, from Canada, officials of the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and of the international joint commission, as well as from the Department of Finance and the Department of Trade and Commerce. This committee went to work from March, 1959 on.

The international joint commission made its report on principles in December, 1959, and in January of 1960 we took the necessary steps to commence negotiation of a treaty with the government of the United States. It was agreed between the two governments that negotiating teams should be appointed and should meet to work out the details of a treaty which they would recommend to their governments for consideration. Again we took steps to ensure that British Columbia would have full knowledge of everything that was being discussed and everything that was being suggested and recommended by those negotiating teams. We did that by asking British Columbia to name a person to be a member of the negotiating team. Again, even though the sole authority and responsibility for negotiating treaties rests on the government of Canada, nevertheless, in view of the importance of ensuring the agreement of British Columbia in the circumstances we took that step; and at our invitation they named Mr. Bassett, the deputy minister of lands and forests, to be a member of the Canadian negotiating team. The team thus named consisted of myself as chairman, the deputy minister of northern affairs and national resources, the assistant deputy minister of external affairs, and Mr. Bassett, the deputy minister of lands and forests of British Columbia. During the course of the negotiations, then, not only was British Columbia represented on the negotiating team and therefore kept fully informed of everything that was discussed, but there was at every stage constant reference back by our Canadian negotiating team to the policy liaison committee.

It will be appreciated that we were negotiators; we were not plenipotentiaries. We were instructed to negotiate and to report back what we would recommend as a treaty. We took our position in the negotiations on the basis of the policy as worked out and approved by the governments of Canada and British Columbia as a result of the work of the policy liaison committee, on which British Columbia was represented. After each negotiating session at which progress was made we reported back to the policy liaison committee, as well as individually reporting to our governments.

After each session, on receipt of our report there was a further meeting of the policy liaison committee to assess the situation and to recommend the position that should be taken at the next stage of negotiations. That recommendation of the policy liaison committee was again referred to and approved by the governments of Canada and British Columbia. We then carried into the next meeting of the negotiators the position worked out and approved by Canada and British Columbia; and so we proceeded through stage after stage. After every session of the negotiating teams we reported back. Full information was given to both governments. The position we had taken was explained, and the position we should take at the next meeting was cleared and agreed to, and we took that position on instructions agreed to by both governments. So that right to the time of our final meeting as negotiators, from which we emerged with an agreed recommendation as to the terms of the Columbia river treaty, we had been working forward on the basis of a position agreed to between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia.

In addition, I should remind the committee that all the estimates that were prepared, all the figuring, all the calculation that was done to form the background of the position we would take, to establish the basis upon which we would estimate whether a certain position was sound or not or alternatively whether we should accept some suggestion made by the United States—all these suggestions and positions and their implications had to be processed by our technical advisers, and I would remind the committee that that technical team consisted of officials of both the government of Canada and of British Columbia. As well, during the course of negotiations we set up an international work group consisting of representatives of Canada and the United States, technical advisers from our two countries, to work together on the technical data that were arising and being considered in the course of our negotiations so that we might have agreed facts and figures between the two countries in order that the negotiators would have a sound and agreed base on which to carry out their negotiations. Again British Columbia had representatives on that international work group processing all the facts and figures, all the engineering data and the economic analyses and so on that were being put before the negotiators to work on.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is surely clear that at every stage and at every level British Columbia knew and approved of what was being done.

And so we come to the reporting of the treaty itself. Early in January the negotiators reached agreement on the terms of the treaty we should recommend, and we reported to our governments accordingly. British Columbia of course knew about the terms of the treaty because they had a member on the negotiating team, Mr. Bassett who signed our unanimous report. But as chairman of the Canadian negotiating team I felt it only proper to give the government of British Columbia formal advice of the treaty that we would be recommending, and I did so. I sent an authentic copy to Mr. Williston, as British Columbia co-chairman of the policy liaison committee, and reminded him of the circumstances of the negotiations to which I have just referred, that is the extent to which British Columbia had been associated, and approved of what we were doing. I stated that under those circumstances they, of course, had knowledge of what was in the treaty but that I was sending him a copy for his official information. I advised him on January 9 that the government of Canada in considering the treaty would act on the assumption that British Columbia was in accord with its terms. I also advised him that, if approved, we would sign it on January 16, and that under all these circumstances we would assume that the government of British Columbia approved the signing of the treaty unless I heard from him to the contrary. I did not hear to the contrary, so the treaty was signed with the knowledge and approval of the government of British Columbia. Every word, every phrase, every clause, every provision, every annex, every implication of that treaty had been exhaustively discussed with and approved by British Columbia before the treaty was signed.

Perhaps I should point out that at the very end, when it came to the actual drafting of the treaty, when the negotiators sat down to write out in formal language the effects of our agreement, we then had associated with us as an adviser the deputy attorney general of British Columbia, who attended the session at which the treaty was being drafted by the negotiators. So, sir, it is an incontrovertible fact that everything that is in the treaty, every implication that is contained therein, was known to and approved by the government of British Columbia before the treaty was signed.

So we are now in the position that what remains to be settled are the details of the agreement between Canada and British Columbia as to the implementation of the treaty, responsibility for construction and operation and so on. It is, of course, understood and was always understood that there were some final engineering matters to be settled before ratification. The actual physical sites of the dams have to be settled. This can only be done by engineering studies which are going forward now. This has to be settled before applications can be made for permits to build the dam. It was well understood that these things would require some little time to settle before we could formally ratify the treaty by the exchange of instruments of ratification, as provided for therein.

If delay was sought by British Columbia on this basis alone there would be no misunderstanding. I am concerned, however, because the delay which is taking place and the positions which are being adopted by British Columbia appear to be suggestive of differences or difficulties certainly wider than the mere desire to establish the final details of engineering such as the actual, precise, physical location of the dams.

However, Mr. Chairman, I have taken the position before, and I think I should take it again, that in view of the circumstances I have outlined, in view of the extent to which there was unanimity between Canada and British Columbia, and in view of the knowledge, consent and approval by British Columbia of this treaty, it is incomprehensible and inconceivable to me that British Columbia should really change its position. I think all of us must proceed on the assumption that, this having been the situation, this having been the agreement, there can be no reversal of position on the part of British Columbia, and that they will agree with us that the treaty should be ratified and should go into effect.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks this afternoon, I am unable to account for some of the things they have said and some of the positions they have taken, except that it must be for the purpose of bargaining. But whatever be the purpose, whatever be the position that they now take outwardly, the facts are as I have outlined them; that we signed the treaty with British Columbia's knowledge and approval, and it is inconceivable in the light of those facts that there should be any fundamental change of position on the part of the provincial government.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, all I can say now, and I am sure the house and every member present will agree with me, is that what is desirable at this time is that there should be early formal approval of this treaty by British Columbia so that ratification can take place, construction can commence at the earliest possible moment and all the benefits in terms of low cost power, stimulus to the economy and millions of man hours of direct employment, as well as the indirect employment in production that will be necessary, can go forward at the earliest possible moment.

I have just one final word. I have sometimes been concerned by the implications of what is being said in British Columbia to the effect that somehow or other there were not adequate engineering and economic analyses of the treaty provisions before it was signed. The federal government alone, Mr. Chairman, has spent over $4½ million on engineering and economic studies of the Columbia river. This is quite apart from what the Americans have spent, what British Columbia has spent and what private concerns have spent. Engineers are great experts and very important people and maybe their services come high, but you can still buy a heck of a lot of engineering for $4½ million. Therefore I must reject out of hand any suggestion, from wherever it comes, that we rushed into this treaty without adequate engineering or economic studies and analyses.

As I have said, some engineering naturally remains to be done, and it is important engineering. It is the kind of engineering that will determine the precise physical location of dams. I am not suggesting for one moment that such engineering is not required, but what I do say quite definitely is that for the purposes of a treaty of this kind—and I am confirmed in my view by comparison with what was done on the St. Lawrence river—every reasonable, and indeed more than reasonable, completely adequate preliminary engineering and economic studies and analyses were made. The government of Canada is satisfied as to the position it took and the information it had as a result of those studies. The government of Canada remains ready to go forward immediately with the ratification of the treaty and the commencement of construction of the project.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to hold up this estimate very long. The minister has made a statement on which I should like to make a short comment. I do not quarrel with his recital of the facts or challenge them in any way. He and the federal government felt they had every reason to believe that the provincial government of British Columbia had been associated with these negotiations leading up to the treaty, that they were kept informed of the developments, that they knew all about the negotiations and, indeed, had participated in them, and therefore he feels that the government had the right to assume that the resulting treaty was acceptable to the government of British Columbia whose co-operation in carrying it out, as I said this morning, is absolutely essential.

The fact is, however, that so far as one can gather that this provincial government does not feel committed at this time to the acceptance of all the proposals, all the implications of the treaty, and further negotiations are under way. I also do not quarrel with what the minister has said about the fact that the international obligation undertaken by Canada in the signature of an important treaty of this kind does not come into effect until the treaty is ratified and the treaty, in accordance with our constitutional practice, will not be ratified until it has been considered by the House of Commons. Nevertheless the fact remains that this treaty cannot be submitted to this parliament for consideration at this time because of the absence of an arrangement with British Columbia.

This procedure is in contrast to that which was followed in the negotiation of the St. Lawrence seaway agreement. When that agreement was negotiated with the United States—and I have the treaty before me—the treaty of 1941 was signed by representatives of the government of Canada, namely Mr. King, Mr. Howe, and Mr. Reed, and representatives of the government of the United States, namely, Mr. Moffat, Mr. Berle and Mr. Olds, on March 19, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and forty one. On that very same day an agreement was signed between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario which was necessary to the implementation of this international agreement.

Therefore once the international agreement was ratified there was in existence a signed agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario which made it possible to implement the international arrangement. That agreement was signed by Mr. King, Mr. Howe, Mr. Hepburn and Mr. Nixon. The same procedure was followed later, I think in 1951, when an agreement was made and signed by representatives of the province of Ontario and the federal government which again made possible the implementation of an international agreement regarding the St. Lawrence waterway.

That is not the situation at the present time. There is no agreement between British Columbia and the federal government in that sense. We therefore cannot consider this treaty in this house until such an arrangement or agreement is signed between the province and the federal government. That is why, when I talk about undue haste being shown in the signing of the treaty, I am not thinking of the years that were required to negotiate it. Of course it takes a long time to negotiate a treaty of this kind. However, I am thinking of the haste to sign an agreement at that particular moment in the negotiations without having a signed undertaking or commitment from the province of British Columbia which would enable that agreement to be carried out if this parliament approves of it.

Mr. Payne: May I transgress on the committee's time for just a moment or two. At the outset I think it would be most fitting to offer congratulations from fellow members from British Columbia to the Minister of Justice for the able and splendid way in which he has conducted negotiations and has successfully brought about an arrangement between the United States and Canada with respect to the Columbia river.

There are two points I wish to discuss. I deeply regret that at this time the hon. member for Kootenay West is not present in the chamber, for he earlier today endeavoured to bring to this committee the view that the people of British Columbia were opposed to the ratification of the treaty which has been successfully negotiated with the United States.

The position he takes is one which I feel he rather poorly defined. I understand he has no quarrel with any part of the proposed development arranged for under the treaty with the exception only of the High Arrow dam. He has taken the position for parochial and local reasons, and not for reasons which are basically of interest to British Columbia as a whole. In doing so I think I should correct one misstatement of his, namely that the only benefit that would accrue to the province of British Columbia by virtue of the High Arrow dam consists in downstream power benefits. This is fundamentally wrong. A large cash sum is arranged to be paid by the Americans in view of flood control provided by the High Arrow dam. I believe the amount involved is a cash payment of some $64 million and I think this committee should be aware of these facts so that they are fully understood.

The hon. member for Kootenay West dived deeply into his mail bag in order to find support for the position he took. I believe he quoted from certain alleged distinguished Canadian authorities resident in California. I am sure they must have a pronounced and profound interest in the welfare of British Columbia.

In this case he reminds me very much of the story that is told about the hon. gentleman from Kootenay West as a result of discussions in the coffee shop of the house recently. He was impressing everybody with regard to the volume of protests that were pouring in upon him daily from the people of British Columbia relative to the position then taken against the ratification of this treaty. I believe he made the statement that "his phone had been ringing all morning". One of the wags of the House of Commons retorted, "Well, why didn't you answer it?" I think perhaps this story alone can be fairly well transposed to him in the realm of incoming mail. This will indicate the breadth of protests and the extent and number of protests received by the hon. gentleman.

Being a member from British Columbia I also receive mail as, I am sure, do other colleagues who join me from that province. I have yet to see one single indication of protest from people of many political faiths. Members of organizations who are endeavouring to serve the interests of their province to the best of their ability and who are giving of their time and service, write and say they trust that we shall get on with the ratification of this treaty. They further state very clearly—and these are people from all political parties—that in the interests of the people of British Columbia and in the interests of the welfare of the people of Canada as a whole they trust that Mr. Bennett will co-operate, will act in good faith and will quickly come to an agreement with the federal government in order that in this very important and very great undertaking, the multiple establishments of facilities required by this treaty, may enter the planning, and construction phase along the Columbia river immediately.

On behalf of many people in British Columbia I express the hope that the treaty will shortly be referred to the committee on external affairs for consideration. I express the further hope that after giving the matter a proper review, and after giving the Minister of Justice an opportunity in detail to set the record straight, this house may ratify this treaty without delay and see one of the greatest works projects ever undertaken in Canada under way thus providing employment for people who need it, providing power for areas of this continent that need it, and helping generally the welfare of the west.

Mr. Herridge: I must apologize, Mr. Chairman, for being somewhat late. I was at a dinner, and it would have been most discourteous for me to have left at the time I should have left. However, I heard the tail end of the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and I expected him to speak in that vein. That is the sort of thing he tells me in private. Of course he does not know much about the whole question. In order to indicate the general approach to this question in the interior of British Columbia, and in order to refute the argument put forward by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, I now quote from the minutes of a meeting protesting the construction of the High Arrow dam held at Revelstoke, last year, at which there were representatives of municipalities, chambers of commerce, labour and all political parties from southeastern British Columbia. I will quote half a dozen extracts to indicate the trend of public opinion:

Mayor Hardman in his opening remarks—

He is mayor of Revelstoke:

—stated that the purpose of this meeting was to draw to the attention of the governments concerned the opposition of the people of this region to the construction of the High Arrow dam.

Mr. Waterfield of Nakusp—

He is a Conservative minded person.

—spoke of the possible short time advantages to Nakusp while the dam was being built, but the more disadvantageous it becomes from the long term point of view.

Mr. Affleck, civil engineer from Nelson, spoke of the shortsightedness which seemed evident in the handling of our heritage. The flooding of the Arrow lake would build up industries across the line to enter into active competition with Canada.

Mr. H. S. McFadden, local solicitor—

He is from Revelstoke and was a provincial candidate for the Progressive Conservatives during the last provincial election:

—detailed water elevations at various points on the lakes and river and gave a rather vivid indication of the devastation that would result from High Arrow development.

Mr. G. Hobbs, local M.L.A. for Revelstoke, expressed his opposition to the building of the High Arrow dam. Mr. S. Fleming, M.P. for Okanagan-Revelstoke, had this to say. I will quote what he said in part:

The construction of High Arrow would diminish the return from Mica dam, according to information received from General McNaughton. The government would undoubtedly take into account the fact that benefits of High Arrow would be of short duration only, while this meeting, quite justly, was concerned in the long range features.

[Mr. Payne.]

That is what they are concerned about. They are looking at it from the long range point of view.

Mr. Bainbridge, president of the chamber of commerce at Castlegar, said that if High Arrow dam was built after Mica dam the accredited downstream benefits accruing from the High Arrow would be of little consequence.

His Worship Mayor Parkinson of Kelowna—

Kelowna is in Okanagan Boundary riding.

—said that he and the people of the Okanagan valley would very definitely protest if a dam were built on the south end of the Okanagan valley resulting in the flooding of the entire region, in order to give water for irrigation to the fruit growers across the American border. The effect would be represented in further U.S. competition for Canadian growers. It appeared to the speaker that this was one basic principle involved in the construction of High Arrow. The only difference being represented in aluminum rather than fruit.

Mayor Becker of Vernon—

That is in Okanagan-Revelstoke riding—

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly.

Mr. Pugh: With regard to Mayor Parkinson of Kelowna, where in his speech did he say the dam would be constructed? I believe you used the word "Okanagan".

Mr. Herridge: Yes, he said that if a dam were constructed—

Mr. Pugh: In the Okanagan valley?

Mr. Herridge: In the Okanagan valley.

Mr. Pugh: Thank you.

Mr. Herridge: These minutes continue:

Mayor Becker of Vernon spoke of the magnificent scenery throughout the Arrow lake region which would be devastated by flooding, and spoke of the many hot mineral springs and scenic beauty of immense value as a tourist attraction when the trans-Canada highway was completed. He stated that the Arrow lake was one of the most beautiful valleys in B.C. Mayor Becker unequivocally opposed the High Arrow project on the basis of his close association with Columbia valley communities and his experience as a qualified engineer.

Mr. A. W. Lundell—

Social Credit M.L.A. for Revelstoke:

—stated that he had been on record for a long time as being opposed to the High Arrow dam. He said that statements from Messrs. Fulton and Williston had already side-tracked the development of High Arrow ahead of Mica dam.

Mr. Reid, Salmon Arm—

Social Credit M.L.A. at that time. Salmon Arm is hundred miles or so to the west of Revelstoke:

—placed himself unalterably on record as completely opposing the construction of High Arrow dam but at the same time he thought it quite feasible that Mica dam could be further implemented by the construction of the low Arrow which economic effect on the valley would be reduced to a minimum.

We agree with that:

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by all visiting delegates.

The mayor of Kamloops was present, and that is the riding of the Minister of Justice.

Resolution passed by meeting or representatives from southern interior municipalities and chambers of commerce, Tuesday, April 26, 1960.

Whereas it is the responsibility of the governments of Canada and British Columbia to provide for the present and future energy requirements of our country through the development of the Columbia river for power production in Canada, and

Whereas the construction of the High Arrow dam does not contribute to this vital requirement, and

Whereas this meeting is opposed to the construction of High Arrow dam for the following reasons:

(a) The unnecessary destruction of 40,000 acres of our very limited agricultural resources.

(c) The High Arrow dam practically eliminates civilization on the Arrow lakes and destroys 20 communities including the city of Revelstoke, involving a population of more than 7,000 people.

General McNaughton told the committee that the High Arrow dam practically eliminates civilization on the Arrow lakes:

(d) The net balance of revenue over costs on the High Arrow dam would show an annual deficit of approximately $3 million when all losses chargeable to High Arrow are computed.

Therefore be it resolved that this meeting go on record as urging our governments to proceed with the construction and early completion of Mica dam, as the first step followed by the construction of Downie creek, Revelstoke canyon and Murphy creek dams, all producing power within Canada.

Carried unanimously.

These are the representatives of a number of municipalities and organizations in southeastern British Columbia. In addition, to indicate the attitude I want to read a resolution of the Okanagan-Revelstoke Progressive Conservative association. This association has written several letters, just as many Conservatives have in my riding. This is a resolution that was passed in respect to proposals to build the High Arrow dam:

Be it resolved that the Okanagan-Revelstoke Progressive Conservative association vigorously protests the proposed construction of the High Arrow dam in preference to the Mica creek dam for the following reasons:

1. The full benefit to be derived therefrom will accrue to the United States except only the remuneration payable to Canada in power delivered and payment for flood control.

2. The High Arrow dam will materially reduce the potential power development on the Canadian side of the border.

3. The High Arrow, without flow control from Mica creek, will create untold devastation from the south end of Lower Arrow lake to and including the city of Revelstoke and is a potential menace to the lower levels of the city of Revelstoke.

4. Flooding of Arrow lakes will completely destroy one of the four main valleys in British Columbia.

I have received numerous letters from very prominent members of the Conservative party, the Social Credit party and the Liberal party in British Columbia who are not going to be directly affected by the proposal to build this High Arrow dam. That is why I say I have every confidence in stating I am speaking on a completely non-partisan basis.

Mr. George Hobbs, member of the legislature for Revelstoke, who is a C.C.F. member, and Mr. Randolph Harding, M.L.A. member for Kaslo-Slocan, represent the two provincial ridings that will be seriously affected by the building of the proposed High Arrow dam. They expressed their complete opposition recently in the legislature of British Columbia, and they were supported by other members of the legislature.

This is a very important step so far as the governments of Canada and British Columbia are concerned. On behalf of the people I represent I do urge the governments of Canada and British Columbia to utilize this delay to reconsider this question, the consequences of which without doubt have not been completely considered. I urge upon these governments to take the opportunity to use this time to reconsider it and see if they cannot accept the proposals put forward by General McNaughton.

I have held meetings throughout the district and I have received letters from Kootenay East. I held a meeting in Invermere with the Invermere chamber of commerce. The majority of the members of the chamber of commerce at that meeting agreed with me, because when you compare the flooding of the Arrow lakes with flooding in the upper Columbia you bring into production four times as much land as you flood in the upper Columbia, if it is necessary—and it is not necessary at this stage, so far as we see it—whereas in the Arrow lakes area you flood for all time 40,000 acres of land, and forest.

There has been inadequate consideration given to the consequences. Do you know, Mr. Chairman, we have competent foresters working with us who point out that we are going to flood something more than 30,000 acres of first class forest land which provides an annual revenue from growth of $15 an acre? We are going to flood some 11,000 acres of the finest agricultural land in British Columbia. Some of that land at the present time is producing up to $1,500 an acre gross, per annum. I can speak of a small community in Renata where there are just over 81 acres under cultivation producing apples, plums, peaches and pears, and these growers have shipped up to $67,000 worth of fruit annually off that land. This is some of the most valuable land we have in British Columbia, yet the government proposes to flood it.

People in the area concerned consider this is entirely unnecessary. I could go on at great length about this, but representations with respect to the economic, sociological and other effects of this proposal will be presented by a delegation which will be coming from the ridings of Kootenay West and Okanagan-Revelstoke when the external affairs committee is considering the treaty. I would ask hon. members to give this matter serious consideration, remembering that once this flooding is done it is done for all time. We believe the proposal requires far more consideration than has so far been given to it, by members of parliament.

Mr. Henderson: Might I suggest to both the hon. member who was just spoken and the premier of British Columbia that they should do their best to hasten the Peace river project. The Peace river is a natural source of power development. This development has been held back because of uncertainty about the development of the Columbia river. Let us go ahead and have this Peace river project, and never mind the Kootenays. Nobody will be flooded out when the Peace river project goes forward. Certainly it is the most beneficial project we could undertake in British Columbia or in North America.

Mr. Leduc: I have followed this discussion with great interest. I have taken a special interest in this subject since I was advised that the development of the Columbia river would not be in the best interests of British Columbia.

During the recess I was fortunate enough to be able to take a trip to Vancouver. One evening I met an engineer who is working on the Peace river hydro project. He had a film. He asked me if I was interested, and he showed me the film. After discussing this matter for hours I could easily understand the position which the premier of British Columbia is taking. This engineer proved to me that for the same amount of money, or possibly less, more electricity could be produced if the province of British Columbia would promote the development of the northern section and still permit the province to sell electricity to the United States if it were needed.

I feel that British Columbia would be better off if it concentrated on the Peace river development because the flooded area to be created would not displace one single family. It would be the largest hydroelectric project and the largest dam in the world. So far as employment is concerned, it would provide just as much as, or possibly more than, would be provided by the Columbia development, and it would lie entirely within the province of British Columbia. That province would therefore have the full benefit of all the money invested.

For these reasons I believe British Columbia is very wise in continuing its studies of this subject. If they are not convinced that the Columbia river project is the most beneficial one for them, I believe they have every right not to agree to the treaty, because the province is not committed in writing. Its representatives have taken part in the discussions in order to obtain more information, and now that they possess this information I believe the province should not be forced to approve an agreement which would not provide the greatest possible benefit for the residents of British Columbia.

Mr. Hanbidge: Now that we have the Columbia river matter settled I want to introduce into this discussion a subject which is not controversial. I think this is the proper item under which to raise it. It has to do with the Red Deer river diversion in northern Alberta. My hon. friend the member for Red Deer and my hon. friend from Acadia in Alberta are much more familiar with this project than I am, but we in western Saskatchewan are particularly interested in it. I had hoped to bring up the question under the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture when the committee was dealing with P.F.R.A., but unfortunately I was not present when those estimates were considered.

The Red Deer river rises at a considerable distance to the southwest of the city of Red Deer, and for a great many years engineers have considered the possibility of using the waters from the Red Deer river, not for irrigation but for the benefit of stockmen and municipalities in the eastern part of Alberta and the western part of Saskatchewan.

Last August, after the house adjourned, I had the privilege of attending a meeting of chambers of commerce at a place called Consort in the constituency of the hon. member for Acadia. That meeting was attended by 300 or 400 people from Alberta and western Saskatchewan. The purpose of the meeting was to discuss this Red Deer river diversion plan, which is better known as the William Pearce plan. William Pearce was an engineer employed by one of the railway companies. It was he who worked on this plan and developed it, together with the specifications, in connection with this diversion for a great many years.

The meeting was attended by officials and engineers of the department of water resources of the province of Alberta and was addressed by Mr. A. G. Underhill, the district engineer at Calgary. It was sponsored by the central Alberta association of chambers of commerce and, as I say, it was attended by a great many from western Saskatchewan. I have here a copy of the report which has been prepared by Mr. Underhill, the district engineer at Calgary.

I might say that those individuals who are familiar with it prefer to refer to it as the William Pearce plan rather than the Red Deer river diversion plan, Mr. Pearce having been the originator of the idea.

I might also say that members of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act program have worked on this project since 1939. Mr. Phillips, Mr. Hawkins, Mr. A. B. Cooke and Mr. Huddlestone are the four engineers under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act who have been working on this plan. I should also add that Mr. L. B. Thomson, the former chairman of the P.F.R.A., was completely sold on this diversion plan. About a year and a half before his death I had the privilege of listening to him address the chamber of commerce at Kerrobert, and he produced his maps and plans at that time. As I said, he was completely sold on this idea. I do not intend to go into the plans and specifications, but the purpose of the plan is to bring water from the Red Deer river down through Alberta into Saskatchewan as far as the South Saskatchewan river. I know that the Minister of Agriculture, coming from the prairies, is very appreciative of the importance of furnishing water to the prairies, as is the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I would like to compliment that minister on his appointment to that very important department, and I know that he will appreciate the difficulties that some of the small towns must face in regard to the supply of water. The cities of Edmonton, Calgary and Saskatoon are built by rivers, but there are many quite large towns dependent on the surface supply of water rather than on rivers, lakes or even wells. Quite a large number of towns in my constituency are dependent on the surface run off in the spring for their water supply. I do not have to emphasize the need those towns have for water, nor the effect upon those towns if they were supplied water through this project.

I realize that the minister is not in a position to go ahead with this plan at the present time, and that, as it affects two provinces, there will have to be co-operation between the federal government and the governments of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, but I should like to urge the minister to give consideration to this plan, and remind him that it is not a question of irrigation but solely of furnishing water for stockmen, towns and villages who are now up against the problem of obtaining sufficient water to supply the needs of their citizens.

I might also mention that the chambers of commerce of several towns in my district including Kerrobert, Kindersley and Eston are particularly interested in this project. I should also like to pay tribute to the chambers of commerce organization of east central Alberta for the effort this organization has made in bringing this matter to the attention of both the government of the province of Alberta and the government of Canada. I would particularly like to commend Mr. Richard Fritze of Castor, Alberta, who is president of that organization. I hope the minister and his officials will keep this project in mind. I might also suggest that if Mr. L. B. Thomson, who was in my opinion one of the greatest men who ever had anything to do with P.F.R.A., had lived, we should probably see, in the not too distant future, the conclusion of this project.

Mr. Mitchell: I should like to direct the minister's attention a little further north than the prairies, and make a further plea in regard to consideration of the grand replenishment and northern development canal. For the sake of a shorter name we have taken the first letters of each word and called it the Grand canal.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that representations were made a year ago on behalf of this replenishment canal, and I do not think it is necessary to go into the details or objectives of it at this stage. One of my constituents, who is the prime mover of this project, has spent a great deal of time and money investigating the possibilities of the project. It is true, perhaps, that the members of the committee did not take a very amiable or favourable view of the representations which were made a year ago, and thought the project was perhaps fantastic, but I should suggest that it is entirely capable of realization, and that the necessary moneys required could be provided as a result of the following hydro developments, and replenishment of the great lakes water through the reversal of the flow of rivers now flowing into James bay.

I should like to draw the committee's attention to the fact that it has recently come to our attention that our neighbours across the Bering sea in the northern part of Russia have considered a similar project in respect of the northern Siberian rivers, and have sent engineers there to investigate and make a study, with the intention of using those waters for the same purpose as we envisage in the proposition I have put forth. I realize this would be a gigantic undertaking, but also that if it were carried through, the waters of the great lakes would be replenished. I realize also that the states bordering on the south of the great lakes are against the proposed Chicago diversion, but I am led to believe that the Chicago authorities are perfectly willing, if necessary, to pay for the water they use as a result of this diversion.

I bring these matters to the attention of the minister with the hope that his department will make an engineering survey to determine the possibilities of such a program. While this plan is at the present time in its infancy, I feel it must be carried out sometime because of the great benefit which will be derived therefrom.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before this item carries I wonder whether the minister could bring us up to date in regard to the Holland dam, the Russell dam and diversion of the Assiniboine river into lake Manitoba? I do not think he has said very much about this project this year.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, before I answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I should perhaps refer to the subject raised by the hon. member for Kindersley, regarding the Red river diversion in Alberta.

Mr. Pickersgill: You mean the Red Deer river.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am sorry; the Red Deer river diversion in Alberta. This project has been under study by the prairie provinces water board for some time. The latest information I have in this regard is to the effect that we cannot expect anything further on the subject for several months, but I should like to draw his attention to vote 296 in the estimates, which relates to the Nelson river and the Saskatchewan river basins. The study, when it gets under way, will incorporate a study of the Red Deer river diversion.

Regarding the subject mentioned by the hon. member for Sudbury, it was dealt with in answer to a question put on orders of the day same weeks ago. I understand this is a topic which recurs from time to time and, as a matter of fact, it was fairly thoroughly examined in the committee on mines, waters and forests a year ago. After an exhaustive examination of the subject by that committee the committee made a quite non-committal report. The report stated, in part:

> The committee heard with interest from witnesses of the proposed Hurricanaw river development project, but it feels that there has been insufficient basic engineering evidence presented to come to any conclusion on this matter.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

I understand that one of the proponents of the scheme has come up with a few statistics on the possible cost-benefit relations and he estimates that the scheme would cost about $4.5 billion at 5 per cent interest over 50 years. It would take almost 300 million horsepower on a continuous basis to bring 25,000 cubic feet per second of water proposed to be diverted from James bay to the Ottawa river watershed and from there to the great lakes, and at the end of the 50 years the returns might amount to $100 million annually. On the basis of those figures, Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to establish, of course, a favourable benefit-cost ratio.

Another difficult aspect of this whole project is the very large amount of hydro electric power potential which would be committed to essentially non-productive purposes. Therefore, in the light of all the other pressing matters of water resource development, at the moment it does not appear that this is one of the more urgent schemes. However, the subject referred to by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate does have a sense of urgency because the Assiniboine river passes through my constituency.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that the criterion?

Mr. Dinsdale: Well, I should say from the personal standpoint it has a sense of urgency because of its location close to home. There are two possible approaches to flood control on the Assiniboine, as the hon. member knows, which have been under discussion for the past several years. The Holland dam diversion is one and the Russell reservoir is the other. There has been no final conclusion as to which is the better approach to the difficulty. There are supporters of both sides of the question. The study that is under way with respect to all flood problems relating to both the Red river and the Assiniboine river will make the final decision and the final choice in this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: This subject is quite separate and distinct, though, from the Red river floodway itself, I understand, because the minister said the scheme itself was all settled, but he did not say that the details were all settled. There is one other question. Has the idea of diverting the Assiniboine, or any part of it, into lake Manitoba been dropped?

Mr. Dinsdale: The idea of diversion into lake Manitoba was pretty well set aside some two years ago, and at the time the Holland diversion became active. The original concept was to divert the river into lake Manitoba. It is now conceived by the engineers that the Holland diversion would be much more effective for the purpose.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rather gathered that from the remarks made by the minister of agriculture in Manitoba but he was not conclusive about it.

Item agreed to.

294. Fraser river—federal expenditures in connection with investigations to be carried out by the Fraser river board, $322,500.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say what is being done at the present time in respect of this item?

Mr. Dinsdale: The Fraser river study has been a continuing one over the past several years. I believe it has been under way since 1949.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the big flood.

Mr. Dinsdale: Since the big flood, as a matter of fact, yes. And the present study, which is actually a continuation of the work that got under way in 1949, is merely continuing investigations of the general water control problems on the Fraser river. There is an annual report on this subject that is available to hon. members. I am informed it is not an annual report. Reports are made from time to time. One was tabled in the house just the other day, which brings the project pretty well up to date.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no danger of a flood this year?

Mr. Dinsdale: No; the flood potential is quite negligible during the current year.

Mr. McLennan: In 1958 an elaborate report was made on flood control and hydroelectric power in the Fraser river basin. In that report the board stated that the immediate problem is the lower Fraser valley dikes. It would appear there is always enough snow and ice in the Fraser river valley basin to cause a flood if the weather is unfavourable. We all remember the disastrous flood of 1948, and the terrific property damage it caused. It is only in the real fertile lower Fraser valley that the problem of flood control assumes any major proportion.

Has the government of British Columbia made any approach to help the scheme of strengthening the dike described in the board's report?

Mr. Dinsdale: No, there has been no approach from the province of British Columbia and I think for a very good reason. Actually, the responsibility for strengthening the dikes would be a provincial responsibility.

Item agreed to.

295. Contributions to the provinces towards the construction of dams and other works to assist in the conservation and control of water resources in accordance with agreements entered into between Canada and the provinces, $1,950,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a few brief remarks I should like to make on this item. They have to do with the upper Thames river conservation authority. It may seem strange to members from other parts of this country that in southwestern Ontario, which is generally considered to be one of the most thickly populated and highly developed parts of Canada, both agriculturally and industrially, we should have conservation projects. But in some respects it is probably the most important part of the country where these projects could take place. The Thames river drains 2,250 square miles of land. The river rises in the highlands of Perth and Oxford counties, which lie northeast of the city of London. It flows for 190 miles into lake St. Clair. This watershed which I have already mentioned encompasses probably one of the most thoroughly populated areas in the country and contains some of the most highly used agricultural land in the area and, of course, is full of small and large industrial towns and cities.

This project under the upper Thames river conservation authority got under way some years ago. In 1953, the first dam, known as the Fanshawe dam, in London, Ontario, was completed. Since that time nothing further has been done. At the same time I should mention that in addition the part of the upper Thames river project known as the Ingersoll channel improvement scheme was also completed, but the principal part of the project completed was the one at London. Since then the people in the area, and I know the members in the area, have been pressing constantly to have the project completed. To complete the project, the channel of the Thames river must be improved. There are two branches of the Thames river, one known as the north and the other as the south branch. They meet in London.

The first item to complete the project is the Mitchell channel improvement scheme. The second is the St. Mary's channel improvement scheme and the third is the Woodstock channel improvement scheme. Then there will be dams and reservoirs at Wildwood, Woodstock and Glengowan. Two other projected dams and reservoirs are suggested at Thamesford and Cedar creek although I have heard recently that these latter two projects may not be found to be necessary. I say "may not" because it is by no means certain yet.

The members of the upper Thames valley conservation authority are appointed from the different municipalities concerned. For a number of years the members of the upper Thames valley conservation authority have sent delegations to Ottawa, for a long time without success, I might say. I know that the hon. member for Perth, who is now Minister of National Health and Welfare, the hon. member for Middlesex East, myself and other hon. members have constantly requested the government over the years to make a contribution toward the completion of this project.

I might say in this regard that the federal government pays 37½ per cent of the cost, the provincial government of Ontario 37½ per cent, and the remaining 25 per cent is paid by the municipalities concerned. The first part of this project having been completed in 1953 and having proved eminently successful, finally at long last in January of this year an agreement was signed with the Ontario government and by the middle of April engineering plans had been approved by the provincial and federal governments for the necessary steps to complete this project.

It is my understanding that engineering contracts have been approved for the Mitchell channel improvement scheme, the Woodstock channel improvement scheme, the Woodstock dam and reservoir and the Wildwood dam and reservoir. I also understand that work is already under way on these projects and that an actual start on construction is to be expected late this summer or early this fall.

I should like to take this opportunity to commend the minister and the government for being so farsighted as to take steps to complete this very valuable project. On completion the upper Thames river conservation authority will be a prototype or, if you wish to put it this way, it will be a "pilot project" which will serve as an example for similar projects in other parts of Canada that are thickly populated agricultural and industrial areas.

I should also like at this time to express the appreciation and thanks of everyone in the area to the members of the authority and their executive committees, and particularly to Mr. Gordon Pittock, the chairman of the upper Thames valley conservation authority. The untiring work and effort that these people have put into the completion of this scheme are highly commendable and they deserve the thanks of all the people in the area.

I see that the item in the estimates for this project this year is $350,000 which will mean a nice start during the current year. The estimated cost of the completed project is a little less than $10 million and the federal government's share is not to exceed $3,600,000 over the next few years.

I should like to point out for the benefit of other members that there will be a great many very direct benefits from a project of this type which may be given consideration in other parts of the country. First of all, it provides flood protection for the communities along the river. I can well remember that when I was a student at the university in London in 1937 about 7,000 people were flooded out. I remember losing all my notes for examinations, which was a sad state of affairs indeed.

In addition, this particular project will ensure that there is a greater water supply for the larger urban areas such as London, Stratford and Woodstock. One of the most important aspects of such a project is that it will ensure a more constant rate of flow of water during the dry season in the summer and fall months. This, of course, will greatly assist in the disposal of sewage from the various industrial plants in the municipalities and will prevent pollution of the river which retards the development of recreational and living areas and, indeed, industrial areas along the river banks. During the summer months the odour from the Thames river near Woodstock, London, Ingersoll and elsewhere is anything but agreeable, and a more constant flow of water will greater alleviate this most unpleasant problem.

The recreational use of the lands around reservoirs is, of course, something that is of great benefit to the people in the area. Land for recreational purposes in southwestern Ontario is at a premium because of the greatly increased population. I know that the Fanshawe dam at London has provided some delightful park areas for the people of London and I know that the dams being constructed near St. Mary's and at Woodstock will likewise provide a great deal of fine recreational land not only for the permanent residents of the area but for visitors as well. Also, of course, as these projects are basically conservation projects they will prevent the erosion of valuable agricultural lands during the spring run-offs and will provide a large reservoir of water which will help to maintain the water table throughout the area and the levels of the various farm wells. The value of this last factor is, of course, difficult to estimate. One hears different opinions about it, but there is little doubt that it will greatly assist the level of the water table in the area.

There are other indirect benefits to be derived from this project but I do not wish to take the time of the committee to go into detail. Likewise I do not see the necessity of dealing with the actual figures concerning the number of cubic feet of water that will be stored and so on. These details can, of course, be obtained by any hon. member from the department.

Again I should like to thank the government. For the people of my area this project certainly is the long-awaited realization of a dream.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, this item deals with contributions to the provinces toward the construction of dams and other works to assist in the conservation and control of water resources in accordance with agreements entered into between Canada and the provinces. At this time I should like to express to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the government the appreciation of those people who are within the area of the metropolitan Toronto and region conservation authority for the announcement which the minister was able to make on April 19 of this year in which he indicated that an agreement would be entered into for the construction of certain works in that conservation area.

While my riding of Peel is not part of metropolitan Toronto, a portion of it comes within the area over which the conservation authority has jurisdiction. We have had experiences in the past of the ravaging of uncontrolled waters. In 1948 the town of Brampton suffered immense damage from the rampaging Etobicoke river. As a result of the scare at that time, a diversion was put around Brampton in 1951. The efficacy of such a measure was shown. When hurricane Hazel came along in 1954, Brampton was spared an event that would have resulted in practically eliminating the downtown area. We have there a practical demonstration of what can result when proper conservation works are carried out.

This announcement was also a source of personal satisfaction to me, as it must be to the hon. member for York West, the hon. member for York-Humber and other members who used to belabour the government when they sat on the other side of the house in order to get it to enter into these agreements to effect conservation measures. I well remember a debate in 1955 in which we did not seem to be able to convince the then minister of northern affairs of the benefits that would accrue to that particular area and the country as a whole if these agreements were entered into.

After listening to the debate this afternoon previously on the Columbia river and the inability of the provincial government to co-operate, I say this. The province of Ontario, under a Conservative administration, was prepared to co-operate in this scheme but the then Liberal federal government was not prepared to co-operate. Now that we have both the provincial government and the federal government of the same Conservative party, we find a measure of co-operation that is certainly resulting in benefits being made available under these conservation measures. I think that the resultant benefits which the hon. member for Oxford indicated in his area followed from these schemes, will certainly follow from this scheme.

Before I conclude I should like to pay a tribute to the conservation authority and in that I include the hon. member for Toronto High Park who sat on that authority, for the persistence shown by them and for their dedication to the work of convincing others that this scheme must be carried out. They persisted over the years. It is an example also of how, when groups at the local level work together themselves and put together their ideas, prepare them carefully and submit them to a responsible and responsive government, action will be achieved. It will result in the saving of property and lives, and greater enjoyment to the people of this area.

I would suggest that the course this government has taken in conservation generally is one that will be increased over the years. We in Canada, because of our abundance of natural resources are sometimes, a little careless with them. This fact is realized by the people in charge of the affairs of this country now. One of the things which must give them great satisfaction is to see put on the statute books of the country legislation such as A.R.D.A. to preserve the natural assets of the country and to see moneys voted in co-operation with the provinces and the municipalities so that our children and our grandchildren will have saved for them the beauties of nature that we enjoy.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister can say what the formula is for the division of costs in these schemes?

Mr. Dinsdale: All these water conservation measures are carried out in the framework of the Canada Water Conservation Act which provides for participation by the federal government up to 37½ per cent. In the case of the metropolitan Toronto scheme or the Humber scheme, the provincial participation is 37½ per cent and that of the local authority 25 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say on what date that principle of division of costs was first established?

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe the act was first passed in 1953. The first occasion on which it was used was in 1960 in connection with the upper Thames program.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was a different formula used in connection with developments on the Grand River?

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe the Grand river project was an ad hoc project, if my memory serves me correctly, but the formula was much the same.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Grand river project was undertaken even before 1953?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: So that this co-operation with the provinces is not something of recent date.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I do not think I have ever been accused of making a "me too" speech in this chamber and I do not wish to do so now; nor do I wish to take any time which could be devoted by the minister to answering questions on a vital matter. However, I would be remiss if I did not echo the remarks of the hon. member for Peel in connection with the satisfaction that I know the people of York West feel in finally seeing this program for the metropolitan Toronto and region conservation authority having a chance to be completed.

I think there is a fair amount of personal satisfaction for any hon. member of the house in seeing a project which has been close to him during his period of office, finally come within sight of completion. This is something which has been close to us in my area since 1954 and for very obvious reasons, namely because of the tremendous loss of life in York West during the period of hurricane Hazel. There have been many intermediate steps. I think the tribute paid to the conservation authority of the district was well earned. I think all of those in the metropolitan area who continued to bring to the attention of the government the need for completion of this project deserve a great deal of thanks.

I might say to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that it is very easy on occasion to have legislation enacted by the house but it is a very different thing to see it implemented. We therefore greatly appreciate the move which the minister has made at this time.

Mr. Best: I should like briefly to concur in the remarks of the hon. members for Oxford, Peel and York West concerning item 295 with regard to contributions from the federal government to the provinces towards the construction of dams and other works to assist in the conservation and control of water resources. In our own county of Halton we have numerous river systems. Indeed, we have all or parts of four river valley conservation authorities. I refer to parts of the Grand, the Credit and the whole of Sixteen-mile creek and Twelve-mile creek authorities. In that respect the situation is much the same as that in the ridings of the hon. members who have spoken previously. We have been adding to our population sometimes at the rate of 10,000 people a year in Halton county. Because of the tremendous growth of our towns and since the number of people commuting to Hamilton and to metropolitan Toronto grows constantly it is important that our water systems, our parks and our farm lands be protected to an even greater extent for agricultural, recreational and safety purposes.

The use made of these areas, particularly in the northern part of my county, has increased tremendously in recent years. Thus any measures which may be able to aid the preservation of such land and water resources are of great importance indeed.

This measure, with the three specific amounts, two for Ontario and one in Manitoba, is indeed a large factor. I only hope it will be extended from year to year to other water systems as applications are made by municipalities and provinces or whoever may wish to initiate such contributions and such planning.

I do feel that this program, along with other matters such as the A.R.D.A. measure, brought forward by our Minister of Agriculture, and which we have been debating in this house in recent days, will go far towards providing greater water resource use in my own county and indeed in many areas across Canada.

Item agreed to.

Northern administration branch—

297. Branch administration including authority to make recoverable advances for services performed on behalf of the governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $1,133,935.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, when I spoke earlier in this debate I mentioned federal aid for Eskimos and said, in effect, that whereas Quebec Eskimos receive around $400 per person per year, the Eskimos in Newfoundland receive much less, perhaps around $250 per year.

I am afraid I left the impression that there was a yearly grant to Eskimos in Newfoundland. I should like to make a correction, because to the best of my knowledge, that is not so. There was a lump sum made available for their use.

I should like again to make my plea that an agreement be reached with the province by which the Eskimos in Labrador would receive the same help from federal sources as do Eskimos elsewhere. I have every reason to think that in saying the Eskimos in Newfoundland receive $250 per head, apart from perhaps creating the impression that this was an annual grant, in fact they receive much less.

May I again ask the minister for his very sympathetic attention to this problem of help for Eskimos in Labrador and an increase in the amount of assistance given to them through the provincial government.

I make this plea because their needs are great. In fact the needs of Eskimos and Indians throughout the north are great. They require additional educational facilities, and so on. I am sure all these things engage the sympathetic attention of the minister and I invite him to take on active interest in this matter.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister a question in relation to the switch in the northern affairs bulletin "North". I would ask the minister why it is now a bigger and a slicker magazine.

I want to ask him also whether he can give us some idea of the cost of this magazine and its circulation. Why do we have something this glossy? I was going to use the word "slick", but I think "cute" would be better. Why is it necessary?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, with reference to the magazine "North", as the hon. member knows, because I believe he is in regular receipt of a copy, there is a subscription charge of some $3 per year. The subscription cost has not been changed, I understand, as between the present format of the magazine and the former format. This is because actually there is very little increase in cost as between the two formats.

As I recall, the paid circulation is 2,000. In addition certain copies are supplied to hon. members of the house and officers of the department. The total production cost is $5,000.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to suggest that it would be nice for me to see in it—and perhaps other hon. members would agree—an article written by someone other than a senior civil servant or a minister of the crown. I suggest that the hon. member for Mackenzie River—while I have seen mentions of him—might be a worth-while contributor comparable with the minister, especially since he has an interest in the area.

I wish to ask the minister another question. It relates to an article that appeared last year in the Ottawa Journal. This was a report by the Canadian Press from Montreal about the remarks of a Dr. Maxwell Dunbar of McGill University, an expert on northern living. This is the quotation from the Canadian Press report:

> Far from being the dedicated, happy band of pioneers they are popularly pictured. Dr. Dunbar said Tuesday, most northern communities are "unhappy, torn by petty jealousy, boredom and over-developed egos".
> They are this way, he told a meeting of the national federation of financial analysts societies, because companies interested in northern development don't hire the right sort of people.
> He suggested they stop "trying to attract anyone at all to live for 18 months in an air-conditioned barracks at 80 degrees farenheit by means of high pay and airborne steaks".
> These lures, he said, have attracted men "with movie and corner drugstore minds".
> Dr. Dunbar said suitable men could be attracted by the "high moral standard" which used to characterize northern living; quiet, modest people with senses of humour, cynical rather than over-optimistic and without illusions about their strengths and weaknesses.

This is the most pungent criticism of the social situation in the north that I have seen. I tried to get the full text of the remarks and did not come up with it, but I heard several other speakers on C.B.C. programs last year indicate something of the same.

I have no idea whether there is any substance in these remarks, but is there a social situation in the north such as Dr. Dunbar sets out? If so, how is it being met by the department and what aspect of it is the government's responsibility?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief remarks before the minister answers this question. I have not read the article that the hon. member for Port Arthur has quoted from, but I want to be immediate, quick and decisive in saying that I dissociate myself completely from any confirmation of the remarks in that article. I think nothing could distort the true picture more than the doctor's remarks in that article.

I live there. I live in a normal community. I have travelled over the Mackenzie and over the Yukon. Nowhere have I found conditions such as those described by the good doctor. I am sure he meant well in writing this article. I do not know what experience he has in the north, but I do suggest that too many people write articles along the lines of the one quoted by the hon. member when they have not a scintilla of actual knowledge of living conditions in the north.

We are normal, healthy Canadians in the north. We are up there with a great deal of faith in the development of the country for the benefit of the whole of Canada. Nothing could be more wrong than the picture painted by the author of that article.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, actually I am very glad the hon. member for Port Arthur raised the question of contributions to the magazine "North". I do not know how many issues of this magazine he has seen, but it is a policy of the editor to encourage contributions from all possible sources, particularly those who have some knowledge of topics that would be of interest to northerners and readers of the magazine. Representatives of the church in the north have from time to time made outstanding contributions to the magazine. I would also like to suggest that if there is any member of parliament who feels he would like to contribute to the magazine such contributions would be greatly appreciated.

An hon. Member: There is a volunteer.

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member for Port Arthur has written on various subjects from time to time and I assure him we would be happy to have anything from his pen which would be regarded as suitable. I am informed there is a very lenient editorial policy and that any such articles would be subjected to a minimum of editing.

As to the other matter, I do not think I can carry the subject further than the hon. member for Yukon, who represents the north, who lives in the north, who has travelled extensively in the north and who is intimately associated with the social life and the social problems north of the 60th parallel.

Articles are written on the north from time to time, and I think the hon. member would be the first to agree that some people look at the subject through jaundiced eyes. I am a newcomer as far as personal contact with our northern communities is concerned, but I have visited each of the areas—the west, the centre and the east. I have been in isolated communities such as Cambridge bay, Frobisher and Aklavik. The thing which has impressed me is the high quality of community life in these places.

Take Whitehorse, for example, which is a typical northern community. That city is as modern as, or even more modern than, communities of a similar size in the prairie regions of Canada. It has all the amenities such as paved roads, hospitals and schools; all the facilities which are required in order to live a healthy normal life by modern standards. The old town of Aklavik, when I visited it during the Easter recess, struck me as being the home of a most happy group of citizens. I think the reason for this social well being lies in the hands of the dedicated civil servants, teachers and welfare workers who are devoting their time to work in this part of Canada. The principal of the school there, for example, is a trained anthropologist, a man with a distinguished war record who has spent his entire teaching career up to the present time in the north. He has obviously set his stamp upon the community at Aklavik.

I could go to the other extreme of the Arctic, to Frobisher. The administrator there is well known to a good many members of this house because two or three years ago, I think, he was on the personal staff of the Governor General. He decided he would like to make his contribution to the program of northern development and he is there now doing an outstanding job on behalf of the people of the north.

It was my privilege to visit Frobisher on a Sunday afternoon and the entire population had gathered together in the community hall, a hall which, incidentally, has been sponsored by the ladies of the I.O.D.E. It is a substantial building equipped for community purposes and there the entire Eskimo population of Frobisher Bay had gathered. The impression I received from talking to many of them was that they were enjoying a happy community life in this Arctic outpost. On that occasion, too, we made history by presenting a 25 year service certificate and button to Mr. Frank Delaute who is the administrator to whom I referred. The presentation was greeted with great acclaim by all the residents of Frobisher.

On the basis, then, of personal experience and also on the basis of extensive reading on the subject I would say that any report which suggests that the communities of the north are beset with difficult social problems as described in the report read by the hon. member must be the result of viewing the subject with limited knowledge or from a biased viewpoint.

Mr. Fisher: There is one question which occurs to me now and it relates to the unique position which Mr. Robertson has as a deputy minister of the department and also in his relationship with the council. This is a unique situation, as far as I know, in government.

There are a number of senior civil servants, including deputy ministers, who are directors of crown corporations and similar organizations but I do not know of any other senior civil servant who has this particular role of being a focal point in what might possibly be a developing desire for autonomy, certainly in a political atmosphere.

I just wonder whether consideration has been given to how long this situation is likely to continue before there may be rifts or the possibility of an attack upon the council which, since some of the members are elected, might place Mr. Robertson as a civil servant in an invidious position. I am not suggesting this has happened. It is hypothetical. Nevertheless it seems to me something which could possibly happen and I should like to hear the minister's comments on whether any consideration has been given to altering the balance of the representation so that we should not have a senior civil servant in such a central position.

Mr. Dinsdale: The question raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur is not a new one. This point has been discussed at the two recent meetings of the territorial council itself. The precedent for the appointment goes back to 1905, I understand. Since that year it has been the practice to appoint a high level civil servant to the post of commissioner of the Northwest Territories. On the other hand, in the Yukon Territory which until recently to a certain extent was in a more advanced state of development, the commissioner has not necessarily been a high ranking civil servant. As to possible future developments, I think recommendations will be forthcoming from the council itself in this respect. As I indicated the other day it is the desire of the government that these territories, both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, should move toward independent status as quickly as the economic and social situation permits.

There is even some suggestion that a separate territory be established in the Northwest Territories area. If and when this suggestion is followed, the commissioner appointed could perhaps be an individual completely outside the high level civil service category.

Progress has been made along this line through the provision of a council for the Northwest Territories which is partly elective and partly appointive. I am sure as progress continues the situation to which the hon. member has made reference will be resolved, and we shall move toward a greater position of independence in the territories.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the minister whether the Glassco commission has a task force operating in the department looking at this particular aspect; that is the dual role of the deputy minister?

Mr. Dinsdale: The terms of reference to the Glassco commission do not necessarily include that subject matter to which the member has referred. Whether that commission will request the opportunity of looking at this situation is something to be decided in the future, but at the moment this is not a term of reference.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to put it to the minister, and the committee, that the onus of the extra responsibility in no way diminishes the attention and concern that the deputy minister can give to his departmental function as distinct from his other duties.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member will agree that the over-all responsibility of the deputy minister of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources necessitates his vital interest in the activities of the north and, while this constitutes extra work—his doubling in the capacity of the commissioner—at the same time it allows him to present his knowledgeable viewpoint regarding the peculiar problems of the Northwest Territories. In the past, during the underdeveloped period, this viewpoint has been very useful.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I did not have that point in mind. I was thinking of the difficulties involved as a result of one individual helping to develop policy, making up estimates and recommending expenditures in certain areas of the northern administration, while at the same time putting on another hat of responsibility in the spending of this money. I was wondering about the possibility of there being a certain amount of conflict and a certain amount of overlap which is perhaps not ideal.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on this subject. The hon. member for Port Arthur is probably aware of the fact that the history of the political development in the Yukon has followed almost the same course as that being followed now in the Northwest Territories. In 1901 the elected portion of the council in the Yukon numbered 5, and the appointed portion also numbered 5. At that time the commissioner was appointed by the minister. As a result of the amendment to the Yukon Act the elected members to that council now number 7, which is now the entire council, and it sits without any appointees whatsoever. The commissioner of the Yukon Territory is still appointed by the minister.

The point I am trying to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Port Arthur is that I have no reason to believe that the people of the Mackenzie river area would feel otherwise than did those people of the Yukon Territory, and that any move toward additional representation, control or autonomy on behalf of those people, should be initiated by themselves and not by this house.

There is a move afoot in the Yukon now for increased representation. Certain representations were made when the act was amended regarding an increase in the size of the council. Representations were also made, through the council, for an advisory committee, in respect of financial matters, which would sit with the commissioner of the territory to consider the budget and other fiscal problems. This is as it was desired by the people of the Yukon, and I am certain that the people of the Mackenzie river area would not wish anything different in regard to their situation. I am sure when they are ready to accept greater responsibility and desire a greater number of representatives on the Northwest Territories council similar to that of the Yukon where the commissioner is in a sense, separate from the departmental administration, they will not hesitate in making their views known. Northerners have a peculiar habit of making their views known quite forcibly and, I must say, during the few years I have been associated with the situation, the department has acceded to all reasonable requests made by the residents of the area.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, if there is any one person who is more concerned with this problem than anyone else, I speak of the anomaly of the deputy minister of the department being the chairman of the council, I am sure it is the deputy minister himself, who has served in both capacities with great distinction and efficiency. It is true, as has been pointed out, that as the work of the department grows, greater responsibility is put on the deputy minister, and he acquires many more duties. Perhaps because of that fact, if for no other reason, the time will come, because of the burdens on the deputy minister, when a change will have to be made.

Mr. Chairman, I am not sure this is the right moment, or that we are dealing with the appropriate item, but I should like to direct some questions to the minister regarding the development of the roads to resources program, in so far as the Yukon and Northwest Territories are concerned. With your permission I shall put them now.

I should like to ask the minister if he can give figures regarding the expenditures to date, in respect of this program, in so far as the areas I have mentioned are concerned. I should also like to ask him what the maximum expenditures are, as envisaged in this program, and the amount of expenditure under the program which has already been committed.

I should also like to ask the minister for information in regard to the mileage of roads now under construction, and the total program in terms of mileage which has been agreed to by the government. Perhaps the minister could deal with those questions now.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to answer the questions of the Leader of the Opposition, I should perhaps say a final word regarding the subject raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur, and endorse what has been said in this respect by the hon. member for the Yukon and the Leader of the Opposition.

I feel sure we can depend on the council members themselves to recommend a change in regard to the commissioner when they feel it is due. We have, in the four elected representatives of the territorial council, four vigorous spokesmen for the north. At the present time it is their opinion that the existing arrangement is the most useful and satisfactory one and, while there is a growing desire for independence, they have recommended that the present system of appointing members to the council be continued, because of the knowledge that these appointed council men have regarding the problems discussed by the territorial council.

The Leader of the Opposition has asked for rather detailed information on the roads to resources program in the territories. Perhaps I can break it down into the various categories that he requested. He asked for the total mileage of resources road construction in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. The figures for the Northwest Territories are as follows. The total mileage is 1,384. Up to the end of 1960-61, 754 miles had been surveyed. Of this total, 503 miles have been cleared and 337 miles constructed.

In the Yukon Territory the total mileage is 900. Of that, 595 miles have been surveyed, 287 miles cleared and 237 miles constructed. The total for the territories is 2,284 miles. In addition, reconstruction of roads is under way in the Yukon Territory. This involves a total mileage of 458.

As for the expenditure represented by this construction, I can give the hon. member the totals between 1957 and 1961. For the Northwest Territories the total was $15,999,000. The amount proposed for the Northwest Territories in 1961-62 is $3.4 million. The amount required to complete the mileage contemplated is $44.5 million. The total estimated expenditure in round figures is $64 million.

For the Yukon Territory the amount spent up to 1961 is $7.26 million. The amount proposed for the fiscal year under discussion is $3.73 million. The amount required to complete the program is $25.79 million. The estimated total is $36.79 million.

The cost of the roads to be reconstructed in the Yukon Territory; up to the present time $2.96 million has been expended. It is proposed to spend $1.23 million in the current fiscal year. The amount required to complete the program is $0.91 million, with a total expenditure of $5.11 million. I do not know whether this covers all the information requested by the hon. member. I can give a further breakdown if he would like to have it.

Mr. Pearson: I think that is sufficient detail for my purposes, Mr. Chairman. It is interesting to compare these figures with the figures given by the Prime Minister himself in a television broadcast on March 3, 1960, which were as follows. I quote from the text of that broadcast. The Prime Minister was dealing with the roads to resources program in the Yukon and Northwest Territories and he said that at that time, namely March, 1960, federal expenditure had been about $20 million and that 600 or 700 miles of unprotected new roads and bridges were under way at that time. In the same broadcast, in regard to this program, he said that the maximum expenditure envisaged was $150 million and that agreements had been signed to cover this. He then went on to say in the broadcast that this program in the north provided for the building of an additional 4,000 miles of roads to tap the new resources of the north and that the total expenditure—that was March, 1960—at that time committed, amounted to $135 million. It will be interesting to compare these figures put on the air a year ago with what the minister has given us this afternoon.

Mr. Nielsen: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question before he resumes his seat. Does he now agree that the roads to resources in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories—the development roads—are a sound policy on behalf of the government in developing the whole nation including that 40 per cent of the nation above the 60th parallel, or does he still adhere to his igloo to igloo statement which he made in 1957 and 1958?

Mr. Pearson: I am very glad the hon. member has given me an opportunity to say something about this. He has asked me whether I now adhere to the position that the roads to resources program in the north is important to the development of that country. Well, of course, Mr. Chairman, I have always taken that position and I made statements to that effect long before the hon. member came into the House of Commons. Nothing could be more important to the development of the northern area than roads, communication and transport generally. There is no question about that. What I also say is that statements made in 1957 and 1958 by the Prime Minister and others that this roads to resources program—it was not called that then—this road-building program in the north, this great program of public works in the north, which included road building, was a phony one in so far as correcting the unemployment situation was concerned. If the hon. member will read the statements I made at that time—I repeat them now—he will find that I said this kind of program as a cure for unemployment was completely unrealistic. That has been shown since that time by the figures that have been given, not by the present minister but by his predecessor, which indicated how much employment was being given by this program.

So far as development is concerned, no one underestimates their importance. But the Arctic road program as a cure never had anything but visionary, political importance attached to it. As a development program, nothing could be more important. As a program for curing unemployment, well, nothing could be more calculated to deceive the people than some of the statements made at that time on the employment aspects of this activity.

I think it should also be pointed out that while it is extremely important to develop the Arctic, it is also important to redevelop some of the older parts of the country where the economy is now slack and where unemployment is now very high. These two things have to go together, both development and redevelopment, in a healthy and balanced economy.

Mr. Nielsen: I might just say that the Leader of the Opposition still has not yet answered my question.

First of all, may I say that I have read very carefully within the last week the 1957 and 1958 statements of both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, and my recollection of those statements is that the unemployment situation was not to be met by roads being built in the north but by national public works. The Leader of the Opposition made several statements throughout the west during 1957 and 1958 in which he referred to the northern development roads as roads from igloo to igloo. He said so in Saskatchewan and also in British Columbia. He selected one particular road in the Yukon running from Flat Creek into the potential oil and gas fields of the Yukon as being a road from igloo to igloo.

If the Leader of the Opposition will read the statistics which I put on the record on May 4, 1961, to be found at page 4384 of Hansard, he will see that this road from igloo to igloo, as he termed it then, has increasing significance now when oil and gas revenue has increased from a figure of $8,344,579 for the period 1953 to 1956 to a figure of $32,599,956 for the period 1957 to 1960. He will also recall, I am sure, that the first oil well in the Yukon came in the year before last, the Chance No. 2, and that the Hope No. 1 well is now in the process of being drilled. Does he still feel that this road is a road from igloo to igloo?

Mr. Pearson: I cannot resist the invitation to prolong this discussion for a moment. When the hon. member talks about northern roads, whether they are from igloo to igloo or from oil well to oil well or from community to community, I would point out that these roads and their construction were put forward as a cure for unemployment, and I ask the hon. member to read the Prime Minister's speeches of that time when they were put forward as a cure for unemployment.

That was a phony performance and has been so described in the house many times. One reason why it has been shown to be so is the figures that have been given in the house of the amount of employment provided over the years by the construction of these very important and valuable roads for development purposes, whether from igloo to igloo, oil well to oil well or town to town. I will send him the text of my statement and also the text of the Prime Minister's statement so that the hon. member will be able to refresh his memory and be quite clear as to what is involved.

Mr. Nielsen: I want to say one last word. As recently as last week I read these statements very carefully, and I mean no intentional disrespect to the Leader of the Opposition when I suggest that his interpretation of the Prime Minister's statement as being the promise of a cure for unemployment is, to say the least, a phony or less than accurate interpretation of the statements that were made. The Leader of the Opposition can speak as much as he likes about road development in the Yukon and how much he supports it now. That was not the position he took in 1958 when he introduced an amendment to a supply motion decrying the efforts of the government to develop roads in the north and saying that regional preference should be given rather than that such development should be carried on on a national basis.

He can speak as long as he likes in trying to wiggle out of his igloo to igloo statement, but there was no doubt in the minds of the people of this country, particularly the people of the north where I live, that the impression he was trying to leave with them was that these roads were useless, that they were roads from igloo to igloo and were not necessary for the development of national resources as opposed to regional resources. I do not think he can ever escape having that statement affixed to him, although I am sure he is rather sorry now that he made it when resources are being developed as a result of such road construction, which he perhaps thought was not going to be the case when he made these statements.

Mr. Pearson: On the question of accuracy, Mr. Chairman, before these estimates are through we will have an opportunity to put on the record what was said on both sides, and perhaps that will help in that regard.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Also on the question of accuracy, one of the reasons why I asked the minister to put on Hansard this afternoon the figures I requested and which he was good enough to give was to compare on the ground of accuracy the figures which the minister gave this afternoon with those that were given over the air by the Prime Minister a year ago. When the hon. member reads the two sets of figures in Hansard tomorrow, perhaps he will not have so much to say about accuracy with regard to statistics affecting the north.

Mr. Nielsen: I will always have something to say about accuracy. I do not mean to be unkind but I think the Leader of the Opposition is merely drawing this distinction to further the political ends of his own party. The fact remains that if you compare the dollars spent in the north as I set forth the figures in Hansard of May 4, you will find we have advanced from a position where under a Liberal government we were spending for the national development of resources in the north $1.2 million or $1.3 million annually to a figure of $6.9 million annually since the present government took office. I think the distinction lies there.

Mr. Pearson: We will have something to say about expenditures too. If you take the expenditures made under one item in these estimates, the relocation of Aklavik, you will see how much was involved in total expenditures there and under what program that was carried out. But I ask the minister again, or the hon. member if he would like to reply, does he consider this to be an accurate statement, and I quote from the Prime Minister's broadcast:

The program—

That is the program of roads to resources in the north.

—provides for the building of an additional 4,000 miles of road to tap the new resources of the north.

Is that an accurate statement?

Mr. Dinsdale: I think we can resolve the particular point raised by the Leader of the Opposition by pointing out that the roads to resources program is much more extensive than the statistics I have already given. The roads to resources program also deals with road construction in the northern part of the provinces, and I think he is well aware of that point. The additional mileage figure for roads to resources in the resource rich areas, many of which are in the northern parts of the provinces, comes to a total figure of 4,504 miles. That is in addition to the 2,000-plus miles we have already referred to in the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories.

My own province of Manitoba has been a pioneer in northern development roads from the beginning. Most of our roads to resources program is taking place in the northern part of the province in order to open up the rich resource areas here.

Typical of the northern resource development is the opening of the Thompson mine which will involve a community of some 12,000 people within the next four years and is based on the deposit of nickel there. To deal with the area north of the 60th parallel, I have in my hand a copy of the Northern Miner for May 4 which has an article reading on page 24 in part as follows:

> One of Ventures' new undertakings of importance is its participation in the financing of Canada Tungsten Mining Corporation, now being moved toward production in the Yukon. Ventures had slightly more than a 14 per cent interest in the project and is maintaining this by purchasing 217,800 shares for approximately $240,000, and $389,136 principal amount of 6 per cent debentures with an additional 116,159 shares. Ventures is also obligated to provide, if required, its pro rata share of up to $1 million working capital.

Then there is this particular paragraph:

> With reference to Canada Tungsten, Mr. Fraser expressed appreciation for government aid and co-operation. Said he: "If the Canadian government had not undertaken the building of an 80-mile development road and had not agreed to contribute toward the cost of the 50-mile access road to the Canada Tungsten property, it might have been many years before the mine could have been brought into production or before further prospecting of the general area was vigorously pursued.

I read that because it is a concrete up-to-date example of the kind of development that is taking place much sooner than even the most optimistic could have anticipated under this roads to resources program.

I have been a member of the House of Commons for the past 10 years now and I do not recall anyone in the house ever suggesting that the problem of unemployment in the midst of prosperity is going to be resolved by one simple formula. I do not think it is a fair statement to suggest that any hon. member, including the Prime Minister, ever suggested in a simple generalization that roads to resources was the means whereby unemployment was going to be resolved. We all know that this is a North American problem. We all know, too, that it has been growing with cumulative effect ever since the end of world war II because of our failure to adapt our economy to the changing international economy as well as to domestic economics.

I sat in this House of Commons for year after year in the opposition and pointed out that Canada was living in an economic fools' paradise unless we came to grips with the adjustments that had to be made following the economic impact of world war II. Let us stick to the main subject at hand, namely the mileage involved in the roads to resources program. I think we can all recognize that it is having a beneficial economic stimulus on the total economy.

Mr. Pearson: I am grateful to the minister for his clarification and I will try to resist the temptation of following him into a discussion of unemployment. I have here a quotation from the Prime Minister's statement in Regina of February 13, 1958—it is from the Regina Leader-Post—in which he talks about a work program, including roads, of $1,185 million in order to assure jobs. It was a work program to assure jobs in so far as the 4,000 miles are concerned. Now the minister says he had in mind not only roads in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories, but roads south leading to the north and access roads to the resources of the north. With a little bit more time I am sure the minister could find a good many more roads than even 4,000 miles of them because you could make a case for any road south being of value in opening up the north or leading in that direction.

The Prime Minister did not make any such suggestion as that in his broadcast, the text of which I have before me, and in which he talks about a road building program in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. He said the program was 4,000 miles and there it is.

Mr. Dinsdale: Again, Mr. Chairman, I think this is just merely a matter of—

Mr. Pearson: Interpretation.

Mr. Dinsdale: —of different interpretations.

Mr. Pickersgill: Different figures.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think one of the essential features of the northern development program is the emphasis it gives to a new dimension in development in Canada. Up to fairly recently, the development has been an east-west development. I think we must agree that if we are going to move in a north-south dimension in terms of resources development, we must have access roads from our southern highway system. Typical of this is the Mackenzie highway which was completed last year and which now provides a highway into the Great Slave district which is an area of high mineralization. We could go into the Yukon and point out that the Alaska highway is an integral part of the northern development program. I think it all depends on the perspective from which you are viewing the subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister say when the Mackenzie highway was started?

Mr. Dinsdale: The Mackenzie highway was first under construction in 1949. It has been completely rebuilt since 1958, I believe.

Mr. Fisher: I am glad the minister has opened up discussion in the field of the roads to resources program at this point because it gives me an opportunity to touch on an aspect of it which the Leader of the Opposition has perhaps been too kind to take the opportunity of discussing. I refer to what I think has been a great deal of bluff and wind about the roads to resources program. I say this knowing that this phrase is perhaps going to hurt the former minister who is sitting over there. However, I can remember an election campaign in which he was describing the merits of this wonderful road that was going to run from somewhere up in Manitoba to Hudson bay and down through northwestern Ontario through the Patricia district. It even got into his maps in the propaganda. I refer to this magic dotted line. It has been part of that propaganda with regard to these 4,000 miles of roads that are going to be developed. I still have not heard from the minister about this ruddy road program. As far as we are concerned, it goes from Erehwon to nowhere or, if you want to use the imagery of the Leader of the Opposition, from wigwam to wigwam. There is nothing really in between at the present time.

We should like to have some of this roads to resources program in the south. The announcement the minister made today about the road in New Brunswick is exactly the sort of thing about which I have spoken previously. These tenuous, mystic terms of the past—I refer to past election campaigns—it seems to me have been brought down to hard, cold reality by the very figures the minister filed.

Earlier today we had some remarks by some Conservative members from Ontario who talked about the wonderful co-operation one gets when one has a Conservative government at Queen's Park and a Conservative government in Ottawa. They say that things are just lovely and that things are moving in the conservation area. Since the minister today raised this subject of roads to resources, I should like to ask him why he is having so much difficulty in northern Ontario in getting co-operation from premier Frost and this lovely government at Queen's Park. Why is it that in spite of all the road projects that have been listed in the past—I think eight of them were listed last year as projected—very little work has been done on any of them? Where is the breakdown? Is Premier Frost not co-operating with him or is he not co-operating with Premier Frost? I think he knows the roads to which I am referring. I would appreciate greatly having answers to those questions.

Mr. Dinsdale: The reversion to this subject gives me an opportunity to make a slight correction in the statement made on motions this morning wherein I referred to a smelter at Heath Steele in New Brunswick. The actual word should have been a concentrator at Heath Steele. I make that correction in order to avoid any misunderstanding on that point.

To go back to the specific question asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur, may I say this. I think he is aware of the fact that the roads to resources program covers a 10-year period. As to the pace of construction on the projects upon which agreements have been entered into by the federal government, that is a matter that is entirely in the hands of the provincial government. I do not think it would be proper for me to express any opinion on that score. We have signed the agreement with Ontario. The agreement covers certain roads that are specifically outlined. As long as Ontario completes those roads within the 10-year period, there is nothing that the federal government can do about it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister, in trying to justify this 4,000 mile figure which the Prime Minister gave, says it is only 2,000. Apparently a mile of road in the north is two miles in the speeches of the Prime Minister.

This is described as a difference in point of view. I would have thought it was a difference in fact that one would hardly expect in the speeches of the leader of the government to the people of Canada on the program called "The Nation's Business". But this, I may say, is not the first time it has happened.

I should like to ask the minister about another road concerning which there was a good deal of talk. A road was to start from Lac La Ronge and be connected in some mysterious way with the bridge in Prince Albert, which is 175 miles away. It was then to go on to Uranium City. Could the minister say whether that road has been completed yet and whether it has speeded up the development of Uranium City.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I think we are somewhat out of order in getting into a detailed discussion on the roads to resources program. This item was passed some time ago.

The road to Uranium City is one of the roads specified in the agreement with Saskatchewan. I have the engineering data. The road covers a total of 505 miles. I am not quite sure of the date of this report, but it is a fairly recent one. It was made within a matter of a week or so ago.

I should say that about one quarter of that road has been completed. Progress is not too bad when you consider that there is a 10-year period in which the road can be completed. According to the engineering report, one quarter of the road has been completed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have two points which I should like to cover here. One refers to a point raised by the Leader of the Opposition and the other to a point raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In my view both these gentlemen have been trying to make political mileage—

Mr. Pickersgill: It was the Prime Minister who was trying to make political mileage.

Mr. Nielsen: —in trying to pick picayune holes in statements made by the Prime Minister and others concerning this northern development roads' program.

I have had my files sent down from my office and I have in front of me two statements made by the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate talks about making statements to the Canadian people which are not accurate. He should listen to a little bit of that advice himself, and so should his leader. They talk about misadvising and misleading the Canadian people on these things. They talk about giving the Canadian people facts which are not facts.

Here is the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition in Vancouver on September 27, 1958:

> Diefenbaker's promise of a billion dollar public works program in the Arctic is the phoniest promise ever made in Canadian history.

The Prime Minister, in this house, in any campaign or anywhere else in this country, never said there was going to be a billion dollar public works program in the Arctic. He was describing a national public works program, included in which was a program of northern development roads.

If that statement of the Leader of the Opposition is not misrepresenting what the Prime Minister went to the country with, I do not know what is a misrepresenting statement. The Leader of the Opposition made another statement in Edmonton, Alberta, on October 4, 1958:

> Canadians have been hoodwinked by the Progressive Conservative government's promise of northern development.

That also is an extremely misrepresenting statement, because far from hoodwinking Canadians, the figures which I filed in this committee on May 4 show that in the period 1952-57 the total expenditures of the northern administration branch of this department were $29,906,075, compared with the period 1957-62 in which these expenditures amount to $137,600,472.

That is not a phony promise, as was expressed in the statement of the Leader of the Opposition in Edmonton on October 4. That is not hoodwinking the Canadian people. Does the hon. gentleman think it is hoodwinking the Canadian people to say to them, "We will build these development roads to develop the nation's resources"? All he has to do is consider the tungsten mine which is being developed. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources pointed out that it is the only tungsten mine in Canada and will commence production in November, 1962. The largest single tungsten deposit in the world—it will place Canada in the position of being the world's largest single supplier of this very rare and valuable metal in the race for space.

This is what these roads are accomplishing. These are not roads from igloo to igloo. I would point out to the hon. gentleman once again that he has not yet answered my question as to whether he still adheres to his igloo to igloo statement. I do not think he does, but I should like him to admit it.

Mr. Pearson: Let me ask the minister some further questions on a general subject. I am not dealing with roads at this moment. I will have something more to say about that matter later when I obtain further details about the Prime Minister's statement. Perhaps when I have finished the hon. member for the Yukon will give me the sources of the quotations which he has just been good enough to put on the record.

I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with oil and gas development in the north. How many wells were drilled in the Yukon and Northwest Territories in the year 1959-60, and how many in the year 1960-61? How many acres in this northern area are under exploration, and how many acres are there over which permits are held or have been allotted?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I believe the Leader of the Opposition, in asking for some detailed information, restricted his question to the Yukon.

Mr. Pearson: No; the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Mr. Dinsdale: To what period does the hon. gentleman want to go back with respect to acreage permits issued?

Mr. Pearson: Since 1957-58.

Mr. Dinsdale: The following are the figures:

		Permits Issued		Permits Active
		No.	Acreage	No.	Total Acreage
1957–58	N.W.T.	217	11,035,053	403	21,439,160
	Y.T.	203	9,163,588	225	10,006,955
1958–59	N.W.T.	1,040	47,031,445	1,357	64,892,769
	Y.T.	153	7,144,616	323	14,953,990
1959–60	N.W.T.	211	10,089,932	1,541	73,233,420
	Y.T.	120	5,410,831	411	19,029,709
1960–61	N.W.T.	95	4,494,418	1,111	52,649,650
	Y.T.	—	Nil	233	11,156,668
31/3/61	Arctic	868	42,905,547	868	42,905,547
	Water	87	4,429,502	87	4,429,502

I believe the hon. member also asked me how many wells were driven. The totals for the two territories are as follows: in 1959-60, 30; in 1960-61 it is anticipated that the total will be 20.

Mr. Pearson: I am grateful to the minister for that detailed information. I wonder if he could tell me, however, how many acres were under exploration at the end of the financial year 1960 and also how many acres at that time in the Arctic islands were there over which individuals and companies held priority.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have the figures here as of March 31, 1961 concerning the disposition of the oil and gas holdings. I believe this is the information which the hon. member wishes to have. The figures, in tabulated form, are as follows:

DISPOSITION OF OIL AND GAS HOLDINGS—CANADA LAND
(Except those situated in the Provinces)
(as of March 31, 1961)

	Canadian Companies	Canadian Individuals	American Companies	American Individuals	Jointly Held	Totals

Mr. Pearson: Again I thank the minister and I would like to put on the record for comparison with those figures a statement made over the air on "The Nation's Business" by the Prime Minister on March 3, 1960 as follows, and I quote from his broadcast dealing with oil and gas exploration and permits and priorities in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories:

Seventy five companies have taken almost 100 million acres under exploration.

Then:

In the Arctic islands 34 individuals and companies hold priorities over 130 million acres.

Mr. Dinsdale: Just let me point out that I think that reference was to priorities.

Mr. Pearson: That was what I asked about.

Mr. Dinsdale: These are permits. They do not necessarily represent the actual acreage taken out. Those were priority claims. In addition, the figure of 100 million quoted in the broadcast has been greatly exceeded.

Mr. Pearson: I asked the minister about priorities and apparently he gave me the figures relating to permits. Could the minister now give me the figures with respect to priorities in the Arctic islands as of March, 1960.

Mr. Dinsdale: Actually, we do not keep a record of priorities. They no longer exist. These figures represent the actual permits which have been taken out by companies and individuals.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder, then, if the minister would explain what the Prime Minister meant by that very impressive statement concerning something about which the minister says figures are not kept. I quote again:

In the Arctic islands 34 individuals and companies hold priorities over 130 million acres.

What does that mean?

Mr. Dinsdale: I think the hon. member has forgotten that there has been a change in the gas and oil regulations pertaining to the Northwest Territories. That was a reference to the situation exising before the regulations were changed, in 1959, I believe, or early in 1960. What I was referring to were permits taken out since the change in the regulations.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought this might be a proper moment to give more permanent form to a clipping I have here from the Calgary Herald of April 14, 1960. The article is by Mr. Bruce Phillips of the Herald's Ottawa bureau. It is headed "Even Minister Confused by Northern Oil Code", and it reads:

Ottawa—The federal government hopes Canadians will be able to participate heavily in northern oil development—but it isn't making any guarantees.

Its hopes are contained in a loosely-drawn set of regulations governing Canadian participation made public Wednesday, which even resources minister Alvin Hamilton admits are open to various interpretations.

"Any lawyer could tear holes in them," he said.

He explained the government sought to avoid overly-restrictive rules—

And apparently overly-restrictive statistics, too.

—lest it discourage capital for northern development which must come in the first instance from foreigners.

"We don't want to kill the golden goose", he said.

And after more than a year of study, the minister said any lawyer could tear holes in it. The article goes on to say:

The regulations were drawn after more than a year's study, 30-odd full-scale cabinet meetings, and scores of conferences among government officials.

That is a rather impressive result.

The results appeared to confuse even the minister, and during the course of an hour-long press conference he gave two different interpretations of his own.

I could go on and read more of the article, but will confine myself to the doubtful section which reads as follows:

A lease shall not be granted—to a corporation incorporated outside of Canada, or—to a corporation unless the minister is satisfied that the shares of the corporation are listed on a recognized Canadian stock exchange and that Canadians will have an opportunity of assisting in the financing and ownership.

Then the article goes on as follows:

As Mr. Hamilton viewed this section after some discussion, it means a foreign company would have to set up a Canadian subsidiary and issue shares, a portion of which would be sold to the Canadian public.

He agreed, however, that others have placed a different meaning on the section. They believe it would allow a foreign company simply to register in Canada without having to establish a separate subsidiary selling shares of its own. The only shares available would be those of the parent company.

It seems to me that the minister, in giving statistics to the Leader of the Opposition, should also have indicated what interpretation has been placed upon this confusion which seems to exist about the regulations, as well as the statistics.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I have studied the oil and gas regulations with reference to the amendments which were made to the Canada mining regulations and, although I am not a lawyer, as I believe the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is—

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I am not.

Mr. Dinsdale: A lawyer in process.

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Dinsdale: I do not know whether that hon. member has studied the regulations or not, but, as far as I am concerned, there is no problem in the interpretation of these regulations. Reputable lawyers representing various development companies have come to the conclusion that the regulations are quite specific in their application.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should perhaps know this, but maybe the minister will forgive me if I have forgotten; when did these regulations, of which we are talking, come into effect?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, could the hon. member repeat that question?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, when did the regulations, that we have been discussing for the last few minutes, come into effect?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, as I recall, the gas and oil regulations became effective during April of 1960.

Mr. Pearson: I take it the statement of the Prime Minister, made in March, 1960, covering priorities, in which he said they amounted to 130 million acres, dealt with the situation as it existed before these new regulations came into effect, and had no application to the present position at all?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes. Perhaps the word "priority" needs a little explanation. I should suggest it means exactly what it says; prior to the promulgation of the regulations, when companies approached the government with respect to taking out permits, they were informed that no action could be taken until such time as the regulations were promulgated. That merely meant that the first company applying would be first, the second would be second, and the third would be third. Allotments were made on a priority basis, and once the regulations were published, then permits could be taken out.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I feel there is one question the minister should answer. Could he tell us how many acres of priorities there were on the day before the new regulations came into effect, and how many of those acres of priorities were transformed into permits? If I am using the wrong language perhaps the minister could begin by correcting it.

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member complained a day or two ago, when I asked for some specific information in regard to specific statistics. I have forgotten what my question was, but it did not deal with as precise information as he is requiring this afternoon. However, as far as I can recall, the figure was something above 110 million acres. I could have that figure confirmed by the officials if it is desired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would like to have time to confirm that figure, and would go on now with something else. I feel we should have information regarding the total acreage under priority in various years in respect of the Arctic islands and the mainland before the regulations came into effect. I understand some of the priorities were converted into permits, but by no means all of them. Is that a correct statement, and to what extent have they become converted into permits?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I will obtain that information.

Item agreed to.

300. Welfare and industrial divisions—administration, operation and maintenance, $1,977,426.

Mr. Best: Mr. Chairman, without delaying the passage of these items, I should like to comment at this point on vote 300.

It is in regard to this item, as well as items 298 and 299, that one could make some remarks about education and the opportunities for development of our northern citizens, particularly the Eskimos and Indians. I should like to do so briefly. I understand from the various figures which the minister has given us that there are some 35,000 citizens of the north, of which 3,000 or 4,000 are Eskimos.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, for the information of the hon. member, there are 12,000 Eskimos.

Mr. Best: Thank you very much. I have been interested in the artistic, cultural, and social development of our northern citizens, particularly Eskimos to whom the minister's department has given great assistance. I feel the minister and his departmental officials should be complimented in this regard.

We often hear criticism in Canada regarding the influence of other Canadians on Eskimo traditions and life, and I can refer specifically to Eskimo designs, stone and bone carvings, and so forth. I understand that the situation was in a state of flux as times changed, and, that if it were not for the fact that direction was given to these people, these arts might truly have died out with the passage of years. These artistic talents, on the part of Eskimos, have been manifested in recent years through the production of stone carvings, and unusual prints, stimulated by the officers of the minister's department. These have created a great impression in the artistic world in this country and, in fact, in many lands of the globe. The recent printing method which has been developed may prove even more international in artistic merit than the earlier carvings. Creative work with fur, leather and other materials has been encouraged and I feel it should be carried even further. The recognition and independence these achievements give as well as the remuneration to the Eskimo artists, are most important. As a result of this remuneration the Eskimos is becoming more varied in outlook and I think this is evidenced by the fact that the Eskimos have hired at least one individual from the south to advise them in regard to the sale and distribution of their artistic works.

In addition, the introduction of such things as one room houses for the Eskimos which have been developed by the department in recent years are most interesting. I understand that there are to be more than a thousand of these sent to the north in the months and years ahead, to be purchased largely by the Eskimos themselves. I think this is a move in the right direction. The best of the old ways must be maintained, but some changes must be planned, and brought about.

The employment of Eskimos in hospitals and in various services as mechanics, in the north, is a healthy sign. The new vocational school at Yellowknife costing, I believe, some $3 million is an interesting development and should give an opportunity to those northern citizens to educate themselves, to acquire additional skills to develop fully the very great natural talents they have. As the minister has pointed out, the people of the north are Canadians, and have every right to equal facilities and opportunities.

I understand that the education of Eskimo children is not now so much a problem when the facilities are there; that they are able to bridge the gap between civilizations to a very great extent. The problem may perhaps lie more with the older group of 15 to 30 years of age, and older still, to try to give them the skills and opportunities to make a living in a changing world. It is commendable that this year 60 per cent of the Eskimos of school age are attending school, compared with only 16 per cent three years ago.

I would say again that the efforts of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, of the minister and of the industrial division of the department deserve the highest commendation.

As far as the art forms which have created such a stir around the world are concerned, I would only say that the necessity for maintaining the highest standards possible both in materials and designs must always be kept in mind. As well, a close examination might continually be given to methods of sales and distribution of these products. From time to time it has come to my notice, largely by rumour, although from reputable people, indeed, that numbers of these products have gone forth from Canada to Great Britain, to Europe and the United States by various means. This may well be right and proper but I do feel that the first opportunity for acquiring these creations should be given to Canadians themselves.

Item agreed to.

305. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment including costs arising out of the relocation of the town of Aklavik and payment of such compensation as the governor in council prescribes to persons affected by such relocation, $9,261,140.

Mr. Pickersgill: This item represents, of course, a very large expenditure indeed. Perhaps the minister ought to give us a progress report on the moving of Aklavik.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think I can satisfy the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate with a very brief statement. The construction of Inuvik has now been completed. I visited Inuvik during the Easter recess and I must say it is a very impressive community located in a beautiful situation close to the Mackenzie delta. As a matter of fact, during my visit to Inuvik it was my privilege to take part in or initiate what might be regarded as the first film premiere in that far northern part of Canada. It was a film produced by the national film board dealing with the subject of building in the north, and it gave a very interesting review of the specialized construction techniques that had been developed as a result of the experience in building the new Inuvik community.

One of the interesting features of Inuvik is the outdoor utilidors which carry all of the necessary services, water, sewers and so forth to provide the amenities of modern living. I was impressed, too, by the school facilities. One of the finest schools in the whole system of the territory, I feel, is located in Inuvik and this gives me an opportunity to make just a passing reference to the comments of the hon. member for Halton who dealt with what I believe is a most important aspect of northern development, namely the development of our human resources.

The total cost of the Inuvik project, which has now been completed, amounted to some $34 million, I believe, and we hope to have an official opening sometime during the summer. As a matter of fact, we hope to have the official opening of Inuvik as soon as the house rises, and we are very optimistic that this will not be long delayed.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one thing that I think would be very interesting. As I recall it, some initial estimate was made of the cost of building Inuvik and moving people from Aklavik. Can the minister say what that official estimate was and how the actual cost has compared with the estimate? When this vote is passed will the expenditure be all completed?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am afraid I cannot give the initial estimate of the project. I have not it to hand but I can assure the hon. member that the vote before the committee represents the final cost of the construction of Inuvik, and the total figure is, as I mentioned, $34 million.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will be able to get the original estimate and give it to the committee at a later stage.

National museum of Canada—

306. Administration, operation and maintenance, $855,972.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the minister a few questions about the national museum. The catalogue of 1960, Canadian government publications, which I hold in my hand is, I think, a good guide to the amount of work being done by cultural divisions such as this. In the last couple of years there seems to have been a falling off in the number and the kind of monographs being published by the museum. We had a large issue last year of the Huron-Wyandot traditional narratives in translations and native texts, by Marius Barbeau, a most prolific contributor to the museum. But in the main, the publishing record as revealed in the Canadian government publications is rather an anaemic one by this department, considering the number of people it has in various cultural fields. I am wondering whether this is a residue of the disturbance that took place in the museum several years ago, and what the publishing program is? I know it is hard to compare one field with another. I am sure some of the people in the museum are having articles printed in university magazines and in other places. But, in a nutshell, this is not a very impressive list of publications in the national museum when we look at the details in the estimates and see the number of professionally trained people there. I would just like to know whether I am correct in thinking there has been a falling off in the publishing of monographs and, if so, why?

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe we dealt with this subject to a limited extent earlier in the discussion. I do not have a copy of the publication referred to by the hon. member for Port Arthur but I do have some information concerning the studies that are in process and the list strikes me as quite an impressive one. The major studies that are under way in connection with the museum are as follows: The birds of Canada, the mammals of Canada, marine animals of the Canadian coasts, fresh water and marine fishes of Canada, reptiles and amphibians of Canada, molluscs of Canada, dinosaurs and other fossil vertebrates of Alberta and Saskatchewan, fossil vertebrates of Prince Edward Island, plants of the Canadian Arctic and sub-Arctic, plants of the Canadian Rocky mountains, plants of southern Canada, maritime provinces to to Manitoba, and mosses of Canada.

These are just a few of the studies that are under way in the natural history field and they strike me as being quite impressive. If the hon. member wishes details in other areas such as that of human history in which I presume he is most interested, I can say that the following studies are proceeding in that field: The pre-history of the Yukon territory to determine early human migrations to North America, the pre-history of the Arctic to establish the origin and migration of the Eskimo, the pre-history of Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces to establish the migrations and interrelationships of the Indians of eastern Canada, the physical characteristics of the early Eskimo, the material and social culture of the Canadian Eskimo, the cultural history and the languages of the Algonkian tribes of Canada, folklore and folk music of the French speaking communities of eastern Canada, folklore and folk music of English speaking communities and other ethnic groups. These are a few in the human history field.

Mr. Fisher: I do not think the minister did this before in his remarks but could he indicate what plans are being made to develop gradually the human history side of the museum more so as to lead to a greater contribution on the part of French Canadians to the country and its administration?

Mr. Dinsdale: We discussed this subject the other day as well and at that time I pointed out that every attempt is being made to strengthen the bilingual activity in the museum. There has been some difficulty in this respect because of the lack of required professional people with bilingual qualifications. The museum is offering assistance to certain research students for the specific purpose of strengthening this aspect of the museum's operations.

Canadian government travel bureau—

307. To assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada including a grant of $5,000 to the Canadian tourist association, $3,019,963.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say whether there have been any recent changes made in the Canadian travel bureau?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes. I think the major change is the decision to open a bureau in San Francisco. This project is well in hand and we expect to have the service in operation by the beginning of June in ample time to meet the needs of the forthcoming tourist season. There has been a preliminary exploration of the United Kingdom and European market but no decision has been made on that score. It is felt, however, that we will have to strengthen our operation in this area, particularly with a view to making preparations for our centennial celebration in 1967 and also to co-ordinate with the stepped-up United States policy in this area.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely what I had in mind. It seems to me that with the tremendous growth in wealth in the European countries and the change in the currency situation which make it possible for peoples to travel in North America who have not been able to travel for 15 years we should not let all of them go to the United States and by-pass Canada if there is anything we can do effectively to attract them here. I know, of course, that our air lines and the steamship lines such as Canadian Pacific and Cunard and perhaps even some of the other lines such as the Greek line are doing a great deal to encourage people to come to Canada, but it does seem to me this one field in which we can perhaps hope to do a surprising amount in the next three or four years by way of redressing in some degree our unfavourable balance of trade. If the minister can throw any more light on how active these explorations are and precisely what is being done with respect to the European market, I think the committee would be interested.

Mr. Dinsdale: I do not know whether I can add anything further to the remarks I have already made. The bureau is quite aware of the challenge of the changed economic picture in Europe. The director of the bureau, Mr. Alan Field, proceeded to Europe last year on an extensive survey. He has made representations which will become the basis of an expanded operation in this field.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is any use made of the officers of other departments such as external affairs, immigration and so on?

Mr. Dinsdale: Oh, yes. The trade commissioners operate in this area. The high commissioner for the United Kingdom has been a very active and enthusiastic supporter of tourist promotion. The closest possible coordination is maintained by the travel bureau with government branches such as external affairs, trade and commerce and so on operating in this field as well as with private travel agencies.

Mr. Garland: I have a few questions I should like to ask. I wonder whether I might call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Garland: At six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I mentioned the fact that I had a few questions I wished to direct to the minister. In so doing, I do not wish to repeat the arguments I put forward on April 21 when we examined these matters. However, it seems to me that the minister has left unanswered some of the questions I put to him at that time. I should like to point out that I am not pursuing these matters in any political sense but only in the hope that we can perhaps together focus public attention on this particular problem. I am referring specifically to the deficit in our travel account.

I would refer you, Mr. Chairman, to two figures in the Bank of Canada report which shows a steady worsening of this situation, from that in 1950 where we had a surplus in that travel account of some $49 million to that in 1960, ten years later, where we had a deficit of $215 million. As I say, this situation, of course, is worsening—as is proven—and it will be changed only by vigorous and imaginative action that recognizes the seriousness of this problem. Concerning the travel account between ourselves and the United States, there is a deficit of something of the order of $100 million. I hope to have something to say about that matter a little bit later.

Further in this regard may I say that I was disappointed to hear the minister's brief report on the action being taken to recognize the importance of the European tourist spending. From what the minister has said, the situation appears to be this. Last year they had a look at it; this year they are having a look at what they had a look at last year, and next year they may take some action. Thus three years are wasted when we could be taking some real advantage of the resurgence of the economy in Europe. I noted also that the minister referred particularly to some proposed action in the United Kingdom. I hope he can give us some more information about that matter and about what action is proposed to be taken on the continent itself.

The other day I mentioned the matter of the degree of spending by the Canadian government as compared with that of some other countries. I do not wish to repeat the things I said the other day, but tonight I should like to refer briefly to the matter and compare our situation with that of Mexico. In 1960 the Mexican government more than doubled their spending on tourist promotion. They boosted it to 24.4 million pesos from 10 million pesos in '59 and there was a further increase in the 1961 budget. They are spending approximately $2 million. When one takes off the administrative costs from the Mexican allotment and does the same thing with regard to the allotment here in Canada, we find that we are spending a similar amount. When we compare our national budget with the national budget of Mexico, we find that ours is roughly $6.5 billion while theirs is $1 billion. It can therefore be seen that the Mexican government are spending six and one half times the amount of money that we are spending in this country. I would also remind the committee that this money is being mostly directed at the United States market and with some effect. In 1960 United States tourist spending amounted to $200 million plus another $100 million at the border.

Another aspect of the matter is, of course, the encouragement of more Canadians to spend their vacations in Canada. As I pointed out the other day, if one in six Canadian tourists spent his vacation in Canada, this deficit would be wiped out.

I think a strong program is needed to bring this matter to the attention of our people and also a strong program directed at our great potential markets. I very seldom in this chamber recommend the spending of more money by the government, but I believe the need in this field is very obvious. The returns are very rewarding. I do not think we can afford to ignore this situation any longer.

I should like to hear specifically what the government plans are because, from the results being obtained, it is quite clear that the present activity is not good enough, as is proven by these facts. I should like to hear from the minister.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, in replying to the comments of the hon. member the other day I suggested he was far too pessimistic in his observations on trends in the tourist industry in Canada.

I pointed out that for the first time our tourist industry occupies the No. 2 position in terms of earning export dollars. I think that in itself is a move in a positive direction. We have occupied the No. 3 position for a number of years now, and our present position indicates that we are moving in the desired direction.

The hon. member made some point of comparing the Canadian situation with the Mexican situation. I do not think the two are quite comparable. For example, the climate of Mexico is somewhat warmer for a longer period of time and the tourist has access to the Mexican tourist market for almost a 12-month period.

The hon. member also quoted figures pointing out the growing number of United States dollars which are spent in Mexico. I understand that a good proportion of this expenditure is in the border towns, where extensive gambling operations are carried on. We do not have a similar activity in Canada, and from that standpoint I do not think the two countries are comparable. I think the percentage of United States dollars earned from that activity is 65 per cent of the total.

The hon. member also made a point about the increased allotment of funds by the Mexican government in tourist promotion. There is a special explanation for this. I understand there is a $3 per head tax on all tourists entering Mexico and this is applied to the cost of tourist promotion. A large percentage of the sum the hon. member mentioned is derived from that source.

We are on the verge of what we may call an explosion in tourist population—we use this phrase generally about a population explosion—and I think within the next few years we will see this situation developing in the tourist industry in Canada. The trend is already in that direction.

The tourist bureau has up to the present time devoted most of its attention to cultivating the United States tourist, for a very obvious reason. Here is a large population with a high standard of living right at our own doorstep and we feel this is the most lucrative source from which to increase our tourist dollars.

I am very happy to inform the committee that since 1958 the trend that had been under way up to that point, of a deficiency in terms of the relative position of United States dollars spent in Canada and Canadian dollars spent in the United States, is moving in the right direction. The imbalance in 1958 was $104 million; in 1959 it was $97 million, and last year it was down to $79 million. I think this is a very encouraging trend and suggests that the activities of the tourist bureau are paying off at an accelerated rate.

I think I should also point out, Mr. Chairman, that one of the reasons for the larger expenditure of Canadian dollars in the United States market arises from the fact that Canadians have been in the habit of making visits to the United States for the specific purpose of going on a shopping spree. It has been a favourite Canadian pastime to take a week end or a week or so for the specific purpose of shopping in the United States. Canadians have been under the impression that goods in the United States are cheaper and perhaps more varied than they are in Canada.

My colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, has recently been making speeches on this subject encouraging Canadians to shop at home. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has been pointing out that goods available here are equally as good and as cheap as those to be purchased in any part of the United States. I am sure the enthusiasm he is devoting to imparting this message will have its effect on the problem upon which the hon. member for Nipissing dwelt at some length tonight.

We must also take into account the fact that a good many elderly, retired Canadians go south in the winter and are actually in residence in the warmer climates of the southern states for months at a time. This involves a considerable outlay of Canadian dollars.

I appreciate the hon. member's desire to encourage tourism as quickly and as aggressively as possible. I assure him that this is precisely what we are doing. If the hon. member has followed the tourist promotional theme during the past few years he will have noticed that it is one of getting to know Canada better.

We feel we now have more effective representation in the United States; we feel this is having its effect. I understand we have been promoting the federal-provincial tourist conference for the past 15 years. This conference was first brought together for the purpose of getting closer collaboration between the provinces and the federal government in making a concerted assault on the United States' tourist market potential.

The province of Quebec, for example, has special attractions for United States tourists and I am happy to say that this province has one of the most effective tourist promotional campaigns. They have also pioneered in encouraging Canadians to spend their holidays in Canada and there has been a noticeable increase in visits by Canadians from the maritimes, Ontario and other parts of Canada to the province of Quebec.

I do not know whether there is anything else I can add to the points which have already been stressed, except to refer to the potential in the European market. Up to the present time this potential has not been specifically tapped or promoted by our tourist bureau. The trend in balance of payments here has been moving against Canada. Our citizens have been visiting the United Kingdom and Europe in larger numbers than the number of visitors to Canada from those two areas.

It is for this very reason that we feel the time has come for a direct assault on this market, especially in view of the increased prosperity in Europe and the United Kingdom and the tendency on the part of these people to travel more than they have in the past.

I appreciate the support the hon. member for Nipissing has given to this matter. I can assure him that I, as minister, and the officials of the tourist bureau are entirely in sympathy with the representations he has made. All in all I think we can say that tourism is moving in the right direction. The figure for expenditures in Canada last year was $417 million. That is the highest on record and all I can say is: as far as we are concerned, that and better will do.

Mr. Garland: In spite of all the fine things the minister has just said, and I do appreciate them, the fact does remain that the situation—the deficit on our travel account—is worsening each year. I can only hope that through all the people who are working in the tourist industry in this country this problem can be met.

I should like to ask the minister if there is anything new in reference to the proposed United States legislation to restrict the expenditure of American tourists in Canada. I know the hon. gentleman answered this question on a couple of earlier occasions, but I would point out that some time has elapsed since the matter was raised. I think the idea was first suggested by President Kennedy early in February. As to the last word I have, I would refer to a press report which appeared in the London Free Press of April 25. It reads:

> Washington (CP)—President Kennedy's proposed reduction in the U.S. tariff-free tourist goods allowance to $100 from $500 was approved by the house ways and means committee yesterday.

That was on April 25. The report goes on to say:

> But a committee spokesman said that Kennedy's request to maintain the reduction for four years was opposed by the committee, which will offer a new bill to the house of representatives today cutting the authority to two years until July 1, 1963. Kennedy wanted the authority until April 1, 1965.

I wonder if the minister has anything new to report on this subject and, if not, whether he would seize any opportunity which may present itself when President Kennedy, perhaps the outstanding tourist to visit Canada this year, is in our capital.

Mr. Dinsdale: We had two United States tourists with us on Monday and Tuesday, the secretary of agriculture and the secretary for the interior, and I assure the hon. member that I seized the opportunity to discuss this matter with those two gentlemen and particularly with the secretary of the interior. They pointed out that this whole subject has to be approved by congress and that there is every possibility of amendments being made. I am certain I have acquainted them with the Canadian viewpoint on this important subject.

Mr. Garland: In connection with this same matter I should like to point out the seriousness with which some of the businessmen in Canada who are connected with the tourist industry view this proposed change. I would remind the minister that when our Prime Minister visited Washington, on February 20 I think it was, he indicated, according to a Canadian press report emanating from Washington, that he had heard of no objection in Canada.

I wish to refer to only one of the news items I have here, although I have several. I should like to refer to a report which appeared in the Vancouver Sun of February 7 according to which Mr. James Hughes, executive vice president of the greater Vancouver tourist association called on the federal government to seek exemption for Canada if congress passes the scheme. Also concerned, according to the same report, was Mr. E. L. Harrison, president of the Vancouver board of trade. He foresaw a threat to the provincial economy and launched a fact finding study of the situation. Mr. Hughes is reported to have said that such a move by the United States would cut retail spending in British Columbia by a third and mean a loss of $5 million a year. Thus, without pursuing this matter further, I again express the hope that most earnest representations can be made in the appropriate quarter. Perhaps I may read one further excerpt from this report in the Vancouver Sun, a statement attributed to Mr. Hughes:

> If Ottawa takes the position that this will have no effect on the Canadian economy it will be wishful thinking.

So I think there is ample proof of the feeling across the country that such a move would mean a great loss to Canada if it were ever implemented as originally announced back in February.

Before I sit down, may I ask whether the minister can report on the activities of the tourist bureau office in New York since its move from 49th Street to Canada House on Fifth Avenue?

[Mr. Garland.]

Mr. Dinsdale: I have just obtained the information from one of the officials. He informs me that inquiries are up from 60,800 to some 70,900 since the move was made, which indicates that the situation has been considerably improved.

Mr. Garland: I thank the minister for that reply. Perhaps I am being partisan here, but it seems to me that the view advanced by the Liberals on earlier occasions—I am referring particularly to January, 1958, when we supported this move and when so many hon. members who are now sitting opposite rejected it in principle—has been justified by events. I am glad to hear the minister say the rewards have been encouraging, because it seems to me that this move from 49th Street to Fifth Avenue, which is really the show street, was certainly a good move. I am glad to hear the minister confirm the wisdom of making it.

Mr. Herridge: The tourist industry is an important and growing industry in Kootenay West and consequently a good number of my constituents are interested in the activities of the Canadian travel bureau.

Before raising a few questions I want to say that I check the United States papers and I check the Canadian papers and keep in fairly close touch with what the travel bureau is doing. I think it is doing an excellent job and I think its work has improved in recent years. No doubt that is the result of experience and of the recommendations of the committee on mines, forests and waters when the estimates of this bureau are discussed and members present their views and put forward suggestions.

Would the minister inform the house whether arrangements are being made for the establishment of an office in San Francisco? This question was originally brought up in 1959. At that time the minister informed the house and informed me personally that the government did not see fit to establish an office there because of budget requirements and things of that sort. I should like the minister to inform the committee whether any consideration is now being given to establishing an office in San Francisco. This is a very important location. I think one of our former cabinet ministers has been put out to pasture in San Francisco.

Mr. Pickersgill: They do not all go to San Francisco.

Mr. Herridge: This one was rather more fortunate. I do not know whether that would be altogether sufficient, but I should like the minister to inform us whether consideration has been given to that suggestion. I have been asked to raise these matters in the committee by the tourist resorts association in my district.

During the discussion of the estimates a year or so ago there was reference made to the animated advertisement sign in Times Square, which was reputed to be the first, as far as publicity was concerned on the part of the tourist bureau, in perhaps any country. At that time the minister took a very optimistic view and approach to this animated advertisement. I should like the minister to inform the committee if that sign is still operating, and if there has been any check made as to the result.

I have been asked to inquire, regarding my third point, by a number of tourist resort operators in my district, and the number is growing every year. This operation provides an excellent opportunity, for an individual with limited capital who is willing to work over a period of years, to build up a nice litle business. I have been asked to point out that these resort operators are of the opinion that the Kootenays are somewhat overlooked in the advertisements directed to the potential tourist market. In looking at a United States paper recently I found there was quite a spread given to the advertisement of the Okanagan. The Okanagan is a very good fruit growing district; it is a lovely valley, but is not as scenic as the Kootenays. The only mention of the Kootenays, which appeared in that United States paper, was a statement to the effect that an individual would also find much of that which is to be desired in the Kootenays.

Mr. Chairman, the Kootenays are the Switzerland of Canada. There exist there unparalleled fishing, hunting, boating and hundreds of lovely beaches. There are seven excellent hot springs which are developed, or partially developed, as well as a number of small ones which have not been developed to date. The existence of these things provides a mecca for tourists, and I should like to impress this upon the minister and his officials this evening, because I feel they do not realize the opportunities for enjoyment that exist in the Kootenays along the lines I have mentioned. As a result I urge that further consideration be given, in advertising, to this garden of Eden of Canada.

I should also like the minister, when he is replying, to give us some information in regard to the department's policy on advertising in Canadian and United States papers and periodicals. I should like to know whether this is done on a rotation basis advertising one part of Canada one month and another part the next and what type of periodical is employed for this purpose. I should also like to know what psychology is used in the writing of these advertisements and whether they are written by government travel bureau officials or by private advertising firms.

I should be very pleased if the minister will answer these questions, and can assure him, if he does so, that I will be quiet for the rest of the evening while these estimates are being considered.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, before the minister replies, I should like to call his attention, and the attention of his officials, to those glowing remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West, and inform this committee that those remarks apply equally to every constituency in British Columbia. British Columbia is really a tourist's paradise.

I am very pleased to note that a former cabinet minister is now in San Francisco in order to promote tourist travel, but I would suggest that the minister will be able to find very competent civil servants to staff the office, and will not be able to find any more cabinet ministers in British Columbia who are looking for jobs. I suggest one is probably enough in San Francisco.

As I understand the situation, his department is not using the direct mail method of inducing United States tourists to visit resorts in British Columbia, as well as Alberta, Ontario, the maritimes and across Canada, but I would suggest this is perhaps another method which would be useful. I would suspect that, because of the minister's love for the north, and the development of access roads to the north, it will soon become an equally attractive tourist paradise, and I refer to areas such as the Cariboo in British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. The opening of these areas will provide to tourists visiting these areas the attraction of adventure of a type which will not be found in the more settled parts to the south.

In view of the present balance of trade with the United States it would be very detrimental to the tourist industry if anything were done in the way of advertising which would restrict the flow of tourists from the United States. Trade in a tourist sense has been and is in favour of the United States, and I do not think this should be so. The tourist trade balance should be on Canada's credit side, and I hope the minister and his officials will work to that end.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Vancouver South has indicated, we are opening a tourist bureau in San Francisco which will be in operation early in July. The opening of this bureau represents a concerted attempt on the part of the department to cultivate the very lucrative western United States tourist market. I am sure one of the areas which will benefit most as a result of this promotional campaign will be that garden of Eden referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: I am sure it will.

Mr. Dinsdale: Some of our best national parks are located in mountainous areas, and we feel that with the bureau operating in San Francisco there will be a dramatic increase in the number of tourists flowing into Canada from this part of the United States.

As has been mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver South, one of our most attractive tourist regions is, in our opinion, the wilderness of the Canadian north. Because of its geographic location it is anticipated that the greatest portion of the increase in the number of tourists coming to Canada will come from that area served by the San Francisco bureau. In anticipation of this influx of tourists the national historic sites and monuments branch has been active. As I mentioned in the committee the other day, we hope to have the Klondike festival operating for the 1962 tourist season. This festival is a revival of the romance of the trail of '98 and will be located in the Grand Palace auditorium in Dawson City. All these projects are designed to create greater drawing power on the United States tourist potential.

The hon. member for Kootenay West has made some inquiry as to the impact of the animated sign in Times Square in the city of New York, but I am afraid it is impossible to draw any categorical conclusions concerning its effectiveness. All one can say is that it is directed toward millions of people every day, and its effectiveness is shown by the increase of 40 per cent in the number of inquiries made at the New York office since the sign went into operation.

I think perhaps the hon. member himself may be able to draw some conclusions on this score if he attends the showing of the new animated films which will be held in the railway committee room on the evening of May 23 during the recess between the afternoon and the evening sittings. We are extending an invitation to all members of the house to be present. We feel this is even a better effort than last year because the drawings have been done by the eminent Canadian animationist, Mr. McLaren, who has gained an international reputation in the field of animated cartoons.

The hon. member also asked some questions about the nature of our advertising program. Recently the Canadian government travel bureau initiated media studies of its own which gather statistical data on a scientific basis and which make it possible for them to determine which media have had the most significant impact with regard to tourist promotion; but perhaps I can give a little general information on this score which might be helpful to the committee.

Over the past four years a conscientious effort has been made to improve the image of Canada to show it as not only a place for outdoor recreation, sports and sightseeing but a country with the second highest standard of living in the world with good resorts, hotels and restaurants. Particular emphasis is laid on festivals and events like the Stratford festival, the Vancouver festival, the Calgary stampede, the Canadian national exhibition, the Gaelic Mod and others. Increasing use is made of the more influential publications which have a high prestige value.

In 1961, the bureau plans to continue advertising designed to create a broader image of Canada to those citizens who have the means to travel and who live near enough to be logical tourist prospects for Canada.

The new major theme in our advertising in 1961 will be the trans-Canada highway, which has now reached the stage of near-completion, which will permit us to feature it as a major attraction for the 70 million people of the United States who are owners of automobiles.

The newspaper campaign in 1961 will use photographs rather than drawings, as was done in 1960. Larger advertisements of 1,000 lines will appear in major newspapers to attract attention by dominating the page. Plans are also under way to streamline the lists of newspapers to remove non-productive publications.

Just before resuming my seat, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to the special Atlantic provinces campaign. The special Atlantic provinces campaign was inaugurated in 1957 as a special economic measure to help the four Atlantic provinces, on the grounds that these provinces were more economically depressed than other provinces. Since that time the impact of the tourist industry in the maritime provinces has been moving onward and upward. Indeed, it was in that area of Canada that tourism first occupied the No. 2 position.

Mr. Badanai: I was very much interested in hearing the minister speak about the tourist bureau functioning now in New York and the one to be opened in San Francisco. Have we any tourist bureaux in the middle west, in Chicago or Minneapolis? In this area there are 30 million potential tourists. To my mind one of the greatest attractions is northwestern Ontario. People travel from Minneapolis up to Duluth, Minnesota and on to Fort William and Port Arthur. To complete the southern tour of lake Superior there is a highway of approximately 1,200 to 1,300 miles which circles the entire lake from the Sault, down through the lakehead to Minnesota, and Michigan. I wish to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that this is one of the most scenic highways in North America. The scenic splendour is unsurpassed even by the magnitude of the rocky mountain area of British Columbia mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver South and the area mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Nothing can compare with the splendour of the lake Superior area.

Is the minister's department considering doing anything about some promotional work to attract United States tourists to northwestern Ontario and inveigling them to take the southern tour? It is one of the features of northwestern Ontario. As a matter of fact, it can be classed as one of the major tourist attractions in Ontario. I urge the minister to give serious consideration to some promotional work in the middle west of the United States to attract tourists into northwestern Ontario. This may not be a national project to the extent that it benefits largely the province of Ontario, but indirectly, it benefits the entire nation. I can assure the minister that the lakehead cities are well provided with facilities to take care of many tourists when they get them, but we do need additional promotional work. The cities themselves are doing considerable work along that line; they are spending money on their own. People in the business are also doing the same thing, but we do require the assistance of the government, and I urge the minister to give some serious consideration to this part of the province of Ontario which richly deserves assistance.

Mr. Dinsdale: I can assure the hon. member for Fort William that our Chicago office is very active on behalf of this important section of Canada. Indeed, every summer the government of Ontario assists in promoting this particular scenic drive to which he has referred in such ecstatic terms here tonight by sending a representative to the dominion government travel bureau office in Chicago for the specific purpose of creating interest in tourism generally in the province of Ontario. Furthermore, our United States friends assist us in promoting the scenic drive because in their promotional literature directed to this particular market they emphasize a bit of the Canadian section of the scenic drive. All in all, I think a major effort is directed toward this part of Canada.

One of the most encouraging developments in past months is the response to our trans-Canada highway booklet which I believe has been placed in the hands of most hon. members. It was published just over a month ago and depicts the tourist attractions of all sections of the trans-Canada highway. Already there have been 98,000 individual requests for this booklet, and 70,000 copies have been distributed to automobile clubs across the United States. In fact, the first printing has been exhausted and we are now proceeding to a second printing.

Mr. Badanai: I just want to make another suggestion to the minister. I should like to invite him to take the southern tour. If he comes up to the lakehead I shall personally undertake to conduct him around lake Superior. I am sure that once he sees that beautiful scenic highway, the splendour of which tourists will view on a tour of this great highway, he will be sold on it and will feel well repaid for his trip.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister say what is the anticipated annual cost to operate the bureau being opened in San Francisco?

Mr. Dinsdale: We estimate that the total cost including necessary capital expenditure in the form of decorating, et cetera in order to prepare the office will be $60,000 for this year. That includes rental, staff and all other activities.

Mr. Garland: What is the anticipated annual operating cost?

Mr. Dinsdale: It should be reduced to $45,000 once the initial expenditures are out of the way.

Mr. Garland: I am speaking from memory now but I believe that the decision was made in November last year to open this bureau. I recall it being announced at that time. Is there any particular reason why it has not been opened earlier to take advantage of the full tourist year?

Mr. Dinsdale: The announcement was made first at the dominion-provincial tourist conference and at that time we had not even selected a suitable building in San Francisco. That was the first task. It was not done too easily because suitable accommodation is rather scarce in a city like San Francisco. We feel we have an ideal location. Once we obtained suitable quarters, plans have proceeded as quickly as possible to decorate and furnish them and to obtain the necessary staff.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if no one else has anything to say on this item, I allowed a couple of questions to stand. I know there is a loan item but otherwise this is the last item of the minister's spending estimates and I was wondering whether he could give me the information I asked for.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is the item with regard to Inuvik?

Mr. Pickersgill: There were two, the number of acres of priorities and the number transformed into permits.

Mr. Dinsdale: It was rather difficult to obtain figures on the anticipated spending for Inuvik but I think we have them as completely as possible in the short time that has been available. As of June 15, 1956, the first over-all estimate of the total cost for moving the items at Aklavik and, second, the cost of the new and enlarged installations at Inuvik, was as follows: Removal costs were $2,190,000 and new construction was $21,092,500, which gives a total of $23,282,527 or pretty close to the final figure. This, however, did not include the Department of National Defence establishments and the engineering fees. The actual cost including these other factors was $34,045,970. The additional costs amounting to $10.8 million were made up as follows: Department of National Defence base, $900,000; airport terminal, $849,682; laundry and freezers, $515,000; fire hall, $100,000; engineering fees, $92,000, which comes to a total of $2,456,682. The cost increases were due to the larger size of facilities and the increases in costs from the time of the original estimates, amounting in all to $8.3 million. I understand there are complete details on this subject in the proceedings of the committee on mines, forests and waters for 1958 but I hope that this brief survey provides the necessary information.

With reference to the priorities situation in the Arctic, I understand that prior to the coming into effect of the Canada oil and gas regulations on April 13, 1960, there were 142 million acres under priority. Following promulgation of the Canada oil and gas regulations 43½ million acres were taken up under oil and gas exploration permits. The reason for the differential in the figures arises, of course, from the fact that the Canadian participation clauses meant that some of the Americans who had established priorities did not pick them up and convert them into exploratory permits. As the hon. member knows, the policy of the government is to protect Canada's heritage for Canadians, and I think this has been demonstrated in the figures I have revealed to the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the minister very much. Those figures are precisely the ones I had in mind and I am very grateful to him for them. As I gave the minister an indulgence a moment ago perhaps he would grant me an indulgence for one minute. This afternoon the minister did challenge the Leader of the Opposition, when he did not have a document here, about the statement of the Prime Minister with respect to jobs in the north. I have here the Ottawa Journal for February 13, 1958. I will not attempt to read the whole article. Five or six headings are given with respect to projects in the north. The article is headed, "Jobs for Thousands" and reads in part as follows:

The program would mean jobs for "hundreds of thousands of Canadians"...

Mr. Dinsdale: If I may add a coda to that theme, the program to which the Prime Minister was referring was the total program embracing the national development policy which included the north but certainly embraced much more than the north.

Mr. Pickersgill: To say the least, that is ambiguous, but the minister and I can argue about that privately. It does not appear from the article.

Mr. Denis: What part of the amount under this item goes to the province of Quebec to assist in promoting the tourist business? What part of the amount of over $3 million would apply to the province of Quebec or does it go into a consolidated fund of some kind?

Mr. Dinsdale: Each province has its own tourist promotion program. The vote indicated in item 307 is devoted exclusively to the cultivation of the American tourist potential and ancillary activities of that kind. There is no cost sharing basis between the provinces and the federal government. We come together every fall in an annual federal-provincial tourist conference and we try to co-ordinate our respective promotional programs to be most effective. This amount is an advertising sum that is earmarked primarily for the American market.

Mr. Denis: As the minister said before, Quebec is a very interesting province for tourist purposes. I have heard him talk about attracting American tourists to Canada. I suppose the minister has thought of using the French language in advertising or publicity to induce Americans to come not only to Ontario which is a very nice province although I would hate to say it is a better province than Quebec.

Mr. Dinsdale: We discussed this subject the other day on the first item. Certainly what we try to do in our trans-Canada highway booklet, for example—if hon. members have seen it—is this. We try to give a distinctive Quebec flavour to the section of the trans-Canada highway involved in the province of Quebec. But as I pointed out the other day, the literature as such is designed for the United States market which is primarily an English speaking market.

Mr. Garland: I was interested in the minister's remarks. In the course of the evening he has referred to the regional aspect of these programs. I should like to ask him by whom and by what means these decisions are arrived at?

Mr. Dinsdale: When I use that word "regional" I am referring to the natural regional divisions in Canada, namely the maritimes, central Canada, the prairies and the western coast. We have pamphlets which deal with the prairie parks, for example, or the western parks, the maritime attractions, features that are peculiar to central Canada and also special features of the province of Quebec. The trans-Canada highway booklet is divided on a provincial basis. Each province is represented in this publication.

Mr. Denis: In order to take advantage of the trans-Canada highway advertising you must have a trans-Canada highway. As the minister knows, Quebec always refused to participate in the trans-Canada highway project until the last election; therefore if you spend your money only on advertising the trans-Canada highway, to date Quebec has had nothing in the way of advertising.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am just referring to one bulletin. We have many other bulletins. Perhaps just as attractive is our "Invitation to Canada" bulletin which exposes all the charms of la belle province.

Mr. Denis: Unfortunately, it was the wrong bulletin that you have been talking about.

The Chairman: Shall vote 307 carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish to add a word to what the hon. member for Fort William has said about the lake Superior area. I spent some time there when I was a student on a survey party. I think that area tends to be regarded as a blank between the east and the west. I notice that it is serviced from Chicago. I understand the reason for that or at least I think I do. After all, that is where the customers are. I hope those who are servicing it really know what it is like. I cannot imagine that the Creator ever made a finer place for tourists. It does not seem to be made for many other things but for tourists it is ideal. There is practically a lake apiece for anyone who wants to go there.

Mr. Taylor: I should like to add a word or two with regard to this item. First of all, I should like to say how pleased I was to find that this year we would be voting some $3 million in this item for the Canadian government travel bureau. That is a substantial increase over the vote for 1960-61. I should also like to draw the attention of the minister to the Century 21 exposition to be held next year in Seattle, Washington, when that city will play host to the nations of the world. It is my understanding that this will be the first exposition to be held in the United States for 23 years. As I mentioned, people will be coming to Seattle from all parts of the world. Seattle is just 150 miles from us in Vancouver.

I should like to feel that the officials of the minister's department would do everything possible to encourage the people who travel to Seattle to come up to Vancouver in order to see us there and to travel through the province of British Columbia. While that exhibition is in progress there I should like to feel that we could send some major units —for example, the searchlight tattoo—to Seattle, Washington, It could do a fine job in that area. Thousands of people saw the searchlight tattoo when it was put on in British Columbia. I should like to feel that the officials of the Canadian government travel bureau would make an effort to see whether this really fine Canadian product could be sent to Seattle in order to entertain world visitors there. Because of the value of the tourist trade to us in British Columbia, I should also like to feel that the minister might encourage the Prime Minister to be in Seattle, Washington, at the time of the exposition. I understand that an invitation has already been extended to him to be there.

I do not want to pass this particular subject without drawing to the attention of the minister the fact that some 45,000 visitors a day are expected in Seattle, Washington and that there will be more accommodations there than were developed for the Brussels world fair. This will give you some idea of the size of this exposition being staged in Seattle which is a city much like Vancouver, of equal size and in the same location in the Pacific northwest. I therefore hope that the officials of the Canadian government travel bureau will do everything possible to send Canadian shows or Canadian spectacles to the Seattle area because such action will certainly help us in every way possible. It may well be also that special billboards could be put up in Seattle encouraging tourists to come north. It may well be that we could have an animated sign much like the one the travel bureau have erected in Times Square in New York.

May I also say how pleased I am that the government has decided to open up a travel office in the city of San Francisco. I know that at the present time the civil service are trying to secure a person to supervise that office. I should like to urge upon the minister that, if at all possible, the officer who will supervise that office be a person from western Canada. Most of the tourists will be from the Los Angeles and San Francisco bay area. We should like that officer to have an intimate knowledge of everything in the western provinces of Canada. That office will serve us well. It may well be that in the near future, in order to have a slightly more elegant office, the Canadian government could join forces with the provincial government because they are also setting up offices in San Francisco at an early date.

I therefore make two suggestions. One is that we join with the province of British Columbia in having a more elaborate set-up in San Francisco. The second is that we have managing the office in San Francisco an officer who will be from western Canada. I saw the animated sign in Times Square. I thought it was a sound effort. It must be doing a good job. Many people have commented upon it. However, that sign is in the east. I hope that we can have a similar sign in the Los Angeles area or in the San Francisco area because of the tremendous value to us of the tourist trade in that area.

When you open up the travel bureau office in the bay area, I think it would be a reasonable suggestion that you have many Canadian government officials in that area and also that you take with you a contingent of the R.C.M.P. They put on a colourful show in that area but it would indicate to everyone that Canada is doing something in that area. That is one added suggestion. You will be opening your office, I presume, in July. If we did open it at that time surely we could fly in or take in by some manner or means a unit of the R.C.M.P., with horses if necessary, and other things of Canadian content.

Mr. Drysdale: Vancouver Lions.

Mr. Taylor: We could try that also. There is one other matter I should like to draw to the minister's attention. I dealt with it at length yesterday. I refer to the matter of winter tourism. I now have the official report of the engineers who reported to the Canadian Olympic Association. On page 29 of that report they say this—and this is an unbiased report:

> The present exodus of skiers from the Vancouver lower mainland to the U.S. for week end and vacation skiing results in the outflow of perhaps $1 million annually which is not counterbalanced by any return visits to British Columbia since there are no facilities available to attract U.S. tourist dollars.

The report goes on to say:

> Provided the development required to satisfy the local lower mainland demand were supplied, then it is believed that the international exchange of tourist dollars would, at least, be balanced, and it might even be possible to achieve a net inflow of tourist dollars to the lower mainland area for skiing purposes.

The report points out that on a typical week end, Seymour, which is a ski area very close to us in Vancouver, receives 6,000 skiers, whereas Mount Baker, a United States resort about 90 miles south of us in Vancouver, receives some 4,000 skiers. It was that situation to which I referred yesterday and it it is my earnest hope that in the foreseeable future something will be done to rectify this situation.

Mr. Drysdale: What about Garibaldi?

Mr. Taylor: In all fairness I must say that the Canadian government has done a fair job in encouraging tourists to come to our area in the summertime. However, I hope much more encouragement can be given, coupled with the building of a proper resort in our area to encourage people in the northwest area of the United States to come to Canada and British Columbia for the winter tourist season.

I was pleased to find that a year ago, for the first time to my knowledge, the Canadian government travel bureau sent pamphlets to an international winter show. I refer in this case to Squaw Valley. Thousands upon thousands of pamphlets were distributed to people who came from all over the world to follow the winter sports events at Squaw Valley.

This was a very good thing and I hope that in the future Canada will have on the grounds of these international sports areas a suitable warming area, if it is in the winter time, which could be called the Canadian area or Canada House. I know that at Squaw Valley the French had a typical and appropriate building, as did Austria and some other countries. We did not plan well enough in advance to have such a building.

We now know that other countries construct this type of building and I hope that at Innsbruck, where the next international winter show will be held, we will have an appropriate warming area so that people who gather at the show can go there, see Canadian wares and pick up Canadian literature.

I also hope we will have a small Canadian pin of very inexpensive construction available at this show. These pins are found everywhere at these international events. I do not think pins of this type would cost more than a cent or two apiece. I am not talking of the type of pin which must be screwed on or affixed to your lapel with other expensive gadgets; I am talking about a pin of simple design, certainly with the maple leaf and the word "Canada" on it which can be pinned on to one's lapel in some appropriate and simple way. This is so important at these international events and I hope the minister will at an early date get in touch with some companies or Canadian research institute and have them design an appropriate pin which can be handed out.

I have another point which ties in with government promotion of the tourist industry. British Columbia needs direct air services to southern California to tap the rich source of tourist dollars there. We have no direct carriers into the California area at the present time. If we had carriers, they could fly directly from San Francisco into Vancouver and we could do a better job in bringing tourists into British Columbia.

I feel that we could solve some of our other tourist problems by instituting the type of system the United States government has provided at their ports of entry and airports. One can go through United States customs on the Canadian side and when you de-plane, for example in New York, there are no further delays in the host country.

If we had carriers flying directly into Canada we could open Canadian customs and immigration offices, say in Seattle, and when the traveller arrived in Vancouver there would be no further delay. Delays are encountered at the present time.

If the officials of the Canadian government travel bureau could encourage their counterparts in some of the other government departments which are concerned with this problem, perhaps progress could be made. I know that Mr. Field and his officials are doing the very best job they possibly can. I know that as a member of parliament I call his office from time to time and every courtesy is extended to me. I know he is keen to help hon. members and if there is a reasonably good suggestion he will try and go along with it and help.

Limitations are placed upon him, but I hope some of these problems to which I have referred can be solved and that progress can be made because of the great importance of the travel business to us in British Columbia.

I should like to refer for a moment to an article which appeared in Time magazine, March 3 issue. It says this about the United States:

> Playing the genial host, the U.S. senate last week laid out a huge welcome mat for foreign tourists anxious to visit the U.S. Passed by the senate and sent to the house of representatives for almost certain approval was a bill establishing a United States travel service, whose function will be to persuade more foreigners to visit the U.S. Provided with an initial budget of $5 million, the national tourist office will open branch offices abroad, work with private business to simplify tour arrangements and hotel accommodations, entice potential visitors with a "Tour the U.S.A." program.

The article goes on to say this:

> An important task of the tourist service will be to speed up visa and entry procedures. A major irritant for foreign travellers is the U.S.'s visa requirement, a practice that all but disappeared in western Europe.

The article continues:

> U.S. consulates abroad have done much to simplify visa applications...The whole process usually takes less than 20 minutes.

It also deals with the way in which the United States air lines have assisted the United States travel bureau in promoting this "tour United States" program. I hope we can adopt a program of this type here in Canada and even improve on it.

I have often wondered just what the Swiss people would do if we vacated this country, and what the Swiss travel people would do when they realized that they had living next to them 180 million of the world's richest people, all of them infected with the travel bug. They have developed their resources in a very fine way. We have not done so, as I indicated to the minister in my humble way yesterday and, I hope, to some degree today. I hope we can show a much greater increase in our tourist trade both in the wintertime and in the summertime in the very near future.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): In past years I have been somewhat critical of the travel bureau on this vote, but I should like to acknowledge what I consider to be a great improvement in the attempt made by the bureau to present the Canadian image abroad in its true perspective I have suggested in past years that the material they have produced has been designed by and large to show Canada as a vast wilderness. In fact, I was getting concerned that so many Americans crossing the border found it surprising that we had indoor plumbing. We were being pictured abroad as a country which could only contribute cold weather, mounted policemen and ducks. I think the bureau has made considerable progress with regard to the nature of the material it has produced, not only in its publication but in the media of newspapers and television which it uses.

I should like to emphasize in all seriousness the need for a further advance in terms of showing the tourist, not only from the United States but from all the other countries, that we have a great deal more than fast running water for excellent fishing, and excellent hunting. All these things we accept as a fact in Canada. I suggest, however, that in addition to these natural resources tourists expect facilities and accommodation at least as good as those offered by competing areas. We tend to lose sight of this. We have drawn attention to our outdoor attractions without giving a clear indication that this country has many metropolitan areas where visitors can enjoy good shopping and pursue many cultural interests. I think that if we were to move even further along these lines it would further the policy of the minister and of his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I offer, as a suggestion, the proposal that we should advance still further in this direction. However, I believe that this year the bureau has shown something more of Canadian life than just the outdoor atmosphere and outdoor activities. I am sure, also, that all concerned with the activities of the bureau are encouraged by the fact that in the past two or three years they have been receiving a great deal of support from provincial bodies. All of a sudden the people of Canada have become conscious of the importance of what the activities of the bureau means to Canada and of what tourism in general means to Canada, and I think the majority of these people at their conventions are agreed that we must present a more balanced approach calling attention to all the facilities which this country has to offer rather than emphasizing one particular facet.

I close, as I began, by congratulating the bureau on what I consider to be a definite improvement and by hoping that the emphasis will continue to be on a broader Canadian picture and a wider approach to Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Lafreniere: Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to add a few words to the remarks just made by the distinguished members who preceded me.

I know that in all parts of my province, there are marvellous sites, but I should like to single out in particular the enchanting sites to be found in the constituency of Quebec-Montmorency, which I represent here. We find there several places worth-while visiting but I should like to draw your attention in particular to the Montmorency falls. Nothing has been done until now by any authority to improve the approaches to the Montmorency falls in order to facilitate their access to tourists. I know that, at present, there is in my constituency an organization of businessmen and important people who are trying to develop that historical and delightful spot.

That is why I take this opportunity of expressing the wish that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Dinsdale) pay special attention to that part of the country of which we are rightly proud.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary South).]

I do not want to discredit other provinces, but simply to say that we have in our province a special atmosphere, because tourists who come once, feel that they want to return frequently.

Item agreed to.

Northern Canada power commission—

486. Advances to the northern Canada power commission for the purpose of capital expenditures in accordance with subsection (1) of section 15 of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, $242,000.

The Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I asked the minister if he would be prepared for a question. I shall not even ask it if the minister has his answer ready.

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe the hon. member wishes to have information concerning the Atlantic provinces power development program.

Mr. Pickersgill: Specifically, I wanted to know what had been spent since May 10 of last year.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have not the expenditure figure broken down in that way but I can give the hon. member the total expenditures up to March 9, 1961. For New Brunswick, for transmission facilities, the total expenditure has been $6.458 million.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is ever since the scheme started?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes. Coal subventions to the end of March of the present year amounted to $1.784 million. That is a total of $8.242 million. Other figures are: Nova Scotia, transmission facilities up to the end of March 30, 1961, $4.222 million; thermal plant up to the same date, $2.865 million; coal subventions to the end of March, $3.260 million, making a total of $10.347 million or a total expenditure of $18.589 million.

I can give the anticipated expenditures for the current fiscal year if the hon. gentleman wishes to have that information.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it would be interesting to have it.

Mr. Dinsdale: In New Brunswick the expenditure for transmission facilities will be $4.751 million; in Nova Scotia for transmission facilities, $1.253 milion; for the thermal plant, $.363 million, and for coal subvention, $1.700 million making a total of $8.067 million.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister tell us where the thermal plant is?

Mr. Dinsdale: The expenditure regarding the thermal plant represents a continuation of the Trenton thermal plant.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Trenton plant is the only plant covered by this program so far?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no plant in New Brunswick covered by this program?

Mr. Dinsdale: No, there is no plant in New Brunswick covered by it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Under this program there is no expenditure for either of the other two Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Dinsdale: No, but we are negotiating an agreement with the province of Newfoundland at the moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister inform us as to the project in regard to which these negotiations are taking place?

Mr. Dinsdale: In Newfoundland the project is a transmission project in connection with transmission facilities from Whitbourne to St. Marys bay.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is perhaps aware of the offer which was made some time ago in connection with possible developments at bay d'Espoir. I take it that offer is still open if the company concerned is able to go ahead with the project?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, of course all these projects are arranged on the basis of negotiations, and if a project of that kind was involved in an offer, we should be quite happy to discuss it with the province.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not attempting to put the minister on the spot or criticize him in any way, but perhaps the minister does not recall that his predecessor, or the Prime Minister, came into the house and made an offer publicly. It was dependent, of course, on the power development project taking place at bay d'Espoir, and I take it that offer has no terminable date, and when this power development is under way that offer will still be open.

Mr. Dinsdale: Perhaps, in view of the hon. member's interest in this matter, I should quote the record on the subject. On February 19, 1959, the premier of Newfoundland wrote the Prime Minister asking under what terms the federal government would agree to aid in providing transmission facilities for the proposed bay d'Espoir development of Southern Newfoundland Development and Power Company. The initial development of the power site would have cost about $25 million and the ultimate development would have cost about $60 million. The total cost of transmission facilities ultimately would have cost about $10 million to $12 million.

The Prime Minister replied on May 2, 1959 to the premier of Newfoundland. He offered aid under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act substantially in the form of the agreement with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. However, because of a change in circumstances, the premier did not accept this offer, and that is where the matter stands.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the real situation is that the project itself, because it is a very big project, would require customers for the power before it could possibly be undertaken, and has not reached the point where it can be proceeded with. What I wished to make sure was that when this was possible the offer would still apply.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, perhaps as a final word on this matter I should repeat that if the project qualifies under the act it will be considered.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not really what I am asking. I am asking, if the project goes ahead, and since the offer was made under these terms, will the offer still stand?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I understand that under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act the province concerned has to enter into an agreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Dinsdale: Such an agreement would have to be worked out under the terms laid down by the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that.

There was another rather celebrated matter connected with electricity which the minister may or may not be briefed about, but which I recall very well. There was a letter written by the premier of Newfoundland to the Prime Minister on the day the Prime Minister visited Newfoundland in the year 1958. I see that the Solicitor General remembers this occasion very well. The Prime Minister made a reply to that letter at a public meeting, and subsequently replied in writing, to the premier, that the proposal contained therein would receive consideration and that a reply would be sent in due course. Up to the last time I made inquiries, no reply had been received. I wonder whether the minister would look at that correspondence to see whether something could be done.

This is a very simple matter. It amounted to a proposal that, since transmission lines in the sense in which they were built as intercommunicating systems in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, were not really relevant to any existing situation in Newfoundland, but distribution—by that I do not mean detailed distribution within a community—lines interconnecting communities involved a great problem in speeding up the electrification of Newfoundland, that in order to provide something which would meet the local situation there on a scale comparable with what was being done in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, should be undertaken. The minister is obviously anxious to make a name for himself, and there is no doubt that if the federal government could do something in this field there could be some speed up in the program for rural electrification, which has made very great strides in Newfoundland in the last ten years. What I am suggesting to the minister is that he should put this program in his active consideration file, and I use the word "active" in perhaps a little more dynamic sense than it sometimes has been used.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I have no personal knowledge of the episode to which the hon. member refers. However, on looking back at the history of this project, I know that, due to the office of the former cabinet minister from Newfoundland, the name of this act was changed from the maritimes power development act to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act in order that Newfoundland could be brought under its terms. I assure the hon. member that every portion of that act, which has been applied to the other maritime provinces, will have the same application to Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely what I am asking the minister not to do. I am asking the minister to adopt a policy to meet the different conditions. The premier of Newfoundland, at a meeting of the Atlantic provinces economic council about a year ago in Halifax, pointed out that one of the difficulties—he was criticizing the previous government—not the present one—was that many of us here in Ottawa tried to force local conditions to fit some formula that was devised by some very well meaning public servants and put forward by the government in Ottawa, and that a lot of these things, for historical reasons, fit Newfoundland rather less than they fit other provinces, simply because Newfoundland has had only a very short history as a part of Canada.

What I am really suggesting is, that the minister with his fresh eyes, his zeal and his capacity to take shorter views rather than longer visions, would look at the situation as it is in Newfoundland in an attempt to fit his formula to the facts rather than trying to force the facts into the formula, or just saying that it cannot be done.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, in view of the hon. member's comments I shall put this suggestion into my "active" suggestion file.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if I understood him correctly to say that exclusive of this year's estimates, $6.4 million would be spent on the thermal plant at Trenton in my constituency, and if so, is the amount of $3.6 million in this year's estimates the final amount to be spent on this plant?

Mr. Dinsdale: According to the information I have, Mr. Chairman, the cost of the thermal plant, up to the end of March 30, 1961, was $2,865,000, and there is a further expenditure this year of $363,000.

Mr. Nielsen: This gives the minister an opportunity to reply to my query concerning the establishment of a public utilities commission to govern the rates of Northern Canada Power Commission and other power suppliers in the Yukon.

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe this is a subject that has been under discussion by the Yukon territorial council and any decision that is made in respect of this matter would be on the basis of the recommendation from the territorial council.

Mr. Nielsen: I believe they have already suggested the establishment of such a commission. I am wondering whether it would be considered by the minister?

Mr. Dinsdale: I shall have to put this subject in my active consideration file as well.

Mr. Howard: One further question of the minister. Does he have a file labelled "sympathetic consideration"? If so, how full is it?

Item agreed to.

487. Advances in accordance with agreements entered into pursuant to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, $6,367,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before this item carries, Mr. Chairman, I think I would just like to say, since this is the first time the minister has gone through this experience and since I do not, because it is not my custom to take up the time of the committee in doing this kind of thing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just wait until the hon. gentleman hears what I am going to say. Since I did not congratulate the minister on his appointment I must say that I cannot forbear to express very limited but very genuine congratulations on the good temper and the good humour with which he has endured our questioning for a rather long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, after such a gracious speech I can only heartily reciprocate my personal sentiments. Perhaps I will also conclude this very interesting and beneficial discussion by thanking the hon. members for their extended interest in the various activities of this department. It would seem that, to quote a reference made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard just a moment ago, they have seen our sign in the east and have come to worship it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have a suggestion to make to the rules committee through you, sir, and that is that next year we bring in the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources before the address in reply to the speech from the throne and perhaps the two can be combined.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

131. Departmental administration, $473,500.

The Chairman: This item may be found on page 29 of the blue book and the details on page 206.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, during the current session of parliament several members—perhaps I should say all members—representing fishing constituencies have made reference to some of the fishery problems in their areas. In order that the committee may see the whole picture, I shall attempt briefly to review progress during 1960-61, and to indicate some of the outstanding features of these estimates for the fiscal year 1961-62.

The role of the department is essentially one of conservation and utilization of Canadian fishery resources in the broadest sense. This role embraces everything from fundamental research in the biology of marine life to the work of our test kitchen in helping consumers to get the greatest possible benefit and enjoyment from eating fish. The various services of the department all have a part to play in this co-ordinated effort.

The department, of course, does not catch fish or market fish. We are, however, keenly interested in and concerned with the economic health of the industry. This over the long run justifies our efforts. I shall therefore refer briefly to the results achieved by the industry in 1960 and to the prospects for the current year as we see them now.

As is so frequently the case in fisheries, the year 1960 had its successes and its disappointments. It so happens that much of the disappointment was felt in the fisheries of British Columbia. Normally, the year begins with an active herring fishery for the meal and oil markets. In recent years, whaling has commenced early in the spring. Last year, world markets for fish meal were seriously depressed following a sharp expansion in production in Peru and other countries. As a result neither the herring fishery nor the whaling operations were able to proceed in British Columbia except on a much reduced scale. The salmon fishery, while not affected by any market weakness, experienced a low phase in the cycle of production in almost all species. Total landings of salmon at some 74 million pounds were only 70 per cent of the preceding year. The halibut fishery produced an increased yield of 8 per cent but lower unit prices resulted in a 6 per cent decline in value. The depressed prices for meal and oil persisted throughout the year and it was not until late November that the fishermen and processors were able to work out a basis for production. Thus over-all landings of herring fell from 444 million pounds in 1959 to only 186 million pounds in 1960.

At this point perhaps I should say a word about the fish meal situation. In addition to the herring meal production on the Pacific coast, we produce about an equal quantity of meal on the Atlantic coast as a by-product of filleting and canning operations. Canada's total production, however, is less than 5 per cent of world production and prices to our producers are determined by an international market. For that reason, FAO's move to convene a meeting of all interested countries to examine the problems that have emerged recently in the fish meal trade was welcomed by the government. The meeting took place in Rome last month and the department, along with trade and commerce and the fishing industry, was represented. It is considered to have been a successful meeting. Substantial progress was made in analysis of the demand for fish meal and similar products, in knowledge of the alternative uses of the raw material and in the organization of intelligence services for the trade. We are hopeful that these advances may introduce a degree of stability into the market for this commodity.

Returning to the general economic health of the fishery, I am happy to report that, aside from British Columbia, our fisheries enjoyed a generally satisfactory year in 1960. The lobster fishery of the Atlantic provinces was especially productive, with over 50 million pounds landed bringing $18 million to fishermen. Good catches and improved prices to the producers of salted cod brought Newfoundland fishermen as a whole their highest level of income since the union of Newfoundland with Canada. Results in the inland fisheries were also generally satisfactory.

On the market side, one of the most promising features has been the renewed strength now evident in the markets for fresh and frozen fish both in Canada and the United ago has eased. Continued expansion is evident in consumer demand, particularly for cooked and prepared fish products. The wide and attractive display of these items now in evidence in chain stores is a reflection of the rapidly improving presentation of fishery products in sales outlets. As I have indicated, prices received by fishermen for salted fish were exceptionally good during 1960. This was largely the result of low European production in 1959. Production was slightly higher in 1960 and some uncertainty now surrounds the market, in Cuba particularly. An excessive year-end carryover in the 1961 season and a consequent depression of prices are a distinct possibility. A near normal production of canned salmon in 1961 should find a ready demand both at home and in foreign markets.

In the field of research, I referred last year to the good work of the research vessel A. T. Cameron in Atlantic waters. We are now proceeding with the construction of a similar 177-foot research vessel for offshore work in the Pacific. Construction of this vessel should be completed during 1962. In addition, we are extending the facilities of the fisheries research board at Nanaimo in British Columbia, at Ellerslie in Prince Edward Island and at St. Andrews, New Brunswick, and Halifax, Nova Scotia. All these new facilities will provide for more intensive work from these centres. Of particular interest in the field of exploratory fishing is the work being carried on off the Mackenzie delta in the western Arctic. Here substantial bodies of groundfish have been discovered which may have at least local commercial significance. In Hudson bay survey work off the Belcher islands has indicated that there are some Arctic char in waters hitherto considered barren.

Across the country important research projects are going forward as a basis for expansion and development of our fisheries. Some examples are the salmon behaviour studies in the open waters of the Pacific, further studies of lamprey destruction and trout rehabilitation in the great lakes, the important groundfish studies on the Atlantic banks as well as shellfish exploration and study on both coasts. Similarly, technological research is going forward in all areas designed to improve existing fisheries and to develop new ones. In oceanography we are continuing to co-operate with other departments and agencies but with special emphasis on those factors affecting the productivity of the ocean as far as fisheries are concerned. To apply the results of scientific research is the expanding activity of the department's industrial development service. I think this is something that is of particular importance because if new knowledge gained is not applied it has limited usefulness. This service is concerned primarily with the application of new developments to fish catching and to the processing of fishery products. The service has a wide range of projects under way in all provinces. It works very closely with provincial departments of fisheries and industrial development. Working arrangements have been established with practically all provincial governments. During 1960-61 this co-operative approach was extended to Ontario and the three prairie provinces. In British Columbia projects are going forward in co-operation with the fishing industry with particular emphasis on the possibilities of developing an offshore tuna fishery and further development of the shellfish industry.

I cannot take time now to list all these projects which range from the introduction, together with the province of Nova Scotia, of plastic vessel construction to studies and recommendations for improved road transport of refrigerated fishery products. Another most important feature of the work of this service is the training courses which have been arranged for fishermen in Newfoundland, the maritime provinces, Quebec and Ontario. These courses cover a range of subjects with particular emphasis on the use of new types of fishing gear. By that I mean types of gear that may not actually be new but are new to a particular area for a particular use.

The conservation and development service of the department takes responsibility for the operation of fish hatcheries and related work in the field of fish culture. It is responsible for the biological and engineering aspects of stream clearance. It includes our efforts to combat pollution and other industrial developments which interfere with the life and growth of fish in our lakes and streams. This service of the department is also responsible for administration of regulations necessary to limit and control commercial fishery operations. A major current activity has been the expansion and strengthening of our fleet of patrol vessels. Construction has already commenced on a large 179-foot patrol vessel for Newfoundland waters and additional smaller vessels are under construction for both maritime and British Columbia waters. I might add that the name that has been decided on for the new patrol vessel for Newfoundland is Cape Freels. Its construction has been held up a bit as the shipyard where it is being built is now on strike.

One of the highlights of 1960 was the completion and inauguration of the Robertson creek spawning channel on Vancouver island. Construction of this large scale spawning area where gravel conditions and water flow can be kept under constant control is expected to make a real contribution particularly to the production of pink salmon in this area. During the current year we will be proceeding with a somewhat similar major construction program on the Big Qualicum river, also on Vancouver island. Here control of the water flow and improvement of the spawning channel will expand the populations of pink, chum, cohoe and spring salmon. Also in British Columbia we have opened an experimental hatchery on the Nanika river designed to rehabilitate the runs of sockeye in the southern branch of the Skeena river.

In Newfoundland we have continued the transfer of salmon from Great Rattling brook to Little Rattling brook. A new fishway has been installed on the Lomond river and a survey of lakes has been made to determine fish populations and to check on industrial developments which may affect the fishery.

The transfer of disease resistant oysters from Prince Edward Island to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick has been completed with reasonably satisfactory results. The department's program of oyster seed collection in Prince Edward Island continues to show good results and gives promise of a sound commercial venture. Those responsible for lobster protection are gratified that the policy of careful protection coupled with education among fishermen is paying off through increased weight of catches.

The department is co-operating with the new Department of Forestry in joint efforts to minimize the adverse effects of d.d.t. spraying of forests where that is necessary. The use of half-strength spray in 1960 gave very encouraging results.

In the Northwest Territories arrangements have been made to open up many of the small lakes to commercial fishing on a group basis from year to year. Because of the slow growth in these lakes, they cannot withstand continuous fishing but through a rotation system it is believed an economic operation will be possible.

Last year I emphasized the work being done by the inspection service in certifying fish plants under Canadian government specifications board. During the past year, an additional 10 plants met the standard and now 41 plants have been certified. It is now believed that at least 75 per cent of processed fish is being produced in accordance with this program. A number of additional plants are now making the necessary capital expenditures to meet the required specifications.

Market comments reaching the department indicate a very satisfactory level of quality both in the domestic and export markets but our goal is for still higher standards. It is obvious that if standards can be made even higher, the consumer acceptance of and desire for fish will become even greater as people recognize fish as an excellent source of food protein which is relatively economic to buy. Two new large mobile laboratories, one to service the Gaspe region and a second to be based at Winnipeg, have been acquired. As these mobile laboratories move throughout their respective areas "open house" educational programs are carried on. In addition, special courses have been put on in co-operation with provincial governments. In the current year we will be proceeding with construction of a new inspection laboratory at Halifax replacing and extending the present inadequate facilities in that area.

Courses are being arranged for fish cannery foremen in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and similar courses will be held in St. John's, Newfoundland and Halifax, Nova Scotia for the foremen of fish processing plants. We believe these training courses are particularly valuable and we welcome requests for them from the fish processing industry.

The department through its information service and its home economics section carries on a continuing campaign to create a greater awareness of the excellent dishes that can be made from fishery products. Every month consumer releases are forwarded to newspapers and magazines and radio and television stations. Much of the material sent out is being widely used by the Canadian daily and weekly press and other media.

Last year I referred to "The Canadian Fish Cookbook" issued by the department's information service. I am happy to report that this publication sold very well and that an additional 10,000 copies in English and 5,000 copies in French have now become available for further sales.

In the 1961-62 estimates provision is made for the production of posters and a filmstrip on Atlantic salmon. These will be used to carry the message of conservation to both anglers and commercial Atlantic salmon fishermen and the general public.

In Newfoundland the serious problem of inadequate bait supplies was relieved in 1960 by a sharp increase in the availability of squid. At the same time, improved facilities have been made available to the Newfoundland bait service. I have referred on previous occasions to the bait holding units which have been introduced to supplement the original supply depots. We now have 20 of these additional units and further additional units are being provided. The estimates for this year make provision for eight additional units to be added in this fiscal year. Provision is also sought to cover plans and designs of a large refrigerated vessel to replace the M.V. Arctica which is now 42 years old.

The program of constructing community stages in Newfoundland is virtually completed. The twentieth one will be constructed in Labrador during this year. I might add that discussions are under way with the government of Newfoundland with the end in view of continuing this program—of course, at a slower speed but nevertheless continuing it—into the future.

Canada, as hon. members know, is signatory to seven international fisheries conventions. Three of them are in partnership with the United States. I refer to the international Pacific halibut fisheries convention, the international Pacific salmon fisheries convention and the great lakes fisheries convention. Several countries join with us in each of the others as well as the United States.

These international fisheries agreements are of significant importance to Canada, of course. They include continuing obligations, in Canada's fisheries interest, which have been assumed by the government. In all of these conventions provision has been made for the establishment of commissions composed of representatives from each of the signatory countries. The implementation of the conventions, in so far as Canada is concerned, comes under the authority and is the responsibility of the Minister of Fisheries. The government is directly represented on all the commissions by senior officials of the Department of Fisheries. All Canadian commissioners are appointed by order in council.

It was decided by the government and other governments that are parties to the conventions, particularly the more recent conventions, that the scientific investigations recommended by the commissions under coordinated programs and accepted by the governments were to be undertaken by the national agencies of the countries involved. This provision permits each country to retain its identity in the field of the investigations which it undertakes. There is no question that the scientific investigations conducted by the Department of Fisheries research agency, the fisheries research board, represent advances in scientific knowledge which would not have been gained otherwise.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

The Canadian fishing industry is heavily dependent on the sea fisheries from which comes the bulk of the Canadian production. Because of the international character of some of the most important fisheries adjacent to our coasts it is imperative that the Canadian government have scientific knowledge on which to propose any necessary conservation measures. This knowledge must be supplied by its own research facilities.

I think it is well to bear in mind the fact that, for many years, Canada has played a leading role in the development of international co-operation in fisheries matters. It is true, of course, that Canada has a direct major interest in these conventions for its own purposes, but there is also the equally important fact that the government of Canada has taken the firm position that in all fields of international relations it is only by co-operation, understanding and mutual respect that problems can be resolved and solutions found for the benefit of all nations.

I hope that the general comments I have just made, Mr. Chairman, will serve the purpose of indicating the scope of the activities of the department. We will continue, of course, to work with other departments, with provincial governments and with all branches of the industry towards an expanding and prosperous fishing industry in the years ahead.

Mr. Robichaud: Before proceeding with the remarks I intend to make on this first item of the estimates of the Department of Fisheries, I wish to thank the minister for his comprehensive report giving us a review of the progress and the activities of his department for the fiscal year 1960-61 and the forecast of the main activities of his department for the coming fiscal year.

The minister has referred to the different services of his department which, as he said, have a part to play in the progress of the fishing industry. I agree entirely with the minister that these services are not called upon to catch and market the fish, but we expect assistance from them to improve the catching and marketing of fish. We expect them to be effective in their respective fields.

The minister has also referred to the depressed state of the fish meal industry. Unfortunately this has resulted in a certain decline in the revenue of fishermen. We are pleased to hear from the minister that with regard to certain species of fish, especially fresh and frozen fish, the situation is good at present and quite promising for the coming season.

Unfortunately the situation of the salt fish market is not quite as good and in view of the high stocks of salt fish on hand this spring the results could affect prices paid to fishermen. I join with the minister in commending the work of the fisheries research board. In passing I wish to note that in many instances there seems to be a weakness in making known to fishermen the practical application of the findings of the research board. This is very important. It is well and good for the fisheries research board to carry on this research, but unless fishermen are in a position to apply the findings of this research it will not have too much effect.

It is generally known that the recorded world catch of fish has steadily increased in the last ten years as more and more nations have turned to the sea to find food for the world's expanding populations. In fact, the 1949 world catch of approximately 20 million tons had reached, ten years later in 1959, approximately 35 million tons, an increase of over 80 per cent.

During the last decade the catch of fish in Canada has failed to meet this increased trend which has been so prominent in such countries as Japan, China, the U.S.S.R., Norway and others, to mention only some of the countries apart from our neighbour, the United States of America, which are known as the major producers of fish and fishery products.

While the catch in the last ten years has increased by 80 per cent in those countries, here in Canada, with our vast coast line—perhaps one of the longest coast lines of any country in the world—our catch has increased by probably less than 5 per cent.

Statistics show that in 1960 the Canadian production reached in the neighbourhood of two billion pounds. This compares with a production of 1,900 million pounds in 1949 and 1,975 million pounds in 1950. As I said, this is an increase of less than 5 per cent in the last ten years, compared with a world increase of approximately 80 per cent.

While our total catch seems to remain at a constant level, let us find out what is going on, say in the Soviet union. I have here the last report of the fisheries association of British Columbia entitled "Facts on Fish". Part of the report is entitled "Soviet expansion in fisheries" and reads:

> With publication by the United Nations of the fisheries catches of leading nations in 1960, fisheries journals around the world have expressed concern about the amazing expansion of Soviet fisheries.
> Soviet scientists forecast that their 1958 catch of six billion pounds will arise to ten billion pounds by 1965—which can only be achieved by aggressive intrusion into every major fishery of the world.

I could add here, "and in our own Canadian fishery". The report continues:

> In 1956 the Soviet fleet had two trawlers doing "exploratory" fishing on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. In 1960, a fleet of 110 Russian trawlers became one of the major producers in this area.
> More alarming to British Columbia fishermen is the steady expansion of Russian fishing effort in the American side of the north Pacific. Boris Kulikov, a Russian observer at the north Pacific fisheries meeting in Vancouver last fall, quite bluntly stated: "The Soviet industry is interested in the development and exploitation of all marine resources in the north Pacific".
> A large Russian trawler fleet last year took 300 million pounds of bottom fish out of the Bering sea. The same pattern of exploratory fishing vessels appeared south of the Aleutians, doing trial fishing in the great halibut banks so carefully conserved by Canada and the United States under the Pacific halibut treaty, and which has produced a 70 million pound annual catch for the two nations.
> The Japanese abstain from fishing these grounds, under the terms of the international north Pacific fisheries treaty. Since Russia is not a member of this treaty, there is no legal obstacle to Russian trawlers exploiting these grounds without reference to conservation regulations.

No wonder the catch of fish is increasing by 80 per cent in other countries of the world while here in Canada the best we have been able to do is show an increase of 5 per cent in the last ten years. This is a most serious problem and it is one which must not be neglected by the government of our country.

Both our Atlantic and Pacific fisheries are seriously menaced by the operation of Russian fishing vessels and trawlers along both our coasts, and nothing seems to be done to avert the destructive effects of such operations.

If we take into account the landed value of all species of fish, including sea fishery as well as lake fishery, we find that the fish catch returned to fishermen about $96 million in 1950, $100 million in 1951; it was down to $90 million in 1955 and remained at approximately $100 million in 1959. Those total earnings, shared by approximately 60,000 to 75,000 full-time and part-time fishermen, have remained stagnant while during the same period the cost of living has practically doubled and the cost of fishing vessels and gear has increased by over 100 per cent.

If we take a look at the estimates of the Department of Fisheries we find that whereas there was a total expenditure of $7½ million in 1949-50, this reached $12½ million in 1955 and will be in the vicinity of $23 million in the coming fiscal year.

I have here a comparison of expenditures for the year ending March 31, 1957 with the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1962. I find some very revealing figures here. For example, for civil salaries and wages, 1957, $7 million; 1961-62, $11 million. This is $4 million more, or an increase of 60 per cent.

For travelling and removals, $735,000 in 1957, $971,000 in 1961-62, an increase of $236,000 or 30 per cent. Postages, $25,000 in 1957, $32,000 in 1961-62, an increase of $7,000 or 30 per cent. Telephones and telegrams,

Departmental reports cost $79,000 in 1957 and $119,000 in 1961-62 an increase of $40,000 or 50 per cent. Office stationery cost $95,000 in 1957 and $189,000 in 1961-62, an increase of $94,000 or 100 per cent. Materials and supplies cost $1 million in 1957 and $1,912,000 in 1961-62, an increase of $901,000 or 90 per cent.

The question which should be in the minds of every member of this committee is the following one: while the responsibilities of this department are increasing in every way and while additional money is being provided for extra staff in the various branches of the department, are our primary producers, our Canadian fishermen, deriving the benefit which they should receive from the program of the department and the effort made by the department to assist the industry? It is not my intention to cast any reflection on the hard work and devoted activities of the entire personnel of the department and of the fisheries research board, nor is it my intention to hold them responsible for the serious problems which face the fishermen and the industry under present world conditions. The fact remains that something must be done to bring the returns to fishermen in line with those from other occupations so as to provide them and their families with an adequate living.

In my own constituency of Gloucester the fishing industry provides a livelihood for a large proportion of our population which is connected directly or indirectly with this particular primary resource. The most important fishery in the Atlantic provinces—and this applies also to my own constituency—is based on the groundfish resources which are subdivided into offshore or deep-sea fishing and what is commonly known as inshore fishing. This groundfish operation comprises cod, haddock, hake, pollock and other varieties such as flatfish, halibut and so on, among them the codfish which is the most prolific species of groundfish in the region and which provides employment for the largest number of our fishermen, though other flatfish and haddock are also of major importance.

In answer to a question which I placed on the order paper and which was answered on February 23 I received the following information concerning prices paid to fishermen for selected species of fish for the years 1945 to 1960 inclusive, and I wish to place some of these figures on the record now. For example, in the year 1945 the fishermen of New Brunswick were paid an average of 3.52 cents a pound for cod while in Nova Scotia they received 3.51 cents, in Quebec, 4.06 cents and in Prince Edward Island, 3.71 cents. In 1955, ten years later, though the cost of living had risen, the fishermen of New Brunswick were receiving 2.56 cents per pound for cod against 3.36 cents in Nova Scotia, 2.42 cents in Quebec, 2.67 cents in Prince Edward Island and 2.19 cents in Newfoundland.

In 1957, two years later, while the cost of production and the cost of living was still increasing, the fishermen of New Brunswick were paid 2.44 cents per pound for cod against 3.10 cents in Nova Scotia, 2.12 in Quebec, 2.05 in Prince Edward Island and 2.17 in Newfoundland. Again, in 1960, according to the latest figures available from the dominion bureau of statistics, cod fishermen in New Brunswick were getting 2.87 cents against 3.45 cents in Nova Scotia, 2.67 cents in Quebec, 2.75 cents in Prince Edward Island and 2.63 cents in Newfoundland. During that same period the prices paid for haddock and flounders varied accordingly.

At the same time I sought to secure information on the retail prices of fish, and particularly of frozen fillets sold on the United States market for the last five or six years, and I propose to use the prices on the United States market because, as we all know, this market absorbs from 60 per cent to 70 per cent of our entire fish production. These figures were supplied to me through the Canadian embassy in Washington and they were secured from the United States department of government concerned. In the year 1955 cod fillets were retailing in the Boston area for 40 cents a pound. In 1958 the price was 46 cents; in 1959, 47 cents; in 1960, 47.7 cents. For the same period in 1955 the retail price of haddock fillets, according to a sample taken from 33 out of 36 United States cities, was 46.7 cents. In 1958, the price was 55 cents; in 1959, 58.4 cents and in 1960, 55.7 cents.

While our fishermen were being paid approximately 2½ cents a pound for fresh cod in 1955, about half a cent more being paid in Nova Scotia, the retail price of frozen fillets on the United States market was in the vicinity of 40 cents a pound. Five years later, in 1960, while our New Brunswick fishermen were still receiving less than three cents a pound for their fresh cod, approximately a third of a cent more than in 1955, the price of frozen cod fillets on the United States market had risen to more than 47 cents a pound, an increase of seven cents a pound compared with the price paid in 1955.

I admit there has been an increase in the cost of preparing these fish for market, together with an increase in the cost of packaging and transportation, but the fact remains that while our fishermen have received practically no increase in price in many cases or, at the most, an increase of one third of a cent a pound, the increase in the retail price on the market has been in the vicinity of seven cents a pound so far as cod fillets are concerned.

If we look at the price of haddock, the bulk of which is produced in Nova Scotia, while the fishermen were paid approximately 3½ cents a pound in 1955, the average retail price for haddock fillets on the United States market was about 46½ cents a pound. Five years later, in 1960, while the price to fishermen averaged slightly less than 4½ cents a pound the retail price of fillets had gone to 55½ cents a pound, an increase of nine cents on the retail level.

One must take into consideration that it takes approximately three pounds of fresh fish to produce one pound of fillets. Nevertheless, the figures I have quoted show that while our fishermen are receiving almost the same price from year to year for their landed catch the price to the consumer has gradually increased by approximately seven to nine cents a pound.

It is true there may have been some slight increases in the prices paid for some varieties of fish but the most important factor remains —the cost of production for the primary producer, and the cost involved in the landing of his fish to the dealers so that they may process his catch for marketing.

I checked these figures with the dominion bureau of statistics, and I now have the figures covering landings of seven fishermen for three different years between 1950 and 1960. One fisherman in 1958 was receiving 2¾ cents per pound for large cod, three cents per pound for medium sized cod, and 1½ cents per pound for small cod. The same fisherman later on in the season, in the middle of August, was receiving 2¾ cents per pound for large cod, and in July, for a short period, 3¼ cents per pound for large cod.

Another fisherman in 1955 was receiving 3¼ cents for medium sized cod, and 1½ cents per pound for small cod. In July of that same year, the same fisherman was receiving three cents per pound for large cod, 2½ cents per pound for medium cod, and 1½ cents per pound for small cod. Late in August he was receiving three cents per pound for large cod, 2½ cents per pound for medium cod, and 1½ cents per pound for small cod. I could carry on, but I think the figures I have mentioned will show that prices paid to fishermen were, on the average, below three cents per pound.

In the late forties and early fifties fishermen in New Brunswick could obtain a 50-foot dragger at a total cost of $30,000 to $35,000. The same vessel today, with minor improvements or additions, would cost the fishermen between $70,000 and $75,000. It is true that the federal government has been, since 1946, providing special assistance in the construction of vessels of the dragger and long-liner type. When this program was initiated the subsidy was applied on the basis of $165 per gross ton. At the time when a 60-foot dragger could be built for $30,000, the federal subsidy covered approximately 22 per cent to 25 per cent of the total cost. At the present time, when the same fishing boat costs in the vicinity of $70,000, the federal subsidy, which remains on the $165 per gross ton basis, covers approximately 10 per cent to 12 per cent of the total cost.

If the fishermen had been paid accordingly for their product—that is in proportion to the increased cost of living and the increased cost of production—the present subsidy of $165 per ton could be accepted. The fact remains, however, that not only does the initial equipment cost the fishermen 100 per cent more than 10 or 15 years ago, but the cost of operation, including the replacement of gear, has also increased by 100 per cent.

As I stated earlier, our fishermen have to be satisfied, despite the increased cost of production, with approximately the same price for their landed products as they were receiving 10 or 15 years ago. The time has come for the government to take action and to reconsider its program of assistance in the construction of draggers and long-liners on the Atlantic coast. If the department intends to be logical in the application of this subsidy, the basis should be increased in proportion to the increased cost of construction, and to my mind should be in the vicinity of $300 per gross ton.

The impact of this program since 1946, I must admit, has been effective, although in recent years it has not met the objective for which it was introduced.

This morning I received the 1959 report prepared by the economic service of the Department of Fisheries regarding the operations of modern fishing craft on the Atlantic seaboard. I wish to quote one paragraph from page three of this report which reads as follows:

> Impact of the program: (i) on development and industrialization.
> Over the period that the modernization program has been in force, the owners of the 422 assisted fishing enterprises which engaged in fishing during the 1959 season were scattered among 171 communities. These enterprises employed 1,831 men in fishing and the landings were made in 110 ports.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that if the government intends to limit its assistance to the level of recent years, and if this subsidy program has cost the government in the vicinity of $500,000 to $600,000 per year, I feel that the government, in consultation with the provinces interested, could arrive at some sort of agreement under which it could limit its assistance to the same amount so that Newfoundland would be allowed its share, Nova Scotia so much, New Brunswick so much, Prince Edward Island so much and Quebec so much. The subsidy could be increased from $165 to $300 per gross ton without increasing by one penny the cost to the federal treasury while at the same time reaching the objective for which this program was introduced in 1946.

I well recall, during the campaign of 1957-58, when the Prime Minister, addressing large gatherings in certain fishing areas of the Atlantic provinces, offered fishermen a fixed minimum price for their fish. This statement was made in no uncertain terms, particularly in the town of Yarmouth on March 25, 1958. The Prime Minister insisted, on that occasion, on the need for fish price supports similar to those provided for farm products, and further stated that his government would relate prices to fishermens' costs of operations. No action has been taken in this field whatever.

In the present estimates there is an increase of $3,000 for the operation or administration of the Fisheries Prices Support Act. To my mind this $3,000 is probably included to pay the increases in salaries to the staff of the fisheries prices support board and for no other reason.

This board, which has been in operation since 1957, was instituted to support prices of fisheries products, and has the power to purchase any fisheries product at a prescribed price, or to make deficiency payments to producers of fisheries products equal to the difference between the prescribed price and the alleged price at which a certain product was sold during a specified period. It is the duty of that board to maintain a fair relationship between the returns from fisheries products, and those from products of other industries.

The accomplishments of this particular board in the last five or six years have been just about negligible. I realize that in the last 10 or 12 years the Canadian government has introduced a number of assistance programs for the fishing industry, particularly since the post-war period, and I wish to outline some of these programs to show what they cost the Canadian fishermen at the present time.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Robichaud: Certainly.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member tell the committee what his party's policy is in regard to floor prices for fisheries products?

[Mr. Robichaud.]

Mr. Robichaud: The policy of the Liberal party regarding floor prices for fisheries products was made known in 1947 when the act was instituted, and has been used during certain periods since then to protect certain types of fisheries products. The fact is that in 1957-58 the Prime Minister exposed the policy of his party, which was that his government was prepared to submit a new prices support program for fisheries and, as I said before, we are still waiting for the application of this program.

Mr. Denis: Do not wait for nothing.

Mr. Robichaud: I intended to outline some of the measures which are included in the estimates of the Department of Fisheries. Such programs include assistance in the construction of draggers and long-liners on the Atlantic coast; the Newfoundland bait service operations; assistance in the construction of bait freezing facilities; certain minor assistance through the agency of the fisheries prices support board; assistance program to producers of dried salted fish; fishermen's indemnity fund providing fishing vessels insurance; a small bounty for the destruction of harbour and grey seals and for the destruction of certain predators. The list also provides some indirect assistance in educational work in producing and selling among fishermen. This appears to be quite a long list but the total cost of such assistance during any of the last fiscal years amounted to approximately $1,750,000 per year.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is it the wish of the committee that the hon. member carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robichaud: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I wish to thank hon. members for allowing me to carry on. As I said, the total cost of such assistance during any of the last few fiscal years amounted to approximately $1,750,000 per year. This cannot be considered at all exhorbitant for an industry which provides a livelihood for 60,000 to 75,000 primary producers and employment for another 100,000 employees engaged in the preparation of fish for market.

I am not against certain emergency measures which have to be taken care of by the federal treasury such as the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, for example, which will cost the treasury $11,800,000 during the coming fiscal year, and the subsidy on the movement of coal amounting to $13,244,000; compensation for slaughtered animals amounting to $2,220,000, which is $750,000 more than all of the measures now in existence to assist the fishermen.

The time seems to have come for practical and definite action on the part of the Deparment of Fisheries for the benefit and the expansion of the industry. As was brought out at the fisheries council meeting held in Toronto a few weeks ago, prospects of the fishing industry in the immediate future are not too bright. When one realizes that the Canadian consumption of fish which had reached 13.7 pounds per capita in 1950 was down to 13.2 pounds in 1957, one must admit that something drastic should be done to increase the consumption of fish on the domestic market.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member repeat the figures he just gave.

Mr. Robichaud: I said that in 1950 the consumption of fish in Canada amounted to 13.7 pounds per capita. In 1957, seven years later, it was down to 13.2 pounds per capita.

It is most unfortunate that such an important industry, an industry which is so vital to our general economy, and particularly to the economy of the Atlantic provinces, must depend on the export market for the sale of over 80 per cent of its production. It is understandable that an organization like the fisheries council, which has spent $184,000 since 1953 in trying to promote the consumption of fish, particularly in our domestic market, is now reluctant to further support and assist such a promotion program. The efforts of the fisheries council of the past seven years must not be wasted, and the federal government should come to the assistance of the council in no uncertain way to promote and develop the consumption of fish in our domestic market.

The activities of the department in this particular field, in co-operation with the Department of Trade and Commerce, should not be limited to domestic consumption but should be diverted, and in no uncertain way, to the advertising of our Canadian fisheries products abroad.

The department should pay particular attention to the present situation of our salt fish market, which is going through a very critical time. The present position of our salt fish stocks in the Atlantic provinces could seriously affect the returns of our fishermen at the opening of the present fishing season.

Another important factor which should concern the federal government and which is strongly recommended by the fisheries council is the recognition of the same rights of Canadian fishermen as those enjoyed by foreign fishermen operating in eastern Canadian waters. The bill which was introduced in the house on May 2 does take care of the situation to a certain extent, but I suggest also that consideration should be given to protecting not only the fishermen operating the larger trawlers but also the owners of small vessels operating in what is commonly known as inshore water. I have in mind definite regulations which might be applied, not just on paper as they are often applied at the present time, prohibiting the operation of certain trawlers in certain portions of waters which should be limited to inshore fishermen. The minister is vested with all the authority required to apply such a regulation by section 7 of the otter trawler fishing regulations established by order in council on May 6, 1951.

Such regulations, for example, have been made to apply to operations of certain sizes of trawlers or draggers of limited length in certain portions of the Baie de Chaleur. Unfortunately, these regulations are being enforced by the department as they should be and consequently a number of fishermen on certain sections of the Baie de Chaleur operating small fishing boats are being interfered with by larger draggers from New Brunswick and the Quebec side of the bay. I urge the minister to take proper steps to have his officials enforce the existing regulations and, if need be, amend them in order to protect the inshore fishermen of that particular area of the bay.

In introducing his estimates on June 29 of last year, the minister referred to limited advertising on the part of his department which had met with very good consumer response, and he referred again tonight to this advertising program. I realize that in this instance he was making particular reference to the "Canada inspected" or "Canada approved" program which began on April 1, 1959, and which has been expanding ever since. I know we are all pleased to hear that the number of plants that have qualified under this program has increased from 10 to 40 in the last fiscal year. There is no doubt that the consumers of first quality products, as well as the fishing industry, cannot help but benefit from the sale of a product which bears the inscription "Canada inspected", or "Processed under government supervision". The work of the department in this field of action must be activated and its inspection personnel must be given the opportunity to qualify themselves for this very complicated and delicate job.

This does not mean, however, that the department must limit itself to the limited advertising of fishery products. The consumer service of the department must be expanded in such a way as to show results which will aim at increased fish consumption in our domestic market. There is ample room for improvement in this field of advertising and I urge the minister to take measures to improve and expand his department's participation in his general consumer advertising so that the consumption of fish may increase.

Mr. Broome: Will the hon. member permit a question. How does he reconcile his recommendation to increase expenditures with the criticism he made at the beginning of his speech when he criticized increases in expenditures?

Mr. Robichaud: At no time have I criticized increased expenditures by the department. I said that I welcomed increased expenditures provided results were achieved, provided there was an increase in catch and an increase in revenue for our fishermen, and provided we could show an increase in the marketing of our fish.

For the last two years, Mr. Chairman, we have had in my home town of Caraquet a fisheries school. A few weeks ago I attended the closing of a class of 30 fishermen and sons of fishermen who had completed their second year of a course in fisheries. The interest has been of such a wide magnitude that the facilities provided by the Caraquet school board are now inadequate and the need has been established for a new building which could provide the necessary classrooms and other facilities for the first school of its kind in the Atlantic provinces.

In fact, the government of the province of New Brunswick announced a few weeks ago its decision to proceed in co-operation with the federal government with the construction of this new school under the technical and vocational training assistance program. I wish to express at this time my full appreciation for the application of this vocational training program which, according to the Minister of Labour's own words, will include all training of all sorts and types below the university level.

I would express the hope that the new school when in operation will receive better co-operation from the Department of Fisheries than has been extended so far to the present school in its first two years of existence. The department has failed to give the present school the technical assistance which it was in a position to offer. It has reluctantly agreed, and this after all kinds of reservations and hesitation, to allow some members of its staff to take part in the kind of instruction which was required to provide the students with adequate information relating to the handling and preparation of fish.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

I will admit that such educational work does not come within the immediate duties of departmental officials. I will also admit that the department and particularly the fisheries research board have provided some services which have been appreciated by the director of the school, the teaching staff and students alike. But it would have been much more profitable to all concerned if less hesitation and better understanding had existed on the part of the department, thus showing its full willingness to co-operate in the success of a new venture which had as its immediate goal the success and development of our fishing industry.

I would urge the minister to consider the possibility of increasing in next year's estimates the item covering educational work in fisheries techniques and co-operative producing and selling among fishermen. The present school of fisheries at Caraquet and particularly the new school which should open its doors in 1962 or early 1963 will be directly concerned with educational work in fisheries' techniques. I note with interest that in this year's estimates this item shows an additional $25,000 grant to Memorial university in St. John's, Newfoundland. I welcome this grant which will contribute to the further development of fisheries' knowledge or research in an area where fishing is of such vital importance. I hope the minister will keep in mind similar assistance measures for the new fisheries school which will be established in Caraquet next year.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, in the three or four minutes at my disposal before the adjournment hour perhaps I should say first of all that we certainly appreciated the extent to which the minister went when introducing his estimates in outlining the activities of the department and of the various fisheries during the past year. I am sure the committee was also extremely interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester. What the minister and the hon. member for Gloucester have said will be of invaluable assistance to the committee in considering the various items in the estimates of the department. There may be disagreement on the interpretation of various statistics that have been introduced but nevertheless I am sure what they have said will be of great benefit to us.

Generally speaking, I find that the fishermen have a high degree of admiration for the activities of the Department of Fisheries. They may complain on occasion about specific phases of its operations but generally I think they have this feeling and in my view it is well justified. With regard to the minister's reference to increases respecting the fisheries research board, these are most welcome, of course, because we feel that in the activities of the board we may find the solution to many of the problems confronting the various fisheries in Canada.

I should also like to pay my respects publicly to Dr. Kask and his staff of the research board for the outstanding work they have done with the somewhat limited resources at their disposal. Dr. Kask lived for a long period of time on the Queen Charlotte islands in the constituency I represent. He was well thought of and well liked while he was there and I am quite sure that those same feelings still exist and will continue to exist wherever he happens to be. I wonder whether I might call it ten thirty.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the acting house leader what the business will be for tomorrow and Saturday, and perhaps he might give some indication of what it will be next week? I hesitate to stop the hon. gentleman from rising but may I say it has been the practice on Thursday to give some indication of the business for the following week.

Mr. Nowlan: I am very happy to rise following a question from the opposition on this matter. Tomorrow we will proceed with the estimates of the Department of Fisheries and following that we will deal with the estimates of the Department of Transport. On Monday and Tuesday we will be dealing with legislation. Frankly I am not in a position at the moment to detail the legislation with which we will be dealing. I had thought that my colleague, the house leader, would be back tonight and I was leaving that problem to him. I had a wire from him late today saying he would not be back until some time later. I will announce to the house tomorrow night, and notify the hon. gentleman earlier if I am in a position so to do, what the legislation will be on Monday and Tuesday and perhaps on Wednesday of next week.

Mr. Chevrier: In view of the wire my hon. friend has received, could he not send one to his colleague and ask him what the business will be for next week?

Mr. Nowlan: I think my colleague will have to depend on my judgment and that of my colleagues here rather than his own with respect to that matter.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

R.C.A.F. BASE, ST. JEAN, QUE.—ALBERT VILANDRÉ

Question No. 212—Mr. Dupuis:

Does Albert Vilandre, who occupies building 124 at R.C.A.F. base St. Jean, where he deals in soft drinks, ice cream, cigarettes, etc., also carry on the trade of the following items: watches and jewellery of all kinds, washing machines, frigidaires, bicycles, record players, and furniture?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

Mr. Albert Vilandre does not carry on trade in these items on station property.

SURPLUS MANPOWER AREAS—REFUSAL OF DESIGNATION

Question No. 214—Mr. Argue:

1. Have any municipalities requested classification as surplus manpower areas, and been refused designation as such?

2. If so: (a) what are the names of each? (b) on what date did each make application? (c) for what reasons was each refused, and on what date?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. Yes.

2. (a) St. Jerome, Quebec.

(b) Application from St. Jerome was dated March 16, 1961.

(c) In a letter dated May 4, 1961, the municipal authorities were informed that St. Jerome did not qualify as a surplus manpower area or locality because it did not meet the criteria announced by the Minister of Labour on March 2, 1961.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

290. Canadian wildlife service—wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $823,390.

Water resources branch—

291. Administration, operation and maintenance, including Canada's share of the expenses of the international executive council, world power conference, and authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the shares of the province of Manitoba and of the province of Ontario of the cost of regulating the levels of lake of the Woods and lac Seul and the amount of the shares of provincial and outside agencies of the cost of hydrometric surveys, $1,754,455.

292. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment and authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the shares of provincial and outside agencies of the cost of hydrometric surveys, $201,950.

293. Studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $47,310.

294. Fraser river—federal expenditures in connection with investigations to be carried out by the Fraser river board, $322,500.

295. Contributions to the provinces towards the construction of dams and other works to assist in the conservation and control of water resources in accordance with agreements entered into between Canada and the provinces, $1,950,000.

296. Nelson—Saskatchewan basin study—expenditures in connection with investigations to be carried out in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $204,000.

Northern administration branch—

297. Branch administration including authority to make recoverable advances for services performed on behalf of the governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $1,133,935.

Education division—

298. Administration, operation and maintenance including authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the share of the government of the Northwest Territories of expenditures on education and vocational training, $5,309,805.

299. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment including authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the share of the government of the Northwest Territories of expenditures on education and vocational training, $2,112,200.

Welfare and industrial divisions—

300. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,977,426.

301. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $555,050.

Yukon Territory—

302. Operation and maintenance including grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates, $1,518,775.

303. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $5,342,400.

Northwest Territories and other field services—

304. Operation and maintenance including grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates and authority to make recoverable advances for services performed on behalf of the government of the Northwest Territories, $6,332,049.

305. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment including costs arising out of the relocation of the town of Aklavik and payment of such compensation as the governor in council prescribes to persons affected by such relocation, $9,261,140.

National museum of Canada—

306. Administration, operation and maintenance, $855,972.

Canadian government travel bureau—

307. To assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada including a grant of $5,000 to the Canadian tourist association, $3,019,963.

Northern administration branch—

483. To increase to $250,000 the amount that may be charged at any time to the Eskimo loan fund, established by vote 546, Appropriation Act no. 3, 1953; additional amount required, $100,000.

484. To authorize loans in the current and subsequent fiscal years in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council, not exceeding in the aggregate $145,300, to the government of the Yukon Territory to enable that government to purchase land at a cost of $17,800 and to loan to the city of Whitehorse an amount of $127,500 to enable the city to build roads and construct water and sewer systems in a new subdivision, $145,300.

485. To authorize loans in the current and subsequent fiscal years in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council, not exceeding in the aggregate $75,000, to the government of the Yukon Territory for the development of low rental accommodation, and to authorize the commissioner in council to make ordinances for the borrowing and lending of such money by the commissioner of the Yukon Territory or by a housing authority established by an ordinance of the commissioner in council on behalf of the territory and for the repayment thereof out of the Yukon consolidated revenue fund, $75,000.

486. Advances to the northern Canada power commission for the purpose of capital expenditures in accordance with subsection (1) of section 15 of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, $242,000.

487. Advances in accordance with agreements entered into pursuant to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, $6,367,000.

TRADE

TEXTILES—ANNOUNCEMENT OF TRIPARTITE MEETING IN LONDON

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Hon. members are no doubt aware that on May 2 President Kennedy of the United States made an announcement drawing attention to his view that a long term solution on an international basis was required to deal with the problem arising from international trade in textiles.

A tripartite meeting at the official level has been arranged to be held in London next week on this subject. Canadian representatives will participate there in informal discussions with representatives of the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States to discuss these textile problems. It is expected that officials from the crown colony of Hong Kong will also participate in these discussions.

Canada has consistently supported previous attempts to find a comprehensive international solution to these problems; always, of course, without prejudice to Canada's freedom of action, under our trade agreements, to take measures to avoid injury to particular Canadian industries during the period when a broad international settlement is being negotiated.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side certainly welcome this action on an international basis if it will lead to expansion rather than restriction in trade in this important commodity.

INDUSTRY

SHIP OPERATING AND SHIPBUILDING—STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware of the serious problems which during the last 15 years have faced the ship operating and shipbuilding industries in Canada in maintaining activity and employment in both fields.

This matter has been receiving the active consideration of the present administration since it took office, and I wish to announce that a policy has been determined which will be of major benefit both to our Canadian ship operators and to our Canadian shipyards. This policy is intended to make it possible for Canadian ship operators to obtain new vessels from Canadian shipyards at reasonable and competitive prices instead of being forced to have them built abroad because of the lower construction costs that prevail in other countries. It is also intended to make it possible for the Canadian fishing industry to obtain the necessary degree of assistance to encourage it to modernize its fleet by the construction of new vessels in Canadian shipyards on a basis which will still keep the costs to the Canadian fishing industry at a competitive level and halt the trend of construction of vessels for the Canadian fleet in other countries.

Finally, the policy is intended to deal with the situation which has emerged recently in the great lakes trade as a result of the arrangements which have made it possible for foreign vessels of commonwealth registry to participate in the domestic trade within this area.

To achieve the first objectives, namely assistance to our domestic operators and our fishing industry in obtaining new vessels from Canadian yards, parliament will be asked to provide, by way of departmental estimates, funds to assist in the construction of vessels for operation under Canadian registry whether in our domestic trades, in the fishing industry, or for use on the deep seas. A special capital subsidy of 35 per cent of approved costs of construction will be paid toward the construction in Canada of Canadian registry vessels, other than fishing vessels, whether for domestic or deep sea work, effective immediately. Moreover, to provide the maximum degree of incentive over approximately the next three years, this 35 per cent rate of assistance will be increased to 40 per cent for any work done between the present date and March 31, 1963. After that date the rate will be set at 35 per cent.

With regard to the fishing industry, a capital subsidy of 50 per cent of approved costs incurred from the date of this announcement will be paid toward the cost of the construction in Canada of steel fishing trawlers in any case where the new trawler will replace one old vessel which will be withdrawn from service. In addition, the present special assistance of up to 165 per gross ton payable toward the cost of construction in Canada of wooden fishing vessels over 45 feet in length will be increased to $250 per gross ton.

The foregoing assistance will be effective immediately, applicable to vessels now under construction and to vessels on which construction may be started hereafter. In the case of vessels now under construction, however, it is intended that the assistance will apply only to work which may actually be carried out from this day onward and not to construction work performed before this day.

The methods of determining approved costs for this purpose and other particulars relating to administration of this plan will be prescribed by regulations to be approved by the governor in council. These regulations will, of course, deal with the question of limiting the proportion of non-Canadian content to be included in costs for the purpose of the subsidies. These regulations have not yet been approved by the governor in council, but they will be tabled in the house as soon as they are in final approved form.

The government has also given considerable attention to another problem which relates to the great lakes area, and which has arisen since the royal commission on coasting trade made its report. Under the commonwealth merchant shipping agreement, a vessel of commonwealth registry may engage in the domestic coasting trade of Canada, and Canadian registered vessels enjoy reciprocal privileges in other countries. This agreement was made many years ago and long before the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway. Prior to the construction of the seaway, deep sea vessels, other than those of very small size, did not have direct access to the great lakes, and in those waters which are basically inland waters the domestic coastal trade was more or less effectively reserved to Canadian registered vessels.

Within the last couple of years, in a number of cases old United States lake vessels which under the authority of the Canada Shipping Act would have been refused Canadian registry, have been purchased by certain operators who have applied for and obtained non-Canadian commonwealth registry with a view to putting those vessels in Canadian domestic service. In addition, other Canadian operators have moved in the direction of transfer of some of their existing great lakes vessels of Canadian registry to non-Canadian commonwealth registry.

Investigation has indicated that apparently under United Kingdom law applications for United Kingdom or colonial registry in cases of this sort have to be granted unless there is something technically wrong with the vessel itself, and there is no method under existing British law by which this condition of affairs can be dealt with. Because the government believes in effect the domestic Canadian trade within the great lakes area was not in any sense contemplated as part of the reciprocal privileges when the commonwealth merchant shipping agreement originally came into force, and that this trade should be effectively reserved to Canadian registered vessels, accordingly the government has decided to initiate steps for modification of the commonwealth agreement to exclude this area.

For this purpose we will be approaching the other parties to this agreement to notify them of our decision to exclude from the provisions of this agreement the great lakes area, which will be defined as commencing at the outermost pilotage station in the St. Lawrence river in the vicinity of Les Escoumains. The effective date of this change, of course, can only be determined after notification to and consultation with the other commonwealth countries concerned and will, I expect, also involve amendment to the Canada Shipping Act.

This new policy will be of great benefit to Canadian ship operators and Canadian seamen as well as Canadian shipyards, and their employees and suppliers. It will help our domestic operators, whether these be inland, coastal or deep sea operators, and whether their craft be cargo vessels, passenger vessels, tankers or schooners on the St. Lawrence, or other powered craft of reasonable size.

It is virtually impossible to forecast accurately what this program will amount to in terms of expenditure and employment, since the initiative in making it successful must now rest with our ship operators themselves. However, at a very rough estimate I would expect this should cover more than 10,000 man years of additional employment in each year for the next few years in our shipyards, and probably an equal number in supporting and supplying industries, to say nothing of increased opportunities that may result for seafaring personnel.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the Minister of Transport is perhaps one of the most important to be made in the house in a long time. I am sure that not only the house will welcome the statement he has made but also, in an especial manner, those who are connected with the operation of ships and the building of ships and those who sail ships on the inland waters of Canada. The statement has both national and international implications, particularly because of the last part with which the minister has dealt. However, it is not my intention to inject into my statement a partisan note, other than to say that we on this side of the house have asked for the policy of the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no necessity to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: —on many occasions, and I am extremely happy that the minister has finally acceded to our request and the requests of the shipbuilding and ship operating industries.

As I understand the statement which the minister has made, I think it can be divided into three parts. First, it has to do with the assistance that will be given to domestic operators. Second, it has to do with the assistance that will be given to the fishing industry which, incidentally, was dealt with by the hon. member for Gloucester last evening when he asked the government to come to the assistance of that industry. Finally, the statement has to do with the great lakes area. To deal with the last part more particularly, that is the one which will require not only amendments to the Canada Shipping Act but also amendments to the commonwealth merchant shipping agreement because, as the house knows, British and commonwealth ships have the right to cabotage in those areas.

If I understand the minister right, it is the intention now to draw a line at Les Escoumains and to prohibit cabotage by ships of British or commonwealth registry in the area upstream from Les Escoumains to the head of the lakes. That is a matter which, as I say, has international implications as well as domestic ones; and without making any further general comment on it may I say that I think we on this side of the house would like to give it careful and intensive study.

So far as the assistance referred to in the earlier part of the minister's statement is concerned, I think everybody will welcome that, and I do not hesitate to commend the government and the minister for the decision which has been taken in that respect.

My suggestion, for what it is worth, is this. Many months ago the minister made a statement in the house that amendments of this kind would be announced. Because they were not announced, and because of the delay with reference to the announcement of that policy, my hon. friend knows that one prominent operator in Canada assigned his flag to Bermuda registry. I am wondering if the government will not give consideration to making the assistance which has been announced retroactive to the time the minister made his first announcement in the house.

With respect to the general picture, Mr. Speaker, all I need do in conclusion is to repeat that this is important and comprehensive legislation to which we will give consideration. I take it that the minister will lose no time in introducing it in the house.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the shipbuilding industry will undoubtedly be interested in the statement which has just been made by the minister. On behalf of this group I can only express regret that it has taken governments 15 years to recognize the need of granting assistance to the shipbuilding industry of this country. It is certainly to be hoped the situation has not deteriorated to a position where it will take too long to rebuild it as a major Canadian industry.

In view of the outstanding record established by the Canadian shipbuilding industry both in peace and war it is perhaps surprising that this industry should have been allowed to deteriorate to the position it now occupies, in which so many of our shipyards are either closed or operating on short time. However, at long last a statement has been made, and as I say it will no doubt be of interest to the industry. It is impossible to say at this time how far the policy statement will go. Before commenting on that we will have to wait until we have more details, which I hope will be given at the time of the discussion of the departmental estimates or at the time of the introduction of amendments to existing legislation.

The statement of the minister covered three phases, all of importance. One of particular importance today is that relating to the fishing industry. I could not gather from the minister's statement how beneficial an effect this will have on the fishing industry, because I gather that there is a severe limitation on the type of fishing vessel that will be covered under the subsidy. Be that as it may, we express regret at the delay and the deterioration. We will make a careful study of the details when they are available. At that time I hope we will be able to commend at least in part the statement of policy announced by the minister, and we certainly hope it goes as far as he anticipates. It is my personal hope that it goes a lot further.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of the announcement he made to the effect that assistance will be provided to Canadian shipbuilding industries. Can the minister indicate whether the government will exercise its influence in allocating the work to shipyards where a surplus of manpower is available.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Of course the government wants to help both shipyards and shipping operators by providing these subsidies. However, I do not think we should interfere in the process of an operator choosing which shipyard is going to handle his work. I do not think it is the role of the government to do that in these circumstances. If it were a government allocation of contracts, of course we would do that; but not in this case.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of his announcement made a while ago. Over and above the amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, will the assistance which the minister has announced be brought into the house by way of a bill or other legislation to amend the vessel construction assistance act.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): As I mentioned in my statement, this can be brought into force by an item in the estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: The whole program will be implemented in that fashion?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. However, there will be an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act in relation to the commonwealth coastal agreement.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister whether the amendment to the commonwealth shipping agreement which will be required was discussed with the government of the United Kingdom before the government of Canada decided on this policy?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, we are going to follow precisely the procedure that exists at the present time in regard to these agreements. We are going to notify the various commonwealth countries along the lines of article 25 of this agreement, and I think, after a period of three months, we will be in a position to enforce our proposals.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether his reply means that legislation cannot be introduced until the amendment has been made to the commonwealth agreement?

Mr. Balcer: The amendments I have mentioned are very minor amendments in the shipping act, but will not affect the principles of the plan. I think the plan can be put into action and enforced without these amendments having previously been passed.

[Mr. Badanai.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—REPORTED STATEMENT IN GENEVA BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would care to comment on a report that the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in Geneva that he was prepared to help mediate the dispute between the United States and Cuba, and on a report from Washington that any such offer from Canada would not be acceptable.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to make any comment. The hon. gentleman asked a question and then answered it in his own way, and I see no necessity for any further comment on the question.

CUBA—INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY OF CANADIAN MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister any report to make on the safety of priests and nuns on missionary duty in Cuba?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter is a subject of continuing discussion by the Canadian embassy in Havana as well as with the Cuban ambassador in Ottawa. I think it may be concluded that everything possible is being done to ensure the welfare and safety of the persons mentioned, and indeed all Canadians.

VISIT OF PRESIDENT OF ICELAND TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harris Rogers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the proposed visit of the president of Iceland to Canada this summer and his intention to visit the hamlet of Markerville and the national historic monument to the outstanding Icelandic and Canadian poet, Stephen G. Stephansson, would the minister undertake to:

(a) do everything possible to make this a memorable event and;

(b) have a suitable marker placed at the junction of the old and new highways west of Innisfail to direct visitors and tourists to this specific Canadian historical site?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to learn that the president of Iceland will include a visit to the historic site at Markerville during his forthcoming visit to Canada. I can assure the hon. member that we will have officials inspect the site to make certain it is in the best possible condition. As for the highway marker, this is a matter that comes under the provincial highway authorities. I shall be happy to communicate with them on this matter. In view of the international aspects of the visit I shall also contact my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE OF COMMONWEALTH ECONOMIC OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the common market will affect Canada in so many important ways and since there is such great interest in Britain's attitude to the common market, I wonder whether there is anything the minister might tell the house about the forthcoming conference of commonwealth economic officials, and whether there is any change in Canada's attitude to the common market.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government continues to take the very proper attitude that it has taken throughout in reference to this subject.

The meeting of senior officials which will be held shortly is the annual meeting at which all questions of interest to commonwealth countries in relation to economic and trade questions are discussed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—REPORTED INTENTION TO SURRENDER CROWN RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or the minister's parliamentary secretary. Would the parliamentary secretary confirm the report of Chief Telford Adams that the Indian affairs department is preparing an order in council under which the crown would have no further rights on Sarnia Indian reserve lands?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and get the reply.

AGRICULTURE

SUFFIELD, ALTA.—REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF CROWN GRAZING LANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister prepared to make to the house, and through it to the farmer-ranchers of southeastern Alberta, a statement with respect to the release, in this year of subnormal moisture in my area, of part of the grazing land with access to stock water now occupied by the defence research station at Suffield? Also, is the minister prepared to assure those interested in this proposed release of crown grazing lands, with their availability to water, that it will be on the basis of full protection to the smaller farmer-ranchers on a strictly community pasture basis?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in view of the shortage of grass and water in southeastern Alberta this year the defence research board did make a study of the work being carried on at the Suffield station with a view to making available this year some land for grazing purposes.

As a result we have decided to make available approximately 150,000 acres adjacent to the South Saskatchewan river. We have also decided that the most equitable way to do this would be to put the operation into the hands of the community pasture organization under P.F.R.A. Discussions are going on at the present time between officials of that branch and officials of the defence research board to arrange details as to how the operation will be carried on.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR SEATING PLANS FOR STUDENTS IN GALLERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I wonder whether I could address a question to Your Honour. In view of the fact that many student groups are visiting this chamber at the present time and will be doing so during the coming weeks, I wonder whether Your Honour would give consideration to seeing that seating plans are provided and made available for students who visit this chamber.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's suggestion will be noted. It is not acceptable as a question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Translation):

USE OF RAILWAY COMMITTEE ROOM FOR ENTERTAINMENT PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

My wife has been invited to a fashion show to be held in the railway committee room and sponsored by the wives of Conservative members, among them Mrs. W. M. Hamilton and Mrs. Noel Dorion.

Could the minister tell us whether this social event is part of the program set forth by the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), to the effect that bread, games, balls and fashion shows are what the Conservative party needs to promote its popularity?

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): That is a silly question.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is perhaps getting outside the jurisdiction of any minister of the crown or any member of this house.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED DECREASE IN NUMBER OF BRITISH IMMIGRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether the hon. gentleman has any explanation to offer for the fact that British immigration has now fallen to third place in this country?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is a statement by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I do not know whether or not it is correct. I shall find out.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the hon. gentleman seen the statement issued by the department on the subject?

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—RECRUITMENT OF PERSONNEL IN U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on May 10 the hon. member for Vancouver East referred to an advertisement which appeared in journals in London, England, recruiting personnel for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The advertisement asked for applications by town planners to serve in the corporation.

Before seeking applicants outside of Canada the corporation endeavoured, in vain, to obtain them within Canada, first through the national employment service, second through advertising in the professional journals, and finally through the newspapers in the larger cities. They have had a requisition on file with the national employment service since 1959 in an effort to get these town planners. The response, however, was very limited.

We finally obtained permission from the national employment service to recruit in the United Kingdom and Europe a limited number of town planners who are qualified for the difficult services involved.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask a supplementary question. Is it customary or necessary to pay the passage, as was indicated in this advertisement, of these people and their families when they are being brought to Canada for professional jobs with good incomes?

Mr. Walker: I shall be glad to accept that question as notice. I thought the hon. member for Nipissing was going to ask me about the latest housing starts and figures, and applications for loans.

Mr. Garland: I thank the minister for replying in his usual superior tone. However, since he is taking the question as notice I wonder if he will also tell us how many Canadian officials have travelled, or will travel to Europe to interview these applicants.

NATIONAL REVENUE

INQUIRY AS TO SEIZURE OF PENGUIN PUBLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue in his role as keeper of the ramparts of purity what the purpose was of the seizure of several books published by Penguin Books, including the "Physiology of Sex" by Kenneth Johnson and "Lady Chatterley's Lover" by D. H. Lawrence.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I do not think I can accept the compliment—I presume it was one—of being the keeper of the ramparts of purity in this country, but I will make inquiries with respect to the particular matter to which the hon. member referred. As the house knows, from time to time books are held for inspection. Very rarely do they get to my desk. When my officials have found, after due inspection, that it appears necessary to refuse them admission, they finally come to my attention; and I am looking forward, after hearing the hon. member, to receiving a shipment which I can inspect.

PART TIME POSTAL EMPLOYEES—REQUIREMENT TO PASS EXAMINATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I address a question to the Postmaster General. Is it true that thousands of part time employees presently employed in the Post Office Department will have for the first time to pass an examination in order to keep their positions? If the answer is in the affirmative, would the Postmaster General care to comment on this new policy?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Within the last year we have increased the salaries of our part time post office workers from $1.26 to $1.72 an hour, thus bringing them to a scale parallel with that of our regular postal clerks. In the light of this we shall expect these people to meet somewhat less stringent but approximately the same requirements that apply to our regular postal clerks, and the only way to determine this is to examine them on their knowledge. The average postal clerk is required to know between 2,000 and 5,000 distribution points in order to maintain the efficiency of the service. A part time worker will begin with a requirement of knowing some 300 distribution points and after several months he will be expected to know about 1,000. I think that is reasonable.

These people are being paid far better than ever before in our history. Also, in accordance with our expectation, which has been borne out by the civil service, we expect top notch performance from them.

Mr. Denis: Does this new policy apply to the so-called flying squad or call girls who have been hired by the present administration and who perform the same type of work as that performed by part time employees?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member is much more expert on the subject of call girls than I am, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As far as I am concerned, dealing with postal employees, the increased salaries and the regulations will apply to those part timers who are working on the sorting of mail.

Mr. Denis: Do I understand that this new policy is part of the program being adopted in order to replace men by machines, because I am sure that not one half of these thousands of part time employees who have been working in the post office for years would be able to pass an examination, though they do their jobs perfectly well. They would have to learn about 2,000 names.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should reserve his speeches until the estimates; possibly he has already made them on the estimates.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Dealing very briefly with the first sentence, which was a question, may I say that this forms part of the government's program to treat its employees well and to operate the service efficiently.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the end of the crop year is just some two and a half months away and the majority of marketing points in Saskatchewan and Manitoba are on a 3 bushel quota or less, can the minister say what the prospect is of reaching a 7 bushel quota by the end of July?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I think the western farmer is aware that never before have such efforts been made to move grain out of Canada as have been made in the last few months. I might mention in passing that as part of this program we have stepped up the capacity of the west coast ports to handle this traffic. In the month of April we shipped 19 million bushels out of there, and this month we expect to ship 20 million bushels. I am leaving this week end to see whether I cannot get another couple of million bushels.

From the great lakes, shipping is moving out at a pace away above last year. At the present time nearly a thousand cars of grain a day are moving into Fort William and Port Arthur, and between 300 and 400 cars daily are moving in the west coast ports.

In answer to the question asked by the hon. member, I should just like to say that on May 8 the official quotas in western Canada were as follows: 213 points were on a 2 bushel quota, 742 were on a 3 bushel quota, 394 were on a 4 bushel quota and 645 on a 5 bushel quota.

Now let me give the hon. gentleman the figures for three days later, May 11. On May 11 the number of points on a 2 bushel quota had dropped from 213 to 58. The number on a 3 bushel quota had increased from 742 to 841. The number on a 4 bushel quota had gone up from 394 to 419 and the number on a 5 bushel quota had dropped from 645 to 443. The 6 bushel quota points now number 233, having risen from zero. This dramatic shift in the quota figures is proof that the efforts being made to ship this grain out of the country are succeeding. I wish to thank the farmers of western Canada for being so understanding and co-operative on quotas.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not like to interrupt, but it seems to me the minister's answer has been broad and comprehensive.

Mr. Argue: After that long propaganda speech by the Minister of Agriculture, I wonder if I might repeat my question, because the minister failed to answer it. My question was whether he could hold out the prospect, as he has done heretofore, that producers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, in particular, where quotas are discriminatory, will have the opportunity of delivering a 7 bushel quota at the end of July.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): These extreme expressions such as "discriminatory quotas" are being answered every day at the present time in connection with the quotas. I suggest to the hon. member that if he is patient and watches the quotas change in the months of May, June and July he will not be disappointed and have to use such expressions at all.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would indicate when the report of the royal commission appointed to make a study of the automobile industry will be tabled in the house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that report will be tabled in due course.

HIGHWAYS

RIDING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK—PROPOSED CROSS MOUNTAIN ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister received, and is he giving consideration to, a resolution from the village of Rossburn and the rural municipality of Rossburn, and a petition by the village of Shoal Lake regarding a proposal for the construction of a cross mountain route through the Riding Mountain national park?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not received the petition or the resolution referred to by the hon. member. I might say that I have been made aware of this suggestion largely through immediate representation by the hon. member for Marquette. From time to time representations have been made by other communities suggesting various routes, but before any action could be taken an extension of the roads in the park would be required as well as the desire on the part of the provincial government to extend its provincial road system to the park boundaries.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECH BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether his speech which was given in York-Humber of which we received copies, was distributed through his own office and by employees of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would be prepared, in view of the contents of the speech, to obtain the answer to that question and present it to the house later.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the matter.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

131. Departmental administration, $473,500.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, last evening the hon. member for Gloucester presented some information which was contained in a publication of the British Columbia fisheries association in regard to fishing, as to the volume of fish caught by the Soviet union and the size of its fleet in two parts of the world.

I have now a reference to the effect that the Soviet fishing fleet has operated in the north Pacific. Canada, along with Japan and the United States, is a signatory to the international north Pacific salmon fisheries commission, a tripartite arrangement dealing with conservation matters in an attempt to ensure that the salmon intermingling ground, which I hope is in the Japanese area and off the coast of Canada and the United States, is protected so that immature fish are not caught.

I believe about two years ago the Soviet union fishing fleet was seen in that particular area, although its primary concern at that time, as indicated by the Department of Fisheries, was directed toward the catching of groundfish rather than salmon. At that time members of the C.C.F. group expressed concern that the Soviet fishing fleet, not being a signatory to the north Pacific salmon fisheries commission, could very easily become involved in fishing for salmon in this intermingling area, and thus participate in the destruction or depletion of salmon stocks from Canadian grounds. Also raised at that time was the possibility that China may subsequently develop a fishing fleet which could also fish in these particular waters. The desire was expressed that the Soviet union initially, and China later on, should be approached in an attempt to have them become part of the north Pacific salmon fisheries commission as signatories, in an attempt to ensure that our salmon stocks are not depleted by fishing in the intermingling areas.

There are some problems involved here which hinge upon the attitude of the United States and Canada, which follows the United States in so far as the field of diplomacy is concerned. We all know that the United States has been adamant in its refusal to recognize, either diplomatically or in any other way, the people of the republic of China; and Canada, refusing to be independent in this regard, has followed suit. I think we can all see the difficulty that could arise if eventually China did develop a fishing fleet which would fish in the particular waters to which I refer, and we subsequently desired or felt that China should become a part of the north Pacific salmon fisheries commission. We can easily see that the silly attitude of the United States, followed by Canada, could pretty well prevent any sort of discussion which would lead to China and the Soviet union becoming a part of this particular commission.

In view of the fact that Russia does have a large fishing fleet and that just a few years ago, namely in 1956, she had only two or three ships out in the Atlantic and now has somewhere in the neighbourhood of 100, if I recall the figures quoted by the hon. member for Gloucester, it is most important that this matter should be taken into consideration. Two or three years ago there was a fleet of some 40 boats of the Soviet union in the Bering strait fishing area looking for groundfish or halibut. If Russia and China should develop a fishing industry, I think it is most important that they be approached with a view to becoming part of the north Pacific salmon fisheries commission in order to ensure that all classes of fish, both on the Soviet side and on the Canada-United States side, be protected and conserved to the fullest possible extent.

I wish to touch on a question in the discussion of which some people may say I am being rather critical of and unfair to certain parts of the country. I do not discuss this matter in the sense of being unfair but in order to deal with it in another way. It seems to me there is far more concentration of assistance—subsidies, grants and financial aid—to the fishing industry of the maritimes than there is to that of the west coast. For instance, I could refer to the Newfoundland bait service as a case in point. Activities under the Fisheries Prices Support Act have been primarily confined by practice to the Atlantic coast even though there is no geographical limitation to its operation. The bait freezing storage facilities also are confined pretty well to the Atlantic coast. The announcement made today by the Minister of Transport on a subject which has been discussed under fisheries estimates on a number of occasions, having to do with increased grants toward the cost of building certain types of fishing vessels such as draggers, long-liners and so on, relates to an activity that is confined to the Atlantic coast.

In introducing his estimates last night the minister said that courses for foremen in fish canneries would be conducted in the Atlantic provinces. After listening to and reading his remarks I take it that this is an activity in which the Department of Fisheries is going to participate in some way, although the minister's remarks were not clear as to just in what way; but again this is something which is confined to the Atlantic coast. The announcement of the Minister of Transport this morning of assistance to the shipbuilding industry in so far as fishing vessels are concerned indicated—from what I could grasp of it, and I stand to be corrected, because often when a long detailed statement of that nature is made one can get an incorrect impression—that the assistance in so far as fishing vessels are concerned will be confined to steel ships where those steel ships replace older or antiquated fishing vessels. And, as I mentioned earlier, the increase in the subsidy for long-liners and draggers will be confined primarily to the east coast also. I submit that this recent announcement will be of relatively little help or importance to the fishing industry on the west coast.

The point I wish to make, Mr. Chairman, and this is not by way of complaint or suggesting that the assistance should be decreased, is that this does point up the fact that perhaps the fishing industry on the east coast is in a generally worse economic condition than the fishing industry on the west coast. I do not think we can continue to attempt to deal with this problem merely from the point of view of the subsidies, grants and assistance that have been given under the various items of legislation I have mentioned, although certainly at the moment it appears that this is a necessary thing to do in order to ensure that the fishing industry on the east coast is maintained at the highest possible level.

If we say that we are going to approach this economic difficulty by means of subsidies, grants and other assistance, then the problem will never be overcome. I think there should be a far more intense examination of the conditions of the fishing industry on the east coast to see whether some other approach cannot be made to the problem so that the fishing industry in that part of the country will become more economic, more profitable and thus be enabled to function more on its own than on government grants, subsidies and aid.

We discussed this problem to some extent on an earlier occasion. One of the ways in which the problem can be met is by the development of co-operatives. Here I am getting into another field, of course, which involves provincial governments to some extent. I mention it only in passing. The basic point is that I do not think we can continue to look at the fishing industry, or any other industry for that matter, purely from the point of view of government grants, government aid, government subsidies, government hand-outs and the like. We must take a rather different and more concerted approach to this question to see whether the industry itself can become economic to the point where it does not have to rely upon assistance of this type.

Last year the herring industry on the west coast collapsed largely because of the glut of meal and oil in the world market, and I think primarily because of the impact of the increased Peruvian production. At that time it was advocated that perhaps we should take steps to regear the herring industry to one which produced herring for food rather than for fish meal and oil. It was also advocated that we seek as well to sell on the international market cured or fresh frozen or canned herring. China was mentioned as one of the countries to which sales of this commodity might be made.

[Mr. Howard.]

Without mentioning their names or their political stripe I can remember some people saying that this was absolutely foolish because all China was interested in buying with her scarce dollars were guns and ammunition; they were not interested in herring or food of any sort. Yet just a few days ago, as well as on another prior occasion, the Minister of Agriculture was able to announce in the house and elsewhere the sale of Canadian grain to China because of the food shortage and other factors existing in that country. If there is immense overproduction of fish meal and oil on the world market, surely to heaven we should be seeking other ways and means to develop our herring industry, and I simply use that industry as one example because it was in extreme difficulties last year. Surely we should try to develop it to the point where we produce herring for food and attempt to expand the sale of that commodity to China, just as we have done in the case of grain. Regardless of the meeting which was held in Rome, I believe, not too long ago, if we continue to push herring production into meal and oil every other country does the same thing, we are not really solving the food problem or any other problem but are simply aggravating the situation. We are merely taking steps to lessen the difficulty as much as we can without really solving the problem.

I should like to deal with one specific point about which I have had a fair amount of correspondence over the last few years, and with which I am sure the department is familiar. It has to do with what are known as reef nets and their use in the Juan de Fuca strait area. Perhaps the best way to place this matter before the committee is to refer briefly to a letter I received some time ago from Chief Edwin Underwood, chief of the East Saanich Indian band, in which he sets out the problem involved because of the prohibition of the use of reef nets. The letter reads in part as follows:

> The reef net was in use on this coast long before white men came here. Its use is an hereditary right and usage has never been surrendered by the Indians in any treaty or agreement. It should always be emphasized that reef nets are not fish traps.
> Prior to 1916 the white man's fish traps as well as reef nets were in common use in the waters of Juan de Fuca strait and of the gulf of Georgia in both Canadian and United States territory. In 1916 the United States, by legislation, banned fish traps in the San Juan islands group but allowed reef nets to be used as reef nets were recognized as not being traps. Reef nets are in common use today on the United States side of the boundary by white men even more than by Indians.
> At the same time the Canadian government banned fish traps in Canadian waters. Reef nets were apparently classed as traps, which they are not, and were also banned.

Without getting involved in the technical argument whether a reef net causes damage so far as conservation is concerned, or whether it is in fact the same as a fish trap within the meaning of our legislation, this is the point I want to get at and it is related to the rights of our Indian people. Reef nets were used prior to 1916 and were then banned by Canada as being the same as a fish trap. However, they are being used by United States fishermen in substantially the same area. If they are destructive so far as fishing interests are concerned, then in some way or other they should also be banned by the United States in that same area. But if they are not destructive, and it has been represented to me that they are not, the use of reef nets should be allowed in that particular area, especially by the native Indian people.

I understand that this matter has been discussed with the United States authorities, and perhaps the minister will indicate at a later stage what the department's position is with respect to reef nets and what arrangements, if any, they are seeking to work out with the United States with respect to their use in this area.

I should like to make another comment that also has to do with the Indians. For many years Indians on the west coast, in any event, have always had the right to fish for food for their own consumption at any time and at any place. I think the native Indian people have been misled in this regard, because I have seen letters dated as late as last year and signed by the Minister of Fisheries or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration which have stated specifically that this was a right of the Indian people, that it could not be touched and that was that.

When I visited the Queen Charlotte islands last fall I heard some complaints about this matter involving the placing of restrictions on fishing for pink salmon for food. The native people were complaining and were wondering what right the department had to interfere with their hereditary right to fish for food. I went to see the fisheries officer and discovered that the department has the right to do this sort of thing. I found that the native Indians do not have an hereditary right, and that in fact the right to fish is granted to them under sufferance.

The British Columbia fisheries regulations made under the Fisheries Act provide in regulation 32, which I do not intend to read, that an Indian can catch fish for food with the permission of the chief supervisor, and that this permission can be limited as to times, places, waters and types of fish, or such fishing can be prohibited entirely. I only raise this point in order to say that for a long period of time the native people of British Columbia have been misled into thinking they had some inalienable and untouchable right which in fact they do not have, and I think in future some attempt should be made to point out this fact to the Indians.

There is one other activity in the field of fisheries in British Columbia about which there has been some controversy in recent months and years. This matter finally culminated at least partially in a report by Dr. Sol Sinclair of Manitoba. I should like to say generally that it seems to me that the engagement of someone outside the government service, especially outside the Department of Fisheries, to conduct a survey of this nature is somewhat of an affront to the officials of the department who, as I know them, are extremely able men and very much dedicated to their work. Not only with respect to the report of Dr. Sinclair but also other similar types of reports I have often wondered why it is necessary to by-pass and to some extent slight the officials of a department who are dedicated solely to the particular field in which they work. It seems to me that in the Department of Fisheries there are people who are astute and capable enough to have made such a study, and to have arrived at recommendations or suggestions somewhat similar to those of Dr. Sinclair.

While I am on the subject of Dr. Sinclair's report on licence limitation, I should like to ask the minister to give the committee when he replies on the first item, or at a subsequent stage of his estimates, an indication of the attitude of the government with respect to the various far-reaching and important recommendations made by Dr. Sinclair. I know that the report has been in the minister's hands for only a short period of time, but I think he should be able to bring us up to date as to what the government intends to do with respect to Dr. Sinclair's recommendations. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the same course of action with regard to this report is not taken as was taken with regard to the report of the royal commission on food prices, which recommended a federal fish marketing act. The minister said a few days ago that this recommendation would be by-passed for a period of time.

I should also like the minister to give an explanation to the committee concerning the artificial spawning grounds. I believe two or three years ago there were some experiments in this field which were primarily directed toward the pink salmon, on the understanding that these experiments would be extended to other species found on the coast. I wonder if the minister could bring us up to date on the progress being made in connection with artificial spawning grounds for all species.

In addition, some studies were being made into the efficacy of aureomycin used as a fish preservative. I should appreciate some comments from the minister as to what has been discovered in this particular field, whether or not aureomycin has been found to be an efficacious fish preservative, keeping in mind the physiological effects of aureomycin on the consumer. While it may well be that aureomycin or some other antibiotic will be found to be a good preservative of fish, we must take into account the effect it is going to have on the consumer.

In find I am within a minute or two of my 30 minute allotment, Mr. Chairman, so perhaps I could conclude at this point. I am quite sure there will be ample opportunity during the consideration of these estimates for other specific matters to be discussed.

Mr. McQuillan: Since I am following the hon. member for Skeena, I might say that between us we represent the major part of the coastline of British Columbia. We are, consequently, aware of most of the problems connected with the fisheries. While we do not always agree on the solutions to these problems, we are both very much concerned with them and are endeavouring to do our best to find solutions.

The Comox-Alberni constituency is probably one of the major fish producing areas of Canada. The major portion of the salmon and shellfish catches is made along the shores of Comox-Alberni. One of the major problems of the fisheries in Comox-Alberni, which probably does not exist to the same extent in the riding to the north, is the ever increasing pressure of sports fishing on the salmon population and its effect on conservation.

Some people are misled about this sports fishing catch. They seem to think something is being taken away from the commercial fishermen and is, therefore, a loss to the economy. This is not the case by any means. About 40 per cent of the total salt water sports catch is made in the waters off Comox-Alberni. Sports fishing is responsible for a tremendous revenue in connection with the tourist business. So when it comes to the question of the greatest return from the trolled salmon catch in this area, the weighted evidence is in favour of the sport catch. It is safe to say that an average of $20 is expended for gear, boats, boat rentals, etc., for every fish caught by a local sportsman. My seatmate, the hon. member for New Westminster, says I am much too conservative. He says that every time he catches a fish it costs him $250. I do not know what he spends all that money on.

It is safe, however, to say that the figure for expenditures by foreign tourists for transportation, accommodation, gear purchases, boat rentals and so on would be in the neighbourhood of $100 per fish. Sports fishing, therefore, is responsible for a large part of the income derived from tourists on Vancouver island. It is for this reason it is so important that everything possible be done to preserve and enlarge the runs of spring salmon and cohoe, particularly in the sports fishing areas.

In this connection, the department is to be congratulated upon the construction of its Robertson creek controlled spawning ground, which has proven eminently successful, and for embarking upon the construction of the project on the Big Qualicum river. These projects will not only assist materially in maintaining salmon runs, but it is hoped they will substantially increase them. I would ask the minister to have his officials make a careful appraisal of the salmon runs in the Campbell River area with a view to the development of controlled spawning projects in that area, as well as the general improvement of natural spawning grounds. The Campbell River area is famous the world over as a sports fishing area, and has been for over half a century. The revenue from tourists who come to Campbell River is tremendous. Local organizations such as the chamber of commerce and a new one recently formed called Salmon Unlimited, are rightfully concerned over what appears to them to be a depletion in the runs in that area.

Along the east coast of the island we have another river which has presented a problem for a number of years. I refer to the Puntledge river. I have raised this question in the house before. The present condition of this river, from a fish conservation point of view, is the result of a power development by the British Columbia power commission in 1955 and 1956. The waters off the mouth of the Puntledge and Courtenay rivers have always been famous sports fishing areas. This is one of the areas in which the famous tyee or king salmon is found. In 1957 the spring salmon run was virtually destroyed on its way to the spawning grounds. I expect the effects of this will be noticeable this year, and again there will be a lack of tyees in 1962. The department has made an effort to ensure an adequate spawn and successful seaward escapement of smolts, but this has been an expensive and, I think, a short term answer. The fisheries research branch and its officers have made an exhaustive survey and developed a plan they hope will solve the problem. I understand that several years ago the department requested the power commission to make certain installations for fish protection. Admittedly they are expensive; I understand the cost is in the neighbourhood of $750,000, but the expenditure is minor when related to the tourist revenue of the Comox-Courtenay area.

I know it is the financial responsibility of the power commission to make the proposed installations, but I think it is also the responsibility of the federal Department of Fisheries to see that immediate action is taken. Over a year ago the B.C. power commission referred the matter to the B.C. energy board, which as yet has not rendered a decision. What authority that body has to decide on a federal matter—and this is purely a federal matter—is beyond my comprehension. I think it is time the minister insisted that the power commission get on with the job of making the necessary improvements to this river in order that the salmon runs may be protected.

I should like to make a few comments on what is now the well known, at least in British Columbia, Sinclair report. This report was prepared by Dr. Sol Sinclair at the request of the department, and a great deal of work was involved in it. I understand that Dr. Sinclair is rated as one of the foremost economists in agriculture. In his report, as I read it, he does not give proper consideration to economics in his discussion of sport salmon fishing. As I have previously pointed out, a salmon caught by a tourist leaves far more money in a community than one caught by a commercial fisherman. This is particularly so in the case of foreign visitors to British Columbia. Let us not delude ourselves; that is the primary reason for most of the visitors coming to this area. If our tourist industry is to survive we must continue to encourage United States visitors. They have plenty of scenery in their own country, but the one thing that will bring them to Vancouver island is the opportunity to catch a fish, or more fish than they can catch in their own waters.

Dr. Sinclair made a recommendation concerning the licensing of sports fishermen for purposes of control and conservation. I cannot support licensing in the sense of a licence which has a fee attached to it. However, if licensing is necessary for conservation purposes, licences should be issued in a manner similar to our forest service camp fire permits, where no fee is attached.

Dr. Sinclair has built up a very strong case for the limitation of the number of commercial fishing licences. However, I believe that some of the statistical material he used does not in fact give a true picture of the situation. I am always a little suspicious of statistics, because I have helped to fill out many statistical reports in my life time, and I must admit that I was not always too careful about giving accurate information.

As an example of what I have said, let us take the figures given at the gross and net income of a troll fisherman. These are found on page 246 of Dr. Sinclair's report. It appears obvious that anyone who has taken out a commercial licence—I believe they cost $1 at present—and sold a fish is included in the statistics used in arriving at those figures, because they show a very, very low income for the average commercial troller. Approximately 54 per cent of them are shown as selling less than $500 worth of salmon in a season.

Everyone familiar with the fishing industry of British Columbia knows that commercial licences are obtained for a number of reasons. A large number are obtained by people who are classed as moonlighters. We have had a number of labour disputes in my province in the last few years, and I know that when there is a strike in the woods, the next day you will find most of the loggers out having a good time fishing. They have taken out commercial licences and are classed as commercial fishermen.

Another group are the white collar workers and others who are fond of fishing and who hope to recoup some of the cost of their recreation by the sale of their catch. Then there are pleasure boat owners who use their fishing licences as a basis for claiming sales tax exemption on parts and material used in the maintenance of their boats as well as in the purchase of gear. Another group are the wives and dependents of fishermen, who use this as a means of avoiding income tax. Therefore to arrive at a conclusion from statistics showing the average sale of the commercial troller is hardly well founded. The categories I have mentioned represent perhaps one third of the licensed troll fishermen, and I am sure they account for the pitifully low earning figure Dr. Sinclair has arrived at in his calculations.

The recommendation he made for an increase in the cost of commercial licences and for a minimum $40 boat licensing fee may have some merit, provided special consideration is given to the native Indian fisherman. The native Indian fisherman is hardly in a position to afford a high fee and if this recommendation is ever implemented I do not think native Indian fishermen should be subjected to this kind of licence fee.

However, Dr. Sinclair's conclusion that the elimination of the itinerant fisherman will necessarily result in an increased catch by those who fish as a full-time occupation is not sound, because a very large proportion of this latter group fish in areas in which sportsmen and itinerant fishermen do not fish. For instance, I believe the major part of the troll catch of salmon is caught off the west coast of Vancouver island in an area where there is very, very occasional sports fishing. I further believe that the suggestion of licence limitation by direct government control should be dismissed as impracticable under any government other than a totalitarian one.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, each year when the Minister of Fisheries brings his estimates before the committee it is a time of great interest to us who are from a province which for many, many years—ever since its discovery, in fact—depended either wholly or in part upon the fisheries. Last night I listened with great interest to the minister as he reported to the committee. I also listened with great interest to the observations of the hon. member for Gloucester, and I should like to associate myself with them.

I should like to begin by saying that any suggestions which I make involving the spending of money by the government are to be regarded as asking the government to invest rather than to give. As far as possible, the suggestions I shall make lie along the lines of investment. I do not think it is either right or wise to ask for government support simply for the sake of getting money to spend. I do believe, however, that the government should look with favour upon the spending of money which is an investment and which will result in the government getting back its bread, so to speak, with butter on it.

With respect to the encouragement of the fisheries on the Atlantic coast—or perhaps I had better address myself specifically to the fisheries in Labrador and Newfoundland—I am satisfied that the expenditure of money in certain directions would constitute an investment which would be profitable not only to the fishermen themselves, particularly on the Atlantic seaboard, but to the Canadian economy as a whole. I think there has been a tendency, perhaps an understandable one, to overlook the value of ancient industries. Fishing is one industry which we have had with us for as long as there has been a Canada. As time went by and Canada developed from the first colony of Great Britain into the great nation she is today, as central Canada became industrialized and prosperous and as western Canada began to supply food of another kind for world consumption, decreasing attention was given to what was a great industry and what still is a basic industry. It was the first industry which produced food in the new world and, in my opinion, it could become an even greater industry than it has been in the past. The population of Newfoundland is increasing, and the population of Canada is increasing, so it is important that the old industries be revitalized and extended just as the new industries should be encouraged and extended.

With this in mind I should like to make certain suggestions applicable to the fishermen and the fishing industry in my riding; suggestions which will, I hope, receive the attention of the minister and, beyond that, sympathetic scrutiny leading eventually to the investment of funds in this industry to the greater profit of my fishermen and of the Canadian people.

Briefly, the fishing industry can be broken up into three sections, production, processing and marketing. With respect to marketing, most of the problems under this heading properly concern the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have already spoken on that subject. However, there are some aspects, particularly in connection with the processing of fish, which are the business of the Department of Fisheries, and I shall have something to say about that later.

The production of fish begins, of course, with the fishermen and depends to a large extent on whether the fishermen have the necessary gear, the necessary facilities and the necessary supplies. There are some exceptions to this rule. Last year, for instance, fish did not appear at all in certain areas but, generally speaking, the equipment which a fisherman possesses has a great deal to do with whether or not he himself can make a living. This factor is, of course, all-important. The fisherman must make a living at his vocation; if he cannot, he is not able to remain in it without receiving aid which, perhaps, is not justified.

Making aid available to help the fisherman produce is a different thing entirely, and I think government assistance should begin right there with the fisherman; assistance designed to help him produce more. Much has been done in the past along these lines, but I do think there have been some basic aspects of this question which have been overlooked.

To begin with, I might mention the matter of the fisherman's ability to purchase his equipment and supplies. It happens from time to time that a fisherman finds that his gear is worn out, his engine is old, and his boat needs to be replaced. He discovers he has not made enough money or has not been able to set aside sufficient funds over the years to make the necessary replacements. If he is to replace his boat at all he has therefore to borrow the money, to obtain credit somewhere. This is not always easy, particularly in Labrador where it is a fact that better boats and equipment would definitely mean higher production per man. So we come to the matter of small loans for fishermen, and despite what has been done so far there is not in existence, in my opinion, any scheme by which fishermen can borrow relatively small amounts of money for the purchase of boats, engines and equipment.

In the first place, in the remote settlements and in the smaller outports where fishing is carried on as a main industry today there are not the banking facilities available, and it is difficult for fishermen to take advantage of any loan scheme which may now exist. I ask the minister to consider seriously the possibility of having a loan scheme worked out whereby fishermen who need small loans so they may improve their property and increase their production may be assisted by some scheme which would make this money more easily available. In this respect I do not believe the fisherman has the same advantage the farmer enjoys, and I maintain that the Canadian fisherman must be placed on a par with the Canadian farmer. Both are producers. Both are necessary to our economy. The fisherman of the Atlantic coast should be given an opportunity to find the necessary money in order to equip themselves to continue in business.

In his announcement earlier today concerning assistance to shipbuilding, we heard the Minister of Transport say that the present special assistance of up to $165 per gross ton in connection with the construction in Canada of fishing vessels over 45 feet in length would be increased to $250 per gross ton. While that is $50 short of what my friend the hon. member for Gloucester requested last evening, we must be pleased that it is a step in the right direction, toward implementing a policy of assistance in the building of ships. I would point out that this assistance is primarily directed to the shipbuilding industry. I say that without in any way wishing to detract from what has been said in this regard this morning. This proposed measure will provide support and assistance to the Canadian shipbuilding industry by helping fishermen buy boats in Canada, although they could perhaps buy cheaper ones outside Canada. However, I repeat that this is a step in the right direction, but suggest that more than this is needed.

This assistance applies to vessels over 45 feet in length. Many of the boats operating along the coast of my riding are much smaller than that. These boats operate in the inshore fishing industry comparatively close to shore. I understand that for economic reasons it is not practical to operate a larger boat in this field. Many fishermen will not be able to take advantage of this assistance because the majority, at least in my area, use boats smaller than the 45-foot minimum, and the introduction of the use of larger boats for this type of work is not feasible.

Just as the invention of traps increased fishery production during at least part of the year, the introduction of long liners in the appropriate field will do the same, but the inshore fishermen must still use small boats. To help the small operator, who must use a small boat to effectively do his work, assistance must be given toward the building of small boats as well as larger ones. The field in which these small boats operate represents a basic part of the fisheries industry, and I should ask the minister to sympathetically consider that situation.

The subject of small marine works should possibly be discussed when we are considering in detail the estimates of the Minister of Public Works. However, I think it is proper that I mention at this time that small marine works are nearly always used in the small fishing communities in the carrying out of their trade. Small wharves for fishing boats represent an essential part of the fishing trade in small communities, and there exists a need for an enlargement of the program of building these works. On this subject I should state that the community stage program, by and large, was a success. I was pleased to hear the minister say that it is intended that this program be continued, but sorry to hear that it is going to be continued on a diminished scale.

I should like to comment briefly in regard to this program. The building of community stages has provided very essential facilities for fishermen in a number of communities in Newfoundland. In addition to providing the property from which fishermen can fish this has had the tendency to bring fishermen together in groups and encouraging co-operative action on the part of the fishermen. Provision of these stages has also been of great economic benefit, because it is not easy any more for fishermen to acquire the necessary materials to build the old type fishing stages. The introduction of the new type community stage has provided the essential property for the use of fishermen.

Actually I should like to have heard that the program of building community stages was going to be continued at its former rate by the federal government, and I am sorry that this program has stopped following the provision of 20 such stages. I feel the government should have instituted a program to build perhaps 10 stages per year, carried on until all those areas which require them had been provided with the necessary stages. I feel that stages costing over $25,000 should be considered the responsibility of the federal government, and I suggest this would in no way have interfered with the ability of the federal and provincial governments to make joint arrangements for the building of stages.

I repeat that it is my earnest opinion that the program of building community stages, which the federal government has now completed with the building of the twentieth stage, should be continued. It is a pity that the many communities which so badly need these stages will temporarily have to do without them, and I seriously ask the minister to give further consideration to the continuance of this program in Newfoundland and Labrador in addition to the program he informed us last night had been worked out with the provincial governments.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some further remarks a little later, regarding the type of stage needed, but intend to refer now to the other basic requirement of fishermen. Fishermen must have bait.

Perhaps I could call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, when the committee took recess at one o'clock I was endeavouring to establish the need for help to the fishermen so they could be independent and so that their production would increase. As a matter of fact, my arguments were based on the need for fishermen to be able to make a living. I pointed out that if the fisherman could not make a living at his job he could not continue at it without getting the kind of assistance which perhaps was not justified, or words to that effect. I hasten to say that by that I did not mean that fishermen should not get social assistance where needed, but I did mean that they should get the kind of aid that would make them independent in their vocation so that they would be able to maintain themselves, and not need other help.

In outlining some of the things which I thought could be done I was discussing, I think, when the committee rose, the question of bait supplies. Each year a shortage of bait cuts down the earning power of the fishermen. It is a perennial problem and I am very glad to see that this matter of bait supplies is one to which the federal Department of Fisheries has been giving attention. The bait holding units which are being installed have had a good effect. I request, of course, that this program be continued and that more of those bait holding units be supplied to the fishing settlements in Newfoundland and in particular the fishing settlements in my riding of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. I request that the minister continue to give earnest attention to the matter of bait supplies for fishermen.

Again I request that the matter of manufacturing artificial bait be given very active consideration. I will not go into details, as I have done so already in this house, save to say that if the same attention were given to developing artificial bait for codfish as has been given to the development of artificial bait for sport fishermen the problem would have been solved long ago.

With respect to salt supplies, nearly every year there is a shortage of salt in various areas. This is perhaps not so much the responsibility of the federal government as it is of the fish trade itself and the fish merchants themselves. Although in these remarks I am trying to point out what I think are the duties of the federal government, I would not want to leave the impression that I think the whole fishery business should be run by the federal government. I think of the industry itself, the commercial interests which exploit the fisheries. They have their duties also. I would ask the federal government to keep on eye on the matter of salt supplies as well as bait supplies and give what assistance they can.

With respect to the processing of fish, there seems to be an overproduction, if anything, or perhaps an out of balance production of heavy salted fish, and this fish is sold in a highly competitive market. At the same time a good market exists for light salted fish. I do not believe we are producing enough light salted fish to fill the requirements of this market. In the old days light salted fish was produced chiefly by hand labour. Of course, it is unthinkable to consider going back to the old ways of making fish when those who made the fish were paid very little for their work. Today, heavy salted fish is chiefly made in mechanical driers. My plea is for a drier which will produce light salted fish.

My understanding is that one of the reasons why light salted fish cannot be made artificially is that it can be kept only a comparatively short time before going bad. In other words, when a fisherman light salts his fish he has to get rid of it fairly quickly in order for it to be made or else it will spoil. That being so, it would seem to indicate that cool rooms built in connection with community stages might be the answer. A community stage would be a unit consisting of a cool room, a bait holding unit and, of course, the stage itself. I said before lunch that I wanted to come back to the matter of community stages and one of the points I had in mind was that a community stage program with the necessary cool rooms and bait holding units is necessary if we are to exploit the light salted fish business properly. It seems to be evident that there is a market for light salted fish, a market that is larger and more readily available than are the markets for heavy salted fish.

With respect to community stages on the Labrador, in addition to those built for Labrador residents I should also like to see the experiment tried of a community stage complete with a bunkhouse and dining facilities so that crews from elsewhere could spend the summer fishing on the coast and then sell to collectors, the fish caught and stored in the stage. That could very well be one way in which the Labrador fishery could be revitalized. Certainly Labrador offers some of the most prolific fishing grounds in Canada and Canada's are the best in the world.

There is no need for me to point out again how other nations are profiting by using the waters off Canada's coast. The Labrador floater fishery, which almost disappeared several years ago, shows sign of reviving and I believe that a new Labrador fishery tailored to meet present-day requirements is a distinct possibility. It is something that the minister could very well look into and I believe it would be rewarding to the fishermen as well as being of great benefit to the Canadian economy.

I should like to express appreciation for the work the minister's department is doing in research and again make a request for further study of the artificial drying of light salted fish. I believe this is absolutely essential. If we do not keep these markets then the markets will disappear. If the product to which they have been accustomed in the past is kept away from them long enough, the demand for it will completely cease to exist. It would be really tragic if we were to lose these historic markets, and if we do not develop the kind of product which the market wants somebody else is going to do it and we may well lose the market forever.

The question of what to do with respect to the fisheries is, I think, fairly easily answered. There have been commissions from time immemorial that have looked into the matter of what is wrong with the fisheries and some of these commissions have produced very valuable information. The last one was the Walsh commission in 1952, I believe, and as a result of that commission action was forthcoming. I ask the minister to keep an eye on the possibilities for development based on the knowledge he already has and so that he may acquire further knowledge I invite him and his officials to visit Labrador and northern Newfoundland personally as soon as possible. When he has assessed what is needed, when he has acquired the necessary information, which is already at his disposal, all I ask him to do is to put into effect the policies that are needed. Some of these policies are simple. Some of them are very basic. They have to do with enabling the fishermen to produce more fish in order to make more money. Some of these policies, like the development or continuation of research, are more involved, but none of the problems is insurmountable. All are problems that can be met, and certainly with a knowledge of what is needed the will to do must be forthcoming.

I should also like to mention the presence of a Russian icebreaker at the seal fishery this year. This is a sign of the times, a sign of the increasing competition with which we are going to be faced in every phase of the fishing industry. It probably would not be a bad idea for us to consider at the appropriate time the advisability of having icebreakers available for the assistance of Canadian sealing ships.

I believe that the government of Newfoundland is experimenting at present with a new type of trawler. While I understand it is hoped that the boat will be self-sustaining, I might suggest to the minister in passing that as the knowledge gained will be available to all of Canada the federal government might consider sharing the loss with the province in the event there is a loss.

Finally, may I again emphasize the necessity of the investment of comparatively small sums of money so that the fishery can be more profitable for all concerned, so that fishermen will be more independent, so that fish products will bring a greater profit to Canada and so that the industry will grow faster than it has been and in proportion to our population and our economic needs to the greater profit of the fishermen of Canada and the people of Canada generally.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, as the representative from Queens-Lunenburg, one of the oldest and most famous fishing constituencies in Nova Scotia, it is with pleasure that I rise to participate in the debate on the fisheries estimates. My first words will be to commend the minister for the conscientious manner in which he is administering the affairs of his department. The fish and shellfish resources that abound off the coasts of Canada make a great material contribution to our national economy and to the food supplies of this nation and other countries, and they merit continual attention not only from the government but from private agencies as well.

The fishing industry is soundly based upon a living, constantly renewing source of national wealth which, with proper management and careful planning, can be maintained at its present level and greatly enlarged. However, if this resource is neglected or overexploited the reverse is true, and this presents Canadian fishermen with a constant problem. Supervision of this great resource is a governmental responsibility but in order to achieve the maximum results co-operation is required from all those engaged in the fishing industry, the fishermen, fishing companies, processors, dealers and the public at large.

The Department of Fisheries has made great forward strides under the present minister, with special emphasis on the fisheries research board. This progressive arm of the fisheries department has been conducting studies on oceanography and the fisheries, and I believe the information gained will be invaluable to Canada's fishermen.

We too easily forget that the earth's surface is only one quarter land and that almost three quarters is covered by water. Of the land quarter only about one half is habitable, and much less than that is cultivatable. On the habitable portion of the land, there now live about three billion people, approximately one billion more than lived here 50 years ago. Experts estimate at present rates of population growth there will be four billion in 15 years, and six billion or twice the present world population in a span of only 40 years. These numerous new people will need both space and food. If the world is to be called upon to provide additional food for another billion people in 15 years, a more readily available source than bringing new land under cultivation will almost certainly have to be found. The only large and as yet not fully explored source of food is the ocean. Recent and continuing heavy capital investment in large modern highly mechanized fishing fleets and in research and oceanographic vessels by the United Kingdom, the United States, Russia, France, Japan and indeed by most of the countries of the world seems to indicate that the race for animal protein is already under way.

We are carrying out similar studies in Canada. In fact, the Canadian committee on oceanography was reorganized in December 1959. From studies already made it would appear the great future developments in marine fisheries lie in three directions. One is to develop fish culture or fish farming. The second is to make fuller use and to take some of the guesswork out of the bank and groundfish industry with which we are already familiar, and the third is to separate the productive from the non-productive areas on the many fishing banks that exist on our continental shelf. With the help of other governmental departments, these broader aspects of oceanography are no longer frightening and positive programs can be laid down and in due course carried out.

One of the prominent examples of fish farming is the experimental work carried out by the department with several imported varieties of oysters, seeking a breed which could survive in Nova Scotia waters. Efforts to plant Prince Edward Island oysters in the Atlantic coast regions of Nova Scotia have not been too successful. I understand from reports that there was extremely heavy mortality in the St. Margaret bay area, though some oysters did grow fairly well at coves near Chester. The reason these tests were not entirely successful could well be due to the fact water temperatures on the Atlantic coast are much colder than in the sheltered Northumberland strait area, and I suggest the department continue with these tests by bringing in oysters that are accustomed to colder waters.

Without question, any expenditure by the fisheries department in an effort to re-establish the oyster fishery depleted by the epidemic oyster disease some years ago can be readily justified because of the great economic benefits to the province, and the nation as a whole. The fact that this type of fishery is within three miles of our coast and will be of direct value to Canadian fishermen should be considered. I often wonder if Canadian fishermen realize the tremendous potential in the oyster fishery.

In 1960 for example we exported to the United Kingdom, British Guiana, St. Pierre and the United States a total of 19,200 pounds valued at $5,443. However, during the same period we imported from Hong Kong, Japan and the United States a total of 71,743 gallons of oysters weighing approximately 10 pounds per gallon, valued at $503,770. In other words, there is a market for over half a million dollars worth of oysters right here in Canada and these shellfish lend themselves well to farming. Plans are available whereby fishermen living along the coast could build cement holding ponds and by pumping in sea water under controlled temperatures, and using proper feeding plans, a suitable oyster harvest could be secured. Oyster seed farming is biologically possible if oyster seed of disease resistant strain is used, as proved on Conway narrows flats in Prince Edward Island, the department's experimental area.

This calls for some forethought and planning, but this could be developed for the benefit of our inshore fishermen and could provide much needed revenue and employment in some of our Atlantic coast regions. The market potential is not only great in Canada, but this program of oyster farming, if developed, could provide us with more oysters for export as the market for this succulent seafood is almost unlimited and this would improve our imbalance in trade. I believe the Bras d'Or lakes of Cape Breton, for example, with an entrance and exit to the sea, and where the water is warm enough to encourage excellent growth in a sheltered area, could be turned into one gigantic oyster farm bringing much needed income to the citizens of that area.

While commending the minister and the scientists of the research board for their efforts to replenish the oyster stocks in Nova Scotia, I would also urge they give equal attention to developing and restocking our clam beds along the Atlantic coast and our scallop beds in the bay of Fundy. During the past few years it has been found necessary to curtail clam digging in many areas of the Atlantic provinces because of the toxic effect this tasty seafood had on the consuming public, due to water pollution. As a result, many of our clam canning factories have been forced to close or seriously curtail their production, resulting in a further loss of income to our inshore fishermen. We see Japanese canned clams in constantly increasing quantities in the food stores throughout Canada, and to see this shellfish packed in a distant country offered for sale in the Atlantic provinces is the height of irony.

The fact that Japan, with its teeming millions in need of food, can export clams to Canada is indicative that we as a nation have been negligent in the care of our shellfish resources. Their success is not due to discoveries of which we are unaware, but due to their insistence in keeping up to date methods of development, production, inspection and conservation. What is the problem affecting our clam industry? In certain areas water pollution has been quite heavy, and as most people know shellfish will pick up and concentrate germs. However, it is equally true that contaminated shellfish will readily cleanse themselves in clean water. This is cheap and handy enough, but to ensure and certify that this has been done requires testing, inspection and market control and I would suggest this work could be undertaken by the officers of the fisheries research board working in conjunction with the fisheries officers in the Atlantic coast areas.

In addition, some encouragement should be given our inshore fishermen to invest in a mechanical clam digger or shellfish harvester. These are used with great success along the coast of Maine, and the fisheries industrial development service working in co-operation with the fisheries research board perfected a shellfish harvester called the "Cyprina" which they found not only good for clam digging but also suitable for harvesting "bedding size" oysters. The plans for this type of machine are readily available, the market for the clams is here in Canada as well as in the United States, and I believe this type of fishery merits a second look not only by our inshore fishermen but also by government officials.

Just what are the possibilities? While Canada's clam production last year amounted to $781,324 we still imported from Japan canned clams and crabmeat, another shellfish that could be processed in Canada, to a value of $482,958. It is true our clam production has been hampered due to contamination in certain areas. However, these contaminated shellfish further point up the need to accelerate construction of municipal and industrial waste treatment works to alleviate the evident destruction and waste of Canada's marine resources. It is a somewhat sobering thought that in the event of an atomic war the ocean could well be the only source of uncontaminated food supplies. The ocean is mankind's largest remaining source of edible protein and it cannot continue to be considered as an unlimited disposal dump for atomic wastes and the products of civilization.

The same conditions that apply to oysters and clams apply to a somewhat lesser degree to our scallop beds. This industry has grown in the past six years in Nova Scotia from almost nothing to a landed value in excess of $2 million. Some 25 scallop draggers carrying crews of from 15 to 20 men each operate on the offshore banks at Georges and St. Pierre. This is a deepsea operation and when landed these scallops are all inspected by fisheries' officers prior to shipment.

However, not too many years ago the bay of Fundy produced considerable scallops and these were landed at Digby, Nova Scotia. In 1927, for example, total production in Canada amounted to 39,000 barrels, and 37,500 barrels came from Digby. Due to overfishing and improper conservation practices this fishery has declined in recent years, creating a considerable loss of revenue for our inshore or Digby scallop draggers.

When discussing shellfisheries we must not forget lobsters, which had landed value last year in the Atlantic provinces of $18,041,000. However, here again is a commodity that is still in great demand not only in Canada but also in the United States and European countries, with markets apparently unlimited.

The export value of Canada's lobster catch last year amounted to $20,149,974. While this is a significant amount, we are only scratching the surface. I believe greater emphasis should be placed upon increasing the amount of lobsters along our shores by establishing artificial breeding ponds. While this method of increasing available supplies was tried some years ago, I think around 1913 and 1914, at Long Beach pond and Gabarus pond in Nova Scotia without promising results, I believe that with our present scientific knowledge we could establish with a greater degree of success artificial breeding ponds for lobsters so that our bays and inlets could be restocked along the coast of Nova Scotia.

At the present time we are spending large amounts of money on research and conservation methods on the high seas with regard to our groundfish industry. The A. T. Cameron, a 177-foot research ship is searching out new areas for our ground fishing fleet. While I am vitally interested in all aspects of our fisheries development, I would point out that any new fishing areas discovered by the Cameron will only be useful in the future when we have larger ships than those presently in existence.

Our efforts to conserve the small fish by establishing net mesh regulations are also questionable as there is a growing feeling among Canadian fishermen that these regulations are not being followed by fishermen of other nations.

In support of that statement I would quote a list of prices taken from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald last week. These prices are for codfish in Boston. They quote large cod at 5 cents per pound, medium cod at 5.75 cents per pound, and cod scrod—that is, 2½ pounds and under—at 5.95 cents per pound. Here the emphasis is placed on the small fish.

In view of our inability to enforce conservation measures beyond the three-mile limit of our coasts I would urge upon the government that we give more thought to developing our shellfish industries and those ground fisheries that come within the jurisdiction of the Canadian government.

I note, for example, the amount of the contribution this year toward fisheries research is only $25,000, as in the previous year, while the amount for the construction of departmental vessels has been increased from $200,000 to $980,000. For the reasons I have mentioned I believe more of this money should be diverted to fisheries research.

To encourage and provide an area for these developments I would suggest to the government that we give consideration to establishing base lines from cape St. Mary near Mateghan past Grand Manan island to the New Brunswick border and class the bay of Fundy area as a territorial sea in which fishing is restricted to ships of Canadian registry.

A similar base line should be drawn from Cape North in Cape Breton to Port Aux Basques, Newfoundland, and the gulf of St. Lawrence classed as a territorial sea, thereby providing an area for shellfish and certain groundfish conservation practices that would come under Canadian government control and provide an income for our inshore fishermen in the Cape Breton area as well as those in Prince Edward Island, the Gaspe coast, the Magdalen islands and part of the coast of Newfoundland.

I do not believe this action would receive any serious criticism internationally as Canada is bordered by three vast oceans, the Atlantic in the east, the Pacific in the west and the Arctic in the north, a total coast line of approximately 60,000 miles in which other nations have unlimited fishing rights. It would also have no effect on those countries which are presently fishing extensively on our east coast banks.

However, in the areas I have mentioned, where the base line would provide a small territorial sea, there are many fishermen and communities which depend principally for their livelihood on the fishing industry. We could carry out in these areas proper conservation practices and assist in the redevelopment of our shellfish industries, which could be of considerable economic importance not only to the Atlantic provinces but to all Canada.

With further reference to fish farming, I believe there is an increasing demand for more sport fishing particularly near urban areas, with the added possibility of developing a commercial product of value. I believe this matter was discussed at the fourteenth meeting of the Canadian committee on freshwater fisheries research, sponsored by the fisheries research board. I believe farm fish ponds and fisheries management should be further encouraged in Canada.

At the present time there are thousands of ponds, mostly in Quebec and Ontario, though we have some in the maritimes. In fact there is one in my riding near Lunenburg. The chief product of these fish farms is trout and the pressure on natural waters and the demand for more sport fishing is creating a situation in Canada favourable to the further development of ponds. There is also a growing commercial market for rainbow and brook trout, which at present are being imported from Japan and Denmark in increasing quantities. In fact, at the present time a 10-oz. package of rainbow trout packaged in Denmark is retailing in Ottawa for 57 cents.

I submit there is an opportunity in this industry for energetic Canadians, and I would urge the fisheries department to give every encouragement to this type of development.

Along the same lines I would urge that further consideration be given to the restocking of our rivers and lakes with salmon. In my riding we have fair salmon fishing on the Medway river in Queens county and the Lahave river in Lunenburg county but steps should be taken to build up the salmon runs not only in these rivers but in Martin river and Middle river and others in Lunenburg and Queens counties. This would further encourage tourists to visit Nova Scotia, and thereby assist in strengthening the economy of our province.

The recent loss of 17 fishermen by drowning when their long-liners sank because of high winds and heavy seas off the coast of Nova Scotia should cause some concern to the minister and officials of his department who have encouraged the construction through subsidies of this type of craft. These men were the very best and most aggressive or they would not have been where they were, and their loss leaves a void that will never be filled.

While long-liners were never intended to operate over 100 miles at sea on our offshore banks, I personally believe there is a structural weakness in these craft which would bear examination. The large wheelhouse placed amidships which covers the engine and fish hauler has been designed more as a shelter from the normal elements than as an integral part of the hull. When struck by a heavy sea this wheelhouse is quickly destroyed leaving the long-liner exposed to the elements and possible flooding when the next sea strikes. It is worthy of note that 65-foot draggers, which are completed decked over, and also ships of the schooner type between 75 and 100 feet in length successfully weathered this particular storm. As a matter of fact, the schooner type design which made the sailing ship Bluenose and the town of Lunenburg famous, has never been surpassed in seaworthiness. I would ask the minister and his officials to give urgent consideration to these facts and to the possibility of improving the long-liner design.

A complete study of the entire assistance program would in fact be most desirable. According to figures supplied by the economics service, Department of Fisheries, for the four year average, 1955 to 1958 inclusive, Nova Scotia draggers averaging 65 feet in length spent 179 days at sea per year. Here my remarks coincide to a considerable extent with those made last evening by the hon. member for Gloucester which would indicate we have our fishermen's interest very much at heart. During this period when the 65-foot draggers operated, actual fishing hours amounted to only 1,433, or less than 60 days out of a year's total of 365. This gives an indication of the seasonal type of operation carried out by the six man crew on a 65-foot dragger and explains the reason for the marginal earnings shared by these fishermen.

It is evident these ships are not large enough to operate in the fisheries on a year round basis, and larger ships are required not only for the safety of men's lives but also to provide steadier employment at sea and ashore. This requires heavier capital investment, and in order to obtain this capital the fisherman must receive a better price for his fish. Of the species of fish landed it is interesting to note that cod, haddock and flounders comprise over 81 per cent of the total. During this period haddock landed averaged 3.5 cents per pound, codfish three cents per pound and flounders slightly better than 3.2 cents per pound. It should be pointed out that though fancy grades bring better prices than those previously mentioned, the scrod grades, that is to say, fish of two and a half pounds and under, lower the total average.

It has been suggested by many fishermen that the present price which has remained fairly constant for the past 15 years be raised by one cent per pound. This would make the difference between a marginal operation, and one economically sound and capable of supporting the fishermen and their families and supplying capital for larger ships. The next question is, of course, whether the market can stand this price increase. A recent survey in the Ottawa supermarkets on the three species mentioned showed frozen haddock in one pound packages retailing at 49 cents per pound, frozen cod at 37 cents per pound and frozen sole at 45 cents per pound. As it takes three pounds of fish to make one pound of fillets, an increase of one cent to the fishermen would increase these prices by three cents to the consumer. Even with this increase these seafoods which provide much needed vitamins and minerals to mankind would still be much lower in price than the trimmings from the slaughterhouse tables which are selling as hot dogs or all beef franks at 59 to 63 cents per pound.

An increase of one cent per pound on haddock, cod and sole over present prices would also go a long way toward providing further additional capital for use by our fishermen on the construction of new ships. While I realize much of our production is sold in the United States market, and we must compete with world exporters, I believe every effort should be made to provide at least this one cent per pound increase to our fishermen. To do this, we must encourage greater consumption of fish among Canadians generally. At present the average Canadian consumes 142 pounds of beef per year, 72 pounds of poultry but only 13 pounds of fish or a little better than one pound per month. This despite the fact that fish protein has a high biological value in terms of body growth and repair. Fish protein is complete and balanced nutritionally. Fish protein is easily digested and readily available to the body. Nutritionally, fish are a gold mine of dietetically valuable minerals and of other inorganic compounds. It is now well recognized the serum cholesterol level in man can be lowered by reduction in fat intake, or by judicious substitution of one form of dietary fat for another.

In fish we have a uniquely valuable food; one that combines the biological value unique to the proteins of the animal kingdom, with the healthful soft fats unique to the plant kingdom, and which assist in the prevention of arteriosclerosis, a disease of the arteries of the heart. In addition to its health values, fish is available in a wide variety of flavours, textures and market forms. To the economy minded, fish fillets provide 100 per cent protein with no fat or bone to waste. It is readily available and easily prepared, and I trust it will find increased acceptance among our Canadian consumers thus providing a much needed boost to our east coast fishing communities, the secondary industries allied with fishing, and a strengthening of our entire Atlantic area economy.

Mr. Winch: The fishing industry of Canada is most important to our economy besides providing valuable food to the domestic market and to people beyond our borders. It is with regret that I have come to the conclusion that the fishing industry of Canada generally is not of immediate concern to the present government. In particular, the present government does not appear to be concerned about the fishing industry of British Columbia. The government and the Department of Fisheries appear to look upon the fishing industry on the Pacific coast as an illegitimate child, something in which they should be interested, but not too much.

Why do I say that? Why do I feel that? Why have I reached that conclusion? I do so because, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Skeena, there definitely seems to be a difference in the attention paid to the fishing industry in the maritimes and the fishing industry in British Columbia. If the agriculture industry is in difficulties, whether it be in regard to wheat, eggs, poultry, sunflower seeds or soybeans, the government takes some action. On the other hand, when the whaling fleet of British Columbia is not able to go out, as was the case last year and as probably will be the case this year, and when the herring industry is in grave difficulties, what does the minister do? The minister tells us, as he did last year, that he is keenly interested and will give serious consideration to the situation, but nothing is done at all. I should like to ask why there is this discrimination?

When the coal industry is in difficulties and requires subsidization, this government provides it. If the gold mining industry is in difficulties and requires subsidization, that industry receives it. When the agriculture industry, and to a certain extent the fisheries industry in the maritimes, is in difficulties, the government does something about it. However, when the fishing industry in British Columbia, which is of major importance to the people of that province, is in difficulties the government considers it as an illegitimate child, and it receives very little attention.

The hon. member for Skeena this morning mentioned the trials and tribulations of the herring industry in British Columbia. I have yet to see any record at all of assistance given to that industry by the minister's department or the government of Canada. I fail to understand why there has not been an intensive effort made to maintain the herring industry of British Columbia in the export field. I realize of course that it could be said by the minister and his department that this is a responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I notice when sales of wheat and grain are needed, that need is not considered a problem of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but a problem of the Department of Agriculture, and is treated as such. If that is done as a government principle I think that principle should also apply to the fishing industry in British Columbia.

The hon. member for Skeena also pointed out that we were grateful for the vast sales of wheat and other grains to China, but a few years ago the province of British Columbia exported vast quantities of salt herring to China, and I should like the minister to inform the committee what endeavours have been made by his department in co-operation with the Department of Trade and Commerce to re-establish our herring export markets in China and Japan. I was very intrigued when reading an article last week to the effect that Japan is now negotiating with the Soviet union for the purchase of 1,000 tons of herring, which is a follow up of a similar sale made a year ago. What have the officials of Canada done in an attempt to obtain markets for Canadian fisheries products, not only in China, where the people are starving, but also in Japan? In view of the fact the herring industry of British Columbia has been in grave difficulties for the past 18 months, one is led to ask has the department made any endeavour to assist that industry. Mr. Chairman, nothing has been done.

As I have said, I was intrigued and interested when I read an article stating that Japan was negotiating a sale of 1,000 tons of herring to the Soviet union. I was also intrigued when reading an article appearing in a newspaper regarding research in the fishing industry. This article pointed out that Norway had developed a herring roe industry and was exporting this product to Japan. This is a very high priced product called kazanoko. This product is regarded as a luxury in Japan and is very, very popular. Its reception there has been so successful that although, according to the article, only 100 kilograms were exported to Japan one year ago, there are now 20 companies producing this product to meet the present demand in Japan.

The Pacific coast of Canada, where there is a herring industry, is much closer to Japan than is Norway. I am wondering what consideration has been given to the herring industry in the way of research by this government, and what attempt has been made, not only to re-establish the old export markets in respect of salt herring, but to create new markets, such as this new market in Japan for which we must give Norway credit in assuming leadership?

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? Has the hon. member any idea of the price at which Norway is selling its herring to Japan?

Mr. Winch: No, I have not the slightest idea. I do not know the price of the kazanoko, but I do know that the coast of British Columbia is closer to Japan than is Norway, and that with a little research, and perhaps assistance in regard to trade markets, with the development of this new product, perhaps our fleet could have been operating instead of being out of work the major part of last year.

We have a similar difficulty in respect of our whaling fleet. My friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond can smile and laugh, but these are grave situations which should be drawn to the attention of the minister and his department.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege; I was not smiling at the hon. member, but smiling at the fact that he has not bothered to produce the facts. If red China intended to purchase herring from Canada in the way it is now purchasing wheat, it would not hesitate to do so. The hon. member has not bothered to produce any factual information in this regard, and that is why I was smiling.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the establishment of an aggressive policy on the part of the government of Canada to sell the products of Canada. I do not believe we should wait, in this buyer's market, for other countries to come to Canada to purchase these products, particularly in view of the difficulties with which the fisheries industries are now faced. My friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, as a Conservative, is quite prepared to sit back and wait for these countries to come to Canada, but in this way we are not going to maintain our export markets. I suggest that we must be aggressive in our attempts to find new markets.

I should also like to direct the minister's attention to the fact that our whaling fleet was not out last year, and I understand it is not going out this year. I feel that some attention should be given to this grave situation.

I should also like to refer for a moment or two, to the matter of conservation. What has this government done in regard to conservation of our fisheries products? I asked this same question of the Minister of Fisheries last year, and he replied that he was keenly interested and concerned, but as yet we have not heard one word in the way of a solution to this problem. The Department of Fisheries, to my knowledge, has put forward no ideas at all, nor offered any help in the solution of this problem.

I suggest that the province of British Columbia, particularly its fishing industry, has been let down by this government. The residents of British Columbia feel that the fishing industry there should not be considered by this government as an illegitimate child. We feel that this industry is of vital importance to the peoples of the Pacific coast and that every assistance should be given to the solving of its problems.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to proceed to discuss a subject of importance to the peoples of Canada from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and I refer to conservation and the methods of killing in respect of whales and harp seals. I have been very interested in noting that only one hon. member from Newfoundland has made any mention at all of the sealing industry. Mention was made of the fact that a Russian icebreaker was at the icefields and that perhaps Canada might do something of a similar nature.

I want to speak on this issue from a different angle. Knowing that these estimates were coming up, I spent a most interesting two or three days a short time ago in reading the various issues in the past year of that most remarkable magazine, the Canadian Audubon, and the writings of that world authority, Dr. Harry R. Lillie. He had a most interesting article in the Daily Telegraph of Great Britain on March 19, 1960. It was entitled "Slaughter in the Polar Seas". I understand that Dr. Lillie is recognized as a world authority. What was the main point of this article? I quote:

> The catching of some 50,000 whales each year involves cruelties unimagined by anyone who has not seen a kill.

He points out the need for conservation and also that more humane methods of killing should be used. I wish to quote just a couple of paragraphs from the article:

> Cruelty is one thing, but with it is the tragic greed of the countries that are wiping out—it could almost be described as deliberately wiping out—these great creatures.

This does not apply to British Columbia because our whaling fleet has not been out. I continue:

> Estimates of the present whale population vary widely, but it seems fair to say that at the present rate of catching the industry will have worked itself out of business in 10 years or even less. The average rate of reproduction is low—only one calf in 2½ years.

May I concentrate on this:

> There is an international whaling commission which does its best to supervise the industry in an advisory capacity on behalf of the member countries. It fixes a quota of whales which can be killed in a season. But it has no powers of compulsion. There is complete reliance on the goodwill of the countries operating—goodwill unfortunately not always in evidence.

When the minister speaks on this first item I should like him to tell us what action is being taken by his department to bring about by international understanding and international treaty a law of compulsion to conserve the whales of the world, and also a more humane method of killing. I make this request because I am in receipt of letters from the Audubon society asking whether Canada will not take the leadership in bringing about a more humane method of killing.

According to the article by Dr. Harry R. Lillie and information from other sources, I am led to believe that a more humane electric harpoon has been developed privately, and that all the full-scale tests which have been made, not in Canada but elsewhere, show conclusively that it has been successful far beyond the original expectations.

I now move from a discussion of whales to a discussion of seals. This subject, of course, is of major interest to Newfoundland. I have read with a great deal of interest a pamphlet issued by the same Dr. Lillie called "The Seals of Pack Ice", and also an article written by one whom those from Newfoundland and the maritimes will know very well, namely Harold Horwood. The article appeared in the Canadian Audubon magazine April, 1960, and is entitled "Tragedy on the Whelping Ice". Maritimers will know that Mr. Horwood is a well known journalist living in St. John's, Newfoundland.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. McGrath: He subscribes to the hon. gentleman's political theories.

Mr. Winch: I did not catch that.

Mr. McGrath: I interjected that the gentleman to whom the hon. member referred subscribes to his political theories.

Mr. Winch: To mine?

Mr. McGrath: Yes.

Mr. Winch: I did not know that before. He is even more worthy of notice than I had understood.

Mr. Drysdale: You had better read it carefully.

Mr. Winch: I have read it very carefully. I say that the author lives in St. John's Newfoundland, and I am certain that the hon. member who interjected will admit that his long interest and knowledge of this very matter, tied in with the report of Dr. Lillie, should commend the article to the committee. What does the article say? It is something that in which everyone should be interested. May I just make a brief reference to it because it has to do not only with the methods of killing but also with conservation. The article reads in part:

> The seal hunt is an annual adventure in the icefields to the north of Newfoundland. Full of hardship, danger and cruelty, it has been going on yearly for a century and a half, but is now near its final act, as the once great seal herds of the northwest Atlantic are relentlessly hounded to destruction by motor ships, aircraft and helicopters.

The article goes on:

> Traditional toast drunk in St. John's to departing sealers is "Bloody decks, and many of them!" This is symbolic of the barbarity with which the seal hunt is conducted. Dr. Joseph Cunningham, the world-famous small boat sailor, who "went to the ice" in 1955,—

I believe this is the term used in Newfoundland. Dr. Cunningham went to the ice and found the seal hunt utterly degrading and cruel. The article goes on to point out what is happening to the seals off the coast of Newfoundland as they go north. He gives the figures of the Newfoundland kill. From 1831 to 1840 it was 470,000 yearly; from 1931 to 1939 it had fallen to 170,000 yearly; and now it is below this figure.

I have an interest in this particular matter for two reasons. I have a very keen interest in it because I take a great deal of pride in the fact that my late father introduced me to this question of humane killing many years ago. He himself never killed an animal or shot a bird; neither have I. That was the education he gave me; only kill because of necessity. But if because of economic necessity we have to kill, then let us do two things: one, remember conservation in the interests of the economy; and, two, kill in the most humane way that science can provide.

I wanted to raise, first, this question of the fishing industry in British Columbia and the problems that we are facing there. It is my belief, as I said, regretfully, that there is not being carried out the research that is required to maintain the various segments of the fishing industry of British Columbia. Second, on the basis of the opinions expressed by authorities in British Columbia keenly interested in whale conservation and authorities in Newfoundland interested in seal conservation and not on the basis of personal knowledge, I submit that serious consideration should be given to this matter and we should be provided with information as to what the department is doing with regard to this matter which is of such great importance to British Columbia and Newfoundland. It is not enough to get an immediate return by killing now. Our great interest should be to profit from our resources in the best way we can, whether they be on land or in the sea, but at the same time to conserve them for those who come after us.

Irrespective of whether we are Conservatives, Liberals or C.C.F.'ers I think the great responsibility of a member of parliament as an adult Canadian citizen is to see that we hand on to those who come after us a heritage which is greater and fuller because it has passed through our hands. That is the principle I have tried to enunciate this afternoon.

Mr. Drysdale: Will the hon. member permit a question before he resumes his seat? I think it would be safe to say that we are ad idem on the question of conservation, but I was wondering whether the hon. member could explain why he thinks electric harpooning is more humane than the present method which I understand involves a detonation when the harpoon hits the whale.

Mr. Winch: I should like the hon. member to read the authorities I have been reading this past week, people from Newfoundland, the United Kingdom and Norway. According to all the information I have been able to gather, the exploding harpoon now used does not necessarily cause instant stunning because as a rule it hits the intestines and does not kill the nerve blocks. On the other hand, the electric harpoon immediately kills all the nerve blocks. According to all the reports I have read, it has been tested with excellent success. The request from the Audubon Society of Canada is that Canada interest itself in this matter and take leadership on the international commission—I have forgetten its name for the moment—in seeing that the most effective method of killing is used. That is my information from my reading. If I had the time I could explain further what happens with the explosion of a bomb harpoon inside a whale.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak on the estimates of the minister's department with particular emphasis on what I and many of us from the east consider to be a very perplexing and serious problem facing Canada's oldest industry. I refer particularly to the salt fish industry. As briefly as I can, I should like to tie in my remarks concerning the problems of the salt fish industry with the work of the fisheries research board. I realize that all too often people speaking on this subject tend to generalize and to oversimplify, and I hope that this afternoon I will not be too guilty of generalization, bearing in mind at all times that I do not have a really technical knowledge of this very complex subject.

Before doing so, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to what the minister had to say in relation to the community stage program. I too share the views of hon. members who have spoken in the debate, and state without reservation that in my opinion the community stage program should be enlarged and stepped up with all possible haste because in my view it is measures such as this that will assist in the salvation of the now dying salt fish industry.

The minister also referred in his remarks to the fact that last year was a good year for the Canadian salt fish industry, and the reason he stated it was a good year was the fact that European stocks were low. I think you have here the real weakness of the Canadian salt fish industry, the fact that our markets for this product depend upon the stocks or supplies of the European markets. It is a common fact that most of the European markets are supplied generally by their own subsidized fleets operating in most cases in Canadian waters.

To illustrate this, in 1959 world production of salt codfish was, I believe, approximately 350,000 tons. The Canadian share of that production was about 45,000 tons. I think it is generally recognized, as I said before, that the majority of this fish is caught and sometimes salted in the waters immediately off Canada's east coast.

In relation to the problem of marketing and the sale of our salt codfish, one cannot escape reference to the system of marketing prevailing in the industry. The Newfoundland associated fish exporters limited, generally known as NAFEL, was abolished a few years ago by virtue of the fact that its exclusive licence as the marketing agency from the federal government had expired. This agency was started by the previous administration of Newfoundland, that is, the government that existed prior to union, in order to correct a situation in the industry that was having serious repercussions around the world in the traditional markets for Newfoundland salt codfish. This situation came about by virtue of the fact that there was cutthroat competition and inconsistency in quality arising out of this competition, all to the detriment of the salt fish industry.

While there are many critics of this organization, there are many people who say it should have been enlarged to take in all of the east coast fishing industry including the Gaspe, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. They say that it should have been set up as the marketing agency for all this area. I am not going to argue the merits or demerits of this cartel, because that is what it was, a private cartel with the blessing of the government, but I will say that just as a need exists in agriculture for a central marketing agency to dispose of Canadian agricultural products, more specifically wheat, in order to ensure stability in that industry and a stable return to the farmer, equally in my opinion the same arguments can be applied to the fishing industry.

I think that this fact is too often forgotten. By the same token, I believe consideration should be given to investigating the possibilities of the Department of Fisheries taking greater responsibility for the disposal of Canadian fisheries production, particularly of Canadian salt fish production.

There have been references to various types of salt fish, the heavy salted fish that is cured in Nova Scotia. However, little reference has been made to the light salted codfish, cured primarily by sun drying, for sale in the traditional markets that prefer this particular type of codfish. For one reason or another, this part of the industry has practically died. I think this is a place where the research board has a very important role to assume. It is a fact that in France, for example, a means has been devised for desalting heavy salted fish. The resultant product is even called "Newfoundland type" codfish. This is the type of fish they prefer.

Of course the problem, Mr. Chairman, concerns the method of drying. I feel that the fisheries research board is aware of this problem and is attempting to cure it. However, I do not think the industry is aware of the work of the research board. I hope I am not trespassing on the sensitivities of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, but I say that the experimental station at Valleyfield, Bonavista, does not serve the purpose for which it was intended because it is too far away from the main plants that produce salt codfish.

After all, if it is not accessible to the industry it is logical to conclude it is not functioning as it was intended to function.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? May I ask the hon. gentleman if he has ever found the time to visit this research station before passing judgment upon it?

Mr. McGrath: Unfortunately I have not, because Valleyfield is so isolated and so far away from the main centres of the island that I have been unable to go there. It is only a few years since the road was put through to Valleyfield. This is the reason why I have never been there. I grant that the establishment at Valleyfield is adequate in every way for the purpose for which it was intended. My contention is that it cannot serve any useful function unless it is close to the main processors of salt codfish. As everybody knows, they are located around the southern part of Newfoundland as for example in the constituency of my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo.

I am not going into the reasons for the establishment of this station at Valleyfield because I think hon. members can draw their own conclusions about that. I will say that this points up what, in my mind, is the weakness in the research aspect of the Department of Fisheries; the fisheries research board. I feel that if the plant at Valleyfield, or one similar to the one at Valleyfield, were located in a more practical location great benefit could be derived from it.

Referring generally to the question of the fisheries research board, I may say in my opinion this board has lost sight of its main purpose, namely to do the type of research, scientific and technological, that could be practically applied to the fishing industry. I do not believe this is being done. I should like to quote from a speech delivered by a member of this board in Halifax, I believe, not long ago. He said:

> Be that as it may—here are the views of a member of the Canadian fishing industry who became a member of this board one year ago. In that period it has become apparent to me that the board lived and worked in a world apart from industry.

I believe that this is a very serious statement, and one that deserves the closest study. I feel it is essential that money be spent on scientific research but that the results of this research be directed toward the practical, everyday use in the fishing industry. I do not believe that it is enough for the scientists to examine rare species of fish. This may be a scientific end, in itself, but I say that unless the work of the fisheries research board can be translated practically to the industry, then it is not justified.

There is no justification, then, for the public money that is spent in support of this board. I believe there is room for research and more research, but let us put basic things first. I believe that the results of this research must be more practically applied in order to achieve its purpose.

I feel, for instance, that there should be closer liaison between the industry and the fisheries research board. I do not think it is enough to publish scientific papers because after all these have to be translated into lay terms that the fishermen can understand and that the industry can understand. When the minister replies, I should like him to deal with some of these points because I feel they are very important and basic to the future of the fishing industry.

In conclusion, I would sum up by saying it is my firm belief that, first, there should be a serious reappraisal of the policy of the Department of Fisheries with regard to the salt fish industry; second, I believe the Department of Fisheries should assume a greater role in the marketing of our fisheries production; third, I think the fisheries research board should re-examine just exactly what its function is and try to translate that function into practical terms for the day to day use of our fishermen.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, as far as the province of Newfoundland is concerned, we are today discussing the estimates of one of the most important departments of government. Newfoundland is an ideal base for fishing, not only for the Newfoundland fishermen but also for the British, French, Portuguese, Russians, Spaniards and others who come to the island every year with their fleets of ships.

These foreign fishermen, with their advanced methods and superior vessels, are fast outstripping the Newfoundland fishermen in methods of catching and curing fish. Consequently they can produce better fish at cheaper prices than Newfoundlanders.

At the present time there are approximately 22,000 persons engaged in the fishery ashore and afloat along our 6,000 miles of coastline. We have approximately 60 fish processing establishments and about 18 freezing plants. The industry ranks third in importance as far as the island's economy is concerned, and its products amount to $32 million yearly.

Newfoundland's main markets for salt fish were the British West Indies, Brazil, Greece, Italy, Jamaica, Portugal, Spain, Puerto Rico, Cuba and other areas in the Caribbean. All these markets are gradually disappearing. Many of these countries are now sending their own fishing fleets to fish on our Grand Banks off the coast of Newfoundland. This decline in our markets has taken place during a period when the consumption of salt fish in these foreign markets, which at one time were our markets, is greater than ever before.

What are the reasons for this state of affairs? Some of the reasons for the change can be attributed to the tremendous assistance given to the fishing industries in these foreign countries by large subsidies and assistance given to these industries by the governments to those countries to build tremendous fleets of vessels to fish on our Grand Banks.

Another very important factor is the increasing capital expenditure for stores, boats, equipment, fishing gear, etc., which have to be made by the Newfoundland fishermen. Their costs of production are too high. Newfoundland requires substantial assistance from the government if we are to hold our place in the salt fish industry by regaining some of our lost markets and getting new markets in the foreign trade. Further, Newfoundland's switch to heavy salted fish has greatly reduced the demand for our fish in these foreign markets. We should therefore produce the kind of fish these markets require if we hope to hold them against foreign competition.

At the present time there are large stocks of heavy salted fish, much of which was caught by Newfoundlanders, on hand in the maritimes. A large quantity of this type of fish was sold to Cuba but owing to present conditions sales have fallen off and this is causing some panic selling by maritimers in the Jamaican market.

Now many of the fish dealers who for years opposed Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited—known locally as NAFEL—are asking for a form of centralized exporting. I am convinced that NAFEL should not have been cancelled by this government until it had a better system of marketing to replace it.

Much of the blame for the condition of our fishing industry today can be attributed to the lack of assistance, lack of initiative and lack of interest taken in the industry by our governments, as well as by the industry itself.

Our governments, both federal and provincial, have helped the industry in certain ways, such as a bounty on the building of vessels, rebate on salt, building fishing stages, etc. While these are good measures, this assistance is not enough if we are to be the great supplier of salted fish that we were in past years. If we are to regain these markets and re-establish ourselves in foreign markets the industry will need a tremendous push, the expenditure of large sums of money, much more equipment purchased and greater assistance given to the fishermen as an incentive to induce men to return to the fishing boats.

Newfoundland is finding it increasingly more difficult to retain her foreign markets and can have very little hope of gaining new markets without definite action being taken by the federal government to counterbalance and reduce to a minimum the difference between foreign fishermen and the fishermen of Newfoundland. Above all we need a fleet of our own vessels to carry our fish to foreign markets so that we can make all the money possible out of our own product, and to make sure that all the returns go to Canadians to be put into circulation in Canada.

I was very pleased to hear the statement made this morning by the Minister of Transport regarding assistance to the builders and operators of Canadian vessels. I hope it meets with every success, especially in our fishing industry.

In my opinion the salt fish industry still remains the main productive resource of our island home and should play a major role in the raising and maintaining of our economy at a high level. If we get the action, incentive and assistance required from all concerned, then the salt fish industry will have a bright future and will contribute to the growth of our island.

The salt fish industry still means very much to Newfoundland and to Newfoundland's economy and it will continue to play a vital part in our way of life. But its future will depend upon the action, interest and assistance of our governments, both federal and provincial, and a new outlook by the industry. The governments and the industry should act now, without delay, because time is short.

I am sure that all concerned were glad to learn that the government has earmarked $150,000 to continue assistance to the fisheries of British Columbia. The fishermen, I understand, will be paid 12 cents a pound for dogfish liver delivered to oil plants and collecting stations. I believe this grant was forgotten by the hon. members from Vancouver.

No mention was made of assistance to our east coast fishermen in a similar manner, but the dogfish is a continual source of trouble to the fishermen on the east coast, as it is to the British Columbia fishermen. For this reason I suggest that the same benefit should be extended to east coast fishermen.

The 12 mile fishing limit for fishing rights has been in the limelight again recently. To we Canadians, to the Atlantic provinces and especially to those in the province of Newfoundland, this 12 mile limit means very much. It means the difference between a sagging economy and a bolstered economy for our province. It means the difference between a small share of the wealth, and practically the wealth itself that abounds in these waters around our shores within that 12 mile fishing limit. This is wealth which rightly and justly belongs to the people of Canada, the people of the Atlantic provinces, and in particular the people of Newfoundland, who have depended upon it for their livelihood for hundreds of years.

What is happening today, and what is taking place within that 12 mile limit? Fishermen from foreign countries, from Norway, Portugal, Russia, Spain, Sweden and other lands with their up to date ships equipped with the latest mechanical equipment are fishing our waters inside that 12 mile limit, taking the wealth out of our waters, taking from our fishermen, from our people, their means of livelihood, destroying our fishing industry and leaving the crumbs for our own fishermen with their small and limited ships which do not have the advantage of mechanical devices or modern methods.

What have we done about this? What has the government of Canada done about it? What does it intend to do to protect the God-given rights of our Canadian fishermen? Are we as Canadians, is the government of Canada, going to stand idly by and see our wealth being taken from us, our fishermen being deprived of their livelihood, our fishing grounds being used by foreign countries and our own fishermen struggling for a living against the tremendous competition provided by the foreign countries, while doing little or nothing about it?

It is up to any government of Canada, Liberal or Progressive Conservative, to see that our fishermen are given at least the same rights as those enjoyed by foreign trawlers. We were interested and glad to hear the Minister of Fisheries say on May 2 as recorded in Hansard at page 4254:

> I want to assure the house that no avenue will be left unexplored, no stone unturned, in order to secure action which will result in greater benefits for Canadian fishermen in the waters adjacent to our own coasts.

Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of our own rights as opposed to foreign trawlers which very often violate those rights, rebuff our courtesy and disregard the need for conservation.

The national Liberal rally held in Ottawa last January recommended to the national council of the national Liberal federation as follows, and I quote from page 10 of the report of the rally:

> We need a program for the stimulation of the fishing industry by increased assistance in the procurement of modern vesels and gear and by research in processing and marketing and in the promotion of expanded export markets. The 12 mile offshore fishing limit for foreign vessels should be established.

Recently two Nova Scotia fishing captains were summoned to appear in magistrate's court in St. John's, Newfoundland by the federal Department of Fisheries charged with operating within the three mile limit in Newfoundland waters. Yet foreign trawlers can come to our shores and legally fish to the three mile limit. This does not add up, and was never understood by the average Canadian citizen. We are glad to see that this situation has now changed and Canadian draggers can now fish to the three mile limit. I consider it is high time that this government gave further heed to the territorial rights of Canada and to the rights of her fishermen and took whatever action is necessary to see that Canadians have the assurance that their treasured possessions will be safeguarded through the exclusive right to fish within the 12 mile fishing zone. As I have already made clear by the quotation I gave, the Liberal party recognizes the need for a 12 mile limit to be enforced.

At the present time the seal fishing industry in Newfoundland is almost a thing of the past, and as a result of the returns from the hunt this spring, I doubt if any Canadian ships will take part in next year's seal hunt.

At one time, more than 400 vessels manned by some 14,000 Newfoundland sealers operated in Newfoundland and brought to port as many as 680,000 pelts in one season. This meant an annual expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars each year, and created much employment all the year round. Last year's catch had a value of less than $25,000.

This spring there were four vessels from Newfoundland and one from Halifax, manned by approximately 300 men seal hunting off the northeast coast of Newfoundland. The hunt was practically a failure, due primarily to ice conditions, and I would suggest that the minister give consideration to subsidizing the ship owners and the sealers.

Several requests for assistance were made by myself, by the owners, and by the captains of the ships who took part in the seal hunt this year to the minister responsible for the Department of Transport.

Mr. Winch: In view of what happened last year and this year, is the hon. member in favour of an international agreement on conservation?

Mr. Tucker: Most definitely. In spite of what I have said about the failure of the hunt as far as the Canadian seal hunters were concerned, the Norwegians have been sealing off our coast for more than 30 years and seem to make a profitable venture out of it. This year about 15 Norwegian ships operated off the northeast coast of Newfoundland. This spring, much to their surprise and regret, Newfoundland sealers found that in addition to the Norwegians they had another competitor in the seal hunt, a 7,000 ton Soviet icebreaker capable of cutting quickly through the massive ice floes which the Canadian vessels were unable to penetrate. The Russian ship was equipped with two helicopters which were used to scout for seals and then to transport the sealers to and from the patches of seals. The presence of this ship has discouraged our seal hunters and it is feared that if Russia continues to participate in the annual seal hunt off Newfoundland in ships similar to the one in operation this year, the Canadian sealing industry will become extinct.

The Department of Fisheries is well aware of the diminution of our seal fishery and the time has come—indeed, it is long past—for the department to take active steps to secure international agreement so that this industry may be preserved by putting a closed season on certain seals and limiting the number of seals to be taken each year. Those interested in the seal fishery were glad to learn that all sealing operations ended on May 5 of this year. The season for seal hunting opens on March 5 in the gulf area and on March 10 off the northeast coast of Newfoundland. Until this year there was no official closing date. An agreement was made this year between Norway and Canada as a result of which, next year, I understand, the season will close on April 30.

> I might add that this item is on the agenda for the next meeting of ICNAF, the international commission for the northwest Atlantic fisheries. I should also add that it has been observed this year for the first time that a Russian vessel has been sealing in the international waters off the east coast of Canada. Communications have been sent to the government of the U.S.S.R. requesting that they require their nationals to adhere to the general regulations.

I should like to quote again from the Liberal rally report, at page 10-NS-2, where the following statement is found:

> An effective program for the conservation of seals in Canada is required.

In closing I wish to thank the minister, and say that I believe he is a very sincere man. I thank him, as well as his officials, for the many courtesies extended to me from time to time. It is my opinion that the minister has a staff of competent officials who are well aware of the many problems that exist in the fishing industry, and I hope that they will see that this important industry is given every protection, in order that our fishermen will receive all the benefits possible from that industry.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? I did not want to interrupt him when he was speaking. The hon. member dealt at great length with Liberal policy regarding the extension of the territorial limit to 12 miles. Is it also the policy of the Liberal party to enforce this 12 mile limit unilaterally?

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I understand this can be done by agreement.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be brief, but I could hardly allow to go unchallenged the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver East regarding the attitude of this government toward the very important primary industry of fisheries. We all know that much has been accomplished, and that the qualities of the Minister of Fisheries will ensure that the problems of this very responsible group of fishermen in Canada will be brought forward and presented to his colleagues in the cabinet.

As an example of the progressiveness which has marked that department I should mention the fine new laboratory currently being erected at Halifax, and compliment the minister and his department for placing it there. The architecture of this new building is such that it will fit well into the complex of buildings in that particular section of the city of Halifax.

I should now like to mention a problem which is perhaps incapable of solution, although I hope it is not. The problem to which I refer results from a great deal of ice from the mouth of the St. Lawrence river drifting down to the coast of the maritimes causing considerable discomfort to the fishermen there. I am sure the minister is aware of this particular problem, as he announced just a day or two ago that the lobster fishing season in certain parts of the maritimes was postponed. Unfortunately, in the area in which I am most interested, from Clam bay along the southeastern coast of Nova Scotia to Canso, the reason has been opened on time. In some parts of that area this ice has presented little or no problem to the fishermen and they were able to place their traps and fish lobsters in the normal way. However, in other sections the ice has indeed presented a problem to the fishermen and has prevented some of them from fishing at all. In some cases the ice has destroyed the equipment of the fishermen. I have a report compiled by a number of my friends in that area regarding the losses of fishing gear. In the areas of Little Harbour, Ship Harbour, and the Tangier and Murphy cove areas, approximately 40 men have lost 25 per cent to 100 per cent of their lobster gear, and there have been additional losses in areas nearby. I do not have the complete statistics as yet, but I will be making a visit there next week, and will be in a position then to bring details, as to the losses suffered there to the attention of the minister and his officials.

I realize that the fishermen do have an insurance fund which replaced the old fund of emergency hand-outs in cases of disaster, but some of the fishermen will perhaps be debarred from collecting under this fund because they were not insured. Since the community as a whole has been affected by these losses I hope the minister will be able to devise some formula of aid for these fishermen. Perhaps a partial solution could be found in the extension of the lobster fishing season which would alleviate the loss of profits to a certain extent, but would do nothing in the way of replacing the lost gear.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could be allowed to go a little afield of the subject for a moment or two, to relate an incident showing the qualities of the inhabitants of that area of Nova Scotia. They are very rugged individualists there. One week ago on Sunday, two fishermen accomplished a rather minor miracle in that they were able to provide a service to the United States which our own search and rescue team was unable to provide. A United States navy man became ill at the United States navigational aid installation at Hardwood island, which is about a mile from Sheet Harbour passage.

Mr. Benidickson: How far is that away from a Canadian city such as Yarmouth?

Mr. McCleave: Sheet Harbour passage is in the riding of Halifax, which is in Canada.

On the day in question there was a wind blowing up to 45 miles an hour, and a very dense snowstorm prevailed. An urgent request for medical aid was received from the United States navigational aid installation at Hardwood island, and search and rescue were unable to answer it because of prevailing conditions. Two fishermen, David and Stanford Levy, of a somewhat picturesque place named Sober Harbour, with the help of sergeant Murray Cottell, of the R.C.M.P., conveyed Dr. Dennis Lahey to Hardwood island. When they reached the island they were marooned for six hours, unable to make the return trip. In order to make this trip they had to go two at a time secured by ropes in the dories. While the story amply shows the heroism and courage of these two fishermen and the mounted police officer, it had an unfortunate ending in that the individual who was ill had died before he could be brought to shore. This fact was unknown to the men when they made this perilous journey to Hardwood island.

I have related this story to indicate the quality and ruggedness of these two fishermen, who are of a type that can be found up and down the coast in that part of Nova Scotia.

In regard to the problem I mentioned at the outset, I hope the minister will be able to devise some formula to provide assistance to these fishermen.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to express my thanks to the minister and his assistants, to his departmental officials from the deputy minister down, for the kind and sympathetic consideration which I have always received in connection with any problems which I have brought to their attention, and for their willingness and cooperation, which have always been forthcoming in an effort to find a satisfactory solution to the problems presented to them. In particular, I should like to express my gratitude once again to the minister and his assistants for the efforts put forth this winter in connection with the encroachment by foreign draggers on our inshore fishing grounds.

Last night the minister gave us a most interesting account of the activities of his department during the past year. He indicated where progress had been made and he pointed out some encouraging signs for the future. Those of us who represent ridings in Newfoundland will welcome the provision of the two new boats which the minister mentioned, the patrol boat Cape Freels and the new refrigerated vessel to replace the old Arctica, and also the training courses for fishermen.

I would not wish to detract in any way from what the government has done and intends to do in the future, nor to deny them credit for things they do. Yet, in spite of all that has been accomplished in the past, there still remain some very harsh and unpleasant facts to be faced.

The fisheries constitute one of our most valuable sources of natural wealth, a natural resource all the more precious because it is self-perpetuating. With proper management it could yield a harvest of wealth which could be reaped year after year and still this great source of wealth could be passed on from generation to generation without being diminished or impaired. Furthermore, the fishing industry constitutes one of the best sources, and one of the main sources, of concentrated protein food in a hungry world, a world in which two thirds of the people go to bed hungry every night, without sufficient food to maintain normal health and growth. In the face of these two facts one would naturally expect the fishing industry to be prosperous.

Last night the minister referred to the higher prices that were received for salt cod during the past year, and particularly the higher prices in Newfoundland. That of course is true but it is not generally true. It is true for a few trap fishermen, but those high prices were not generally distributed among the fishermen as a body. The stern reality is that our fishing industry, particularly in the Atlantic provinces, is anything but prosperous. This was borne out by the figures placed on record last night by my hon. friend from Gloucester which can be found at pages 4702 and 4703 of Hansard. At that time he pointed out that in the years from 1945 to 1950 the fishermen of the maritime provinces received an average price of about 3½ cents a pound. At the same time the Newfoundland fishermen received an average price of 2.19 cents a pound. In the year 1957, those prices were still practically unchanged. In 1960, the prices were 2.57 cents a pound in New Brunswick, 3.45 cents a pound in Nova Scotia, and 2.63 cents a pound in Newfoundland. These figures prove beyond doubt that the returns to fishermen have not kept pace with returns from other industries; neither have they kept pace with the increase in the cost of living.

In my own province there is not much competition for the fishermen's fish. Somehow or other the various fish plants seem to arrive at the same price to the fishermen. The only protection the fisherman has against what looks like agreed prices is the opportunity to deny his fish to the fresh fish plant, but he can do that only if he has an alternative method of disposing of it. The alternative method, of course, is to salt his fish and dispose of it in the salt fish market. Last year, as the minister pointed out, the salt fish market was good and that benefited not only the salt fish fishermen but also those fishermen who sold their fish fresh.

In my own province of Newfoundland fishing is one of the three main props of our provincial economy, the other two being the production of paper and mining. While fishing is the most important from the standpoint of the number of people depending upon it for a livelihood—and I think my hon. friend from Trinity-Conception pointed out that 22,000 people were engaged directly in the catching of fish—yet the fishing industry in Newfoundland is the least prosperous of all. Our people forsake it when other work can be found, and they return to it when no other means of a livelihood is available. In my own riding it is the only means of livelihood for about 90 per cent of my constituents.

In view of the technological revolution that is now taking place in our Canadian economy, it must be expected that for the next 10 to 15 years those whose age and educational levels preclude them from being retrained and acquiring industrial skills will have no choice but to fall back on the fishing industry as a means of livelihood.

It is true that expansion of the fresh fish industry in Newfoundland has filled the gap left by the disappearance of the old banking fleet of sailing ships. Those plants have given a new lease of life to communities like Grand Bank, Fortune, Burin, Burgeo and Harbour Breton, which otherwise would have become ghost towns. Where these plants have been established the people have enjoyed relative prosperity but I should like to emphasize the word "relative" because the prosperity is relative only in comparison with communities which do not have fish plants. It is not relative in comparison with other industries either in Newfoundland or in other parts of Canada.

In my own province the best that can be said for the fishing industry is that it is holding its own. In many cases it is not doing that. The inshore fishery has not improved much in the past 12 years. It is true that the fisherman's lot has been improved to some extent but this improvement has come about mainly through the enjoyment of social security benefits which became available when Newfoundland became a part of Canada. The improvement has not resulted to any significant degree from increased earnings from the fishery.

This is not to say that nothing has been done. On the contrary, a great deal has been done both provincially and federally. The minister mentioned last night the improvement in the bait service and the provision of portable bait holding units and community stages. My colleague, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, referred to the small loans for fishermen and the hon. member for Gloucester mentioned the subsidies for fishing vessels. To these I think we can add the salt rebate, fishermen's insurance and other forms of federal assistance. On the provincial level we can mention bounties, loans to fishermen, loans to fish companies for plants and draggers and for modernization of equipment. In spite of all this assistance, which on the provincial level has been considerable in my province and possibly greater proportionately than that provided by any other province, the desired results have not been obtained. In my opinion the results that have been obtained have not been commensurate with the assistance given.

We may very well ask ourselves two questions. In view of this assistance, why is it that the fishermen have not benefited to any appreciable extent? Second, what additional forms of assistance are required and how much if we are to put the fishing industry on a proper economic basis? These are two very important questions which can only be answered on the basis of facts. The facts can only be obtained by a special fact-finding body set up for the purpose and armed with the necessary authority to get the information required. Since the fishing industry overlaps provincial boundaries, a body of this kind should, of course, be set up by the federal government.

As to the first question, why have we not obtained the results we anticipated from this assistance, though I am not in a position to quote facts I have been a close observer of the fishing industry in my own province and particularly in my own riding for the past 12 years. As a result of my observations I have formed some ideas and conclusions which, for what they are worth, I should like to put before the committee today.

In my opinion one of the main reasons why we have not achieved the desired results from all this assistance is the lack of an over-all, integrated program. I am not mentioning this by way of criticism directed at the minister or the government. I am stating a fact which I think has prevailed over a number of years. What we have done for the fisherman through all these various forms of assistance that I have mentioned seems to have been done on an ad hoc basis. These measures have not been the expression of an over-all policy.

The minister himself mentioned one or two good examples of that last night. He referred to the community stages. We have heard pleas today for the community stage program to be continued. Yet the minister told us last night that the program was one of 20 stages and as the 20 stages are completed that is the end of it. To what were these 20 stages related? I cannot see that this particular program of community stages has any part in any over-all program. It is something that grew up like Topsy. It fitted in as a type of winter works program. It was limited to 20 and now it is being cut off.

If the community stage program is a good thing and has a part to play in the development of our fishing industry, why should we stop it? Certainly it is one of the most important things that we need, and the very fact that it is being cut off proves my point that it is not related to any particular over-all program. Community stages are important for two reasons. They not only lower the cost of production but improve the quality of the fish. Instead of the fish being handled in many little buildings around a harbour it is brought to one place where it can be washed clean and sanitary conditions can be maintained. They also provide the fisherman with an alternative in disposing of his fish because where there is a community stage the fisherman has a choice of selling his fish fresh or salting it. If there is no community stage he is at the mercy of whoever wants to buy his fish because he has to dispose of it at the only outlet available. The community stage program is a vital part of our fishery development program and I join with others in urging the minister to have it continued.

Another example one can cite is the salt rebate. This is a program whereby the fisherman gets a rebate of 50 per cent of what he spends on salt. Obviously the more salt he uses the more money he is going to collect by way of rebate. This encourages fishermen to produce heavy salted fish but in these times the market for heavy salted fish is poor while the market for light salted fish is good. We cannot supply the demand in Europe for Spanish cured and Italian cured fish and yet we have no program to encourage people to produce that kind of fish. On the other hand, we are encouraging them to produce a kind of fish which the market cannot absorb at the present time.

I think another reason why this program has failed is that the various provinces have had their programs and the federal government has had a separate program and if any effort has been made to integrate them it certainly has not been very successful. A good example of that is the portable bait holding units. As the minister told us last night, we have provided these at the rate of eight or ten a year. In Newfoundland alone we need at least 50. I think we could take care of most of our needs with 50 or possibly up to 75 but no more than that. Why should we have to dole these out at the rate of eight or nine a year and spread the small cost over a period of eight or ten years? They only cost about $5,000 or $6,000 per unit and if we had a program of 50 units for one year the cost would not be exorbitant and such a program would do much to establish our fishing industry on a sound basis.

Another reason, in my opinion, is that we have departmentalized our fishing industry within the boundaries of the various provinces. By doing this we have conformed to a clash of interests within the industry as between one province and another. The hon. member for Trinity-Conception cited the case of NAFEL, as did the hon. member for St. John's East. NAFEL, the Newfoundland association of fish exporters limited, came into being to deal with a situation under which we had to sell our fish to a central buying agency. Individual sellers were at a disadvantage in having to sell to that kind of agency. There were some undesirable features in NAFEL, I readily admit, and I hold no brief at all for that organization. I do not think it was as aggressive as it might have been, but it certainly filled a need and the undesirable features could have been changed. It did not suit our friends on the mainland at that particular time, and they were out for NAFEL's scalp.

Eventually, the exclusive right of NAFEL was removed. Now we have the reverse situation because of that and because of the developments that have taken place in Cuba, whereby we are at a disadvantage again in marketing our fish to a centralized buying agency. The very people who wanted to kill NAFEL have now realized the benefit of it and would like to have it back. The point is not whether or not we have NAFEL back. The point is that we should have some organization to market our fish in a situation where we have to deal with centralized buying agencies.

In spite of all the assistance we have given to the fishing industry it has been so ineffective that foreign draggers can come all the way from Europe and fish on our very doorstep, producing fish more cheaply than we can and underselling us in the markets of the world. This morning the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador listed the problems of the fishing industry under three headings, production, processing and marketing. I would add two more headings to those, conservation and research. While it is convenient to separate our problems under various headings, this tends toward oversimplification because all these problems are interrelated and overlap each other. For example, the problems of production overlap the problems of conservation. The problems of processing overlap the problems of marketing.

My time is running out and I shall have to limit my remarks primarily to the problems of production. The fishing industry in my province is hampered by production costs. One of the most important factors in that cost of production is the cost of living. Also the cost of our Canadian ships, the cost of their construction, maintenance and operation, is much higher than similar costs for the same kind of ships and equipment from foreign countries. The Canada Shipping Act regulations impose standards from which foreign draggers are exempt, and these add to the cost of operation of Canadian companies.

If we are going to assist the fishing industry by means of a bounty or subsidy, the size of the subsidy should be related to this differential between the cost of construction, operation and maintenance of vessels in Canada and the cost to our foreign competitors.

In addition, there is the cost of nets, twine, gear, processing machinery and fuel for the operation of motors. In this connection, the tariffs imposed on these items greatly increase our costs of production. I want to support the recommendations which the fisheries council made to the Minister of Finance to remove these burdens. We have done this for other industries. We have done it for the farm industry and, in some cases, for the logging industry. However, for some unaccountable reason we are reluctant to give the fishing industry the same kind of treatment we have given to other industries.

I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I have a few more items to mention. However, I feel this is a very good time for me to stop and perhaps I shall have another opportunity later.

The Chairman: Order; it being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Progress reported.

COMPANY DIRECTORS

BOARDS OF FEDERAL COMPANIES TO HAVE MAJORITY OF CANADIANS

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-26, respecting company directors (directors' qualifications).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill as given in the explanatory note is to require that all companies created by the parliament of Canada be managed by a majority of directors who are either Canadians or Canadian residents. When this bill was first introduced two sessions ago, the requirements of the bill were a great deal stiffer in that they called for directors who were Canadians. Hon. members will see, therefore, that this bill is not now as strict or as limited in its provisions as the one which was first introduced. Undoubtedly, other changes will be required. What I propose to do today, Mr. Speaker, is to give the reasons why I think this bill is both timely and urgent and to point out two areas in which it might be modified. I would suggest also to the house that if it meets with the approval of the house it might well be read a second time and then referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

I feel, for instance, it might be an advantage if the wording were changed to indicate that the majority of directors must be resident in Canada and that the majority of this majority must be outside directors; that is, directors who are not employees of the company. They could well have a financial interest in the company but would not directly be executives of the company concerned.

Another change which was suggested has to do with international, non-profit organizations such as governmental organizations. Hon. members will recall that recently the house approved a bill to incorporate the international brain research organization. Like other such international non-governmental organizations, the I.B.R.O. visualizes a governing board with directors from many countries.

A member of the press gallery has written an interesting doctoral dissertation entitled "Facilitation Problems of International Associations" in which he suggests Canada should do more to attract these organizations. I understand that currently the budgets of these organizations, as listed in the year book of international organizations, amounts to some $306 million. In addition, the total budgets of the intergovernmental organizations come to some $415 million. It will therefore be seen that the combined budgets of the international non-governmental organizations are actually bigger than those of the intergovernmental organizations.

At present Canada is host to very few of these organizations, though I might mention the international air transport association and, of course, the I.B.R.O. Naturally such organizations could not possibly be constituted with a majority of the board of directors being resident in Canada as these directors will be drawn from all over the world.

I should like to quote from an address given by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) at Dartmouth college on September 7, 1958. The Prime Minister said:

> There is an intangible sense of disquiet in Canada over the political implications of large-scale and continuing external ownership and control of Canadian industries . . . Canadians do not wish to have their economic, any more than their political, affairs determined outside Canada.

I have heard many hon. members on the treasury benches make statements in speeches which are very similar to this and which I believe echo the concern of the Canadian people. In a booklet "Foreign Investment in Canada" by J. M. Smith, published by the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, on page 11 is found a table entitled "Non-resident and United States ownership and control in selected industries, 1954".

This information is taken from the Canadian-United States economic relations committee, page 104, which was a study prepared for the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. This table shows that the percentage of industry controlled outside of this country in automobiles and parts is 95 per cent; in the rubber industry, 93 per cent; in electrical apparatus, 78 per cent; in chemicals, 75 per cent; in the petroleum industry, 70 per cent; in other mining, 57 per cent; pulp and paper, 56 per cent; smelting and refining of non-ferrous native ores, 55 per cent.

As hon. members know, the royal commission brought down its findings several years ago. This pamphlet goes on to state that the control and ownership, particularly in the petroleum industry, is undoubtedly much higher now than the figures given here.

In general, Mr. Speaker, one might say that we in Canada own and control the non-industrial spheres. We own the roads, hospitals, public buildings, houses and farms, but in our manufacturing industries and resource development industries we are at the best a very small minority participant.

This booklet refers to recommendations made by the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects and I should like to refer to these. They can be found on page 393 of the final report, where the commission, in discussing foreign investment in Canada, had three recommendations to make. Before making these recommendations they set out that it is important that Canada should not discourage foreign capital by unfair, discriminatory action and that the free movement of interest and dividends to foreign investors should not be interfered with by currency restrictions. I quote from page 393:

> We believe Canadians should have more tangible assurance than they now have that the people who are responsible for the management of such foreign-owned concerns will, whenever reasonably possible, make decisions that are in the best interests of Canada; that such concerns in effect become more "Canadian" in outlook. We do not suggest by this the development of a narrow nationalistic outlook; nor that the concerns in question should be restricted in their access to their parent companies and to all the benefits and advantages they obtain as a result. The following specific suggestions respecting desirable objectives for the operations of such foreign-owned concerns would not have these effects; we believe they would be of benefit to all concerned.

Then the commission makes the following recommendations:

> (1) wherever possible, such concerns should employ Canadians in senior management and technical positions, should retain Canadian engineering and other professional and service personnel, and should do their purchasing of supplies, materials and equipment in this country;
> (2) they should publish their financial statements and make full disclosure of the results of their Canadian operations;
> (3) they should include on their boards of directors a number of independent Canadians and they should sell an appreciable interest in their equity stock to Canadians.

The purpose of this bill has to do with one half of the commission's third recommendation. I have had other bills on the order paper. I had one bill on the order paper in regard to financial statements. I am pleased to say that the government has taken it up in the form of a government bill which is a much better bill than the one I proposed. I sincerely hope this particular bill will commend itself to this government.

Mr. Benidickson: Is the other bill going ahead this session?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and ask that the house be physically counted for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is a quorum. I ask that the count not include hon. members coming in from behind the curtain.

I raised my point of order, sir, because at the moment I counted there were only 19 hon. members in the chamber. One or two have come in since.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member made a mistake. I distinctly thought there were 21 hon. members present.

Mr. Winch: I counted 19, but some have come in since.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There appears to be no deficiency in the quorum at the present time.

Mr. Broome: The royal commission went on, on page 394, to deal—

Mr. Benidickson: Before the hon. member proceeds, may I comment on the fact that he made reference to the government bill and said he felt it was in some respects superior to his own bill. I wonder if the hon. member could inform the house whether or not the government bill with respect to the disclosure of financial status and so on will be proceeded with this session, because that might have some influence on our judgment with regard to the measure now under consideration.

Mr. Broome: I do not see that that matter is at all relevant. The fact that it is on the order paper is good enough for me.

Referring particularly to the third recommendation of the royal commission, the final report goes on to say, as reported on page 394:

> The third objective is that Canadian subsidiaries of foreign companies—particularly the larger, well established ones—should sell some part of their equity stock to Canadians and include a number of independent Canadians on their boards of directors. A number of companies have adopted this policy and have said that it has worked out well and to their advantage. Certainly we see no reason why, if the Canadians selected as directors were able and conscientious men, the adoption of such a policy would not work out to everyone's advantage. In addition to the fact that the public would have some assurance that broad Canadian interest would not be lost sight of in the everyday discussion and decision of company policies, the companies in question would be better informed of Canadian views and attitudes. Both in the case of long range company planning and in decisions concerning day-to-day operations, such Canadian directors would not be likely to forget the broader interests of the nation.

Then the commission went on to say, as recorded on page 395:

The proposal that Canadian subsidiaries of foreign companies should appoint independent Canadians to their boards of directors and sell stock to Canadians is, of course, not a new one. But fewer companies than one might have expected have done anything about it. It seems to us that on the whole those Canadian subsidiaries of foreign companies which have adopted the policies we are suggesting have made a greater contribution to the Canadian economy in many ways than others that have not such policies. Those that have done so appear to be more interested and aggressive in developing their Canadian operations and to be more aware of Canadian problems and viewpoints. There is no way in which we can prove this general proposition scientifically—but it is a definite impression we have gained as a result of our travels, hearings and discussions.

Mr. McGee: Would the hon. member mind repeating the source from which he has just been reading?

Mr. Broome: I was reading from the final report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects.

Mr. Benidickson: Surely the Secretary of State is not leaving?

Mr. Broome: I should like, in setting out this ground work, to refer to an address by Mr. R. M. Fowler, president of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, at the annual luncheon of the association in Montreal on January 27, 1961 in the course of which he discussed Canadian-United States relations. He had this to say as reported on the last page of his speech under the heading "The Basic Philosophy":

In the current debate about the extensive investment by Americans in Canadian industry, the problem is usually broken down into a number of separate issues. It is suggested that financial statements should be published, that Canadians should have a chance to buy shares, that more Canadians should be employed in senior positions and more research should be done in this country. No doubt all these steps have some value in themselves, but in my opinion all could be taken by a company and the problem would remain unsolved. A subsidiary can sell stock to Canadians, can have Canadian personnel throughout, can give generously to charity and so on, but if most of the decisions are made back in the home office by men whose interest in the Canadian operation is not greater than, and often less than, their interest in a dozen similar operations throughout the world then that subsidiary is not being a fully Canadian corporate citizen. The first essential is de-centralized, autonomous Canadian management in the subsidiary.

I suggest that the views of a man with the international reputation of Mr. Fowler are well deserving of attention.

Again, in a speech to a seminar on Canada-United States relations at the university of British Columbia, Dr. John Davis, director of research for the British Columbia Electric Company, gave food for thought when he said that over half the profits of Canadian industry belong to non-residents, mostly Americans. That has nothing to do with the present bill, but Dr. Davis did go on to mention several complaints, one of which was the failure of United States subsidiary companies to appoint outside directors. He felt that Canadian industry could not operate and take its proper place in the economic life of this country unless there was a measure of control in the form of outside directors who could give to the parent company proper information and proper ideas as to how the operation of their companies could best be carried on in Canada.

I would refer also to the declaration of policy by the Canadian chamber of commerce for 1960 and 1961 as reported on page 39 where the following statement is made:

The Canadian chamber of commerce recognizes that a high rate of non-resident, long term, investment in Canada is essential to the continued development of our country's resource and manufacturing industries. However, it is concerned as to whether the non-resident owners are familiar, in all cases, with the principles underlying the Canadian point of view and thereby overlook or disregard legitimate Canadian interests.

Then follows the recommendation:

The Canadian chamber of commerce strongly suggests to the federal government, provincial chambers and non-resident owned businesses operating in Canada that it would be in the best interest of such companies to place or list their stock on the various Canadian stock exchanges, include independent Canadians on their boards of directors, employ Canadian citizens wherever possible, especially in managerial and technical positions; purchase their equipment, material and supplies locally when it is economical to do so, and publish separate financial statements on their Canadian operations.

A review by the Empire Trust Company of New York with regard to American capital and Canadian management, in queries to major United States corporations operating in this country found that those companies which had the most successful operation in general were the best citizens as far as the employment of Canadians, the appointment of Canadians on boards of directors, the publishing of financial statements and so on were concerned.

Perhaps the most recent publication is that put out by the Canadian-American committee and sponsored by the National Planning Association of the United States and by the Private Planning Association of Canada. This booklet is entitled "Policies and Practices of United States subsidiaries in Canada." The authors of this booklet are Mr. John Lindeman and Professor Donald Armstrong. The former has had wide experience in the field of international economic affairs with the United States government and as a private economic consultant. He is the author of earlier studies on United States business performance abroad, published by the National Planning Association, and he is currently a partner in International Economic Consultants, Inc. in Washington, D.C. Professor Armstrong has had broad experience as an economic consultant in Canada and has recently been appointed director of the school of commerce at McGill University in Montreal.

At page 6 of this report the following statement appears:

> In the preparation of the report the staff has benefited greatly from the advice and collaboration of a large number of Canadians and Americans in many different organizations.

Chapter 4 of this book entitled "Canadianization of Personnel" deals with the subject matter of this bill. I will not read all the details found in that chapter but will refer only to the conclusion. The paragraph contained in the conclusions section deals with the suggestion that at professional and technical levels Canadians are discriminated against. That paragraph reads as follows:

> At the professional and technical levels Canadians already have an employment advantage over non-Canadians.

It shows that the record of subsidiaries in this regard is a very fine one. The paragraph includes the following statement:

> A case might be made, however, for transferring to Canada some of the technical and professional tasks now being performed by the parent in the United States on behalf of the subsidiaries.

This statement refers, of course, to work in the field of research. It also is suggested in these conclusions that of the companies considered it was found that in many cases the nominally titled president was a resident of Canada while the actual executive direction in respect of all routine matters came from United States headquarters of the parent company, and from individuals who held no titles at all in the Canadian subsidiary.

It is also pointed out that the degree of Canadianism of a company is dependent upon the strength of the executive team. If there is a strong executive team at the head of the company the company will be more Canadian than a company with a weak executive team at the head. It points out that if a parent company wants to make all of the decisions, almost invariably that company has a weak executive team.

In the conclusions at page 39 the following statement appears:

> With respect to executive positions, there is a discernible preference for Canadians to fill the jobs available in Canada. The degree of Canadianization of such jobs is probably much greater than the meagre statistics on this point would indicate. However, titles and the nationality of the officer holder have little meaning in themselves. The important thing is the amount of authority that goes along with the office. On this point the interviews showed considerable variation among the companies, a variation which apparently reflects home office attitudes that cannot be changed simply by replacing U.S. executives in Canada with Canadians.
> As was the case with companies with Canadian equity participation in ownership, it was found that decision-making authority tends to be greater in Canada among the subsidiaries with outside Canadian directors. This is not surprising, because most of the companies with Canadian equity participation in ownership also have outside Canadian directors, and most companies with outside Canadian directors also have Canadian equity participation. Whether outside Canadian directors will necessarily and automatically produce more autonomy for the Canadian subsidiaries is perhaps an open question. Much will depend on the strength of the men selected. But it is at least possible to assert that companies which give their Canadian subsidiaries a relatively high degree of autonomy are more likely than other companies to recognize the business and public relations value of a functioning board of directors with broad Canadian representation.

I think I have proved the case that subsidiaries of foreign companies would find it profitable to have directors who are residents of Canada and that these directors should, in the main, be outside directors who are not employees of the company. It seems to me, in view of the fantastic ownership of our industries, as I have pointed out and supported with tables which I have quoted, that this scale of industrial set up is not to be managed at the level of an annual meeting or luncheon held in New York or some other United States city. Absentee ownership may not interfere with plant functioning, or the efficiency of a plant, but certainly lends itself to a foreign outlook on the part of the companies concerned. The executive of a foreign company is not always a policy making executive, and it is in the field of policy making that it is most important that we set up a financing board and a policy making board which will interpret Canadian aspirations and Canadian conditions for the owners in whatever land they may reside.

It is quite true that the industry in many ways is putting its own house in order, but why should a good company do this when a poor company is allowed to get away without doing it. I suggest in this field it is in our national interest to set minimum qualifications regarding the operation of companies in the same manner as we have set qualifications governing many other spheres of activity. We should also have qualifications governing the policy making sphere because I feel we are entitled in this country to have the industries which are growing here, profiting from the use of our natural resources and profiting from our domestic markets with almost life and death power over the economy of many communities, obliged to appoint as the policy making heads individuals who live in this country and understand the conditions under which the company will operate.

When I introduced this bill I pointed out several areas where this idea might well be modified. However, I suggest the fundamental principle is such that no hon. member in this house can quarrel with it. The fundamental principle is right and just, and I commend it to all hon. members for consideration.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member concludes, I would like to pursue the question I raised earlier. The hon. member said he felt the government's Bill No. C-70, an act to provide for the furnishing of financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of corporations and labour unions carrying on activities within Canada, had merit beyond his own bill. The hon. member in making that statement undoubtedly felt that in considering this bill we would be concerned with the other bill. I should like to ask him if he shares my view, that Bill No. C-70 is in fact a phony bill and will not be proceeded with at this session?

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to my own bill regarding the publication of financial statements. My bill deals only with companies incorporated by act of parliament, and it was worded that way because of the existence of various provincial companies acts. However, Bill No. C-70 represents a different approach to the problem and has reference to all the companies in Canada which properly may be considered public companies but which through a quirk of the law are considered private companies by virtue of the provision of having 50 shareholders or less.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member, I spoke in the debate and gave instances of gigantic corporations in this country such as General Motors, Chrysler Corporation, Heinz, and there are dozens of others, which are classed as private companies in this country, but in their country of origin they are public companies. The characteristic of the parent descends to the child. If the parent is a public company, then the child should be a public company. This is what I said—

Mr. Benidickson: It is a phony.

Mr. Broome: It is not a phony, and I can tell the hon. member that he will certainly find this out. If he goes out on the hustings during the next election campaign he will find that he will not get very far with this kind of philosophy.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I assure you, sir, that I am not interested in a government or an opposition member fighting the next election. I do not very often agree in policy or politics with the hon. member for Vancouver South. Nevertheless, I believe that he should be thanked for his courage in proceeding with the bill before us because I believe it is in complete conformity with what we understood the government of Canada was going to do following the speech from the throne. It has not done it, but he has had the intestinal fortitude to follow through with a private member's bill. I was very sorry that the hon. member had to take half an hour to introduce the bill. I sincerely hope it will not be talked out because it was introduced by a backbencher on the government side of the house who is trying to put forward what we understood to be a principle of the Conservative party enunciated during the election campaign and in the speech from the throne itself.

This bill has only one major purpose in principle. Its purpose is to require that all companies created by the parliament of Canada after this legislation becomes law shall be managed by a majority of directors who are either Canadians or Canadian residents. That is an understandable thing. They must be either Canadians or Canadian residents. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have only one criticism of the bill as far as the explanatory note goes. I take exception to the words "Canadian residents". I wish the hon. member had said "Canadian citizens" because I know of many important companies in Canada—and a great many in British Columbia—the managers of which are Canadian residents but not Canadian citizens.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winch: In a moment. I know of major logging industries in British Columbia, the managers and directors of which have been residents of Canada for 30 years but never Canadian citizens. I think it is very important that these people should be Canadian citizens. The bill of the hon. member refers to "Canadian residents". I feel it is bad for a manager of a company to be a resident of Canada for over 30 years but still remain a citizen of some other country.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member now permit a question?

Mr. Winch: I tell the hon. member I shall be glad to answer any question in a few moments. I say this because I do not want to see the bill talked out. This measure introduced by a private member covers in principle that which was promised in election campaigns and in the throne speech by the Conservatives. I wish to call to your attention, sir, that in the discussion of this important measure introduced by a staunch Conservative every minister who has anything to do with matters of this kind is absent from the House of Commons at this time.

Mr. Benidickson: They walked out after the hon. member started to speak.

Mr. Winch: I want to say that I completely support the principle of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If hon. members wish to carry on private conversations they had better go out in the lobby.

Mr. Winch: That is where they were half an hour ago when only 19 members were in the house. They came in fast then.

I agree in principle with what the hon. member for Vancouver South is trying to do by a private bill, namely to overcome the fallacies and the dereliction of the government in so far as the speech from the throne is concerned. I sincerely hope that the bill will be passed. I do hope that when we reach the committee stage, if we do, the term "Canadian resident" will be changed to "Canadian citizen".

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to discuss the bill in question I propose to put in another form the question I was going to put to the hon. member who preceded me and say that in connection with this question of Canadian residence, I am sure the hon. member would not want to penalize some person who had come to Canada and was in the process of becoming a Canadian citizen.

Mr. Winch: What is the question the hon. member was going to ask?

Mr. McGee: Would the hon. member not agree with me that by making the change he suggested he may be penalizing a person by insisting that he become a Canadian citizen before he could qualify as a director under this legislation? This would in fact be penalizing a person who had come to Canada and was in the process of becoming a citizen but was not yet a citizen.

The hon. member spent a great deal of his time in being out of order, it seems to me, as was the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). I can hardly conceive that discussion of the business of the house and government business is in order in debating a private member's bill.

If the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River wishes to find out such information it seems to me there is a proper place for such comment. The hon. member for Vancouver East made much of the number of members in the house a while ago. In view of the fact that he raised this issue I think I might say that he was the only member of his party in the house at the time. Perhaps he was using this method to point out the errors of some of his colleagues and perhaps I had better leave it at that.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member who introduced this bill. It seems to me he was far too modest in respect to the influence that the discussion of private members' bills on this and other subjects some years ago had on subsequent government policy and government bills. I think he made a most profound impression on the house previously, and inevitably on government policy itself.

The statement is made occasionally when discussions revolve around bills such as this and other measures that by bringing up matters such as this and by pointing to dominant United States ownership of Canadian industries somehow it adds up to anti-Americanism. I think the people who hold this view concerning such matters are exaggerating. The obvious answer—and the answer has been given by other people—is that this is by no means anti-American but by all means pro-Canadian. It seems to me that nothing but good can evolve from discussions that remind us individually and as a nation of the state of affairs in terms of foreign ownership and control, and if no other function is served than to caution us with respect to where these trends are leading us, such discussions perform a very useful function indeed. I was impressed by the statement that the hon. member read from the report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, particularly the fact that it was noted that where firms had already in fact implemented policies in the pattern of their directorates which would qualify under this bill the results have been very beneficial indeed.

There is one aspect of the problem on which I wish the hon. member had perhaps spent a little more time, and I recall this criticism being raised when the bill was first discussed two years ago. I refer to the assertion, and to be fair I must say he did touch on one aspect, that if such a bill became law it would create a class of professional directors or in a sense a group of front men qualifying according to the letter of the law but clearly avoiding the spirit of the law. Certainly this point deserves some attention. This aspect of the problem is perhaps superficial but I think it could and should be answered more clearly.

This bill and other bills and resolutions introduced by the sponsor of this measure focus attention on what has to be the utimate solution, namely, that Canadians are going to have to lose some of their investing conservatism and take a more aggressive interest in purchasing equity stock and participating through measures such as this and others. This is not an easy road and the investing habits of Canadians cannot be expected to change overnight. However, I feel that discussion and debate of matters such as this should be very much encouraged as they will ultimately benefit Canada. I should like to conclude by congratulating the hon. member and by wishing him well with this bill.

Mr. Douglas Jung (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I also take a minute or two of the time of the house to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) on the introduction of this bill. Those of us who know him well, and I consider myself one of such persons, know the study he has put into this subject and into all other subjects on which he speaks, and I am delighted to be able to support the principle of the bill.

Mr. Broome: Say more. Keep that up.

Mr. Jung: I agree with everything the hon. member has said but I think he should have gone further and included in his remarks the desirability of setting up citizenship qualifications for directors of labour unions in Canada. Labour unions, with their very large membership, are comparable in size and activities to industrial corporations, and their activities certainly have a great influence on the Canadian economy. Because the activities of Canadian unions have a direct bearing on the Canadian economy I think that the hon. member for Vancouver South should have included the directors of national labour unions in his bill.

As an example, consideration might have been given to the influence which union officials of another country have in directing strike activities in Canada. All I can say at this time is that if we must have strikes let them at least be directed by Canadians. I say no more because I know I am already imposing on the house and its generosity by introducing a subject outside the scope of the present bill. I simply conclude by saying that I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) when he said that citizenship qualification was a very desirable thing to have in the case of corporations.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) made some reference to the promise in the speech from the throne of a bill similar to that now introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome). The only reference I see in the speech from the throne reads as follows:

> You will be invited to consider means by which to encourage a greater participation by Canadians in the ownership and control of industry and resources in Canada. You will be asked to approve legislation requiring the disclosure of information by business and labour organizations in Canada controlled from outside Canada.

Certainly it is the policy and the declared intention of the government to provide greater opportunities for the control of industry developed in Canada and companies operating in Canada. But the problem before us today and the motives which prompted the hon. member for Vancouver South in bringing this measure before us are found in the natural desire of Canadians to have the greatest possible control of our own assets as they are developed. The problem that arises is to what extent can we control the development of our assets by foreign investors without discouraging the foreign investment that is necessary for the development of the country.

Mr. Regier: Is it necessary?

Mr. Morton: I think that is a matter of opinion. The hon. member speaks as if it is not. I think there is plenty of evidence to show that we have not got sufficient money of our own to develop the country as quickly as it should be developed. I know that the hon. member has the authority of no less a person than the governor of the Bank of Canada who said in a recent speech before the Canadian chamber of commerce:

> ... we are now at one more of the critical crossroads in our history, perhaps the most critical of all, when economic developments and preoccupation with economic doctrines of an earlier year are pushing us down the road that leads to loss of any effective power to be masters in our own household and ultimate absorption in and by another.

I think that expresses the fear of many Canadians at this stage in our development. On the other hand, I have in my hand an article written by Professor James V. Poapst, professor of finance at the university of Toronto, which appeared in the December, 1960, issue of the Canadian magazine known as The Executive. He attempts to answer Mr.

Coyne's statement. The professor does not disagree with the desire and need of Canadians to take control gradually of their own resources and their development but in a very thought-provoking article he does warn us against haste in our nationalistic pride and desire to take over control lest we frighten away the foreign capital that is necessary in the meantime. He points out that discriminatory legislation seriously deters future growth when that growth would require large capital imports to finance it. Then, he goes on to say:

> Let's not panic over foreign investment. If it does in fact create a problem, let's try a positive approach to its solution.

I think perhaps the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South is one for safeguarding this control. Whether or not it is timely, I feel, is a matter that has to be seriously considered. Professor Poapst said this:

> In companies controlled by foreign investors, they decide whether Canadians are to be admitted as shareholders, participate in management, whether the company will undertake research in Canada, what products it will develop, where it will buy and sell, the prices it will charge, whether it will expand or contract. It is foreign control over decisions such as these that creates concern over "loss of autonomy", the greatest cause of concern over foreign investment. We are too sensitive about autonomy, inclined to think that any loss of it is bad. Yet complete autonomy requires economic self-sufficiency. Economic development based on specialization and trade involves the continued reduction of economic autonomy to acquire greater freedom from want. We should not try to avoid all possible reductions in autonomy but, rather, try to avoid any reductions that are not worth while. Canadians have benefited enormously from foreign investment. We lose sight of this when we become concerned with various aspects of autonomy.

Then, he goes on to say:

> How significant is the fact that Canadian equity investors are excluded from many foreign owned companies? It is participation in total disbursements, not participation in distribution of profits alone, that is important. Obviously foreign companies pay wages to and buy goods and services from Canadians. Nor in an era in which about one half of net earnings are paid out in profits taxes can it be said that Canadians do not participate in the profits of foreign companies. Here taxation, which when applied to ourselves is described as punitive, is levied for our benefit. The number of individuals who would benefit directly from access to the shares of more foreign controlled companies is not large. While individuals are the major shareholders in Canada, share investment is narrowly concentrated among them. Institutional investment in shares is quite limited. Access to shares of foreign controlled companies could reduce the supply of equity funds for Canadian controlled companies. Finally, as it is, not all foreign controlled companies exclude Canadian shareholders.

Then, the professor goes on to say:

> When a country commences to discriminate against foreign investors, these investors can be expected to re-assess it as an outlet for further investment. This is not to argue that we must never discriminate against foreign capital.

Then, he says further:

> There have been complaints that foreign companies do not give Canadians sufficient place in management. We lack comprehensive information on the distribution of management in these companies but in the study Canada-U.S. Economic Relations Gordon commission scholars, Irving Brecher and S. S. Reisman, reported on an examination of a sizable number of the larger ones. They found "overwhelming evidence of widespread participation by Canadians in the management of large foreign controlled companies". Also noted was an evolutionary process respecting the nationality of the managements. Foreigners who held senior positions initially tended to be replaced by Canadians as the latter became trained or otherwise acquired sufficient skill to do the job. Is nationality apt to override ability in the choice of management in companies where profits and not chauvinism guides decision-making?

I pointed out this aspect of it, not in opposition to the principle advocated by the hon. member for Vancouver South but because we know that during these days there is great evidence in all countries of a desire to control and benefit from their natural resources. I think perhaps the same situation prevails, to some extent, in the South American countries. Some of them have taken perhaps more stringent legislative steps to control their assets than we have. Perhaps that is why some of them have been slower in their development than we have. Yet, I feel it is timely for us, as Canadians, to examine the control that should be exercised over the development of assets of our country, and the legislative means that could give us that control without discouraging entirely the foreign capital that is desired.

Mr. Winch: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Morton: Yes.

Mr. Winch: Would he allow this bill to come to a vote?

Mr. Morton: Now, the hon. member wants to put the responsibility on me for allowing this measure to come to a vote. I understand there are two or three other members who want to speak on it. In addition, as the hon. member knows, the primary purpose is not the adoption of the bill but the opportunity for private members to express their views so that those views can be considered by the government and others in the country. Then, if we can come to a solution that is satisfactory to all Canadians, legislative steps can be taken. I am afraid if we held snap votes on all these measures we would not come to decisions which would be in the best interests of the country.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the acting house leader would let us know what is to happen tomorrow and perhaps he could tell us something about next week.

Mr. Nowlan: Tomorrow, we will go on with estimates. We will be taking up the estimates of the Department of Transport tomorrow. If we finish those tomorrow, we will then go on with the estimates of the Department of Justice. On Monday and Tuesday, we will be dealing with legislative matters. The first matter to be considered is order No. 4 on today's order paper, an amendment to the Criminal Code in respect of race meetings. I would assume that bill would not take too much time. Following that, we would deal with No. 6 on today's order paper, the setting up of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping.

Having concluded the debate on that, we will take up item No. 8 on today's order paper concerning the Freight Rates Reduction Act. Having concluded that, we will then take up item No. 5 on today's order paper, the introduction of a measure to amend the Canadian National Railways Act with regard to the board of directors. If we conclude all of this before Tuesday evening, which I hope we will, we will then proceed with resolutions Nos. 9 and 10 on today's order paper. On Wednesday—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would just indicate the names of those because the order numbers would not be the same next week.

Mr. Nowlan: Order No. 9 is the resolution with respect to the Farm Improvement Loans Act in the name of the Minister of Finance and No. 10 is the resolution respecting the War Veterans Allowance Act in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

On Wednesday, we will return to the consideration of estimates. I would prefer not to designate the departments tonight. I understand my colleague the Minister of Fisheries did not finish his estimates and I would assume we would go on with his department on Wednesday. However, we will deal with that later.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, May 13, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

WATER RESOURCES

REPRESENTATIONS BY U.S. RESPECTING DIVERSION FROM HUDSON BAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs, and ask him whether representations have been made to Canada by the United States state department in connection with the water levels of the great lakes, and with particular reference to a diversion out of the Hudson bay watershed to the great lakes. If that is so, could the Prime Minister tell us the nature of the representations?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman gave me notice of this question a few moments ago, and I have endeavoured to secure the latest information. As of yesterday no representations had been received on this matter from the state department. I should add that from time to time various proposals have been made for a diversion of water from the Hudson bay watershed to permit an additional diversion at Chicago, but as far as this government is concerned it stands unalterably opposed to any further diversion of water at the request of Chicago.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—REPORTED STATEMENT IN OSLO BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of official United States reaction to a statement our Secretary of State for External Affairs is alleged to have made, in which he offered to mediate differences between the United States and Cuba, could the Prime Minister report to the house what the Secretary of State for External Affairs actually said?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not as yet been able to secure any statement that was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that would bear out the press references. However, on his return to Ottawa he will be able to go into some detail in this connection. Suffice it to say that naturally the Canadian government is always ready to discuss with American states those things that can be of help, with a view to the attainment of good relations among the nations of the western hemisphere. In saying that, I would emphasize that in my opinion there is no justification for any suggestion in the press to the effect that mediation was discussed.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON OTTAWA MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Is the minister in a position to report to the house on the meeting held yesterday in Ottawa to discuss the coal problem of Cape Breton? Also, is he in a position to assure the house that action will be taken to avert the closures announced for the coming week?

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, a meeting was in fact held yesterday afternoon under the chairmanship of the mayor of Glace Bay, Mr. Macdonald. The group included about twenty people from various sections in the vicinity of the mines in question, that is to say mines No. 4, Caledonia, Lawrence, and No. 16, as the house knows.

The discussion, which dealt with the various points submitted by the parties concerned, was quite friendly, and opinions were exchanged freely. The ministers present were my colleagues the ministers of national revenue, labour, and forestry, as well as myself. We listened carefully to the various points of view that were expressed.

However, in view of the official meeting with the premier of Nova Scotia, which is scheduled for next Monday in Ottawa, I do not think it would be wise to make any further comments at this time. After that meeting it will probably be in order to issue a statement as to the decision taken and where the matter stands.

(Text):

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STATEMENT ON DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECH BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur asked me about the distribution of a certain recent speech of mine. I find that in my absence from Ottawa the channels used were those normally involved when I am dealing with a strictly departmental subject. I have given instructions that the oversight should not in future be repeated.

Mr. Pickersgill: How do you repeat an oversight?

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Will the minister consider making some apology for some of the slurs that were in the speech circulated by his government or departmental staff, as distinct from whatever political staff or staffs he may have?

NATIONAL REVENUE

STATEMENT ON SEIZURE OF PENGUIN PUBLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur asked me a question with respect to the seizure or delay of certain books by officials of the Department of National Revenue. I knew nothing about the matter. I made inquiries and found that those books had been delayed some considerable time ago and were subsequently released without the matter being referred to Ottawa.

GRAIN

MANITOBA—REQUEST FOR COMPARISON OF DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): May I address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. My question arises out of some anxiety expressed by Manitoba farmers that their delivery quotas authorized by the wheat board will be lower than those of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Can the minister give the house an up to date report on delivery quotas in Manitoba and how they compare with those of the other two provinces?

[Mr. Comtois.]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not my documents on this subject with me this morning. I shall be glad to take the question as notice and give an answer as soon as possible.

INDUSTRY

SHIP OPERATING AND SHIPBUILDING—REQUEST FOR HIGHER SUBSIDIES TO WEST COAST SHIPYARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport based upon the announcement yesterday about shipbuilding subsidies. Because eastern shipyards have a price advantage over the west coast yards owing to such things as the proximity of steel supplies and transportation, can the minister indicate whether any consideration was given to allowing a higher subsidy on ships built in west coast yards in order that they may be in an equally competitive position with eastern yards?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

THE CENSUS

VANCOUVER CENTRE—QUALIFICATIONS OF COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce based on a telephone call from a person of great rectitude who is interested in public life and is not a supporter of this party. In view of the minister's statements in the house on April 12 and April 19 that candidates for the position of census commissioner had to meet certain high qualifications, and that his department would select only the very best persons available in each area to carry out this important and exacting operation; and in view of the appointment of Mr. Frank E. Smith as census commissioner for the riding of Vancouver Centre, will the minister assure the house that this person's background and experience meet the high qualifications which the minister has informed the house are necessary for this appointment?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not know Mr. Frank E. Smith personally and I am not aware of his qualifications. The qualifications that I outlined in the house on several occasions are those that are supposed to be adhered to in the choosing of census commissioners. I will have inquiries made as to the qualifications of this particular gentleman and will be glad to inform the hon. member when I have done so.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

402. Departmental administration, $3,395,700.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, in that part of the blue book of estimates entitled "Transport" there are several dozen votes, together with three or four items authorized by statute, pertaining to the Department of Transport and several other government agencies which report to parliament. A quick glance at the bottom of page 82 will show that these appropriations total $287,468,802.

The first allotment to which I will direct the attention of the committee is vote 404, aids to navigation, construction, to be found on page 75. This vote is up by approximately 70 per cent. A large expenditure is associated with construction of our new marine agency depot at Charlottetown. This project, begun in 1958, requires several years for completion. The Department of Public Works administers this type of construction for us; and we are providing $500,000 for wharf construction.

Another work of a similar type will be completed this year at Saint John, New Brunswick. There we must spend $250,000 to wind up construction of the agency complex which we began four years ago. We will also embark on a wharf extension project at Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. The $200,000 which the Department of Public Works expects to spend on our behalf represents the first portion of an outlay of some $2,200,000.

Erection of lighthouse piers will be pushed ahead in line with our program for installation of the most modern aids for the assistance of shipping. One of these items alone, the light station at Prince shoal in the St. Lawrence river, represents the largest single outlay in the appropriation, namely $700,000. Facilities at our Quebec city agency will be improved at a cost of $250,000.

There is another proposal related to the trend toward modernization. Many of our light stations are isolated, and the attendants and their families are cut off from contact with other people. When weather conditions are particularly bad the delivery of supplies or the evacuation of sick persons cannot be performed. With a view to lessening the hardships on these employees we propose to construct helicopter landing platforms at several stations this year. If this experiment proves successful it will, of course, be extended to many other locations.

Increased shipping activity from the seaway is reflected in the decision to construct modern type establishments at Prescott, Ontario, to replace the structure destroyed by fire last year and other obsolete facilities. The overall cost of that work will be $1.5 million. Among the many other specific points at which major works will be performed are Victoria and Prince Rupert, British Columbia, and St. John's, Newfoundland.

Despite its very short existence, the St. Lawrence seaway has already resulted in a very definite—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could have a little more quiet in the committee so that those of us who want to follow what the minister is saying can do so.

The Chairman: I agree with the hon. member. I think private conversation should be continued in a much quieter tone.

Mr. Balcer: This very definite trend about which I was speaking is borne out quite conclusively by an examination of the annual reports of the seaway authority and the national harbours board. Both agencies have reported the movement and handling of more cargo by fewer but larger ships. Quite clearly this emphasizes the urgency of maintaining and improving shipping channels in the St. Lawrence and Saguenay rivers. With this in mind we are planning to construct and operate, at a cost of some $350,000, a hydraulic model of the river section below Montreal.

The long term capital dredging program, begun five years ago, for widening critical sections and deepening other areas in the ship channel will be advanced considerably with the expenditure of some $3¼ million.

The summarized detail in the estimates book discloses that total moneys proposed with respect to our marine services aggregate something over $63 million. That figure represents an increase of 24 per cent over the related total for 1960-61. I think I should, therefore, explain the reason for this.

The recommended programs for aids to navigation and ship channel work, to which I have already referred, account for about $4 million of the increase. The largest single appropriation is that operation and maintenance of the Canadian marine service, our departmental fleet. Here we will be holding to an outlay almost identical with last year's appropriation. The $18.8 million we have allotted pertains to expenditures associated with design of new vessels, as well as refit, conversion, repairs and operation of our fleet of icebreakers, supply and buoy vessels, weather ships and northern service vessels.

Next in order of size is the vote for construction or acquisition, for which $15.5 million is provided. This vote shows the largest increase percentagewise of our 40-odd departmental appropriations. During the past year our ship construction program levelled off very appreciably. We were then witnessing completion of numerous large units. Apart from this, our ship construction organization was engaged in the preparation of plans and specifications for additional ships. That planning has now progressed to the point where we are able to embark on actual construction. To illustrate this aspect of the proposed program set out in this appropriation, let me point out that approximately $11 million is labeled for additional vessels.

I shall give a rundown on the larger projects. There is first a triple screw icebreaker, similar in type to the John A. Macdonald which entered service last year. It is hoped to commence construction some time this fall, with completion billed for the fall of 1964. Included in the proposed new starts is one unit which will differ somewhat in type and function from any of our existing vessels. I am sure all members of this committee are aware of the publicity given to breaks occurring in trans-Atlantic cables fanning out from our shores. This has been a matter of some concern to the government, for the loss of revenue resulting from so much as one day's interruption in service is very appreciable. In addition, it is a fact that there is a very decided shortage of cable repair ships, and this country must depend on other nations for assistance. It is proposed, therefore, to construct a dual type unit suitable for cable repair work and for icebreaking. When not engaged on the former work, this ship will be used on normal departmental tasks. The total cost may go as high as $7.5 million, and we have included approximately $2 million for the initial construction work.

For the past 10 years the department has operated, under international agreement, two weather ships in the Pacific ocean. After careful consideration extending over the past couple of years, it has been decided we should take action to replace the two ships. This decision is based on two factors. The ships are wartime frigates of the R.C.N. converted for this particular assignment, and maintenance costs have become excessive. Furthermore, a broadened demand for scientific data tends to make the ships quite unsuitable. The two new ships will cost some $8 million each. The department is now conferring with other departments to determine suitability of design. This is not an easy matter to resolve, because the ships must serve such diversified requirements as meteorology, oceanography, hydrography, search and rescue, aircraft guidance, etc. Subject to settlement of the design feature, we plan on getting construction under way in the latter part of this year.

During the past few years my predecessor in office has kept hon. members informed of the very heavy work load we have assumed regarding transportation of cargo to the far north in support of domestic and international activities, both civil and military. Each succeeding year our techniques are being improved upon, so much so that the hazardous assignment of a few years ago has become somewhat routine today. Despite this transition, however, the operation continues to be one which imposes rigorous working conditions for our personnel. It is for this reason that we have included in our program an item of $1.5 million for a depot ship which will provide living accommodation for stevedores.

I am sure that representatives of east and west coast areas will be specially interested in another part of our shipbuilding program. Announcement was made in 1960 of the government's intention to improve our marine search and rescue operations as well as safety practices among shipping operators. In line with that decision we intend to provide, at a cost of some $4 million, eight high speed cutters—five large and three small—which will operate on both coasts and in the great lakes. Barring any unforeseen delay we should have these cutters ready in the summer or autumn of 1962.

The 1961-62 vote bearing No. 413 should be explained inasmuch as it appears to be approximately five times the last appropriation. Actually this vote is a consolidation of two or three appropriations appearing separately in past years. This has resulted from a reorganization of the establishment which links together pilotage, steamship inspection and marine reporting service. Apart from that, a few large construction projects are contemplated. Present temporary accommodation for the pilotage station at Les Escoumains, Quebec, will be replaced by a new station at Anse aux Basques, at a cost of $750,000. The Department of Public Works will construct for us at Clarenville, Newfoundland, a marine haul-out and a fitting-out wharf. Vote 413 contains $400,000 for these facilities, which will permit the inspection and repair of ships of up to 500 tons capacity. Another proposal related to improvement of the pilotage service rendered to shipping involves an expenditure of some $900,000 to replace obsolete pilot boats at Sydney, Halifax, Saint John, New Brunswick, and Vancouver.

Grouped together in the blue book under the heading "Railway and Steamship Services" there are 12 votes totalling $32 million plus, a slight increase over last year's figure. I shall comment very briefly on the larger of the individual changes. Moneys required for the auto-ferry vessel for the Prince Edward Island car ferry service are considerably less; the ship will be completed in the latter part of this year. The item for improvements to the terminal at North Sydney is likewise decreased by approximately $400,000, and for the same reason. The project related to additional railway trackage undertaken last summer is now finished.

We find it necessary to increase by $1,175,000 the allowance for the anticipated deficit in operation of the Newfoundland ferry services and terminals. The Canadian National Railways, who operate the service on behalf of the government, anticipate a slight increase in revenue, but operating expenses are expected to be a good deal higher.

The blue book comparison also indicates a sizeable increment in the deficit for the Prince Edward Island ferry service. The increase shown is $546,000. This is to a certain extent misleading, because subsequent to the preparation of these estimates a final supplementary vote increased the 1960-61 appropriation by $322,000. Thus the expected net increase for 1961-62 is $224,000.

Last year parliament approved an expenditure of $325,000 for improvements to the Cape Tormentine terminal of the Prince Edward Island ferry service. This work was necessary to permit efficient use of the vessels now operated. With the commissioning of the new ship to which I referred just now a total of four ships will be operating during the peak traffic season. Since this will overtax the facilities at Borden, it is proposed, therefore, to build a new ferry dock there at a cost of $980,000.

The lengthy, diversified list of services, programs, functions and responsibilities which are grouped together under the air services of my department accounts for some $155 million of the total funds we are asking parliament to provide. In relation to the main estimates for the last fiscal year, this proposed total outlay means an increase of some $15 million. This is, of course, indicative of the ever expanding requirements we must expect in our efforts to cope with the trend toward travel by air.

Just to demonstrate the tremendous growth in this area of public expenditure, let me point out that funds voted ten years ago, that is for 1951-52, amounted to $39 million. Other illustrations of this growth factor are easy to find in any study of this area. In the same decade the number of Canadian civil aircraft licensed has multiplied; it was 1,960 aircraft at the end of 1950 and is now 5,400. Examination of personnel licensing records disclosed an almost identical rate of growth. We find that for each type of licensing there is a remarkably consistent increase of 15 per cent each year.

Let me mention here some significant detail on the traffic side of the picture. Whereas in 1950 our Canadian operators carried slightly more than 1 million passengers, in 1959 they transported close to 5 million. Carriage of goods showed a fourfold increase.

To compound the problems presented by this growing acceptance of air travel we now have the demands of the jet age. The noise level and greater space requirements are, in many instances, forcing design changes in airport construction. Runways have to be lengthened and strengthened, greater allowances are required for apron and hangar space and fuel storage. Location of airports in turn demands innovations to speed up refuelling, loading, unloading and shortening of taxiing distances; otherwise the advantage of speed will be lost. The more critical performance standards of jet aircraft demand other requirements as well. A good example is the more sophisticated traffic control services and the growing acceptance of some element of automation.

Proper administration of the numerous programs planned for the meteorological, telecommunications and civil aviation branches during the next year will most certainly make for a heavy work load, so much so that we must seek approval for a staff increase of 243 positions. This augmented staff will total 9,809 positions.

I do not intend to try to spell out in any great detail the many constituent parts of the various proposed activities. To do so I would be obliged to deal with a number of separate divisions, each of which in turn has a variety of activities, such as construction, operation, regulation, etc. I shall therefore attempt to single out particular items which I believe will be of greatest interest to the members of this committee.

The very large sum of $60,900,000 is set down for all types of construction related to airports, whether this be terminal buildings, runways, service buildings, taxiways, parking aprons, approach lighting, power plants, seaplane docks, water or sewage services. Within the last few years increasing emphasis has been given to the establishment of a series of modern air terminal buildings which will soon extend the length of our trans-Canada airway. In 1930 we saw that objective brought much closer with completion of our terminals at Montreal, Regina, Halifax and Ottawa. Very substantial progress likewise was made on the structures at Edmonton, Winnipeg and Toronto. For these latter three projects alone the sum of $20.5 million is provided in these estimates. Numerous other points should witness air terminal building construction this year, for example North Bay, Sault Ste. Marie, Port Hardy, Victoria, Fort McMurray, and Prince Rupert and Penticton. Some of these are projects we had, in fact, planned to start last year, but changes in requirements and internal reallocations of funds have led us to institute revised planning.

A significant change appears in the two appropriations related to both the operation and the construction of radio aids for air and marine navigation, and again the change is upward. I refer to the two allotments on page 80 of the estimates book, which total some $33 million. The programs envisaged here do not lend themselves to ready explanation. One reason for this is the technical nature of the work. Then, too, the various systems of communication facilities are so dispersed that one cannot pinpoint expenditures by specific locations.

I would, however, like to apprise this committee of one particular assignment to be added to the work of this section of the department this year. This is the operation of four chains of DECCA navigator stations, a task heretofore performed for us by a commercial agency.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the name of the stations?

Mr. Balcer: DECCA navigator stations. We must augment the personnel establishment by 70 positions for this reason. These marine navigation aids will greatly assist shipping in the waters off Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, as well as in the lower St. Lawrence and upper gulf areas.

In this same field of communications the pressure of constantly expanding and changing air traffic patterns is very evident. We plan to expend some $400,000 for the first stage of a program to cost well over $1 million, pertaining to acquisition of radar to television scan conversion systems. These ingenious devices convert normal radar signals to ones suitable for operating a standard television type display. Again, in the matter of radar, we are providing a small sum to enable a start on a $2½ million project related to secondary radar.

Perhaps a word of explanation of this secondary radar would be helpful. Radar systems now in use are called primary radar. They depend on some of the transmitted radar energy being reflected back from the aircraft to the control station. Considerable refinement is possible through the use of secondary radar. The latter involves the fitting of an aircraft with a small beacon, which sends a signal whenever the radar beam strikes it. The display shows only objects thus fitted, and the signals can be coded. In brief, this system enables easier identification of aircraft and a clearer picture of their positions.

Before turning to other matters I should like to refer to the disposal to private enterprise, during the last year, of virtually the last segments of the government telegraph and telephone service, namely those on the Magdalen islands and in Cape Breton. I do so in order to pay tribute to the people who, down through the years, have worked so hard to bring public communications to those areas served by this historic service. It is to their credit that the services were developed one by one to the point where they could be absorbed into the responsibilities of the regular communications agencies providing public service.

As usual there are two appropriations this year to cover the requirements of the meteorological branch of the department. The main estimates last year provided a total of slightly over $17 million for the services performed by that unit of the department; for the coming fiscal year we are estimating a figure approaching $19 million. The program pertaining to the various individual types of services which our meteorological experts have formulated for the assistance of aviation, shipping, the defence forces, government agencies, the general public, etc., will not differ appreciably from those performed in 1960-61.

One special item I have singled out for attention is an item of $25,000 to cover grants in aid of meteorological research in Canadian universities. The proposed outlay is quite small, but we attach considerable importance to it. Meteorology is a scientific endeavour wherein much has been accomplished in a short time. Nevertheless the potential regarding acquisition of further knowledge and greater refinement is enormous; consequently the area of research is important. It is our earnest hope that this assistance will stimulate the recruiting of university graduates for employment in our meteorological service and also encourage a broadening of research in Canadian universities. A further innovation with the same objective calls for the hiring of some 50 summer students. These are undergraduates of universities across the country, and they have been selected because their scholastic endeavours in mathematics and physics provide the basic training of the meteorologist.

Another commencement item, if I may call it that, relates to weather surveillance radar.

This is a program designed to observe weather phenomena over a wide area. Such expansion will enable forecast offices to provide to heavily populated centres more precise and more accurate warning of the onset of adverse weather.

Mr. Chairman, this concludes my over-all statement on the estimates now before this committee for examination. Admittedly it has been a brief statement but, faced with such a variety of individual programs related to practically every section of the country, it is difficult to select those items of particular interest to hon. members. Then too, if time permitted I would have liked to deal with activities proposed by such agencies as the national harbours board, the St. Lawrence seaway authority and others. However, I presume hon. members will have a few questions to direct to me when specific votes are reached. Let me assure them I shall do my best to meet their wishes.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the committee is grateful to the minister for the very comprehensive statement he has just given us, breaking down the various items of his department into a number of divisions which will enable us to consider these estimates with greater clarity than we otherwise could. I have some comments I should like to make regarding these divisions of his department, and I shall make them as I go along.

First, I should like to reiterate my congratulations to the minister on his appointment to what I have always considered the finest and best department in the government service. I have no hesitation in adding to that my best wishes to the minister for a happy but short tenure of office.

My first suggestion is one which may not meet with the approval of the minister but which I feel should commend itself to the consideration of a government that intends to deal with this huge department in an objective way. One has but to look at the estimates of the Department of Transport and consider the very wide field that the department covers to come to one conclusion; that it is extremely difficult for any one individual to administer the activities of a department of that size effectively and in the manner in which they should be administered. I am sure the minister will understand that I make that suggestion objectively without in any way wanting to be derogatory to himself. One has but to look at the annual report of the Department of Transport to appreciate what this department contains.

The department can be divided under three main headings: railway services, waterway services and air services, which in themselves are tremendous. But when one looks at the many corporations and boards which are also responsible to the minister, such as Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines, Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation, the air transport board, the board of transport commissioners, the maritime commission, the St. Lawrence seaway, and many other such agencies for which the minister is responsible, one can appreciate how vast the department is.

To strengthen my argument, I suggest there should be added to the Department of Transport such other communication matters as the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which are assigned to one particular minister because of their importance. That was the policy of the former government, and it has been followed by this government. However, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and all its affiliations are matters which normally should come under the department having to do with transportation. That is why I suggest that the ministry of transport should be divided into two parts, one having to do with air services, under which would come civil aviation, meteorological services and communication services, together with the crown corporations, boards and commissions that normally fall under those three headings. Under the jurisdiction of the other part could come other services that fall under the Department of Transport such as rail services and waterway services, together with the crown corporations, agencies, commissions and boards relating to those services. It seems to me, sir, that this is not an illogical division. Because of the tremendous importance which this department takes on year in and year out, the government should give consideration to this suggestion.

I move to another point which has to do with the railways. What is the position of the Canadian railways? It had a huge deficit in 1960; I think the amount was $65 million or $70 million. A large deficit for 1961 has also been prophesied. A threatened strike has just been averted by the operators of the railways and their employees. When one refers to that threatened strike one cannot do other than ask the government where it is going with reference to railway services in this country.

Some time ago the Prime Minister set up the MacPherson royal commission on transportation. It has brought down four recommendations involving subsidies of about $97 million. What is the policy of the government with reference to these four recommendations? We have asked repeatedly in this house for information in that respect and we have received none, save that the policy of the government will be announced in due course. That is not what the Prime Minister said in November of last year when we were face to face with a railway strike. It is important for the people of Canada and the members of the House of Commons to know what is to be done with respect to those recommendations.

There is on the order paper now a bill having to do with the Freight Rates Reduction Act, with which we shall be dealing early next week. A statement has been made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport in that regard, and I shall not take up the time of the committee in commenting on it other than to say that on the one hand we have the board of transport commissioners, which cannot make freight rates retroactive; it cannot reduce freight rates retroactively. On the other hand we have the minister and the Prime Minister saying that the Freight Rates Reduction Act will be made retroactive. How these two things are going to be reconciled I do not know. Perhaps I should not put it positively, but rather should ask the question. How does an act of parliament giving a freight rate reduction retroactively jibe with the policy of the board of transport commissioners, which is based on the Railway Act, which clearly states that freight rates cannot be reduced or increased retroactively? These are matters that we shall be discussing during the course of next week.

I come back to the threatened strike which was settled recently, because I asked the very important question in the house, where was the money to come from? We all remember what the Prime Minister said when this matter was under discussion in November of last year. I should like to put on record what he said as reported at page 359 of Hansard of November 30, 1960:

> It will make its report as to the means whereby these discriminatory rates may be avoided. Legislation will then be introduced in order to equalize opportunity across Canada. The freeze will then be taken off and the railway companies may then make an application to the board of transport commissioners to raise the freight rates and to take into consideration the agreements now in existence between the employers and the unions back to January 1, 1960.

Legislation will be introduced in parliament. First the Prime Minister said that the royal commission on transportation would bring in a formula that would settle the dispute. Well, if they brought in a formula it certainly did not settle the dispute. Then the Prime Minister said that legislation would follow. It is there in black and white. Notwithstanding our demands of the Prime Minister as to what was going to be done with the recommendations made by the royal commission, he said that the policy would be announced in due course. There is no question of legislation, although the report was made some weeks ago.

The Prime Minister said that the freeze would be lifted and the railways would then be in a position to make an application to the board in order, I presume, to take into consideration the agreements in existence between the employers and the unions. Therefore I think I am justified in asking the question, where is the money to come from? Does the minister not think it is about time for the government to make known its policy on this whole matter of railway transportation in Canada, as was done yesterday with reference to shipping policy, about which I shall have something to say later on.

The point is that the railways find themselves in a difficult position, and I think it is the duty of the government to tell the country what its policy is to be, not only in the general field, having regard to the report of the MacPherson commission, but in the other field that I mentioned. I should like to put on Hansard what the Prime Minister said on May 10 in his television broadcast on "The Nation's Business":

> I think most Canadians will welcome the fact that the railway strike scheduled to take place next week has been averted. Some opposition members, you should have seen them in the house, they were far from happy when it was announced. They looked disturbed.

This is not a statement which should come from the Prime Minister. I said in the house, and I repeat now, that all Canadians should have been pleased and I am sure were pleased that a railway strike was averted. This kind of statement comes with ill grace from the Prime Minister in so far as it is a reflection upon the members of the opposition. Then he went on to say:

> The action we have taken and the stand we took last fall has been fully vindicated.

That is not so; that is a complete inaccuracy. I continue:

> And yet what happened last fall? The members of the Liberal party and the C.C.F. party voted against the legislation, but the vocal critics of last December are not so noisy now in the month of May.

Well, just let us pause for a moment and see what happened. The dispute was settled on the very basis of the recommendation made by the Liberal party. The Liberal party suggested to the government that the dispute be settled on the basis of the majority report of the conciliation board, known as the Milvain report.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): By compulsory arbitration, you mean; that is what you suggested.

Mr. Chevrier: And the Liberal opposition made it quite clear where it stood in so far as a strike was concerned. The conclusions that have been reached in the settlement of the strike are the same as those that were recommended from this side of the house. Therefore it ill becomes the Prime Minister to be blowing off steam because of the fact that he or the government by inference have been responsible for the settlement of the strike.

I say to the minister that we were the ones who were in the right in reference to this matter. The government was wrong, because the agreement was not according to the procedure described by the Prime Minister. I have put on record the statement made by the Prime Minister as to the manner in which this matter would be dealt with, and there is no doubt that is not the way in which the strike was settled. It was done on an entirely different basis. According to the statement which I put on record, the railways were not supposed to receive any subsidy from the government but would improve their ability to pay by increased freight rates according to a formula which the royal commission was to recommend.

Where is the money going to come from? Is the Minister of Transport going to bring down another estimate of $40 million, or whatever amount is required to pay these increased wages, or will the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation be implemented by way of subsidies? Those are earmarked for a specific purpose. So the question immediately arises whether the one will be used to satisfy the other. Nothing of what was recommended by the Prime Minister on November 30 has happened. The royal commission did not produce a formula, and the railways will have to pay the wage increases from the subsidies they will receive from the government for this particular purpose or for other purposes.

The Prime Minister in the speech he made the other day over the air on the program "The Nation's Business" tried to create the impression that the Liberal party last fall was opposed to government action in order to prevent a strike. That statement is simply untrue. We said again and again last fall that we were against a railway strike, but instead of accepting the mere delaying tactics proposed by the government at that time we said, in the form of an amendment—and it is there for anyone to see—that the strike could be prevented through a settlement based on the Milvain report, and that is exactly what has happened.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Not by compulsion, though.

Mr. Chevrier: So there was no purpose in the Prime Minister appearing on "The Nation's Business" and making the statement he did.

Mr. Grills: What about 1951?

Mr. Chevrier: I presume that those who are now interrupting will have the opportunity to speak in this debate, and I should like to hear what they have to say. So far as 1951 is concerned, absolutely nothing happened in that year with reference to the strike. I am glad that the Prime Minister has now come into the house. I am delighted that he should be here, and so that he will not think I took advantage of his absence—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You generally do.

Mr. Walker: He did this morning.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I raise a question of privilege. The Prime Minister says that I generally take advantage of his absence from the house to make statements concerning him. That is untrue. That is not so, and I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to have the Prime Minister withdraw that implication with respect to my conduct.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman is very touchy. I repeat what I said. It is a common practice among certain hon. members opposite—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, the Prime Minister is now shifting his ground. He has said it is a common practice among certain members of the house, but that is not what he said a moment ago. He directed his statement to me, and I am asking the Prime Minister to withdraw that statement because it is untrue and it is unfair of him to say so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have nothing to withdraw, and it is not untrue. I read in Hansard what has gone on when I am out of the house, and I find that so frequently this has become a method, a modus operandi as we lawyers call it—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am asking you to rule on the question of privilege. The Prime Minister has no right to reflect on a member of parliament in the manner in which he has. He has no right to reflect on any member on this side of the house by saying that he takes advantage of the fact he is not in the house to make statements concerning him. If he is not in the house that is his fault, but I can tell the Prime Minister now that anything I have to say with reference to him I will say in his presence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Go right ahead.

Mr. Chevrier: I am now asking the Prime Minister to amend the language he used a moment ago.

The Chairman: I must say it is very often charged that some members take advantage of the absence of others to make statements with respect to them, and references to the absence of members are very frequent. I do not recall having seen in Beauchesne or any other authority any indication that statements of that kind have been considered improper, or that would justify the Speaker or Chairman requesting that they be withdrawn. If the hon. member has a case in point I am willing to consider it.

Mr. Chevrier: I think that is a most unfair way in which to put it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not up to me as a member to submit authority. The Prime Minister is the one who has broken the rules of the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chevrier: I think that is also a reflection from the Chair on myself as a member.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Grills: Sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: I will not sit down for you.

The Chairman: Order.

An hon. Member: Steady, boy.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Laurier has indicated his view that he does not think the Chair is being fair in its consideration of this problem. I have indicated that in my view there are no precedents, and I am asking him if he has any to submit. I think it is only natural that the Chair should not be forced to make a decision without having some ground for the decision which the hon. member suggests. If the hon. member has no precedents I will consider that such references, which are very frequent, have been considered parliamentary and are not such as to justify any withdrawal.

Mr. Chevrier: It is a common rule of this house.

Mr. Walker: It is not.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, you know a great deal about the rules. The Minister of Public Works does not even know the minor rules of the house, and it would be much better for him to sit down.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I want to say that I know of no one in the house who breaks the rules more than the hon. member for Laurier, and I know of no one who takes greater advantage of the absence of ministers than the hon. member for Laurier. I respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order. What we have to consider now is the point raised by the hon. member for Laurier. If other points are raised I will deal with them later. The hon. member for Laurier may consider that the unparliamentary words referred to in citation 155, for instance, do not apply in this case. As to other precedents which may apply, I may tell the hon. member that I do not know of any. If the hon. member for Laurier has some such citations—

Mr. Walker: It is pure bluff; he has nothing.

The Chairman: —I am willing to consider them. I might say that I have heard similar charges in the house since I have been here. I have never heard anybody request that they be withdrawn. I have heard members rising on questions of privilege, or something like that, and explanations given. However, that is another matter. I think the hon. member for Laurier has sufficiently explained his position in so far as any question of privilege is concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: I would have thought that the rules of the house—

Mr. Walker: What rule?

Mr. Chevrier: —were clear enough to indicate that the Prime Minister should amend his language. However, if I may—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I want to hear what the hon. gentleman has to say. If his sensibilities have been exacerbated may I say I will immediately amend my statement and say that whatever he did say he really did not mean.

Mr. Pickersgill: That statement is clearly against the rules.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to lose any more time in connection with this statement by the Prime Minister. I have a contribution to make and remarks to make in answer to what has been said by the Minister of Transport on this occasion. I intend to proceed with my remarks. I leave to the house the words that were used by the Prime Minister. I do not believe they meet the position. However, that is his responsibility, and he alone will have to take it.

Mr. Walker: You are hoist on your own petard.

Mr. Chevrier: Now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Walker: On a question of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that you have asked the hon. member for precedents. He has not given any precedents, and I think he should withdraw his insulting remarks to you, as Chairman of this committee.

The Chairman: I heard the hon. member for Laurier say he had accepted the ruling and was now reverting to his speech.

Mr. Walker: Has he?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think you should immediately call the Minister of Public Works to order. I am entitled, as a member of the house, to proceed and this minister is continually interrupting these proceedings. He has no right to do so. He has referred to insulting language that I used. I did not use insulting language. On the contrary—

Mr. Walker: It was extremely insulting to you, sir.

Mr. Chevrier: —it was language used by the Prime Minister that brought this about.

The Chairman: I consider the incident closed. The hon. member for Laurier may proceed with his speech, and I ask all hon. members not to interrupt the member who has the floor.

Mr. Chevrier: To come back to what the Prime Minister said a moment ago, I should like to invite him to point to any circumstances under which I have made statements such as he said I had made. In his absence I put on the record certain statements he made on November 30, and I do not intend to repeat them. However, he quite clearly said at that time how the strike would be settled. He made it quite clear there would be four matters taken into consideration. First, there would be a report from the royal commission on transportation. Then there would be legislation introduced. Then the freight rates freeze would be lifted, and then it would be possible to come back to a consideration of the agreements that had been made between the parties. This did not happen.

The question I asked while the Prime Minister was absent from the house was, when are we going to get a statement of policy from the government with reference to this whole matter, the report of the royal commission and the four recommendations that were made and the policy of the government with reference to the manner in which funds will be provided for the settlement of the strike? I think the committee is entitled to know and the country is entitled to know. We have not heard a word, and that is why I say, and repeat now, that the policy of the government in respect to that part of transportation services, namely rail services, is a complete blank.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to ask the hon. gentleman a question. He is proceeding with an argument and, while I am not accepting it, it is an argument. I should like to ask him this. Does he have any objection to the labour unions and the railways getting together and coming to a settlement as a result of the processes of negotiation, or would he have had the government step in and stop that?

Mr. Chevrier: In answer to that question, I am asking the Prime Minister whether they did get together, or whether the government instructed certain people to bring about a settlement. That is the point. I think that is the question that should be answered before I answer the question asked by the Prime Minister. Then again—

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question? In his last statement he implied that the labour unions or a segment of the upper echelon of the labour unions had accepted instructions against the wishes of the rank and file to carry out a settlement of this threatened strike. If that was his implication he had better amend his statement.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not amend my statement for the hon. member. If he had listened to the question I put to the Prime Minister in answer to the question he put to me, the hon. member would have understood what the implication was. The implication was quite clear. In so far as we are concerned, I think we are entitled to know in what manner these funds are going to be provided and that certainly has not been indicated either by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Transport.

Then I was about to go on to another matter when the Prime Minister entered the house. I think we should know the position taken by the Canadian National Railways toward employment. I believe the committee is entitled to know that. These questions have been asked and the answer has been, "Well the committee will be set up and questions can be answered during the deliberations of that committee." While that is true in general, the opposition is entitled to know whether the general position of railway workers on the Canadian National has deteriorated over the years. The minister surely ought to be in a position to tell us that.

While we do know that there has been deterioration in the position of many Canadian National employees, there is on the order paper a resolution indicating that the directors will be increased from seven to 12. We will be dealing with that resolution on another occasion. While there are hundreds of thousands of people out of work in this country, there is on the order paper a resolution indicating that the number of directors of the Canadian National Railways is going to be increased. How many people have been laid off by the Canadian National? What is the position of the employees at the McGill street headquarters of Canadian National Railways and the aviation building in Montreal?

I attempted to move the adjournment of the house on one occasion to deal with this situation. The minister made the usual statement that, in so far as the Canadian National Railways were concerned, they were not interested in laying off people; they would do the best they could. I think the minister owes it to these people to say what is the position of those men who are employed in the headquarters building of Canadian National Railways at 360 McGill street and the adjoining building and who, because of the shift from that building to the new office premises in the city of Montreal, may be laid off. What is the position of those who are engaged in the maintenance of those buildings, now that Canadian National Railways are handing out this work to a contractor? How many of these men remain out of work? In the C.N.R. building alone 160 of them were affected by this move, and I am told that in the aviation building a number were also affected.

This first item should not be allowed to pass, Mr. Chairman, until the committee is given the details. I will give the minister credit for this sentiment. I am sure that he is not any more anxious than anybody else to see men out of work. But that feeling will not suffice. What is the position of these people who have lost their jobs. Before this first item is disposed of I hope the minister will be able to tell us what the situation is.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Let him continue.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member be allowed to continue

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: I am grateful to the committee for their consent. I will try to bring these remarks to a close as quickly as I reasonably can do so. However, I would bring to the attention of the minister the representations that were made by those employees to the Prime Minister. I am sure the Prime Minister has received a large number of letters from the employees at the headquarters building in Montreal. I have received one copy if not several copies of letters that have gone to him. I am sure the Prime Minister has turned them over to the Minister of Transport. That is another reason we should have a complete breakdown of the position as it affects these employees.

I next come to the question of aviation services. I am somewhat surprised that a statement has not been made by the government with reference to aviation policy in Canada. I do not believe a statement has been made on aviation policy for many years. Certainly no statement has been made by the present government except, of course, in answer to questions that were put to the former minister of transport and to others. I do not think that is a healthy situation, Mr. Chairman. Because the air services in any country are of such great importance, careful consideration should be given to the position having to do first with (1) international carriers; (2) domestic and transcontinental carriers; and (3) regional carriers. No announcement of policy has been made. I submit to the minister that he should give some indication of what the policy is.

I should like to say a word in connection with the bilateral air agreements. There are in existence a number of bilateral air agreements that Canada has made with other countries. Since this government has been in office those agreements have been detrimental to Canada. They have been detrimental because Canada has given away certain of its sovereign rights—I refer to fifth freedom rights—to foreign carriers when Canada itself did not have those rights in the foreign countries concerned. In one case Canada gave up a substantial and important right in its own country in an exchange with another country.

There has been or there is before the cabinet an application by Canadian Pacific Airlines for certain international air services. In equity and in fairness I think the committee is entitled to know the nature of the application and the government's decision on it. Surely the government is not going to sit on it. What are the demands that are made in the international field by Canadian Pacific Airlines? Have Trans-Canada Air Lines made similar representations? What has been the decision of the government? Is the government still studying those applications?

Under the Aeronautics Act—I have forgotten the section, but I believe it is section 15

—it falls within the jurisdiction of the governor in council to deal with applications of that nature when the applicant is also a surface carrier. What is the position of carriers in so far as transcontinental services are concerned? Have Canadian Pacific Airlines made application for certain services? Will those applications be dealt with by the cabinet, or will they be given to the air transport board for determination?

It would seem to me that the logical body to make a determination on applications of that kind is the air transport board. They are a technical body. They have all the necessary facilities. They have held hearings from one end of the country to the other. Last year, during consideration of the estimates of the minister's predecessor, a statement was made that regional hearings were being held by the air transport board all across Canada, first in the eastern part of Canada and later in the western part, and that some decisions would be arrived at. It seems to me that the committee is entitled to know what those decisions are.

Then again there is the question of the regional air carriers. Need I tell the minister that some of them are in difficult circumstances and need assistance? Perhaps all of them need assistance. I know definitely of some instances, in the province of Quebec particularly, where assistance is needed if the carrier is to be able to carry on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. gentleman say what carrier that is?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. If the Prime Minister will allow it, I should like to defer doing so; I am coming to it in just a moment. I wanted to preface my statement with an article that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen following the minister's statement to the air industries and transport association at Quebec last year. He had just been appointed at the time, and there was a good deal of consideration for and sympathy with the difficult position in which he found himself at that meeting. The title of this article which appeared in the Citizen of November 5, 1960 is "Air Carriers are Seething" and it reads in part as follows:

> There was little secret that the A.I.T.A. members were dissatisfied with Mr. Balcer's defence of the controversial decontrol policy and more forthright indignation was only suppressed by the members' consideration for the fact that he has just stepped into the post of a new minister.

Following that up, may I say that the minister was told that in 1958 the aviation industry employed about 40,000 people directly and 65,000 people indirectly, and was the third largest employer in Canada. In 1960, for which I have the latest figures, the situation had worsened considerably. The gross selling value of products in 1958 amounted to $462 million. In 1960 that figure was down to $327 million, and the employment roster was down to 28,516. It was taken for granted—and in fact it was so stated at the A.I.T.A. conference in Quebec—that the position in 1960 would be worsening.

The Prime Minister asked me to what air carrier I referred. I refer to an article which appeared in L'Echo du Bas Saint-Laurent, in which it is stated that Quebecair is being threatened because of competition from other carriers, but more particularly T.C.A. Many reasons are given in the article, but I will only place this paragraph on record. I think it is an excellent article; the minister may have seen it. It is by Jean-Paul Legare and is entitled "La Concurrence d'Air Canada Menace la Survie de Quebecair".

(Translation):

> The Quebec Airways, or Quebecair, has struggled mightily to secure the right of flying the Quebec airlanes. The company is using those airlanes as its natural field of operations. There is therefore no valid reason for T.C.A. to continue duplicating Quebecair service between Montreal and Seven Islands. We have it from good authority that, if Quebecair had the monopoly of its airway network, they could give first class service and prosper. On the other hand, if T.C.A. keeps competing, this state-owned company will pile up deficits and, which is still worse, jeopardize the survival of Quebecair, a private enterprise.

(Text):

I do not, of course, intend to extend the same arguments to other corporations having to do with T.C.A. This being a regional area I think the position is entirely different than that of the two main carriers in this country, namely, T.C.A. and C.P.A. But I hope the government is taking into consideration the recommendations of its own report, the Wheatcroft report, and I trust the minister has given consideration to the conclusions which were reached by the distinguished commissioner which at the request of the government made a complete study of the whole field. It was clear, following that report, that there should not be competition in certain areas, and that when competition did take place it was to happen in a very gradual way. Particular reference was made to a five year period and a ten year period. I have forgotten the date of the Wheatcroft report, but I think it was published some three or four years ago.

However, having regard to the deficit of Trans-Canada Air Lines, which amounted to $2½ million in 1960, and the deficit of the Canadian Pacific Airlines, amounting to $4 million or more during the same period, the government, it seems to me, must be extremely careful in reaching any decision which it might make either in the international field or in the domestic and trans-Atlantic fields which would affect the strength of either of those two great corporations.

That is easier said than done. I will grant at once that in theory it is easy, in the field of aviation, to make a general statement, but when you come to apply it things are far more difficult. That is why I say this is not a political question. It is a technical question which should be decided on the merits and the facts, and there is a body which deals with that responsibility under the Aeronautics Act, namely the air transport board.

Mr. Balcer: They are doing just that at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, in that case why is the cabinet holding hearings? Why did the cabinet appoint a subcommittee and hear representations from the presidents of C.P.A. and T.C.A.?

Mr. Balcer: That had nothing to do with the domestic aspect.

Mr. Chevrier: I am dealing with both. I am dealing with both the international aspect of the aviation policy and the transcontinental aspect. I am happy to hear the minister say that the air transport board is dealing with this now.

Mr. Balcer: Could I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I wonder if the hon. member for Laurier could tell me on what occasion there was ever a public hearing before the air transport board on the allocation of an international route.

Mr. Chevrier: I believe there were public hearings in at least one case. I may be mistaken, but I think it was in the case of the air cargo application some years ago. In that case there was a public hearing before the air transport board.

Mr. Balcer: Followed by a meeting of the committee of the cabinet.

Mr. Chevrier: What was that?

Mr. Balcer: Is it not a fact that this matter was brought before a committee of the cabinet?

Mr. Chevrier: That is true, but not until the air transport board had made a complete study of this question and had made recommendations to the cabinet with regard to it. That is why I said a moment ago that under the provisions of the Aeronautics Act it is the governor in council which deals with a certain aspect of this whole matter, namely the international carriers. We did not deal with it in the past until we had before us a complete study and recommendations by the air transport board.

Mr. Balcer: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but just to clear this up I wonder if he could tell us whether the air cargo he mentioned was domestic or international. I am under the impression that it was domestic air cargo which was under discussion at that time.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the particular application as between T.C.A. and C.P.A. had to do with domestic air cargo, but the decision the government took was made following a study by the air transport board after a hearing before them, and its effect had to do with international services and international air cargo as well. That is why I say to the minister that it seems to me this whole question is one for a technical body, the air transport board, which has the facilities and the personnel to deal with this matter in the manner in which it should be handled. If it is dealt with by that body, and if there is a recommendation made, I do not think the minister will find any exception being taken from this side of the house.

I should like just to say one word about the shipping policy which the minister announced yesterday in the House of Commons. I told him, and I repeat, that in my opinion it was one of the most important statements to have been made in this house in a very long time. It has to do with three aspects of water transportation; assistance to the shipping operator and the shipbuilder; assistance to the fishing industry; and cabotage, or the manner in which ships may move in and out of the great lakes.

The minister has stated that the first two aspects will not be dealt with by legislation, but brought about by means of an item to be introduced in the estimates. In so far as the latter item is concerned, namely the one involving amendment to the commonwealth merchant shipping agreement, there is a point which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister.

My recollection is that there are five kinds of trade on the great lakes. There is trade moving from one Canadian port to another Canadian port; there is trade moving from one United States port to another United States port; there is trade moving from a Canadian port to a United States port; there is trade moving from a Canadian port to an overseas port, and there is trade moving from a United States port to an overseas port. As the situation is now, the laws of the United States prevent or prohibit cabotage or the carrying by foreign vessels of trade or cargo from one United States port to another United States port.

This is not so in Canada. That restriction does not apply to British vessels or to commonwealth vessels. They may move from one Canadian port to another Canadian port, and the announcement the minister made yesterday was that he intends to apply for an amendment to the act so that after the passage of that act, cabotage, as I call it, will not be permitted to other than Canadian vessels in that area from Les Escoumains to the head of the lakes. Downstream from Les Escoumains, British vessels and commonwealth vessels will be able to trade from one Canadian port to another Canadian port. The question that comes to my mind therefore, is this. What will be the position, first, of Canadian owners who are now operating vessels under the British flag; and what will be the position of Canadian owners who have transferred their flag to other flags of convenience, as did the operator I referred to yesterday? Does this mean that they will bring their ships back to the Canadian flag?

The next question I should like to ask the minister is this. He has already stated that he intends to amend the shipping act in order to bring this about, and I think there is a part of the shipping act which has to do with this matter; but will that be done only after an agreement has been completed with the commonwealth countries? If that is so, does the minister anticipate that agreement with the commonwealth countries can be finalized before the end of this session? This must be an international agreement, an intercommonwealth agreement, and I take it these agreements are not made overnight but by representations on a formal basis through the usual offices, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or by meetings of a committee.

What effect is this policy going to have on the ships of the Canadian National Steamships line that are still lying at anchor in Halifax harbour? Will it be possible to use this policy, in some form or other, to assist those ships? Have payments been made in accordance with the agreement that has been arrived at between the Browning company and the guarantors through the bank of Cuba, and has the new bank repudiated any of the payments? Will the minister give consideration to rehabilitating these ships under the new policy if the other matter falls to the ground; because surely the minister will agree that there are six or seven ships there doing nothing, and that have been doing nothing for many years, that could be of great service in trade to and from the federation of the West Indies.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the house would allow me a few minutes before I resume my seat, so that I may deal with a matter I recently brought to the minister's attention. It was about the use of the Soulanges canal, in regard to which I put the following question to him on May 3, 1961:

> Since the discussions were started between the two governments, have any industrial corporations approached the government with a view to locating plants in the area set aside by the minister?

Mr. Chairman, this is the one mile strip of land set aside for industrial development purposes in the vicinity of Cascades. As reported on page 1 on the appendix to Hansard for May 3, the minister replied as follows:

> Not directly, Mr. Speaker, but a number of chambers of commerce in the area have made representations to have this federal government property set aside so they may have time to approach various industries with a view to bringing industrial construction into the area.

Following that answer, I asked the minister which chamber of commerce had made such representations; the minister then said that he would make inquiries and reply later.

Now yesterday, or was it the day before, I forget which—

Mr. Johnson: The day before yesterday—

Mr. Chevrier: —the minister replied—

Mr. Johnson: Yes, it was the day before yesterday.

Mr. Chevrier: —that he had on hand a pamphlet indicating that the chamber of commerce of Vaudreuil-Soulanges supported such industrial development. Now, what the minister had on hand at that time was not a petition, but publicity material which had been written in 1958, at least two years before the petitions he received. It therefore seems to me that the minister should have admitted at once that he had received no representation to that effect from a chamber of commerce of the Vaudreuil-Soulanges area, for I have them all here before me and none of them recommends that mile long area in question be set aside. On the contrary, each of the seven requests states that:

> —many industrial promotion organizations and large financial syndicates have vainly sought to convert the canal and areas along the canal, into a source of income for the population—

—of Vaudreuil-Soulanges, and that, in spite of this, the chambers of commerce recommend to the minister:

—to encourage the free assignment of the land and buildings of the Soulanges canal in whole—

And not only in part.

—to the government of the province of Quebec, to help carry out the above projects and thereby provide people in the constituency of Soulanges with a source of income that would enable them to prosper as they did before the closing of the canal.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to keep raising this matter indefinitely but I feel that the minister should admit that no chamber of commerce in the constituency—if this be the case, as I believe it is—has recommended that this mile long strip of land be reserved for industrial development purposes.

What is more, the whole railway system which might promote industrial development on the canal is at the other end and not in the Cascades area. In fact, the C.N.R. has a railway centre at Coteau Landing, while the C.P.R. has one at De Beaujeu, near St. Polycarpe, which is quite close to the upper end of Soulanges canal. Therefore, if it is advisable to promote industrial development in that part of the constituency, it is at the upper end of the canal it should be done, and not in the Cascades area.

(Text):

Sir, I have been much too long, I know, but there were certain matters which I thought should be brought to the attention of the committee. I reiterate my statements with reference to two of them. The first is that, I regret the failure of the government to give the House of Commons the policy of the government in the field of railway services. I also regret the failure of the government to make any announcement of policy in so far as aviation services are concerned. I hope it will be possible for the minister to do this in both those important fields of transportation—perhaps the most important of his department—as he has done in the field of water transportation, before the consideration of his estimates has been concluded.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Certainly.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member made reference to the changed status of Canadian National Railways employees at headquarters in Montreal. My question to the hon. member is this. Is the hon. member aware that prior to this government taking office a similar change took place in Nova Scotia, where a contract had been awarded by the Canadian National Railways to a private company depriving union men of work, and among the directors of that company at that time was the then president of the Nova Scotia Liberal association?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid my hon. friend misunderstood my remarks. I was dealing with the maintenance employees on the headquarters staff of the Canadian National Railways at 360 McGill street. I said that what the Canadian National Railways had done was to give a contract for its new office building on Dorchester street, where the circumstances are not at all the same as those related by the hon. member. I also said that because of the change from a prevailing rate group to a contractual group many men on the Canadian National Railways maintenance and operational staff would find themselves without work. I believe 160 of them were affected, and I was asking the minister to tell me what their position was. I said I did not think this first item should be allowed to pass until all these men had found employment.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, to that reply I can only say that when the hon. member rose he said the circumstances were not similar. This would indicate he knew very well what the circumstances were.

Mr. Hellyer: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; are you recognizing the hon. gentleman?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Trinity has a point of order?

Mr. Johnson: I have a question. If the hon. member for Laurier is willing to answer it now I have no objection.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Does the hon. member for Laurier not feel that it would be possible for the provincial government to take on those employees, since the work involved is not of a clerical nature such as might require major changes in the organization of the work, but is more in the nature of what is described as "maintenance", that is cleaning work in the buildings. I therefore ask the hon. member for Laurier if the provincial government could not employ these persons?

Mr. Chevrier: As usual, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has not—

Mr. Johnson: Let us have an answer.

Mr. Chevrier: As usual, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member does not clearly picture the situation. The Quebec government is not responsible for this situation; C.N.R. officials are the ones responsible—

Mr. Johnson: Could not the government do it?

Mr. Chevrier: There is only one answer—

Mr. Johnson: Do answer my question.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, let me do it. There is only one answer, and it is this: first, the C.N.R. is responsible for the situation, and then the minister answers for it in this house. So, in the last analysis, it is up to the C.N.R. to provide employment for those people and not for the Quebec government.

Mr. Johnson: Therefore, it is the Quebec government that is laying them off.

Mr. Chevrier: Because it is not—

Mr. Johnson: It will not give them jobs.

Mr. Chevrier: Will you allow me to answer?

Mr. Johnson: Give us an answer.

Mr. Chevrier: You do not like the one I am giving you.

Mr. Johnson: That is no answer.

Mr. Chevrier: That is because you misconstrued the question.

Mr. Johnson: That is no answer.

Mr. Chevrier: I am simply telling you that it is not the responsibility of the Quebec government but the responsibility of the C.N.R. to find jobs for them.

Mr. Johnson: They could co-operate with the C.N.R.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I think I can agree with many of the points made by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Laurier, without agreeing that he has made a better review of the over-all problem of transportation which we face today than the minister has. One would assume that the present minister received his post because of the desire of the Prime Minister and the cabinet to have a stronger representation of French speaking colleagues. This is, I think, to most hon. members the most important practical cabinet post of all. I am torn between appreciation, for example, of the announcement made yesterday on Canadian shipping and other factors that have arisen since the minister has taken office. He has the verve of a cigar store Indian when it comes to putting over his department. The other point that stuns me about the department since he has taken over the post is the delay in getting replies. I see that the Minister of Public Works wishes to interrupt, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Brunsden: On a question of privilege, the hon. member for Port Arthur has made allegations against the minister which are unwarranted.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Brunsden: I suggest that he be asked to retract the statement.

Mr. Walker: On the point of order, we all know that the hon. member for Port Arthur speaks from Mount Olympus and looks down on ordinary members of the House of Commons. I think we should consider the source of the remark. If I were the hon. member I would not ask that the hon. member for Port Arthur should withdraw this insult to the French Canadian race.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, where the insult comes I cannot see. I used a simile. Is there anything wrong with that? I believe this is the first time since I came to this house that I have been asked to withdraw anything. If the minister personally takes objection to what was said I will be only too pleased to withdraw. I think the Minister of Public Works is leaping into a breach that has not been made yet in so far as an insult to the French Canadian race is concerned.

Mr. Walker: The rest of the committee thinks so.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister an authority on the rest of us?

Mr. Walker: Not on you.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, since this remark was made about me I must say that I did not see too much offence in it. I shall be in a position to answer the specific points raised by the hon. member at the end of the discussion on the first item. At that time I shall deal with everything he has to say. I urge him to carry on; he is extremely interesting.

Mr. Brunsden: On the question of privilege, there is a term in western Canada which my friend from Port Arthur should know. A cigar store Indian is a dead duck, and certainly our minister is anything but that.

Mr. Hellyer: You mean a Bomarc.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should have begun my remarks with some acknowledgement of the pleasure it is to be speaking in the House of Commons on Saturday. It seems to have been such a popular move, particularly with the staff although they seem to have shared an inordinate amount of credit for the condition, that I should like to extend my words of appreciation to those hon. members who have managed to find it possible to be here on this particular day.

The theme on which I should like to approach the estimates of the Department of Transport and the whole question of transportation has really been offered to us by the Prime Minister in his ringing declaration that the future election, which I think most of us will agree will be coming very soon, is going to be centred on the issue of free enterprise versus socialism. I know this is a topic that is dear to many members' hearts, particularly on the government side, and I want to try to analyse the problems that we face in transportation in the light of this situation.

If the issue is between free enterprise and socialism, it seems to me that in all fairness the thing to do is to get the government out of any kind of operation of transportation services at all. If you are going to have a pure and thus, I think, a practical free enterprise approach, if you are going to use the theme that as a political party and government you stand for free enterprise, then it seems to me that the challenge is to get the government out of any kind of transportation operation. That is the first point.

How do you get the government out of such operations? Do you sell the C.N.R.? Do you sell Northern Transportation Limited? Do you turn them over to private enterprise? That is one side of the problem. The other question is, what about the problem of subsidies? If you are a free enterpriser and against socialism, especially the creeping or dead hand of socialism, are you going to offer subsidies to private enterprise in any shape or form?

Yesterday we had an announcement, which will be very much welcomed in my own region and is welcomed by this party, in relation to the shipbuilding industry. But I put it to the minister and to the Conservative members of the house: In view of the Prime Minister's theme for the next election, does this announcement not bother you? Does it not strike a blow at the very purity of your theme of free enterprise? The minister was candid enough to say that there is no idea what this is going to cost. I know that last year the hon. member for Laurier and I made recommendations along this line and he estimated the cost, as I remember, at $40 million to $50 million a year to carry out this kind of proposal, that is, a 40 per cent contribution to the capital cost and a fitting in with the depreciation pattern we already have.

It seems to me that there is here a challenge to the government to explain to us how this announcement, which I take as a form of socialism, fits into the free enterprise theme. After all, if you are going to underwrite both the shipyards and the shipbuilding industry to the extent of 40 per cent of capital costs, you will have a most difficult time coming forward as an apostle of free enterprise. This is something in a policy way that I wish the minister would explain. How does this announcement that we welcome fit in with the role of the government in moving from this trend toward socialism toward what the Prime Minister says is the issue in the next election?

Mr. Balcer: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Balcer: Would he call the United States government a socialist government because it gives subsidies to its shipping and shipyard operations?

Mr. Fisher: No, I would suggest that throughout the world we have a trend toward both planning and the support of industries by governments. I was talking to a Conservative just before I came into the chamber who was telling me how attracted he was—I think this is fair—to the statements of senator Barry Goldwater and the whole idea of stopping the trend toward collectivism and the mixed economy. Is this theme of free enterprise versus socialism going to be an attempt to stop the trend toward collectivism and the mixed economy? In all fairness, I think the minister has to recognize that this is a trend toward a mixed economy. Here is a 40 per cent underwriting of the shipbuilding industry and the shipping industry in Canada.

I also hope that some time during this debate Conservative members from the west, especially those representing prairie constituencies where grain is shipped, will give us their views on the announcement of yesterday. I acknowledge there is a tradition, whether you are a Conservative, Liberal or C.C.F.'er from the west, that you want the cheapest shipping rates possible in order to get your grain into foreign markets, and

I should like to hear from these western members whose constituents export grain as to what they feel the effect will be.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question? Where are the C.C.F. members from the west?

Mr. Fisher: Where are the C.C.F. members from the west? I was referring to C.C.F. members who have been here in the past. We have one C.C.F. member from the west now and I think we are likely to have more again. That is beside the point. I should like to hear what the western members think of this announcement and what it may do to the cost of carrying their grain to world markets.

I want to touch on another aspect of this question of free enterprise versus socialism. We have had the argument put forward in other places attached to this house that the government should get out of the operation of Northern Transportation Limited. Here is a company that is not really making money and it is in competition with private enterprise, so the theme is get rid of it and let private enterprise handle the freight transportation problem in the Yukon. We have a situation with the Polymer Corporation where a crown organization is making a great deal of money and the argument there seems to be that we should sell it right away because what business does the government have in engaging in any field in which money can be made? This is another contradiction in the free enterprise approach of the present government that I cannot understand.

There is in Canada today a free enterpriser who has spoken forth recently and who seems to have a certain amount of influence with the government. I am referring to Mr. Crump, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Not long ago on the occasion of the annual meeting of the Canadian Pacific, he made an address that was well covered in the press. I should like to quote an extract from the Gazette of May 4, 1961. Mr. Crump sets out a number of the difficulties confronting the Canadian economy at the moment, and points out that the growth of the gross national product per capita does not match that of the United States. Then, he says this:

> Among the reasons responsible for this undesirable situation, it would appear, is that Canada, to a greater degree than the United States, is committed to the mixed economy, in which state enterprise and private enterprise function in co-existence.

I can only take that statement as a criticism of the mixed economy. I should like to hear the minister's views because, as I understand it, Mr. Crump's air line has been before him and before the cabinet in relation to demands that it have a better break, as a private enterprise carrier, in the carriage of passengers.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would he explain a little further why he took that as a criticism on the part of Mr. Crump? I have read the statement but I did not take it as a criticism.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member is mistaken. I did not say this was a criticism of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Macdonnell: I thought the hon. member said it was a criticism of the mixed economy?

Mr. Fisher: Yes. Well, he set out why Canada is not doing so well. He said that among the reasons responsible for this undesirable situation it would appear is that Canada, to a greater degree than the United States, is committed to the mixed economy in which state enterprise and private enterprise function in co-existence. I can only take it from that that Mr. Crump thinks the mixed economy has gone too far. It is one explanation of why we are in a stagnation period.

Mr. Macdonnell: When I undertook to question the statement I must say I had forgotten Mr. Crump's full statement. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member.

Mr. Fisher: This is a legitimate line that Mr. Crump took. It is a legitimate line, but I do not agree with it, and his action in having Mr. McConachie down here lobbying for an extension of the franchise of Canadian Pacific Air Lines is in agreement with this particular attitude.

What I want to know is whether or not it is the attitude of the government that the mixed economy has gone too far. I know the Prime Minister was probably oversimplifying when he said the choice is going to have to be between free enterprise and socialism. Nowhere will you find a department in which you have this problem staring you right in the face to a greater extent than you do in the Department of Transport. I should like to give some examples.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Brunsden: The hon. member has used the term "mixed economy". Will he define it?

Mr. Fisher: Well, I do not want to get into a discussion of terminology, but I do not want to use a term upon which there is some misunderstanding. Let us put it this way: It is an economy in which there is a great interrelationship between private business and government, where the government not only gives the initiative in certain fields but also gives subsidies and, in certain areas it carries on operations and services that could be carried on by private enterprise.

However, I wanted to point out some examples of this problem. I am sure every member of this house received a communication from the representatives of the trucking industry after the announcement was made that subsidies were going to be paid to the railways as a result of the MacPherson commission report—at least, we assume they are. The trucking industry, on the basis of the argument by the MacPherson commission that they are prime, hard, legitimate competitors of the railways, ask what business the government has in subsidizing the railways in competition with them. Again, they have a point if you accept the commission's attitude.

What is their thesis? As I understand it, it can be taken two ways. One of their positions is that they do not want the government subsidizing the railways at all. Let us say we are talking in terms of the relevant period. Their other argument, as I understand it, is, if you are going to subsidize the railways then you have to subsidize us. Of course, the railways and the railway unions answer by saying that the truckers are already subsidized by the fact that their right of way is provided by the taxpayers. You can get lost in this kind of maze. My argument is that we are going to have a blurring of the line between free enterprise and socialism.

One of the aspects upon which I expected the minister to comment, as he was requested to do by the hon. member for Laurier, is this question of air line competition. Perhaps I can best make my point by quoting from an article that appeared in the Montreal Star of May 6, 1961 under the heading "Air line costs cause fear of another 'C.N.R. situation' ". The article goes on to say:

> Fear of "producing another C.N.R. situation" has become a dominating shadow hanging over the government's consideration of aviation policy, highly reliable sources said here today.
> The fears have been heightened, these sources continued, by an estimate produced within the government that too rapid an increase in competition in the air could quickly send this country's air line losses up to around $40 million a year. The combined losses of Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Pacific Airlines last year were $7 million.

If I could skip through the general argument and come to the last paragraph which is relevant to the request I should like to make of the minister, it reads:

> The position of the Prime Minister on these issues appears to be unknown to his colleagues in the cabinet and is accepted as vital. External affairs minister Howard Green is widely identified as McConachie's strongest supporter in the cabinet. Finance minister Fleming, justice minister Fulton, trade minister Hees and transport minister Balcer are described as strongly opposed to granting the C.P.A. request at the present time.

This last paragraph is pure speculation. I introduce it only to suggest that, in this kind of situation which is being aggravated by these speculative stories, we deserve a statement from the minister on this particular issue. I would challenge him to come out with a free enterprise stand such as that which is going to be presented to the people at the next election. It seems to me the free enterprise stand should be to give Canadian Pacific whatever they want. If you are going to be a free enterpriser you have to widen the opening in the gates for competition. Let me underline the fact that this is not our position. It seems to me that in a battle between free enterprise and socialism, this is what you have to do. I expect before this debate is over we will hear from the minister what the free enterprise position of the government is in relation to this issue.

One other point upon which the minister did not touch to any great degree is the situation with regard to the St. Lawrence seaway and the fact that the seaway has not been bringing in the amount of revenue which had been estimated. The minister is aware that there is still a very strong feeling in certain parts of Canada, particularly in the Welland-Niagara area, that tolls on the seaway at the present time are discouraging traffic through the canal. There are still demands that tolls, in so far as Canada is concerned, should be wiped out. In essence, if you abolish tolls, you would be putting the government in the position of completely underwriting a service and getting no return from the private users of that service.

In one sense I suppose this is a denial of government intervention or the mixed economy. In another way, we need an explanation from the minister as to what the views of the government are. Again, as has so often happened in Canadian history, the government has taken the lead in providing a service and that service, in terms of return, does not match what was expected so we, as taxpayers, are underwriting the venture. What is the consistent approach, if you are going to provide a service like that? It seems that we would be on much better ground if we forgot about the tolls, and if we looked at services such as the St. Lawrence canal as vital to providing a traffic condition in the country that we have needed to keep improving since a time prior to confederation and then to accept the fact that is a basic service that must be provided for.

From the canal situation I turn to what I think is a most expensive future aspect of transportation services as it relates to air. If any hon. members look at the charts at the back of the annual report of the department, I think they will note the astronomical rate of ascent of the expenses for air services and there is no indication at all that we have any horizon in sight. The cost is tremendous. This matter is having repercussions, but again the minister did not mention it in his address as far as I know. I refer him here to an article in the Financial Post of April 29 of this year which reads "Airlines pile up moans at cost of D.O.T. services".

The minister knows that D.O.T. is having difficulty in collecting from foreign air lines for the services we are providing. These services are tremendously expensive. When one looks at the aspects of meteorological services and telecommunications and realizes that as the jet age advances they are going to become more prosperous, I should like to ask again this question: Where is the free enterprise versus socialism philosophy in this matter? How do you adopt a free enterprise versus socialism philosophy and yet continue to go on providing these tremendously expensive services and extensions of services for what is in essence a fairly small sector of the country and a fairly small sector of the travelling public? It is this kind of paradox which makes this department a particularly fruitful field for inquiry on the basis of free enterprise or socialism or a middle of the road mixed economy. What are we getting into with the spiralling transportation costs in terms of the ethic that the Prime Minister has announced for his party? I think we deserve some kind of statement on this matter.

I would imagine that the costs in the next ten years would be well over $1 million just for air services and for those ancillary things that are required. I am sure we can afford this amount and I am sure these things should be provided. But when you provide this sort of thing, is it fair to accept the argument of Mr. Grant McConachie that Canadian Pacific Airlines deserve a chance to compete for and to get their share of the business in air travel? The Lord knows that the return one gets, whether it is from T.C.A. or C.P.A. or any other line, for the provision of services is just a pittance. I ask any hon. member to look at the fees which the Department of Transport gets from the provision of air services as against the expenditures. I refer not only to the capital expenditures which are growing but also to the expenditures required just to keep the services in existence. No one would want to contend that we should go back to the horse and buggy days. Neither do we wish to restrict the development of these services. However, we need to see the provision of these services against the background of this free enterprise cry of the C.P.A.

One thing about Mr. Crump's announcement that intrigued me was this. If any hon. member looks at the historical review of the Canadian Pacific Railway as provided by the dominion bureau of statistics he will see in there a number of items which indicate that the C.P.R. has had provided over a number of years a tremendous amount of subsidy from the Canadian people both in terms of money and in terms of resources that were turned over to the railway. This fact again highlights the continuing dilemma in Canadian transport: What do you do from a free enterprise point of view or from a mixed economy point of view or from a socialistic point of view? I suggest that there is a great inconsistency in any political party that stands for free enterprise and yet continues to go along in the way in which the minister went yesterday with his announcement that we are going to underwrite 40 per cent of the cost of ships built in Canada.

One of the other aspects of which I thought the minister would treat is the following which I know is a delicate matter. No one wants to talk about this matter really and yet we have a very definite trend. I refer to the matter of winter transportation in the St. Lawrence river. I am sure the minister has seen the story in yesterday's Financial Post relating to the excitement of the gulf ports such as Baie Comeau and other ports like it, over the fact that their winter shipping is going ahead by leaps and bounds.

We know that there are now icebreakers and mechanical devices which can keep the port of Montreal open for almost the whole of the year. We also know that this is a delicate political problem because it is going to have its repercussions and its effects upon Halifax and Saint John. Yet I had a figure given to me by a man who is very prominent in shipping. He pointed out to me that the average saving per ton on freight coming through Halifax and Saint John in the winter as against that coming through Montreal is $12 a ton in favour of Montreal. One only has to look at the amount of freight coming through the two maritime ports in order to realize that we are in effect subsidizing the Atlantic ports by not pushing very strongly a policy to open up Montreal to winter shipping. Again, there are political situations that need to be accounted for. But how can a free enterprise party continue to allow this kind of lack of efficiency to go on? I refer to shipping that costs $12 more a ton in effect to bring the goods to the Canadian people through an important part of the year when there are techniques and ships that can keep Montreal an open port.

One of the problems that always comes to mind in transportation as against other problems which the government faces relates to the matter of jurisdiction. That is one of the great excuses for all of us as politicians. I am sure every hon. member has been struck by this fact. If you are making a speech and somebody nails you with a question there is always a certain amount of delight in being able to say that this is really a matter for the provinces, and you can shrug off the responsibility. This just happens to be a department in which, except for the field of trucking, there is very little chance to shrug off anything because of the jurisdictional angle. For that reason it seems to me that this department, perhaps more than any other one, gives the government the opportunity to work out a coherent transportation policy for all parts of the national picture.

In that regard I should like to say this to the hon. member who suggested that the department be broken up—at least that is what I understood him to say—that it is really too big for any one man to administer. This is an argument that I have placed twice before the House of Commons in previous years and I am beginning to have doubts about it now. I am wondering if what we do not need is perhaps some more deputy ministers within this department or perhaps under ministers and then to have the minister in charge of transportation doing the job of trying to relate all the shipping and transportation problems we have in Canada; then have some five year or 10 year plan that will set objectives, set the amount of money we wish to spend and work out the amalgam we are going to have between private bodies and public bodies.

To me it is a striking thing that the royal commission on transportation really is not a royal commission on transporation but is just a royal commission on railways. I notice that a great many people have taken from the report of this royal commission that it stresses competition as the main factor in existence today within the transportation business. This is so. But one needs to underline the fact that this is competition between types of carrier services and not basically competition between carriers themselves. I can see in our transportation picture no efficacy of cutthroat competition between the carriers themselves.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

The Chairman: Does the committee give consent to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Ten minutes.

Mr. Fisher: I should only be another few minutes.

The competition which the transportation commission stresses is one which seems to me has some imperfection to it, as far as the government approach is concerned, because if we do not make some decision as to what is the best kind of service in certain areas we are going to have to have a dual service in which the various elements are rivalling each other. We can see this between T.C.A. and C.P.A.; we can see it between the various trucking companies. The approach to a solution, it seems to me, would be for the Minister of Transport to take as his goal some kind of integration of the transportation picture within a five year or a ten year plan and explain to Canadian citizens where we are going in transportation and how much it is going to cost.

I should like to offer one opinion on the matter and that is we should not be scared of either of these things; we should not be scared of this free enterprise idea and deciding that we are going to sell all government enterprises off. At the same time I do not think that in the trucking field we should go forward with the conception of underwriting all these truckers and, in effect, building up some kind of naturalized industry. It seems to me that in the next ten years what we need is some idea of our goal and how we are going to get there, and some lessening of the duplication we have. It seems to me that one thing which is required immediately is the bringing together of the transport industry within the ambit of the board of transport commissioners and some kind of integration between the various transport commissions we have at the present time. I am thinking of the national energy board, the board of transport commissioners, the air transport board and the Canadian maritime commission.

The last remarks I wish to make at this stage relate to the C.N.R. and the fact that we still have not had the president of the railway before the house committee. I do no want to impinge on the debate which was suspended on this matter but I do want to stress definitely that since I made some remarks in this house in that debate relating to my view that it was time for Mr. Gordon to go, I have received, and I am not exaggerating, hundreds of letters, wires and cards from employees of the Canadian National Railways. I received only one card that disagreed with me. That came from a little place in Saskatchewan, Tisdale, and was to the effect that no one with an English name should at any time be criticizing a good Scotsman like Mr. Gordon. All the railway workers agreed with me. Some of them pushed it even further. The point it reinforces for me in terms of this response is that the president of the Canadian National Railways has lost the confidence of his employers. I hope the government and the minister are giving very serious consideration to replacing that gentleman at the earliest possible time.

Mr. Brunsden: The hon. member used the term "employers". Did he mean "employees"?

Mr. Fisher: I have forgotten the context, but I was referring to employees.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, I should like at the outset of my remarks to congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) not only for the work he has accomplished since his elevation to that office, but also for his appointment to the Department of Transport, for the good reason that this is the first opportunity I have had to congratulate him in this house. I find that, since his appointment to the post of Minister of Transport, the present minister has been successfully continuing the work of his predecessor and is doing a gigantic task in the service of the whole country, and particularly of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I know you will not mind my saying that the province of Quebec is proud to see one of its sons, a man of the ability of the present Minister of Transport, in charge of such an important department. Since I am allotted only a limited time to deal with various matters, I should like to reply forthwith to the remarks made this morning by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) with regard to the maintenance staff in the building sold by the C.N.R. to the Quebec government. I asked the hon. member for Laurier whether he did not feel that the Quebec government, through its public works department, should take on the former C.N.R. staff, since the building in question is now the property of the Quebec government, who got it at a more than reasonable price.

If it is true, as indicated by the Liberal platform last year during the provincial election campaign, and as the Quebec premier took pleasure in repeating, that unemployment is primarily a problem of concern to provincial authorities, it is the duty of those authorities, who have entered into a contract with the C.N.R., to take on again the C.N.R. employees who were laid off as a result of the sale of this building to the provincial government. In fact, the Quebec provincial department of public works could employ those same workers, thus avoiding a rise in unemployment in Montreal.

Obviously, if C.N.R. officials did not see fit to insert a clause to this effect in the sales contract, they deserve to be blamed for not doing so; however, I believe the only person who can solve this problem is not the federal Minister of Transport, but the minister of public works of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I would have liked to deal more extensively with this subject, but since my time is limited, I turn immediately to the matter that I want to consider more specifically this afternoon and which is being more and more talked about—the deepening of the Richelieu river.

Mr. Chairman, I feel this project is worthy of the greatest consideration on the part of the federal government, but before stating the problem as I see it, I think it should be said that all responsible associations, like the Quebec chambers of commerce, various committees composed of prominent citizens in the Richelieu area and even government opponents recently converted to the idea of this project—in particular the Liberal members—all agree that the government should be requested, not to start work immediately on the construction of the canal, but to have some kind of an agency determine whether the project of a waterway between the St. Lawrence river and lake Champlain via the Richelieu river would be a paying proposition.

At the moment, United States authorities seem prepared to undertake joint surveys with the Canadian government, either through the international joint committee, known as the international joint commission on boundary waters, or a United States-Canada commission, so as to come to a definite conclusion as to the economic feasibility of this project.

I know the cost of this undertaking will be extremely high. In fact, back in 1937, it was said that the dredging of a 27-foot channel in the Richelieu river would cost some $342 million. At present prices the cost would be about $600 million, maybe more. Therefore, the matter should be carefully considered and the project should be studied from every angle before it is undertaken.

Mr. Chairman, in my humble opinion, if the Canadian government were to undertake a survey like the one I referred to earlier, we would get an answer to all the problems created by the deepening of the Richelieu; I therefore hope that our government will at the earliest possible moment, announce its intention of carrying out such a survey.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, first of all, I should like to place some emphasis upon an area close to Montreal which would, at the outset, be the principal beneficiary of the modernization of the Richelieu canal system. For convenience in discussion, I have given this area the title of the "Canadian golden triangle".

I should point out that this title is now in use in the United States. For many years the name has been given to a tongue of land in the city of Pittsburgh, which is bounded on both sides by the Alleghany and Monongahela rivers, which join to become the Ohio river, thereby forming a triangular peninsula which is called the "golden triangle" by reason of the fact that the aforesaid tongue of land is completely covered by skyscrapers without a blade of grass in sight and is very comparable to the lower tip of Manhatten island, New York. It is hardly necessary for me to point out that the fabulously wealthy city of Pittsburgh is—besides having other distinctions—the steel capital of the entire world.

I have, therefore, given this name to an area of land on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river just opposite Montreal which is roughly triangular in shape and bounded on three sides by: (1) the St. Lawrence river from Sorel to Laprairie, or Candiac; (2) the Richelieu river from Sorel to St. Jean d'Iberville; (3) the area between Laprairie and St. Johns.

This area is what I have designated as the "golden triangle" of Canada, and I shall clearly demonstrate how richly deserved this appellation will be in a very few years' time. It will qualify as the greatest concentration of industrialization in all Canada. May I be allowed to state here, Mr. Chairman, that the beautiful towns of Chambly, Fort Chambly, Richelieu and St. Mathieu are located in the heart of this triangle.

It is doubtful if a high percentage of the citizens of our Canadian metropolis are aware that over 14 per cent of the population of this country live in greater Montreal, and with no decrease in the tempo at which their population, industrial expansion and building construction are assuming progressively larger proportions. The transformation presently taking place on Dorchester boulevard in Montreal, is a sufficient indication of things to come, and proves that Canada's largest city is now bursting at the seams, and for some years has been obliged to search for suitable factory sites far beyond the city limits.

Montreal has the principal car shops and other major installations in Canada for the servicing and reconditioning of the rolling stock of our two railways. Its new international airport has facilities second to none on the continent, it is Canada's principal seaport and has now embarked upon an era of terrific industrial expansion. But where? Not to the west of the island of Montreal where expansion is circumscribed by several non-navigable streams and inferior transportation and service facilities. Nor would expansion northwards toward the foothills of the Laurentian be attractive because of increasing remoteness from the facilities of the port of Montreal, and also because of inadequate rail communication. East of Montreal on the Quebec mainland, lies a large strip of somewhat desolate farmland with no sizeable municipality between Montreal and Three Rivers. There would be no adequate provision for housing for factory workers.

Actually the port of Montreal has recently extended its jurisdiction to cover an additional 25 miles downstream along the north shore, but solely in order to ensure that no new waterfront construction will hinder the future development of Montreal navigation and port facilities, which already have reached the saturation point. Some people have emphasized the fact that it will be many years before there is any perceptible change in the Montreal harbour picture downstream from the city. It is, therefore, very obvious that the logical extension of Canada's largest seaport can take place only on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, an area which has none of the disqualifications that characterize the other three major areas to the north, east and west.

Furthermore, shipment of merchandise manufactured in industrial plants situated to the north, east or west of Montreal can only reach the harbour after the usual annoying delays encountered because of the serious traffic problem in this metropolis, for which no alleviation appears to be in sight. Contrariwise, the situation is becoming worse.

Implementation of the Richelieu canal modernization project should, of course, be a highly desirable concomitant to the utilization of the south shore or the extension of the port of Montreal facilities. The physical aspects of the canal project are briefly these; to deepen the present Richelieu canal, which now has only a depth of six feet and is about 100 years old, to 26 feet, the same as the seaway and, the construction of a new 15 miles of canal from Longueuil to Friar's island or from Laprairie basin, if the route from Sorel to St. Johns through the Richelieu river itself proves to be not economic or not logically possible. This canal, when completed, will provide the third side of the golden triangle. Two entrances will thus be available for United States bound traffic; (a) one at Sorel, Quebec, to handle upriver traffic from Seven Islands, Three Rivers, Port Cartier, European ports, etc. This would be a short route for iron ore shipments from new Quebec and Labrador, and newsprint from Three Rivers where the world's largest pulp and paper mills are situated, destined for New York city, which consumes one million tons of newsprint annually. And (b), the Longueuil entrance to the canal to be used for shipment to and from Montreal, the upper St. Lawrence and great lakes ports.

Admittedly, implementation of the canal project would be extremely costly, but as well as lower shipping costs for Canadian products to United States markets, commensurate benefits would similarly transform the economy of three large United States industrial states, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

It will be noted that I respectfully recommend the deepening of the waterway to 26 feet—the same as the seaway. Already Lieutenant Colonel Lucien Dansereau, a member of the international joint commission, has indicated that he, having made an intensive study of the project, as well as official Washington, would recommend that we go along, as of now, on a basis of a 12-foot depth of the canal, but I feel that if the costly undertaking were justified at all, it should have the same depth as the seaway. I feel we should adopt that position rather than compromising on the 12 feet and then, I am sure, having all the expense of a further inevitable deepening in years to come.

It will be readily seen that a 440 mile waterway between Montreal and New York, instead of the 1,670 mile trip down the St. Lawrence, around the Gaspe peninsula and thence along the Atlantic coast, would represent an enormous saving in transportation charges on many millions of tons of waterborne freight, annually.

I should like now to make reference to the hazards of the Atlantic route during war time. An aspect of this question that we cannot possibly afford to ignore concerns the effect that another world war would have upon the safety of our Atlantic communications. One of the latest editions of Janes' "Fighting Ships" published in London—conceded to be the leading authoritative reference for all statistical information concerning the navies of the world—claims that soviet Russia has 500 submarines available for Atlantic service, an undisclosed number of which are nuclear propelled and equipped with the latest in armaments. Janes do not exclude the possibility that certain of these submarines will be able to fire ballistic missiles without surfacing. R.V.B. Blackman editor of Janes, says:

> In the event of hostilities, the allied navies might be threatened by 450 to 500 submarines, and the damage they could inflict on our material, personnel and economy staggers the imagination, when it is remembered that at the height of world war II, a little more than a fifth of this total were enough to bring the United Kingdom to the brink of starvation; not only as regards food for Britain's population, but as regards the vital raw materials required to prosecute the war.

Janes further believe that Russian submarines could seal off all communications between Europe and America, and it is well known that Soviet underwater craft have been caught making reconnaissances in the gulf of St. Lawrence, off the American Atlantic coast, and the coast of Argentina as well. We now live in a very small world.

The exposed Atlantic route would accordingly not be available for iron ore shipments from Port Cartier and Seven Islands once a world war got under way. So a short, deep water, sheltered route of 450 miles only between Montreal and New York is an absolute must.

Incidentally, Rear Admiral H. F. Pullen, flag officer, Atlantic coast and commander of the Atlantic submarine area under NATO, in a powerfully argued article appearing in the Atlantic Advocate of January, 1959 took a very pessimistic view of our defensive resources against the nuclear propelled Soviet submarines, some probably armed with ballistic missiles, which might even be capable of being launched by a submarine without surfacing.

Canada is not a member of the nuclear club; but we must agree that upon what success the western nuclear powers have in establishing amicable relations with the communists will depend whether we have peace or war.

All the United States authorized groups and organizations, having either a geographical, economic or political interest in the implementation of the project, have been working feverishly to get the canal modernization under way, such as the state of New York, the state of Vermont, the joint state, New York and Vermont, commission on the Champlain basin, the port of New York authority and the United States army corps of engineers. Besides, the congressional delegation from both these states I mentioned have instructions from their state governments to place pressure on Washington to schedule an early commencement of the project.

There is little doubt in my mind, Mr. Chairman, that if the Kennedy administration can be persuaded that the short, modernized, sheltered waterway between Montreal and New York is absolutely necessary to over-all continental defence, Washington may not be inclined to take no as Ottawa's answer; there is too much at stake. The project was also strongly endorsed by Governor Nelson Rockefeller during his gubernatorial campaign. It is perhaps unfortunate that practically all of the physical and engineering aspects of the work lie in Canadian territory.

Let me return for a moment to the potentialities of the "golden triangle". Here are some highlights that were suggested by competent observers. It contains the entrance to the St. Lawrence seaway. It would contain all entrances to the proposed Richelieu canal. At this point let us not forget that the valley of the Richelieu river is the cradle of the Canadian nation. It is the hub of direct rail routes and highways connecting Montreal with (a) the eastern United States, wherein lies the greatest concentration of United States markets and industrialization; and (b) direct rail routes to the maritime provinces. The Steel Company of Canada is now operating its new $10 million plant at Contrecoeur. The Quebec Iron and Titanium Corporation has spent an additional $5 million on new plant facilities, making $80 million in all invested by this ambitious company in Quebec province. Thousands and thousands of new jobs are already available. Nationally known companies have allocated a total of $500 million for plant facilities in the area, either already completed, under construction or projected, with a potential of 70,000 industrial jobs on completion of the schedule.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Natural gas from western Canada is almost available in the triangle for industrial and residential purposes. The area is also serviced by the Shawinigan Water and Power Company or, rather, its subsidiary, the Southern Canada Power Company and Hydro-Quebec. The tonnage of two-way traffic anticipated for a modernized Richelieu canal would be comparable with, or even exceed, present traffic on the seaway.

Many homesites approved by the crown company, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as well as by industrial plants for their workers, are under construction in the triangle to provide adequate housing commensurate with the projected industrial expansion. Schools, churches, recreation and shopping centres will follow in due course. A large part of the triangle will be only 20 minutes distant from downtown Montreal.

I repeat, the "golden triangle" a few years hence could conceivably become the greatest concentration of industrialization to be found anywhere in Canada. I would therefore express the hope that the government will endeavour by every means at its disposal to keep implementation of the canal project very much in mind.

It may not be out of place, Mr. Chairman, when discussing developments of properties, whether in industrial or residential districts, or in desolate areas where an abundance of valuable mineralization has been discovered, to recall that in August, 1958, when opening the Canadian National exhibition at Toronto, our Prime Minister made a vibrant appeal for acceleration in the exploitation of our fabulous hinterland, and he further drew attention to the startling fact that only 10 per cent of the total area of our country is privately owned, the remaining 90 per cent of our vast expansive territory consisting of crown lands being held either by federal or provincial governments.

Those who remind us that a sizeable percentage of this area is uninhabitable tundra or barren land in the far north do not take sufficient cognizance of the fact that we are living in the atomic age. I believe that certain nuclear physicists of impeccable professional reputation have even hinted that outdoor air conditioning, climate control, may well be within the range of future possibilities. This could hardly be more fantastic than the circumnavigation of the earth by a guided missile, already a "fait accompli".

Far too high a percentage of our native Canadians are completely indifferent as to the ownership of property, probably because Canada has more territory than she knows what to do with. Most immigrants coming to Canada to seek homes and careers have been truly amazed at our general apathy when it comes to the acquisition of real estate. These new Canadians coming from the crowded countries of central or eastern Europe where every square foot of land has been chained down for centuries will often forgo the necessities of life in order to keep up their instalments on a piece of property in what they often call our undeveloped country.

What Canada needs more than anything else is a tremendous infusion of new wealth. We have at our back door the last natural treasure house left on the continent, with an abundance of valuable mineralization whose development is still in the early stages. Its exploitation should be accelerated as rapidly as the necessary capital and equipment can be obtained and, may I hope, primarily for Canadians.

Let me conclude, Mr. Chairman, with a reference to my own province. No government is perfect, but Quebec citizens have not entirely forgotten the achievements of the predecessor government of the province of Quebec for the benefit of Quebec agriculture and for the development of our superb natural resources as well as the massive industrialization program inaugurated and now attaining higher levels by leaps and bounds, and which will be crowned by the spectacular exploitation of the "golden triangle". There is no comparison between the transformation that has taken place in the economy of our province in recent years and contrariwise the lethargy and vacuum that characterized the Liberal regimes.

In point of history, Quebec is our oldest province and the intensive industrialization of the "golden triangle", not to mention new Quebec, will maintain the pre-eminence of the banner province for many years to come. Thank you.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson)?

I should like to ask him who wrote the speech he has just read in English?

Mr. Balcer: You are so considerate.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, I was not aware that the member for St. Denis wanted to be funny, though he did give us a sample of that yesterday. In any event, rather than making a fool of myself and making mistakes like he does when he uses English, I decided to write my speech and keep as close to it as possible in the delivery, something I have a perfect right to do. I would advise the hon. member to do the same, as it would improve not only his English, but also his French when he uses French.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take part in the discussion this afternoon, but it is so seldom that I have an opportunity to support a position taken by the member for Chambly-Rouville that I felt compelled to rise after him to urge the government to reconsider the possibility of going ahead with the Richelieu waterway project.

I must, however, express regret that the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville did not make his speech before the government took the decision last December not to go on with plans for deepening the Richelieu. It is a bit like locking the stable after the horse has fled. Perhaps the hon. member would have been in a better position than I to urge the government to give serious consideration to the Richelieu waterway project.

I attended the conference where the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) stated that the government had no intention to go ahead with the project, and indeed saw no need to conduct a formal investigation of the scheme.

After hearing the speeches made in this house by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, as well as others who have referred to this matter, and after reading the briefs sent to the government by Canadian organizations as well as by representatives of U.S. administrations, I think the government should realize that the Richelieu seaway project is causing great interest everyhere. Very serious studies were made from the economic, as well as from the technical angles, and it seems that, not only is the project economically sound but is in the best interest of the Richelieu valley area, and also of this country's economy as a whole.

I deplore the fact that the house should not have been informed of the result of the surveys which the government says were undertaken with regard to the project. I also regret that it should be so difficult to find out the contents of the correspondence recently exchanged between the government of the United States and the government of Canada in respect of a joint study which the U.S. government is willing to undertake, because I feel that the expenses incurred for such surveys would be insignificant and that, because of the interest shown in this project, they would, to my mind, be amply justified.

The other day, during a discussion in this house with regard to the Richelieu seaway, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggested that the Liberals had never done anything about this matter since 1935. There seems to be some confusion in this respect, in spite of the fact that the reason for which it was impossible to make any further progress with regard to the project has been repeated over and over again. Therefore, I believe it would be well to say once again that a start had been made on the Richelieu seaway project and that some work was done in 1937, because, at the time, the St. Ours locks were deepened and extended.

It was also in 1937 that the Liberal government of the day built the Friar island dam which, as you know, has not yet been used but was specially erected for the purposes of the Richelieu seaway project.

Therefore, it is not only false but unfair to suggest that the Liberal government did nothing about it when, after all, the work had already been carried out at that time. On the other hand, there was, in 1937, the boundary waters commission, which, after studying the project, suggested waiting for the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway, before considering the deepening of the Richelieu; and that is exactly what happened.

I also would like to point out to the government, and more particularly to the Minister of Transport, that what we are asking today is not necessarily the completion of the Richelieu seaway, but simply that some serious consideration be given to the project. As you know, a project like this one requires a joint survey with the United States. That is all we, on this side of the house, are asking for at the moment. I hope the government will be in a position to reconsider that project more favourably and, at least, to agree to proceed with the already initiated economic survey.

The second point I should like to bring up is about the statement made yesterday by the minister. He surely knows how interested I have been in the legislation he is planning to introduce in the house to provide assistance to shipyards.

A shipyard in my riding has had trouble in recent years—as did all other shipyards elsewhere—in getting contracts and work for its skilled workers.

I do not know to what extent the measure announced by the minister yesterday will provide assistance to shipyards. At first sight, the grants seem generous and I imagine that many shipyards will use the money that the government seems prepared to make available to them.

If I am not mistaken, those grants will simply be included in the estimates and will not be provided by special legislation. I sincerely hope that this government's offer to the shipyards will not be shot through with administrative difficulties and that the assistance will be readily available to the shipyards.

On this matter, I suggest that the minister tell us in his reply whether the federal government's share of the cost will apply to all vessels or only to those of a certain tonnage. Will there be restrictions? For instance, will the cost sharing apply to the building of 10,000-ton vessels, to ocean-going vessels? Could the minister tell me also whether this cost sharing will apply to any ocean-going vessel, including freighters, tankers and liners.

Mr. Balcer: With my hon. friend's permission, I shall tell him at once that this will apply to any self-propelled vessel. It will not apply to barges towed by tug-boats, for instance. It will apply to any self-propelled boat. It will not apply, however, to pleasure yachts.

Mr. Cardin: I thank the minister very much for this information. I am all the more happy about the legislation he announced yesterday. At last, our shipyards will have the means they need in order to remain in operation.

However, I reserve the right to criticize the measure, if necessary, once it is implemented and after we have had a chance to see how it works. For the time being I congratulate the minister for announcing this measure which, I think, may provide assistance to the shipyards.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister permit a question based on the answer he gave to the member for Richelieu-Vercheres. (Mr. Cardin)? How much do the officials of the Department of Transport think it will cost to carry out the policy which he announced in the house yesterday?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, as stated this morning, I intend to answer all those questions at the same time. I will answer this question when I answer those of the other hon. members.

Mr. Johnson: Would the member for Richelieu-Vercheres permit me a question?

He said a moment ago that the Minister of Transport had positively closed the door on the project. Is that really what he meant?

Mr. Cardin: Well, I was present at the conference when the minister made this statement, and I, like all the guests at this dinner, had the impression, that the minister had definitively closed the door on this project.

Mr. Johnson: I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman, but I am making it a question of privilege. I was personally present at that conference, as was the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres.

Mr. Chevrier: That is no question of privilege.

Mr. Johnson: The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres stated that all the guests, all those attending shared the opinion he has now expressed. I object to such a statement and I could say, with equal truthfulness, that many persons suggested that there was still hope and that there had been indications that, because of the cost of the project, its implementation would be difficult for the moment.

Mr. Cardin: Since the hon. member does not share my views and is not yet convinced that the government has closed the door on the project, I would ask him to refer to the answers given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to questions on this matter only a few days ago.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the argument between the two hon. members has to do with a statement I made in Montreal. I am the one most involved, for it concerns parts of my speech. I would therefore like to repeat what I said at that time: "At the present time, an economic study is being made in my department on the possibility of deepening the Richelieu river".

This study is being contunued, but at that time I had come to the conclusion, after examining the different reports prepared on the subject by my officials, that the expenditure the project would require would not be justified in the circumstances.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, would the minister allow me a question? Could he tell me whether the survey now being made by his department is another of those secret surveys that the house is never told about?

Mr. Balcer: Well, Mr. Chairman, everyone knows very well that the reports of surveys undertaken by the officials of a department are for the exclusive use of the department; they are privileged documents, never tabled in the house.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to make a momentary interjection merely to comment on the speech made by the hon. member for Port Arthur. I tried to find him to ask him to come back into the chamber to hear this interjection, but I have been unable to do so.

The hon. member, in his speech, referred to criticisms he had received of Mr. Gordon, the president of Canadian National Railways. I regret that he did that, and I suggest that anonymous criticism of this kind from people who communicated privately with the hon. member, is unfortunate. I suggest further that the time when Mr. Gordon's ability, character and experience can be assessed is when he appears, as he will, before the relevant committee of the house dealing with railway questions.

Mr. Winch: Perhaps the hon. member for Port Arthur would like to answer now? I understand he will answer. Since the hon. member just entered the chamber, I thought perhaps he might have heard the interjection and desire to answer now.

Do I understand from the minister that after the first item of his estimates is carried he will supply the details relating to the subsidy on the building of ships? Is that what the minister intends to do?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, what I said was that after every member has spoken on the first item I shall attempt to answer all the questions that have been raised. In so far as the questions relating to the new shipping policy are concerned, the answers to those questions will be covered by the regulations that will be passed by the governor in council and tabled in the house. I will certainly answer all the questions it is possible for me to answer.

Mr. Winch: The reason for my question is that I am most interested in knowing the details of this policy. As I said yesterday, I am a little bit disturbed about the amount of help this will be to the people on the B.C. coast. I am hoping the minister will give some indication as to how this policy is going to help the fishermen on the B.C. coast with the purchase of new ships.

In addition to that, we are now considering estimates which I understand were prepared months ago for this department. Am I right, sir, in believing that the minister now has to introduce supplementary estimates in order to get the funds required for his new policy?

Mr. Balcer: That is quite right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Winch: Can the minister give us an idea of the amount of the supplementary estimate?

Mr. Balcer: My understanding is that it will be a one dollar item.

Mr. Winch: That is the very reason why I rose. Do we understand then that the minister has no idea of what this is going to mean or what is going to be the effect? He is only going to put in $1. That means then that $1 is going to be of such a nature as to cover whatever it means, and I hope it means a great deal. How do we know the exact plan? Is it completely on the Canadian content of these ships or on the entire cost of these ships?

Mr. Balcer: I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member for Laurier who asked me a similar question earlier. I told him that I would answer him at the end of the debate on the first item. I do not want to be unfair to him and I also do not want to be unfair to the hon. member for Vancouver East. However, I will answer whatever questions he now asks and I will do so all together after the last speaker on this first item.

Mr. Chevrier: In view of what the minister said and of what was said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, will the minister answer this particular question? As to this important program, consisting of two divisions, to assist the ship operators and the shipbuilders and the fishing industry—will all of it be put into effect by the insertion of a $1 item in the estimates.

Mr. Balcer: Yes. It will be inserted as a $1 item because there is no limitation to this subsidy. We do not want to restrict shipbuilding in Canada. I think our regulations will be drafted in such a manner that we can look after all reasonable requests from shipbuilders and ship owners. No ship operator, I am quite sure, will risk 60 per cent of the cost of a ship if there is no market for the services of that ship. However, on the other hand, if a definite amount were set up, the result would be to limit this subsidy policy and we do not want to do that.

Mr. Winch: That is the very thing that has me bothered.

Mr. Pearson: On that point, may I say this. Yesterday we heard from the minister a statement enunciating a very important policy in respect of a very important matter and making a far-reaching change in our shipping policy. That change is not to be made in this important matter by the introduction of legislation in the House of Commons. Legislation has been introduced during this session on matters of far less importance than the matters which were dealt with by my hon. friend yesterday. On this occasion in respect of this extremely important and far-reaching change of policy, the government is going to proceed by way of item in the estimates rather than by way of legislation. The government is going to proceed not only by way of an item in the estimates but by a dollar item in the estimates, a procedure which they used to attack very bitterly in the past in respect of far less important matters than a change in Canadian shipping policy.

The minister has said that it is necessary or desirable to handle the matter in this way because no one knows how much money may be required. That is perfectly true, but it does not prevent the government from making an estimate of the amount of money that might be required and putting that amount in an estimate. Then if it is not sufficient, they can always get extra money in the next estimates. There is no reason in the world why the matter should be dealt with in this way or why parliament should not be given some idea of the general extent of the program. However, in connection with a change in Canadian ship policy which is of national and international importance, we now find that this government is going to proceed by putting a $1 item in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Winch: The Leader of the Opposition has in part covered what I wished to say when I rose. I must admit that I cannot understand the attitude the government is taking to this most important matter. It will, of course, be realized that the statement made yesterday by the minister was on a most important matter. I simply cannot understand the approach that is being made by the minister and by the government.

The minister has within the last five minutes said that this matter is going to be covered by a supplementary vote of $1. That statement indicates to me that he does not know what the program is going to cost. Not knowing what it is going to cost, the government or the minister puts in the supplementary estimates an item of $1. However, he told us yesterday it meant 10,000 direct jobs in the shipbuilding industry and 10,000 indirect jobs. If the minister can tell us, as he told us yesterday, that it means 20,000 jobs, he must have some idea of the cost to the government over and above the cost of $1.

I say quite bluntly that if the hon. member was not being political yesterday because there is a by-election in Esquimalt-Saanich and because there are two shipbuilding yards in Esquimalt-Saanich, then he must have some information about the cost. In addition to that, there is this consideration. I am certain that every member of this committee will vote any money required to rebuild the shipbuilding industry of Canada. But the way in which the minister is now presenting the matter to us means that the House of Commons is completely in the dark and that he is asking for a blank cheque. I do not believe in blank cheques, Mr. Chairman. I do not believe in the $1 item technique in this instance. Surely the minister can give us more information, more direction or be a little bit more specific. Surely he can act more in keeping with the integrity of a cabinet minister and not so much in keeping with expediency having regard to a by-election in Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Balcer: I think the document that I read yesterday stated in very clear fashion the shipping policy of this government to come to the rescue of the shipping and shipbuilding industries in this country which in the last 15 years have been left in an awful state by the previous government.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the present government. Hon. members opposite have been in office for four years.

Mr. Balcer: Yes; and we came up with something.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hon. gentlemen opposite have been in office for four years and this policy was forecast six months ago.

Mr. Balcer: The shipbuilders and the ship operators understood what I said yesterday.

Mr. Pearson: Parliament does not matter.

Mr. Balcer: What I said yesterday was that we wanted shipbuilding to have a chance to survive in Canada.

Mr. Winch: That is right.

Mr. Balcer: I think we are bringing in a measure that will really give us a place in the sun. What I said was very clear. We are giving a subsidy of 35 per cent on shipping built in Canada, to be registered under Canadian registry. This 35 per cent is given in order to provide an incentive. It will be put up to 40 per cent until March 31, 1963. In addition, we intend to help the fishing industry in a manner which would give our fishermen a chance to compete with foreign trawlers operating near the coast of Canada. We intend to help the fishermen who are working in very small boats. We are going to look after them, too.

Mr. Winch: Boat construction?

Mr. Balcer: If the hon. member would read what I said yesterday he would not be so worried. We are not doing this only to please the people from Esquimalt-Saanich. We are doing what this government has always done. We are trying to answer the needs of the Canadian people in general and, in this instance, provide help for an industry which has known great days in the history of Canada. Canada has always built ships. This new policy has been extremely well received by the industry, by labour, and by the public in general. I am asking all hon. members to support the government when it comes before parliament with such forward looking legislation whose only purpose is to help Canadians to help themselves.

Mr. Pearson: What the minister has said is, of course, completely irrelevant to the point we were discussing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: It was completely irrelevant, and perhaps the minister will come back to the point and forget about the by-elections for the moment.

An hon. Member: Who spoke about them?

Mr. Pearson: The minister has said that this policy is of extreme importance and will prove of great advantage to the people of Canada. We hope it will. When the time comes, we shall make our views clear with respect to that policy. The minister does not intend to proceed with respect to this policy by way of legislation. He says we can proceed by way of legislation with respect to a good many matters which are of less importance, but when we deal with shipping policy —a policy which the minister says will put the industry on a new foundation—we are to proceed by way of an item in the estimates.

The minister said we have to do it that way, irrespective of the rights and privileges of parliament, because we do not know how much money we shall have to spend. But the minister told us yesterday we know how much more employment will be created—that it was going to employ 10,000 people directly and 10,000 indirectly.

Mr. Balcer: I said "over 10,000" and the reports of the shipbuilders say it will be even more than that.

Mr. Pearson: I hope it will be. Nevertheless, my point is this: the minister has the details when it comes to the employment which may be created but when we ask him how much this might cost he says he has no idea, so we are to proceed by way of an item in the estimates. We have to put an item of $1 in the estimates. That item of $1 was something against which hon. members opposite used to inveigh when we on this side formed the government. We may have to spend $10 million, $15 million or $20 million, but the hon. gentleman does not know how much; the government will spend whatever is necessary to put this policy into effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: But why not put down an estimate of what this project is likely to cost? If you need more money you can get more above $10 million just as well as you can get more above $1 million. Why put down $1 to implement a policy of national and international importance which is going to have such far-reaching consequences?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Is the hon. member about to ask a question? If not, other hon. members have indicated their desire to speak. I appreciate there has been a debate on a certain point but, I am trying to recognize alternately, as is the usual practice, those hon. members who have indicated their desire to speak.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) for the decisively progressive policy he announced yesterday regarding coastal shipping in Canadian waters and shipbuilding.

With all due deference to opposition members who complain about this declared policy of the government, I am sure that it is an asset which will help solve the problem this industry is facing by improving the conditions in a field that has been neglected for many years by the previous administration.

I would like also to thank the minister for the kind support he gave me in all the representations made in connection with the Soulanges canal.

Last fall, at the request of the Vaudreuil-Soulanges voters, the minister was kind enough to use his influence to hasten the work on the jetties which now replace the swing-bridges over the Soulanges canal.

At the request of these same people, the minister agreed to set aside part of the properties along the canal, which will be used as a lure to get the industries that have been needed for so long in that part of my constituency. In fact the establishment of industries there would provide profitable and stable employment in a section of my constituency.

Despite the province of Quebec offer to take over the whole Soulanges canal, which would have relieved him of a heavy task, the minister, with all his many occupations, worked overtime in the interest of a population which is grateful to him for his devotion. May I be allowed here to thank him for that, both in my own name and on behalf of my constituents. With reference to the offer made by the province of Quebec to take back all properties along the Soulanges canal, I must say that, at first glance, one must be more than a realist not to accept it at once, because the decisions to be taken will affect the economic future of a whole area. I believe we must, by all means possible, ensure the prosperity of an area that deserves to be developed. The minister of fisheries and game of the province of Quebec wishes to obtain all properties along Soulanges canal in order to set up there a fish-breeding centre and develop camping grounds and parks for tourists. We approve all those projects and we admire those who planned them.

That is why we have refused to sell any part of those lands to private individuals. We were keeping them for the department of game and fisheries of the province of Quebec.

However, it is feared in Vaudreuil-Soulanges that the transfer of the canal to the provincial government will cause some trouble.

Over the past few months, hundreds of provincial employees who had lost their jobs have been replaced by supporters of the new party in power, as a result of directives from a group of patronage distributors.

The people of Vaudreuil-Soulanges would not want the plans worked out by the minister of games and fisheries of Quebec to be used only to reward those who voted for the party temporarily in power in Quebec.

I should like at this point to draw a comparison between what was done in Ottawa after the Conservatives were returned to office in 1957, and what has been going on since the Liberal party took over in Quebec last June.

Out of 600-odd federal civil servants resident in Vaudreuil-Soulanges, none have lost their jobs for showing a preference for any of the political parties represented in this house.

All employees who had been operating the Soulanges canal from the beginning have been able, through our efforts, to find other employment either on the St. Lawrence seaway or at Lachine or at Ste. Anne de Bellevue or elsewhere, or have been pensioned off.

The wholesale dismissals by the provincial government of workers who in fact had only exercised their rights as free citizens are not likely to improve relations with political opponents who have very different views on the way to deal with economic problems.

Such actions show a total lack of social sense and Christian charity. The Liberals should have shown greater wisdom and greater respect for the working classes of Quebec.

I feel duty bound to do everything in my power to protect from political retaliation on the part of the Quebec Liberal party, those free citizens whose only desire is to be able to earn an honest living.

Soulanges canal was built at the turn of the century for a specific purpose: to improve navigation between Montreal and the great lakes so that 14-foot draft ships could increase their cargoes between the two points.

It had never entered into the minds of the public men, of the economists and engineeers of that time to make it a fishpond or a tourist's paradise. Let the Quebec minister of game and fisheries think of turning it overnight into a hatchery, if he so wishes. Let him dream. But a canal, an economic instrument, cannot be altered into a centre for tourists and sportsmen without undergoing deep changes.

The Tory government is ready to let go of the most important section of the canal to serve this purpose. I refer to all the area west of Pointe Cascades extending for 13 miles in the direction of lake St. François and which includes:

1. A strip approximately 200 feet wide all along the south side of the canal;

2. About 10 acres of fine land and the power station at Côteau du Lac;

3. A piece of land of about 60 acres between the canal and the C.N.R. line near Côteau du Lac;

4. A large piece of land on the shore of lake St. François, at Côteau Landing; for which we refused $15,000;

5. All the land north of the canal where the provincial department of roads built highway No. 2 without having to pay anything for expropriation purposes. That is what the federal government is offering the department of game and fisheries for the fabulous amount of $1—referring to the amount of $1 mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson)—this is a genuine offer of $1—not to mention the $100,000 it cost the federal government last fall to replace the swing bridges.

If we were asking half a million dollars for all those properties, the minister, Hon. Gerard Levesque, woud be justified in haggling about it, but we are offering him without any charge more than 90 per cent of the Soulanges canal properties.

We want to offer industrialists and people who are looking for an ideal site to set up an industry of some kind or to expand their present industries, the Pointe Cascades sector which is connected to the seaway, only two miles away, by lake St. François. We merely wish to diversify sources of employment in the Soulanges district. We feel that that is a sounder policy, that it rests on better principles than if Soulanges had all its eggs in one basket, as the Liberals would have it. We are anxious to please the tourists but we feel that our main concern must be the working class which would find permanent employment in the district through the establishment of small and medium size industries.

A campaign has been going on in Quebec for some time now whose object is to have French Canadians get control of part of their economy. Many of our young people wish to set up their own industry, but cannot afford to have their meager capital engulfed in one swoop in the buying of expensive properties near the metropolis. Our suggestion meets their desires and, if implemented, would be of a great help to them.

Let the Quebec game and fisheries and trade and commerce departments agree on a proposal which would reserve Pointe Cascades or a certain area of the canal for the establishment of small Quebec industries, and we shall lose no time in concluding this business about the Soulanges canal. But we do not want to have them talk only of fishing and camping. Low wage earners too are entitled to their share in the development of the Quebec territory.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) stated this morning that he had some knowledge of the petitions of the Soulanges chambers of commerce urging that the entire Soulanges canal be surrendered to the province of Quebec. Well, Mr. Chairman, there is only one chamber of commerce in the whole Soulanges area. However, there is an industrial development committee whose purpose, as its name indicates, is to promote the establishment of industries in Soulanges.

Having attended a number of meetings of the Soulanges chamber of commerce and of various organizations in the area, I am in a position to state that the people of Vaudreuil-Soulanges are now prepared to accept for lack of anything better, the scheme put forward by the Quebec department of game and fisheries. But if some industry expressed a desire to locate at Pointe Cascades or at the other end of Vaudreuil-Soulanges and was able to provide 200 or 300 permanent jobs, the whole population would support the new scheme.

Besides, the federal government has no authority to promote any specific industrialization in any area of the country. There is no other means to encourage the establishment of industries in the Soulanges area than to announce that some crown buildings and lands, comprising the Soulanges canal property, shall be put up for sale, in accordance with departmental regulations and practices. In such a way, we shall know who is interested, what industries and investors wish to set up an industry in the Soulanges area. We shall know at the same time whether that area is suitable for industrial expansion.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me our action should inspire the Quebec legislators, and that instead of trying to confuse the issue and multiply promises, they should show more realism and begin by carrying out their fish-breeding project and creating that anglers' and tourists' paradise in the area we have offered them.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to refer to another matter in respect of the Department of Transport in which I take great interest.

Having had the opportunity to meet members of the Canadian air lines pilots' association, I was shocked to learn how to what a marked extent our once dynamic aviation air lines industry, mainly Canadian Pacific Air Lines and Trans-Canada Air Lines, have lost business to their foreign competitors. This has had the result of forcing our major air lines to face the possibility of having to discharge nearly 100 pilots within the near future. The discharging of 100 pilots will result in approximately 1,000 jobs lost in hangars and airports, with a subsequent loss of employment for well paid technicians. It is pathetic to hear about the plight of professional pilots who will now have to emigrate to Europe in order to continue in their profession or abandon their profession and seek positions in inferior fields of employment. This same situation applies to thousands of skilled Canadian air lines' employees who will have to seek other sources of income.

This situation has been caused by an imbalance and weakness in the Canadian air lines as compared with the more aggressive foreign competitors on this continent and abroad. As an example of this I should like to cite a few facts regarding our major air lines' weakness in improving their methods in this field of transportation. I shall first list the routes from Canadian cities served unilaterally by foreign carriers. There exist over 2,000 miles Canadian-United States border between Toronto and Victoria, where no Canadian air line has scheduled trans-border rights. This large area of Canada is served by five United States carriers, which are as follows: 1. Edmonton-Winnipeg-Minneapolis-Chicago and the northwest; 2. Edmonton-Calgary-Great Falls-Denver-Las Vegas and Los Angeles; 3. Regina-Minot, North Dakota and north central United States; 4. Calgary-Spokane-Portland, San Francisco and the west coast; 5. Vancouver direct to Seattle-San Francisco-Los Angeles. These areas are served by the following air lines respectively: Northwest Air Lines, Western Air Lines, North Central Air Lines, West Coast Air Lines and United Air Lines.

No Canadian air line has the right to serve the capital of the United States from either Ottawa, Toronto or Montreal or western Canada. This service is provided by Eastern Air Lines and Northwest Air Lines exclusively.

Another imbalance exists because no Canadian air line is allowed rights over the following major North American routes: Ottawa-Washington, Toronto-Washington, Montreal-Washington and western Canada-Washington, which are served by Eastern Air Lines, American Air Lines, Eastern Air Lines and Northwest Air Lines, respectively. This same imbalance exists between Montreal-Frankfurt and Montreal-Amsterdam, which are served by Lufthansa and K.L.M., respectively.

A comparison can be made between the United States and Canada in respect of their air carriers between the United States, Canada and Europe. Whereas the United States carriers in 1960 enjoyed 50 per cent of the north Atlantic passenger traffic between the United States and Europe, Canada provided only 33 per cent of the scheduled passenger flights between Canada and Europe. This is apart from passenger charter flights where greater imbalance exists. On the north Atlantic routes, there are about 49 foreign carrier weekly flights compared with 25 Canadian carrier weekly flights. This makes the percentage of weekly flights originating in Canada 33.8.

I submit that although a reasonable balance of flights exists on the Canadian-United Kingdom routes under the Canadian-British pool arrangement, this balance is completely destroyed by the fact that the passenger fare from western Canada to the United Kingdom through the New York gateway via Toronto is identical to that from western Canada to the United Kingdom through Montreal under the pool. I suggest then that the pool can be, and is being, circumvented by way of New York to an alarming extent. I point out that while the Canadian passenger may choose between 22 Canadian and 23 British flights per week under the pool arrangement, he has 45 additional British flights per week to choose from via Toronto-New York at the same price.

The above advantage to the British carrier is funneling Canadian passengers to the United Kingdom through New York. This advantage is also enjoyed by Air France, K.L.M. and Lufthansa to continental Europe. These foreign carriers maintain large sales offices in every major Canadian city. The figure of 33.8 per cent of the north Atlantic schedule air service from Canada now provided by Canadian carriers is being vastly diluted by the great number of weekly flights available through New York at the same price.

I should like to place on record a table indicating the number of weekly flights available to the western Canadian passenger on foreign carriers to Europe via New York:

Carrier	Flights per week
Air France	27
K.L.M.	25
Lufthansa	22
B.O.A.C.	45
Total	119

This is the total number of weekly flights operated by direct competitors in the Canadian market to New York-Europe.

Although figures are difficult to obtain on charter flights, the following is a good example of the lack of push on the part of our Canadian air lines' salesmen:

Charter flights planned for period May-September, 1961
B.O.A.C.	North Atlantic	185
T.C.A.	North Atlantic	30
Charter flights operated May-September, 1960
B.O.A.C.	North Atlantic	120
T.C.A.	North Atlantic	14

This gives a ratio of approximately six British charter flights to one Canadian on the north Atlantic. A similar situation is found in the north Atlantic air freight service. At the present time no Canadian carrier operates an all-cargo service over the north Atlantic. Total cargo carried over this route increased by 33.7 per cent—United States carriers included—during 1960. Total cargo carried in 1960 between Canada and Europe was 4,664.6 tons. The share of this amount carried by Canadian air lines in the holds of passenger flights was 1,518.6 tons. This amounts to 32 per cent of the total cargo carried to and from Canada and Europe. Scheduled cargo flights from Canada to Europe planned for 1961 are as follows: K.L.M., six weekly; B.O.A.C., two weekly; C.P.A., nil; T.C.A., nil. B.O.A.C. have two DC-7's converted to freighters and are converting two more. Canadian carriers have similar aircraft which are suitable for cargo conversion. In Canada we also have the best cargo aircraft in the world, designed specifically for air freight, namely the CL-44. To date, no Canadian carrier has given any indication of interest in this national achievement.

Another unfavourable imbalance in Canada-Caribbean scheduled passenger service is reflected in the following comparison. Eleven weekly flights are scheduled by foreign air lines from Montreal to Bermuda while only five are scheduled from Montreal and Toronto by Canadian air lines.

May I touch on the Pacific-Orient schedule passenger service. It is also important to point out that the main source of imbalance in this area exists because the Canadian carrier does not have United Kingdom landing rights on its Vancouver-transpolar-Europe route; the contention being that the greatest passenger revenue source lies between Australia, New Zealand, Hong Kong and the United Kingdom. Qantas, on the other hand, enjoys Orient-San Francisco-New York-London rights with pick-up rates between Vancouver and San Francisco. This places the Canadian carrier at a distinct competitive disadvantage.

The Canadian air lines pilots' association asserted, on the basis of many years of active association and participation in the Canadian aviation industry, that foreign carriers are getting far more than their share of the air passenger and freight service from this country. I am glad to present its suggestions designed with the sincere hope of giving some assistance to the minister in his consideration of this problem.

The following quotation has a point: "A recession is greatly a state of mind". This point is made in requesting a vigorous nationally sponsored campaign to encourage Canadian passengers and shippers to patronize their own air lines. Some non-members of A.I.T.A., and even some members of A.I.T.A., extend special discounts to their own nationals. It is recommended that special discounts be granted to Canadian citizens by Canadian carriers in order to discourage the equal-fare drain of Canadian business to such gateways as New York-to-Europe and the Caribbean.

Extension consideration must also be given to air cargo. It is well known that the majority of stock in the major Canadian carriers is held by the Canadian railways. Consequently, it is understandable that considerable reserve will necessarily dominate any decision by these air lines to enter actively into the air freight markets to the detriment of their major stockholders. It is respectfully submitted, however, that it is this very prejudice that is allowing foreign air freighters to carry approximately 68 per cent of the Canadian cargo and mail across the north Atlantic.

While considerable air freight is being carried into and across the Canadian Arctic, this service is conducted in its entirety with completely antiquated, obsolete and often dilapidated air freighters of quarter century vintage, while the very best freighter in the world, the swing-tailed CL-44, very desperately awaits adequate orders at its factory at Montreal.

Consideration must be given to the equipment and reequipment of international and external Canadian carriers with the CL-44 with the objective of regenerating the Canadian air freight industry and stimulating the Canadian aircraft industry. The thought is respectfully offered that, while such action might have to be supported by government loans, it might also reduce the annual deficit now being borne by the government, through the capture of this country's rightful share of the world-wide cargo market.

It must be pointed out that while our two major Canadian air lines have been fighting one against the other under what is known as fair trade competition and that the respective mouthpieces of those companies have virtually managed their personal grievances rather than managed their air lines, great consideration should be given to affiliation of our Canadian air carriers.

It is respectfully suggested that an operational and economic affiliation between the major Canadian carriers would be far more beneficial to the Canadian economy than the pool agreement between a Canadian carrier and B.O.A.C. The Canadian carriers cannot afford the luxury of abrasiveness between themselves.

I submit that such Canadian operational and economic affiliation, as compared with Canadian-British affiliation, would so dovetail their routes as to offset seasonal revenue fluctuations with north-south routes against east-west routes. It is felt that only benefit could come from such an amalgamation not only to the carriers but to the Canadian economy as well.

I also submit that the existence of one-sided foreign service into and through Canadian cities as I have outlined earlier should not be tolerated by our country in that it can only contribute to the stagnation of the Canadian aircraft industry and air line industry and at the same time injure our economy. The government should apply vigorous pressure to equalize those areas where the Canadian industry is not enjoying a fair share of its own market, as I have mentioned earlier.

It is my contention that the major Canadian air lines in conjunction with the Canadian government during the years immediately following world war II were not sufficiently aggressive in carrying the Canadian flag to all parts of the world. I point specifically to K.L.M., S.A.S., Air France, Lufthansa, Sabena and even B.O.A.C. as national flag carriers of countries which were decimated by the war but which have nevertheless subsequently extended their air routes to every corner of the earth. Furthermore, I feel that great effort should be directed toward the acquisition of new routes for the major flag carriers of the Canadian air line industry.

Those responsible for the lagging of this once proud and vigorous industry, which put Canada on the air map at the very beginning of aviation and much earlier than most of our competitors of today, those responsible, as I said, for the present deficit of our two major air lines should take a new look at the possibilities of improving their companies' business through the information given them by the Minister of Transport and the Canadian air lines pilots' association rather than ageing through their personal feud. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I want to turn to a topic on which we have already had some information relating to the announcement as to shipbuilding, and I should like to place some questions and points before the minister. In his announcement as released yesterday the relevant paragraph on which I wish to touch reads as follows:

> However, at a very rough estimate I would expect this should cover between 7,000 and 10,000 man years of additional employment in each year for the next few years in our shipyards—

I am not concerned now with the equal amount of employment in other industries to which he referred. I just want to look at his statement and come back to the inability of the minister and his officials to forecast with any accuracy what the program will amount to in terms of expenditure and employment. I wonder whether the minister's officials have looked at the statistics of the shipbuilding industry as revealed in the d.b.s. publication of that name. If the minister will take the year 1959 he will see that the statistics for that year in the shipbuilding industry show that there were some 14,000 workers, that salaries and wages totalled $62 million and that the gross value of the products turned out by these 14,000 employees was approximately $143 million.

If the minister could make a calculation of between 7,000 and 10,000 jobs, which is a very appealing figure, I cannot understand why he could not take the average wage as revealed in these statistics and arrive at the expenditure. There is a remarkable comparison all the way through. According to my rough division, the average wage or salary in the shipbuilding industry is around $4,100 a year. If you are providing 10,000 jobs this means a wage bill of approximately $41 million. If the wage bill in the shipbuilding industry in the past has been on the average approximately 45 per cent of the total gross value of the product as it comes out of the yards, this would indicate to me that the estimate of value is going to come out of this announcement, when you correlate the manpower figures with these figures, is somewhere between $75 million and $85 million, and 40 per cent of that at least in the next two years until 1963 cuts you back roughly to a subsidy on the capital cost of somewhere between $30 million and $40 million.

That is a sum immense enough and yet within frontiers that are understandable enough that we fail to see why the minister cannot give us something better than the dollar item that is going to appear in the supplementary estimates. If he can calculate this attractive figure of 7,000 to 10,000 jobs a year, it seems to me that he can take the average figures in the shipbuilding industry because, Lord knows, in an industry where you have unions you are not going to have any great changes either up or down in this pattern. There is a remarkable failure to provide us with a calculation and to provide the country with some estimate, like the job estimate, of what this program is going to cost.

I do not think we will quarrel with an estimated cost of between $30 million and $40 million with respect to the subsidization of the capital cost of shipping. We are not going to do that, but we think that for general financial purposes that is the figure that should be revealed to us and that is the kind of appropriation that should be set aside rather than this dollar item which just throws it wide open. I think we deserve an explanation from the minister as to why he would not push his estimate of the jobs into an estimate of the actual money that the program is going to cost.

There are two other aspects of the shipbuilding announcement on which we need some explanation, and I say this not in criticism but for understanding. One is the matter of Canadian content and how that is going to be written into the question of capital cost. I would assume that the Canadian maritime commission is going to be the body that will determine the capital cost of these vessels, and I am wondering whether it is going to continue under its previous instructions in relation to Canadian content and the encouragement of the use of Canadian machines and equipment within the ships.

The other point on which we deserve an explanation, since there is going to be nothing statutory in relation to this matter is the effect that the minister contemplates this program will have upon the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. The hon. member for Laurier mentioned this point. While this act, as most members will recall, is complicated in its application, it simply amounts to giving accelerated depreciation to firms for building ships in Canada. This is a considerable concession although apparently it has not been enough. We would like some estimate from the minister of what is involved for the Department of Finance or the Department of National Revenue so far as this act is concerned with relation to the new subsidy that is going into this field.

If we could have information on these matters during this debate on the estimates of the minister, we would feel much happier about the efficacy of this announcement. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East, has suggested that he feels this legislation is related to the by-election in Esquimalt-Saanich. I will go him one further. I think it may be related to a much bigger election foray. I have no particular quarrel with that but if we are going to have this as a preliminary to tub thumping on the hustings I think we should have more information as to the cost and the application and as there is to be no statutory change I think the minister should give it to us now. We would especially like from him at this time the views of the Department of Finance in this particular matter, and I would ask him this question. Is it possible that the whole matter of what this program may cost will be revealed to us by the Minister of Finance when he brings down his budget?

To reiterate one part of my argument, I say that when you look at the d.b.s. statistics on the shipbuilding industry you see a remarkable stability in the correlation between employees, wages and gross value of the product. Since the minister has had the temerity to give us the figure of 7,000 to 10,000 jobs and since we have this pattern established in the past, why did he not go further and give us, within the limits of this kind of accuracy, an estimate of what the program is going to cost?

Mr. Macquarrie: I should like to begin my remarks, brief as they usually are—

Mr. Chevrier: May I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman? I do not want to interrupt the hon. member who has just risen, but the former chairman had already recognized the hon. member for Fort William and I thought that was what you were going to do at this moment.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): May I point out that there may have been some confusion. When I came to the chair there was a list in front of me and the hon. member for Vancouver East indicated that the hon. member for Port Arthur was to speak in his place. I thought we were rotating back and forth and therefore the hon. member for Queens would be next and then the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. Macquarrie: In that case, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Fort William will be even more pleased with my reference to brevity than were my colleagues on the Conservative side who showed their glee at that stage.

I should like to say how happy I am to congratulate the Minister of Transport upon his assumption of this important and very difficult portfolio. I have had the pleasure of knowing the minister for a long time, a good deal longer I would hazard than has the hon. member for Port Arthur, and I have admired him, and admired the things for which he stood. I am heartily enthusiastic about the great leadership he is giving in this difficult portfolio which means so much to the area which I represent. I suppose there is no minister in the cabinet who receives more letters from me, and I suppose from many of the maritime members, than does the Minister of Transport. In spite of the multitudinous problems we bring to him, he greets us with the courtesy which has always marked his relationships with other people.

We islanders live near the sea and many of us live off the products of the sea in an economic way, so transportation is of tremendous importance to us. One of the most important problems in the whole Atlantic area is this question of transportation. One of the drawbacks under which we have laboured for many years has been the inadequacy of transportation so we are, therefore, extremely interested in the type of minister who is in charge of this department. There are many items in the province of Prince Edward Island alone which are of importance to our economic life and upon which the actions and decisions of the government through this Department of Transport have a major bearing. Not long ago in the city of Charlottetown a new 7,000-foot runway was opened. This has meant a great deal to that community and to our province. Had this runway not been constructed, the very fine industry established by Enamel and Heating Products Limited would not have been possible. This new runway was sought by the city of Charlottetown for many years, and for many years it was refused.

We are pleased, too, with the developments in the marine service which have recently taken place. I thought it was very appropriate that the department's new boat based at Charlottetown, for the Charlottetown marine disrict, should be called the Tupper. Tupper was one of the fathers of confederation who performed so magnificently nearly a hundred years ago when he came to the Charlottetown conference, at which conference it has been said he formed an offensive and defensive alliance with Sir John A. Macdonald as he later came to be. I am pleased, too, that the department has authorized the construction of an additional ferry. I refer to the one which is under construction at Halifax, although little progress has been made on this vessel lately because of labour difficulties.

I was pleased this morning to hear the minister's reference to the extension of new facilities to the docks at Borden. He mentioned an impressive figure of $980,000. Recently we have seen his interest in the field of subsidies as indicated by the grant of a new subsidy to the important service between Prince Edward Island and the north shore of the St. Lawrence. This will be very helpful to our primary producers and will act as a stimulant to our whole economy. We have discovered in the maritimes that the development of the St. Lawrence seaway brings new prospects for trade with the area at the mouth of the St. Lawrence. Prince Edward Island, with its surplus of fine agricultural products, is ideally suited for trade with the north shore ports.

In this connection, I should like to say a word about the new chairman of the maritime commission. He is a man, it seems to me, who understands the situation and has been most co-operative and most perceptive in looking at the needs of the Atlantic community. I should like to mention one more item to complete my complimentary list before I commence making suggestions to the minister. I want to mention the establishment of direct T.C.A. service to Halifax. With all due respect to other parts of Canada, I always thought it highly unfortunate that so many of our visitors from Europe made their first contact with Canada at Montreal. They then went across Canada and missed seeing the Atlantic provinces. No one could possibly know much about Canada with such a neglectful approach as that. It is possible now to land directly at Halifax and then start the journey in the Atlantic provinces where it should commence.

Mr. Chairman, in a previous session of parliament I used as a paper, one might say, the timetable of the Canadian National Railways. I was not asked to table the document because it is fairly well known. I was impressed then, as I am impressed now though still not favourably, by the comparison between the service provided by the Canadian National between Montreal and Ottawa, a distance of 116.1 miles, and the service provided between the city of Charlottetown and the city of Moncton, a distance of 126.8 miles. You leave Moncton at 2.40 and you arrive at Charlottetown at nine o'clock. When you leave Ottawa at 3.30, you get to Montreal at 5.30 o'clock. The difference is phenomenal. I would ask the minister to use his influence with Canadian National Railways to correct this situation as they seek to gain for themselves a greater share of the traffic. We all know the difficulties under which the railways are operating at this time. One of the keynotes in any program to attract a greater share of the traffic is good service. The kind of service I have mentioned to the capital of Prince Edward Island is not good enough. There is no reason why we should spend so many hours travelling from Moncton to Charlottetown. There may be slower runs in some parts of the country, but I am not familiar with many that would compare so uncomfortably.

We islanders never ask for too much and our suggestions are always moderate and modest, but there is one more item that might be brought to the attention of the minister. In addition to the old, familiar lifeline formed by the car ferry that runs between Tormentine and Borden, there has been established a new ferry between Wood Islands and Caribou, the latter point in the constituency of my good friend, the member for Pictou. The traffic increase on this run has been rapid in recent years. We have a very fine snipe appropriately named the Lord Selkirk which handles the traffic well and makes the run in proper time. Automobiles are moved on and off quickly with that new boat. There is also a fairly ancient ship which has a fine record and does its best but it cannot by any means cope with the demands of the traffic. Just as soon as possible—and we were talking about shipbuilding a while ago in this committee—I think efforts should be made to bring along either a sister ship to the Lord Selkirk or one as modern, effective and efficient. If that is done, it will look after, for some time, this section between Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

I suppose no minister of transport would ever expect any Prince Edward Island member of parliament to discuss his estimates without making some mention of the ferry service between Borden and Tormentine. Indeed, if one went back over Hansard covering the debates of this house since Prince Edward Island entered confederation in 1873, he would find that was the one thread of consistency. Indeed, it is said that no Prince Edward Island politician ever really gets under way unless he has prepared and delivered one speech on transportation across the straits. If he has ever had any difficulty in getting across there, as have many islanders, he will utter that speech with all the more fervour and sincerity.

This does not come into the category of a request of the government. This comes in the category of consideration of the proper fulfilment of a confederation pledge. Ferry service is always on the minds of islanders because we regard this service—and we cannot help doing so—as an economic lifeline. This year the province of Prince Edward Island has endured the worst winter since 1905. I suppose this fact proves the old adage that the rain falls on the just and on the unjust.

An hon. Member: And snow.

Mr. Macquarrie: There have been many holdups in connection with the crossing of the ferries. Those in charge of the ships have done very well. But when you find the depth, width, extent and continuity of ice that there has been in the Northumberand strait in the last number of months—it seems like six months—the situation can be understood. Of course these matters are beyond the control of the Minister of Transport himself. Nevertheless it has brought into sharper focus than ever the problem with respect to this important ferry. I mentioned earlier the fact that an additional boat is being built at Halifax. This boat will certainly be needed. I would suggest that akin to that but separate from it is the very important consideration of a replacement of at least one of the existing boats. The secondary ferry the Prince Edward Island is a boat that is now older than is the junior member for Queens. When Robert Borden came to Charlottetown in 1911 —I was not there but I acquired this information through going back through the history—he said to the people of the island, "You have been wanting a car ferry. Elect me as prime minister of Canada and you will get one". They did and he did. However, the same boat is still there doing valiant service. As much as we love Sir Robert Borden in Prince Edward Island and as much as we prize that old ship—it certainly was a credit to the builders—we would think that an urgent move to replace the Prince Edward Island would be very much in order.

The estimates of the Minister of Transport are before us, not those of the Minister of Public Works. If this latter were the case, I would be discussing the causeway. However, it is difficult to dissociate completely the two subjects. If the causeway should be proven not feasible, it would be up to the Minister of Transport, as the dominion minister responsible for overseeing this confederation pledge, to give us continuous and efficient communication with the mainland and it would be his responsibility to start a process whereby we would have the most up-to-date ferry service possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Macquarrie: I expect that it is loaded, but I will be delighted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was going to ask the hon. gentleman whether that last paragraph was a funeral oration on the causeway?

Mr. Macquarrie: A colleague observes that it was loaded. I think it is really far too soon for funeral orations.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just badly bruised.

Mr. Macquarrie: In fact, we in Prince Edward Island are hoping that the kind of orations we shall be making before very long will be those of great jubilation. Perhaps I had better not pursue the subject of the causeway at this time but leave discussion of it until we reach the estimates of the Minister of Public Works at which time I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and I will discuss this subject to the nth degree. I know that we shall both be happy in our presentations, if nothing else. The arguments in favour of the causeway are very strong on the economic side because the maintenance of the service by boats has been an extremely expensive matter. The total cost of the capital spent on port Tormentine now amounts to approximately $25 million. The operating deficit since 1933 alone—and the minister referred to this in his opening statement—reaches the figure of $30 million. Therefore when the time comes to discuss the causeway in economic terms there will be some very good ammunition which I know the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will support me in using, when the time comes.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Nowlan: But not for the same reasons.

Mr. Macquarrie: If, however, the causeway is judged feasible, and if it is undertaken very soon indeed, it cannot be completed before the Prince Edward Island boat aforesaid is too old for the service. Therefore, the minister will still be faced with the situation of providing yet another boat. I started off by saying that we are modest people, but I see no other solution to the situation except the provision of yet another boat.

No doubt the experts in the Department of Transport have looked at the figures with reference to travel by people from other parts of Canada, from the United States and indeed from other continents to Prince Edward Island. Back in 1943 fewer than 10,000 automobiles were carried across the strait. In 1947 the figure rose to 27,000 and in 1960 the figure was 171,500. I need hardly say that this is a growing service. I need hardly underscore the need for providing increased facilities. Last summer in the midst of the demand, I should say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister, the most elaborate facilities were provided in the trans-strait service. More boats were making more trips than ever before, and I am happy to say that the service was enthusiastically applauded by those who undertook it. As I mentioned with respect to the estimates of another department not so long ago, we had more tourists last year than ever before and it is likely their numbers will continue to increase, because once people come to Prince Edward Island they will return and tell their friends what a wonderful place it is.

We are counting on the Minister of Transport to see that our service will be so good that even if—God forbid—we have another winter as tough as this one, or as tough as the winter of '05 which I do not personally remember, we shall be able to get through the wind, ice, sleet and snow, and that he, like Robert Borden will update the transportation facilities and give us the finest and best type of transportation to the mainland we have ever had.

I wish I had time to say more, but I have given my usual undertaking to be brief. I should only say this. At times I have been a little disturbed that, perhaps, as a result of events which were taking place in Canada, if the party to which I belong should make an appeal to the people it might suffer the loss of one or two seats. However, having heard today the reactions of certain hon. gentlemen opposite to the minister's splendid announcement regarding shipbuilding, recalling their reaction to the recent announcement made by the Minister of Agriculture concerning our sales of wheat to China, I have assured myself that even those limited fears were utterly groundless.

Mr. Badanai: I am pleased to rise to take part in this debate, and at the outset I wish to express my appreciation of the capable performance of the Minister of Transport since his appointment. The shipping policy which the hon. gentleman announced on Friday is without a doubt the best move that this government could have made toward the creation of job opportunities in the shipbuilding industries. I have personally advocated such a policy ever since my election to parliament in 1958, and I should like to quote a few paragraphs from a speech I delivered in this house on June 27, 1960, as reported at page 5451 of Hansard.

A few moments ago I was trying to point out the importance of having a Canadian merchant marine. The Canadian great lakes shipping industry could provide the foundation upon which to build an international commercial fleet worthy of a major trading nation. During the war, Canada built training and fighting ships. Some of these were built at the Port Arthur shipbuilding yard which at present is not doing much. However, this yard has the experience in both management and personnel to build ships for any purpose. It is regrettable that many ships of Canadian registry were built in foreign shipyards, and that many more are being built abroad. The federal government could bolster dwindling employment in Canadian shipyards by encouraging shipbuilding in every possible way. We are subsidizing wheat growers, hog producers, egg producers, coal mines, gold mines, and railways; why not give a little help to the shipbuilding industry? Why not reestablish the Canadian merchant marine which was allowed to disappear so ingloriously a couple of years ago? Whatever the circumstances surrounding the disposal of those ships, the action taken at that time has not added to the stature of our nation. If a mistake was made—and I submit that the sale of those eight ships to Cuba was a mistake—let us admit it and renew our efforts with the vigour which is the characteristic of everything Canadian.

I realize that enthusiasm for the idea of a subsidized merchant fleet would probably be challenged on the ground that it would result in additional taxes, but I submit that the benefits resulting from a policy of assistance to shipbuilding and the development of a merchant fleet would more than offset the cost of such a program.

Not long ago I saw a report in a newspaper to the effect that Greece intends to spend more than $10 million to build a fleet of six freighters for the great lakes-Mediterranean trade. This means that the Hellenic lines will be entering the St. Lawrence seaway for the first time. These ships will bear cargoes to and from such ports as Naples, Istanbul and Beirut, and they are expected to be put into service by the summer of 1961.

Where will these freighters be built? Not in Canada. Our exports and imports will be carried through the great lakes by vessels of other countries.

Canada builds fewer ships than Finland. Our deep-sea fleet, which ten years ago numbered some 200 vessels, is now less than a dozen and these are mainly oil tankers sailing between the United States and Canadian ports.

Our shores front on three great oceans, the Atlantic, the Pacific and the Arctic. I especially want to underline the reference to the Arctic ocean. If the Prime Minister's vision ever comes to fruition and we witness an increased development of the north the Arctic ocean will become a great sea lane. In addition we have the great lakes system which in itself could be classed as another ocean.

Despite all this other nations build ships for us. Other nations operate ships for us. All this is true, because we say we cannot possibly afford to build and operate ships ourselves. Then we wonder why we have so many unemployed. The time has surely come to sound a clarion call for the reconstruction and expansion of a national merchant marine. I commend the suggestion to the minister and to the government. They have the power to initiate a movement to bring back our merchant marine and establish our nation in the forefront of seafaring nations of the world. We are the third largest trading nation of the world but so far as shipping is concerned our position is not much superior to that of Switzerland. I sincerely trust that the government will take action as quickly as possible.

I feel strongly about this, Mr. Chairman, because as Canadians we are often prone to boast of our national resources. We boast about what we have under the ground and above it but we say little about the exploitation of what we have in our own country for the benefit of Canadians and for the benefit of those who will come to our shores in the years ahead. I commend to the government consideration of this great challenge that faces us from coast to coast.

I know that objections will be raised. Some will say that this is all nonsense and that it would cost millions of dollars. It probably would represent a large expenditure but it would be worth it. It would be a Canadian enterprise of which we would be proud and in years to come we could look back upon it as something worth while. Let this 24th parliament take action.

That is the end of the quotation from my speech.

At the Liberal rally held in Ottawa last January, at the meeting of the committee on transport I moved a resolution which met with the approval of that body. I quote that resolution because I wish to have it on the record:

Whereas the greater proportion of world's commerce is still being carried by sea going ships, and

Whereas Canada is the world's third trading nation, but no ships flying the red ensign are ever seen on the sea lanes of the world, and

Whereas ten years ago our deep-sea fleet numbered 200 vessels, now being down to fewer than a dozen, namely oil tankers, and

Whereas our shipbuilding industry is now practically at a standstill with thousands of skilled workers unemployed,

Therefore, be it resolved that a Canadian merchant marine be established, and that a formula of assistance to Canadian shipyards be considered, to stimulate shipbuilding in Canada.

It is only natural, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that I should be pleased with the announcement made by the minister to the effect that Canadian shipowners will be able to obtain new vessels at reasonable and competitive prices instead of having them built abroad because of lower construction costs. I assume that this will be accomplished with a formula of subsidies which might bring about the gradual creation of a Canadian merchant marine and the beginning of a deep-sea fleet.

Perhaps the government could give some consideration to the establishment of a Canadian coast guard, something which the advent of the St. Lawrence seaway has made not only desirable but necessary. Of course the coasts of the great lakes are not the only coasts that need guarding; both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts require patrolling. Coast-guard vessels are badly needed and I hope that in this new Canadian marine policy will be included a provision for a Canadian coast-guard.

On April 18, 1961 I asked the minister whether he was in a position to indicate to the house if the government intended to bring in legislation which would eliminate unfair competition from commonwealth registered ships which are now permitted to carry goods between Canadian ports. The reply is found in Hansard for that date at page 3747 and reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I am looking into the matter at the present time. Further examination by my department is necessary. As I indicated previously, I expect to have something to say about shipping policy generally before this session ends.

The announcement has been made that consideration has been given to these problems affecting the great lakes areas due to the commonwealth shipping agreement under which vessels of commonwealth registry are enabled to engage in domestic coastal trade. The government is evidently conscious of the unfair competition of these ships of commonwealth registry, which is adversely affecting Canadian ships. All in all, the announcement should be welcomed by most Canadians.

I should also like to say a word about the seaway which is now beginning its third year of operations. Ocean-going vessels are now seen on the seaway from Montreal to the Canadian lakehead, and with the enlargement of the Welland canal, the effects are more clearly seen, and ever increasing traffic can be safely predicted.

As an example, the total overseas imports into both Canada and the United States, through the St. Lawrence section of the seaway increased 400 per cent since 1958; a gain from 500,000 tons to 2.1 million tons in 1960. Seaway borne exports expanded even more in 1960, amounting to 5.3 million tons, nearly 10 times the 1958 figure.

Overseas exports of wheat carried directly from the lakehead ports of Fort William and Port Arthur which, before the opening of the seaway, was only a small amount, now accounts for nearly 5 per cent of Canada's total wheat exports. It has been reported that 750 ships will be required to carry the wheat which was sold recently to China. I wonder whether it would not be as economical to move some of this wheat through the lakehead ports and around the Panama canal. Of course, this may not be a practical idea, but it could save on the cost of shipment by rail from Manitoba and Saskatchewan to the Pacific coast.

With all its growing pains and difficulties encountered, especially during the first two years of operation, we can safely say that this gigantic enterprise has certainly proved its worth, and that it will be, and is, a great monument to those who conceived the idea, and those who made the decisions to proceed with the project.

On March 2 of this year the minister addressed the annual meeting of the Fort William chamber of commerce, and he devoted a major portion of his speech to air transport.

There is no question that the airport which serves Fort William, Port Arthur and district, has developed to the point where it requires extensive expansion if it is to meet the continuing increase in demand for air transportation, which has indeed become an almost integral part of our business life today.

The minister at one point in his address said that an estimated $110,000 will be spent this year toward improvement of the airport, and also that plans have been made for an extension of the air terminal building, to triple its capacity to handle travellers. This, together with several other improvements will bring the total expenditures for these expansions and renovations to $650,000.

He also made the statement, with which we cannot quarrel, that, where airport accommodation is concerned, the department is endeavouring to concentrate its plans on needs for the next ten years. This is a sensible approach to the question of meeting the needs of that growing army of air travellers which make Mr. R. G. McGregor's heart beat with warm anticipation and pleasure.

The people of Fort William were pleased to hear the minister paint such a glowing picture of progress for the future of the lakehead in terms of air and sea transportation, and I hope that he will tell us how soon we may expect action on this program of expansion at the lakehead airport.

The advent of fast jet airliners has not improved Trans-Canada Air Lines service to the lakehead. These jets do not stop there, with the result that we now only have two two-way flights connecting the lakehead with Toronto and Ottawa. I wonder whether there could be some way of improving this service.

And now I wish to deal briefly with perhaps the greatest medium of transportation which made confederation possible in 1867, namely our railways. We can go back to our first prime ministers, Sir John A. Macdonald, Scottish born, and the French Canadian, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. These two great prime ministers were the embodiment of what was the best of the two great historical parties, the parties which will continue to give Canada good government, we hope, and a government of free enterprise without distinction of class. Both these prime ministers strongly supported the first trans-continental railway system as being the only link binding together all parts of Canada and thus forming this young, vigorous nation. They stood shoulder to shoulder in advocating low cost transportation to promote the spread of our population and the development of our resources.

Here I wish to quote Sir Wilfrid Laurier speaking in parliament in support of the railways:

> To provide immediate means whereby the products of the new settlers may find an exit to the ocean at the least possible cost and whereby likewise a market may be found in our new regions for those who toil in the forests, in the mines and in the shops of the older provinces. Such is our duty, it is immediate and imperative. Heaven grant that it be not already too late.

At that time a policy was implemented under which shippers were charged on the basis of their ability to pay—in other words, low cost freight rates—and here subsidization was born. Succeeding governments have been more or less, and with very little variation, carrying on a method of subsidization to meet increasing operating costs, the latest being the $97 million for 1961, of which the Canadian National Railways will receive $57 million and a fraction and the Canadian Pacific Railway $39 million and a fraction. According to the recommendation of the royal commission on transportation, the annual amount is to be scaled down until at the end of five years the total will be reduced to $47 million for the two railways. These annual subsidies are the cause of considerable alarm and criticism against the two great trans-continental systems. However, it should not be forgotten that the Canadian National Railways, for example, is made up of a group of private railroads which went bankrupt many years ago. It has been an instrument of the government in opening up the country in which it is still being used.

In dealing with the first report of the royal commission I wish to point out that the commission substantially agrees with the submission of the lakehead cities to the commission to the effect that horizontal increases on a percentage basis cause unfair distribution of the freight rate burden; also, that freight rates, including increases which the carriers cannot collect, are unrealistic and impose an unfair burden on the so-called "captive traffic" forced to use the rails and to assume the maximum cost; also that certain losses in the passenger service which fares cannot cover should not be a charge on the freight rate structure. While subsidies, which of course nobody likes, are seemingly necessary as the only means of helping the present situation, the carriers should use every possible means to reduce the need for this assistance.

On page 34 of the commission report I find the following:

> All industries and regions feel that their particular transportation problems are great and important. It is too much to ask from a rail user in Newfoundland, at the lakehead, or in the Okanagan valley that he agree that the difficulties he has brought before the commission are of a lesser significance than, for instance, the problems of the maritime provinces. How true; and to get the full benefit of this statement one must know how highly the maritimes have rated the importance of the maritimes, with some justification, all down through the years.

This quotation seems to bear out our contention that northwestern Ontario has been penalized with a discriminatory set of freight rates which have militated against a greater expansion of trade and industry at the lakehead.

These are the few suggestions I have presented to the minister here this afternoon. I trust they will be given some consideration. As a matter of fact, they deserve deep study. They require some expert opinion. They require the experts of the department to go into them fully and to see whether or not any of them have merit. I am of the belief that they have merit, and that it will help Canada greatly if the suggestions are implemented.

Before the end of the discussions of these estimates I hope the minister will be able to give us the answers to many of the questions which have been asked and that he will be in a position to come forward with something which we shall all be pleased to hear.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few moments of the committee's time to discuss the minister's estimates from the point of view of the development of the north country. Before passing to the main theme of my remarks, which will be criticism of the present policy of the issuance of class C and B licences in air transportation in the north, I should like to draw the minister's attention to a number of problems that come under the jurisdiction of his department in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Many of those have been solved in the last two or three years, and many point up very dramatically the difference between the activities of the department in the northern part of our country now as compared with the lack of such activities in the past.

Before informing the members of the committee on those points, I should like to take issue with one of the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat when he described the support which Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave to the building of the railroad at that time. He forgets, I am sure, the expression coined by the Liberal opponents of the transcontinental railroad of that day about building a railroad from wigwam to wigwam. It seems to me that a similar expression was used by their present leader in recent years. I cannot refrain from reverting to the discussion of the other day with the Leader of the Opposition about his statement concerning the building of roads from igloo to igloo.

In the last two years the department has been responsible for a great expansion of communications generally in the north. In the Yukon and Northwest Territories telephone facilities have been installed where they were not available before. A new line has been constructed from Whitehorse through to Mayo, Dawson City and Elsa as well as new lines in the Northwest Territories. This has made it possible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to provide services to this part of the country where none existed before apart from one or two voluntarily operated stations in the larger communities.

The department has been improving the airport and navigational facilities at the larger airports in the north in a very commendable fashion. The activities of the department have resulted generally in a raising of the standards of air transport in the north and this in turn has provided a certain stimulus to travel to these northern regions. However, there is still much to be done. I might draw the minister's attention to the need for extending the runway at Dawson City. With the Klondike festival targeted for 1962, it is very necessary that this airport be extended to the point where it is able to handle four-engine aircraft. There will be a larger number of tourists who will wish to travel to Dawson City for this event and it will be found that a good deal of this traffic will not be realized unless four-engine aircraft are provided with facilities at Dawson City.

Mayo airport is also due for enlargement to handle four-engine aircraft. This airport is right in the heart of a highly mineralized area. United Keno Hill mine operating in this area now provides with its one silver mine almost as much in dollar revenue to the Canadian economy as the 20 silver mines of British Columbia and the 12 silver mines of Ontario. Therefore improved facilities at this point are very essential.

I would also draw the minister's attention to the departmental plans concerning the improvement of facilities at the Whitehorse airport. I understand that plans exist for the conversion of one of the existing hangars at the Whitehorse airport in order to provide larger terminal facilities. With the traffic in and out of Whitehorse, which is the main centre on what was known at one time as the northwest stageing route, the facilities required here are not so extensive that the minister could not, I am sure, obtain co-operation from the other government departments requiring space therein.

There is another point I should like to draw to the minister's attention, the maintenance of emergency strips in the north generally. Emergency air strips are very essential in facilitating air traffic and air safety in the north and in my belief much more can be done to improve these very necessary facilities.

One point about which I am particularly concerned has to do with the large turnover in meteorological workers in the northern areas although I believe the problem is national. In these scientific workers we have some of the most highly skilled individuals on the government payroll and yet they are one of the worst paid groups of scientists. These people must have university educations before they undertake their duties and unless much more attention is given to establishing a proper wage structure for meteorologists in the service of the Department of Transport I believe the minister and the department will continue to be faced with difficulties in replacing a large number of these employees who seek employment in the United States and elsewhere where wages are much more attractive.

Specifically, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with the government's policy in connection with the granting of licences for the operation of non-scheduled commercial air services. In December of 1959 the then minister, who is now Minister of Trade and Commerce, announced that a more liberal policy was being implemented with regard to applications for licences for non-scheduled commercial air services involving small light aircraft and helicopters. It had been decided that, except in unusual circumstances, applications for air services in these categories would not be refused on the grounds of protection of existing operators or restriction of competition but rather would be made available on a liberal basis in accordance with the spirit of free enterprise.

Prior to the announcement of that policy the principle upon which air transport licences had been granted to non-scheduled commercial air services was based on the need for protecting charter operators out of bases in all areas of Canada so that a healthy and high quality growth in the service concerned would be encouraged. I am not aware how the new policy is working out in the rest of Canada but I can assure the minister it is not having the desired effect in the north. The air transport board now, in exercising its licensing function under the Aeronautics Act, is granting a larger number of class C and class B licences. If the policy is continued I believe that the previous high standard of services provided by these charter operators in the north is going to deteriorate substantially particularly with regard to the operation of helicopters. In January of 1960 the air industries and transport association of Canada submitted a brief to the Prime Minister wherein they set forth their views, and I wish to quote briefly from their submission as follows:

> Notwithstanding our submission the Minister of Transport, on December 18, announced the policy of decontrolling non-scheduled air services as defined by the air transport board as being in group "B".
> It is therefore our opinion in the light of our earlier submission that we would be remiss in not advising you of the very serious implications of this policy.
> While Canada can be justly proud in having recently celebrated its fiftieth anniversary of powered flight, it was not until the thirties that aviation started to show its potential importance to the development of the north. From that period to the year 1945 air carriers operated without any regulatory control for the benefit of the public necessity, convenience or interest. It is a well known fact that this lack of control had a devastating effect on the growth of this industry . . .
> The potential is only so great and unlimited competition is not the answer.

I should like now to draw the minister's attention to the operations of Eldorado Aviation Limited, a subsidiary of Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, a crown corporation, and also since it comes under the jurisdiction of the department, the operations of Northern Transportation Company Limited, a water carrier on the Mackenzie river system. In my view, the services of these two subsidiaries have outlived their usefulness, and there should not be a continuation of government subsidies to these organizations in direct competition with the private carriers in the north. Pacific Western Airlines, who now operate services up and down the Mackenzie system from Edmonton and other northern provincial points, is in trouble because of declining load factor which could easily be improved by the amount of traffic carried by Eldorado Aviation Limited. P.W.A. is operating a high quality service in the northern regions and is operating on a high standard of safety. This, of course, will continue. There is no doubt, however, that P.W.A. will have to diminish the service it is now supplying to these areas if the operations of Eldorado Aviation Limited are allowed to continue to eat into the potential traffic. For instance, over 8,000 passengers were carried by this crown subsidized corporation during 1960.

Two of the conclusions reached by the air industries and transport association are, one, that the situation will not only stifle but submerge a young and growing industry—that is what it is—which has been one of the major factors in the opening up of Canada's north. Second, the continued implementation of such a liberal policy will result in a situation which could have a vital bearing on the safety of travel and, more specifically, to Canada's north with the obvious resultant expense to search and rescue.

The air carrier, Mr. Chairman, has been for some years basically the prime instrument in the development of the north. The system under which the operator has been able to produce and exist is based on a minimum of protection. In return, he establishes permanent facilities and, as such, becomes a permanent part of the community he serves. It should be pointed out these facilities are provided at the expense of the operators. The Air Industries and Transport Association of Canada is not the only group that is concerned with air development in northern Canada. There are several other organizations, but I do not wish to take up the time of the committee by quoting extensively from correspondence I have had with these other associations.

I should like to put it to the minister that there are a number of ways in which the development of air services in northern areas could be helped. I am constrained to say, however, that they amount to a subsidy of some sort. I am sure that in the transportation field, however, subsidies are not a strange animal to the government. I should like to enumerate some of these ways. A direct operating subsidy could be given to the air lines involved in these northern regions. Second, a fuel rebate could be granted on fuel boarded in the north which would equate the cost of fuel to these northern operators with the cost of fuel in urban areas. Fuel cost is a major air line operating expense, and the saving to the air lines could be passed on to the customers. The exploration of other benefits could probably reveal other ways of equating northern operating costs with those of the more economical intercity services.

Another major air line expense is the cost of equipment. The government could underwrite part of the cost of the airplanes in order to make it easier for the air lines to equip or to re-equip. This form of subsidy is used in connection with the civil air reserve plan in the United States. The policy there is that it is in the national interest to further increase the number of individual aircraft available to handle any national emergency. The aircraft purchased by air lines for profit will not provide this capacity because profit margins require high load factors and, therefore, the government will help with the equipment bill if the result provides more aircraft than would have been purchased otherwise.

There are, however, some restrictions imposed. The air lines must agree to release part of their fleet to the nation when required and must buy a type of aircraft which can be used as military transport. I think Canada has taken a most dramatic lead here with the development of the de Havilland Caribou. A plan similar to that which has been devised in the United States would certainly help all aviation in this country.

Another factor in considering this problem is the used aircraft market. This is no longer good and has not been for some time because of the rapid technological developments in this field. Depreciation will become a problem for air lines, and it is a problem for some of the smaller operators now. The government could maintain a market for used aircraft at good prices, thereby encouraging their replacement. This would benefit the country as well as the air lines, in that it would help keep the aircraft modern. The new aircraft are better in every way, including economy of operation.

Another field to which I have devoted some thought is the operation of the R.C.A.F. transport command. I think this could be redefined. The R.C.A.F. now does a lot of northern transport flying which could be handled by commercial operators. Many people believe that the R.C.A.F. should be limited in transport operations to operational support transport and that air lines should be integrated into the defence picture in a way similar to the merchant marine. This is an involved suggestion, but a plan which offers civilians peacetime use from defence expenditures is certainly worth considering. It can be pointed out, too, that an expanded civil air fleet would provide some jobs for the many fine pilots trained by the R.C.A.F. who now, on discharge, find it almost impossible to practise their chosen vocation.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

The government could benefit northern air transport greatly if some money were spent on facilities. Northern airports, navigation aids, alternate airports, instrument approach facilities, and night flying facilities need a great deal of improvement. This is true, in spite of the rapid strides the government has been making in improving these facilities. At some stages the air lines own and operate essential equipment themselves. This imposes an additional and unnecessary cost on their operations, which cost is reflected in their service. A lot of present day flying in the north is contract supply to D.E.W. line bases. I think it could be considered that these bases will remain in operation for some time and that a permanent air transport service is warranted. The present system of annual contracts does not encourage the kind of air line growth which has any real benefit to the country. I refer to the fact that these supply contracts are renegotiated annually.

I am not suggesting for a moment that the government, through T.C.A. or any other government service, should go into the north and compete with air lines now operating in the north. On the few northern runs these private companies have left, there is hardly enough to support the service they now provide. As a matter of fact P.W.A. in the Mackenzie system has not enough traffic to support the service they are now operating.

As I have already pointed out, air transport is like all other transportation. It is a matter that is vital to the country, affecting its growth, its prosperity and its defence. The government should appreciate these factors and give careful attention to the development of policies which will be consistent therewith. If we have earned any special criticism in so far as our air line policy is concerned, I think it is because it has not been definitive enough; whereas in the past administration there was absolutely no really definitive policy in so far as the development of air line transport in this country is concerned or, if there was a policy, it was a policy of reaction, laissez-faire, or "We will do something when something appears on the horizon". From this we have advanced at least to the point where we can discern certain definitive avenues in our air transport policies. But these are not yet cohesive and they still must be evolved into a plan which will insure the realization of the factors of growth, prosperity and defence, as I have pointed out. The government as yet has not involved itself deeply in this problem, in my view, and I feel that the time is far past when we should have done so. These are the remarks I have to make concerning the development of air transport particularly relating to the north and I confide them to the minister in the hope that they will, to use a phrase that I have learned from both sides of the chamber, get the consideration they deserve.

Mr. McMillan: In connection with the minister's announcement, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I am very much in favour of helping our shipbuilding industry. I also hope that our Canadian trade between Canadian ports will be carried by Canadian ships and will thus increase employment. I do not believe this matter of helping the shipbuilding industry should be handled by way of a vote of $1 in the estimates. I am in favour of helping the industry in a proper manner. The government should give us an estimate and we could vote it. I think the government should be able to give that estimate and if they did not have enough money, they could come back for more and we would gladly vote it here in this chamber. I do not think any hon. member would be opposed to it. This whole thing seems to be trickery on the part of the government. The Minister of Finance will show $1 as an expenditure, and although expenditures can go up to $40 million, $50 million or even $100 million and they will just show as $1. At the present time we know that his books are away out of balance and that he wants to avoid putting extra expenditures in his budget. He is just going to put in $1 and it will not even stand that.

Mr. Benidickson: Pre-election procedure.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. McMillan: To me this is taking away the rights of parliament, to show just a $1 expenditure and be able to go ahead and spend millions. Where are the rights of parliament? What about the bill of rights? We have not so many rights left. If this was a bill, we could refer it to the Minister of Justice and he would pass his opinion on it. However, it is not a bill, and we therefore cannot get his opinion on whether or not this might come within the bill of rights or whether we are leaving with parliament the right to vote money.

I want to deal with something particular, Mr. Chairman. It has to do with a matter in my own area. Since it will probably take me 10 minutes to deal with it and as it is nearly six o'clock now, may I call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the acting house leader whether he will be good enough to put on Hansard again, so that it will be there for convenient reference, as much of the government's plans for next week as he can give us now?

Mr. Nowlan: The government's plans for the first two days of next week are set forth on page 4752 of Hansard of May 12. As far as I know at the moment, there are no changes to be proposed in any of those matters which we set forth for Monday and Tuesday. On Wednesday, we are going back into the estimates and, rather than taking up those of the Department of Fisheries, as I intimated last night was the possibility, I think we will proceed with the estimates of the Department of Transport. Following that, we will probably conclude consideration of the estimates of the Department of Fisheries which were under consideration yesterday.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister, of course, appreciates the fact that on Wednesday we will not have more than about half an hour. Is that the program also for Thursday?

Mr. Nowlan: That will be the program. We will carry on with the Department of Transport on Wednesday and Thursday and until concluded. If my colleague who is going to be sitting here on Monday happens to be held up until late Tuesday with transport legislation, he will go on on Wednesday and Thursday and until such time as his estimates are concluded. Then we will take up fisheries, followed by justice or mines and technical surveys, I am not sure which.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CIVIL DEFENCE

Question No. 129—Mr. Regier:

1. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, what were the total expenditures of the government of Canada in the interest of civil defence?
2. What was the estimated cost of expenditures for this period on the part of the provincial governments?
3. What is the estimated cost of expenditures in this regard during the same period on the part of municipal governments?
4. What is the estimated total cost of expenditures by all levels of government for the fiscal period mentioned above?
5. What consideration has been given by the government to the project of changing the name from "civil defence" to "civil disaster"?
6. Has the government any record of the number of homes that have built basement shelters? If so, how many have been built?
7. What recommendation in this regard has the government to make to people living in apartments in concentrated urban areas?
8. How much money has already been spent on the proposed project of moving the seat of effective government out of Ottawa in case of a nuclear war?
9. Who has been designated to decide as to who will be eligible for priority in the proposed movement of government authority out of Ottawa in case of a nuclear war?
10. Who is on the priority list referred to in the above question?

Answer by: Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister):

1. Apart from army expenditure on survival operations and communications, where the expenditures in aid of civil defence and continuity of government cannot be accurately segregated, the total expenditures on civil defence measures and other preparations for civilian measures to be taken in wartime were $4,635,832.

2. $574,903, excluding those reimbursed by federal grants.

3. $243,728, excluding those reimbursed by federal grants.

4. $5,454,463, including both civil defence and other preparations for civilian measures in wartime, in so far as these are segregated in accounts. In some cases work is done for these purposes but paid for out of appropriations for the general purposes of the department concerned and is not separated in accounts.

5. The government has already been using the term "emergency measures" to cover both civil defence and peacetime disasters, as well as preparations for the continuity of government in wartime.

6. No.

7. The government is preparing for publication material regarding protection against radioactive fall-out for people living in apartments. In addition, surveys are being conducted this year to investigate the protection afforded by existing larger buildings in urban areas and means of improving it.

8. It is not considered in the public interest to publish detailed information relating to all the various sites from which elements of the government would operate outside of Ottawa in wartime.

9 and 10. Various responsibilities for wartime operations have been allocated by the government and by individual ministers, as reported to parliament from time to time. Other responsibilities may be expected to be assigned from time to time in future. The ministers responsible for these various departments and agencies in peacetime, and their deputies, designate the personnel who will be trained for wartime duties and who will take them on, if they can, should war occur. It may be necessary that various individuals be designated as alternatives, or in rotation if, as is now expected, special precautions become necessary because of the very short warning time that may be counted upon when missiles become the main threat to Ottawa. The lists of those being instructed to assume various duties in the event of war are still being compiled and revised. It is considered that publication of the names of these individuals would serve no useful purpose at the present time.

It should be added that those assigned to emergency duties will not be assured of safety, as the emergency facilities cannot provide protection against a nearby nuclear detonation. Protection against fall-out is being provided to enable work to be carried on in these locations. Persons assigned to emergency war duties will not be free to look after the safety of their families, as others will be doing, and will have to make other arrangements in respect of their dependents.

Monday, May 15, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN "FINANCIAL POST"

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning an editorial in the Financial Post of May 13, 1961, which in my opinion is irresponsible, somewhat libellous and in at least one respect not true. The editorial reads:

> It's outrageous that 469 divorce petitions are stalled in parliament, and likely to remain stalled indefinitely, by a blockading operation conducted by two M.P.'s.
> Most Canadians agree that these petitions, all coming from Quebec and Newfoundland, should not be parliament's business at all. A federal court should handle them if these two provinces are not willing to empower their own courts to dissolve marriages.
> But years of argument have not yet persuaded any Canadian government to sponsor reform in the system; and there is not the slightest immediate chance of reform.
> In these circumstances, the continuation of last year's indiscriminate filibuster against all divorce bills by two C.C.F.'ers, Frank Howard and Arnold Peters, is a cheap political stunt. It's a callous and brutal stunt because it will force 469 Canadian couples to stay unhappily married when, presumably, there is conclusive evidence that they ought to be divorced.

I would point out that the so-called "blockading operation", as it is termed in the editorial, is occasioned not by any activity of the hon. member for Timiskaming or myself but is occasioned in the first instance by the refusal of the Senate to deal with a particular bill that was sent to it—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I agree that there may be a question of privilege concerning the hon. member, but I think he should restrict his remarks to the point having to do with his own conduct and not refer to the other place.

Mr. Howard: Very well. The remarks about which I wish to complain are the reference to the continuation of the blockade of last year being carried on by myself and the hon. member for Timiskaming. You will know, Mr. Speaker, that on no occasion this session have we dealt with the divorce bills currently on the order paper, for the reason that they have not been advanced. The sponsor of these bills has requested that they stand, and the house has agreed unanimously that they should stand. I think the editorial is a reflection upon the actions of the hon. member for Timiskaming and myself, because we have not engaged in any discussion whatsoever of any of these divorce bills.

Mr. Chown: What about the Aurora Pipe Line Company bill?

Mr. Howard: If my friend wants to get involved in a discussion about building that pipe line, we can do that tomorrow.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REPORT ON EXERCISE "TOCSIN"

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the time of the national exercise on civil defence or just prior thereto I stated that I would give a statement regarding the findings and the experiences of those who participated in that exercise. The purpose of the exercise was not only to practice and test the emergency measures which are necessary for national survival and continuity of government, but in particular to identify gaps in existing plans and preparations.

I think the initial report indicates that the exercise served its purpose adequately. Sirens were sounded in a number of communities across the country. Siren coverage is rapidly being increased and many more areas will, within the next year, have these warning devices.

The early stages of the exercise in Ottawa went as planned and certain emergency procedures of government were practised. The signal authorizing the sounding of the alert took only 39 seconds from the time it was sent to the provincial centres by the federal warning centre until the last acknowledgement was received from the provincial warning centres.

The exercise in the central headquarters at Camp Petawawa showed considerable improvement in preparations and capabilities over 1960, and revealed that in an emergency the basic elements of government could be operated. However, I would be less than frank if I did not point out that the efficiency of the operation was less than is requisite, and much remains to be done in the fields of departmental emergency planning, advance preparation of executive orders and policy directives, staff training, organization of staff to work effectively in emergency facilities, and further improvement in communications. These problems will receive urgent attention.

First reports from the regional centres which were set up indicate that the exercise went well in the provinces. Federal personnel close to the maximum numbers planned participated. Provincial participation varied considerably, depending upon the stage of provincial planning and preparation in this field. Provincial governments were represented in most provinces, and in so far as the federal government was concerned it was represented in most of the provinces either by cabinet ministers or by parliamentary secretaries.

At the central headquarters at Petawawa several federal ministers were at work in connection with their emergency assignments. I should like to say a special word of commendation for the observers, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch).

Many hundreds of persons in the service of government at all levels played an active part. At the central headquarters alone almost 200 took part. Besides the activity by federal and provincial personnel at regional headquarters in the provinces, some 500 municipalities throughout Canada also took part.

Many gaps were revealed in the plans and preparations. I feel, however, that a considerable advance in the knowledge of the problems to be faced has been achieved, and that all concerned are better prepared to play their part should a real emergency arise. So far as the gaps are concerned, every effort will be made to fill them and to remove any evidence of weaknesses revealed during the course of the exercise.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if, unfortunately, civil defence is necessary in the world in which we live, it is important that it should be planned and organized as effectively as possible. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, the operation in question has shown that there is a great deal to be done in that regard. Civil defence is important, but policies in all countries to make civil defence unnecessary are even more important.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it is the policy of the government to endeavour to establish an organization for civil defence and to spend considerable money on it, it is perhaps a good thing that the recent exercise referred to was held. I cannot help but say that the Prime Minister must have been on an exercise different from the one I was on, in view of what he said a few moments ago.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I was grateful for the opportunity of serving as an observer. There is no opportunity at this time to discuss all the experiences of the exercise, but in my estimation the exercise disclosed not only many minor but many major gaps. I was interested in knowing that the attack was supposed to be realistic. I gathered that from the statement made by the Prime Minister the day previous to the exercise. The attack was to be realistic in order to demonstrate what might happen under certain circumstances. The attack was all by manned bombers except for the latter portion, during which two missiles were discharged.

The major gap disclosed by the operation was this. Outside of the few cabinet ministers, parliamentary secretaries, and two private members from the opposition, the government and the House of Commons were completely wiped out. That may be a good thing.

Mr. MacInnis: That is your only chance.

Mr. Winch: It is obvious, on the basis of this realistic exercise, that there should be considerable discussion of it in this chamber. I hope when certain estimates are before the house all hon. members will participate in a discussion of this subject. On behalf of this group I take the position that we are not supposed to keep to ourselves exactly what we observed, especially in terms of gaps in the operation, but that these things should be mentioned and discussed.

In commenting on the remarks of the Prime Minister I feel I must say that something is definitely wrong in this country and in the world if we have to have civil defence. Let us hope that sanity will prevail and that something will be done as speedily as possible in other fields so that our money, effort and brains can be directed to the introduction of useful and productive measures and policies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot add anything to what has been said, Mr. Speaker. Both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Vancouver East mentioned the fact that every effort should be made to bring about peace, thereby denying the necessity of civil defence. That is not only their view but the view of this government, which has pressed very strongly to bring about disarmament while at the same time having to maintain defences until disarmament is attained.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—STATEMENT ON CURRENT SITUATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say a word at this time respecting Laos. On May 11 the international supervisory commission for Laos was able to report to the United Kingdom and Soviet governments, as co-chairmen of the Geneva conference of 1954, that the principal parties to the recent hostilities had ordered their troops to cease fire from 8 a.m. local time on May 3, and that since that time there has been a general and demonstrable cessation of hostilities. The commission is satisfied that a state of de facto cease fire exists throughout Laos.

Despite the commission's report, which was available last Friday, the opening of the conference has been delayed because of disagreement over the seating of Pathet Lao representatives on an equal footing with the representatives of the government headed by Souvanna Phouma, which is recognized by the communist powers, and the royal government of Vientiane. Some countries have taken the position that to concede equal status to the Pathet Lao would prejudge the central issue of the conference and place them on a footing to which as representatives of a paramilitary organization they were not entitled.

There have been suggestions that the conference should be allowed to proceed, dealing first with such practical matters as the question of the cease fire, leaving time for the Laotian parties to agree among themselves on a government for Laos and representation at the conference. Another suggestion has been that any delegation should be permitted to invite any Laotian group to participate in the conference as observers without prejudice to the ultimate composition of the government to be formed in connection with a political settlement. While this formula was acceptable to the principal powers, it has not yet been agreed to by the representatives of the royal government, and consequently there is still doubt as to when the conference will be able to begin its work.

In view of all the circumstances I think I should advise the house that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who expected to return to Canada tomorrow, will be remaining in Geneva, and that the earliest possible date for his return, short of a complete breakdown of the conference, will be the end of the week. He had a number of appointments here during the latter part of the week, I believe on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Those appointments will be cancelled in view of the situation prevailing at Geneva.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members will be interested in what the Prime Minister has said about this important and difficult conference which is, we hope, about to begin in Geneva. There were two difficulties in the way of the conference. One was the arrangement of a cease fire. That difficulty seems to have been overcome although, according to the press, the cease fire apparently is a rather uneasy one at the present time. The other difficulty which apparently has not yet been overcome is concerned with the representation of Laos itself at the conference. It is unfortunate that agreement could not be reached between the two inviting governments—I refer to the government of the U.K. and the government of the U.S.S.R.—as to the representation of Laos before the conference was convened. It is to be hoped that agreement can be reached with a minimum of delay so that this conference, which may be so important for peace and political settlement in this sensitive area, can get to work.

It is reassuring to hear from the Prime Minister that Canada will be represented at the early part of this conference, notwithstanding this delay, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This is a conference of foreign ministers and no doubt the Secretary of State for External Affairs felt that he should make his own contribution to it in that capacity.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, speaking for this group I wish to say we are glad to hear of the cease fire being a fact, or a near fact, and we certainly wish the coming conference every success. We know that the Canadian representatives will make their usual constructive and commendable contribution to this most important conference, working toward an end we are all seeking.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR INFORMATION TO PUBLIC

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-91, to amend the Canada Elections Act (information to electors).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, in order to promote broader participation on the part of the Canadian public in the matter of election or campaign fund expenses, clearly a program of public education is required. To complement such a program a change is also required in the elections act to place in the hands of the public information necessary to make such contributions.

I might say in passing, Mr. Speaker, that such a program was undertaken in the United States in 1958, and produced a substantially increased and a much broader based participation in that country. Also, this would remove some of the compulsion features in the so-called New party program being put forward in this field, compulsion in the sense of compelling a union member to contribute to a party which he has no intention of supporting.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to revise the provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with the death penalty and also the provisions dealing with the trial of a person charged with an offence for which the penalty is death.

The provisions relate primarily to the crime of murder, and the effect is to divide murder into two types, capital and non-capital. Under the proposed legislation the death penalty will attach only to murder of a planned and deliberate character, or to killing in the course of committing a crime of a nature importing the elements of deliberation or stealth. In such case only the person who committed the act resulting in death, or who counselled or procured it, would be subject to the death penalty.

The bill also makes changes in the provisions regarding the plea to be entered by a person charged with an offence for which the penalty may be death, and provides automatic review by the court of appeal of any case where the death penalty has been imposed. There are other consequential and related provisions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

COMBINES HEARINGS ON NEW DRUGS

Motion No. 123—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of telegrams, correspondence, and other documents exchanged between the government, the restrictive trade practices commission, or the combines investigation branch, and any person, organization, or company since January 1, 1961, regarding the question of hearings by the restrictive trade practices commission concerning the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the documents asked for are those that relate to or are filed in proceedings before the restrictive trade practices commission which, as I have already explained to the house on more than one occasion during the last two weeks, specifically on May 3, May 4 and May 10, are intended by parliament, under the Combines Investigation Act, to be conducted in private unless otherwise ordered by the chairman of the commission. No such order has been made by the chairman in this instance and, except to the extent that the chairman so orders, or details of submissions are included in the final report of the commission, which will be made public, the contents of such documents which parliament has intended to be private ought not to be disclosed. The correspondence referred to in this motion will have been exchanged between the commission and those to whom the commission wrote in connection with submissions to be made at the hearings and in many cases contain details submitted in reply. Therefore I cannot accept the address for production of the documents in question.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I feel that is stretching things quite a bit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member wish the question put?

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I wish you would put the question, please.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Howard) which was negatived on the following division:

COMBINES INVESTIGATION, RAW FISH, B.C.

Motion No. 124—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of the statement of evidence by Mr. T. D. MacDonald, director of investigation and research of the combines investigation branch, in the matter of an inquiry into the production, purchase, and sale of raw fish in British Columbia.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have already objected to an identical motion on the same subject made by the hon. member for Skeena on June 24, 1959.

My objection can be found in the revised Hansard at page 5085. I refused then to table the statement of evidence because the act makes it clear that it was the intention of parliament that proceedings and inquiries should be conducted in private unless otherwise specifically ordered by the chairman of the commission.

The house then sustained the objection. No change in the situation has since taken place that would call for any modification. I am therefore unable to accept the motion, and under the circumstances I wonder whether the hon. member would consider withdrawing it.

Mr. Fulton: Page 5085, June 24, 1959.

Mr. Howard: It is my understanding that the house did not sustain the objection of the minister at that time but that I agreed to withdraw the motion. I did not realize then, as I do now, that there is so much secrecy in the operations of the government, and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to put the motion, please.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, I have ignored such remarks from the hon. member before but I do not think I can continue to do so. They are quite improper, and a reflection on members of the house. It is not the government or members who have ruled that these inquiries should be conducted in private. It is the statute passed by parliament.

Mr. Howard: If I may speak on the question of privilege raised by the Minister of Justice, I would point out that the rules of the house prohibit the Minister of Justice from interpreting statutes. It is considered that he is not competent to do so. What the minister is now doing is interpreting the Combines Investigation Act, and in my opinion it does not say what he has just said.

Mr. Fulton: I can certainly understand what the statute means when it uses the words "in private", even if the hon. member does not.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF WARSAW CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of a recent decision by the United States courts limiting to the amount of $8,300 the liability of an air carrier on an international flight, under the Warsaw convention to which Canada is a signatory, as reported in the Financial Post of May 13, does the government intend to make representations through its delegates at I.C.A.O. or at some other international level to amend the Warsaw convention?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman gave me notice of his question. The Warsaw convention limits the liability of an air carrier on an international flight to the amount of $8,300. On August 16, 1956 Canada signed the Hague protocol, which was opened for signature on September 28, 1955. The purpose of the Hague protocol, which incidentally requires ratification by 30 states before coming into effect, is to double the amount of the liability established under the Warsaw convention. To date only 19 states have ratified the convention. As the house will know, five and a half years have gone by from the time it was opened for signature.

A factor having an influence on the government's decision to ratify will be the likelihood of sufficient countries ratifying the protocol to bring it into effect. However, I can say that ratification is under consideration. Nevertheless, I know the hon. gentleman will realize that when only 19 of the requisite minimum of 30 have actually ratified, there is not too much hope of the protocol coming into effect.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may, I should like to ask this additional question. Does the Prime Minister not think that if Canada were to ratify it, that might lead others to follow its example?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Others often do so, Your Honour. I can only say that the matter is receiving consideration. If ratification takes place I would hope that the expectation of the hon. member would be achieved.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

RESERVATION OF PROVINCIAL BILLS BY LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. On May 5 he informed the house that the government was giving consideration to the formulating of formal instructions that could be sent to lieutenant governors regarding the reservation by lieutenant governors of provincial bills. Can the Prime Minister say whether those instructions have now been formulated?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No instructions to that effect have as yet been sent, nor has a decision been made in this regard.

SHIPPING

REPORTED SEIZURE OF CUBAN SHIP IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or, in his absence, to his parliamentary secretary. Has the minister or his parliamentary secretary read a press report this morning concerning the seizure of the Cuban freighter Fundador in Quebec for failure to pay for half a million dollars worth of merchandize sold to Cuba? If so, has the minister any comment to make?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the newspaper clipping has been drawn to my attention. I will take the question as notice.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO AID TO POTATO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture and both his parliamentary secretaries, I wonder whether I could ask the Acting Minister of Agriculture whether the government has any definite plans to provide relief to potato growers in the maritime provinces, who have suffered losses owing to rot. If so, can the minister inform the house what those plans are?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will realize that I am not familiar with the subject matter of this question. However, I shall be glad to take the question as notice and provide an answer tomorrow or as soon as possible.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

NUMBER OF PILOTS USED IN VANGUARD AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is he aware of the fact that the Canadian airline pilots association have protested strongly against the decision of Trans-Canada Air Lines to fly its Vanguards on the New York and Chicago runs with only two men in the cockpit, as compared with three on United States lines using the same aircraft? What do the officers of this department intend to do about this problem, which appears to be a serious one?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this fact. As it is a matter between the management of T.C.A. and its employees, it is a matter for collective bargaining. The government is watching the situation with a great deal of attention. However, it is a matter for the T.C.A. management. I will pass along the representations of the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is it not also a matter of the safety of an aircraft, as to whether three pilots or two pilots should fly it? That would be a technical matter for the Department of Transport officials to determine.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker; as far as the regulation of it is concerned, it comes under the regulating powers of the Department of Transport, which has issued an order in this particular case. I have nothing to add at the present time.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): I wish to ask a supplementary question having regard to the statement that the United States air lines using the same plane carry three pilots. Can the minister check as to whether any United States air line is using the same plane?

Mr. Balcer: It is a fact that no United States air lines are flying Vanguards at the present time.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I have a further supplementary question. Can the minister say whether the department has assured itself that the traffic conditions at Chicago and New York, which are the points under question, are such that two pilots are competent to manage a large aircraft in those flight areas?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, this is a technical decision to be taken by technicians. Whatever factors those technicians have taken into consideration are matters that I am afraid I cannot spell out at this time. However, as I stated we are following this matter very closely. When a decision was reached it was based on a technical assessment of this particular situation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY OF CANADIAN MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he tell the house whether there is any further information available on the plight of Canadian missionaries in Cuba?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian embassy in Havana visited the Colon area and reports that conditions there regarding the priests and nuns have improved. I have some expectation that within the next few days there may be something further to report in this connection. The only Canadian who was in custody last week, namely John Darling, was released on Thursday or Friday.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—REPORTED INTENTION TO SURRENDER CROWN RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, referring to the question asked on Friday last, May 12 by the hon. member for Peterborough, as found at page 4715 of Hansard, may I say that the answer is as follows.

By order in council P.C. 1961-680 of May 11, 1961, the governor in council returned to reserve status lands that were surrendered for purposes of Dimensional Investments Limited but not resold by that company. Such lands will be administered as before under the provisions of the Indian Act. Nothing beyond this has been under consideration.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he is in a position to give the house any indication of the date or even the approximate date of the budget?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it will not be possible to bring the budget down this month.

Mr. Argue: After the by-elections.

Mr. McIlraith: Now we know.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORT OF DR. CLARK—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he is yet in a position to advise the house of the government's intentions as to action as a result of the Clark report.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question very recently. I cannot give the exact date or reference in Hansard. However I indicated that it was being studied.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether the government has decided to introduce legislation in this field during this session?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I said on a previous occasion.

Mr. Argue: The minister never knows anything.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LENGTH OF RACE MEETINGS AND NUMBER OF RACES

Hon. E. D. Fulton (for the Minister of Agriculture), moved the second reading of Bill No. C-89, to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings).

He said: Section 178 of the Criminal Code provides that parimutuel betting may be conducted on horse racing tracks if the parimutuel betting is under the supervision of an officer appointed by the Minister of Agriculture. The section also stipulates the amount of racing which may be conducted by a racing association each year. The purpose of this bill is to amend the present provisions of the act with respect to the number of days of running racing which an association may conduct and the number of trotting races each day.

With respect to running races, an association may, under the present provisions of the section, hold one meet of 14 consecutive legal racing days or two meets of up to seven days each, with a minimum of 20 days between the two meets. While this permits an association to conduct 14 days of racing, the provision that if two meets are held neither shall consist of more than seven racing days has, in some instances, prevented an association from taking advantage of the authorized 14 days of racing. If, for example, an association scheduled a first meeting of four racing days, the second meeting would be restricted to seven racing days, making a total of only 11 such days of racing.

The proposed amendment would permit an association to schedule either one meeting of 14 days or two meetings of any length so long as the combined total of the two meetings does not exceed 14 days. The amendment merely provides more flexibility to associations in scheduling their race meetings. It does not increase the amount of racing which each association is now authorized to conduct, and the present provision that there shall not be more than eight races on each day continues in effect.

The second part of the amendment deals with trotting and pacing races. The present provisions with respect to the number of events which can be conducted in one day is rather complicated, with varying provisions for races, heats and dashes.

In trotting race parlance a dash is a complete event within itself. Races may be made up of a varying number of heats, with the same horses racing in each heat. The section at present authorizes four combinations of races, heats and dashes in any one racing day. There may be eight races or dashes, which is a total of eight events; or there may be two dashes and four heat races of two heats each, which is a total of ten events; or there may be four heat races of three heats each; which is a total of 12 events; or there may be six heat races of two heats each, which is also a total of 12 events.

This authority for varying combinations of dashes, races and heats has proven to be cumbersome and to create difficulties both for racing associations and for the administration. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to simplify the authority for the number of authorized races and to provide that not more than ten races, or events, will be held in any one day. Racing associations will then be free to adjust their scheduling of races, heats and dashes within that total authority. As in the case of the amendment with respect to running races, there is no increase in the total number of racing events which are now authorized under the section.

In this matter we are, of course, concerned with the humane factor with respect to the horses to the same extent as with the amount of parimutuel betting which is authorized. Since the amendments will not increase the number of events now authorized, but merely provide for more flexibility in scheduling those events, it is considered that both interests are adequately protected in the amendments.

Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat I think I should simply say that traditionally the responsibility for legislation dealing with this part of the Criminal Code—that is, that part concerned with parimutuel betting and horse racing—has been that of the Minister of Agriculture. The fact that I am speaking today on second reading should not be taken as any departure from that principle. I am speaking on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture, in whose name the bill stands, during his absence in the furtherance of his productive efforts to sell more Canadian wheat.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where is he?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side do not intend to object to this bill dealing with horse racing, notwithstanding my own Methodist ministerial background. As no question of political principle seems to be involved in the bill, we do not see any reason for delaying it by discussing it.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I think we all know, even though we may disagree with it, that Canada's economic philosophy, with which this government agrees and propounds from time to time, is one which is classified generally as free enterprise. The expressions made on a number of occasions by hon. members in this house are that a free enterprise is the paramount thing and must govern our every walk of life; that an individual should have the inalienable right to invest his life savings in enterprises in order to bring to people those things which add to our social and cultural values and understandings. If the individual, following his own individual initiative, is allowed to bring it to full play we have greater employment, lower prices, the quality of our goods and services is better, and the market place is the arena which is a sufficient check and balance against abuses of the system itself.

This particular bill does to a degree smack of state control and bureaucratic interference and influence over the right of individual citizens to pursue their free enterprise tendencies to the fullest extent. The remarks I have just made could of course very well have come from any Conservative hon. member in this house, and have come from them on many, many occasions in the past on other matters. Apparently, though, there is an adulteration of those principles in this particular instance, and perhaps an expression on the part of the government that the general public does not need some protection against the abuses that arise out of this so-called free enterprise system.

It would seem to me—although perhaps this does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice, though he did get off a bit on the selling of wheat and perhaps I will be able to make a comment or two in some other field—that perhaps it would have been much more appropriate, in view of the incongruities which exist in so far as our gambling laws are concerned, if some amendments could have been brought in to deal with the questions of bingos, lotteries and the other types of ticket selling raffles which I am sure every hon. member of this house has engaged in at some time or another. In fact I think some of us have promoted or precipitated certain forms of gambling in order to advance pre-election campaigns, but I think it would have been more appropriate if the—

Mr. Chambers: The unions will be more effective for raising money.

Mr. Howard: It would be inappropriate to do it at this time, and I am not prepared to enter into the field of where my friend and his party get their campaign funds from, but I am quite sure there are far more nefarious strings attached to the donors to his party than are or ever will be attached to those who donate to my party.

Mr. Hellyer: But you admit there will be nefarious strings attached to gifts from some of your supporters.

Mr. Howard: I have not admitted anything of the sort.

Mr. Hellyer: That is just what you said.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what you said.

Mr. Howard: I am not one of those who a few moments ago violated his own principles in connection with something which at an earlier time he did not agree with. Obviously the influence of a former minister of fisheries is still prevalent in this party, and—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman has made a reflection on certain hon. members of this house who did not choose to vote for a motion that he put forward in this house two years ago and on which there was no division. Therefore it is quite impossible for the hon. gentleman to know, unless he has some insight that is not given to the rest of us, how other hon. members would have voted.

The plain fact of the matter is that the hon. gentleman knew, when he introduced that motion, that the information for which he was asking was barred by statute of this parliament, and it would be my submission that the motion should never have appeared on the order paper for that reason. In any case, we believe in upholding the laws passed by parliament and not trying to undermine them.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if I could speak on the question of privilege, I of course would not attempt to guess what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate intends to do on any occasion, because there is a great deal of inconsistency on his part and on the part of the Liberal party. Just a few days ago—I could not find it immediately in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings—an hon. member of the Liberal party stood up in this house and moved a similar motion in regard to the drug industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: That was a different motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think we should come back to a consideration of horse racing.

Mr. Hellyer: The reason we are so far behind is because his party is so far back in the race.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Peters: Why don't you stand up and make a speech?

Mr. Hellyer: Why don't you say something when you do stand up?

Mr. Peters: You have not said anything standing up or sitting down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that betting on horse races is similar to betting on the Liberal party; one is going to lose his money either way. I suggest it would be more appropriate for the government to have brought in amending legislation, in respect of the Criminal Code of a type dealing with all forms of gambling, apart from the political type.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a limited number of words on my own behalf in regard to the amendment now before us. I oppose any form of gambling whatsoever. I believe the amendment now before us will aid and abet the interests of the horse racing industry. In other words, it will make the betting that takes place at race courses a little more lucrative to the organizations which look after horse racing. I believe Canadian people are being led down the garden path in the matter of horse racing, in the matter of bingo games, and in regard to all other forms of gambling, in that they are being led to believe that they can get something for nothing. I oppose gambling on horse racing and on all other forms of games. I oppose horse racing also because I suspect it is a little on the inhumane side because it involves cruelty to animals.

Mr. Speaker, I must plead guilty in that I have purchased lottery tickets—perhaps more than I should have—but I feel that if and when I buy lottery tickets or place a bet on a horse race, I should be informed through the law that I am acting illegally and assisting to lower the morality of the people of our nation.

Mr. W. C. Henderson (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about horse racing. I do not believe there is anyone in this house, with the possible exception of the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) (Mr. Hodgson) who knows more about racing than I do. I attended the Kentucky derby last week and saw 100,000 people having fun at the races. I managed a fair at Dawson Creek, British Columbia, where we had race meetings supervised by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and I have never seen anything wrong or anyone receive any wrong treatment. I do not drink, and the only bad habit

I have is that I like to gamble, by betting a few dollars, but I suggest that is my business.

I have never seen a population starving, or anything of that nature, because of horse racing, and I have been to all kinds of race meets. I attended the race meetings at San Bernardino, California, one winter. That meeting lasted all winter. Millionaires at those meetings spend a lot of money, with the result that many people are employed. I should like hon. members to know that a boy who looks after a race horse receives between $300 and $400 a month. This is a most lucrative way of making a living, and I suggest there is not a nicer one.

So I say to my hon. friend, who has such tough luck at the bingo games, that I am not in favour of his argument at all. The hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) races horses. He has a big stable of horses, and you will never meet a finer man than that hon. member. I am in favour of horse racing and in favour of the people who raise horses.

Many individuals make a living raising horses. There are many farms in Ontario where horses are raised, from which colts are sold, and the individuals in the business of raising those horses probably have nothing to do with racing at all. Those people raise the colts for sale, and I suggest it is a very nice profession. The racing of horses is certainly not inhumane, and I ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam if he has ever seen a jockey fall off a horse at a race track when the horse stopped and complained about it? I suggest that the horse just went right on running.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to say any more in this regard, as I am sure all hon. members know how I feel about these things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. Henderson: Certainly.

Mr. Pearson: Would it be fair to state that what the hon. member is actually saying is that he would like to see more and more horses on the payroll?

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, we used that particular horse during the election campaign some years ago.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I do not have much experience in regard to horse racing, and I should perhaps direct my question to the hon. member for Cariboo rather than the minister, but I should like to ask whether the proposed changes will have any effect on the number of meetings which can be held in neighbouring communities. I have no personal objection to horse racing, if the meetings are held on week ends, but in my area, where meetings are held in communities close to the Quebec border, there are races held at different towns a day or two apart, using the same horses and normally attended by the same people. This type of exchange goes on for a good part of the summer. I should like to know whether, under these new regulations, there can be only two meetings in one area, or ten meetings, or what effect the regulations will have as to the number of horse races taking place in areas similar to the area to which I have referred.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, in circumstances such as the hon. member has suggested, there would be different associations holding the different meetings. One association can only hold one meeting at one place. Therefore if there were other meetings being held nearby at the same time, those meetings would be held under the auspices of different associations.

The purpose of this bill, simply stated, is to provide flexibility in respect of the total number of days of racing which may be carried on by one association. It is not intended to increase the number of meets but to make the situation more flexible by providing that one association can hold not more than 14 days' racing in a combination of two meetings, such as four days and ten days, or eight days and six days, as the case may be.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, to use a concrete example, if racing takes place one day at Earlton, the next day at Ville Marie, the next day at Noranda, the following day at Val d'Or, all under the auspices of one association, how many days is considered to be a meeting and what effect will this change have? I am interested in this subject because in my area we have a very short racing season, and in providing horse racing in each of the different areas there is a good deal of travel involved because of the distance between the towns. There is also a provincial boundary involved. I am wondering whether the new regulations will prohibit horse racing on the basis I have described.

Mr. Fulton: No, it would not Mr. Chairman. On the basis of what the hon. member has said, if such circumstances did exist—I think he mentioned five places in which racing would be held on five consecutive days, but at a different place each day—they could only exist with respect to harness racing, not running races. There would be no prohibition of that situation under the proposed amendment.

Mr. Caron: The amendment refers to—

> ... racing during any such meeting to be held on consecutive days on which racing may be lawfully carried on—

Can the minister tell me whether if they are not consecutive days, they are excluded? Is the racing excluded if there is an interval of, say, two days?

Mr. Fulton: Is my hon. friend speaking of running races or harness races?

Mr. Caron: Harness races.

Mr. Fulton: No; I am informed that they could have an interlude of a day or more in between, and they could go on then afterwards to complete their full quota of 14 days. In the case of harness racing the days need not be consecutive. It is only with respect to the running races that the days must be consecutive.

Mr. Howard: It seems to me that there are two or three race tracks in the lower mainland of Vancouver, and the racing season appears to run throughout the whole summer, if I am not mistaken, perhaps for a period of say 60 days. In view of the act as it stands now, why is this permitted? Is it because the races are sponsored by more than one association that they can carry on?

Mr. Fulton: That is correct; different associations holding charters may set their meets consecutively, or so time them that one follows the other.

Mr. Howard: Are there any prohibitions or sanctions with regard to the structure of certain racing associations? Can they be interlocking? Can the same people be members of two associations?

Mr. Fulton: I am advised that one person may be a director of more than one association. The limitation on the association itself is that it must have had a charter or been incorporated prior to 1947, and also have held meetings at which there was parimutuel betting under the control of the Minister of Agriculture between 1938 and 1947. In other words, no association which was not incorporated before 1947 is allowed to hold race meetings.

Mr. Howard: No new ones can enter the field and hold race meetings?

Mr. Fulton: Not unless they were to be incorporated by a special act of this parliament or of the legislature of a province.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Howard: Under what authority are they incorporated or given a charter at the moment? I refer to the ones that were incorporated prior to 1947.

Mr. Fulton: They were mostly provincial charters. The information I have is that, so far as we know, there are only two federal charters, so they are nearly all provincial charters. Even so, to qualify they must have had their charter before 1947.

Mr. Howard: It seems a bit odd to me.

Mr. Fulton: That is in the code now, and the provision is not being touched by this amendment.

Mr. Howard: It just seems odd to me. In this particular field we are maintaining the status quo as it was in 1947, subject to incorporation by special act of this parliament or of any legislature, and we are also restricting the number of days during which any one association can function. We are also limiting the total period of time, so that one association holding races cannot hold them for a period of more than 14 days. What would be apt to occur if we were to have this open ended and not have the restriction in so far as the number of days are concerned? Is it the thought of the minister or the government that this might allow one or other of the associations to reach such a state of affairs that it would have a virtual controlling influence over the whole of the racing season and therefore be in a monopoly position in so far as the holding of races is concerned? Is the desire to have some sort of competitive element at work?

Mr. Fulton: There are, I believe, two primary reasons for this provision limiting the number of days. One of them is so that no one association can hog the whole field. The other is in part a matter of enforcement and control. It will be appreciated that parimutuel betting can only be carried on where these things come under the control of the minister, and the R.C.M. police must be there to supervise the betting. Well, we do not have unlimited personnel; therefore we must have some limitation. Consequently it is a combination of the two factors; a desire not to see a situation where one association hogs the field and, second, the practical matter of providing the personnel to supervise the betting.

Mr. Howard: This desire to limit or control competition and ensure that one association does not get in a monopoly position and thus be in a position to exploit the entire field may be commendable, but in so far as the R.C.M. police are concerned in supervising the parimutuel betting system, are the R.C.M. police there on all occasions? Are they there during each day and during each of the races? How do they conduct the investigation or checking to ensure that whatever they want to ensure takes place?

Mr. Fulton: I am informed that there are regulations which prescribe that the R.C.M. police shall be present during the course of any period when parimutuel betting is being conducted.

Mr. Howard: For argument's sake, in the case of a community such as Vancouver which has race tracks operating in the summer season, or for a period of two months, are the R.C.M. police there on each day of those two months during which racing takes place?

Mr. Fulton: If there is betting the answer is yes.

Mr. Howard: Well, then, how does this limitation make enforcement easier, if the R.C.M. police have to be there in any event?

Mr. Fulton: Well, I would think the answer to that is fairly simple, for my hon. friend has said, for instance, that under his hypothetical case racing is carried on for two months. Presumably that is the maximum time for which it can be carried on in view of the number of existing associations and the limitation of the number of days upon which they may each hold race meetings. If we did not have that limit, other associations would come in or existing associations could hold longer meetings, and the R.C.M.P. would have to be present during that longer period.

Mr. Howard: I had in mind maintaining the status quo of 1947, but not the limitation of 14 days. If you have a limitation with respect to the period of time, say a two or three month period, it might allow anyone to enter the field and I can foresee that you would have racing on Christmas day and every other day of the year. I just wanted to get that clear in my mind.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend has given a case where racing is carried on for two months. That could be done by four associations under their respective 14 days each, making a total of 56 days. If we did not have that limitation one association could carry on racing for 365 days.

Mr. Pigeon: I should like to ask a question of the minister. How much revenue has the federal government received from racing over the last two or three years?

Mr. Fulton: The information I have is that in 1956-57 the revenue was $533,000, in round figures; in 1957-58, $573,000; in 1958-59, $646,000; in 1959-60, $673,000, and the forecast for this year is $710,000.

Mr. Howard: To what degree does this meet or does it more than meet the expenses of the R.C.M.P. in providing surveillance for these operations?

Mr. Fulton: I am informed that at least during the years I have referred to there has been a surplus, and in recent years the surplus of revenue over expenditure has been in the neighbourhood of $18,000 to $20,000.

Mr. Howard: This is the only organization or individual I know of that makes money at race tracks.

Mr. Peters: Is it safe to say that the legislation does not apply to any meetings where parimutuel betting is not official? In other words, the small race meetings held throughout the country where there is some form of betting but no formal parimutuel betting do not come under this provision.

Mr. Fulton: Indeed they do not. The Criminal Code provides that betting at race tracks may take place only under the supervision of the minister, that it must be parimutuel betting, it can only take place at races carried on in accordance with the provisions which are incorporated in this legislation. It may only be parimutuel betting, and it is only permitted at authorized race meetings.

Mr. Pigeon: How many race tracks are there in each province of Canada?

Mr. Fulton: I do not have that information here for the purpose of this amendment, but I would be glad to get it and provide it to the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: What would be the relationship of race associations of this nature with the Combines Investigation Act and the activities under the act if the occasion arose when there was considered to be some conflict?

Mr. Fulton: It is difficult for me to see that the activities of racing associations would come under the surveillance of the director of investigation and research. I am informed that it is a highly competitive business or occupation and, as the hon. member will appreciate, not only is it regulated precisely by the Criminal Code but where betting does take place it can only take place under the control and supervision of the Minister of Agriculture. Therefore I cannot visualize at the moment how any situation would arise which would be of concern under the Combines Investigation Act.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? Now, by leave?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Hellyer: Next sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, if the bill is not to be read the third time now may I crave the indulgence of the house to correct some information I gave in the committee. I think I said that the excess of revenue over expenditure was $18,000 to $20,000. I am advised that I left out one figure, that it should have been $118,000 to $120,000 per annum.

Mr. Howard: That makes it even more lucrative. Maybe you are engaging in sin.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING OWNED AND CONTROLLED BY THE GOVERNMENT

The house resumed, from Monday, February 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Balcer:

That a sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and controlled by the government be appointed to consider the accounts, estimates and bills relating to the Canadian National Railway and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the power of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys, and to consider the pension rights of existing or retired Canadian National Railway employees with respect to anomalies which may have resulted from breaks in the continuity of service, and also to consider the arrangements for turn around benefits for employees of the Canadian National Railway, and the said committee should be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time, and that notwithstanding standing order 67, the said committee shall consist of 26 members.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): When this debate closed at ten o'clock several weeks ago I had just been challenged by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on two points. The first was with reference to the word "rationalization" which I had used, and the need for rationalization in railway operations in this country. He wanted to know what I meant by that. Then he challenged me to indicate what rationalization would mean in terms of the number of jobs available.

There was a definition in today's issue of the Globe and Mail of the word "rationalization". They said it implies rational or reasonable scientific organization of industry to ensure the best use of labour, material and the machinery of production. The editorial goes on to say that this just means the reign of common sense. I suggest to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that if he will look at the statistics for the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways he will discover that since 1956 approximately 25,000 jobs have disappeared on the Canadian National Railways and approximately 16,000 jobs have disappeared on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Now, this surely underlines the importance of some kind of analysis to ascertain where the railways are going. Whether or not the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River likes it, railway jobs are disappearing. I insist that what we need to find out is the rate of attrition, and some means of restoring some stability for the railway employees as a whole. The productivity increase resulting from the use of new equipment means fewer jobs. Surely we can stage these changes so they mean less dislocation than we have seen. It is not a question of saying to the railways that they cannot lay off any more men; the men need jobs. This is going to happen, but it could be put on a reasonable basis. It seems to me that the railways, the unions and the government could consult together to see if these changes could not be put on a reasonable basis.

It seems to me that the MacPherson commission report, which has been tabled since we were last discussing the matter, has given the railways a breathing space of perhaps five to eight years in which they can adjust to these new conditions. However, let no member of the house deceive himself; the MacPherson commission and its recommendations, in themselves, are not going to have any effect of lessening this trend toward a decline in jobs. Any member who has had a divisional point in his constituency is aware of the fact that the use of new equipment is having an effect on employment.

I insist that this is one of the things at which we have to look in connection with the C.N.R., and try to find out from Mr. Gordon when he is before the committee what arrangements are being made to stage these lay-offs and this decline in the working force. The figures are startling to anyone who realizes that the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways between them in the last four years—this is not counting 1961—have seen the loss of employment opportunities for over 40,000 people. This represents a healthy chunk of our working force, when you recognize that about five years ago almost 200,000 people were employed by the railways and within another five years we are likely to be down to about 100,000. This gives you some idea of the impact on the country.

One of the things about which we want to hear from Mr. Gordon when he appears before this committee is this matter of the Canadian National getting into the trucking business. A little over a year ago the Canadian National announced that it had purchased four truck lines. The thing that bothers me is that over the year—this is as I understand it—not a single one of these deals has been completed. I have information that indicates that several of these lines are losing money at the rate of $40,000 to $50,000 a month. We want the background information as to how the Canadian National got into this trucking business, and why they went into it in the way they did by using such different methods from those followed by the Canadian Pacific Railway in connection with Smith Transport.

There are countless questions that I think Mr. Gordon will be facing. I only hope that all members of the committee will try to find out where the Canadian National Railway is going in such fields as trucking and employment. I am sure the hon. member for Laurier will join in these deliberations. We should like to know whether we can ever hope for anything better than these huge deficits Mr. Gordon and his management seem to keep building up.

The last point I would mention is the need for a more thorough explanation of the change in the pension system that was introduced by Canadian National Railways this year. It seems to me from my information that this is somewhat of a bookkeeping entry that makes the financial statement of the railway look about $10 million better than it actually is.

During the last few weeks, Mr. Speaker, I have spent a great deal of time reading over the last 10 committee reports when Mr. Gordon appeared before the committee. We have had some very able members of parliament, including the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for York West, who when they were in opposition seemed to have a great time having a go at Mr. Gordon. In the past there has been a very keen interest displayed by opposition members, but it seems to me that in those 10 years Mr. Gordon has always managed to play a superior Hamlet to that of the members of parliament.

This may be what one would expect because, after all, in money terms, he seems to be worth seven and half times what each one of us is worth. I call on all members of the committee to use all their zeal to see if we cannot this year get a little deeper into the roots of the Canadian National Railways to find out why this railway is not doing better than it is, despite the fact it has had this vigorous, dramatic, and I might almost say romantic leadership since 1950.

Motion agreed to.

FREIGHT RATES REDUCTION ACT

AMENDMENT EXTENDING APPLICATION OF REVISED RATES

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act to extend for not more than twelve months the period during which the revised rates under the said act shall be applicable and to increase the authorized expenditure under the act by an additional twenty million dollars.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say that I have not as yet received my file on this subject. However, the committee has seen the wording of the resolution as it appears on the order paper. The last time the Freight Rates Reduction Act was amended my predecessor, the then minister of transport, moved for an extension of that act of 12 months and an increase of $15 million. The reason for that amendment was that the government had decided that the whole matter of the railways would have to be reviewed by a commission known as the MacPherson commission which was to make a complete survey of the situation of railroading in Canada. The MacPherson commission started its sittings, and even at that time my predecessor hoped it would be in a position to make a final report within 12 months. Unfortunately, however, for various reasons this report could not be produced within that time. That was the reason this Freight Rates Reduction Act was extended.

The first volume of the MacPherson commission report came before the public only a few weeks ago. At that time we made sure that the shippers in Canada and the Canadian public would not be hurt by the fact that the MacPherson commission report had been produced so late. Also, as hon. members know, what was produced was only the first volume of that report; there are still two other volumes to come. The purpose of the Freight Rates Reduction Act, as the committee knows, was to reduce, first of all by 7 per cent, the freight rate increase which had been requested by the railways and had been agreed to by the board of transport commissioners.

This decision of the board of transport commissioners had been appealed by eight of the Canadian provinces. Following that appeal the government decided to bring down this bill. This bill had for its main purpose the provision of $20 million to the railways to permit them to effect a reduction of no less than 7 per cent, which made the previous increase not more than 10 per cent. In actual practice, after the board of transport commissioners had time to assess the real impact of this reduction of $20 million they made a decision to further reduce this freight rate increase by another 2 per cent. As a result shippers were to pay only 8 per cent because of this further reduction.

This further amendment to the Freight Rates Reduction Act will have the effect of postponing for another 12 months this full increase of 17 per cent. In the meantime the government will have a chance to consider the recommendations contained in the first volume of the MacPherson commission report. We shall also be given the opportunity of waiting for the second and third volumes. The first volume contains some extremely important statements concerning matters affecting the railways that depended mostly on legislative action by various governments, our predecessors or ourselves. The second volume will deal mostly with regional aspects, regional anomalies and regional problems that affect the welfare of our railroads in Canada. That is why the government has decided to carry on for up to another 12 months this Freight Rates Reduction Act, and has also decided to vote another $20 million to take care of this difference between 8 per cent and 17 per cent.

This is a general outline of this resolution. When the bill is brought down hon. members will find that it contains provision to take care of the period between today and April 30 next. I know that hon. members opposite have asked what the government was going to do about the matter or what was going to happen in this period; whether the railways were going to be reimbursed for the amount of money they will lose because freight rates were not increased by the full 17 per cent. The bill will look after this matter, and will ensure that the railways and the shippers will not be taxed more than they would have been taxed if this present amendment had been brought in prior to April 30.

I therefore recommend to the committee that this resolution be adopted. It is my intention, after second reading of the bill, to move that it be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, as were the amendments to this bill last year and the year before. I therefore recommend the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee has listened with great interest to the statement the minister has made in connection with this resolution which is now before us. The resolution is a simple one. It concerns the extension of an act which was passed by this house on an earlier occasion, known as the Freight Rates Reduction Act. It can be divided into two parts; first, the extension of the act for a period of 12 months, and second, the increase in the subsidy to the total of $55 million over the three periods that the act has been in operation.

I would remind the minister that in his statement a moment ago he said the last time the act had been amended by his predecessor it was extended for a period of 12 months. My recollection is that the extension was for a period of nine and not 12 months. The minister has also said—and he will correct me if I am wrong—that the object of bringing in this resolution now is to give the government a breathing spell in order to allow them to consider the recommendations in the first volume of the report of the royal commission on transportation, together with the other two volumes which will be coming in due course.

If I am right in the inference which I obtained from what the minister said, I take it that there will be no legislation based on the report of the royal commission on transportation during the course of the present session. I say this because if the intention is to extend this act for a period of 12 months in order to give the government time to consider the recommendations of the royal commission, I take it there is not much hope of such legislation during the course of the present session of parliament.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, may I just interject a word here. I do not want to mislead the committee. Actually I stated that this amendment will be for up to 12 months, but any time it were necessary to interrupt the provisions of this act, it could be done. I do not say it will last for 12 months, but it will be up to a maximum of 12 months.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for the statement he has made. The minister now indicates that while the extension is for 12 months, it may be interrupted during the course of that 12 month period by legislation which would be brought down to deal with the situation in accordance with the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation.

I must at the outset of my remarks deprecate the manner in which the government has dealt with this particular piece of legislation. The reason for that statement is that no intention was indicated by the government until the last days of the month of April. The prior act expired on April 30, and up until a day or two before that date there was no indication by the government to either the railways or the shippers of what the government intended to do in this situation. Therefore it was clear that the mind of the government either was not made up, or the government had entirely forgotten that the act was coming to an end on April 30, 1961. This is indicated not only from the questions asked in the house but also from information which anyone can obtain at the board of transport commissioners, because while the committee knows that the board of transport commissioners cannot make freight rates retroactive, the railways may, if they wish, file a tariff in reduction of rates.

The information I have in my possession is that the railways did file a tariff on or about April 28 which, because the government had not made up its mind, indicated as alternatives either (1) a tariff seeking to increase freight rates to the 17 per cent which was authorized on November 18, 1958, or (2) maintaining the freight rates at the level contained in the act of 1960, namely with the 8 per cent increase. Therefore I do not think there is any doubt that up until that time the government had not made up its mind what it intended to do.

That is indicative of the attitude of the government on this whole problem. I should like to put on record some of the statements made by the Prime Minister during the campaign of 1957. At Drumheller, Alberta, on May 18, 1957, in the Canadian Press report in the Montreal Gazette the Prime Minister is quoted as saying:

> On freight rates, he said that a rate pattern discriminatory to the west has been made worse by recent increases. This had struck "an almost paralysing blow" to industrial development in the west.

And according to the Toronto Globe and Mail of May 20, 1957:

> He said a Conservative government would equalize freight rates as far as possible to help both agriculture and industry on the prairies compete with the rest of Canada.

Then again during the campaign of 1958, according to a Canadian Press report in the Windsor Daily Star of February 14, 1958, the Prime Minister said:

> On freight rates, Mr. Diefenbaker spelled out for the first time his government's apparent intention on the increase granted in January by the board of transport commissioners.

I would ask the committee to pay particular attention to this passage:

> "We said before we were in power that freight rates were unjustifiably high when raised horizontally. Did we act? When the board allowed an increase we held it up because it couldn't be justifiably brought into existence on the basis the increase was provided".

What happened after this statement was made was that an application was made by the railways of Canada to the board of transport commissioners to increase freight rates to the extent of 17 per cent. That application was granted by the board but there was an appeal to the cabinet by the provinces and others under the requisite section of the Railway Act and the appeal to the cabinet from that decision was granted.

Therefore, notwithstanding the words of the Prime Minister in his campaigning of 1958, the high freight rates about which he complained, and the horizontal increases, were worsened to the extent of 17 per cent.

Mr. Jones: This is what the subsidy was for.

Mr. Chevrier: I will come to that in a moment. Does not my friend who has just interrupted me realize that either the Prime Minister meant it when he said "Did we act to stop this increase?", or he did not. He did suspend it for a time, but then the cabinet, after consideration, allowed the freight rate increase of 17 per cent to go into effect.

Mr. Fulton: And immediately introduced a subsidy to reduce that increase.

Mr. Chevrier: Therefore he did not carry out his promise in this connection.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend will agree that a royal commission was immediately set up to take care of the problem.

Mr. Fulton: A subsidy was introduced.

Mr. Chevrier: I will tell the hon. member when the royal commission came into being. It was quite some time after that. I intend to put on the record, step by step, exactly what was done in connection with this matter.

Mr. Jones: A royal commission was set up to investigate it and a subsidy was immediately introduced following that.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: What subsidy?

Mr. Fulton: It was the roll back subsidy which is now being extended.

Mr. Pickersgill: That only covered part of the increase.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I will deal with the roll back subsidy in a moment. I hope the Minister of Justice will enter this debate and tell us just how the statements made by both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister, have been carried out. Incidentally, I have sent a note to the Prime Minister's office advising him that I intend to deal with this matter now.

Mr. Pearson: Where is he?

Mr. Chevrier: Neither of those statements have been carried out by this government.

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member permit me to say that it is quite true he sent a note to the Prime Minister's office but I should tell him that it reached the Prime Minister's office almost coincidentally with my hon. friend's intervention in this debate, and after the Prime Minister was involved in another engagement which prevents him from being here at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope the Prime Minister will not enter this house on another occasion, as he has done before, and say that I have taken advantage of his absence to make a statement when he was not present. At any time the Prime Minister was not present he was, as the Minister of Justice has said, away on other important business—I am sure the Prime Minister cannot always be here—but he should not say that statements are made in this house in his absence with the implication that they are made intentionally then.

To carry on, if I may—I have only limited time—after that the cabinet decided to dismiss this appeal and allow the 17 per cent increase to go into effect, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister made the following statement, which I should like to put on the record; and I draw this particularly to the attention of the Minister of Justice, who interrupted me a moment ago. The statement is dated November 26, 1958 and reads in part as follows:

> The Honourable Howard Green, Acting Prime Minister, issued the following statement today on behalf of the government:
> On the hearing of the appeal from the decision of the board of transport commissioners awarding the railways an increase in freight rates in order to meet a proposed increase in wages, it was agreed by the eight provinces and the railways
> (1) that the wage increases are reasonable
> They disagreed on the propriety of the action of the board of transport commissioners in basing an increase in freight rates on an anticipated wage increase which had not been unconditionally agreed upon by the railways and their employees; the provinces asked that the order made by the board be disallowed on this ground.
> [The Chairman.]
> We consider that, in future, the railways and their employees must come to a definite agreement before a wage increase should be accepted by the board of transport commissioners as the basis for an increase in freight rates, otherwise the board, as it foresaw itself, is apt to be forced into making judgments about wage settlements which are not its proper responsibility. In the present case we are not allowing the appeal on this ground because to do so at this stage would precipitate a nation wide strike over an increase in wages as recommended by a conciliation board which increase neither the railways nor the provinces have resisted or will resist.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I draw the following words of the Acting Prime Minister to this committee:

> The suggestion was made that these wage increases should be paid from the federal treasury. We do not intend to embark upon a policy of subsidizing wage increases; there would be no end to demands on all governments if such a policy were adopted.

What is this bill we are dealing with now, and what was the freight rate reduction bill of 1959-60, if not a subsidy?

Mr. Balcer: This is not a subsidy in respect of wages.

Mr. Chevrier: How do the words of the Acting Prime Minister compare with the legislation which is now before this committee and which was also then before the house? The statement continues as follows:

> It is however recognized by the government that there are serious inequities in the present freight rate structure which have both contributed to, and been aggravated by, the system of horizontal rate increases. The government has already indicated its intention to move toward a solution of these problems.

It was only after that, namely May 13, 1959 —quite some time after—that the order in council establishing the royal commission on transportation was set up.

I should like to make two points clear in respect of that statement made by the Acting Prime Minister. The first point is, that exactly what he said the government should not do is being done in this legislation. The second point is—

Mr. Balcer: This has nothing to do with wages.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not talking about wages now, I am talking about subsidies.

Mr. Balcer: You said before it was a wage subsidy, but it is not a wage subsidy.

Mr. Pickersgill: When is a subsidy not a subsidy?

Mr. Chevrier: I did not say that at all. I quoted the words of the Acting Prime Minister, who said that.

An hon. Member: You are all mixed up.

Mr. Chevrier: Some hon. member on the other side suggests I am all mixed up, but I would suggest that the government has never been in such a chaotic state so far as freight rates are concerned as it is at the moment.

The Acting Prime Minister complained about the injustice and inequities in respect of horizontal rate increases. That statement was made three and a half to four years ago, and what has been done to do away with the inequities of horizontal freight rate increase? I suggest they have been worsened, first of all by the 17 per cent increase in freight rates, and then worsened again in connection with the extended 8 per cent change in respect of subsidies under the Freight Rates Reduction Act in 1959-60 and now again under this measure. So that the position, in so far as inequities of horizontal increases in freight rates are concerned, is much worse now in 1961 than it was when the Acting Prime Minister made his statement. There is no doubt that in respect of this act, as well as in respect of the whole field of freight rates, the government has certainly made a complete mess of it.

There are one or two other matters which I feel I should direct to the attention of the committee. The order in council setting up the commission, P.C. 1959-577 dated May 13, 1959 had, amongst others, the two following objectives to consider:

(a) Inequities in the freight rates structure, their incidence upon the various regions of Canada and the legislative and other changes that can and should be made, in furtherance of national economic policy, to remove or alleviate such inequities;

(b) The obligations and limitations imposed upon railways by law for reasons of public policy, and what can and should be done to ensure a more equitable distribution of any burden which may be found to result therefrom.

The first objective of the royal commission on transportation was to remove the inequities in the freight rate structure. Has anything been done in this respect? I ask the minister to indicate whether the government, since it came into office in 1957, has done anything to remove the inequities of the freight rate structure.

Mr. Balcer: That is precisely why we set up the royal commission, to investigate this whole matter.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not what the Prime Minister said. I placed his words on record the other day and I will do so again. When we were discussing the continuation of the work of the railway employees in November of last year the Prime Minister indicated quite clearly one of the reasons the royal commission was established. At page 359 of Hansard for November 30, 1960 the Prime Minister had the following to say:

The reason we say we are waiting for the report of the royal commission is this. It will make its report as to the means whereby these discriminatory rates may be avoided.

Has it done that? I asked the question a moment ago. That is the reason this is being done. Well, the Prime Minister said:

It will make its report as to the means whereby these discriminatory rates may be avoided. Legislation will then be introduced in order to equalize opportunity across Canada. The freeze will then be taken off and the railway companies may then make an application to the board of transport commissioners to raise the freight rates and to take into consideration the agreements now in existence between the employers and the unions back to January 1, 1960.

Four things were set out by the Prime Minister. Not one of them has been accomplished. First, the inequities would be removed by the report of the royal commission. Next, freight rates would be equalized across the country. Third, the freeze would be lifted; and fourth, the railways could apply for increased freight rates.

Mr. Balcer: We will still have that.

Mr. Chevrier: That was all to take place before May 15.

Mr. Pearson: That is so.

Mr. Chevrier: The position is quite clear. There is no doubt in the minds of those who have given this matter any study what was in the mind of the Prime Minister. He made it quite clear, as indicated in the words I have quoted. There is no doubt that the Prime Minister expected and anticipated a report by the royal commission at that time. There is no doubt he thought that a formula, as he said, would be found whereby the strike might be averted, but instead of that—

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): It was averted; the dispute was settled.

Mr. Chevrier: Of course it was. And from the commission has come a four-pronged recommendation involving subsidies to the extent of $100 million. It is a recommendation for subsidies notwithstanding that the Minister of Labour said that he was against subsidization in this respect.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): For wages.

Mr. Starr: May I interject a word here, so there will be no misunderstanding. I made a statement in respect of subsidization of wages. There is no recommendation in the royal commission report at all with respect to wages.

Mr. Pearson: It's to give them the money for something else.

Mr. Chevrier: So there will be no misunderstanding about what the Minister of Labour said, I quote from his statement in Hansard of November 30, 1960, at page 347:

> Some of those who have suggested implementation of the majority report have also suggested subsidies to the railways. The Prime Minister has clearly expressed the basic weakness of such action. Once such a course was embarked upon this might again provide an undesirable precedent. The dangers inherent in such a solution must surely be obvious. Such a course might well be an easy way out, but in time it would be the hard way of settling such a dispute.
> In the case of the Canadian National Railways the taxpayers of this country are already being called upon to make up huge deficits. To require the Canadian taxpayer to subsidize the operating costs of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would be setting a most dangerous and costly precedent.

Did the Minister of Labour make this statement?

Mr. Starr: Yes, I made it in respect of any wage settlement.

Mr. Chevrier: I have the admission from the Minister of Labour that he made this statement. The threatened strike has been settled. The presidents of both railways have clearly indicated that they have to get the money to pay the increased wages. Where is the money to come from? I have repeatedly asked this question. The government ought to be in a position to tell us. Of course it must come in some form or other, unless the deficit of the Canadian National Railways is to be increased by its proportion of the $40 million required to pay this increase in wages. Therefore the subsidization policy which was being condemned by the Acting Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in November, 1958, the subsidization policy which is condemned by the Prime Minister, the subsidization policy which is condemned by the Minister of Labour—

Mr. Starr: In respect of wages.

Mr. Chevrier: All right, I will add that—in respect of wages, must of necessity be considered at the present time by the government. I ask again—

Mr. Pickersgill: It has been promised to the railways.

Mr. Chevrier: I ask again, as I have asked before, how is this going to be implemented? How is one of the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation going to be implemented? Is it going to be implemented by way of legislation? If it is, the minister had better hurry up, because after all parliament is entitled to an intelligent discussion of this whole matter, and if it is the intention of the government to bring this session to a close at the end of June or early in July it will not be possible to do this.

The other alternative is for the government to bring in a subsidy to cover this increase in wages. Will the government do this? I think the committee and the country are entitled to know how this matter is to be dealt with, and thus far we have had no indication.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister want to ask me a question?

Mr. Balcer: I should like to ask a question.

Mr. Chevrier: Fine; I will yield.

Mr. Balcer: Is there anything in the first volume of the MacPherson report recommending subsidies of $100 million which says that if the government pays such a subsidy it will be paid to meet the wage bills of the two railways? Can the hon. member point to any page of the MacPherson report which says that?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I cannot. It is not recommended. I will admit at once there is no recommendation along that line in the MacPherson report, and I think it was excluded from the report; but will the minister answer this question? If it is not to be found in the $100 million or so recommended by the royal commission on transportation, where is it to be found?

Mr. Balcer: The intention of the MacPherson report as stated by the commission is to create an atmosphere and put the railways in a position where they will be able to meet their various obligations and also expand and develop as they should. If the government implements any of the recommendations of the MacPherson report, or if the government introduces legislation based on parts of the MacPherson report, it will be with that thought in mind and it will not be, as the hon. member for Laurier says, a subsidy to meet the last wage increase.

Mr. Chevrier: What the minister says simply confirms the argument that I am attempting to develop. A moment ago he said the government must have a breathing space in which to think this whole matter over, but that breathing space is certainly going to last more than a couple of months. Then, I ask, meanwhile where is the money going to come from if not by way of another $1 item or another subsidy item in the supplementary estimates at the end of the session to meet this particular problem? This is a matter which the government cannot get away from. It is a matter on which parliament is entitled to have some information. It is a matter on which absolutely no light has been thrown either by the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Transport or the Prime Minister himself. On the contrary, the statements they have made indicate quite clearly that there is going to be no policy of subsidization, although the measure now before us is subsidization for wages.

Mr. Balcer: Subsidies for the shippers.

Mr. Pearson: How are you going to get the money for the wages?

Mr. Pickersgill: This is subsidization for wages.

Mr. Chevrier: I am worried about parliament. I think parliament is entitled to know. I think parliament should not be kept in the dark. I think the government should tell us, as the Prime Minister told us on November 30 what would be done; that legislation would be introduced to implement the recommendations of the royal commission, that the freight rate freeze would be lifted, and that the unions would be able to bargain with their employers, in accordance with the agreements. That is what he said. None of that is being done. It would have been much better if he had not said anything in that particular respect.

Then when he spoke on television the other night he said that the government was responsible for the settling of the strike. I do not know what the government did to settle the strike. It certainly did not take an active part in the settlement. In answer to a question which was put to him earlier, before the strike was settled, the Prime Minister made it quite clear that he had invited the parties to get together, and his reply was that the government had not been successful at that time in getting them together. That is what I am complaining about, if my hon. friend wants to know.

Before this debate is concluded I think we should get a clear indication from the minister and the government of what is going to happen. So far as the retroactive date of this legislation is concerned, I think any comment I have to make in that respect will have to await the bill. I believe it is advisable, as has been recommended, that this matter be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines so that the trucking industry and the provinces, if they feel so disposed, can make recommendations in this respect.

I want to point particularly to two things. The first is the chaotic situation in which the transportation situation now is because of the indecision and hesitation of the government. The second is the fact that the government did not realize that this particular act was coming to an end on April 30 of this year and took no steps to introduce this legislation until the dying days of the month of April, contrary to what was done on previous occasions when notice was given to shippers, the railways, the board of transport commissioners and the country as to what they could expect. After all, it is the board of transport commissioners that fixes the rates by order, and the board cannot make rates retroactive. As the Leader of the Opposition points out to me, it is contrary to the pledge on the part of the government. So I say that the government has failed on these two counts.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, we support this resolution as we have on the two previous occasions when similar resolutions have been before us. We will vote for it, but this does not mean that our approval is not conditioned by the view that it is a palliative and an expedient on a very short range basis. I should like to emphasize the criticisms that have just been made which it seems to me are to this effect, that this is another example of the procrastination, posturing and indefiniteness of the government with respect to its policy in the field of transportation.

The hon. member for Laurier is sceptical about the past record of the government in relation to the railways. He pointed out that before the election in March, 1958, the government put a freeze on freight rates. As the hon. member for Assiniboia has said on former occasions, this was a brave act. But once the election was over and the railways came back with a further application the freeze disappeared and we had this subsidy. I think hon. members should be aware that the subsidy is extended to the Canadian National Railways, a publicly owned organization, and to the Canadian Pacific Railway, a private organization.

The whole idea of the subsidy was conceived in those dark months in the fall of 1958 when, according to rumours, the present Minister of Veterans Affairs led a revolt in the cabinet against the whole idea of freight rate increases. There have been press reports as to what occurred. As I remember, the Prime Minister was out of the country and the then minister of public works was in charge. There was quite a little battle over the matter, and this legislation was the solution.

Apparently $20 million was all that the western members of the cabinet were able to pry out of the Minister of Finance. It was recognized by all members who followed the legislation that the subsidy was not adequate to meet the increase and was only a partial or half-way measure. The hon. member for Laurier has indicated by quotations from what the Prime Minister has said in the past that there have been many inconsistencies in his arguments. I hate to read from old records, but there is one paragraph in the announcement made by the former minister of transport when he first introduced this legislation which I think underlines the point made by the hon. member for Laurier. As found on page 2208 of Hansard of March 24, 1959 he said:

> As hon. members know, the government has indicated its intention of proceeding with a comprehensive inquiry into matters affecting the railways. The proposed legislation therefore limits the assistance to a 12-month period, when it is hoped a report will be available to the government.

I point out that this was over two years ago. This is the capacity of foresight that the government seems to have. Over two years ago the minister predicted a report in about a year's time, and the report actually appeared another year later. In other words, it took two years instead of one and we now have only part of the report. At that time the minister went on to say:

> Consideration will then be given—

That is, when the report is available.

> —to means of further relieving the unfair discriminatory burden of the freight rates structure.

We do not know what the steps are going to be but it is quite apparent that we are not going to get this legislation this session unless we work all through the summer and have a fall session. I have indicated previously that I feel we are on the eve of a general election. It seems to me that this kind of part-way measure is just a means of clearing the way for a general election without really revealing the government's policy. I should like the minister to tell us whether they feel it is possible for them to go ahead on the freight rates matter with only one volume of the MacPherson commission report. If it is not, when do they feel they can act to rationalize or equalize the whole freight rates question? One cannot help but be cynical or sceptical of their record in view of the way they have diddled and dawdled along with the transportation question.

The matter of the strike that was averted by the settlement between the railways and the unions a few weeks ago is another very good indicator of how the government has procrastinated with regard to the transportation problem. We were glad to see a settlement, but we are left with unanswered questions which it seems to me will be still floating around during a general election.

From the reaction of railway employees I know that the heat is off now and their sensitivity is sinking. It is much less keen that it was a month ago and, politically speaking, this is an ideal situation for the government in relation to an election.

However, the settlement does not really answer the problem that other speakers have brought up; where is the money coming from for the raise? It is not going to come from this legislation, because this is just a partial palliative; and since the railways have only signed a two year contract with the unions and since the contract runs out at the end of this year, we are going to be involved next year again in the same dreary round of conciliation boards, high cost reports and analyses and frustration on the part of everyone in relation to the railway problem.

I could point out to the minister, for example, that the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific got together and approached the Woods Gordon Company. This company turned out a rather extensive report, which I have read, which would supply the railways with a standard approach to entering into wage negotiations. The minister knows, if he has read the Milvain report, Judge Milvain really threw that extensive report right out the window. I hear now through the grapevine that the railways are right back with Woods Gordon again. They have assigned this organization to do another study in the same field. This is an example of the continual frustration and expense that is involved when you do not have a clear transportation pattern or picture presented to you by the government.

The general satisfaction that is felt in most parts of the country over the fact the royal commission report is now available must be tempered by the fact we have had no real indication from the government as to its response to these recommendations. The response of the country as a whole has been generally favourable, except perhaps in western Canada where there are still some very vivid criticisms of the recommendations in relation to the grain rates. Here again, as every member from the west knows, the Crowsnest pass rate is a fundamental political issue in western Canada. This is a bread and butter issue, and it seems to me that the government has moved itself into a situation where it has not answered the question of what is involved in the report on the Crowsnest pass rates. The government has not indicated what it is going to do about this recommendation. Consequently, the whole election in western Canada is going to be fought in a bit of a vacuum or will be surrounded by mystery.

I saw an excellent editorial in the Manitoba Co-Operator for April 29 of this year dealing with the transportation commission. The editorial stresses that the western farmer must take a new look at the recommendations, not only in relation to the subsidy for grain rates but also the matter of passenger service abandonment and branch line abandonment. The Co-Operator stressed the dissenting report of Mr. Gobeil and said it made very good sense to them. He raised a fundamental question about the Crowsnest pass rates which should be answered. The keynote here which I bring to the attention of the minister is that in western Canada the royal commission report has not removed the suspicions with which the people look at the Canadian Pacific Railway. I hope the minister has noted what the commissioners say about the Canadian Pacific Railway's case in connection with the grain issue. Certainly, the Canadian Pacific did not prove that they suffered a tremendous loss through the carriage of grain. I am sure western Canadian members will have some views to express on this question. I am not asking on their behalf but on behalf of this group for a statement from the minister regarding the government's position in so far as the commission's recommendations with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway are concerned.

There is one question that I think troubles many members and has been troubling them for a long time. The Canadian Pacific Railway pension situation is not nearly as attractive or decent in relation to former employees as is that of the Canadian National Railways. On a previous occasion the Prime Minister indicated that our committee on railways was going to go into this whole pension matter. I imagine all members have received representations from the various organizations representing borth former Canadian National and Canadian Pacific employees. You might ask, Mr. Chairman, what relevance this has to this measure. Previously, we have had a very wide ranging debate on such measures, and I should like to suggest it is time we asked the government what it intends to do to bring the Canadian Pacific into line on this pension issue. It is worth while to ask this question because this measure we are discussing relates to a subsidy not only for the shippers but also for the Canadian Pacific Railway.

There is one other factor with which I wish the minister to deal at this time. The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort has a bill on the order paper for the purpose of bringing rapeseed within the meaning of the term "grain", in order that it can gain the advantage of certain rates. Since I have been a member of the house, this issue has been brought up every year by the representatives from that particular region. It seems to me that this is another part of the transportation picture to which we should have an answer at this stage. Why is it the government does not feel it can give this particular product the benefits of the subsidies that are now in existence in so far as freight rates are concerned? The debate on this measure, Mr. Chairman, will probably be a relatively short one. I ask the minister if, before it concludes, he could not give us some kind of projected schedule as to when we will get legislation that represents conclusions drawn from this MacPherson report. I should like him to be as frank and as candid as he possibly can because the whole matter of the wage increases that will be sought fairly soon, we can be sure, by the railway unions—perhaps toward the end of this year—will result again in a climate of dissent and disagreement, and a feeling of uneasiness will again be abroad in the country. This may be done after a general election has taken place, but it seems to me that an honest government would do its best to lay its cards on the table before we have an election.

Mr. Henderson: Would you say this was not an honest government?

Mr. Fisher: I did not say that at all. I just said that I thought an honest government would lay its cards on the table before it went to the people on an issue as big as this which affects as much of the country as this does. We have been very much disturbed by this whole freight rate question. The region I represent, the bridge region, has been up in the air. This region made very strong representations to the MacPherson commission. We know that the prairie provinces spent thousands and thousands of dollars for counsel and presentations to the commission. British Columbia is vitally involved. Their member of this commission entered a dissenting report. We feel that in this kind of situation the honest government is the government that puts its cards on the table so that we know what it plans to do and when it plans to do it.

One aspect of this question was brought up by the hon. member for Laurier. He asked where the money is coming from to pay the wage increases. Is there going to be a later subsidy? As I indicated, this measure is only a palliative.

In reply to the hon. member for Cariboo, I would say that I would not go around labeling any government either honest or dishonest except in a specific situation. Surely, this is a specific situation that calls for honesty. All I can point out is that the transport minister, when he first introduced this legislation, was mistaken in his estimate as to how long it was going to take and what was going to flow from the government's policy. I think if the hon. member checks Hansard he will find this government said it expected to be able to act in one year. Instead, we have had one postponement and then another postponement. Here we are, over two years later, and we still are not in a position to know the policy or direction in which we are going. This is not an accusation of dishonesty, it is an accusation of procrastination and indecisiveness, of not being able to really plan the legislative future. I do not see how the hon. member could disagree with this analysis, even if he does support the government. If he wants to make the kind of contribution he can make perhaps more effectively in the caucus than here, I suggest that he along with other members keep pressing in caucus for the transportation policy of this government. I refer to the policy that it hopes to take to the people and not this short range palliative.

Mr. Granger: I should like to say a few words while this resolution is being debated. Freight rates have an important bearing upon the cost of living and the conduct of business in Newfoundland and, in fact, in all the Atlantic provinces. We are a considerable distance away from the industrial centre of Canada. As I have pointed out previously, we in Newfoundland import practically everything we use, everything we wear and most of what we eat. Freight rates are therefore of vital importance to those of us who live in Newfoundland and in the Atlantic provinces; and any statements made with regard to freight rates or any legislation passed in relation thereto must command our intense interest. Our economy depends, to perhaps a greater extent than that of any other part of Canada, on the cost of moving goods.

I should like to call attention to an advertisement which must have been very appealing at the time it appeared because of the interest taken in this matter by the part of Canada from which I come. I refer to an advertisement which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of June 8, 1957. The advertisement was appropriately edged in black and blue and it urged maritimers to vote Progressive Conservative. It contained this pledge:

> We are committed to the original pledge given to our people at the time of confederation that freight rates would be adjusted and transportation facilities would be provided so that our geographic position would not prejudice our producers in having reasonable access to the markets of Canada.

That was a noble sentiment and it no doubt affected advantageously the political fortunes of some hon. members. But what in fact happened? What happened was this, if I may make a brief résumé of subsequent events. The board of transport commissioners allowed or approved an increase of 17 per cent. In 1959, parliament cut this figure down to 10 per cent and later, in the next year, cut it to 8 per cent, paying the difference between that figure and 17 per cent. I suppose the idea now, if my understanding of it is correct, is that parliament will approve the payment of the difference to the railways so that they will still get 17 per cent in order to meet their wage bills.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Be that as it may, the cost of transportation is still up and it bears very heavily on a section of Canada which is least able to pay high costs. By virtue of our geographic position on the eastern seaboard there is a longer haul to get vital supplies in, the goods manufactured in central Canada, the things that are used in normal daily existence, as I mentioned previously, such as food, clothing and so on. These things have to be brought in to Newfoundland from various parts of Canada. They have to be loaded at the port of North Sydney, unloaded at Port aux Basques and loaded on railway cars or perhaps loaded on ships for various ports and unloaded again. Any way you look at it, the cost of transportation is bound to be high unless effect is given to this principle which appears in the advertisement I mentioned and which reads:

> —freight rates would be adjusted and transportation facilities would be provided so that our geographic position would not prejudice our producers—

And so on. It would appear from the record that this has not been done and that the Atlantic provinces still suffer from freight rates which are too high and which bear unequally on a part of Canada which provides an important market for the rest of Canada.

Mr. Phillips: How did that situation occur?

Mr. Granger: I beg the hon. member's pardon? How did what situation occur?

Mr. Phillips: How did discrimination in freight rates occur?

Mr. Granger: All I have to say in answer to that question is this. The discrimination has not been removed in accordance with the pledge of the party of the hon. member; and the fact is that a part of Canada which is important economically to the rest of Canada has its own purchasing power reduced and its economic expansion curtailed because of a freight rate scale which is too high. I would ask the minister to keep this matter in mind and to remember that there is real advantage in a policy such as this, to quote again from the pledge:

—that freight rates would be adjusted and transportation facilities would be provided so that our geographic position would not prejudice our producers in having reasonable access to the markets of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: I do not wish to prolong this discussion as there will be an opportunity to speak again when the bill founded on this resolution is introduced. At that time we shall be able to make our position known with regard to the details of the legislation which is now contemplated. However, in view of the minister's introduction of this resolution and the importance of the principle involved in it, I wish to say something at this time.

In the first place I should like to reiterate and emphasize what my friend the hon. member for Laurier said a few moments ago, namely that when the Prime Minister and the present government took office in 1957 they were pledged to the elimination of horizontal freight rate increases. There can be no doubt about that pledge. At that time the Prime Minister made it perfectly clear that he would stop all these inequitable freight rate increases and would bring in an alternative policy which would be far more effective in dealing with the problem than the device of horizontal increases.

We soon learned what this pledge meant. The threat of the strike in 1958 made that matter perfectly clear; the fact that there would be no such long range policy introduced. On November 27, 1958, the government provided for a horizontal increase of 17 per cent with a view no doubt to preventing the strike. Our position as a party at that time was made perfectly clear in a statement then released and I do not wish to repeat it now. It may be necessary to put it on the record later. This increase was compensated, in part, by legislation reaffirming and introducing again the principle of subsidies, which brought down the impact of the increase by, I think it was 9 per cent. But it left the principle itself intact.

That legislation has been renewed. We are now being asked to renew it again. As my hon. friend from Port Arthur pointed out, this is itself proof that the government in the years since has had no long range policy to put before the house in respect of this important matter.

Of course, the minister will say, "Oh, well, we set up a royal commission to deal with this matter", and the recommendations of this royal commission will no doubt in due course be implemented. I think we were told in the house the other day that it is the intention of the government to implement them in part—at least in part.

However, it is quite clear that whatever may be the intentions of the government with regard to the recommendations of this particular royal commission, those intentions cannot be carried out to deal with the present situation in which the railways now find themselves, having a few days ago accepted the recommendations of the conciliation board in regard to wage increases.

We have been asking the minister how the railways are going to meet this new obligation which they told us through the government last November and December they could not possibly meet, that they were not in a position to meet. The minister says, "Oh, these recommendations will in due course put the railways on their feet. They will make possible improvements in railway management. Operations will be more economical and they will be able to get out of some uneconomic activities. As a result of this they will be in a better position to raise wages to the level which is demanded".

But this is not going to help the railways meet this particular demand which they have accepted. As a result of their acceptance a strike was prevented in May on exactly the same basis as we suggested last November it should be prevented. Therefore we ask the minister, when he winds up this discussion, to tell us how the railways are going to do now, in respect of this matter, something they found it quite impossible to do last December.

Last November and December when this matter was being debated, spokesmen for the government, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour, made it quite clear that the attitude would be that taken by the Acting Prime Minister, in 1958 I think it was; that subsidies would not be resorted to as a way out of these difficulties. This was still going to be the decision of the government—no subsidies. We need not put anything more on the record on that score.

The minister now says, "Subsidies specifically tied in to wage increases are one thing, but subsidies for something else as recommended in a royal commission report are different". But a subsidy used by the railway for one purpose can help that same railway in some other respect; in connection with wage increases or anything else, because it is quite clear that if you help the railway in one direction you will help it in another.

The government's position is that the railways should not be assisted through subsidy but that wage increases—and I want to be fair to the minister in this—should be made possible, when desirable, by the removal of discriminatory freight rates. That was the position taken, we know, by the government in November and December. But having taken that position, the Prime Minister said this would be done through the royal commission in time to be effective before the strike deadline of May 15. There can be no doubt about that, and there is no use of the minister or anybody else trying to tell the committee that what the Prime Minister had in mind was that ultimately these things would be corrected, discriminations would be removed and everything would be all right in the future.

I say this because the Prime Minister's words are so clear that there can be no reason for any misunderstanding. I am going to read them. At page 359 of Hansard of November 30, 1960, the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

> The reason we say we are waiting for the report of the royal commission is this. It will make its report as to the means whereby these discriminatory rates may be avoided. Legislation will then be introduced in order to equalize opportunity across Canada.

All this would be done to avoid a railway strike. Then the Prime Minister went on:

> The companies may then make an application to the board of transport commissioners to raise the freight rates and to take into consideration the agreements now in existence between the employers and the unions back to January 1, 1960.

If that were not clear enough, the Prime Minister repeated it on December 1 at page 370 of Hansard. This time he put the date in at which these things would be done, he said, "By next May 15—". Not May 15, 1962, 1963 or whenever the royal commission will have completed all its work, but he said:

> By next May 15, without the sacrifice of anything except a postponement, every railway employee will be in a position through his bargaining agent to come to an agreement with the railway company. The railway company will be able to apply to the board of transport commissioners. The freeze will be lifted and the Canadian people, in the normal run of events, will then have to pay extra freight rates in order to meet the increased wage levels, just as they have to pay to meet all other types and varieties of expenditure.

So I ask the minister, when he replies, to tell us whether this is the situation now? Of course it is not; it has not been so. The strike was prevented, but not on the basis stated by the Prime Minister in those two excerpts from Hansard which I have just read. There can be no doubt about that.

Something else has happened. A great mystery has developed as to how this was done, and perhaps the minister will enlighten us in due course as to that mystery and what has been done to make it possible for the railways to do in May what they said they could not do in December. Perhaps the government is going to put a $1 item in the supplementary estimates which will make it easier.

There is something else which certainly should be brought to the attention of this committee. I regret doing this while the Prime Minister is not here, because it is a report in the press which refers directly to a statement made by the Prime Minister. However, it is a statement to which a good deal of attention has been given and which has not been corrected, so far as I know.

It deals with the resolution which was put on the order paper—the resolution which we are now discussing—and more particularly in regard to the retroactivity of the legislation which was required because of the carelessness of the government in not bringing in this legislation before April 30.

There is a Canadian Press story about this dated April 25 and I quote from it:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker said Friday—

This was not in the house, but outside, I believe:

> —legislation to extend the $20 million a year rollback subsidy on freight rates will be made retroactive to May 1 when it is passed by parliament.

It is obvious that this has to be done because it was not brought in when it should have been. Then the story goes on:

> Present legislation authorizing the subsidy, under which the federal treasury has put up $35 million in the last 21 months to counteract a 17 per cent freight rate increase granted in 1958, expires Sunday night.

That is the $35 million to take the place of this long range policy that the Prime Minister was going to introduce in 1957. Then the story goes on, and this is the important and astonishing part of it. It is almost impossible to believe that this is accurate. Here it is, however:

> Mr. Diefenbaker was asked whether it would be necessary for parliament to act on the extension today in order to assure there is no lapse.
> He said the government notice given the commons earlier this week would act in the same way as a budget proposal which becomes effective when it is announced, subject to later parliamentary approval.

I should be glad to hear the minister answer that statement which is attributed to the Prime Minister and not changed or corrected since that time; which lays down the incredible doctrine that legislation of this kind, which is to be made retroactive, because it is the same as a budget resolution, becomes automatically retroactive, when it is passed, to the date the resolution was put on the order paper. This is something entirely new to constitutional law and parliamentary practice. To give the impression, through a story of that kind in the Canadian press, that whether we bring this legislation in after April 30 or not, when the legislation is passed it becomes retroactive in the same form as a budget resolution, to the date of its introduction, is, to use the politest words I can find, misleading to anyone who reads the story. I would be very glad indeed to have the minister deal with this particular aspect of this particular resolution.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, when the resolution is passed and the legislation is before the house, we will all have an opportunity to give it the kind of examination it deserves. Meanwhile, we have the right and duty at this time to express our disappointment, in and condemnation of, the government for, in May, 1961, introducing legislation to carry on for another year, or whatever term it may be, a policy which the government itself said in 1957 was wrong and would be changed if it were given the opportunity to make the change.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak very briefly in respect of this legislation, and I take this opportunity of doing so because this resolution provides for the continuance of subsidies.

I rise now to speak very briefly in respect of two matters which are of importance to many individuals in British Columbia; first, having regard to the injustice suffered by certain pensioners of the Canadian Pacific Railway who were retired prior to January 1, 1953. This matter has been brought before the house repeatedly by members of this group, as well as other members of the house, and the situation has been fully explained. I do not at this time intend to take up the time of the committee by going into detail. Suffice it to say that regardless of the concern of members of this house, and representations made in this house, as well as the indication on different occasions that the minister would look into the matter, to date no action has been taken to remedy this situation.

During the debate regarding the postponement of the strike which threatened to occur on September 1, 1960, this matter was again brought to the attention of the Prime Minister who promised at that time that a special committee would be set up to deal with this question and to hear directly from the workers concerned in an attempt to find a solution to the problem. So far as I know there has been no action taken to date in respect of that promise.

The hon. member for Port Arthur raised this question on that occasion in his usual eloquent, inspiring and informative manner, but I should like to take the opportunity again of raising this point, because it is a matter of great concern, and because we are dealing with the question of subsidies to railways, paid for by the people of Canada through the government of Canada which has a responsibility to take action to correct this injustice which the pensioners have suffered. I trust that the minister will inform the committee whether any consideration has been given to the problem that is of concern to the workers involved so that they may appear personally, or by representation, before a special committee to explain the circumstances of their problem.

Having made those few remarks regarding this matter, I should now like to raise, as I have done on a number of other occasions, the question of equalizing freight rates. I am prompted to do so by a letter dated April 24, 1961 I received from a Mr. C. W. Brazier, who was counsel to the province of British Columbia in respect of freight rates matters. I should like to quote portions of this letter. Mr. Brazier writes as follows:

> Re: Royal Commission on Transportation.
> In line with the policy of keeping the members of parliament from British Columbia informed as to the position of the provincial government on transportation matters, I would like to comment briefly on volume 1 of the report of the royal commission on transportation which was released on April 10, 1961.

I presume that this committee will give some consideration to this report at a later time. Mr. Brazier goes on to say:

> First of all I must state that the provincial government is gratified at the over-all approach of the report to the railway problem. I believe the commission has placed the problem in its proper context—"the unequal impact of competition across the nation," the inequities arising therefrom, "the inability of the railways to adjust to competition because of the yoke of organization, plant and service suited to another age," all aggravated by burdens imposed by public policy and the reluctance of railway management to accept new concepts demanded by new conditions.

I think that is a very fair and reasonable observation with respect to volume 1 of the royal commission's report. The letter goes on as follows:

> It is my opinion that the analyses of the issues made by the commission are fundamentally sound—

Perhaps I should point out that I know Mr. Brazier very well, indeed. As a matter of fact, he was a partner of mine in business, and I say that in rather a subdued voice. He writes as follows:

> It is my opinion that the analyses of the issues made by the commission are fundamentally sound and that the measures proposed to overcome the problems are timely, constructed and geared to present and future needs of the railways and the nation.

I am very glad to see that Mr. Brazier takes that point of view after making a study of the report, with a great deal of experience in freight rates questions, and as representative of the government of British Columbia for a number of years.

He then goes on to say:

> It is gratifying to note that the basic position of the province of British Columbia advanced in two briefs—

I have a copy here. Then he goes on as follows:

—and the final argument (of which all members of the House of Commons have copies) has been sustained in the report of the commission.

I am very pleased to see that the royal commission has paid attention to the representations and the representatives of the government of British Columbia in respect of this question. Mr. Brazier goes on in his letter to say:

Without detracting in any way from the importance of volume 1 of the report, I would like to raise one or two points of concern. It is not clear what position the commission has taken with respect to the $20 million "rollback" subsidy provided for by the Freight Rates Reduction Act, except to indicate that the removal of certain public obligations will relieve the exposed shipper from some pressure for increases in rates.

I presume that the minister will, in his reply, deal with the query contained in that paragraph in respect of the $20 million rollback. The letter then goes on:

While I am of the opinion that subsidies of a general nature such as provided for by the Freight Rates Reduction Act should be made available to all modes of transportation, the legislation itself was a clear cut recognition of the plight of the "captive" railway shipper. It is quite natural that the fate of the "rollback" subsidy which is due to expire on April 30 is of great concern to the province of British Columbia. It is my opinion that this subsidy should be continued until alternative legislation is passed to serve the same function.

I should suggest also that this is of particular importance to the lumber industry of British Columbia and, on that account, we are very glad to see this legislation. Mr. Brazier then goes on to say:

Another problem of great interest to British Columbia and the Peace river district of Alberta is the application of subsidies to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway. Shippers on the P.G.E. have not shared directly in the Freight Rates Reduction Act and have thus been discriminated against in so far as normally rated traffic is concerned. Any reduction in rate due to competition with other railways has been absorbed by the P.G.E.

I should like the minister to comment in regard to that statement made by Mr. Brazier when the minister is concluding the debate on this resolution. Mr. Brazier then goes on to say:

It is important for me to point out that while the P.G.E. has no branch line problem it still has to maintain a passenger service and to move export grain at the low export rates. As the national railway plant is rationalized in line with the recommendations of the commission more grain will be shipped on the P.G.E. from Alberta as this will be the cheapest and shortest haul. I feel that this is a problem which deserves your close attention.

I should like the minister to comment on the points made in this letter when he concludes this debate.

[Mr. Herridge.]

I have one other matter to bring to the attention of the committee, Mr. Chairman, and on which to express my opinion. I refer to the responsibility of the railways so far as the general public is concerned. What I have in mind is the reduction of passenger service on the Kettle valley railway by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to which reduction people in my constituency and in east Kootenay as well object very much. I cannot see why those people are denied this opportunity. They are not asking for very much. They are simply asking for daily service with the present Budd car plus a combination cafe and sleeping car so that persons who wish to take a berth or a bedroom when going to the coast or returning would have that opportunity and an opportunity to sleep in a decent and civilized manner.

I cannot see why the railroad divorces its freight earnings from its passenger earnings. That section of the railroad is very profitable to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and yet they insist on this reduction of passenger service on the excuse that it does not pay. Perhaps the passenger service does not pay but the freight service certainly does and the people of my constituency, including chambers of commerce, trade unions, farm organizations and other people believe that the earnings of the railway, both freight and passenger, should be considered in the interests of the communities. In addition to that, the most profitable investment the Canadian Pacific Railway Company ever made, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, is in this area. This is where it makes a considerable portion of its profits and yet the railroad insists on divorcing its railroad activities from its other activities. We are of the opinion they should all be considered together. Whatever the opinion may be in that respect, the people I represent, and I am speaking very largely for the population, believe that, in view of the freight earnings in the district, in view of the interest of the Canadian Pacific in the district, there should be at least a daily service from Vancouver to Lethbridge over the Kettle valley and a combination cafe and sleeping car attached to the present Budd car. This is not asking very much when one considers the wealth that is produced in that area and the profits that go to the Canadian Pacific as a result of industrial activity in that area.

In the present circumstances we believe that the company is not accepting its responsibilities to the area concerned. In view of the fact that this government under this legislation and other legislation, and indirectly the people of Canada, are subsidizing this and other operations of this company, we do urge that the government do everything possible to see that this situation is remedied.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising to participate in this debate is to try to strike a blow for northwestern Ontario in its fight against freight rate discrimination. I cannot help but sound a note of disappointment at the government's failure to introduce this legislation sooner. We are led to believe that we are now on the last lap of this session, and if we are to end it around the end of June, then not much time remains to give proper consideration to matters of such great importance as our railways and freight rates.

The level of the freight rate structure brought about by the successive increases implemented during the post-war years has commanded increasing attention during the past year. The Freight Rates Reduction Act provided for a subsidy not exceeding $20 million for one year only, to reduce the burden of the 17 per cent increase in freight rates which the board authorized to become effective on December 1, 1958. On July 10, 1959, the board issued a further order substituting an increase of 10 per cent for the 17 per cent and directed that the adjusted rates be not increased for one year unless otherwise permitted by the board. At the time the legislation was passed the Prime Minister announced the appointment of a royal commission on transportation and the Minister of Transport stated that the government would not permit any further general increase in freight rates for an indefinite period, ostensibly pending the report of the royal commission.

I would imagine that the royal commission on transportation report of 92 pages has been and is being scrutinized by the government. It is an important report and one which requires many hours of close study because the recommendations contained therein are of such a nature that they could easily affect every facet of our economy. The report comprises 92 pages of technical data, and it includes also a minority report, mostly concerned with details of the Crowsnest rates on exports of grain. These Crowsnest rates are one of the biggest items within which a substantial area of disagreement may be found.

I am not at all sure that the continuation of these abnormally low rates, in the light of present day costs which are conservatively 10 times higher than they were when these rates were set, are justified. However, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to develop an argument against them at this time. All I say is that this feature should be a matter deserving deep study.

There is the problem of regional freight rates, and the regional freight rates structures with respect to which some sections of the country, such as northwestern Ontario as an example, have borne the brunt of discrimination for years. This should be one of the first matters to be considered when freight rates adjustments are made. I think it should be one of the duties of the government to bring forth a recommendation which will end such rank discrimination once and for all.

At page 29 of the report there is reference to the limitation of regulations consistent with public interest and fair treatment in all ways to all carriers.

At page 71 of the same report there is a statement on increases of rates to the effect that no one can or should guarantee that the revenue of any competitive business will be adequate. This is just as true of competitive transportation as of any other business.

Incidentally, the predecessor of the present Minister of Transport as reported at page 2208 of Hansard of 1959 had this to say in answer to a question:

> Consideration will then be given to means of further relieving the unfair discriminatory burden of the freight rate structure. In the meantime the government does not propose to permit any further general increase in railway freight rates.

In that statement he definitely said that discrimination would be done away with and that a new era would come upon us so far as railway freight rates are concerned. The royal commission report has now been in the hands of the government for several months and we are awaiting the results of its study.

Mr. Balcer: On a point of order, the report has not been in the hands of the government for many months. I would not like hon. members to be under that impression. We just received it.

Mr. Chevrier: It has certainly been there for weeks.

Mr. Fulton: There is quite a difference, is there not?

Mr. Pickersgill: More than a month, anyway.

An hon. Member: The usual state of Liberal accuracy.

Mr. Hellyer: It would not make any difference to this government.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister promised it would be there before the 31st of March.

Mr. Balcer: It was a free commission. It was not run by the government.

Mr. Badanai: I accept the minister's correction. If he says it is only several weeks I will accept his statement. I was under the impression it was longer. However, I may be wrong. In any event, we are now waiting for the results, what the government will recommend and what it will not. In the meantime, and ever since the appointment of the commission over a year ago, freight rates have been in a freeze.

On numerous occasions, and more recently when the case of northwestern Ontario for more equitable rates based on common sense was presented to the royal commission sitting in the court house of the city of Port Arthur, we have pointed out that increases amounting to 157 per cent have been awarded the railways during the past 11 years and the result in high cost of freight has meant the loss of business and the discouragement of business in this area of Ontario. For the benefit of those who wonder why one section of Ontario protests high freight rates that are accepted in another section of the province of Ontario, the reason is that southern Ontario does not have to pay for the long haul around the great lakes. In this respect northwestern Ontario's position is more comparable with that of the prairie provinces where virtually all freight is long haul business.

Mr. Neil Edmenstone, vice president of Steep Rock iron mines, speaking before a chamber of commerce meeting at Fort William on March 22, 1961, had this to say:

> We need freight rates that make economic sense to this area which will permit us to thrive and compete while permitting the railways to do the same. If the railways won't do it, then the government must act to do it. There are policies being mooted which would stop dead in its tracks the biggest development northwestern Ontario has ever had or may have for a long time to come.

The Prime Minister, speaking at Fredericton last December, made the statement that the government was against the railroads meeting union wage demands by increasing freight rates, and he went on to say:

> We acted in the continuation of the operations of the railways without unfairness or injustice. Additional time was provided by the government's action to enable the royal commission to bring about equalization of opportunity everywhere in Canada.

Further on he added this significant statement:

> To have allowed the railways to increase freight rates on a horizontal basis would have been to increase discrimination rates that now exist which deny the Atlantic provinces the possibility of expansion.

That is precisely the problem of northwestern Ontario. The situation there parallels that of the maritimes. I wish to cite several examples to show how this discrimination works to the detriment not only of the manufacturers but also the consumers. On a 30,000-pound car of canned foods from Chatham, Ontario, winter freight rates are as follows and, incidentally, they do not include heating charges: Chatham to Marathon or Geraldton, a distance of 783 miles, $1.57 per 100 pounds. The distance from Chatham to Fort William or Porth Arthur is 981 miles and the rate is $1.57 per 100 pounds. From Chatham to Atikokan, Ontario, the distance is 1,056 miles and the rate is $1.90 per 100 pounds. From Chatham to Winnipeg the distance is 1,400 miles and the rate is $1.65 per 100 pounds. You will notice the difference there. From Chatham to Atikokan the charge is $1.90 per 100 pounds for a distance of 1,056 miles and from Chatham to Winnipeg, a distance of 1,400 miles, or 344 miles farther, the rate is $1.65, which is much lower on a longer haul.

From Chatham to Regina, a distance of 1,756 miles, the rate is $3.01 per 100 pounds. From Chatham to Vancouver, a distance of 2,864 miles, the rate is $1.80 per 100 pounds. In other words, it costs less to send 100 pounds of canned goods from Chatham, Ontario, to Vancouver than it does to send 100 pounds of the same canned goods from Chatham to Atikokan although the mileage in the latter case is only a little more than one third.

If cars of canned goods roll to the lakehead for distribution and are hauled back to Geraldton or Marathon there is a further charge of $1.37 per 100 pounds for this 200-mile haul. This means that it actually costs 85 cents to freight one case of 24-15 ounce tins weighing 29 pounds from the canning plant to Marathon or Geraldton and this 85 cents represents a further cost of 32 per cent.

To take another example, one case of corn containing 24-15 ounce tins and costing $2.60 f.o.b. factory would cost $3.45 per case f.o.b. Geraldton or Marathon. Whereas a retailer will sell this corn in Chatham to the consuming public at two tins for 27 cents his counterpart in Marathon or Geraldton 783 miles away would of necessity have to sell it at two tins for 35 cents. These examples, and I could cite others, will suffice to indicate the discrepancies in these rates. These examples only show the vicious impact on the cost of living in northwestern Ontario which by no stretch of the imagination can be condoned any longer. The freight rate on a basic commodity such as wheat, which is subject to world market competition, could not be related in any way to the domestic market. Internal freight rates agreements should be made to enable the transportation companies to assess their rightful tariff, and then every section of Canada will carry its proper share of the load. The establishment of a fair freight rate structure for northwestern Ontario in general, and the lakehead area in particular, is the key to the development and prosperity of this often forgotten but very important section of the province of Ontario.

This committee will recall, Mr. Chairman, the removal to Montreal of the passenger bus manufacturing facilities from the Canadian Car plant at Fort William. This was not caused by competition from General Motors, as was suggested by the hon. member for Port Arthur a few weeks ago but rather came about because of freight rate inequalities. We do not yet have the advantage of numerous adequate highways which would allow many of our important industries to obtain competitive rates. In addition, there are not too many examples of agreed rates in this territory. Horizontal freight rate increases have a harsher effect upon northwestern Ontario than is generally the case in many other parts of Canada. These conditions have meant that our small businesses, forced to use class rates extensively, bear an increasingly large percentage of the burden. Our people also bear this burden because everyone, directly or indirectly, pays freight rates which often amount to more annually than one's tax bill. We know two things about our present economy. It is distinguished by higher than average costs and higher than average unemployment. Each of these aspects is related, and both are related to high freight costs.

The rate structure as a whole is very sensitive to changes, and often a seemingly realistic adjustment can boomerang in the most unexpected place and manner. For example, the removal of the mountain differential looked good to British Columbia. However, it resulted in the cancellation of some reasonable commodity rates on British Columbia lumber to the Canadian lakehead, and raised that rate by 19 cents per 100 pounds. This was the start of conditions about which our industry has complained so bitterly. Our lumber and wood operators believe they can prove that the present rate structure is out of line with the development of their businesses and the development of the community.

The lakehead cities of Fort William and Port Arthur are situated in what has come to be called northwestern Ontario. In terms of railway mileage, these cities are 419 miles from Winnipeg, 551 miles from Sudbury and 810 miles from Toronto. This huge region, over 225,000 square miles in area, is crossed by the transcontinental line of Canadian National in its north centre, by the Canadian Pacific in its south centre, and by a line of Canadian National along its southern edge west of the lakehead. In freight rate terms, the western region begins at Fort William and at Armstrong to the north on the Canadian National. Traditionally the lakehead cities have been the gateway to the west. Aside from this transportation aspect of our economy, the region's main industries and activities centre on the forests and the mines. The products are largely pulpwood, lumber, plywood, paper and poles, iron ore and base metals. Northwestern Ontario's case relating to freight rates stems from the effects of horizontal increases since 1948. These increases, as I have already pointed out, have amounted to 157 per cent. The cumulative effect of these increases has worked to the marked disadvantage of our territory where long distances make for high freight costs, inordinately increased by the percentage basis.

We are submitting to the government the importance of adjustments in these rates. As I have pointed out, this region has been more or less neglected for the past several years. I trust that the minister will have some answers to these questions when he sums up at the end of this debate, and that he will give some thought to the case of northwestern Ontario, a region which I am representing here at least in part because my own constituency is largely dependent upon industries which are seriously affected by freight rates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to repeat the points that have already been made by the hon. member for Laurier and the Leader of the Opposition. I do intend, in somewhat different language and for the sake of emphasis, to repeat a point that was made by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador.

First, I want to say something directly about the measure that is before us in view of the interjections that were made by the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport earlier this afternoon. The government did not see fit to bring the measure before parliament before it came into effect. These ministers say that what we are being asked to vote now, this $20 million for the year beginning May 1, is not a subsidy to support wages. This, of course, is just a fiction. Everybody knows that the 17 per cent freight rate increase was made in 1958 to meet the increase in wages. Everybody knows that the government allowed the 17 per cent increase to come into effect, and then decided that the shippers would pay part of it and the taxpayers would pay the rest of it. This is what happened. If one calls that a subsidy for some purpose other than for wages, one is just playing with words. It is true it is not a direct subsidy for wages but it is subsidy which is paid because wages went up. In consequence of wages going up, the board of transport commissioners allowed freight rates to go up horizontally, notwithstanding the fact the Prime Minister promised in 1957 that we would have no more horizontal increases if the people voted for him. This was just another of those promises about which we have heard so much, but not recently, and about which hon. gentlemen opposite hate to be reminded.

The fact of the matter is that we should call a spade a spade. The government should not pretend things are not what they are because the government is not fooling anybody. This $20 million is a straight subsidy resulting from a freight rate increase which resulted from a wage increase. In other words, it is a subsidy for a wage increase. Why it was all right to provide a subsidy in respect of this matter, and why it became suddenly so wicked last November and December, it is rather difficult for people whose minds move reasonably logically to understand.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I think we also ought to remember that this legislation has been brought in because of another promise which was made by the Prime Minister and which he was unable or unwilling to keep. As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out following the hon. member for Laurier, the Prime Minister last November promised that a solution of this problem would be found; he promised that there would be no wage subsidy and that a solution would be found by the MacPherson commission which would enable the railway labour dispute which could not be settled last December, to be settled before May 15. The Prime Minister also promised that he would bring in legislation to create conditions that would make that settlement possible. There has been no legislation. There has been no change whatsoever from the situation with which we were faced last November and December.

An hon. Member: The strike has been settled.

Mr. Pickersgill: There never was a strike. I might say to the hon. gentleman that there never was a strike to settle. Last November the government brought in legislation to compel the men to go on working. That is why there was not a strike last December. There has not been a strike this May because the railways decided in May to accept the precise terms which the Liberal party in November said it would recommend, namely the recommendations of the Milvain report.

Mr. Balcer: And compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Pickersgill: If nothing else was changed, and if no solution was offered by the MacPherson report, why were the railways able to accede in May of this year—as the Leader of the Opposition asked a few moments ago —to what they said it was impossible to accede to last December? The Prime Minister told us in December about a solution which was up Mr. MacPherson's sleeve but which would be down by March 31. When Mr. MacPherson about the middle of April produced his report there was no solution and there has been no legislation. Yet the railway labour dispute was settled, as I say, on the basis recommended by the official opposition last November. It was settled precisely on that basis, namely on the basis of the Milvain report.

I could believe that Mr. Gordon was ordered to do that because, after all, Mr. Gordon is an employee of the government of Canada. They can give him orders and he must either accept those orders or resign; that is if he has anything to resign about at the moment, a matter which seems to be in some doubt. However, I do not think the government can give orders to Mr. Crump; at least I would be rather surprised if they can do so. Therefore any reasonable person will assume, as I do, that they gave Mr. Crump something else than an order. I think they gave him an assurance that certain things would be done.

Mr. Balcer: Things are done in a straightforward way today, not by any back door method as was the situation when the Liberals were in power. There is no under the table deal.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going to deal with that matter. Let the hon. gentleman wait a moment. I am going to reach that matter.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member is making insulting innuendos.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not making insulting innuendos at all. I am putting on the record what has been said about this matter. On May 5, as found at page 4401 of Hansard, I asked the Prime Minister this question:

> Could I ask the Prime Minister to give an assurance that no prior undertaking of any description was given to the railway company before the settlement was reached yesterday?

Here is the Prime Minister's reply given in that courteous manner which so endears him to the house and to the country:

> Mr. Diefenbaker: I say with the greatest joviality to the hon. gentleman that the experiences he used to have when he was a member of the government of a former day are not being repeated by this government.

I can tell you the experiences I had with Mr. St. Laurent. Mr. St. Laurent did not use double talk like that. When you asked Mr. St. Laurent a question, he gave a courteous and straightforward answer to it and he did not reflect on his predecessors who were no longer in the house. The plain fact is that if Mr. St. Laurent had been asked a question like that in this house he would have said yes or no. We can only assume that the reason the Prime Minister did not say yes or no was that he was not willing to tell us what the arrangement was and yet he did not want to say there was no arrangement as there is an arrangement. That is the only inference one can draw from this kind of answer. Then I went on to ask this question:

I wonder if the Prime Minister could not now give a categorical answer to a simple, straightforward question.

Once more there was the usual courteous reply by the Prime Minister: silence.

Mr. Fulton: Where is the inference?

Mr. Pickersgill: Where is what inference?

Mr. Fulton: The inference you have drawn.

Mr. Pickersgill: The inference I have drawn is that an assurance was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. Fulton: Where in the answer is there any justification for that inference?

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the minister is asking the question, may I say this. In my view, if there were no such assurance the Prime Minister would say simply and in a straightforward manner, "There was no such assurance". Because he obviously evaded the question and because the railways have said they cannot find the money themselves, I think we are entitled to assume that they had such an assurance, either expressed or implied. If there is any respect for parliament in this government which professes to have so much respect for it, I think parliament should be told what that assurance was.

Parliament was told by the Prime Minister in the most categorical fashion last November and December that the royal commission was going to provide a solution to this problem. To my simple way of looking at it, the royal commission has provided no solution to this problem. If it has done so, will the government please tell us now what that solution is? Earlier, in reply to my hon. friend from Laurier, the Minister of Transport said that the subsidies which have been recommended by Mr. MacPherson's commission were not for the purpose of subsidizing wages. That is quite true. But if the government should, in its wisdom, some time before the end of this session bring in legislation or an item in the estimates in order to provide some of these subsidies, there is nothing to prevent the railways from using them, not for the purpose Mr. MacPherson recommended but, as my hon. friend from Laurier said, in order to meet this deficiency in revenue because of the increased wage rates. But at least parliament ought to be told what we are being asked to do and why we are being asked to do it.

If the government are going to bring in legislation to give a further subsidy to the railways, why could it not have been done today? Why could it not have been brought in with this measure instead of bringing two measures before the house? Why could we not have dealt with the whole problem at once? Is it because the government, as usual, do not know what on earth to do about the problem or is it because they wish to wait until the last day of the session, as they have done with many another controversial thing in every session since 1958, in the hope that they can get it through without much scrutiny and without much debate? I say, Mr. Chairman, that to bring in this stopgap measure that was brought in in 1959 and again last year—a stopgap measure that was to last only until the MacPherson commission had made its report—and now to bring it in again, and at the same time to refuse to tell the house and the country what their plans are is conduct that I do not understand. If the government have no respect for the house, surely they have some respect for the country. Surely we are entitled to know, as the representatives of the people, what the government's plans are for dealing with this urgent, grave and difficult problem.

I want to say a word, and just a word, about the measure as it affects another promise made by this government, the promise my hon. friend from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador read to the committee earlier. Of course, this was in that high noon of promises in May of 1957. These are the promises that hon. gentlemen opposite would like to forget; they hate to have them mentioned.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all. We have fulfilled most of them.

Mr. Pickersgill: These are the famous Atlantic resolutions—

An hon. Member: We have to leave something for you to talk about.

Mr. Pickersgill: —which, as my hon. friend from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador said, are edged in black and blue and are badly bruised.

Mr. Fulton: It was you that was badly bruised; you forget that.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman sounds more aggrieved than I do at the moment. For one who is supposed to have been bruised, I would stack up my cheerfulness against his any day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Thistledown.

Mr. Pickersgill: When I have your attention again, sir; when you can afford to give me your attention again, sir—

Mr. Ricard: When the hon. member for Laurier stops making noises.

The Chairman: I would inform the hon. member that I have not missed a word he has said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not suggesting any reflection on Your Honour. I was suggesting Your Honour's attention was being distracted by hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I come back to this solemn pledge which hon. gentlemen opposite are very anxious not to have me read:

> We are committed to the original pledge given to our people at the time of confederation that freight rates would be adjusted—

I emphasize those words "that freight rates would be adjusted":

> —and transportation facilities would be provided so that our geographic position would not prejudice our producers having reasonable access to the markets of Canada.

I admit that the word "adjusted" is an equivocal word. I do not know whether it was deliberately put there to give hon. gentlemen an out; but I suggest that everybody in the Atlantic provinces who read that thought that if freight rates were going to be adjusted, they were not going to be adjusted upward. I think they were intended to believe, and they did believe—if they believed it at all; and I am afraid a lot of them did—that this meant freight rates were going to go down.

Mr. MacInnis: It still makes better reading than something you could not get across. Walter Gordon stopped you.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman from Cape Breton South is erupting. When his eruption is over, sir, I will continue. It will be recalled that one of the last acts of the previous government was to increase the advantages to the Atlantic provinces under the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

I would also point out that the only action taken by the present government with respect to freight rate adjustments has been to increase freight rates, and to increase them horizontally. That increase is still being continued by the present government, not at the full level recommended by the board of transport commissioners but at something about half that level, and the taxpayers are paying the rest.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make any remarks on this particular item because I think my views as to subsidizing the railroads are well known. However, after the outrageous anti-labour speech that has been made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I think I must make a few remarks.

Mr. Pickersgill: Anti-labour?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Of course, it is not surprising, knowing his affinity with the premier of Newfoundland and his regard for labour, that the hon. member's attitude should be such as it is. However, I was absolutely amazed to hear him attribute all the ills of the railroads and our transportation system to the employees of the railroads.

The hon. member says it does not matter how you disguise it; it does not matter what you want to do for the railroads in the form of a subsidy, it is entirely the fault of the railroad employees and nobody else. It does not make any difference that they might have been operating passenger services that are uneconomical; it does not make any difference that they might be hauling grain below what it costs them to do it; it does not make any difference that they might be forced to operate uneconomical branch lines; the hon. member says that if a penny is paid to the railroads it is the fault of labour and nobody else. He says that every ill of the railroads is the fault of the employees.

I am absolutely surprised to hear a statement like that, not only from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate but it has been implied all the way through by his colleague, the hon. member for Laurier, only the hon. member got up and put it a little more clearly than he did. I suppose a lot of it stems from their great disappointment that the rail strike was settled in the first place.

Mr. Chevrier: It was settled on the basis we recommended.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Oh, Mr. Chairman, the basis that was recommended by the opposition and the hon. member for Laurier was compulsory arbitration—

Mr. Chevrier: It was not.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): —which is something this government has been opposed to, and labour has been opposed to, throughout the years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yours was compulsion without arbitration.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am sure the employees of the railroads will be pretty well pleased to have the promise of the Prime Minister that their rates will be back dated to January 1, 1960. They will not lose a cent of pay, which they would have lost had they gone on strike. I do not think there will be any complaint from these employees, and as one hon. member of this house I can say I have heard very little complaint from railway employees since then.

If this government had taken the course of compulsory arbitration suggested by the Liberal party I am sure it would have taken away for all time the rights of the employees on the railroads to strike. We must remember that when the Liberal party was in power in 1950 this was their solution to the thing, to propose compulsory arbitration notwithstanding the fact that labour was entirely opposed to it.

Had the present government taken that course suggested by the opposition, compulsory arbitration would have been established for any dispute on the railways. There can be no doubt that had that happened there would have been the same suggestion on the part of the Liberal party to impose compulsory arbitration when any other serious labour dispute came about.

I am not going to deal any further with this particular subsidy except to say that I am concerned about it being continued again. I pointed out to the house when it was first instituted that subsides are very difficult to discontinue once they are started. This is now the third time that we are dealing with this particular question. I think the concern I had at that time has been shown to be not unfounded.

However, I realize the position the government is in through having just received the report of the royal commission on transportation, and having received only the first volume of that report. It was suggested by one hon. member of the opposition that the government has had this report for months and had done nothing about it. Then the suggestion got down to weeks, and it finally turns out to be less than a month that the government has had this first volume in their hands, and they have only the first volume of the report.

When we consider the actions of hon. members of the Liberal party when they were in office, they show a great deal more concern now for the passage of time than they did at that time. A difficult question such as this cannot be resolved in the space of a few weeks. I can only come to the conclusion that most of the concern of hon. members of the opposition was caused by the fact that the railway strike was settled.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I did not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but of course he made statements about what I had said that were so out of accord with the facts that it is very hard to believe the hon. gentleman was even listening to what I had to say.

I said—and I want to repeat it—that the subsidy we are now being asked to vote is a subsidy which has been historically and as a matter of fact occasioned by an increase in railway rates, which in turn was given to the railways to meet an increase in wages in 1958. I do not think those facts are in any dispute anywhere, and this parliament—

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): That is what you say.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman; perhaps he would allow me to make my correction. This parliament has decided twice, and is now being asked to decide a third time, that part of that increase in freight rates to pay those increased wages should be paid out of the treasury of Canada.

I suggest to call that what it is, is what we ought to do here. We should tell the truth about what we are doing and not pretend it is something different from what it is. If that is an attack on labour then I am afraid I have made an attack on labour. However, I should remind that hon. gentleman that last December, when he voted to compel these men to go back to work at the old wages, the Liberal party protested because we on this side felt those employees were entitled to the increase in wages recommended by Judge Milvain. I do not think the hon. gentleman will confuse the people concerned by his distortion of the facts.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, we have heard some very interesting statements this afternoon in respect of this proposed legislation, especially those made by the hon. member for Vancouver East. Some hon. members raised some very interesting points, and the official opposition have taken an air of great offence to the fact that we are bringing this legislation in at the present time. Before I deal with the resolution itself, I should like to be fair and set the record straight by calling this committee's attention to some figures, about which we heard, a few minutes ago, from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He suggested that the present government was responsible for increases in freight rates and that this government was not the friend of the people of Canada on this account.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that. I just said there were increases in freight rates.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, and you made a big thing of it. I should just like to present certain figures, at this time, which I am not pulling out of a hat, in respect of those figures quoted this afternoon. I suggest by looking at the varying proportions regarding freight rate increases we will then have a clearer picture in respect of which government is more concerned with the welfare of Canadian citizens as far as freight rates are concerned.

Since 1945 freight rates have increased by 157 per cent. One hundred and forty per cent of this increase occurred during the time my hon. friend was a minister under the Liberal regime. During the Conservative administration—that is during the last four years—the only increase which has been allowed was to the extent of 10 per cent, which was later reduced to 8 per cent. In other words, the total increase of 17½ per cent was originally decreased to 10 per cent, and then to 8 per cent. The government has also frozen all increases; this policy is still in effect. I suggest that this government has shown the people of Canada what it thought of the great burden of freight rates in various parts of the country. This government has looked into the matter seriously and has gone out of its way in an attempt to help the shippers of various regions of Canada, who have had to face these freight rate increases.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, would the minister place on the record, in the same manner as he has done in respect of the previous administration, the amount of increase imposed under the Conservative regime which preceded the Liberal government?

Mr. Chambers: Why not go back to the Sir John A. Macdonald regime?

Mr. Pickersgill: That would not be any more irrelevant than what the minister has done.

Mr. Balcer: I do not have the figures at hand.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, but you could get them quite easily.

Mr. Fulton: We are talking about a floor to prevent rates from going up.

Mr. Balcer: Yes.

An hon. Member: He is just drawing a red herring.

Mr. Chevrier: Surely this is a bright red herring.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I am very impressed by the difference between 147 per cent and 10 per cent.

[Mr. Balcer.]

The hon. member for Laurier made a great fuss this afternoon about the fact that this amendment was being brought forward after April 30, and that the house was taken by surprise. He seemed to be suggesting that there was some kind of plot involved. I should like to remind the committee that the hon. member asked me a question, and I am sure he remembers it very well, prior to April 30, to which I replied that legislation was to be brought in to take care of the few days existing between April 30 and the time approval was given to this bill. I remember also being asked what was to happen in respect of the new rate which was filed by the railways, and I told the house that both railway presidents had written to me stating that these freight rates would not be applied. I would suggest, therefore, that not one single Canadian will have suffered any harm, in any way, shape or form as a result of this legislation being brought in at the present time. I should also suggest that the resolution was placed on the order paper before April 30, so no one was taken by surprise.

We wanted to act in a fashion which would permit both labour and management complete freedom to discuss these problems in an attempt to settle them in a manner that would be in accordance with the collective bargaining traditions of this government. We were very pleased to find that we did not have to impose any compulsory arbitration measures on one side or the other, because management and labour had come to an agreement. It has been suggested here this afternoon that the official opposition was disappointed because of that sudden settlement, however, I must say that we on this side quite freely admit that we are extremely pleased, and suggest that the rest of the people of Canada are extremely pleased, that the strike did not take place.

Mr. Fulton: Because of the efforts of the minister.

Mr. Balcer: The Minister of Labour.

We have also this afternoon heard many expressions of criticism of the fact that the first report of the royal commission on transportation has been tabled now for one or two weeks, and that the government has as yet not introduced any legislation to implement the recommendations contained in that report. I suggest that my hon. friends opposite know very well that recommendations contained in reports of royal commissions are not dealt with in a matter of two or three days. This report is an extremely important one to be followed and complemented by two further volumes. Having read the first volume I feel that volume II will have a great impact on transportation in Canada.

Earlier in the afternoon, the hon. members for Fort William and Bonavista-Twillingate, as well as some others, referred to the problems which face the shippers in various regions of this country. As indicated by volume I of the MacPherson report, volume II will deal with the burden of freight rates on a comparison basis, as they affect different sections of the country. It is also the intention of the commission to include in volume II of its report recommendations concerning special transportation problems. I think it will be extremely important to see the two further volumes of the report of the royal commission on transportation.

My friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, in his unique fashion, this afternoon tried to build up a great plot on the part of the Prime Minister in his dealings with the railways' presidents. Maybe that is what happened a few years ago, but that is not the way things are done now. What happened is that the management of the railways and labour got together and discussed their problem, after the first volume of the royal commission report on transportation had been tabled. I remember the Prime Minister stating in November that the report of the royal commission on transportation would have quite a bearing on any discussion between the railways and labour. Of course, I am convinced that the report must have had quite a bearing on their discussion. We could tell by the opinions expressed both by Mr. Crump and Mr. Gordon, when the first volume of the report was published, that they were impressed by the first volume of the report. They expressed their satisfaction with many aspects of the report, and I am quite sure that it must have been one of the big factors in the railways deciding to meet the majority recommendation of the Milvain report. Of course, it was a decision taken freely by the presidents, by Mr. Hall and by the other labour leaders who signed the settlement agreement on behalf of the two parties.

Mr. O'Hurley: I say to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that things have changed.

Mr. Pickersgill: They have.

Mr. Balcer: This afternoon my friends on the opposition side of the house have talked quite a bit about various undertakings that the Prime Minister gave during the last two election campaigns. It is a fact that the Prime Minister has dealt quite extensively with this problem of transportation and the inequities that were existing in Canada at that time and between regions, between types of transportation and between commodities and classes of goods of that kind. The Prime Minister promised that his government would do something about this and that is why we appointed the royal commission to deal precisely with those injustices and anomalies and to make sure that Canadians from one end of the country to the other would be receiving the same treatment as far as freight rates and railway transportation are concerned.

The royal commission has produced its first report and the government of course is considering the first volume. It contains extremely interesting recommendations concerning aspects of the railway problem and the government is of course giving considerable study to the first volume of the report.

Since the report has been tabled the Prime Minister, in answering questions raised by my hon. friends, has said that we can expect interim legislation to be brought forward which will be based on certain parts of the MacPherson report. The government will certainly take into consideration the study made by the commissioners and of the principle expressed by them but, of course, before adopting any part of the report the government wishes to give it the most careful consideration and also wishes to consider its impact on Canada as a whole and on the taxpayers as a whole. We wish to do something which will not be just a stopgap, which will not be just a palliative, but something which will help railway transportation in Canada in the years ahead, and I do not think there is any government so well qualified to do it as the present one.

Mr. Chevrier: Before we dispose of this matter I wonder whether the minister would reply to a few questions, which I think is customary on an occasion such as this. The minister has made it quite clear that it will take some time to implement the recommendations of the royal commission. One of the questions I should like to ask him is this. Does the minister intend to bring in legislation this session implementing the recommendations contained in the first volume of the MacPherson report?

Mr. Balcer: I think I have just covered that point. This point was covered by the Prime Minister. He said that the house could expect interim legislation based on the report, and that will implement—

Mr. Chevrier: This session?

Mr. Balcer: It was quite possible, but it has to be announced in the house at the proper time. I have not the actual quotation of the Prime Minister right here, but at the present time the government is considering this report and we intend to bring in interim legislation or at least legislation based on the MacPherson report, even if it does not implement the whole report.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand, and I thank the minister for the answer. Will it be legislation by an item in the estimates, as is being done in the case of the shipping policy, or will it be legislation in the nature of the resolution which is now before us?

Mr. Balcer: I do not know. The government has not made its decision known, but when it has the house will know at the proper time.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister was asked one question to which he has not replied, and it had to do with the manner in which the settlement of the railway dispute will be implemented. Will it be by way of a subsidy introduced in the house or how will it be done?

Mr. Balcer: We have nothing to do with this, Mr. Chairman. As I said earlier, both sides decided freely to settle this dispute. The railways probably came to the conclusion that it was the best deal they could make and so did labour. Therefore, they came to a settlement together, but there was no question of the government giving them a subsidy to meet their wage bills.

Mr. Winch: That is the point I want to make.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just follow up with one more question and then I will yield. It follows from the answer which the minister has given that there is no intention on the part of the government to introduce legislation, including a subsidy to the railways, which will allow them to implement the settlement which was made to prevent a strike?

Mr. Balcer: I think the hon. member is rather twisting my words. If the railways decide that our legislation or our action improves their position to the point where they are better off and it is easier for them to pay their wage bills, that is up to the railways. But we have no intention of bringing in legislation to meet the wage bill of this last strike settlement. As a government we have no intention of doing that.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the minister during the last hour, and all that he has said does not make sense, and especially is that true of what he said in the last five minutes. Here is the situation. For 14 months the "non-ops" had been in negotiation with the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. and they could get no agreement whatsoever. They were prepared to settle for 14 cents but asked for 25, but they could get no satisfaction whatsoever from the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. They could get no satisfaction from the railways, so right in the last hours the government brought in legislation not to give the "non-ops" any increase but to prevent a strike. The men carried on for a period of six months during which they could not strike. We read reports in the newspapers about what was supposed to be going on but we could get no answer from the Prime Minister or the government side as to what was taking place.

However, again in the last few hours the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. accepted exactly what the union had agreed to seven months ago and which the government would not give them by legislation. The minister is saying now that in the last 24 hours before the settlement the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. had no indication from or understanding with the government of Canada. I am going to say that this is the most extraordinary situation I have known in my 30 years in the trade union movement. What miracle happened? What happened before the bill was introduced last December and what has happened now?

I am going to be very blunt about the matter. Having in mind what happened last December after 14 months of negotiation and what has happened now, I believe that there must have been some kind of direction or indication by or promise from the government. I should like to ask the minister to give the committee certain very important information. From the time the government froze freight rates by order in council, can th minister tell us what the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. maintain their losses have been because of the freeze on freight rates? What has been the cost to the government of subsidies for freight rates and for payments because of increases in wages since that time?

I will put it this way. Since the government has been in office what has been the loss that the government has incurred under legislation or order in council by reason of subsidies to offset the freezing of freight rates and to take care of increases in wages, and what is the position of the government now with regard to subsidies declared or yet to be declared for the railways of Canada? I have an idea, and I mean this, that we are not being given the entire picture at this time. We agree with the minister that nobody wanted a strike. We all support anything that will prevent a strike, but I say to the minister quite bluntly that we have not got the picture yet but we are going to get it. I say that more money is going to be asked for by the government either by way of a subsidy on freight rates or a subsidy for wages. I ask the minister now to tell us what has gone on since the Conservative government took office and what he anticipates the government will be requesting the House of Commons to pay the railways of Canada either directly or indirectly.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the first question raised by the hon. member, I simply wish to repeat that labour and management settled the dispute of their own free will. With respect to any indication of a wage subsidy or what have you, no statement of any kind has been made by the government. I am not as surprised as the hon. member is at the decision of the railways to change their stand at the last hour. It has happened before, and I am afraid I have no information as to what was behind their decision. They have taken the decision of their own free will. It has been suggested to me from other sources that it must have been because of the reaction to the first volume of the report of the royal commission on transportation. I think that makes a lot of sense but neither Mr. Crump nor Mr. Gordon has told me and I do not think they have told anyone. I think this is strictly a matter of a settlement that has been arrived at by free collective bargaining, and I do not see anything so extraordinary about that.

Mr. Winch: Will the minister say now that the change in attitude by the two railways was not in any way brought about because of any commitment given by the government?

Mr. Balcer: No. I do not know of any commitments. I said that earlier and I think that should have cleared the situation as far as hon. members are concerned. The hon. member has also asked me for various amounts with regard to subsidies and freight rate increases. These are all figures that he will be in a very good position to obtain as soon as the bill is sent to the committee. I do not have these figures in front of me but I am quite sure he can ask for them in the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think the minister gave a categorical negative answer to the hon. member for Vancouver East in connection with a commitment, and I repeat the question. I think the minister should indicate to this committee categorically whether or not a commitment was given by the government of Canada to the Canadian National Railways or to the Canadian Pacific Railway that the implementation of a certain part of the recommendations contained in volume I of the report of the royal commission on transportation would be brought in this session and that the railways could, if they so desired, use that money which was earmarked for specific purposes to meet the position brought about by the settlement of the strike.

Mr. Balcer: Again, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer my hon. friend to the statement that was made in the house by the Prime Minister who stated very clearly, I think, what the intention of the government was with respect to the implementation of the MacPherson report. On May 5 the Prime Minister was asked this question by the hon. member for Laurier as reported at page 4399 of Hansard:

> May I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour whether any arrangement has been made between the government and the railways in connection with the funds with which these increases will be met?

The Prime Minister's reply was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, when the government is in a position to do so it will bring before the house, as I have already pointed out, such legislation as may be acceptable to the government in conformity with some parts, not all, of the recommendations made by the MacPherson commission.

I have nothing to add to that statement.

Mr. Chevrier: That was not my question, Mr. Chairman, and I am not going to pursue it unduly. However, I thought from the answer which the minister made to the hon. member for Vancouver East—if I am wrong in this impression I hope the minister will correct me—that he said, categorically no, the railways had been given no undertaking, that out of the moneys coming from the implementation of the recommendations of the MacPherson report they could settle the dispute.

Mr. Balcer: I want this to be very clear. There was no undertaking on the part of the government so far as the wage settlement was concerned.

Mr. Winch: The minister says there was no undertaking given by the government so far as the wage settlement was concerned. Will the minister now tell the committee what was the arrangement that was made between the government, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific which, after 14 months during which the railways rejected—

Mr. Balcer: There was nothing other than what has been said in the house during this session. That is all. I have just read what the Prime Minister has said so far as the recommendations of the MacPherson commission are concerned. So far as the question just asked by my friend is concerned, there was nothing else but what has been stated in the house.

Mr. Winch: I may be naive but I hope I am not that naive after all these years. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, if I have to continue this discussion. I just cannot be that naive. For the past two years we have been confronted in this house with problems relating to railway transportation. The "non-ops" unions have been in negotiation for over 14 months. Last December we came within hours of having a strike. The railways and the government both refused to do anything about the arbitration report.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. We have heard cross-examination on matters dealing with railway wages, and it was my understanding that this measure related to freight assistance. It seems to me that wages or the settlement of a strike are not topics that are in order.

Mr. Winch: I am not discussing wages, sir, I am discussing the freight bill. If the hon. member is trying to stop me from speaking, why did he not get up and try to stop members of his own party when they spoke on the same matter?

This has been one of the most serious problems before this House of Commons. The "non-ops" unions have been in the process of negotiation for 14 months. Just a few hours before a strike was called the government introduced a bill and there was no strike. We are now in the month of May. Right up until almost the deadline set for the strike—the minister knows it because the press covered it—the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific refused to settle just as they did in December. Then, just out of the blue and with only a few hours to go, the railways accept the conciliation report which they had rejected for 14 months.

I am going to ask the minister an honest and sincere question. Neither he nor anyone else in this house can tell me that after 14 months of refusing to accept the plea of the Prime Minister last December, refusing to accept the plea of the Prime Minister last month, the railways suddenly went overboard and accepted the entire 14 cent increase. I just cannot believe that Mr. Crump and Mr. Gordon all of a sudden discovered that they were wrong and they should do something about it. I am saying, Mr. Chairman, that there had to be something between the government and the railways. What was it? Perhaps it did not concern wages but related to decisions on the recommendations of the royal commission. Would the minister be honest enough now to tell us if the decision—

Mr. Balcer: I have told the hon. member five times already.

Mr. Winch: —of the railways was based on any indication given to Mr. Crump or Mr. Gordon that they had better sign an agreement now? I should like the minister to answer that because if anything happens in the future I should like to have him on record now. I am glad the strike was settled.

Mr. Balcer: I am beginning to think that the hon. member is just as sorry as the official opposition that the strike is over. I will answer his question for the sixth time by saying that there was nothing else but what has been said in the house; that is all.

Mr. Batten: I did not intend to take part in this debate. I thought the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had covered the case for Newfoundland thoroughly. However, following the remarks made by the minister, I feel I should like to make a few remarks in addition to what those hon. members had to say.

We in Newfoundland are in a difficult position so far as freight rates are concerned. Transportation has always been a very difficult problem for us. We live in an area where, when freight rates are increased, we have very few other modes of transportation to which we can turn as may be the case in some other provinces. The result is that if freight rates are increased we still have to have most of our commodities transported by train or by the Canadian National boats. We live in a province where over 9 per cent of everything we purchase has to be sent into the province. Each year from the mainland of Canada we bring in $250 million worth of various types of commodities. Newfoundland is at the end of the line, and every time there is a percentage increase in freight rates, the percentage increase for Newfoundland is much greater because the rate we pay is higher. However, the point I want to make is this. Stripped of all the verbiage we have had this afternoon, and regardless of what acts have been passed in the last two or three years, the fact still remains that for every freight dollar we paid before 1958, in Newfoundland and the maritime provinces, we now pay $1.08.

Mr. Chevrier: There is another matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and it is this. On February 23, 1961, the board of transport commissioners granted an increase in freight rates of 25 per cent in what are known as the Atlantic and west grain rates, the movement of grain from bay ports to Halifax and Saint John, and that increase has been suspended by the cabinet by order in council which I think was effective March 30 and it is to come to an end early in July. As the minister knows, this legislation is for a period of 12 months. What will happen to these rates? Will they be covered by this legislation or are they rates that are not considered under this measure?

Mr. Balcer: I do not know what will be the decision of the government at that time. At the present time the order is suspended by government action. I could not say at the present time what will be the attitude of the government on July 3.

Mr. Chevrier: The point is this. These are rates known as class and commodity rates. This legislation deals with class and commodity rates but not with competitive rates. I therefore think the question is in order. Will the grain rates that have been increased 25 per cent be covered by this legislation on July 3 to be exact, when the other matter expires?

Mr. Balcer: When the bill is before the committee, I think the experts of the board of transport commissioners will be present and they will be only too glad to answer the questions asked by the hon. member.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Balcer thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-93, to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING NUMBER OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canadian National Railways Act to increase the number of members of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway Company from seven to twelve.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Balcer: The resolution before the committee is to approve the introduction of a bill to amend the Canadian National Railways Act which would increase the number of directors of the company from seven to 12.

The committee will recall that the third and final report of last year's sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping recommended that the government might consider the advisability of strengthening the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways by adding to its present number. In the light of this unanimous recommendation, the government reached the conclusion that parliament should be asked to pass the appropriate legislation. The increase to 12 will provide for broader representation on the board, and I feel sure the resolution will commend itself to the committee.

With the permission of the committee, I should like to make a short review of the history of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway Company. Chapter 13, statutes of Canada, 1919, authorized the organization of the Canadian National Railway Company to operate the Canadian Northern Railway lines, the Canadian Government Railway lines and any other railway lines as should be entrusted to it from time to time by order in council.

The statute provided that the directors be appointed by the governor in council and their number was to be not less than five and not more than 15. Chapter 6, statutes of Canada, 1931, provided for the possible appointment of 17 directors instead of 15 as originally limited by chapter 13 of the statutes of 1919.

Order in council P.C. 2094 of October 4, 1922 appointed nine directors of the Canadian National Railway Company to fulfil the intentions of the above-mentioned legislation. The railway was operated with nine directors in 1923, and in 1924, the directors were increased to 13 and remained at 13 until December 24, 1930, at which time two additional directors were appointed making a total of 15. In 1931 two additional directors were appointed bringing the total to 17. From 1932 to December 30, 1933, the board consisted of 16 directors.

Chapter 33 of the statutes of Canada, 1933, being the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, authorized the governor in council to vacate the existing board of directors of the Canadian National Railway Company and to appoint in their place three trustees. A board of trustees were appointed effective from December 30, 1933, consisting of three trustees under the chairmanship of the Hon. Charles Fullerton to replace the board of directors. This board functioned until October 1, 1936.

Under chapter 25, statutes of Canada, 1936, the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act was amended which authorized the governor in council to replace the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railway Company by seven directors.

The seven directors were appointed October 1, 1936, and the number of directors has remained at seven up to the present date. Since the amendment of the Canadian National Railways Act in 1955, the authority for appointment of the board of directors of the railway has been included therein, being section 6 of chapter 29, statutes of 1955.

Under the present legislation the directors are appointed by the governor in council for a term not exceeding three years but a director at any time may be removed for cause.

The salaries of the directors are paid by Canadian National Railways and the amount is fixed by the governor in council.

Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier in my statement, the increase in the number of directors to 12 will provide for broader representation on the board. If we look at the boards of directors of major railways in North America and the mileage operated by these railways, we find that the Canadian National Railways is certainly in an anomalous position in that it has a very small number of directors for the mileage it operates.

As hon. members know, there are seven directors on the board of directors of Canadian National Railways. This railway operates 26,329 miles. If we compare this with Canadian Pacific Railway, they have a board of 24 directors and operate 17,000 miles.

If we look at the short list I have here, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company has 12 directors and operates only 7,000 miles. The New York Central Railroad Company has 15 directors and operates 14,000 miles. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has 18 directors and operates 16,000 miles. The Southern Pacific Company has 16 directors and operates 13,000 miles. The Union Pacific Railroad Company has 17 directors and operates 11,000 miles.

This shows that of the six railways I have listed, the one with the smallest board of directors is the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, with 12 directors, and it operates only about one quarter of the mileage operated by Canadian National Railways.

Therefore I think this proposal of the government will certainly help the Canadian National Railways' management in that it will give broader geographic representation and also a broader representation as far as the average Canadian activity is concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the minister began by saying this was a unanimous decision of the committee. I must challenge that remark. It is true that there is a recommendation of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping that the government might consider the advisability of strengthening the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways by adding to its present number, but it does not follow that because this recommendation is there it is a unanimous decision.

I for one, had I been at the final meeting, would certainly not have approved of it, because there was nothing in the minutes of the committee which indicated that a conclusion of this nature would be arrived at. One has only to read—

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, perhaps we might say it was unanimous as far as the members who were present were concerned.

[Mr. Balcer.]

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if the minister wants to put it that way, I would counter with this. Why, then, was not an earlier recommendation of the committee implemented? I refer to a recommendation made by myself and approved by all the members—that one was unanimous—having to do with the establishment of an economic survey of the St. Lawrence seaway on regional areas of Canada. I have asked repeatedly in the House of Commons why it was not done and failed to receive any satisfactory answer. But it was approved by the committee.

The point I am making now is that because a recommendation is contained in a report, that is not a reason for it being implemented and I challenge the statement of the minister at once. I do so because I know full well that the minister's predecessor, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, was opposed to it. Representations which I received when I was in office indicated that he and the then government were opposed to it.

Perhaps I may put on Hansard the short discussion which took place in the committee concerning this matter, which is evidence of the fact that the minister's predecessor was opposed to it. For instance, at page 153 of the committee's proceedings last year the hon. member for Port Arthur is reported as having asked this question:

I would like to ask the minister—

This was the present minister's predecessor:

—if he is satisfied with the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Fisher: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Hees: I said I was satisfied with the directors of the C.N.R.

Mr. Benidickson: Are you satisfied that the number of directors is adequate, having regard to the fact that the rival company, the C.P.R.—and I have raised this in the house—has a very large board, with tremendous connections with potential freight right across the country. Is the minister satisfied that the board of seven which we have is adequate in relation to the competitive advantage that I see in the C.P.R. of having a large board? I do not know how many there are, but I would imagine there are about 25—all with connections for producing freight.

An hon. Member: And with shares.

Mr. Benidickson: I think some of them have very few shares. I am quite satisfied that our seven directors hold shares in Canada, as Canada and that is their job. However, I do not think that it is a large enough group to keep in touch with potential suppliers of business to the C.N.R. I have raised this in the house before.

The Chairman: Did you raise it before your party went out of power?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, I have done that, and I think I have done it with my former minister, who is sitting beside me, Mr. Chevrier. I still think it is a valid suggestion and I raise it to the minister. Will you consider it?

Mr. Hees: I have had no reason to believe that the present number of directors is not adequate.

The Chairman: This minister is as hard to convince as yours was.

That certainly does not indicate that there was unanimity in the committee about increasing the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned at six o'clock I was saying that it ill-behooved the minister to put this legislation forward on the basis of a committee recommendation. I think this is a matter which must be accompanied by reasons other than that and, of course, the government must take responsibility for this legislation.

The point that came to my mind as I listened to the minister earlier today is, has the management of the Canadian National Railways asked for this increase in the number of directors? The minister likes to say in the House of Commons that he does not direct the affairs of the Canadian National Railways but that it administers its own affairs, and that he represents it and reports on its behalf in the house. That is a position which I think all hon. members will accept. However, I think the minister should tell us whether the management of the Canadian National Railways has recommended an increase in the directorship from seven to 12. I would certainly be interested in knowing whether that is the case or not. I should also be interested in knowing when this decision was arrived at because, certainly when we were in the committee on railways, air lines and shipping last year, there was not the slightest intention expressed by his predecessor of increasing the directorship. In fact, he made it quite clear where he stood so far as the number of directors was concerned. I put that stand on the record earlier, and feel it is not necessary for me to repeat it now. We on this side of the house will oppose this legislation.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Broome: Will the hon. member extend that position to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River?

Mr. Chevrier: I think the hon. gentleman will have to direct his question to him.

I have placed on the record part of the discussion which took place in that committee last year. There was no doubt where the previous minister of transport stood in regard to this question at that time. There certainly was no doubt where the hon. member for Laurier stood, and where he has always stood in this regard—he resisted this particular type of legislation when he was in office.

Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a time when this legislation ought not to be introduced, that time is now. There are 720,000 people out of work in Canada today and, notwithstanding that situation, this government introduces legislation to increase the directorship from seven to 12. Twelve per cent of the labour force is out of work. There has never been more unemployment in Canada during the last 20 years than there is now, and there is no greater unemployment in any industrial country in the western world than there is in this country. Notwithstanding that position the government has decided to increase the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

An hon. Member: What has that got to do with this bill?

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chevrier: I certainly will and, if I can hear the hon. gentleman, will be glad to answer.

Mr. Macdonnell: I shall do the best I can. I find myself unable to follow the argument which is being presented, and perhaps the hon. member would explain it. Why the incidence of unemployment should be an argument against this increase, I do not yet understand because, if the object of the act, namely to increase the efficiency of the railways is achieved, then it should help alleviate unemployment.

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to that question is that I consider the statement I have made, as well as the question which the hon. gentleman has asked, as a serious one, unlike some interjections of hon. gentlemen who have been interrupting, and my answer is this. When there is substantial unemployment, particularly in respect of one of the railways of Canada, surely that is not the time to increase the board of directors where the fees are very substantial, as the hon. member knows.

In dealing again with the point which the hon. member for Greenwood has raised, there has been a substantial decrease in the number of employees of the Canadian National Railways, to the extent of 5,000 per year for the last four years. The member for Port Arthur put some figures on the record earlier today in connection with the Freight Rates Reduction Act having to do with diminution or attrition of employment in the Canadian National Railways, which were greater than those I have mentioned. Whether those figures are correct or not, I do not know, but let us assume that there has been at least—

Mr. MacInnis: The statement you have just completed contains an admission that you do not know whether or not your own figures are correct.

Mr. Chevrier: That type of interruption is made by an hon. member who most of the time—

Mr. MacInnis: Which you never answer, though.

Mr. Chevrier: —speaks from temper rather than from logic. I welcome these interruptions because I see that these suggestions arouse the ire of hon. members. Apparently they would like this measure to go through without any objection. I see some very serious objections to it and I intend to put them on Hansard.

I was going on to say that from the figures I have been able to obtain it appears that there has been a diminution or attrition in the number of employees of Canadian National Railways of at least 5,000 per year in the last four years. Yet while this is going on the government is increasing the number of directors. While men are being laid off directors are being added to the board. While men are without work directors are being increased on the board. While men are without employment on Canadian National Railways, it takes more men to administer the railway.

There has also been a fairly substantial reorganization of the various districts of Canadian National Railways recently. I am told this is in an effort to curtail expenditure, a move, incidentally, which is extremely unpopular with the men and with the public. On one occasion the hon. member for Levis gave some indication of what the railway reorganization has meant in his area and how this move has upset the workers in that region and changed the pattern which had existed for many, many years. Notwithstanding that reorganization, it is still found necessary by the government to increase the board of directors.

The deficit of Canadian National Railways this year is probably one of the highest in its history. The estimate given for 1961 is not too encouraging. What it will be I am unable to say but it will certainly be substantial, and if the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation or part thereof are not implemented then, of course, the deficit will reach astronomical figures. While that position exists in the Canadian National Railways the government thinks it is necessary to have more directors look after the business of the company.

If you have a small board such as exists now it seems to me that each director will take a greater responsibility than if there are more directors. It seems to me that each director will feel that he has a greater share of the responsibility if there are seven such directors than if there are 12. Again, I ask the question, what will be the calibre of these directors? Is the calibre going to be higher than in the case of the board of broadcast governors, for instance, where one director has had to resign because of obvious reasons? Will the same calibre of men be chosen here as in that instance?

There is, of course, another very serious matter to which consideration must be given and that is territorial representation. That question is inevitably going to arise if the directorship is increased. This question is going to arise if the number of directors is such that there is likely to be more than one representative for each province, and that is, of course, what is going to happen here. Twelve directors will mean that there will be more than one director for each province. When there is one director from each province it seems to me that unquestionably there is a solemn duty to represent the interests of that province without, of course, neglecting the national interest. If there are two from a province you may well find that sectional divisions will arise.

Then there is the question of the representation of the province of Quebec if there are 12 directors. With 12 directors it will be expected that the province of Quebec will be accorded equitable representation having regard to its population. If it does not get such representation I need hardly tell the minister that he will hear about it in due course because he has repeatedly stated that the C.N.R. was not fair and just to his province. I am not going to put on the record the statement he has made. I have used it before and I do not think this is the opportune time to repeat it. But I do tell him that with these additional five directors he will be face to face with the problem of additional representation in his own province, whether there will be three directors or whether there will be less, and he will have to meet that problem.

It seems to me that the directors ought to be appointed from the point of view of their competence rather than from the point of view of geographical and political interests. There is no doubt that with 12 directors there will have to be geographical representation, and, so far as political interest is concerned, if the same pattern is followed here as is followed elsewhere I suppose that consideration will be given to that as well.

There are some who say that the Canadian Pacific Railway has a large board of directors and why should not Canadian National Railways likewise have a large board? I think there is a very important distinction to be drawn here between a crown corporation such as Canadian National Railways and national corporations. I believe they think it is necessary to have larger boards but in my opinion that is not so in the case of Canadian National Railways. Directors are appointed to the board of the Canadian Pacific Railway for various and obvious reasons. I can think of one such directors, whose name I shall not mention, who has been appointed to the Canadian Pacific board because of the tremendous business that will ensue to that railway, and I presume that applies to others too. From all this it seems to me that a great distinction exists between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways.

The question of regional representation, which I mentioned in passing a moment ago, is also of considerable importance. If you have two or more directors from a region or two directors from a province there is likely to be a clash of interests which would not exist if there were but one from the province or one from a region. For these and other reasons which will be submitted to the committee on behalf of the opposition we will oppose this measure.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the minister has indicated that this measure is brought forward as a result of the recommendation of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, of which I was a member, along with the hon. member for Laurier. As I remember it, the recommendation was unanimous, and it was strongly supported by one of the colleagues of the hon. member for Laurier, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

It is always of some interest when a government accepts a recommendation of a committee. I like to see it. I do not like to be critical of the reasons why they may choose to do something like this. Some people who do not look at the government with favour suggest this is just another place in which to stick a few political friends. I thought that note was in the argument of the hon. member for Laurier when he indicated that if we looked at the B.B.G. as an example, we would have some indication there. But as one who supported the idea of the committee, both in the full committee and when we were meeting in camera to produce the report, I indicate that we are going to support the measure although I do not feel that it may necessarily mean too much.

The main recommendation for this move, as I understood it in the committee, was one which I do not think the hon. member for Laurier went into fully enough, and that was the idea that by getting a larger and more representative board it might be possible, not so much to have a better check on the C.N.R. as to bring to the C.N.R. management a greater guidance and expertise in various fields that originate traffic or understand traffic and in a complementary way for these people to bring the knowledge that they may have that may lead to the C.N.R. getting more traffic not only from competitors such as the C.P.R. but from competitors such as truck firms.

The argument of the hon. member for Laurier that somehow this is going to create regional problems really does not hit dead centre at all because when you look at the board of directors of the C.N.R. you find that Mr. Bickle has recently died, but the men who are on that board, it seems to me, give a very incomplete representation regionally. I know in our part of the country where the railway tends to be the biggest employer we would very much like to know that we had someone on that board who was more cognizant in a general way of the Canadian National Railways' role in our area than these particular men who are on the board at the present time.

It seems to me the hon. member for Laurier dismissed too quickly the list of people who are directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the effect that they have of bringing business and support to that railway. If any of the hon. members have had the opportunity of reading the first volume of the history of the Canadian National Railways, produced a few months ago by Colonel Stevens, they will quickly deduce that there has been a very close connection between railways and banks and investment houses and trust companies ever since railroading got under way. The relationship between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Bank of Montreal has been something that you just take for granted. It seems to me regrettable that in the kind of economy we have with respect to certain features of it you have a situation where you have congeries or constellations of financial, investment and manufacturing establishments interlocked through directorships. It seem to me silly to oppose probably Canada's greatest company taking advantage of this kind of relationship.

I can say this without saying that I think this kind of interlocking structure is the ideal situation, but it is quite apparent when you run through the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway where you find such names as Harry Arkle, London, England, L. J. Belnap, Montreal, Sir George Bolton, London, England, George W. Bourke, Montreal, Hon. F. Philippe Brais, Montreal, Cyril F. H. Carson, Toronto, Hon. J. V. Clyne, Vancouver, N. R. Crump, Montreal, Robert J. Dinning, Edmonton, R. A. Emerson, Montreal, G. Blair Gordon, Montreal, G. Arnold Hart, Montreal, Louis L. Lang, Waterloo, H. H. Lank, Montreal, R. S. McLaughlin, Oshawa, Ross H. McMaster, Montreal, Sir Edward Peacock, London, England, H. E. Sellers, Winnipeg, Howard C. Sheperd, New York, Ian D. Sinclair, Montreal, H. Greville Smith, Montreal, Harold M. Turner, Toronto, H. G. Welsford, Montreal, Henry S. Wingate, New York.

This points out not only the representation that the C.P.R. shareholders have in relation to United States and British investment in the company but also the links that the C.P.R. has with classes that originate and develop a great deal of the traffic that is carried on the road. I see no reason why this attempt should not be made. But having said this, I would point out there is a bit of an anomaly here in that last year in the sessional committee I asked the present Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he was satisfied with the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways and his reply was:

I said I was satisfied with the directors of the C.N.R.

Then, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked this question:

Are you satisfied that the number of directors is adequate, having regard to the fact that the rival company, the C.P.R.—and I have raised this in the house—has a very large board, with tremendous connections with potential freight right across the country. Is the minister satisfied that the board of seven which we have is adequate in relation to the competitive advantage that I see in the C.P.R. of having a large board? I do not know how many there are, but I would imagine there are about 25—all with connections for producing freight.

Then, the hon. member went on:

I think some of them have very few shares. I am quite satisfied that our seven directors hold shares in Canada, as Canada and that is their job. However, I do not think that it is a large enough group to keep in touch with potential suppliers of business to the C.N.R. I have raised this matter in the house before.

The committee chairman asked:

Did you raise it before your party went out of power?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, I have done that, and I think I have done it with my former minister, who is sitting beside me, Mr. Chevrier. I still think it is a valid suggestion and I raise it to the minister. Will you consider it?

Mr. Hees: I have had no reason to believe that the present number of directors is not adequate.

The Chairman: This minister is as hard to convince as yours was.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. Chevrier: May I tell the hon. member that I put all that on the record before six o'clock.

Mr. Fisher: Before six o'clock? I thought I was here listening.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): You were not.

Mr. Fisher: I was within the environs.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): You were not listening.

Mr. Fisher: I offer my apologies in this regard. The point I want to make is that a year ago the then minister was not convinced. Evidently the committee report convinced him and in this sense there is no point, it seems to me, in making a great issue out of it and we will accept it. But there is one aspect of the board of directors that I should like to touch on.

Several times in the last three years I have made a request to the committee that the directors be brought before our committee so that we could talk to them and every time Mr. Gordon has raised strenuous objections. He has read out past statements of the relationship between the president of the railway and the board and he has indicated he does not think this is a proper procedure. But I wonder how long we can go on having confidence in a board, whether it is six or 12, when we get these endless records of deficits and we cannot talk to the board of directors and cannot ask them what are the reasons why the company seems to be making decisions that are supposed to take us out of a bad financial position but seem to put the company further in debt. I can give an example to the minister. The Canadian National Railways a little over two years ago decided to go into trucking. This seemed to be following the pattern of the Canadian Pacific. Now, obviously, somebody sold that policy to the board of directors, but I should like to know why the particular policy was sold to the board of directors?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member himself has explained that what he is discussing now is irrelevant because he has pointed out that whether the number of directors be six or 12 he would like to know certain things. I would suggest to him that questions on that subject would be better put before the committee that this house has agreed should be set up.

Mr. Fisher: I just wanted to underline to the minister that the fact the number of directors is being increased does not subdue the curiosity one might have about the functions of the directors. On this point, I am strictly relevant. I feel that a larger board, especially if the selection is well made, stands much more chance, it seems to me, of being suspicious and critical of the management. This is what I should like to see for a period in the history of the Canadian National Railways, a board that would be very critical of the management. I think when one calls for fresh people at the top of the management, that is the time to also call for fresh people on the board of directors. I hope, for that reason, the minister will act very quickly when this legislation is passed, as I assume it will be, to get a new board.

I would suggest that at that time serious consideration be given to an argument that has been placed before us regarding another crown corporation, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I refer to the whole question of the relationship of the permanent employees of the company who, at the same time, are on the board, such as Mr. Ouimet or Mr. Gordon, for example, and the role that they have within the board of directors. I know the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Simcoe North, I think it is, have often put these questions. I am not trying to interpret their point of view, but I know they have views on this question as to the role of someone who is a senior official of the company and, at the same time, on the board of directors. I know the suspicion has been brought forward in relation to the C.B.C. that the two continuing persons on the board of directors have an advantage when they are speaking to the board about policies which, perhaps, they would not have if the board were somewhat removed from them.

The government has not renewed the appointment of Mr. Donald Gordon as chairman of the board of directors. We have this new legislation before us. One of the most noted of the directors has recently died. It seems to me, therefore, that the minister will have a grand opportunity to bring in not only new faces but to consider allowing the 12 members of the newly constituted board to choose a chairman rather than allowing the president to be reappointed by the government. I do not know what statutory changes that would require, but the suggestion seems to me to be worthy of consideration. The conclusion one gathers from glancing through the 25 year history of the Canadian Pacific and the 25 year history of the Canadian National in statistical returns can be only superficial if one is a layman. However, there are a number of factors I should like to see the board of directors take into consideration. One is the fact that the Canadian Pacific has had more success in keeping down the relationship between payroll and total expenditures than has the Canadian National. I think that we need a candid summation of this by the board of directors and the presentation of some kind of information to this house on this particular matter.

There are quite a number of indications in a comparison between the two railways which would lead one to believe all has not been well with the management of the Canadian National in terms of efficiency. I am a believer in public enterprise. I think it can be very good, and I do not think it has to take a back seat to private enterprise. However, the figures with which one is faced when one compares the Canadian National with the Canadian Pacific can only lead a fairly gullible layman like me to be very critical of the management and directors of Canadian National Railways. I would hope, for that reason that the people who would come from across the country to form this larger board would take a fresh look at the Canadian National and, if this government will not remove Mr. Gordon, ascertain whether or not his performance can be jacked up.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, we have just heard the hon. member for Laurier in this debate make a series of remarks which I think have been more fitting if they were found in "Alice in Wonderland", because they lack logic; they lack common sense. They were full of fantasy. I agree with the hon. member for Port Arthur when he says that the committee's report was unanimous. We heard nothing from the hon. member for Laurier when we were meeting in camera discussing this subject. We did not hear very much from him in respect of this point in the open committee meetings. The committee's report was unanimous in so far as the recommendation for an increase in the number of directors was concerned. We did not state the number. In fact, I believe that the increase from seven to 12 is too small an increase and I shall advance reasons why I think that way.

Perhaps it is unfortunate that we have a free enterprise company to compare with this crown corporation. However, the comparison is certainly an interesting one. The Canadian Pacific has a 24 member board of directors and seven members of the executive committee. So far no speaker mentioned the executive committee. The executive committee is a committee which ratifies the actions of the senior executive of the company, in this case Mr. Donald Gordon. We were told there was an executive committee of three and that the composition of the executive committee could be different each month. There would be three directors, that is two directors and the president.

We were also treated to a dissertation by the hon. member for Laurier on how the Canadian National Railway was set up. It would be a free enterprise company which would operate outside of the control of the department. The minister would report to parliament on behalf of the company but would have nothing to say about its operations. This provision was made in order to give the company all the advantages of a free enterprise operation and to keep it free of restrictions. The purpose was to enable Canadian National to compete with Canadian Pacific. We have seen the measure of their competition in the balance sheets. These balance sheets reveal that something is sadly lacking some place in the organization.

We were told in the committee, coming back to the setting up of this company, that it was not for politicians or members of parliament to put their noses into the business of this company, that this was part of the function of the management and we were simply there to receive the report of the management on the way the railway had been operated. Whether the company had good public relations with its employees, with its customers and with the general public of Canada, did not matter; we were there simply to receive reports. Last year, for the first time, this committee came out with some suggestions. This government has a record of having good work performed by the committees. I refer hon. members, in this regard, to the estimates committee, the public accounts committee and many other committees that have made suggestions which have been acted upon and adopted by the government, suggestions which have been good. These suggestions have come from the rank and file members of this house. We are operating in a way that the former government did not know, and it is apparent that we—

Mr. Deschatelets: Why don't you talk about the industrial relations committee?

Mr. Broome: Why don't you get yourself on the committee and get in there and do some work; that is the way in which you can do some useful work instead of criticizing all the time. We are making contributions, whereas contributions on the part of the members of the Liberal party are notably lacking. They have been so dragooned over the years that they have not an original thought left, none of them.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is getting excited.

Mr. Broome: The hon. member laughs because he knows as a former minister how well he did his job. To come back to the composition of the board of directors may I say this. The hon. member for Port Arthur is quite right. It was requested that the directors appear before the committee, but for various reasons it was felt that they should not do so. But they did come up with this operation which has all the advantages of free enterprise and has none of the disadvantages, not one. In a free enterprise system, if your management is not competent or if your management does not produce the results you wish you change them, because they report to the shareholders and the shareholders are interested in the efficient operation of the company.

In this case, the management reports to the executive committee and if the executive committee is not in agreement with the management, management can change that executive committee. The executive committee of the Canadian National Railways are three, and they need not be the same three except for the president. The executive committee of the Canadian Pacific are seven out of a total board of directors of 24. We have on the C.N.R. three out of a total board of seven. If you wish to talk about the officers you find that in the C.N.R. we have 43 officers and in the C.P.R. we have 19 officers. If you want to talk about railway operations only, leaving out ancillary operations of the C.P.R., and if you wish to compare the railway operations, what do you find? This is what you find, and I will give the round figures. In the C.N.R. in 1960 there was total operating revenue of $963 million; operating expenses, $955 million; net revenue, $7.5 million. The C.P.R. in the same period, 1960, there were revenues of $457 million; expenses of $423 million and net earnings of close to $34 million. If you want to go back to 1959, you find on the C.N.R. $740 million on the revenue side, $720 million on the expenses side and $19 million on the revenue side. On the C.P.R. in the same period you find $477 million of revenue, $441 million of expenses and $36 million of net earnings from railway operations alone.

The hon. member for Laurier felt that in this time of unemployment the directorship should not be increased. The Liberals would bring in unemployment no matter what we are discussing. They have got to drag in unemployment on everything, they can think of nothing else. The hon. member brings in unemployment and he refers to the substantial fees of the directors. I may say frankly that I do not think the fees of the directors of the C.N.R. are high enough. They certainly are not substantial. In this the hon. member for Laurier is not any more accurate than he was when he raised a question in the house this morning with regard to the Vanguard and wanted to know why the T.C.A. did not have the same number of pilots on the Vanguard as there are on Vanguard operations in the United States where none operate.

Mr. Chevrier: What has this to do with the question?

Mr. Broome: This is a bad day for the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: On the contrary.

Mr. Broome: The hon. member is out of step with the facts. He is out of step with his own party or, rather, responsible members of it. He talks about curtailing expenses on the part of the public, he says that the public are against curtailing C.N.R. expenses and by inference that means that the public desire that there should be a deficit on the part of the C.N.R. This is what it means. He means that the C.N.R. is not to be made a profitable, efficient operation. He says that they should go further into the hole than they are now going, that nothing should be done, and that if this increase in the board of directors is of advantage to this railway he, the hon. member for Laurier, is against it. That is the only inference that can be drawn. Let me tell the hon. member for Laurier that the taxpayers of Canada want the C.N.R. to be a good, well run, efficient operation.

Mr. Chevrier: So does everybody.

Mr. Broome: He had better—

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member is talking through his hat.

Mr. Broome: —keep in mind that the public know that we have had deficits totalling hundreds of millions of dollars. We must try to improve the management of this operation, and to do so not from the point of view of operations alone, but also from the point of view of relations with the public and their employees, and they certainly need better relations in those two fields. This government proposes to increase the number of members among other things in order to do this.

Then we get into this funny story about 12 members and how you break them up among the provinces, how will you do justice to Quebec and what the Minister of Transport has said on previous occasions in this regard, according to the hon. member for Laurier. What I say to the minister is this: "Pick the best men you can across Canada regardless of where they live". We are fed up with this sort of gobbledygook from the Liberals. Let the minister pick good men and we will have a chance of having a good operation for once. We never would have this under the thinking of the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: Pick good Tories.

Mr. Broome: He talked about representation according to population; so we divide up the people of Canada and this part will be entitled to half a director, that part to a director and another part to a third of a director. This is fantasy and fairyland talk. I am rather ashamed of the hon. member for Laurier for the part he took in this debate because up to this time I have had a sincere liking for the hon. gentleman. I have thought that he made a remarkably fine contribution to the debates in this House of Commons. Tonight I have changed my mind. I hope tomorrow the hon. member will reverse this stand he has taken and that I shall be able to maintain my former high opinion of him.

Not only should this resolution increase the number of directors, but later on the minister should set out that the C.N.R. shall have a strong functioning executive committee of the board of directors. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that of a C.P.R. executive committee of seven, three are officers of the company, namely the chairman and president and two vice presidents; and of the 24 directors of the C.P.R., 12 are from Montreal. I realize that there are certain variations that we would have to have in a crown operated company but we do not have to get into sectionalism. We do not have a company where each city such as Regina, Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg and Halifax must be represented. We need broad regional representation. This is the governing criterion. I therefore say to the minister that this is good, well-thought-out legislation which gives confidence to the committees of this house to do a better and better job, whether the Liberals like it or not. It gives a chance to take the C.N.R., with which I do not believe any of us are satisfied, and to put at the head of it a board of directors which will do a job, will exercise a certain amount of control, will give guidance and will help this railroad to do the job the people of Canada want it to do.

Mr. Chevrier: I think it is the practice, Mr. Chairman, when an hon. gentleman makes statements, such as those which have been made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, interpreting statements made by another hon. member, to take issue with them immediately. I take issue with the hon. gentleman because of the interpretation which he put on remarks which I made.

Mr. Broome: Hansard will show. I have a note.

Mr. Chevrier: All the hon. member need do is read Hansard and he will find out clearly, in black and white, what was said. I do not need the hon. member for Vancouver South to put words in my mouth to the effect that I am in favour of larger and larger deficits. That is not the case. That was not my statement, and the hon. member should know better than to misrepresent what was said by another hon. member.

Mr. Broome: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, Hansard will give the story. The hon. member for Laurier is saying that I misrepresented him. I have a note here which says, "curtailing of expenditure on the part of the C.N.R. was not in the public interest", or words to that effect.

An hon. Member: Who sent you the note?

Mr. Chevrier: Then the hon. member had better read carefully in Hansard what was said, or he had better listen to what is said by the hon. member for Laurier. He either was not listening or he was asleep.

Mr. Deschatelets: He was asleep.

Mr. Chevrier: I made no such statement as the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Broome: You said nothing about curtailing expenditure? You did not use those words?

Mr. Chevrier: Will you resume your seat. I gave you an opportunity to speak and I did not interrupt you.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I should be addressing the Chair, and I will do so. However, I made it quite clear that there was a deficit of the C.N.R. which amounted to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $65 million, and perhaps it would be higher because of the subsidies required, and I said this was not the time to increase the directors. That is the statement I made. My hon. friend should not be attempting, by the remarks he made, to misrepresent what other hon. members of the house have said, as he did a moment ago.

Then my hon. friend ridiculed the idea that this had anything to do with employment. I say to him that it has a great deal to do with employment. I say to him that when employment is being reduced on Canadian National Railways, this is not the time to increase the directorship.

Mr. Broome: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Broome: Do you mean it is not the time to increase the directorship because they will become more efficient, or what is the reason behind that statement?

Mr. Chevrier: The reason behind the statement is this, that when there is a curtailment or an attrition of employees on the Canadian National Railways it is not opportune to increase the number of directors to administer the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. That is the point I was making.

Then, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend complained about what had taken place in the committee. My intervention in committee, which I put on record, is quite clear. My hon. friend asked a question with reference to that matter, and I told him to ask the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. It may well be that he is in favour of increased directorship, and that is his responsibility. But saying that there was unanimity with reference to this resolution is not correct, because I was not present at the meeting.

Mr. Broome: That is right, and—

Mr. Chevrier: Just a moment. Had I been present at the meeting I would have opposed it, as I have opposed it down through the years; as the hon. member's own government has opposed it through the predecessor of the present minister. He has opposed it. I am sure that if the management were asked for their views, they would say exactly what we on this side of the house are saying. There may be a time when it will be necessary to increase the board of directors, but that time is not now.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to correct one thing. The hon. member for Laurier says there was not unanimity in the committee because he was not there, because if he had been there he would have opposed it, and therefore all of us who were there were not unanimous.

This, I beg to say, is exactly the type of reasoning he has used throughout his remarks in this debate. This is the reasoning, that had he been there he would have opposed it; he was not there, and therefore it was not unanimous.

Mr. Chevrier: A great argument.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I think the ground has been pretty fully covered and there is very little left for me to say. I wish to say at the outset that I am in favour of increasing the number of directors. Indeed, as another hon. member has already said, I would be very glad if the number of directors were raised above the present proposed number.

There are two reasons, I think, for having directors. One is that if the Almighty is kind you may get directors who are helpful in the management of the railway. The other more obvious and more certain reason is that if you are wise in your appointments you will get people who, by their prestige, and so on, will raise the reputation of the railway in the eyes of the business community and who through their business connections will bring business to the railway.

The hon. member for Port Arthur has pointed this out. He has said that perhaps it is not a situation that we think is ideal, but at any rate it is practical and inevitable and there is nothing improper about it. Incidentally, I can see no reason whatsoever why a crown corporation should not make full use of directors just as well as a private corporation.

In the authority we have set up for a national productivity council we have tried to get the best businessmen we can and the best labour men we can. They have been glad to come and serve.

I am not going to go through the objections which the hon. member for Laurier raised, except for one or two. I did find it difficult to follow him when he said that because this is a time of unemployment we should not be increasing the expenses of the railway.

No one wants to increase them by a dollar, of course. However, what we are talking about would at the most mean a few tens of thousands of dollars; perhaps less than that. If we were wise and got people who were worth their salt, they might very well make suggestions and bring business which would result in hundreds of thousands, and perhaps millions of dollars of business being brought to the railway. If I may say so with deference to the hon. member for Laurier, his point in this respect seemed to me to be quite unreal.

One thing he did not say, which I was glad he did not say and I was afraid he might say, was that these appointments will be political, and will not be good appointments.

In my opinion the appointments that have been made are excellent. Mr. E. W. Bickle died regretted by everybody. I think he was a great asset to the railway. We have no reason to think that we will not get other men of the same calibre. If we can get such people, we should do so, and I do not see any reason why we should not. People like this would play a real part in building up the railway.

One point has been made which is real and which should not be ignored. I know nothing about this, but I think this statement was made by the hon. member for Laurier. The hon. member said that the full-time officials of the railway would not be so keen to get additions to the board.

Here I am just thinking out loud. I can imagine that if the executive heads thought they were going to have let loose on them a lot of undesirable people who could not contribute, they might very well not want them. But I would bet my shirt that a man like Gordon—whom I regard as a great businessman—if you matched him with men of his own ability on that board, I venture to say he would be glad to have them.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Chairman, we have heard an interesting political speech by the hon. member for Laurier. I must say that the Liberal party must be getting right down to the bottom of the barrel to try and make political advantage of a simple measure like this. But everybody certainly on this side of the house, and I am sure this applies to the hon. member for Port Arthur, is trying to do something about the C.N.R. to make it a more efficient operation.

I, too, have sat on the sessional committee. It was my understanding that this was a unanimous recommendation of the committee. Certainly we are very sorry that the hon. member for Laurier could not be there for all the committee meetings. However, at the same time we have to spend some time in these committees, we bring in recommendations and we are very pleased to see the government accepting this one.

I do not accept his premise that the management of the C.N.R. should be asked whether or not they would like an addition to the board of directors. It is my contention that perhaps we need a stronger, more efficient board of directors. I like the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver South, of an effective and perhaps little larger executive committee to scrutinize the decisions made by the officers of the C.N.R.

I think enough has been said about the foolishness of the argument of the hon. member for Laurier with regard to unemployment. I have one other remark I should like to interject here, that they have enough vice presidents now in the C.N.R. that they could lay off half a dozen without missing them very much. If they added some competent men from various parts of the country this might very well have the effect of providing management the stimulus that is required to make this railway run more efficiently, and to improve public relations, both with employees and members of the public, assisting the taxpayers in their problem of running this state owned railway.

I thought it rather amazing that the hon. member for Port Arthur, being the good socialist that he is, was apparently having a few agonizing pains because the free enterprise operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway was better. I think one of the reasons why that fact exists is because the management of the Canadian National Railways has, like some senior civil servants, been burdened by red tape. They might be able to do a more efficient job if they were aware of the fact that there was to be a searching inquiry made by a sessional committee of the House of Commons. In this regard, I am sure it will come to pass that we will acquire greater detailed information in respect of the operations of the railway, because this is the only overriding scrutiny to which management is subject.

Apparently another reason why the hon. member for Laurier spoke today against an increase in the directorship of the Canadian National Railways was because there had been reorganization of the railroads in respect of several districts, and for some reason or other it would be detrimental to this organization to have an increase in the directorship. I am unable to follow his thinking in that regard, because it seems to me that with this reorganization, it is vitally important that we have an increase in the board of directors. I am thinking particularly in regard to railway companies operating in northern Alberta. The Northern Alberta Railways is 50 per cent owned by the Canadian National Railways and very seldom has any representation on the Canadian National Railways' board of directors, yet the N.A.R. management makes decisions, or does not make them, as the case may be, and there is no check in this regard.

It seems to me, as I said at the outset, that the Liberal party, particularly the hon. member for Laurier, has been more effective at other times when there was something to take issue with, but the hon. members of that party tonight have been on very flimsy ground when they suggest they are opposed to this proposed legislation because the representation would not be proper geographically. The hon. member for Laurier has tried the old dodge of divide and conquer—if things are not right in Quebec, or western Canada, or other places, it will be bad politically. This was the impression he left with me. I am very sorry he has created that impression because I think it is an extremely weak position on the part of the official opposition. I suggest that this government be commended for accepting the recommendations of the committee, and I personally hope it will continue to do so in future.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything about this particular measure regarding whether there should be 12 or seven directors. I do not think it is of major importance, and I do not believe the hon. member for Laurier feels that it is a major matter. On the other hand, I think we both feel, as do most hon. members on this side of the house, that at a time when the president of the United States is visiting this country; at a time when we have the kind of economic crisis with which we are faced today in this country, we should be concerned with problems of more gravity. What have we been doing in this house today? We have been dealing with horse racing and dealing with the reneval of a stopgap bill regarding the rollback subsides to the railways because the government cannot make up its mind about this and what we are now dealing with is at best, a purely ancillary sort of thing which has been on the order paper for months. In other words, we are being asked to sit these long hours, not to consider the grave situation which faces this country today, but to deal with trivial things like this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say again that this is a pretty fair sample of the way this government is running this country, and an example of the kind of consideration it gives to managing the business of this country.

Mr. Winch: Who has done all the talking about it?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have explained to hon. gentlemen that I was speaking solely because of the speeches of the hon. gentleman for Vancouver South and the hon. gentleman for Jasper-Edson which really had nothing to do with whether there should be 12 directors or seven, but fundamentally were attacks on the management of the Canadian National Railways. What those hon. members have said is that the government is not doing its duty in supervising the Canadian National Railways properly; that the government was allowing the Canadian National Railways to get away with murder, and that is why they are supporting this bill. This is the inference I drew from the remarks made by those two hon. gentlemen. I do not want to be unfair to anyone, and if those hon. gentleman feel that is an unfair inference to draw they may say so. The hon. member for Vancouver South referred to the deficits of the Canadian National Railways which were getting higher and higher. I suggest there is nothing new about that situation because since there has been a Canadian National Railways, whenever there has been a Tory government, the deficits of that railway went higher and higher. Whether that is coincidence or cause and effect, I do not know, but it is the fact. I suggest the reason for that situation is that we have a Tory government rather than because we have seven instead of 12 directors.

If the management of the Canadian National Railways is as bad as the hon. member for Vancouver South and Jasper-Edson say it is, the government ought to have guts enough to change it. I do not think it is as bad as that, but if it is, the government should have the guts to change it, and I suggest they will not be changing it very much by appointing 12 directors rather than seven. Probably all that will result from this change will be that five Tory heelers will now have something to do with their spare time.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I hate to follow speakers on the government side and to pour salt on the wounds which they have exposed under the intellectual armour of the hon. member for Laurier, but shall have to do so later. First, however, having listened to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I am amazed that—if he is really sincere in the position he takes, that this is a small trivial matter—he felt it was necessary to make any intervention at all in this debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I explained why I intervened.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member may have explained to the satisfaction of some members, but I doubt if the majority of hon. members of this committee have been satisfied.

Having heard the hon. member for Laurier earlier today, and again recently, in connection with the very grave problems which he relates to the railways of this country, I thought that any measure at all by which this government could attempt to remedy the situation would be acceptable. I suggest one way of doing that is to attack this problem by organizing some change in the administration of the C.N.R.

I was disappointed, as was the hon. member for Vancouver South, in the attitude taken by the hon. member for Laurier on two instances. I was disappointed first in the stand he took when he opened the discussion on behalf of the opposition and, second, having listened to the very logical and devastating argument made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, I was satisfied that the hon. member for Laurier, in his second statement tonight, was going to tell us he had changed his mind, and that he was now convinced that this was a good and logical bill which the opposition was now going to accept. I was very much surprised that he did not do this.

Mr. Chairman, I will deal first with two of the points which were raised by the hon. member for Laurier. He suggested, as a possible reason why this bill should not be introduced, the fact that the previous minister of transport was not convinced, at the time it was discussed by the sessional committee last year, that this was an essential move. I do not know what took place in that committee, as I was not there, but will accept the statement read into the record by the hon. member. However, surely that is one of the trade-marks of this government and of this party—it is prepared at any time to accept recommendations of a committee when it can be shown that changes in policy, in legislation, and in programs are necessary and desirable. That is the trade-mark of the progressive thinking of the Progressive Conservative party. When changes are required we are prepared to advocate them, to put them in the form of legislation and to place them in the statute books of the country.

Second, the hon. member for Laurier was somewhat critical of what he thought might be the calibre of any new appointments which might be made provided this resolution and the legislation which will be based on it are passed. I think this is a place where the hon. member and members of his party should be very sensitive. After all, when a party has held office for 22 years it becomes tottering, sluggish, lazy and complacent. I always think of that analogy of the line of extinct volcanoes, which may well reflect the position of the previous government. That type of government is reflected in the appointments which they make. At this time I am certainly not going to specifically criticize the management of the Canadian National or any of the crown corporations, but in the dying days of a government which has held power for many years there is a tendency to make appointments which I fear are not in the best interests of the country; and certainly the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways, as it has been presented to this House of Commons from year to year, is the best indication of this fact.

I think of a crown corporation where you have an executive who is a permanent member of the directorate and where you have other directors who meet from time to time. There is a strong tendency—the likelihood is most extreme—that as this board meets, the policies advocated by the executive will be passed down to the directors without too much consideration. There should a continual change of directors. There should be a board of directors whose attitude is, "I am from Missouri; I must be shown that this is right and proper". I am satisfied that there has been too little of that in the past. This is one of the reasons why the position of this crown corporation has come to where it is today. I think we need fresh blood, new thinking and a new approach.

I certainly would go along with those hon. members who have suggested that we might seriously think of increasing the membership of the board of directors not to 12, but to a larger number. For example, I heard the hon. member for Jasper-Edson speak of the situation of the Northern Alberta Railway. That railway consists of approximately 1,400 miles, and for many years it has had no representation at all on the board of directors. This is an isolated but self-sufficient railway, and it should have some measure of representation on the board. I am not suggesting, for example, that 1,400 miles of railway, in relation to the total mileage of the C.N.R., would justify the Northern Alberta Railway having a separate director, or that the area which the Northern Alberta Railway serves ought to have a separate director, but this sort of reasoning seems to me sound and reasonable. We have not had enough of it in the past.

There is another reason I want to touch on as to the necessity for this change. Anyone who has examined the recommendations contained in the first report of the royal commission on transportation must be struck by their approach to this matter on a regional basis. For example, two of the recommendations which they make deal with the elimination in course of time of passenger traffic in certain areas and on certain lines where it has proven to be uneconomic. The same situation prevails also with regard to freight traffic in what they call low density traffic areas. The suggestion there is that an annual subsidy of $13 million should be payable over a period of 15 years. There has been a recommendation, also, that subsidies totalling some $62 million, subsequently scaled down in five years to 20 per cent of that amount, should be payable in respect of the elimination of the passenger traffic. Now surely, Mr. Chairman, that requires representation on the board of directors on a more varied, more regional basis so that those directors when they come to the board meetings should be able to reflect the thinking and the situation in their particular areas.

When it is necessary for the management of the Canadian National—and I assume the management of the Canadian Pacific—to make various applications to the board of transport commissioners with regard to the gradual elimination of those services, they should be made after adequate knowledge is brought to the board by a director or directors who have some indication of the feelings of the people in that area, who have some knowledge of the economic conditions and are prepared to place this knowledge and information and make their position clear in the board meetings. For this reason, if for no other, it is my sincere opinion that this legislation, when brought before the House of Commons, will be most timely and will be very effective in helping the Canadian National Railways to deal with the very vexatious problems which will confront them if and when they are required to implement these portions of the MacPherson royal commission report.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, the ground has been pretty well gone over as to the merits of appointing a greater number of directors to the board of the Canadian National Railways. There were, however, a few remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier that caused me some concern. As I recollect his remarks, he said to the minister he did not think the fact that a committee had recommended this was much of a reason for going ahead and doing it. It is a well-known fact that under the previous government committees did not play the part that they are playing at the present time. It has been the aim of the Prime Minister and the present government to build up the amount of work done and the contribution made to our proceedings by committees.

I feel the members of the Liberal party must have some great concern about this because, after all, their own work was put into that committee; they had some members on the committee and during the time that we discussed this matter I do not recall any objection being taken by any one of them. The hon. member for Laurier said he was not there or he certainly would have objected. But none of the other members objected to it and they were there.

Of course, the report was made to the house and there was another opportunity if the opposition wanted to object to it, at that time. I find it strange that we have not heard from any of the members of that party who were on the committee and endorsed the report. I would have thought there would have been a little more freedom within the Liberal party now that they are out of office. We know that that party had some rigidity while they were in office. I would have thought that certainly a party in opposition would have a backbencher who would be free to stand in his place and say something. I say it is very unusual that we have not seen any members of the committee from that party stand up and either agree or disagree with the hon. member for Laurier. I think that a further contribution would be made to this debate if we heard from some of those members who sat with us on the committee. Are they now going to get up and tell us we wasted our time sitting there; that they do not really think committees are much use after all. I do hope the government is not going to be in any way influenced by them.

I am sure the members of the Conservative party commend the government for the action it took to strengthen our committees and to enable backbenchers of the house to make some contribution to the proceedings of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Did the hon. member say "strengthen"?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): If the hon. member for Ottawa West has something to say now will he get up and take part in the debate and say what he thinks of the contribution of the members of his party in relation to the committee, the work which the hon. member for Laurier has said was useless, that they did not know what they were doing. In any event, committees really have not much to do with it, anyway.

I am not going to go over the arguments that have been made as to the merits of appointing directors. Of course, the suggestion made by the hon. member for Laurier that because employment on the railroad is going down we should not have an increase in directors is so ridiculous it is only an oddity because anyone who thinks about it would surely think if there would be any reason for strengthening the board of directors of the railway it would be that very fact. I cannot think of any thing that would cause us to want to make more efficient the management of the railway than that very thing, to try to protect the employment of the persons engaged on the railroad.

It was pointed out, of course, that in the case of other similar companies they all had much larger and more diversified boards of directors, and nobody has really got up to dispute that or to give any logical reasons why the C.N.R. board should not be enlarged. On the other hand, we have heard all the excellent reasons why it should be. I hope we will hear from some of the members of the Liberal party who served on that committee. I am most concerned that they should just say nothing and allow the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier to go unchallenged because this would make it appear that that committee was really wasting its time and that its recommendations should not be heeded.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Jasper-Edson placed an interpretation on my remarks and since it is popular today to put a gloss on the position that other people take for you may I say that I believe he indicated that I was agonized perhaps because as a socialist I find the C.P.R. doing better than the C.N.R. I want to put my view in a nutshell. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said that two members of the government were in effect making criticism of the management of the C.N.R. I am not taking that interpretation from it, but this is what I mean. I do not want the fact that I criticize the management of the C.N.R. to stand either as a reflection upon the employees in the main or to add to any merits that the C.P.R. may have.

When you have three divisional points in your constituency on one line and two on another you come to know some of the employees, and I do not believe that the ordinary brakeman, conductor or maintenance of way man on either railway is inefficient or bad or poor. I see very little to choose between them. The comparison I have in mind has to do with the statistics. Mr. Gordon always tells us that there is no point in comparing the statistics, that you cannot look at the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. We are gullible. We do not know. We cannot stand up against Mr. Gordon.

I pointed out this afternoon that for ten years he has been coming before committees and in the past the best M.P.s in the house have taken him on and he has always been able to confound them. He always makes an annual plea about free enterprise, that the C.N.R. is to be treated as a private corporation. Then he always manages to put over a homily about how you cannot really compare the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. Then we get another little homily that certain information cannot be revealed because that will impede the competitive position of the C.N.R. Quite frankly, Mr. Gordon may consider that I have a great deal of crust and gall and am probably wickedly irresponsible in saying that I have grave doubts about the management of Canadian National Railways. The fact remains, however, that I have this suspicion. We have recurring large deficits. As far as the railway workers throughout the country are concerned they are a morose group of wage earners. It is also my hunch that there is an unpopular public response to the railway.

Having said these things, may I say that I welcome the increase in the number of directors. There are other changes I would welcome more. When the board of directors is duly constituted I suggest that they should take a good look and find some means of comparison that we with our resources as members of parliament cannot find. There is a very definite legal fiction in relation to this whole business of the C.N.R. reporting to parliament rather than to the government. It seems to me that one of the things this house needs to do is to make up its mind that it is a legal fiction because if any member of parliament who is on the committee feels that with our present resources he is really capable of making a good analysis of Canadian National Railways, I think he has another think coming.

This being the case, it seems to me that we want to examine what I call this legal fiction that the C.N.R. is actually responsible to parliament in the sense that it reports to one of parliament's microcosms, the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping. This is the main reason why I welcome the idea of more directors. It may not be worth a hoot but I welcome the idea that we are going to have more directors and that they are going to be drawn from more places and have a greater variety of backgrounds. Maybe we can get some inkling as to why this huge mammoth concern is in the difficulties it is when, as so many people are fond of saying, it has this magnificent president and this great management team at the top.

Resolution reported.

Mr. Balcer moved that the resolution be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Chevrier: On division.

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and resolution concurred in.

Mr. Balcer thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-94, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF BANK LOANS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act to provide that the maximum amount of bank loans made during the period ending on the 30th day of June, 1962 shall be four hundred million dollars, an increase of one hundred million dollars.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution is to permit the introduction of a bill to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The bill is very brief. In a word the amendment provides for an increase of $100 million in the aggregate principal amount of guaranteed loans which may be made by all of the chartered banks during the existing lending period, April 1, 1959, to June 30, 1962.

[Mr. Fisher.]

The limit on guaranteed loans under the act now established in the legislation for this period is $300 million, and it is proposed to increase that amount to $400 million. From April 1, 1959, which is the commencement date of the current lending period, until February 28 last a total of 134,200 loans had been made amounting in round figures to $194 million. Lending has exceeded earlier expectations and there remains just over $100 million in this authorized lending pool for the remaining 16 months of this present term. If present lending trends continue, this amount will be insufficient to cover the total of loans which may be made between now and the end of the lending period.

The amendment is designed to ensure that an adequate supply of credit will be available to Canadian farmers for farm improvement purposes under the legislation. Hon. members will, I am sure, be gratified to know that the credit facilities provided by the act have proved so valuable and have been so widely used by Canadian farmers. I might refer hon. members to the annual report under the act for the year 1960, which has been tabled. The report indicates that there has been a substantial increase in lending during recent years and that the total of loans for 1960 of approximately $102 million represents an all-time annual record.

The bill to be founded upon the resolution, Mr. Chairman, is very brief. It will change one word in the act. This is the word "three" in section 5(d) of the act as amended in 1959 by chapter 25 of the statutes of that year. The bill will change the word "three" to "four".

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Finance, I am sure, will be gratified to learn that for once I quite agree wholeheartedly with something he is doing in this house. We on this side of the house are exceedingly proud of this piece of legislation which was part of the reconstruction program introduced by the Mackenzie King government and by that great finance minister, Hon. J. L. Ilsley, at the end of the war. The fact that this legislation is continuing to serve the Canadian people well, particularly that community to which it was directed, and has served as a model for another bill the minister introduced earlier this session that we also had pleasure in supporting, is I think a matter of gratification to a party which, according to the Globe and Mail, provides the ideas in this house.

Mr. Herridge: I rise to express our support for this resolution. I might say that we are rather pleased to notice that the minister comes before the committee, according to the act, to get authority to guarantee this 10 per cent of the additional funds that are required.

We are very glad that they are required. We support this measure wholeheartedly because it has played a very important part in the years since it was first made effective in assisting and developing the economic family farm. I think the experience of the administration since the act was given effect proves this piece of legislation has been very valuable to the farmers in this country who needed short term or intermediate credit.

I know quite a number of farmers in my own constituency who have utilized this act. I see that, according to the report, the purposes of the loans are, the purchase of implements—there is a considerable increase in that—the improvement and renovation of farm buildings; the purchase of livestock; the clearing and breaking of land—this is a section in which I am particularly interested and I will come back to it in a few minutes —and miscellaneous developments. According to the report, a remarkably low loss ratio is shown, about one tenth of 1 per cent. I think that is a remarkably low loss ratio. When the minister replies, I should like him to inform the committee what the loss ratio is on commercial loans from the banks under ordinary circumstances. The comparison would be very interesting. I think the loss ratio demonstrates the stability of the investments and the fact that the money is being loaned wisely.

First of all, I want to make a suggestion that I have made previously in connection with the clearing and breaking of land. I believe that farmers who borrow money to clear and break land should receive the same exemptions for the money expended in that direction as the gas and pipe line companies or oil companies receive under the Income Tax Act on the basis that they are bringing natural resources into production. I do urge the minister to give some consideration to this suggestion. I think the farmer who increases our agricultural production by breaking or clearing land, draining land or in some cases diking land, should receive the same consideration as these other companies under the Income Tax Act. I feel there are valid reasons for the consideration of these representations.

I should like to ask the minister if he has received any representations or suggestions from farm organizations in the last year in respect of the improvement of the administration of this act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not recall receiving any.

Mr. Herridge: Has the minister received any suggestions from the banks for the improvement or amendment of the legislation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not recently.

Mr. Herridge: Has he received any suggestions for improvement of the act from his own officials?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the legislation has been working satisfactorily. The hon. member is aware that these are government guaranteed bank loans and, so far as the officials of the department are concerned they are concerned with the administration of a loan toward which the crown stands in the relationship of a guarantor and not the original lender.

Mr. Herridge: Then I should like the minister, when he replies, to inform the committee what the normal procedure is when the government has to meet the guarantee for a certain loan. What is done then to attempt recovery of the loan after the government has met the guarantee? I am not quite clear about that.

I should like to know what information is sent out to farm organizations, and what advertising is done. The one criticism I have to make is that some bank managers are not quite alert in this respect. I have a letter on my desk which I received yesterday from a local bank manager who is interested in a dairyman who wants to take advantage of this act. The bank manager has informed him about it and told the dairyman what can be done. In other cases, however, I find bank managers are not fully acquainted with the benefits of the legislation or do not take the time to inform local farmers and farm organizations of the advantages of this act. What is done in the way of advertising? Does the Minister of Finance make a practice—I think it would be a good one—of making certain that the farm organizations receive literature? I am not suggesting that every organization should receive this literature, but the provincial sections of national organizations should receive it. Then, too, sufficient copies of the annual report should be sent to each local farm organization such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture branches, dairy organizations, livestock organizations and organizations of fruit growers, so that they would be distributed to the members. I think that would be very valuable.

I think the act could be utilized to an even greater extent. My major criticism is that a number of farmers I meet are not aware of this act. I cannot understand it. I think there is really a lack of information so far as local organizations are concerned.

Those are the remarks I have to make at this stage. Like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, we find we are a sort of happy family in supporting this legislation tonight. The suggestions I make are made in a good spirit, and I should like to hear from the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has asked about several points. As hon. members are aware, this legislation has been in existence now for some 17 years. It has been amended from time to time. It was originally introduced with a limit on the term of years for which it was in effect and with, of course, a ceiling on the extent of crown liability. This period has been moved forward. As the hon. member will recall, in 1959 we brought amendments before the house and those amendments enlarged the scope of the act. They moved forward the lending period. They fixed the total of permissible loans at $300 million and enlarged the maximum individual loan from the figure of $5,000, as it had been previously, to $7,500. These amendments have been very well received and have undoubtedly proved their usefulness to the Canadian people.

As to making the available facilities of the act known, I think it may be said that the facilities of this legislation are well known to the Canadian farmer today. It is a well established credit facility available to him. Pamphlets have been available through the rural branches of the chartered banks for a long time explaining the features of the act and the facilities that are available under its terms to the farmer.

The hon. member asks about the way in which the guarantee is administered. The act, of course, stipulates the total of loans that may be made in pursuance of its provisions. This total is not a revolving fund. It is a total of loans permitted in the particular lending period. In the earlier years of the act these were three-year periods. In 1959 we made the present period of three years and three months in order to bring it to June 30, 1962, which was thought to be a more convenient date for the house in the course of its sittings. The legislation fixes the extent of the crown's liability as guarantor in the 10 per cent provision which is to be found in section 4, subsection 1 of the act.

As to the guarantee itself, these loans, of course, are made by the banks and the individual branch bank is responsible for reviewing the suitability of the applicant and his eligibility for a loan. The ordinary tests as to credit worthiness of the applicant are in the hands of the local branch managers to enforce. Then the loans made under the act by the bank are reported to the department. Regular reports are submitted to the department and a record is kept there of the loans. There must be a record, of course, in order to be sure that the operations are carried on within the limits of and according to the terms established by the legislation.

When a default occurs it is, of course, the responsibility of the lending bank concerned to endeavour to enforce the terms of the loan. It is only when the bank has failed in its efforts to remedy the default that the claim would be made in pursuance of the guarantee. When the claim is made on the guarantee it is only after the bank has exhausted its normal remedies in its endeavours to collect, that the loan liability would be discharged by the guarantor, namely the crown. In that event the crown is subrogated to the rights of the lending bank so that if there were opportunity for recovery against the borrower, in that case the crown would be in a position to exercise the rights that had previously accrued to the bank under the terms of the loan. That is the procedure.

The hon. member for Kootenay West has pointed out the loss record under this legislation as being quite a remarkable one. The 1960 annual report at page 4 contains this instructive paragraph:

> Losses under this legislation continue to be low. During the year—

That is the year 1960.

> —209 claims for a total of $167,406 were paid. Since the inception of the legislation 1,752 claims have been paid for a total of $1,192,594. On the basis of a total of $1,013,782,362 lent, the loss ratio is approximately one tenth of 1 per cent.
> Recoveries of claims paid to date amount to $100,605.

To paraphrase what has been there stated in the report, the aggregate of loans made under this legislation since 1944 exceeds $1 billion. Yet in the 16 years of operation the number of claims on which default has been made with a resulting claim under the guarantee is just 1,752. The crown has paid in pursuance of its guarantees a total of $1,192,594; and the crown having paid out under its guarantees sums totalling that figure has made recoveries of $100,605.

Mr. Herridge: There is just one question that I overlooked and I hope the minister will not mind my asking it now. Has the minister recently received any representations from farm organizations with respect to any amendments to the legislation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; none that I am aware of. I think it is an indication of the fact that the legislation is working very satisfactorily.

Mr. Gundlock: When I speak on agriculture matters, I find that I am repeating myself. It seems that invariably I follow the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Kootenay West and it has been a pleasure to do so. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate indicated his happiness over the fact that during a certain period this original bill was instituted. I can only say that during another certain period the bill has been made most effective.

Following the hon. member for Kootenay West I have only this to say. I certainly agree with him and I enjoy his support. I just wish to state, putting it in simple language, that this increase of 25 per cent in the matter of farm improvement loans is to me a great step forward.

Recently, in other places connected with this house we have been told that this is a most wonderful piece of legislation, although possibly a little bit less than what it could be. I may say frankly that I refer to certain machine companies in certain discussions with regard to farm machinery prices. Time and time again it was stated by those particular companies that this very act itself had contributed much to the welfare of Canadian agriculture in particular. Their only comment was that it did not go quite far enough. I repeat what I said previously. I am very happy to bring this matter to the attention of the committee. The final over-all figure is increased.

There again I would call this statement to the attention of the very quiet group in the corner. They have so often talked about interest rates. On several occasions in the committee it was pointed out to us, and very reluctantly as a matter of fact, that the equipment companies do make arrangements to finance farm machinery purchases, and of course the rates of interest are from 10 to 11 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, in rising tonight in committee to support this measure we all realize that the rate of interest is 5 per cent. Most certainly we must all commend the government for increasing the total amount available under this measure to Canadian agriculture for the purchase of farm machinery, livestock and all the way down the line.

This means more aid and more support to Canadian agriculture, which particularly relates—and I again endorse some of the things said by hon. members who have spoken before me in this committee—to the small family farm. This question has come up so many times previously that I am not going to go into it and take the time of the committee tonight. However, by way of emphasis I should again like to say that this increase in the total amount most certainly enlarges the aid to and contributes to the betterment of the family farmer in Canada.

What I said the other night in supporting another bill might bear repetition at this time. It is certainly our duty to support the Canadian family farm, because as I emphasized at that time it is my conviction—and this has been borne out more and more as the legislation of this government takes form; perhaps not in completion, but as it takes form— that we can compete, and compete economically, particularly in light of the fact that such legislation is continually being brought forward and improved. In saying that I speak with all deference as a Canadian family farmer.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, hon. members of the committee have been very much in agreement on this resolution and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made a speech in which he commended the government for having continued Liberal policy.

I have noticed a tendency in the Department of Agriculture that when they are continuing what is really legislation that has already been placed on the statute books, they usually make some announcements about improvements that they say are exceedingly important and far-reaching. Then they change the title of the act in order that everyone will forget that the basic act had been passed by a former administration.

Although the Minister of Finance has not done this, I wonder why he has resisted this temptation, because he could have upped the extent of the provisions. He might have extended the definition of livestock to include other birds and animals that are not contained in the definition. He might have changed the title so we would forget that this act had been amended and improved.

The Minister of Finance might have changed the name of the act. It has been called the Farm Improvement Loans Act; he might have called it the farm development act, or the farm bank credit act, and then we could have forgotten the bad record of the former administration—

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister does not want to take away the simple pleasures of the opposition.

Mr. Argue: I am glad the Minister of Finance takes this very practical attitude and has not changed the name of the act. However, I think there are certain improvements that could be made in the act.

We are very pleased that the government is increasing the aggregate sum that may be loaned by the banks with this guarantee. I think that not only the lending history under this act demonstrates that this move should be made, but information coming to us in the agricultural committee indicates that this particular act should be used much more extensively than has been the case.

One of the witnesses before the agricultural committee, a witness for the farm implement dealers, was asked a question, if I remember correctly, as to what proportion of loans for financing the purchase of farm implements was made under this act. His reply was 25 per cent. Therefore according to this gentleman 75 per cent of the money loaned for the purchase of farm implements is either provided by the implement companies themselves, by finance companies, or perhaps to some extent by credit unions.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Not necessarily.

Mr. Argue: My hon. friend can make his speech later. He says, "Not necessarily". I think it follows from that statement that a very large proportion of the implements being sold today are being financed by the companies themselves.

I would be interested in obtaining information on this particular point if the Minister of Finance has that information. I do think it is an important point in assessing the relative value of this legislation. We are all in favour of it and we think it is good legislation. We are not quarrelling with it. However, it would be interesting, if the minister has this information, to know what proportion of farm implements are being purchased through financing under this act, or alternatively are financed by the implement companies themselves through their own credit corporations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I certainly have not the figures on those points, but I can say to the hon. member that approximately 80 per cent of the loans made under the terms of this act are used for the purpose of assisting in the purchase of implements.

Mr. Argue: Of course, the minister understands very well that he is not answering my question. All he is saying is that this act in the main is used for the financing of farm implements. However, the minister does not have the information and I am not being critical.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Argue: Surely.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Does the hon. member suggest that all loans made by banks for the purchase of farm implements are made under the terms of this act and that none are made on the normal security of debtor and creditor?

Mr. Argue: No, I would not say they are, but I would think the vast proportion are made under this act. If the hon. gentleman has information on this point that he can give the committee, I would certainly be pleased to hear it. My own impression at least, from talking to farmers, is that farm implement loans are generally financed under this act.

Mr. Gundlock: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Certainly.

Mr. Gundlock: Are you speaking for western Canada?

Mr. Argue: I am speaking about western Canada, yes. The figure I referred to was given to the committee. I do not know that it applied particularly to western Canada.

However, there has been growing up in recent years a practice by farm implement companies themselves to finance a very substantial proportion of their own farm implement sales.

This is of course important to them and it is important to the dealers, because it makes it possible for them to make sales that perhaps otherwise would not be made. But it is very expensive for the farmer; it means a higher cost for the financing of farm implements. We were told the rates were in the neighbourhood of 12 per cent, and certainly to finance farm implements through the farm implement companies themselves would cost twice as much—perhaps more than twice as much—as the cost under this legislation.

I think it is very much in order that we should increase the total amount of money that may be loaned under this act in the hope that the banks will be lenient, that they will promote this kind of loan, and that the implement companies and the farmers will make use of these facilities. I think there is probably a tendency on the part of banks to make loans with guaranteed higher interest rates, although I understand they have changed this policy. I certainly think it is correct to say, with the existence of policy generally restricting bank credit, banks will put the squeeze or lid on this kind of loan, and enforce the same kind of control as is enforced in respect of other types of loans.

This is good legislation and should be continued. I feel there will be ample money available under the act to cover loan needs of agricultural producers. I repeat again now, something which I have stated in discussions of this type of measure in the past, that I feel very strongly that guarantees which are given to banks, under this and other legislation, should be given to credit unions.

The minister may say that credit unions have not asked for this type of legislation. He may also say, as he has said before, that credit unions are not under the jurisdiction of the federal government. He may be able to give many reasons why he disagrees with the suggestion I have made. I made this proposal when another bill was before the house guaranteeing bank loans to small businesses, and the minister of finance, of that day, said that credit union spokesmen and representatives had not asked for this type of guarantee. I feel those representatives were a little slow and not perhaps completely up to date regarding the matter, because after that legislation had gone through the House of Commons and was before the banking committee of the other place, representatives of a co-operative union said that under certain circumstances they would like these guarantees to apply to them. While the minister was absolutely right when he said that credit unions had not asked for this guarantee, they did ask for—not full guarantees across the board—guarantees under certain circumstances. I am sure the day will arrive when guarantees under this kind of legislation will be given to credit unions. I think the fact of the matter is that not only has the government itself been reluctant to provide this type of guarantee, the credit unions themselves have been slow in asking for it and in coming to the conclusion that it should apply to them.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member another question? Would credit unions be willing to lend money at the same rate of interest provided under this legislation?

Mr. Argue: To secure an answer to that question, I feel we should direct it to the credit unions themselves. Perhaps we could also ask whether guarantees would be given to credit unions if the interest rates were higher, but only the minister can state government policy. Credit unions provide loans at something more than 5 per cent, and they provide insurance on the loans. That is certainly something which is worth while.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Is the hon. member intimating that the Conservative government is smarter and further ahead than credit union management?

Mr. Argue: If the hon. member wishes to take that implication from what I have said, he may. I do not think it was inferred. I think credit union representatives are ahead of the minister, but the minister was correct in saying that they had not asked for guarantees.

I feel that guarantees such as are provided under this act should also be made available to credit unions. The hon. member asks whether credit unions will lend the money at this low rate of interest; I am not sure that they can, because credit unions in the area from which I come are lending money at rates of interest in excess of this. Some charge about 7 per cent interest, but they pay patronage dividends. They pay dividends to the individuals who borrow the money. However, I do feel that credit unions, at least under certain circumstances, would be able to lend money at this rate of interest, but they should be allowed to speak for themselves. I think representatives of credit unions should be allowed to appear before the banking and commerce committee in order to explain to members of parliament why they should or should not like guarantees such as are provided under this and other acts. I look forward to the day when credit unions in this country are given the same kind of guarantees as are given to banks. I look forward to the day when credit unions occupy an even larger portion of the lending field and, in fact, become the people's bank, owned and operated by membership, and feel that when that day arrives they will carry out a very useful service providing money at rates of interest certainly lower than the rates of interest now being charged by small loans companies after having paid dividends. I refer to interest rates much lower than those charged now by implement companies.

I suggest also that banks should be more lenient in the provision of loans under this act. I feel it is a disgrace to the banking system, to the government and to parliament, that institutions, charging interest rates of 10 or 12 per cent, should be occupying, to a larger and larger degree, that area of farm implement lending.

The interest rate provided by this legislation is very reasonable. The resolution which was introduced when the last amendments to this act were made did not initially contain a limit on interest of 5 per cent. Some hon. members worked very hard to have the 5 per cent limit placed in that legislation, and we are very glad that this has been done, and feel this is the kind of interest rate that should be provided.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about this resolution. I believe this is wonderful legislation. Increasing money for loans from $300 million to $400 million will be of great assistance to the young farmers in the Peace river district of my constituency. In that area we have 1 million fertile acres, the finest land in the world. Wheat grown in that area has five times won the championship of the world at the Chicago exhibition, which finally barred one Herman Trellee from entering a sample from the Peace river country.

Not long ago we had people from the United States coming into the area buying up the ranch land. Young farmers want to buy their fathers out because they have cultivated the land, worked it and know exactly how to farm it. They wish to stay in the farming business and, to do so, like to buy out the old man, and the old man wants to go into town to retire. These old gentlemen are in the age group that I am in, around 70, and are getting too old to do the hard work, and the young fellows want to take over. Naturally they want to take over those farms on which they have been raised and have made a living and the farming methods for which they understand. I suggest that no one is a better farmer than the boy who has been raised on the farm.

The Peace river country, as I have said, is wonderful country consisting of a million acres. When I look out over the Ottawa countryside and see this stony land it makes my heart bleed. These are good hard working people, and that country would be an asset to Canada. Land is a thing that is needed. We need more money. The sum of $400 million is fine, but let us get it up to $500 million.

Like the last speaker, I think the co-operatives should come under this legislation. We have one of the largest co-operatives in Canada at Dawson Creek. Hon. members can check and see whether I am right. Some hon. members laugh, but we have the largest co-operative store in Canada. We are not out in the bush, you know; we are located in the finest farming country you ever saw. Those people came in just the other day with 2,600 ewes. They lost 14 bringing them in. If we can kill off New Zealand in so far as their lambs are concerned, why we can raise all of the lambs necessary for all of western and eastern Canada.

I just wish to compliment the minister on this fine resolution and I hope we get more money still. Thank you.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I should like to say a few words on this particular resolution. I realize that it may well be a necessity because of the amount of loans made in the past two years. The sum of $98 million was borrowed in 1959 and $101 million in 1960. If another $100 million, or a little more, is loaned in the coming year we shall well exceed the limit which, as I understand it, is now $300 million. Therefore this legislation is certainly a necessity. The maximum amount must be increased to $400 million.

In looking over the report of the farm improvement loans board tabled in the house by the minister I find that on page 7 it suggests that the banks have given the fullest co-operation toward meeting the credit requirements of agriculture generally. Before the committee on agriculture the farm implement dealers suggested that as early as May 1959 they sought other ways to provide credit for farmers to purchase agricultural machinery. This is interesting because in 1958 this government increased the amount of the loans, as has been mentioned already, from $5,000 to $7,500. It is interesting to note on page 10 of the 1960 annual report that the loans jumped from $69 million in 1957 to $90 million in 1958, to $98 million in 1959 and to $101 million in 1960.

Five years before the maximum was increased the maximum amount loaned out in any one year never exceeded $70 million. Certainly, the extension of the amount loanable from $5,000 to $7,500 did give quite an advantage to a large number of farmers with respect to the amount of the loan for the purchase of agricultural machinery. It certainly was welcomed by the machine companies themselves.

I had grave doubts, Mr. Chairman, and wondered whether perhaps this would not simply allow the well established farmer to borrow more money. I am pleased to see that, according to the annual report of 1960, at page 4, there were 28,774 borrowers who had not previously obtained farm improvement loans. I think this is a welcome figure and it accounts for 42 per cent of the number of loans made. Therefore, I might suggest that perhaps new farmers are coming into the borrowing field at all times, and perhaps more farmers are taking advantage of the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

I might say that at times I have been a bit disturbed about how this legislation is administered and how the operations of some banks have limited the amount of the loan under the act. I notice in the 1959 report that the Bank of Commerce loaned less money in 1959 than in 1958. It was one of those banks that was perhaps lending money, or lending a greater share of its money, to more lucrative business. I think that to a greater extent the banks could lend money to farmers who, through necessity or a desire to get ahead, have branched out and accepted part-time jobs besides their farm work. Some banks have a tendency to limit loans to this type of part-time farmer, and other tenant farmers have found it difficult to borrow money because they do not have a secure title to the land. They may have a long term lease of it, but the banks have been reluctant to lend to them because in the next year or two they may be somewhere else or in some other farming community or district.

I notice that on page 7 of the annual report it is suggested that the terms of the loans and the rate are 5 per cent per annum. The hon. member for Assiniboia suggested that when this measure was brought into the house in 1958 there was some suggestion of changing the interest rate. Well, he was mixed up as usual. What he was referring to was the Farm Credit Corporation and not the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I am not really surprised because the hon. member for Assiniboia has been taken in this house to be an agricultural expert. But he is so far away from the farm that I do not think he could tell a tractor from a combine, let alone a kernel of wheat from a kernel of barley. Therefore, it is quite normal to expect him to get mixed up between a Farm Credit Corporation loan and a farm improvement loan, which are two different things entirely. The one is a loan from the government, the other is a loan through the bank for a smaller amount, mainly toward the purchase of machinery.

The hon. member went on to talk about credit unions and co-operatives taking advantage of this legislation. I do not think there would be any objection to that if they became a chartered bank and loaned at the same interest rate. I do know the farmers would welcome another lending institution from which to borrow. I know the credit unions are sometimes short of lending money but some of the large co-operatives have quite a bit and are able to back a lot of insurance companies and so on, particularly those in Saskatchewan. Therefore, they might well have the financial resources to enable them to become a chartered bank, or set up a chartered bank and get under this act. I do not know, but I would welcome it if they did.

One of the things that I should like to see taken into greater consideration under this act while they are expanding the amount to be loaned under it is a change in the attitude of banks toward lending money toward the purchase of machinery. Some of the banks have a tendency to lend money toward the purchase of new machinery or practically new machinery. I know it is difficult for a farmer. He might see a tractor that is five years old. A lot of five year old tractors are pretty good machines and they could be picked up at pretty reasonable prices; but it is sometimes difficult for a farmer to get a farm improvement loan on a five year old tractor. Banks are a little hesitant about putting out the money. They would like to see the farmer purchase a new tractor, and they would give a farm improvement loan on a new tractor. But oftentimes a farmer can borrow a lot cheaper on a five year old tractor and he can buy it a lot cheaper. I realize that you can pick up many lines of machinery that are one, two, three years old. But when you get in the five to ten year class, a lot of bankers are very reluctant to lend under this act on these particular types of machines.

I also notice in the annual report that a greater number of loans are being made for livestock. Actually, in the past three or four years, whether we like it or not, the cow has become a very stable sort of financial investment for farmers, particularly in western Canada and, I might say, in all of Canada. There is no safer place to invest a dollar bill than in a cow. I think the banks could make a substantially greater amount of loans toward livestock purchases. Recently a lot of feeder associations have been established which are making loans for the purchase of livestock by cattle feeders and other farmers who wish to purchase livestock but these farmers must pay 6¼ per cent on the borrowed money. If they could borrow the money under the Farm Improvement Loans Act they would only have to pay 5 per cent interest and the cattle would be theirs. If they decided to keep them for an extra year they would not run into any difficulty if they met their payments on their loans and they would have a greater length of time to pay the money.

I notice that farm improvement loans are repayable within four years but that the maximum period is ten years. I must say that in my experience of farm improvement loans the limit in most cases has been three years although with the extension in the amount that can be borrowed from $5,000 to $7,500 the banks have tried to extend the period to four years and possibly five years. I think it would be a very rare exception where they would extend the period to the maximum of ten years and I wonder how many times they have actually done so.

I was interested in learning that before the agricultural committee one of the farm machinery companies had suggested that 38 per cent of the machines purchased through their dealers in western Canada last year were financed by their own finance company. To me this was a surprising and shocking statement because these farmers were borrowing money at an interest rate of 11 per cent. I would think that if the banks were willing to co-operate and lend to the fullest extent on new and used machinery the great field of machinery financing into which the machinery companies are stepping would be absorbed under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Some members may wonder why I emphasize a greater amount of lending for secondhand farm machinery. Today in western Canada, and I think the same holds true for all of Canada, I know that there are two secondhand tractors sold for every new one or possibly three or four in the case of some dealers. Therefore when I look at the annual report and see that 26,000 tractors were purchased last year I wonder how many of those were used machines and how many were new. With respect to used machinery particularly, the finance companies which are part and parcel of the machine companies are moving into this field at a rapid rate. In fact, some dealers have told me that the only way they can move stock is to find somebody whose credit rating at the bank is not good enough and who is willing to take secondhand machinery such as they have on their lots at the company's terms, which means an interest rate of 11 per cent. Therefore I think the greatest area for expansion under the Farm Improvement Loans Act is to give greater consideration in the case of secondhand machinery and also in the case of livestock loans and permitting farmers to purchase livestock on a three-year basis. To my way of thinking this would be very helpful to anybody wanting to purchase what might be termed a basic herd. Three years is a relatively short period to pay for a basic herd and this period could well be lengthened to the maximum of ten years if the farmer had that kind of credit rating.

A few years ago livestock prices were fluctuating a little more than is the case today. The farmers of western Canada all remember the foot and mouth disease outbreak and the drastic drop in cattle prices after that occurrence. Today, however, there is a floor price on cattle and the market will not depress completely. Therefore there is not nearly the risk in investing money in cattle that there was in 1952 when a great number of feeders in western Canada went completely bankrupt because there was no floor under cattle and prices dropped substantially.

I have very little more to say than that I hope the banks will make a real effort to extend credit in the areas I and other members have mentioned tonight. I hope that the farmers will take greater advantage of the 5 per cent interest rate rather than turning to the finance companies set up by the machinery companies. Last year and in years past the finance companies have been making substantial profits. It might be interesting to note that Traders Finance made as much money as the average chartered bank in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am going to raise a point of order. We are being asked to sit exceptionally long hours and I should like to know whether this filibuster is going to go on all evening on this measure on which everyone is agreed and with respect to which the hon. member quite obviously is trying to put in time on something that has no relation whatever to the measure before us.

Mr. Jones: On the point of order, is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate going to deny to hon. members in this chamber the same opportunity to speak? Surely he speaks enough in this chamber. My friend who has the floor is not one of those who has the opportunity to speak every day and when he speaks he usually has something to say—

Mr. Chevrier: He certainly makes a lot of noise.

Mr. Jones: —unlike the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who monopolizes a good deal of the time of the house. I suggest that the point of order he has raised is completely spurious.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to hear the Conservative whip on this point. He has been busy getting people to filibuster.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Perhaps I have used a little more time than I intended when I got up to speak but this subject is dear to my heart. I have borrowed a lot of money. I have bought a lot of machinery through farm improvement loans. I know what it is like to go to a banker and ask him to extend me credit under this act. In fact, I would say I have taken the fullest advantage of the act, and I know some of the difficulties farmers are having in borrowing money under the act.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate objects to members speaking in this house. Whenever a government member speaks he says we are filibustering some piece of legislation. It is the same thing in committees. I have sat in committees with him such as the broadcasting committee. If government members speak they are wasting time or filibustering something or asking frivolous questions. The hon. member interjected with a rude point of order that I was not speaking to the particular legislation. Actually I thought I was. I was suggesting some fields that could well be covered by the banks in lending this extended amount of money. I beg to differ with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I suggest I was speaking to the resolution. I realize that the hon. member cannot grasp and does not know anything with respect to what I am talking about.

Mr. Pickersgill: I agree.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is quite understandable because he knows very little about a lot of things pertaining to western Canada and agriculture in particular. I hope I have not bored him too much. Maybe if he will study what I have said about farm improvement loans he will glean some information from my remarks. I think I have said about all I wish to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order that was raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, may I say that I am sure the committee realizes there was nothing personal in the remarks he made. He made an interjection which he had every right to make. It was quite obvious to those of us who sit on this side of the house that my good friend, my distinguished friend, the whip on the other side was whipping up members in order to get them to filibuster this measure. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was quite right when he said that if we are going to be asked to sit long hours in connection with the business of the house, then an unusual length of time should not be taken up in discussing measures and particularly in a repetition of the speeches on these measures, such as has occurred here.

Mr. Pallett: Since the hon. member brought my name into this discussion, I may say that I feel after his demonstration last Saturday he is the last person who should indicate that the privileges of this house are being abused.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I should like to speak for a minute to this point of order. It has been suggested that my speech was whipped up by the party whip. No whip ever came to me and asked me to speak on this subject or any other subject. I got up and spoke on this subject for 20 minutes without any notes. I was not making a repetitious speech. I referred to the need for an extension of the provisions of this measure. I corrected several frivolous errors made by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I referred to the need for greater loans on secondhand machinery, and no other member mentioned this topic. I spoke on a subject about which I have more knowledge than you or any other member sitting over there.

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize very sincerely to the hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Don't let it happen again.

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize very sincerely to the hon. member. I am sure that the hon. member needs no coaching from anyone in this house, and I exonerate the whip from having coached the hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. Kindt: My intervention may incur the wrath of the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, but if they will bear with me for a few minutes I promise not to delay matters much longer.

Mr. Chevrier: No longer.

Mr. Kindt: I should like to add to the discussion of this topic because, like the hon. member who spoke before me, this subject is dear to my heart. I have used farm improvement loans many times. I am familiar with the work performed by this measure. I want to say that it is doing a grand job in the farming areas of western Canada.

I should like to add a word or two on the need for a greater amount of intermediate credit. The period of the loan should be extended perhaps by a year or two. In other words, the great need of the farm population is intermediate credit. On many occasions bank managers who make loans are inclined to squeeze down the period of repayment of the loan and to make it too short for the farmer to make a return on his operations and repay the loan. I would suggest that if there is one thing the Minister of Finance might take up with the banks, it would be the lengthening of the period of repayment of the loans in order to cope adequately with the need for intermediate credit.

There is one other point I should like to make. The regulations which are written by the farm improvement loan administration contain a provision permitting the bank manager to make loans for the purchase of new buildings. Further along in the same regulations there is a provision which permits bank managers to make loans for the purchase of secondhand buildings. These two provisions are set apart in the regulations. I found in one instance that a mistake had been made by one of the banks in that they turned down the request of a farmer for a loan to purchase a secondhand building. At Claresholm, Alberta, several buildings were offered for sale by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. The bank manager in one nearby town turned down a request for a loan simply because he did not read far enough in the regulations to ascertain that a loan could be made under a later section in the regulations.

My only purpose in mentioning this incident is to make a constructive suggestion to the Minister of Finance. When the regulations are rewritten, it would be helpful to have a cross reference on these two particular sections, the one dealing with authority to purchase new buildings and the other dealing with authority to purchase secondhand buildings. These two sections should be brought together by some kind of cross reference in order to avoid the possibility of bank managers making mistakes. I thought I should take up the matter with the Minister of Finance because this cross reference would make a very worth-while addition to any new regulations issued for the guidance of bank managers.

In closing, I want to say that I heartily support the measure which is now before the committee. I feel that one of the finest things this government can do is to increase the amount available for lending under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Smallwood: I shall try not to make too long an outburst at this time, but I should like to spend a few minutes, with the permission of the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, in speaking to this measure. This act has proven quite successful in my community. The farmers are using the farm improvement loans to a great extent. They are not having any trouble with the bank. We see the machinery companies charging 11 per cent interest. In most instances when farmers go to these machinery companies their credit is not too good at the banks.

We must admit that we are handling a great deal of the people's money because the government is guaranteeing these loans to the banks. It is the bank's responsibility, therefore, to see that they obtain good security before making these loans. In some parts of the province the farmers use the improvement loan to buy cattle. Then, when they have used the loan to buy cattle they find that they need some new machinery. They buy this through the machinery company and they have to pay a high rate of interest. Thank goodness we are living in a free country. It is the farmer's business whether or not he wants to buy his machinery through these machinery companies and pay a high rate of interest. Some people would like to dictate to us in this country and tell us what we should do. We do not want that to take place.

These farmers who use the credit made available by the machinery companies are also protected by life insurance. There is one instance in particular of which I know where the farmer had bought machinery through the credit of the implement company. Even before taking delivery of the combine he was seized with a heart attack. However, through borrowing money in this way his combine was completely paid for and the wife did not have that debt hanging over her head. On the other hand, if the money had been borrowed through the bank she would have been responsible for this liability. I heard the thought mentioned tonight that the provisions of the act should be extended to buying cattle. I understand from the minister and his assistant that this is the case now. I am quite sure that the farmer can buy livestock today with a farm improvement loan.

I do not want to take any more time of the committee tonight. I would say to the minister that this is a very good legislation and that I am sure that it will be appreciated by the farmers of Canada.

Mr. McIntosh: Like those who have spoken previously, I do not want to take too much of the time of the committee tonight. However, I have a few questions that I should like to put to the minister with regard to the mechanics of this act. First I should like to ask the minister what the percentage is of the yearly loss on loans made under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Has the fund actually cost the people of Canada any money or is the percentage and so on sufficient to carry any losses that have been incurred on the part of the banks? What is the percentage of repossessions? What is the disposition of the balance of the amount owing to the bank? Another question is this. What are the mechanics of the payment from the government to the bank in the case of a bad loan? Is only 10 per cent of the balance paid by the government of Canada or is the entire balance paid by the government of Canada? In the case of a bad loan, what happens when there is a compromise offered by an estate or a brother who may want to take over a loan from one of the family who through illness or some other reason cannot carry on with the commitment? Is there any provision in the act whereby a compromise can be entertained by the bank or by the government? I think those are some of the questions that some of the farmers want answered.

Mr. Winkler: I have one matter to bring before the committee on the introduction of this resolution with regard to the Farm Improvement Loans Act. While I am on my feet I should also like to state that I believe the restrictions in the terms of the act should be lessened somewhat. I am thinking particularly of the younger people in my area who wish to go on a farm but who find it necessary to become involved in other occupations until such time as they are eligible for this type of support or other loans that may be available to them. I think a broadening of the basis of such loans is warranted because of the record of these payments. When one considers the insignificant amount of money that is lost in the lending process under the act, namely one tenth of 1 per cent. I think the minister could take a broader look at the terms and assist the type of person to which I have made reference.

There is one other important point in relation to these loans which I think should be mentioned. Through experience of the last few years I have seen instances in which the farmer has become indebted through one of these loans on the purchase of machinery and has sustained loss by reason of a fire on his property. In many cases, if his ability to earn money on the farm is greatly limited or restricted, he will not of his own accord procure insurance in order to cover that machinery which has been purchased. Consequently when such a loss is sustained by him, it is multiplied owing to the fact that he has not seen fit to pay for insurance on this equipment.

I think the minister might also take a look at the possibility of requiring insurance to be placed on such machinery when the loan is made at the bank. On looking at the record of the act over the years, one can see that, having regard to the amount of money that has been loaned, the loss through default has been low. As I stated, the record of repayment is one which I stress again. It has been such that I think the minister might consider broadening the basis on which loans are made particularly, as I have stated, to younger farmers and as a previous speaker pointed out, on the basis of loans for livestock. The risk is very small and it would put a substantial number of these younger farmers on a much more independent basis.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-95, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wonder whether the house would consider giving second reading to this measure now. The bill changes only one word in the act. It changes the word "three" in section 5 (d) of the act to "four". That is the only change made by the bill in the act.

Mr. Chevrier: We have no objection.

Mr. Argue: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? By unanimous consent, now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Some hon. Members: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Next sitting of the house. We want to hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill).

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF ALLOWANCES AND INCOME CEILINGS, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952, to increase the monthly rates of allowances and permissible income ceilings; to allow for further exemptions in property and income; to modify certain conditions of service eligibility; to allow for administrative and organizational changes within the board and to provide for certain further changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, with only five minutes to go, according to the clock which is opposite me, I wonder whether the committee would prefer to rise, report progress and consider this resolution tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, go ahead.

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate the interest of all hon. members—

Mr. Fulton: Also their courtesy.

Mr. Churchill: —in legislation of this importance which affects so many veterans across Canada. In the fall of 1957, when certain major changes were being made in the War Veterans Allowance Act, I noticed that the house took about two days discussing the resolution stage, and then a considerable time on second reading. I presume that with a measure of this importance a somewhat similar course of action will be followed this year.

The reason is obvious. There is no hon. member of the House of Commons who is not interested in the problems that affect war veterans. Every province in Canada has its quota of war veterans and there is a great deal of interest by the public generally in the care and attention which is provided by the parliament of Canada for the veterans of former wars.

The War Veterans Allowance Act has been in effect since the year 1930. It was brought in at that time in recognition of something that was known to veterans of the first world war, of the South African war and of the northwest rebellion of 1885, that many men who served in the campaigns of those wars, although not wounded and not eligible for pension, nevertheless as a result of the hardships they underwent and the exposure to the elements suffered in a way which made it difficult for them in later years to re-establish themselves effectively in society and to continue to earn a living.

Experience has shown that when veterans who have undergone campaigns have reached the age of 60 years or thereabouts they may enter upon rather difficult times whether or not they have been wounded. Therefore the legislation introduced in 1930 was designed to provide some assistance to veterans in that particular category.

During the 30 years this act has been in operation 158,867 veterans and 28,075 widows and orphans have been given assistance. At the present time there are 47,204 veterans on the roll and 19,266 dependents.

The annual charge has risen over the years. I spoke on this subject in the House of Commons on March 7, 1955. At that time I reviewed the number of people who were on the war veterans allowance roll. At that particular period the sum of money that was voted by parliament was close to $27 million. Over the years it has increased and in the fiscal year 1956-57 the annual charge was, in round figures, $41 million. In the fiscal year 1959-60 the charge was $57 million.

This gives hon. members an indication of the cost of war veterans allowance over the years and as I continue my remarks tomorrow I will give further details concerning the background of this very useful legislation. I do not know of any piece of legislation apart from the Disabled Persons Act which is more acceptable to veterans across Canada.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it 10.30.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: In welcoming the Minister of Veterans Affairs back from the by-election perhaps I could ask him to indicate what the business is for tomorrow.

I think, we have assisted him tremendously today in reducing the order paper substantially. I wonder what business there will be for tomorrow by way of legislation. I take it that the estimates which were announced in the minister's absence for Wednesday and the remaining part of the week remain as announced.

Mr. Churchill: I thank the hon. member for Laurier for welcoming me back, and I hope he recalls his colleague, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, to the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the budget is not until June.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will have third reading of Bill No. C-89, which was dealt with today, an act to amend the Criminal Code, and third reading of the bill based on the resolution which passed the house a few minutes ago amending the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

That will be followed by second reading of—

Mr. Chevrier: Second reading of the bill concerning the Freight Rates Reduction Act?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, second reading of the bill dealing with the Freight Rates Reduction Act; then second reading of the bill based on the amendment to the Canadian National Railways Act. This will be followed by the resolution in my name dealing with amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

On Wednesday and the following days we will carry on with the estimates of the Department of Transport as announced.

Mr. Chevrier: Did the minister forget third reading of the Farm Improvement Loans Act?

An hon. Member: No, he mentioned it.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, he did not.

Mr. Chevrier: No, he did not. Try again.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps I made a mistake in reading. I should have said, third reading of the bill, with reference to the resolution we dealt with a little while ago, amending the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and then second reading of the bill concerning the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.M.H.C. MORTGAGES

Question No. 213—Mr. Regier:

1. What was the total amount of estimated unpaid principal on marketable first mortgages held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as of March 31, 1961?

2. What was the total amount of estimated unpaid principal on non-marketable first mortgages held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as of March 31, 1961?

3. Of the unpaid principal of these marketable mortgages, what amounts called for what percentage of interest charges?

4. When Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation sells its interest in a mortgage to another party, does the realization on unpaid principal accrue to the C.M.H.C. for reinvestment or other purposes, or must it be paid back to the consolidated revenue fund of the federal government?

5. Would the Bank of Canada be entitled to purchase above-mentioned securities directly from C.M.H.C.?

6. Would the chartered banks of Canada be entitled to purchase above-mentioned securities directly from C.M.H.C.?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

1. The National Housing Act provides that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation may sell any obligation to the corporation that is secured by a first mortgage and may, pursuant to an agreement made with the purchaser, continue to administer the obligation. All of the corporation's mortgage assets in the amount of $1,389,591,580 are therefore marketable.

2. For the time being it is not intended to sell mortgages relating to limited dividend loans, rental guarantee loans, primary industry loans, or the corporation's share of joint loans made under previous national housing acts. The total amount of unpaid principal on these loans is $404,456,018, including unpaid principal on loans not yet fully advanced.

4½ per cent	$ 12,446,709
5 per cent	16,841,007
5¼ per cent	25,496,145
5½ per cent	20,090,769
6 per cent	812,030,784
6¾ per cent	98,230,148
Total	$985,135,562

4. By arrangement with the Department of Finance in the light of the current money market, the proceeds of the sale of mortgages will be used by C.M.H.C. either to make new loans or to retire the corporation's indebtedness to the government.

5. The Bank of Canada does not believe it has the statutory power to purchase insured mortgages from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

6. The question of whether an insured mortgage is a proper security for investment by an approved lender depends upon the statutes governing such approved lenders. However, as far as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is concerned, the National Housing Act authorizes the corporation to sell insured loans to anyone.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 16, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON OTTAWA MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can advise the house whether any proposals emerged from the conferences held in Ottawa on Friday last and yesterday which would have the effect of avoiding the closure of three Cape Breton collieries.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it might be wise to await the return of the Minister of National Revenue, the minister from Nova Scotia, who is laid up today. I hope he will be available tomorrow and the question will then be taken as notice and answered in detail.

Mr. Pearson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which might also be taken as notice and dealt with by the minister tomorrow. Is it a fact, as reported in the press, that the federal government is preparing to accept the cost of keeping the mines open if the coal company should agree to such a course?

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR INCREASED WELFARE BENEFITS FOR MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the reports of destitution among miners and their families caused by cutbacks in the Nova Scotia mines, has the government given consideration to a recent resolution from the mayor and council of New Waterford, Nova Scotia, as well as from the local of the united mine workers, calling for increased welfare benefits to the miners?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have had no indication of this, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Argue: Is the government giving consideration to increasing its proportion of welfare benefits that are being paid?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member undoubtedly well knows that under the Unemployment Assistance Act the federal government stands ready to pay half of any subsistence payments in welfare matters.

Mr. Argue: No consideration has been given to increasing the federal government's proportion?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Any time there is any change in this respect, Mr. Speaker, the house will be so informed.

UNITED NATIONS

ANGOLA—ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of reported genocidal measures in Angola, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could report on the delay in the establishment of the United Nations five nation committee of inquiry into Angola.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member asked a question on this matter the other day. I referred to the fact, as the hon. member knows, that action was taken by the United Nations some three weeks ago. I shall make inquiries to ascertain the reason for the delay.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister say whether Canada has been approached to act on this committee?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not have that information at the moment, but I shall make inquiries and report to the house as soon as possible.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPORTED PROHIBITION AGAINST FRATERNIZATION WITH NATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, notice of which has been given. Can the minister inform the house whether clauses which prohibit fraternization or association with Indian or Eskimo people are placed at the insistence of the government in the contracts of employment between employees and companies which hold contracts with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is no. Perhaps I should leave it at that stage except to indicate that so far as I know there is no restriction imposed at the request of the government on any of the people working in the north.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not feel there is a conflict between such clauses in contracts of employment and the bill of rights?

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps the hon. member is asking for an expression of opinion on the interpretation of statutes, which would be out of place at this time of day.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME PROVINCES—STATEMENT ON AID TO POTATO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday as reported at page 4807 of Hansard the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked a question in these words:

—I wonder whether—the government has any definite plans to provide relief to potato growers in the maritime provinces, who have suffered losses owing to rot.

I presume that the circumstance to which the hon. member had reference was the abnormal loss suffered by some potato growers in Prince Edward Island last season due to a fungus infection known as fusarium rot. The province of Prince Edward Island has proposed that the provincial and federal governments should share jointly in providing some measure of compensation to those who suffered abnormal losses. This is at present under consideration.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SMALL FIREARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Pursuant to the introduction of Bill No. C-92, would the minister kindly say whether we can expect at this session the introduction of a bill dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code in respect of small firearms?

[Mr. Howard.]

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I will be in a position to introduce amendments relating to this matter at this session. There are discussions and studies under way at the moment concerning the whole question of the control of firearms, but I do not expect they will be completed in time to make possible the introduction of amendments at this session.

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO IMMIGRATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration this question. In view of the fact that there is almost nothing left on the order paper under government orders, does not the hon. lady think this would be an appropriate time to introduce the revised immigration act promised four years ago?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the act is ready for presentation it will be made available to the house.

EXPROPRIATION ACT—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Is it the government's intention to introduce a bill this session regarding the Expropriation Act?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I think that matter will have to await determination on the basis of progress made in dealing with the business of the session.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY OF CANADIAN MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has he any information additional to that which he gave to the house yesterday with regard to the plight of Canadian missionaries, priests and nuns in Cuba?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yesterday I intimated that there might be something to be expected in that connection. Today I am able to advise the house that 63 Canadian Roman Catholic priests and nuns, who have been engaged in educational work and have had to discontinue this work in Cuba, are returning to Canada and will be arriving late this afternoon.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES—NOTIFICATION OF APPLICANTS REFERRED BY EMPLOYMENT OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising from incomplete reports. Can the Minister of Labour assure the house that national employment service officials in Long Branch are fully informing applicants for employment at the Trane company that this company is on strike?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Any workers who are referred are advised verbally that the employment is affected by an industrial dispute, and their referral slips are also stamped to this effect. This is a policy which we adopt, and it is the practice right across Canada in all our offices.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—RECRUITMENT OF PERSONNEL IN U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on Friday's orders of the day the hon. member for Nipissing asked if it is customary or necessary to pay the passage of the people recruited abroad. This question was in connection with C.M.H.C. getting town planners after failure to do so through advertising and through the national employment agency in Canada over a period of two years.

The answer to this question is yes; it is customary for an organization seeking specialized help to use as an incentive an offer to pay the passage of an applicant and his family to the place of employment. It is proposed to have the corporation's chief architect and planner travel to Europe to conduct the interviews.

HARBOURS

GROS-CACOUNA, QUE.—STATEMENT ON RESOLUTION RESPECTING DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): In reply to the hon. member for Levis in connection with his request to be notified whether or not a resolution from Riviere du Loup had been received by me, may I say the answer is no; we have had no recent resolution. However, a large and representative delegation came from Riviere du Loup on April 11 last and made strong representations on behalf of the Gros-Cacouna port development.

This is a very large project involving $2 million to $3 million, and at present we are studying the engineering and economic aspects. Until these studies are completed I cannot say what the answer will be.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSTAL EMPLOYEES—REPORTED COMMENT BY MINISTER ON AUTOMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. In this morning's Gazette it is reported that at a luncheon he said that automation would not cut down the number of employees nor limit their use. Will the Postmaster General explain to the house what is the use of automation, if it does not cut down the number of employees or limit their use?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): The use of automation, Mr. Speaker, is to enable us to handle the ever increasing volume of mail with the same size staff and to increase our efficiency in the handling of it, as is obvious to almost every Canadian except one.

Mr. Denis: I have a supplementary question. Am I to understand that the Postmaster General means there will be no additional employees in the Post Office? Also, does he mean that prior to automation there was no efficiency in the department?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, there has been an ever increasing degree of efficiency in the department since June 26, 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: The right date is June 21.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The remainder of the question might well have been dealt with under our estimates, if the hon. member had only had the imagination to do so at that time.

Mr. Denis: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Skeena.

POSTAL EMPLOYEES—NIGHT SHIFTS AT CITY POST OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to announce whether the night shifts at city post offices will be selected in accordance with seniority upon a vote being taken by the employees?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REQUEST THAT UP TO DATE UNITED STATES FLAGS BE FLOWN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, and ask the minister whether he is aware of the fact that the United States of America comprise more than 48 states at the moment, and whether he could undertake to bring the United States flags that are flying around the hill today in line with the present day conditions.

(Translation):

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONTREAL—USE OF LAND FOR HIGHWAY PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Has the minister received representations from the authorities of the city of Montreal concerning the use of C.N.R. properties along the harbour of Montreal, for the construction of an east-west elevated roadway?

If so, has a decision been taken?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when I went to Montreal, about two months ago, I discussed this matter with the municipal authorities of Montreal and we agreed that they would send me a brief and other documents in that connection. I could not say right now if that brief has reached my office but I expect it any day now.

[Later:]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, could I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport?

Could the minister check whether he has received a report from the city of Montreal and inform the house later on?

Mr. Balcer: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

LAY-OFFS DURING PAST FORTNIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. If the hon. gentleman is not in a position to answer it this morning, perhaps he will take it as notice. Can the minister say how many employees of the Canadian National Railways have been laid off during the last two week period?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I am not in a position to answer that question.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister take it as notice, because I understand there have been a number of people laid off since the settlement of the dispute with the non-operating unions.

Mr. Balcer: Similar questions appear on the order paper from time to time, and we endeavour to answer them diligently. We shall do the same in this case if we are asked.

HUMAN RIGHTS

CALGARY—REPORTED DISMISSAL OF MISS VALERIE SMITH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of a press report that a Calgary firm, Midwest Surveys, has dismissed an employee, Miss Valerie Smith, because of a speech she made in which she praised certain aspects of the present Cuban regime. Could the minister say whether the bill of rights protects employees from being fired merely because—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is dealing with the employment of an individual by a private firm, which is not an administrative responsibility of any minister as far as I am aware. The latter part of the hon. member's question relates to the enforcement of justice, which is under provincial jurisdiction. Therefore I do not think the hon. member is entitled to pursue the matter.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, can I take it from your remarks that the bill of rights does not cover such a situation?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: I should like to put another question, if I may—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Lessard).

[Later:]

Mr. Argue: I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister say whether the government has given consideration to the introduction of an amendment to the Criminal Code which would make it an offence under the code for an employer to dismiss an employee because of a political opinion?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The government's position with regard to this matter was amply demonstrated when on July 1 of last year the Prime Minister introduced the Canadian bill of rights which parliament adopted that year.

Mr. Argue: Can I take it from the minister's announcement that there is no intention to provide any protection for a person who has been arbitrarily dismissed, as in this case.

Mr. Fulton: The bill of rights is now in force. What the hon. member is really seeking to do is to ask me for a legal opinion as to its effect. Other members of the house know, if he does not, that that is not in order.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED OFFER TO ADVISE ON SETTING UP MAIL ROOMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. According to this morning's Montreal Gazette the Postmaster General is reported as having said that the Post Office was prepared to offer, free of charge, advice on the setting up and manning of an efficient mail room. Is the Postmaster General in a position to explain this new curb service?

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member's question relating again to the speech of the Postmaster General?

Mr. Denis: This is a new policy announced in this morning's newspaper.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest it would be more appropriate to discuss the policies related to the Post Office during consideration of the estimates of the department.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, the estimates have been passed. This is a new policy just decided by the Postmaster General and reported in this morning's Gazette. I will have to wait until next year if I want some information on the estimates.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might just clarify one point about this being a new policy, in the light of your ruling. The hon. member could have discussed it under the estimates at any time during the last four years it has been in operation, had he known about it. It has been widely publicized.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WATER RESOURCES

BOW LAKE, ONT.—REPORTED POLLUTION BY RADIOACTIVE WASTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the Minister of National Health and Welfare received representations from Mr. Hook regarding the radioactive pollution of Bow lake by mining interests, and can the minister assure the house that his department will take steps to end this situation immediately?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I received notice of the hon. member's intention to ask this question only a few moments before entering the house. I understand that a letter from this gentleman was received in the department yesterday. It is at the moment being studied by my department, and I shall be pleased to inform the hon. member what transpires.

TRADE

PROPOSED U.S. RESTRICTIONS ON TOURIST IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance based on a press report from Washington in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that the United States House of Representatives yesterday passed a bill reducing tourist allowances. I wonder if the minister can say whether Canadian representations on this subject are continuing?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the announcement, but I take it that it indicates that the measure in question has been passed by one house only of the United States congress. The United States government is very well aware of the views of the Canadian government in this regard. I outlined last March the manner in which those views had been communicated to the representatives of the United States administration at the meeting in Washington on March 13 and 14 of the continuing joint committee on trade and economic affairs.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED EXPORT OF PULP TO CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or perhaps in his absence to the acting minister or to the Prime Minister, if he would care to answer it. My question is based upon reports that three west coast pulp and paper firms, namely MacMillan and Bloedel Limited and Powell River Company, B. C. Forest Products and Columbia Cellulose Limited are exporting pulp to Cuba. Can one of the hon. gentlemen indicate whether any representations have been made to the government by either the United States government or the parent company of one of those companies with respect to those particular exports?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question will be taken as notice.

COMBINES

FISHERIES—INQUIRY AS TO PUBLICATION OF EVIDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could put a question—a factual question—to the Minister of Justice, and ask him whether the matter of the publication of the evidence in the fisheries inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act is now before the courts.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, by way of injunction proceedings. There have been a number of injunction applications dealing with this matter and all or most are being appealed. At one stage the supreme court of Ontario gave a strong judgment that these documents are completely private.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I ask the Minister of Justice why he did not inform the house of this yesterday, rather than have to be assisted today by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, to be quite frank, because it slipped my mind. It is only one of the many reasons why the hon. member's motions have been unacceptable.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON BORDER CROSSINGS BY UNDESIRABLE PERSONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in a position to answer the question I asked, and which her parliamentary secretary took as notice, on May 4, 1961 respecting any steps the department may have taken to restrict border crossings by race track touts, bookmakers and others?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I answered that question one day last week. If the hon. member will refer to page 4503 of Hansard of Monday, May 8, he will find the answer which was given to the house.

Mr. Hellyer: Thank you very much.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LENGTH OF RACE MEETINGS AND NUMBER OF RACES

On the order:

Third reading of Bill No. C-89, an act to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings)—The Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Before I put this motion may I say that although the initials "E.F." do not appear opposite this bill or the subsequent bills, I am informed that all bills standing on the order paper have been printed and distributed in both English and French. Is the Minister of Justice moving the motion for the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-89, to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings).

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF BANK LOANS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-95, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Caron: Have you copies in both English and French?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I am advised that that is so.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FREIGHT RATES REDUCTION ACT

AMENDMENT EXTENDING APPLICATION OF REVISED RATES

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-93, to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

He said: I have a few brief remarks to make. Quite an extensive study was given to the resolution that preceded this bill, and there is very little additional information I can give that was not given on the resolution.

As the house knows, the Freight Rates Reduction Act was passed in 1959. Its purpose was to alleviate the burden of the 17 per cent general freight rate increase authorized in November, 1958. The rates to which the act applies are the normal class rates and commodity rates, excepting competitive rates, which were taking the 17 per cent increase on the day the act came into force.

Class rates are the maximum rates that the railways can charge. They apply to about 8,000 articles in the Canadian freight classification. The principal articles shipped at class rates are high class manufactured articles.

Commodity rates are lower than the class rates, and they apply on bulk commodities and other articles shipped in large quantities such as steel, sand and gravel, lumber, pulpwood, fruits and vegetables, ores, cement, wood pulp, newsprint paper, canned goods, sugar and so forth.

The reduction required by the act does not apply to subnormal rates which the railways have published because of competition, such as competitive rates and agreed charges. Neither does it apply to the statutory Crowsnest pass grain and flour rates, nor to international rates between Canada and the United States, nor to export and import traffic carried at rates in competition with United States ports.

The act made provision for the board of transport commissioners to require reductions to be made in the class and commodity rates, other than competitive rates, that were in effect and taking the 17 per cent increase on the day the act came into force. The reductions were to be effective during a period of not more than one year. Provision was made for payments not exceeding $20 million to reimburse the companies for the resulting reduction in their revenues.

The act came into force on July 8, 1959. The first reduction in the freight rates became effective on August 1, 1959, when the 17 per cent increase was reduced by 7 percentage points; in other words, it became 10 per cent instead of 17 per cent. In the following spring the board ordered a further reduction of two more percentage points, bringing the 17 per cent increase down to 8 per cent. It has remained at that level ever since.

The act was amended last year by extending the one year period of the reductions for another nine months and by increasing the $20 million by another $15 million, making a total of $35 million for the full 21 months.

The purpose of the amendment is to extend the provisions of the act for a further period not exceeding 12 months from April 30 last. The original bill and last year's amending bill were considered at length by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines of the house and also by the standing committee on transport and communications of the Senate. There is no change in the principle or purpose of the legislation at this time. What is proposed is a continuation of its provisions for a further period of 12 months. After the present discussion I propose to move that the bill be referred to the standing committee which I have mentioned.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, yesterday there was a general discussion on the resolution to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act, and I do not want to traverse the ground covered then. However, there are a number of things that remain to be said in connection with the bill now before the house.

In my view the bill divides itself into two parts. First, it authorizes the board of transport commissioners to make an order continuing the freight rates reduction which was authorized under an earlier act in 1960. Second, it attempts, although I doubt whether it succeeds, to make the rates retroactive. In so far as the shipper is concerned, I do not think there can be any doubt that the reduction is effective. In so far as the railways are concerned, I believe there is some doubt, and I should like the minister to clarify that position when we get to clause 1 of the bill.

My understanding of the situation is that the railways may, if they wish, file a tariff in reduction of rates, but that the board of transport commissioners cannot in any way make that tariff retroactive. That is why I said earlier that so far as the shipper is concerned the moment the railways file a tariff in reduction of rates or in continuation of a rate reduction, that position is covered, but I do not think that applies with respect to the board of transport commissioners. I said that I do not think they can either make a rate retroactive or payments retroactive, and on that point I should like to get some clarification later.

A question was also raised by the Leader of the Opposition in connection with the statement made by the Prime Minister, and there was no explanation given by the minister yesterday when he rose to reply on the resolution. I refer, of course, to the statement that appears in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 25, wherein the Prime Minister said that the subsidy would be retroactive, and I quote from this dispatch from Ottawa:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker said Friday legislation to extend the $20 million a year rollback subsidy on freight rates will be made retroactive to May 1 when it is passed by parliament.

Then there is this significant passage:

> He said the government notice given the commons earlier this week would act in the same way as a budget proposal which becomes effective when it is announced, subject to later parliamentary approval.

Of course that is not the case, and I think the minister owes it to the house to deal with this matter. The notice referred to by the Prime Minister is certainly not in the nature of a budget proposal, nor has it the same effect, nor does it come into effect until both houses of parliament have approved the legislation and it has been proclaimed. Therefore I think the house is entitled to an explanation of that statement.

However, sir, I rose for another purpose this morning, namely to deal with some of the statements which were made yesterday during the course of the debate and particularly with a statement made by the minister which I will put on the record in a moment. During the course of the reply made by the minister the inference was left that while we were in office little or nothing was done in connection with this whole very serious matter of freight rate reduction and the freight rate structure. I quote what the minister said, as found on page 4836 of Hansard:

> I should just like to present certain figures at this time, which I am not pulling out of a hat, in respect of those figures quoted this afternoon. I suggest by looking at the varying proportions regarding freight rate increases we will then have a clearer picture in respect of which government is more concerned with the welfare of Canadian citizens as far as freight rates are concerned.
> Since 1945 freight rates have increased by 157 per cent. One hundred and forty per cent of this increase occurred during the time my hon. friend was a minister under the Liberal regime.

I pause here to state that while I am unable to verify the increase of 157 per cent I take it that perhaps it is correct, but I do make the statement that if freight rates have risen by that amount in Canada they have risen by a higher amount in the United States and by an equal amount in the United Kingdom. So, having regard to the kind of economy existing in those countries, there is not too much to—I am looking for a better word than "blow" about, because I do not want to inject a note of contention into the debate.

Mr. Argue: Oh, go ahead.

Mr. Chevrier: From the statement the minister made, and with which I am dealing now, I do not think there is too much for him to become exercised about, because the position is no better here than it is elsewhere. The minister went on to say:

> During the Conservative administration—that is during the last four years—the only increase which has been allowed was to the extent of 10 per cent, which was later reduced to 8 per cent. In other words, the total increase of 17½ per cent was originally decreased to 10 per cent, and then to 8 per cent. The government has also frozen all increases; this policy is still in effect. I suggest that this government has shown the people of Canada what it thought of the great burden of freight rates in various parts of the country. This government has looked into the matter seriously and has gone out of its way in an attempt to help the shippers of various regions of Canada, who have had to face these freight rate increases.

I should like to tell the minister that the former administration not only did what he said but went a great deal further. As I said earlier, from this statement of the minister the inference is created that little or nothing was done by the previous administration.

Mr. Balcer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: I hear cries of "hear, hear" from the other side of the house. I should like to put on the record some of the things that were done. It would take too much time to go into them seriatim, but in the light of what was said yesterday and the fact that this is a debate on freight rates there are some general statements which I think deserve to be put on the record.

First of all, let me say that there were no increases in freight rates in this country for quite a long time. From 1903 until world war I there were no increases whatsoever in freight rates in Canada. The first general increase came in 1917. I need not tell the house what government was in office then. The increase amounted to 15 per cent. The second came one year later in 1918, and amounted to 25 per cent. It was made not by the board of transport commissioners but by a cabinet direction given to the board. An order in council was passed by the government of the day, which was a Conservative administration, directing the board of transport commissioners to increase freight rates to the extent of 25 per cent. In 1920, still under a Conservative administration, there was an increase of 40 per cent in the freight rates of this country following an application made by the railway association of Canada to the board of transport commissioners.

Then there was a change of administration. When the Liberal government took office the 40 per cent increase which had been approved in 1920 was reduced first by a 5 per cent decrease in 1921 and then by a 10 per cent decrease in the same year. This was followed by a further decrease on August 1, 1922 leaving, in respect of the 40 per cent increase, a net increase of 17½ per cent in eastern Canada and 12½ per cent in western Canada.

Turning now to another aspect of this question I wish to deal with the manner in which freight rates and the freight rate structure were dealt with in former years. I need hardly tell the house that the Crowsnest rates were established in 1897. They were perhaps the lowest grain rates in the world. They were so considered at the time and they have never been touched or tampered with, with but one exception. There is some reference to those rates in the recommendations contained in the first volume of the report of the MacPherson commission. From the representations that were made to the royal commission by various groups all across Canada it is quite clear that even at this date, 64 years later, there is a jealous regard for those rates. There is, too, a general view, particularly in the prairie provinces, that they should not be touched.

In 1903 the Railway Act was enacted in this country. It established the board of transport commissioners, giving that board powers to deal with applications concerning freight rates. In 1924 there was inaugurated a freight rate investigation to determine whether it was possible to equalize freight rates in Canada. I bring to the attention of the house that in 1924 and even long before that, as I shall be able to show later on, there was an attempt in this country to equalize freight rates; so that when we are told in the house that the MacPherson commission on transportation is going to bring in a recommendation to equalize freight rates we should not become too excited over that because the board of transport commissioners, royal commissions and other investigations have over many years dealt with this very difficult and complex question of the equalization of freight rates.

In 1927 the then administration introduced the Maritime Freight Rates Act giving the benefit of a 20 per cent reduction in freight rates to the select maritime region. That has since been increased to 30 per cent under a Liberal regime.

From 1948 to 1950, over a series of various steps, the mountain differential was entirely removed. Following this, under an order in council known as P.C. 1487 the board of transport commissioners was authorized to make a thorough investigation into the rate structure of railways and railway companies with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rate structure which would, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities so as to permit the freest possible interchange of commodities between various provinces and the extension of Canadian trade both foreign and domestic, having due regard to the needs of agriculture and other basic commodities.

In 1948 there was established by the former government a royal commission on transportation or, if you prefer to call it such, the Turgeon commission. That commission sat for a period of more than two years and brought in a very exhaustive report, one of the finest ever produced on the subject of freight rates, together with that of the Duff commission. The two, taken together, are historic documents which will stand out for many years to come, and which I submit have been a tremendous benefit to the railways, to the shippers and to the taxpayers of this country. I am not suggesting that the MacPherson commission will not bring in an equally good report, but the house will have to await the publication of the subsequent two volumes before an opinion can be expressed in that connection.

The Turgeon commission made an exhaustive study. It was made by a person who had devoted a great deal of his life to problems concerning western Canada, and who was praised for the recommendations contained in his report by the present Prime Minister when he sat on this side of the house as a private member. Finally in 1951 the then government accepted the recommendations of the Turgeon commission. All of them which had to do with freight rates, and many others incidental thereto, were brought into effect by way of legislation implementing those recommendations. It was stated at the time on both sides of the house that this was the most important and most forward looking piece of legislation having to do with freight rates ever introduced in the house.

What did this legislation do? First, it provided in accordance with the recommendations of the Turgeon commission for the payment of a subsidy of several million dollars to maintain the trackage through northern Ontario which serves as a link or bridge between certain points in northern Ontario. Second, it provided for a national freight rate policy as enacted in section 336 of the Railway Act. This was an over-all direction to the board of transport commissioners stating that every railway company, in the language of that section:

> —shall, so far as is reasonably possible, in respect of all freight traffic of the same description, and carried on or upon the like kind of cars or conveyances, passing over all lines or routes of the company in Canada, charge tolls to all persons at the same rate, whether by weight, mileage or otherwise.

This, of course, is subject to the exceptions mentioned in subsection 4 of section 336. This section was of tremendous benefit to western Canada. It provided for equalization of rates between the east and west, and also paved the way for equalization of certain commodities.

Another feature of this legislation was the one and one third rule which is contained in section 337 of the Railway Act. The legislation also provided for uniform classification of a system of accounts for the railways. The interstate commerce commission had led the way or had used this system for years; and because, as the house knows, railways in Canada—the C.N.R., the C.P.R. and others—moved to points in the United States, it was felt by the royal commission that there should be a uniform method of accounting for these lines. The legislation provided for the filing of a competitive tariff before the board so that the board could go into such and such a rate and ascertain that it was bona fide and compensatory. It also provided for the recapitalization of the C.N.R. and other matters which it would take too long for me to go into at the present time.

Before I go on to another point I should like to acquaint the minister with the attitude taken by the opposition at that time. I do not know whether or not he was in the house then, but I believe he was. The opposition took a very negative attitude toward some of the measures that were brought forward, notwithstanding the fact that the present Prime Minister had declared that this report of the royal commission was an excellent one.

The opposition first of all sought to do away with the board of transport commissioners. When the estimates of the Department of Transport were up for consideration, the opposition moved that the item be reduced to $1. I will not mention the names of those who were prominent in that discussion. That attempt was not successful, of course, but it gave some indication of what was in the minds of the members of the opposition at that time. Not only did they move to reduce to $1 the estimates for the maintenance and operation of the board of transport commissioners, but they condemned the board of transport commissioners, and some of them would have done away with the board. It was said by them that the board was incompetent, that it was responsible for the state of confusion and chaos in which the country found itself, that it was not functioning as it should function, that it was not competent to assume its task. That language can be found at page 3121 of Hansard of June 2, 1950.

May I point out that this government has been in office now for four years. If it had wished to do so, it could have done something about the board of transport commissioners in those four years. The fact that it has maintained the board is evidence that the criticism made by it in the days when it was in opposition was futile and really of no use. In those days the opposition were opposed to the establishment of the royal commission. They fought the royal commission. They said a royal commission to deal with freight rates was useless. They said it was a complete waste of time. Although the provinces wanted a royal commission, the then leader of the opposition did not want one.

Mr. Pickersgill: What was the name of the leader of the opposition then?

Mr. Chevrier: Hon. Mr. Drew. He made statements declaring himself to be against a royal commission to deal with this all-important subject. However, because of the attitude taken by the provinces and by most of the responsible groups in Canada, the Conservative party changed its attitude and at its convention passed a resolution demanding a royal commission, thereby overruling its leader. There was in those days in the opposition, as there is today in the government, evidence of confusion and of party members running in two directions at the same time. We have had examples of that situation, and we certainly have had an example of confusion and chaos in connection with this whole problem.

A great deal has been said about horizontal increases in freight rates and about their unjust, unfair, and inequitable impact upon all parts of Canada. With regard to that statement there can be no objection or no complaint. That is a fact. When freight rates are raised horizontally they are bound to create inequity in certain parts of Canada that are far away from markets. However, that is not a new position. That position has existed in this country for many years. That position was dealt with by the royal commission on transportation headed by Mr. Turgeon.

The Prime Minister has indicated that when the MacPherson royal commission hands down its report, a formula will be found whereby freight rates across Canada can be equalized and therefore the impact of horizontal increases in rates can be minimized or made to disappear entirely, thus by inference leading us to believe that no previous attempt has been made at equalization. I want to correct that suggestion. I should like to put on record what Mr. Justice Turgeon had to say in his royal commission report in 1951. At page 50, in chapter 2, under the heading "Horizontal Increases", we find the following:

> The method of applying a uniform percentage increase to all rates is known as the "horizontal percentage increase".
> The seven provinces which opposed the 30 per cent and 20 per cent increase applications before the board from 1946 to 1950 and attacked the horizontal increase method continued their attack before this commission.

It can thus be seen that the matter of horizontal increases is not a new one. I continue the quotation:

> Many submissions were made criticizing this method and asserting that it works great hardship upon shippers in the provinces subject to long haul on their traffic.

Then the commissioner goes on to give examples of horizontal increases in freight rates. Then at page 52, under the heading "Treatment of the Subject by the Duncan Commission", I find the following:

The following excerpts from the report of the Duncan commission seem to indicate the importance of this subject.

In the report which was made in September 1926 appear the following statements:

"Incidence of horizontal war increases"

"There is one further very important feature of the railway situation as it affects the maritimes, which calls for special attention. In one sense it is connected with the problems that we have been discussing, but its immediate incidence is not so interconnected with the general problem as to make it impossible to deal with it separately. Indeed the reaction of the burden which it imposes is so great that, in our view, it should be dealt with as a special problem. We refer to the system under which, during the late war, flat percentage increases (known as horizontal increases) were added to railway rates."

I refer to that passage in passing simply in order to show that as far back as 1926 the Duncan commission took cognizance of this matter. The chief commissioner goes on at some length to deal with the manner in which this question is handled in the United States, and I shall not refer to that matter. However, he draws a number of interesting conclusions which I should like to put on the record now. First, he states at page 61 of the report:

Applications for uniform horizontal increases to all freight tolls assume that all freight can, under all conditions, bear an equal burden of increase. This is an incorrect assumption.

2. Horizontal increases, although preserving rate relationships percentagewise, disturb them in cents per 100 pounds (or other unit) in so far as shippers and consignees are concerned, and this is of much importance to them.

3. Horizontal increases aggravate the disadvantage already suffered by long haul shippers and consignees.

4. The remedy does not lie in the prohibition, statutory or other, of horizontal increases, but is in the hands of the railways themselves. The railways should make studies of traffic conditions in all their bearings and should present to the board (in accordance with the foregoing precedents) proposals showing not only their maximum percentage increase requirement, but also, among other particulars, varying percentage increases on different commodities, flat, instead of percentage increases when these are more suitable, and maxima in appropriate cases in cents per 100 pounds or other unit. Special attention should be given to long haul traffic and to rates on basic (or primary) commodities. The railways should be in a position to do this especially in the light of new statistical procedures. But if the railways do not approach the task in this way, it ought to be the duty of the board to see that they do so. Presumably an examination of the "waybill study" undertaken by the board will help to provide it with the requisite "reliable traffic statistics" which it stated were lacking in the 30 per cent applications.

Finally the commissioner concludes by saying that legislative enactments to deal with this are not necessary. At this stage I should like to show what was done by the board of transport commissioners following that recommendation and following the legislation which was introduced in the house by the former administration to equalize freight rates across this country.

I mentioned earlier that under order in council P.C. 1487 the government had directed the board of transport commissioners to conduct an investigation into the whole subject of equalization. The first thing the board of transport commissioners did to comply with that recommendation was to ask the railways to make an analysis of the waybill, that is, a waybill study. As the house knows, there are some 65,000 or more different freight rates in Canada. Before it was possible for anybody, let alone the board of transport commissioners, to study this problem it was necessary to make a study and an analysis of the waybill. This the board of transport commissioners did, and they made an interim report on the equalization of freight rates which is dated Ottawa, March 25, 1955.

This report refers to the order in council which established the board to deal with the matter. It refers to section 336, which established the national freight policy in Canada. I should like to read this short paragraph from page 4 of the report:

The board completed the first phase of the equalization of freight rates on March 1, 1955, by establishing on that date a new freight classification and a new scheme of "class" rates applied in connection with that classification, and the present therefore appears to be an appropriate time at which to make an interim report in the matter of equalization generally.

Then it goes on to deal in detail with what had been done. I think it can be summed up by this sentence at page 17:

—it has been possible within two years to evolve finally a class rate scale which was thought worthy of being put into effect and subjected to the test of experience.

There then came a further report which is dated September 23, 1957 and which is signed by Clarence D. Shepard, the chief commissioner. I should have said that the earlier report dated March 25, 1955 was under the signature of the then chief commissioner, Mr. Justice Kearney. Page 1 of the report of 1957 states:

—the first phase of equalization throughout Canada, namely, of class rates accompanied by a new freight classification, had been accomplished and made effective on March 1, 1955.

The report states at page 4:

The equalized class rates have now been in effect for two and one half years and have cured the complaints that existed for so many years concerning the higher class rates in western Canada compared with eastern Canada.

Then it says that the second phase of equalization is to deal with commodity rates, which it divides into four classifications. The report goes on to deal with those. There came a third report dated December 22, 1958, this one again signed by Clarence D. Shepard, the chief commissioner. I should like to put on Hansard the second introductory paragraph of this report:

> Order in council P.C. 1487 of April 7, 1948 required a general investigation of the freight rate structure of Canada, and directed that this investigation be made "with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rates structure which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities, etc." Section 366 of the Railway Act is broader in its application and sets forth the national freight rate policy that, subject to certain exceptions, "every railway company shall, so far as is reasonably possible, in respect of all freight traffic of the same description, and carried on or upon the like kind of cars or conveyances, passing over all lines or routes of the company in Canada, charge tolls to all persons at the same rate, whether by weight, mileage or otherwise".
> The board has been proceeding with "equalization" as defined by section 336, i.e., that subject to all reasonable considerations and the exceptions set forth in the section, the rate on a given article for the same distance and for the same weight must be the same in any part of Canada west of the maritime provinces, despite any differences in circumstances and conditions.

Then it lists the various board judgments dealing with equalization and it gives a long list of articles upon which freight rates in Canada have been equalized. This report concludes by saying that in as far as it has been possible so to do, these rates have been equalized.

My purpose in putting these matters on the record is to indicate, first, that this was not a new subject; it dates back many, many years; that equalization has been going on in this country over a period of years; that equalization was recommended by the Turgeon commission and was put into effect by three interim reports of the board of transport commissioners thereby lightening, but not making disappear entirely the effect of horizontal freight rate increases.

I hope the present royal commission on transportation will be able to come up with a formula which will make horizontal freight rate increases disappear entirely and equalize freight rates to the fullest extent across this country. That would be a desirable objective. Whether it can be reached or not I am unable to say, but I do know that under the previous administration the board of transport commissioners gave this subject careful consideration, and anybody either in this house or outside who tries to say that the previous administration did not face up to this problem is making an inaccurate and false statement. I repeat that the recommendations are there; they are indicative of what was done by the royal commission. The legislation also is there to indicate what was the attitude of the government. At that time there were various bills introduced in the house —I have forgotten how many, but certainly there were a number of them—dealing with each of the aspects upon which recommendations were made by the Turgeon commission. Will the present administration do the same thing? I invite them to do so when they have decided upon which parts of the report they intend to implement.

I leave the subject there, satisfied that I have replied effectively to any statement or charge, made directly or by inference, that little or nothing was done by those who were in office for 22 years. The record is there to bear me out. I think the previous administration did a great deal, both during the 22 years when the last Liberal government was in office and under earlier Liberal governments, to deal with this question, which is a complex one, a complicated one, and one which cannot be dealt with overnight. Having said that, I can only reiterate that we on this side of the house will give our full support to this measure, and hope it will be possible for the minister to clear up any doubts I have in mind about the retroactivity of this bill when we come to discuss it clause by clause.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I do not have the exact quotations here but it seems to me he said at one time that the Crowsnest freight rates were shackling the railways. I should like to know whether or not the hon. gentleman is in favour of maintaining for western Canada the Crowsnest freight rates on grain.

Mr. Chevrier: That question is easy to answer, and if the hon. member would look at Hansard for the period during which I was minister of transport he will see that I repeatedly said they should not be touched. Furthermore, in the terms of reference to the Turgeon royal commission there was a provision excluding consideration of the Crowsnest rates, thereby indicating the intention of the government at the time that the royal commission on transportation should study the whole question of freight rates, freight structure and other transportation matters but not the Crowsnest rates.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would answer one supplementary question. I may have misunderstood him, but I understood the hon. member to say on one occasion that the Crowsnest pass freight rates were shackling the railways. That was at the time when the Prime Minister declared that the rates were a magna carta for western Canada. Did the hon. gentleman suggest in this house at any time that the Crowsnest pass rates were shackling the railways and should be changed?

Mr. Chevrier: I thought I had answered that question by referring just now to statements I had made when I was sitting on the other side of the house. I have been in the house for 23 years and I do not remember all the statements I have made, but I cannot recall having made a statement of the nature quoted by the hon. gentleman or any statement like it having to do with the Crowsnest rates, and this is in line with the attitude I have taken all along. If, perchance, the hon. member is able to show that I have made such a statement I shall be the first to rise in the house and correct it. However, I should be tremendously surprised if any such statement was made either by me or by any member of the Liberal administration.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The question which the hon. member for Bow River put to the hon. member for Laurier is indeed an interesting one. Perhaps clearer than anything else in the discussion of freight rates one thing stands out, and that is the policy of every political party in Canada, as enunciated from time to time, that the Crowsnest rates must remain unchanged and must not be tampered with. Any government or any political party which embarked on a course of tampering with the Crowsnest rates so as to raise the rates on western grain would not have a chance to elect a single member from any one of the three prairie provinces. So if any political party in Canada wishes to commit suicide in the three prairie provinces, this is the course open to it and this is the way to bring it about.

As a matter of fact the people on the prairies are so much opposed to tampering with the Crowsnest rates that they would view very carefully any contention that those rates should be used in such a way as to get something for the railways by way of a compensatory grant. The railways require assistance. The employees who work for the railways should not be forced, as they have been in the past, to accept wages lower than those paid to workers in comparable industries. But the Crowsnest pass rates must remain as they are now and no method should be used by any government, either directly or indirectly, to undermine the effect of those rates.

There has been a great deal of speculation lately as to whether the country may be confronted with a fall election, and an atmosphere of this kind leads members in various part of the house to make speeches which are tailored to meet such a situation. I think this present bill is tailored to that possibility. I do not say this bill means we are to have an election in the fall, but the government is taking no chances; the government is doing everything it can to make a fall election possible if it decides at some later date that an election at that time would be in its own political interest.

The long and carefully prepared speech which was read by the hon. member for Laurier certainly suggests to me that the Liberal party and its great research bureau are very conscious that an election may be coming before long, and in order to provide some alternative argument to this legislation or to the royal commission report which has been placed before the country the hon. member for Laurier has made a spirited and detailed defence of the Liberal party, not only of today but throughout its whole history. He has endeavoured to show that it is the Conservative party which has been the party of high freight rates and that it has been the Liberal party which has valiantly come to the rescue of the freight users of this country by taking far-reaching steps to equalize freight rates and relieve the burden caused by horizontal increases.

The Turgeon commission report was presented on February 9, 1951. From the end of the war until that time, according to the information I hold in my hand, and I believe it is correct, there were two horizontal increases in freight rates. On April 8, 1958 there was a 21 per cent increase; on June 16, 1950 there was a 20 per cent increase.

Then we received the report to which the hon. member for Laurier has referred. We have it. The government did a few things about it. Some measures were introduced, and after we had the report, on February 11, 1952 there was a 17 per cent increase in freight rates. On January 1, 1953 there was another 9 per cent increase; on March 16, 1953 a 7 per cent increase; on July 3, 1956 a 7 per cent interim increase; in December, 1956 the 7 per cent interim increase was increased to 11 per cent. We had a couple of increases before the report; we had four complete increases in a total of five stages after the report.

I am very much opposed to freight rate increases. I am disappointed that the government did not roll the last increase right back to the position before the increase, but we were getting dizzy with increased freight rates under the former administration. Although the royal commission report was pitchforked in among the increases, nevertheless the increases continued at a very alarming and rather monotonous rate.

Well, the Liberal government had royal commissions and the Conservative government has had royal commissions. We have one now. The Turgeon royal commission made one report. It did not help very much. The MacPherson royal commission is going to make three reports, and I do not know whether the three reports of the MacPherson commission are going to be any more substantial in their effects than the one report of the Turgeon commission. We have the initial report of the MacPherson commission and, according to the government, all its railway freight policies were being tailored to the moment when the MacPherson commission would make its report. That is, both as to railway wage rates and as to freight rate policy, the government would get the report, it would make up its mind, it would study the report and it would act.

It received the report. Apparently it studied it. Instead of action there is further procrastination, there is further postponing. The government is doing nothing today to deal with the report or with the freight rate situation that it did not do a year ago or a couple of years ago. The government has no policy with regard to freight rates. It has a policy with regard to royal commissions. It has appointed as many as possible on as many subjects as possible. Get all the royal commission reports and in the main shelve them. Let them gather dust and procrastinate and postpone in the hope that the royal commission reports will be something of an answer for an electorate that is requiring action.

In his statement this morning the minister made it clear that this bill freezes only certain freight rates. It freezes the general class and commodity rates, but it does not freeze the competitive rates or the agreed charges. In other words it puts a ceiling on certain rates, and underneath the ceiling the rates can be adjusted upward right to the ceiling. So that while this measure does put some control on the revenues that may be obtained by the railway companies, it would be false to assume that it freezes railway revenue or even freight rates. It does not do this; it freezes only certain rates, and we certainly are in favour of any measure that prevents further horizontal increases.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this particular bill deals only with a certain restricted area of railway operations, and the railway companies are still free under the law, as they have been in the past, to undertake actions that have a very important effect on the freight users of this country.

The MacPherson royal commission report makes some submissions and recommendations with respect to passenger train service on branch lines, to subsidies and to the Crowsnest rates. Nothing will be done with the Crowsnest rates. That is clear. But from all the information I can get the indications are that the discontinuance of passenger service will undoubtedly go forward, and the pressure that the railways have placed on the board of transport commissioners to allow them to abandon branch lines will be continued. I ask the minister whether he can give the house and the country any assurance whatsoever that there will be a freeze, or even a slow-down, in the rate at which the railway companies will seek to bring about an abandonment of railway passenger service or an abandonment of railway branch lines.

I come from a part of the country, and I suppose this is equally true of a majority of hon. members, where branch lines are exceedingly important. Over the years the people of Canada have felt that railway service was not something that could be confined or the jurisdiction over railway service was something that could not be confined, to private companies, but that the public interest demanded public control and a public policy for freight users in the country. The citizens of our nation who use branch line services are very much disturbed over the royal commission report which, under certain circumstances, would give the green light to a wholesale abandonment of branch lines in the country.

I say that the government is dealing with only part of the transportation problem; it is dealing with only one of the criticisms when it takes steps to prevent further increases in class and commodity rates. It is doing nothing constructive of which I am aware. I ask the minister to tell me what the government is doing, if it is doing something, to prevent the railways in our country getting from the board of transport commissioners the right to abandon all branch railway lines throughout the country.

I for one am going to resist, and resist for all I am worth, the wholesale abandonment of branch railway lines in Canada. The MacPherson report says that the railways could save $13 million annually by a wholesale abandonment of branch lines. I do not think the saving of $13 million by the railway companies warrants any kind of policy of wholesale abandonment of railway lines. Today the railways have a policy of wholesale abandonment of railway services. Usually the first thing they do is discontinue passenger train service. Then they put on mixed trains. A couple of years later they remove the passenger coach, and then they reduce the frequency of train service. Later they try to close the station and allow the agent to look for other work. Then they amalgamate various sections of the railway for maintenance purposes.

This, Mr. Chairman, is almost a wholesale folding up and abandonment of railway services in our country. I say this has already gone so far that the government should develop at least an interim policy that would prevent its continuation until such time as an over-all, clear-cut railway policy is developed.

I have said that I am going to resist the discontinuance of branch line services in our country in any wholesale manner. I live in a community that has a branch line service. Ours is almost a branch off a branch, but although the service is only twice weekly it is important to that community. We do not want to see our costs of farming and of doing business skyrocket because of the tearing up of the railway track, thus condemning this small community, which is representative of hundreds of similar communities across the country, to economic death, the end of the community as it now is and a tremendous increase in the cost of doing business in the community.

The abandonment of railway lines is taking place. It is something that is with us. But if there is to be abandonment—and it may take place even though some of us oppose and resist it—I suggest that where it does take place the federal government should be prepared to put federal money and perhaps railway money into the building of paved highways over the right of way or along the right of way so that a community which loses its railway service will at least have an adequate highway system to replace the railway service.

As hon. members from western Canada know, many communities all over western Canada that have a very minimum of railway service also have very little by way of adequate highways serving them, and I say it would be a disgrace to our nation to tear up railway lines and leave these communities with inadequate highway facilities. I say it would be unjust, and it is not in keeping with a progressive nation that is looking forward to better and better services and a higher and higher standard of living.

The measure before the house is just a case of politically marking time as far as the government is concerned. It is a clear indication that the government has no policy, that the government has postponed and procrastinated. We can only hope that some day soon the government will develop an overall railway and transportation policy, that under this policy the freight service users of the country will be protected; that transportation facilities of all kinds will be integrated in a fair and equitable manner and, most important of all, that the freight service users and the communities that depend on the railways will be given adequate consideration.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak very briefly on this matter, because after the lengthy and comprehensive exposé by my colleague the hon. member for Laurier there is very little left to say that would not be repetitive. However, one or two points were raised by the hon. member who has just taken his seat on which I should like to make a few observations.

The hon. member pointed out quite correctly, as the Minister of Transport did yesterday at the resolution stage—I have not done the arithmetic myself but I assume it is correct—that over the period after the war when a Liberal government was in office there had been horizontal increases in freight rates amounting to 140 per cent. I am not contesting that figure.

Mr. Balcer: One hundred and forty seven per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman said that up to the present it was 157 per cent, of which 17 per cent was under the present government. I have his words right here, and I checked them just before rising to speak. He said that 140 per cent was under the previous government. I am not contesting these figures at all.

Mr. Balcer: Something around 15 times.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. It would be an increase of 140 per cent, which is not exactly 15 times. I think it is probably 14 times, but again I am not seeking to get into an arithmetical contest with the Minister of Transport. What I was going to observe was this. Suppose we take 157 per cent, which is the figure right up to the present, including the 17 per cent about which this bill is concerned. I recall very well that in the year 1939 I bought a Chevrolet sedan for which I paid $1,100. I think anyone who goes into the market today to buy that kind of motorcar made by the same company will pay three times that much, or a 300 per cent increase.

Mr. Thrasher: You are wrong.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member can show me a comparable Chevrolet sedan that can be bought new—

Mr. Thrasher: I will show you a better one for $2,800.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member will not get a better one, because a better one is not made. I have had some experience in the matter, and the motorcars that have been made since the war are not as good in quality as the ones that were made before the war. In any event, the point is that whether you pay $2,800 or $3,000 the disparity is far greater than the disparity in freight rates. That is the whole point. It is about twice as much no matter on what scale you take it.

It seems to me that it is really quite irresponsible for us on either side of the house to suggest, in view of the increase in costs of every kind that has taken place since 1939, although practically all of it has been since 1945 because of price control during the war, that the railways could conceivably, with the greatest possible efficiency, provide service without an increase in the cost of that service and an increase from some quarter in the compensation for it.

It seems to me that anyone who talks as though that kind of miracle could have been performed is not really talking realistically about this subject or making much of a contribution to the solution of a problem which I would say is one of the three or four most difficult problems that we have to solve in this country. It does seem to me that on the whole it would be a good thing for us in parliament to try to contribute to the solution of that problem, and surely the first point in its solution is to try to get the facts straight.

The Minister of Transport suggested in the course of his remarks yesterday that the present government had done very well because while there had been a 140 per cent increase under the former administration, there had only been a 17 per cent increase under the present administration.

Mr. Balcer: Eight per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Seventeen per cent in the rates.

Mr. Balcer: Brought back to 8 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not trying to distort the facts, but perhaps I could be allowed to put them in my own words. A 17 per cent increase was granted by the board of transport commissioners, and the government decided in 1959 and again in 1960 and is now asking parliament again to reduce that increase by a grant out of the treasury. That is what we are talking about. That is the purpose of this legislation. The increase was made, but the government decided that instead of the whole 17 per cent being paid by the shippers, or whoever does pay when it is charged in freight bills, approximately half of that increase should be paid by the taxpayers out of the treasury.

That is the point. But the government did not decide that it should not be paid. The government did not decide the railways were not entitled to it. The government decided that for the time being, whether or not the railways were entitled to it, they should receive it. That was the decision announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he was acting prime minister in 1958. My hon. friend from Laurier placed that statement on Hansard yesterday.

If the railways are to provide services and if they are to pay, as we think they should, wages that are comparable with the wages paid to other workers in Canada for comparable work—and I do not see how, especially on a railway owned by the taxpayers, we could expect anything else—if those two conditions are to be met, these costs have to be paid by somebody. They have to be apportioned in some fashion, and the apportionment of them is really about all that parliament can do very much about. The question of how they are to be apportioned is admittedly a very complicated one.

Parliament decided years ago, after world war I, that the Crowsnest rates on grain were not to be changed; and no government and no political party, as the hon. member for Assiniboia quite properly said, has ever deviated from that position. It is true that in the report of the MacPherson commission it is recommended that the railways should receive, out of the treasury of Canada, some compensation for the maintenance of those rates. That will be, when the time comes, if it comes, if the government brings forward legislation, a very debatable question, but it is not under debate at the present time. The hon. member for Assiniboia, and my friend the hon. member for Laurier, and the Prime Minister at various times in the life of this parliament have made very clear the position on this question of all three parties represented in this house, and as far as I am aware there is no division at all on it.

After the Duncan commission made its report in 1927, if my memory is right, the government of that day saw fit to introduce the Maritime Freight Rates Act. That act had the effect of reducing, by means of compensation from the treasury to the railways the effect on shippers in the maritime provinces of certain freight rates. That legislation was extended to Newfoundland at the time Newfoundland became a part of Canada, in 1949.

In the year 1957 my hon. friend Mr. Harris brought a budget into this house, and in the course of that budget announced that the benefits to the shippers in the maritime provinces under the Maritime Freight Rates Act would be increased from 20 per cent to 30 per cent. That represented an increase of 50 per cent. It so happens that that was just the last of many steps taken by the Liberal government over the years following 1918 to mitigate the effect of the standard rates on certain sections of the community.

My friend the hon. member for Laurier did not mention that particular one because at the time of its introduction he was serving our country in another capacity.

That is really what the approach of the Liberal government has been, to mitigate for certain sections of the country the effect of the standard rates. Among the sections of the country that have benefited were the grain growers, the Atlantic provinces, the east-west traffic in respect of the bridge to which the hon. member for Laurier referred, and British Columbia because of the abolition of the mountain differential. By the various steps toward equalization that were taken by the board of transport commissioners as a result of the action taken in this parliament at the request of my friend the hon. member for Laurier in 1951, very considerable ameliorations have made more equitable to the Canadian people generally the weight of these charges.

Nobody can remove these charges without affecting revenues. Nobody can reduce them very materially, it seems to me, although automation may have some effect, as other kinds of efficiencies may also have, without reducing the services. I think it is foolish to pretend there is some magic way by which these can be changed. I know there are certain people who feel that if the whole system of control established by Sir Wilfrid Laurier when the board of railway commissioners was first established early in this century were abandoned; if free competition were permitted and the railways were allowed to set any kind of rates they liked, they might be able to be more efficient and cut their costs. Although I have a bias in favour of freedom, frankly I have a little scepticism about this particular argument. Nevertheless it is an argument that is made seriously by serious people.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: At one o'clock, sir, I was pointing out that it seemed to me that all of us, in considering this problem of freight rates—although the bill deals with only one very small aspect of the subject—must keep one basic fact in mind. Unless we are going to say that the railways must go bankrupt, or unless we are going to say that they are not to pay wages comparable with the wages for comparable activities, unless we are going to make that kind of decision somebody has got to pay the cost of maintaining these services. The only problem that we are faced with is how these costs are to be divided. Of course I suppose that a really full-fledged socialist would say, "We will give the railway services free"; that is to say, that they would all be paid for out of the treasury, because that is the only way in which they can be given free.

An hon. Member: It still is not free.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose these great champions of free enterprise like the Prime Minister would say, "We will take all the controls off the railway and let them charge anything they like for any service, and any service that does not pay will have to be abolished".

An hon. Member: Where does he say that?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that the Prime Minister said it. I said I supposed that these free enterprisers, whose ranks the Prime Minister has lately joined, would say that we should take all the controls of every kind off the railways, let them charge anything they like and if any service does not pay, we should abolish it. But nobody in this parliament, not even the Prime Minister or the hon. member for Skeena—and they perhaps represent the two extremes in this house—really means either of these things.

Mr. Peters: What do you mean?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely what I intend to explain. I mean first of all, as I said before luncheon, that a certain measure of railway service, ever since confederation and prior to confederation—as one of the terms of confederation the Intercolonial railway was built—has been regarded as in the national interest; and that railway service must be paid for somehow by someone. There are two questions this parliament can settle and only two, it seems to me. The first is how much of that railway service really is in the national interest. The second is how that part of it which is in the national interest is to be paid for.

We in the Liberal party, when we were in office and since then, have never taken the view, any more than did the Turgeon commission, that horizontal increases or any other kind of increases in freight rates may not from time to time be necessary in order to pay for these services. We have never taken the view that there will not be certain instances in which some of the services should be paid for out of the treasury. In fact, as my hon. friend from Laurier pointed out earlier, it was the Liberal party that was responsible for the Maritime Freight Rates

Act, and it was the Liberal party that was responsible for the bridge in northern Ontario.

That was a decision that in the national interest the treasury should pay for these things instead of their being paid for by shippers or by whoever benefited directly from the service. We have decided twice already in this parliament, and we are now being asked to decide again as a stopgap, that half of a 17 per cent increase which the board of transport commissioners decided the railways were entitled to and the government agreed they were entitled to in 1958, or about half of it should be paid out of the treasury, and the other half should be paid by the shippers until such time as a long term solution is found.

We did not quarrel with that decision in 1959; we did not quarrel with it in 1960; and my hon. friend from Laurier indicated before luncheon, we do not quarrel with it now in itself. What we quarrel with is the fact that the government, instead of being straightforward about this matter; instead of saying that until the MacPherson commission had plenty of time to reach its conclusions that in the meantime they were going on with this stopgap; over and over again the government have held out false hopes about this matter and promises that were not fulfilled. For example, we have the Prime Minister in 1957 saying this. It is true he had no responsibility then, but in 1957, under what I called the other day that noontide of promises in that month of May four years ago, the Prime Minister had a few things to say about freight rates. This is a Canadian Press report in the Montreal Gazette of May 20 from Drumheller, Alberta, May 18:

At Drumheller he said there should be equalization of rail rates in Canada "within reasonable limits"—

I do not know what that means.

—to give a shot in the arm to agriculture and industry on the prairies... On freight rates he said that a rate pattern discriminatory to the west has been made worse by recent increases. This had struck "an almost paralysing blow" to industrial development in the west.

That is what the Prime Minister said. Then the Globe and Mail reported this:

He said a Conservative government would equalize freight rates as far as possible to help both agriculture and industry on the prairies compete with the rest of Canada.

Mr. Fisher: What is the source?

Mr. Pickersgill: What has happened? A 17 per cent increase has been reduced to 8 per cent with the help of the treasury. I do not think anyone thought the equalization that the Prime Minister was promising in Drumheller would be another horizontal increase.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

This was in 1957. But the Prime Minister in 1958, when he had had some months of office, if not responsibility, had this to say in another part of the country. This is from the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of March 3, 1958, a report of a speech made at Saint John, New Brunswick on March 1, 1958:

Addressing a public meeting at the Saint John high school, Prime Minister Diefenbaker gave a hint of a new promise for the maritime provinces.

In that noontide of promises of 1957, they were not hints of promises; they were outright promises. In 1958, except for one famous promise that we all remember, that no one would suffer, they were hints of promises:

—Prime Minister Diefenbaker gave a hint of a new promise for the maritime provinces. He said his government was considering additional freight rate assistance for the area to spur industrial development.

Then it says:

Mr. Diefenbaker's reference to consideration of new freight rate aid for the maritimes involved the Maritime Freight Rates Act, a 1927 statute under which rates on goods moving between the maritimes and central Canada were set at a below average level.

He said the government is studying the possibility of broadening the basis of aid and changing the present formula to remove discriminations.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, could I ask what document the hon. member is quoting from?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quoting from a compendium of the statements and promises of the Prime Minister, all of which are taken from the press of Canada. There are two volumes of them, which I have in my hands. One was prepared in 1957 from the promises made in that year; the other was prepared in 1958 from the promises made in that year; and I notice these documents are never quoted from the other side of the house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the hon. member has ever taken the trouble to weigh those two volumes to see what is the weight of the promises. I understand they weigh around five pounds.

Mr. Pickersgill: They have been weighed in the balance and most of them have been found wanting; I can say that.

Mr. Ricard: It is a good thing you have them, otherwise you would not be able to speak.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could finish replying to one question before I undertake to reply to another. As I said to the hon. gentleman, they have been weighed in the balance and most of them have been found wanting, as those two promises were. I refer to the promise to do something about maritime freight rates. Something was done about them; that is quite true. As the hon. member for Port Arthur pointed out yesterday, freight rates were frozen before the 1958 election, but after the 1958 election the increase was allowed. Then this legislation which we are now being asked to renew was brought in to diminish that increase, but only to diminish it. That is all that has happened to implement either of those promises.

It is true that the MacPherson commission was appointed, and I am not going to say that ten years after the Turgeon commission, with all the changes that have taken place since, another dispassionate look at our transportation problems was not justified. I would not say that at all. I think probably it was. However, I do say that this commission should have been allowed to carry on its work until it had completed it, without being made a political tool, as it was made a political tool, last November when the government was embarrassed about the railway labour dispute and the whole work of the commission was interfered with and perverted—

Mr. Churchill: What is your evidence for saying that?

Mr. Pickersgill: —by the efforts of the Prime Minister to use it as an excuse to compel the men to go back to work without any increase in pay for months.

Some hon. Members: That is nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what happened and, as my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition pointed out yesterday, the promise was made that this commission would report on March 31; that it would provide a solution of the whole problem, and that this solution would be brought before this house in the form of legislation before May 15.

I am not going to repeat those promises because the Leader of the Opposition put them on the record yesterday; they are there, and everybody knows them. The Prime Minister put them on the record in the first place, of course, when it suited his political purpose. As I say, none of those things has been performed and all we have before us is the same problem which we had last December and an interim report of the royal commission upon which the government does not dare express its views, apparently in May anyway—maybe it will in June—and this stopgap of 1959.

I say that this is no way to treat this serious problem. While we recognize that we do not want to see, any more than anyone else, the whole 17 per cent increase imposed upon the shippers and we will therefore support this stopgap as a stopgap, we say the government is derelict in its duty in not dealing with the real problem.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this subject today. However, Your Honour will recall that this morning when the hon. member for Laurier was speaking in this house on the question of the equalization of freight rates for Canada, and in particular on the bill which is now before the house, I asked him whether he had ever said anything in reference to the Crowsnest pass freight rates and whether he had been reported as saying—because I recall the report—that the Crowsnest pass freight rates really were shackling the railways.

In order to make our position clear I think I should set out what I feel our position is as far as the Crowsnest pass freight rates are concerned. In doing so may I add these few introductory remarks. Over the years the fact is that we have enjoyed in western Canada, in the agricultural areas, the Crowsnest pass freight rates. They have assisted the farmers in getting their grain off the farms, into the markets and to Fort William at a reasonable freight rate.

That is why the Prime Minister has said on several occasions during my short time as a member of parliament that the Crowsnest pass freight rates are really the economic magna carta for western Canada and in particular for the western farmers. In particular, when speaking on May 13, 1959, when the royal commission was set up to inquire into problems relating to the railways, the Prime Minister made very clear the stand of this government and the Conservative party as far as the Crowsnest pass freight rates were concerned. On Wednesday, May 13, 1959, as reported at page 3607 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said this:

> When the Minister of Public Works as acting prime minister announced the government's intention to arrange for this review he assured the western farmers that such review would not mean that they would have to pay more freight on the shipment of grain for export. I wish to take this occasion to confirm this, in regard particularly to the action that may be taken as a result of the work of the royal commission. To make it clear beyond question, the Crowsnest pass rates are part of a bargain that was made between the railways and the government on the one hand and the settlers who went west on the other hand. We intend, in so far as this government is concerned, to see to it that that contract shall not be broken.

In brief, it seems that there the Prime Minister set out clearly once again that as far as the royal commission was concerned there would be no interference with the Crowsnest pass freight rates. The Prime Minister also said on November 30, 1960, as reported at page 358 of Hansard:

> There is also the indirect subsidy, claimed as such, of the Crowsnest pass rates which, in so far as this government is concerned, must not be changed, for the legislation of 1897 was a Magna Carta, as it were, for the western provinces before they became provinces.

In other words, we made it clear where this government and this party stand as far as the Crowsnest pass rates are concerned in relation to the shipment of western grain.

Returning to my introductory remarks, I asked the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Laurier, whether he had ever said anything to leave the impression that those rates should be looked into or that those rates should be changed. I want now to read from page 3751 of Hansard for May 18, 1959. Hon. members who wish to refer to this volume will see that there was some discussion between the Prime Minister and the hon. member on this subject. The present Secretary of State for External Affairs had directed the following question to the hon. member for Laurier:

> May I ask the hon. member for Laurier to explain in more detail what he means by this suggestion? What does he thing should have been written into the terms of the commission in this respect?

I suggest that this question was asked in order to determine where the hon. member for Laurier stood as far as this subject was concerned. Now let us see what the answer was, I am reading from page 3751 of Hansard for May 18, 1959:

> Then there is the other matter to which the Prime Minister himself referred when he made the announcement of the royal commission. I should like to quote his words. If I interpret them wrongly I am sure he will correct me. At page 3607 of Hansard of May 13 the Prime Minister said—

Then the hon. member for Laurier went on to quote what the Prime Minister had said on that occasion, and if hon. members check the words used by the hon. member for Laurier they will find that he quoted the Prime Minister exactly. He set out the Prime Minister's stand as far as the Crowsnest pass rates are concerned in relation to the western farmers. But I am going to repeat the Prime Minister's statement. This is the quotation:

> When the Minister of Public Works as acting prime minister announced the government's intention to arrange for this review he assured the western farmers that such review would not mean that they would have to pay more freight on the shipment of grain for export. I wish to take this occasion to confirm this, in regard particularly to the action that may be taken as a result of the work of the royal commission. To make it clear beyond question, the Crowsnest pass rates are part of a bargain which was made between the railways and the government on the one hand and the settlers who went west on the other hand. We intend, in so far as this government is concerned, to see to it that that contract shall not be broken.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Then the hon. member for Laurier went on to say this:

> In that statement the Prime Minister for obvious reasons has started the royal commission off with—

At this point the Deputy Chairman interrupted by pointing out to the hon. member for Laurier that his time had expired. Some members invited the hon. gentleman to continue. The Deputy Chairman asked whether there was unanimous consent that such a course should be taken, and various hon. members indicated agreement.

Now we come to the statement which I wish to put on record and about which I intend to ask some questions in order to find out where the hon. member for Laurier stands, and to find out whether he was speaking for the Liberal party or for himself with respect to the Crowsnest pass rates in relation to western Canada. This is what the hon. gentleman had to say:

> I had reached the last point I intended to make, and I am grateful to the Prime Minister and hon. members of the committee for allowing me to continue. When I was interrupted I was saying that I thought this commission was being started off with one foot carrying a ball and chain, because unless I interpret this (the Prime Minister's) statement wrongly it indicates that they cannot consider the Crowsnest pass rates because these rates are part of a bargain which was made between the railways and the government on the one hand and the setlers in the west on the other.

Let us look further at what the hon. member said. Let us analyse it for a minute. His words were:

> When I was interrupted I was saying that I thought this commission was being started off with one foot carrying a ball and chain—

I have not the clipping here, but if my memory serves me right the Calgary Albertan, which is a Liberal newspaper—whether it was quoting the hon. gentleman correctly or misquoting him I do not know; it is for the house to judge—reported that the hon. member had stated the railways were shackled as far as the Crowsnest pass rates are concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the hon. member cite any passage in Hansard where I have made that statement?

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member will bear with me, I am sure; that is why I am being very careful to say it is for the members of this house to judge for themselves, as well as for those outside the house who are concerned with it. I intend to ask the hon. member a few questions, and then the house and the people of western Canada can decide where the hon. member stands on this subject. He says the Liberal party has always stood for the equalization of freight rates and that the Liberal party has always supported the Crowsnest pass freight rates—

An hon. Member: You won't be here.

Mr. Woolliams: Time will judge. Time has judged before, it judges today and it will judge tomorrow. I intend to read again what the hon. member said:

> When I was interrupted I was saying that I thought the commission was being started off with one foot carrying a ball and chain—

Well, a ball and chain is a shackle, a heavy shackle.

Mr. Argue: Maybe there was one on each foot.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, maybe he wanted one on each foot to shackle western Canada as far as these rates are concerned. The hon. member continued:

> —because unless I interpret this statement wrongly it indicates that they cannot consider the Crowsnest pass rates because these rates are part of a bargain that was made between the railways and the government on the one hand and the settlers in the west on the other.

This statement suggests to me that the hon. gentleman is criticizing the Prime Minister and criticizing the government because when they set up the royal commission the Crowsnest pass rates were omitted from the terms of reference.

Let us think of this as a question. Why did the hon. member want those freight rates considered by the royal commission? I have always respected the hon. member for Laurier and listened with pleasure to what he has had to say, because he has that touch of culture which makes him an excellent orator. But when he set out the facts with reference to this subject and criticized the Prime Minister for not including the Crowsnest rates in the reference to the royal commission, did he do so because he wanted those rates, to put it bluntly, looked into by the commission? Was he not suggesting that they should be the subject of inquiry and, if they were felt to be unfair and discriminatory in the opinion of the Liberals, that they should be changed? On that I rest my case.

Mr. Chevrier: Not a very good case.

Mr. Woolliams: It may not be, but I shall leave that to the jury.

I think I should read on. The hon. member said:

> I doubt if that is correct from an historical standpoint, but I have not risen for that purpose.

The hon. member made it clear that this was not the purpose for which he got up to speak. He continued:

> So far as the government is concerned, the declaration that this contract would not be broken seems to be tantamount to excluding the Crowsnest pass rates from the scope of the inquiry of the royal commission. If I am wrong I stand to be corrected.

What the Prime Minister had stated with regard to the subject, and the quotation which the hon. member for Laurier read from Hansard of May 13, 1959 was very clear. The Prime Minister made it plain when he dealt with the terms of reference of this commission that it was not to look into the Crowsnest freight rates because they were a solemn contract between the western sector, the western farmers, and the railways. It is also made clear that in consideration for that deal the railways got plenty. The Canadian Pacific Railway received land, and from that land they got petroleum, oil and natural gas; extremely valuable rights in the western provinces. It is true that since that date the C.P.R. has formed separate companies and turned those resources over to those companies; consequently they do not now show in the profits of the railway. Nevertheless, in considering this bill everyone from western Canada, irrespective of politics, knows, just as the hon. member for Assiniboia agreed with me this morning in reference to this subject, that as part of the deal the C.P.R. got that land and they got rich resources of petroleum, natural gas and other considerations.

There is the other aspect of the situation that some members seem to miss. A commodity such as grain is hauled to country elevators in bulk. From those country elevators the grain is loaded in cars in bulk. Anyone who has lived on the prairies from the time he was a boy has seen the trains, first steam and now diesels, taking the grain across the prairies. Those trains were half a mile or more long, and the cars were full of grain. I suggest that the manner in which this grain is transported makes that commodity easier for the railroads to handle than any other commodity in Canada. Surely this fact was behind the thinking of this government and of the Prime Minister, and that is why the solemn contract which was completed should stand on the statute books and the Crowsnest pass rates should not be interfered with. Surely this is why the subject was left out of the terms of reference of the royal commission.

Who was the chairman of that royal commission? It was Mr. M. A. MacPherson of Regina, a former attorney general of Saskatchewan. If anyone knows anything about the railways as far as freight rates are concerned it is this gentleman. Irrespective of politics, he knows the subject well, because he has acted at various times as counsel for the province of Saskatchewan, and has set forth the very same arguments I am putting forward this afternoon. This man was named the head of the commission, and this is why the subject of the Crowsnest pass rates was excluded, although evidence was allowed in. It was excluded in the report of the royal commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Mr. Woolliams: Why, certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. gentleman explain to the house how, if the subject was excluded from the royal commission, Mr. MacPherson was able to make recommendations about it, as he has done?

Mr. Woolliams: I am very happy that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has asked me the question. I do not know whether he has finished his law course, but he knows that once a royal commission is set up the chairman of that royal commission controls the evidence and what he puts in his judgment is within his jurisdiction.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate may laugh, but let him show us in this House of Commons where it says in the terms of reference that the MacPherson commission should admit evidence and make no decision as far as that subject is concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: The government say they should not.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a question?

Mr. Woolliams: I am glad to have these questions.

Mr. Pearson: Can the hon. member explain how a royal commission can make recommendations on a matter which is not within its terms of reference?

Mr. Woolliams: Well, I am not going to get into a legal battle with the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has started his law course; I do not know when the Leader of the Opposition will start his, but he knows as well as I do that any commission is controlled by its terms of reference. Let us get back to the subject matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Let us not lose sight of the fact that the hon. member for Laurier criticized the terms of reference because they did not allow the royal commission to look into the Crowsnest pass rates. If he wanted them looked into, Mr. Speaker, it is quite likely that he wanted them changed. As long as the Liberal party is running for office in western Canada this little ghost will come out of the cupboard and warn the people on election day where the Liberal party stands in western Canada as far as freight rates are concerned.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly. I have had questions from the front row. Since I am far at the back I like to hear these questions; I want to know how the front row think.

Mr. Argue: I should like to know whether the hon. gentleman is in favour of the majority report which says that there should be a subsidy to compensate for the Crowsnest rates, or does he agree with the commissioner who says that the Crowsnest rates carry themselves and the railways have no claim whatsoever for any compensation?

Mr. Woolliams: That is a very good question, and if I were to answer it I might be here all afternoon. One thing I will say. This is something for the government to decide. I would say to the hon. member for Assiniboia if they decide the question as the government has decided that the Crowsnest pass rates shall not be changed they will get my support, and I will always have confidence in our leader, the Prime Minister of this country.

I should now like to say something with reference to the shipping of another commodity. In my earlier remarks I dealt with the question of the transportation of grain and why it is so easy to transport it from the country elevators to terminals in Vancouver, Fort William or Port Arthur or wherever it is going. It seems to me that if the principle that is applied to the shipment of grain were applied to the shipment of coal from western Canada, then coal could move from some of the mines of western Canada and compete with coal going into eastern Canada from Pennsylvania on the same terms and conditions as we compete with reference to grain.

It is unfortunate that up to now, with one or two exceptions which I shall deal with later, coal has been shipped in individual carload lots. There was an exception to that. I see the former minister of trade and commerce in his place. I know he recalls the deal in 1958 under which coal from Canmore and the Crowsnest pass was shipped to Japan. At that time we sold some 600,000-odd tons of coal under one contract. On that occasion the coal did move from those areas in trainload lots. At that time, of course, the cost of transportation was cut. May I suggest that the subject be looked into carefully.

I have dealt with agriculture, which is a major industry in my constituency. Coal mining in my constituency has suffered because of competition from petroleum and natural gas. Consequently the coal miners have been laid off in the last 10 years. If coal could be transported in a cheaper way, then it would revitalize the industry, because the industry would be able to compete with coal coming to eastern Canada from other ports and U.S.A.

I have been most happy to put on the record the reasons I asked the hon. member for Laurier questions with reference to the Crowsnest pass rates.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Do I understand that the hon. member for Laurier rises under standing order 37?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to mention to him and to the hon. member who just resumed his seat that standing order 37 does not permit the hon. member for Laurier to reply to the questions which were put to him. The only thing he can do is correct any misinterpretation or misunderstanding which may have been put on his remarks by the hon. member for Bow River. I thought I might warn the hon. member for Bow River at the same time, because he might insist on having an answer to his questions which he cannot get under the standing orders.

Mr. Chevrier: That is all I am seeking to do, Mr. Speaker. I am seeking to reply in accordance with the standing order to which you have referred.

I think the hon. member for Bow River who has just taken his seat has used his imagination far more than he should have done. If he had read the whole of the statement I made when the discussion took place earlier he would have had no reason to intervene nor ask the questions which he did. He started off by saying that I had made a statement to the effect that the Crowsnest rates were really shackling the railways. He was not able to find any place in Hansard where a statement to that effect had been made by me. What he did was to read into Hansard certain statements from which he drew that inference, but he did not give himself the trouble, as he should have, as every hon. member of this house should in such circumstances, to complete the statement I made on that occasion. If he had done so he would not have said what he did earlier. I now want to put on the record the whole of this statement and I ask the house, the country generally and western Canada in particular to be the jury in this case. As found at the bottom of page 3751 of Hansard for May 18, 1959—

Mr. Woolliams: They may find against you.

Mr. Chevrier: They will find that the hon. member did not read all of my statement from Hansard. He just read the convenient parts and forgot other parts that are pertinent.

Mr. Woolliams: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member spoke on that occasion he ran out of time. If I had put all his statement on Hansard I too would have run out of time, and I would not have completed my statement of facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: You ran out on the quotation instead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I read standing order 37 for the guidance of hon. members:

> No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but then he is not to introduce any new matter, and no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation.

Mr. Chevrier: I should now like to put on the record this pertinent part of my remarks which the hon. member for Bow River conveniently overlooked:

> The point I wish to make is this. When the Prime Minister made the announcement of the royal commission I said that when some years ago I occupied the position which my hon. friend the Minister of Transport now occupies, the situation in so far as the Crowsnest rates were concerned was quite clearly established by parliament and we had no intention of changing those rates in any way whatsoever.

Is that clear? These are statements made by me in 1959. I continue:

> But the point I wish to make now is this. Why should it not be within the scope and purpose of the royal commission to inquire into whether those rates are compensatory? Surely there is nothing which would effect in any way the rights of people in western Canada if that were done. And if perchance it were found that the rates are not compensatory to the railways, then the royal commission might want to make a recommendation to parliament for the payment of a subsidy on behalf of the western farmer, who benefits from the movement of grain because of the Crowsnest rates, in the same manner and to the same extent that there has been a Maritime Freight Rates Act, as there has been a bridge subsidy, and as there has been assistance given from time to time to certain areas for the movement of commodities.

Then the Prime Minister interrupted to ask this question:

> May I ask the hon. gentleman this question? He has quoted what I said and I stand on those words, but I would ask him what are his suggestions. How would the western farmer be compensated? He has studied this very carefully. The Turgeon commission dealt with this matter rather subjectively. The hon. member, having been a minister, and having given a great deal of study to this, possibly would suggest what he has in mind.

Then I replied:

Before I answer—

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is now going beyond what you outlined as the implications of standing order 37. He may speak in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but he is not to introduce any new matter, and that is precisely what he is doing now. He is going on with a long explanation trying to defend his position when the jury has already found him guilty.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before hearing the evidence. What a jury.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the very intelligent and clever interference by the house leader. I am replying to the entirely false allegation made against me, and I want to complete my remarks by putting the rest of my statement on the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has indicated that he wants to reply, but that is not what the standing order permits. It only permits an explanation. I do not think it is necessary for the hon. member to put on Hansard long extracts from former debates to explain how the hon. member for Bow River may have misquoted or misinterpreted his speech. Otherwise the hon. member is really being allowed to speak twice and to introduce new matter bringing about a debate, which is not the purpose of the standing order.

Mr. Chevrier: I was attempting to correct the erroneous impression created and the incorrect statement made by the hon. member for Bow River and I had almost completed the statement when I was interrupted by my hon. friend. I continue:

Mr. Chevrier: Before I answer the Prime Minister's question will he allow me to ask him one question? Am I correct in the assumption I have made that the royal commission on transportation is not to give consideration to the Crowsnest rates?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not challenged the hon. member's interpretation.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I take it I was correct in my assumption. That being so, it seems to me that I made it quite clear that if the commission were given the power to study this matter they might well make a recommendation that a subsidy should be paid which would give assistance to the railways in the amount required to compensate for the right which the western farmer enjoys in so far as those rates are concerned. If that were a recommendation of the royal commission and the government decided to implement it, I am sure that parliament would give it the consideration which is required in these matters and which it would deserve under all conditions.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

As the house knows, the MacPherson royal commission on transportation has made its report and has recommended exactly what was suggested by the hon. member for Laurier in that statement. Having said that, I say to the hon. member for Bow River that he is hoist on his own petard.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was introduced and I read it I found that it had to do with an increase in the board of directors of Canadian National Railways, which brought back to my mind a former board of directors and the bringing of a motion in the house with respect to the then president of Canadian National Railways. The hon. member for Northwest Toronto at that time, later the member for Broadview, had some pertinent things to say about the president of Canadian National Railways, and I presume the introduction of this motion to increase the board of directors provides an opportunity to say something about this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member speak a little louder?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might indicate to the hon. member that the house is now concerned with Bill No. C-93, an act to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

Mr. Small: That is the reason I brought up this matter. I was at a loss to know whether it had to do with the board of directors, having regard to the way the debate was proceeding; because the sum and substance of the debate seemed to be the increase in the board of directors. That is all I could get out of it, and as it seemed there was no attempt to bring the debate into line I thought I would continue along that line.

However, we are now talking about freight rates, and I listened to hon. members this morning referring to the Crowsnest pass rates and pointing out that none of the parties would be opposed to them. That is beside the point, because I have never heard of any party opposing them. They were established in the latter part of the nineteenth century to take care of the situation in the west. It was very necessary for the west to have these rates. We are now concerned with present conditions as to freight rates, and the matter of the directors who are going to sit on the board in the future has been interwoven in the debate. Members have injected any subject they wanted to discuss into the debate as if we were discussing a resolution preceding a bill.

I want to say that I brought up this question before. I was surprised to hear from the hon. member for Assiniboia and also the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on the matter of the Crowsnest pass rates. I thought they had discussed this subject once before, and I thought any interference with the Crowsnest pass rates was anathema to them. They said that we dare not touch those rates because they were a form of protection given to the farmers out west who were bringing their grain to market. This is something new coming from that motley crew of free traders over there.

However, since they are questioning these Crowsnest pass rates, perhaps it would be wise for us to examine the various things that have been brought forward with regard to the movement of our wheat. It was natural that when costs went up freight rates were increased. In the case of the Crowsnest pass rates, there was more or less a covenant that those rates would remain the same. I have no opposition to that. As I have said before, I have no particular objection to what I call these built-in preferences for the benefit of agriculture in the west, but now these free traders ask, where is the money coming from? If you are going to give subsidies, where is the money coming from?

I never heard such a nonsensical question before. It is quite obvious where the money is coming from. It comes from the people who pay taxes, the working people. This is the place from which all the money comes. No matter how you present the case to the people, the fact still remains that it is the people who pay taxes who supply the money that the government uses. We have to see that the money is wisely spent, wisely allotted. If the government is going to make more money available for freight costs out west, let us say frankly that it is going to be done by means of a subsidy or whatever the method may be. Let us say so, and let us be honest about it.

Let me make an interjection at this point, and I hope I will be allowed the same latitude as others were permitted on the subject of the board of directors. I have listened to the debate here, and I go along with the hon. member for Port Arthur and also the hon. member for Greenwood—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must warn the hon. member that these comments were made in another debate, the debate on the resolution preceding the measure to increase the numbers of directors of the Canadian National. This debate of yesterday is another matter.

Mr. Small: I have read both debates of yesterday and I cannot distinguish between the two of them. There seems to have been a very wide latitude permitted and obviously the subjects were not separated, so far as I can see. I thought perhaps I would be giving an omnibus and see if in that way I could get it all in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should realize that in a few minutes, if this debate is concluded, he will have an opportunity to make these remarks; because I understand the next item will be the measure in which he is interested, and his remarks would then be relevant.

Mr. Small: I thought I might get the debate ended by interjecting in this way.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I have no intention of speaking for as long as I did yesterday on the resolution stage of the bill. However, I want to touch on something that has been mentioned by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Hon. members may recall that quite a number of times in the last couple of years I have brought up a particular issue which I feel now, in the light of the battle cry that has gone resounding out across the country for the next general election, the battle cry of free enterprise, is particularly relevant.

I want to ask this minister, as I have asked other ministers, to explain how a group of free enterprisers can boldly go pushing out these subsidies to support things. When are we going to see revealed in all its glory the beautiful rhythm of this free enterprise effort? When is it going to be demonstrated that this government really means that it stands for free enterprise?

Mr. Grafftey: What about the Regina manifesto?

Mr. Fisher: I have had an interjection from my favourite interjector down there. Do I remember the Regina manifesto? This question has been thrown at me quite a number of times. I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman that the C.C.F. changed its approach in view of changing circumstances, and I assume this is what the Conservative government has done. After all, a Conservative government did start the C.B.C. It was the former Conservative prime minister, Mr. Meighen, who was the architect in the building of the Canadian National Railways. But I thought we had a new issue laid right on the line by the Prime Minister not long ago, that the issue in the next election is to be between free enterprise and socialism.

Mr. Pickersgill: That has been changed twice since.

Mr. Fisher: I can just see coming up again that dead hand of socialism; the cry to keep out the hand of socialism, the pinkos. Yesterday we heard this announcement from the minister about the shipbuilding industry. Did all hon. members look at the lead editorial in the Globe and Mail today? I hope they did. The Globe and Mail welcomed the Prime Minister's statement that the issue was to be between socialism and free enterprise. I am beginning to doubt even the Globe and Mail's approach, because they welcomed this $50 million subsidy to the shipping industry; at least I calculate it will be about that amount. Here we have another subsidy.

I should like the minister to tell us how this really fits into the free enterprise theory of the Conservative party; or has the Conservative party changed in the last 10 years, just as the C.C.F. party changed the Regina manifesto of the 30's to the Winnipeg declaration. The reason I ask this question is that in the friendly relations one has around the house, the talk behind the curtains and in the lobbies, one recognizes that there are a great many free enterprisers in the Conservative party. I see some of them in the house now. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome), the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) and the hon. member for York North (Mr. Cathers) would be among these free enterprisers. There is this group of people within the Conservative party who, as I know them, seem to stand for free enterprise. I know they welcome the Prime Minister's declaration. Yet again and again we keep getting this type of legislation which is nothing more than, perhaps not outright, crass socialism, but at least creeping socialism.

I should like to point out to the minister that the MacPherson commission took this view of the feeling in Canada today, and in the preface to the report said:

> We sense in our hearings across the country an impatience and dissatisfaction with attempts to deal with the problem of transportation on a piecemeal or short run basis.

I think the commission really has got something. We have a call for a national transportation policy from the minister. In the light of the free enterprise ideal of the Prime Minister we must assume that this national transportation policy is going to be one of outright and open competition. We should like to know when we are going to see the C.B.C. being sold to private interests. When is the Canadian National going to be broken up and sold to private companies? What are we going to do with Polymer, Eldorado, Northern Transportation? Is this your election issue? This is what we would like to know, and we think the debate on second reading of this bill is another opportunity to call for information.

Now, the last point I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker, relates to the question of agreed charges. The minister knows that agreed charges do not come within the framework of this bill. The minister also knows that every year the number of agreed charges increases. The revenue from agreed charges has been increasing and, in fact, there has been a marked increase in the two years since this bill went into effect. The assumption one has to make, therefore, since this subsidy is not going to affect agreed charges, is that agreed charges are spreading more widely and the subsidies should be making an increasing contribution to that portion of freight that does not fall within the agreed charges or other competitive rates. From this point of view one would assume that the subsidy required might be less, because if agreed charges are proliferating—and if hon. members check in the C.P.R. annual report they will see that the increase has been marked in that railway; and we know it has been marked in the C.N.R.—then there might be a possibility of reducing this subsidy; and I am trying to look at this matter from the point of view of someone with Conservative principles.

I should like the minister to be prepared, during the committee stage when we are going through the bill, to explain to us what effect the proliferation of agreed charges has had upon the fund and whether it is spreading out wider or more deeply in those freight areas where the agreed charges are taking the business away. I realize that is a rather clumsy explanation but I think the minister can see the point I am making. If agreed charges are increasing and are providing more and more revenue for the railway, then there is less and less need for this subsidy. We should like to know what the relationship has been in the two years' experience.

Perhaps the last thing I should say on this matter, Mr. Speaker, is this. I thought the review given by the hon. member for Laurier was a worth-while one to have on the record. However, I should like to suggest that to anyone who reads Hansard and follows it, it is a record as seen through Liberal party eyes. This is fine, but once you accept that qualification, you put some different interpretations upon the freight rate increases that took place and you put some different interpretations upon the actions of the board of transport commissioners. I thought it was a good review of the record from the Liberal point of view.

I should like to add that I myself can see little difference in attitude toward the freight rate question on the part of this government and on the part of the previous Liberal government. I am back at the only thing with which I started and it is this. We seem to have this new statement of principle on the part of the Prime Minister that he and the Conservative party stand for free enterprise. I would therefore assume that this gives us a completely different approach. That is why I am back again wondering about those members in the house who support and stand with the Prime Minister for free enterprise, and wondering how they explain their vote and support for this particular measure.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question before he takes his seat. Does the hon. gentleman not realize that he is totally out of date? Does he not realize that the Prime Minister last week, scrapped that issue and gave us another, namely, "Banish fear; substitute faith"?

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, representing as I do a British Columbia constituency, I am very much pleased with this subsidy, even though the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) said I am an out and out free enterpriser. This subsidy is not incompatible with free enterprise. This subsidy is based on giving to the western seaboard and the eastern seaboard equal advantages which are at present enjoyed by the central provinces because of the variety of services which are offered to them and the fact that they have competitive means of shipping apart from rail transportation.

I should like to refer to the submission made by the province of British Columbia to the royal commission on transportation in order to give to the house an idea as to how this matter affects British Columbia. On page 24 of the submission to which I referred, under the heading "British Columbia's Dependence on Rail", we find the following:

> Shipments from British Columbia being bulky, heavy, and travelling long distances, are ideally suited to rail and are in many cases tied to railways as there is no reasonably competitive form of transportation for these types of commodities.
> Roads are difficult and costly to build through the province, and so trucks going to eastern Canada travel via the U.S.A. routes, paying license fees in each state. As there are no reciprocal licence arrangements between the province and the several states or provinces, truck operation over long hauls is very costly and impractical for the types of commodities which British Columbia has to offer.
> As there is usually no alternative form of transportation, reasonable rail freight rates—reasonable in the light of costs of carriage—are absolutely essential for the economic health of British Columbia. The fact is that the province depends almost entirely on railway transportation for its welfare and the economic growth of the Province is in danger of becoming stunted by reason of high freight charges.

In a table on the following page is shown the distribution of traffic between transportation agencies with regard to incoming and outgoing shipments in the year 1957. It shows for rail shipments incoming, a figure of almost 13 million tons; for shipments outgoing, almost 11 million tons. As to other forms of transportation, you find for water a figure of 760,000 for incoming shipments and of 194,000 tons for outgoing shipments. With regard to highway shipment, you find a figure of 176,000 tons for incoming shipments and of 64,000 tons for outgoing shipments. Rail traffic therefore represents from about 90 per cent to 95 per cent of all traffic incoming and outgoing in British Columbia. Therefore the purpose of the bill is to prevent those areas which are entirely dependent upon rail—those captive areas—from taking the great percentage of any freight rate increases which the railroads need to have and must have. In order to prevent this from happening—a happening which would throttle the economic growth of the maritimes and of the west coast—I contend this subsidy is necessary and essential.

I should like to refer for a few minutes to another subsidy with which we do not agree. I refer to the so-called bridge subsidy. The bridge subsidy was recommended by the Turgeon commission on the basis of what they called an economic desert north of lake Superior. It was a subsidy to facilitate the movement of goods from eastern Canada to western Canada against the railhead north of lake Superior which, in the opinion of the commission was largely an unproductive area as far as freight is concerned.

In this same submission of the province of British Columbia there is a comparison between the number of tons of freight generated per mile of traffic in the bridge area between Sudbury and Port Arthur. It showed the number of tons per mile as 2,425. The Turgeon commission said that this area would not generate the traffic which could be generated in the prairie provinces. When you compare this figure of 2,425 tons with that in the province of Manitoba, all lines, and that in the province of Saskatchewan, you find that the number of tons per mile in the province of Manitoba is 1,698 and in the province of Saskatchewan the number of tons per mile is 1,121. This so-called unproductive area is therefore a great deal more productive of freight than are the prairie provinces per mile of track.

The location of this bridge north of lake Superior gives an economic advantage to shippers in eastern Canada who already have alternative forms of transportation not available to the west coast. This puts us at a disadvantage in shipping eastward across the bridge. In the opinion of the province of British Columbia the bridge subsidy unfairly discriminates against that province.

Mr. Speaker, I have one other point and I will have finished. In regard to the general subsidies recommended by the MacPherson commission, and so on, in the Montreal Gazette of Tuesday, April 18, in the business section there appeared an article written by Mr. John Meyer. He pointed out that these subsidies would not be of the magnitude envisaged in the report because for one thing a subsidy to the C.N.R. would simply reduce the deficit, and on the other hand a subsidy to the C.P.R., because the C.P.R. is already in a 50 per cent tax bracket, would mean that half the subsidy would be returned in the form of corporation taxes.

Hon. members from the prairie provinces have gone into the question of the Crowsnest pass rates. However, I should like to point out that the dissenting opinion in the first volume of the report of the MacPherson commission pointed out that there were many ways in which costs had been loaded against the grain shipper of the west and these rates were much closer to being compensatory than is generally believed. I would refer hon. members to that dissenting opinion in the report if they wish to obtain a much fairer idea as to the true effect of the Crowsnest pass rates.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak only for a very short time. My words arise out of the statement made in this discussion by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) in which he threw some doubt on the policy of our party in regard to the Crowsnest pass rates.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) dealt with the references which were made to him based unfairly upon selected portions of a speech he had made. I need not go into that matter because it has been disposed of.

I would like to make it quite clear that this party remains firm in the position it has always adopted in regard to these rates and we would support no policy or no recommendation of any kind which would interfere with the rights of the producers established by the compact which led to those rates. That is a solemn compact and will not be interfered with so far as we are able to prevent that interference.

Our words on this matter, which I repeat this afternoon, have the advantage of being substantiated by the record of our party over the years. The words attributed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in this matter cannot be substantiated in the same way.

I recall, for instance, that the Crowsnest pass rates were abolished by the Conservative party in world war I and were restored by Mr. Mackenzie King when he formed the Liberal government. Therefore our record is clear in regard to the maintenance of these rights established for the producer under a solemn compact, and no effort on the part of any hon. member to throw any doubt on that record will be successful.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member say whether or not his party agrees with the stand taken by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) that if an investigation of the Crowsnest pass freight rates were undertaken and it were discovered that there was some difference between the cost of operating under these rates and the yield from the rates themselves, his party would be in favour of a subsidy earmarked to cover that difference?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, that is another point and I am quite happy to deal with it. The point I have been making is that the rights of the producers under these rates will not be interfered with so far as we are concerned.

My hon. friend said, what would we do if the government brought forward a subsidy to compensate the railways for those rates.

Mr. Jones: I did not say that.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member said that if a royal commission makes a recommendation for a subsidy of this kind—

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, just in order that we may proceed with the explanation I should like to refresh the Leader of the Opposition's memory on the question I actually asked. It was: what position would his party take if an investigation disclosed a difference between the operating costs in connection with the transport of grain under the Crowsnest pass rates and the yield from those freight rates themselves.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for clarifying the question. However, I would point out to him that in fact such an investigation has been made. It was made by a royal commission set up by this government with terms of reference laid down by this government. It was found appropriate and reasonable by the commission to make that investigation under these terms of reference. My hon. friend from Bow River criticized the hon. member for Laurier for dealing with this question when he made his statement.

This recommendation has been made. It is a recommendation by the majoriy of the commission. There was a dissenting voice to the effect that in fact no such subsidy should be given the railways. It is a responsibility of the government to decide whether or not it is going to implement this recommendation made by a commission set up by the government.

The Prime Minister has already stated that at least some of these recommendations will be dealt with by the government and brought before parliament. We will be very interested to see which of these recommendations are so brought. If this particular one is treated in that way and appears before us as a government proposal for action, we will be glad to make known our position as a party when it appears.

Mr. Jones: You apparently do not take the same position as that taken by the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member for Laurier has never taken a position that contradicts what I have just said.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to comment for a moment or two on some remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). The hon. member for Port Arthur seemed to think he was going to embarrass us in this party by referring to the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had said we were in favour of private enterprise. So we are, but we are also in favour of common sense.

A great leader of our party used a phrase of which I like to remind people again and again. I am referring to Mr. Meighen. He spoke about the "immortal grounds of common sense". I like to think that I belong to a party that tries to look at things in a common sense way. If we look at our society in a common sense way we know it is not pure private enterprise, free enterprise or public ownership; we have a mixture of these things in our economy.

I am quite ready to proclaim, on behalf of our party we have gone into certain aspects of public ownership because we thought it was practical, good business and common sense. I refer particularly to the hydro-electric in Ontario, which I suppose it is fair to say was instituted very largely by a Conservative government. It got under a full head of steam in the days of Sir James Whitney. I may also refer to the C.N.R. and Right Hon. Arthur Meighen in the days of the first world war. He had a great deal to do with the setting up of that railway.

We remember what happened. We remember there had been a rather extreme orgy of railroad building in Canada in the early years of the century. Both parties had a good deal to do with that, so honours are equal there. We were a bit too enthusiastic. In the days of the first war the situation grew acute, and I suppose Mr. Meighen was responsible more than anybody else for setting up the C.N.R. roughly in its present form. So when the hon. member for Port Arthur twits us and wants to know what we stand for, I will say to him that we stand for common sense, and when we run into a situation of this kind when by reason of what has happened in the past—and the judgment of both parties enters into this—we have set up an organization—I refer to the Canadian National Railways—which has been loaded up, as we all know, by a lot of unprofitable lines and become a kind of basket into which everything was dumped. When such an operation encounters difficulties and is in need of assistance I make no apology for belonging to a party which comes along in a practical way and gives it assistance. It does not worry me if somebody says it is a form of grant and that we are subsidizing the railways. This is the situation we face, and I hope we shall always continue to face such situations in what I regard as a non-doctrinaire, practical, honest, straightforward way.

Mr. Fisher: Could I ask the hon. member a question? I think we would all like to be apostles of common sense, but does he not see that when a party and its leader espouse such a clear-cut issue as free enterprise versus socialism it does raise questions with regard to the payment of this and other subsidies.

Mr. Macdonnell: Anyone who wishes to argue that question may do so. The Prime Minister is the leader of a party which as I said a minute ago is bringing in this subsidy, and if the hon. member wants to argue that this is entirely inconsistent, he may, of course, do so. But we live in a practical world. I like to think that we belong to a party which is pledged to the preservation of private enterprise. However, this does not mean you have to tie yourself to a doctrinaire position and refuse to recognize practical considerations when they arise. I suspect that the hon. member for Port Arthur possesses a good deal of that frame of mind. I do not think he is doctrinaire.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I may ask the hon. gentleman one further question. Would it be fair to describe his position as this—that the Conservative party is moving left, the C.C.F. is moving right, and soon the twain shall meet, leaving the Liberal party as the party of common sense?

Mr. Macdonnell: I shall not match myself with the leader of the Liberal party in hair splitting of that kind. I am content with our position. I think we know where we are. I believe we stand on the ground of common sense and I am content to stop there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion (Mr. Balcer) agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING NUMBER OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-94 to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister going to make a statement in connection with this measure?

Mr. Balcer: As I stated during the debate on the resolution stage, this bill is simply to provide for an increase in the number of directors of the Canadian National Railways from seven to 12. A full discussion took place on the resolution stage, and as the legislation makes only this one amendment I do not feel there is any need for me to make a further statement at this time. The bill is very simple. It is practically word for word the same as the resolution. That is all I have to say at the moment.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): We had a discussion on this bill last evening and I think the position taken by those on this side of the house was made clear. However, we did have at least one extraordinary speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) and I should like to refer to some of the things which were said on that occasion before turning to another matter.

The hon. member for Vancouver South was highly excited last evening and I suppose one could excuse him for some of the things which were said. For instance, as reported at page 4848 of Hansard of May 15, he continued by saying this:

> We were also treated to a dissertation by the hon. member for Laurier on how the Canadian National Railways was set up. It would be a free enterprise company which would operate outside of the control of the department. The minister would report to parliament on behalf of the company but would have nothing to say about its operations.

The hon. member continued to that effect. Well, one has only to read the statement which I made to become convinced that I made no such dissertation. I made a passing reference in one sentence to the position of the C.N.R. and that will be found at page 4843 of Hansard of the same date. This is what I said:

> The minister likes to say in the House of Commons that he does not direct the affairs of the Canadian National Railways but that it administers its own affairs, and that he represents it and reports on its behalf in the house.

That is a position which I think all hon. members will accept. It was not a dissertation. It was just a simple sentence in passing.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver South said:

> We were told in the committee, coming back to the setting up of this company, that it was not for politicians or members of parliament to put their noses into the business of this company; that this was part of the function of the management and we were simply there to receive the report of the management on the way the railway had been operated.

I challenge that statement. I have no recollection of any member being told anything of the kind in that language during the proceedings of that committee. But what I have always been told, and what I have always respected when I sat on the other side of the house and, what I hope, the present minister would respect, is that there shall be no political interference with the management of the C.N.R. If that is what the hon. member for Vancouver South is seeking, namely, to have members of parliament interfere politically with the affairs of the Canadian National Railways, I say to him and to others of a like mind that that would be a sad day. The establishment—the board of directors and the administrative section of the C.N.R.—is there to administer the railways. There were days in Canadian history when there was political interference with the affairs of the railway. Those were sad days and I hope they will never occur again. When we were in office we repeatedly took the position in connection with the C.N.R. that the affairs of the railway were to be managed by the company and that there should be no political interference. Certainly, I have not heard it said that things should be otherwise, except in this statement of the hon. member last evening.

Then at page 4849, referring to myself, he said:

> He talks about curtailing expenses on the part of the public; he says that the public are against curtailing C.N.R. expenses and by inference that means that the public desires that there should be a deficit on the part of the C.N.R. This is what it means. He means that the C.N.R. is not to be made a profitable, efficient operation.

Never, in any of my remarks have I either directly or indirectly inferred that that should be the case. If the hon. member will look at page 4844 of Hansard he will see that I said:

> The deficits of Canadian National Railways this year is probably one of the highest in its history. The estimate given for 1961 is not too encouraging. What it will be I am unable to say but it will certainly be substantial, and if the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation or part thereof are not implemented then, of course, the deficit will reach astronomical figures.

I made one other reference to the Canadian National Railways in that respect. A little earlier I said:

There has also been a fairly substantial reorganization of the various districts of Canadian National Railways recently. I am told this is in an effort to curtail expenditure, a move, incidentally, which is extremely unpopular with the men and with the public.

Then I said:

Notwithstanding that reorganization, it is still found necessary by the government to increase the board of directors.

Where is there any reference directly or indirectly in this statement, or any place else in what I said last night, that I favoured a higher deficit for the Canadian National?

Then, the hon. member got terribly exercised over the statement I made concerning regional representation. "Take the men where they are", he said. "Get good men, no matter where they come from". Look at the annual reports of the Canadian National Railways and see what the government has done. It has made regional appointments. All one has to do is to look at the annual reports of the Canadian National Railways to see that that policy which was established by the earlier administration was followed in 1957. There were seven directors in that year, two from Ontario, two from Quebec, two from the west and one from the Atlantic provinces. In 1958 two new appointments were made on the basis of the same regional representation. In 1959 again we had the same group of directors, two from Ontario, two from Quebec, one from the maritime provinces—

An hon. Member: And none from the west.

Mr. Chevrier: Two from Ontario, two from Quebec, two from the west and one from the Atlantic provinces. Then, we have the 1960 report which will be under study when the committee on railways, air lines and shipping is set up. I have the names before me. There are two from the west, two from Ontario, two from Quebec and one from the Atlantic provinces. It is the same regional representation. What is the matter with regional representation? Is it not what the present government has done with reference to the royal commission on transportation? The commissioners were taken from regional parts of Canada. It seems to me that there is nothing abnormal or nothing that is against common sense in having it done in such a way. But my hon. friend rises and becomes highly exercised because I suggest regional representation. That principle has been followed by the present government and I am sure that when they come to appoint the additional directors—which I hope they will not do—they will not appoint them all from one section of the country but they will give regional representation because it seems to me that is the object of a crown corporation. The purpose is to see that representatives of the various regions are on the board so that they can make known to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways or of any crown corporation the interests of the various parts of Canada. Certainly this is true with respect to many other crown corporations which I have mentioned.

In conclusion, I need only state that it seems to me regrettable the government should seek to increase the number of directors of the Canadian National Railways at this time when there is no indication that it will mean more business, when there is a decrease in the number of employees of the railways, when there is a reorganization which is most unpopular and particularly when there is a tremendous amount of unemployment. Under all these circumstances it seems to me that this is not the time to increase the directorship of this company.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I hope I am on the right spot now. After listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier I can probably get on to the subject which is the matter of increasing the board of directors from seven to 12; in other words, adding five extra directors. This brings back to my mind a time when there was a motion before the house having to do with lending the president of the Canadian National Railways to the government of Mexico for six months with the purpose in mind of rehabilitating the railway of that country. I recall that the then member for Toronto Northwest (Tom Church), who afterwards became the member for Broadview, was heartily in favour of it. In fact, he was going to support the motion. The president at that time was Sir Henry Thornton, for whom he did not have a very high regard. It was suggested that the motion would apply first for only six months, but he suggested that it be 365 days for next year and for five years hence and put the motion through as a local improvement.

The legislation before us has to do with increasing the membership of the board. The hon. member for Laurier says that he does not see any reason why the membership should be increased because we have a great deal of unemployment. I would say there are good reasons for increasing the membership of the board. We should have more people on the board, but they should not be there from the regional point of view; they should not be on the board for the reason suggested by the hon. member for Port Arthur, namely that it would add prestige. We should get men of business renown who would help to increase the business of the railway. The hon. member for Greenwood made the same statement and I think it is quite reasonable.

The board of directors should consist of practical men who know how to run the railways and would run them as the president did in the days when Tommy Church was the member for Broadview. The president at that time was a railway man and had great experience in the first war. He made a fairly good job of running the railroad. In fact, he was very popular with the railroad men because he made a real good job of public relations. He was highly admired by the men. The same cannot be said of the president of the Canadian National Railways at the present time.

I have said in the past in this house that I am not an idolater of the president of the Canadian National Railways, nor am I enamoured of the work he has done as president of that organization. I have repeatedly said that to my way of thinking he is not the proper man in the right place, and this is the time to discuss it. I have repeatedly made remarks along this line and I have found out one thing. It seems to me there is a coterie of members in this house who seem to regard him very highly. If you make any remarks about him with which they do not agree they assume right away that it is almost treasonable. They start to go after you. This is the way I see it. If you gore or goad one of their sacred oxen they immediately put you down as looking for the job. One thing is certain. I am not looking for the job. I have no inclination that way. I have no intention of seeking it. I do not suppose anyone in this house would care for the job under the conditions under which it is operated at the present time.

However, now that we are taking steps to increase the board of directors I presume it is being done for the purpose of improving the board. When I first read the bill I thought that here was an operation like that which Tommy Church tried to carry out in order to get rid of the president at that time. I thought that this would be a good opportunity to dispose of the president of Canadian National Railways, not because we want to do him any particular harm but because he has appeared before committees of this house and not only has defied them but has told them that if they were not satisfied with his services they should get rid of him because he did not want to be there and we should oblige him.

[Mr. Small.]

There are enough people throughout the country who are not satisfied with his services, particularly those who are working for Canadian National Railways. I have had many of them write to me and call me on the telephone and having sorted out the ones you would not pay attention to from those putting forward genuine criticisms and offering suggestions for improvement but who do not want to have their names mentioned I would say this is the time to discuss the matter of what you are going to do with the board and whom you are going to appoint. I would say at the salary—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must warn the hon. member that I think he is discussing a matter which is not within the scope of the present debate. I do not see how he can relate the choice of directors or the services of the president of Canadian National Railways to the bill which has only one effect, to increase from seven to 12 the number of directors.

I might also indicate to the hon. member that yesterday the house passed a motion setting up a committee to review the accounts and operations of Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines, and I think that would be a much more appropriate place to discuss matters like the ones into which the hon. member is now venturing.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I say a word on the point of order Your Honour has raised because it seems to me you have raised a fundamental point with respect to the rights of members. Mr. Gordon is not just the president of the railway. He is or was—it seems a little hard to find out which—a director, and surely we are not going to say we ought to have 12 pigs in a poke instead of seven pigs in a poke, which would seem to be the effect of the suggestion made by Your Honour. Surely it is competent to the hon. member for Danforth, who is always anxious to obey the rules of the house, to be able to say if he wishes to do so that he would like to see 12 directors if they are this kind of director but he would not like to see 12 if they are that kind of director. It seems to me that is the essence of the matter.

I said last night on the resolution stage and I repeat now that I am against the bill because I suspect that the government is going to appoint a lot of Tory ward heelers, but surely the hon. member should have the same freedom to speak that I had and that is what I am trying to seek for him.

Mr. Small: With respect to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I really thought I was discussing the directors who were going to be appointed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If it is the wish of the house that the hon. member discuss this point I have no objection, but I will tell the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that he has not convinced me that an increase in the number of directors from seven to 12 brings in the problem of personalities. It is simply a problem of number.

Mr. Small: Mr. Speaker, I would say that from the point of view of economics and saving money the advice of the house in regard to the selection of directors is very appropriate. When you are sizing up the directors you are going to appoint you have to bear in mind that some of them are in receipt of exceptionally high salaries and by removing the one who is receiving the highest salary of all you could then appoint others at lower salaries and make a great saving there while at the same time there would be a vast improvement. You could appoint the kind of directors who would be more acceptable to the people of Canada to run the railway.

The matter of free enterprise has been discussed. The only free enterprise I can see is that when a train comes into the Ottawa and Toronto stations the passengers are dumped off with the freight and the only freedom the passengers have is the freedom to walk a long distance while the freight is carried away by truck. Perhaps I might put the matter this way. A farmer was taking a load of manure to his friend's place about ten miles up the road and a hobo stopped him and asked him for a lift. The hobo went to get in with the farmer but the farmer told him to get on the back on top of the load of manure. As the farmer was going up the road a friend stopped him and said, "What have you got there"? He said "I have a load of manure and a hobo". A little farther along he was asked the same question. He was asked the same question four or five times and he replied, "I have a load of manure and a hobo". Finally another friend of his came along and was about to ask the same question when the hobo said to the farmer, "The next time when you are asked what you have would you mind giving me the preference"? All I am asking is that the passengers at least get the preference when they arrive at the station. This is the kind of deal the president has been giving the passengers in the past and it does not go over very well.

I can also remember when the railway was first started. I believe D. B. Hanna was the president at the time. I can remember a speaker waxing eloquent on the platform about how this great Canadian National Railways had been brought into existence by taking the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern and other bankrupt railways and bringing them together into one great railway system. He said, "Think of it, it is yours, it is mine, it is ours. We can ride on it". One fellow in the audience was not taken in so easily and he said, "Do you mean to say we own that railway"? The speaker said, "Of course, we do". The second fellow said, "We do not have to pay any fare on it"? The speaker said, "Oh, no, I never said that". The second fellow said, "Then what difference does it make who owns it if we have to pay to ride on it"?

If we are getting to the point where we are going to provide cheap transportation for everyone it does not matter who owns the railway but we have to have competent men as directors to do this job. I am supporting this motion if the government is getting rid of its high price help. I get a great kick out of listening to members of the opposition, these paragons of political virtue. They think that no one else can administer this country as they have, but the Conservatives have always given good service and this will be another instance if we have new members on the board of directors. We can advise these new directors what is needed. It is about time we had a change. At the same time we will economize by removing the top man and letting him go to that job he was offered which pays $125,000 a year. He will get an increase in pay and we will have a much needed improvement. We can get the job done for less money and at the same time a better job will be done.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at any length on this legislation because I promised the minister I would be brief. Besides, I wonder why this piece of legislation is being submitted. I have been sitting here for 21 years, and frankly, I have never seen such an insignificant and useless bill.

When I got here last evening, I read the remarks made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) when he introduced this legislation, and I noted that he did no more than outline the historical background of the C.N.R. board of directors, and to say how many members there were on the board of directors of other railway companies. I tried to find a single argument that might cause the members of this house to support this legislation, but found nothing that might justify an increase from seven to 12 in the number of board directors, except perhaps that such a change might provide, as the minister said, a better geographical representation in the C.N.R. management.

In my opinion, the remarks of the minister indicate that neither he nor the former minister of transport are convinced of the necessity and the usefulness of that change.

It is not my intention to repeat the arguments put forward yesterday and this afternoon by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), because he clearly set out our party's stand. As the minister knows, however, this railway matter is of particular interest to me because there are several hundred people in my riding who are employees of the C.N.R.

I had an opportunity, during the budget debate in January, to make certain suggestions which I feel would have produced more significant results both for the railway company and for its employees. The minister knows from experience that the mere fact of increasing from seven to 12 the membership of the board of directors of this crown company will in no way reduce the deficit, or the number of lay-offs.

I am still wondering why a measure such as this is being introduced at the end of the session, when we have so many serious problems to deal with. I wonder whether the Conservative government still has friends with nothing to do and whether appointments must be made in order to satisfy those friends. Well, under the circumstances I do not think that the house should be called upon to adopt such a bill. In my opinion, one way of providing this company with the assistance it needs would be to endow the C.N.R. research division with the required sum of money so that a solution may be found to the problems now facing it.

The minister should now know, after discussing the point with the company's high officials that automation and the new technological developments have created problems that must be urgently met if we want the C.N.R., which is now in a bad situation, to continue its operations. The necessary answers to those problems must be found.

There is another matter which looks as important to me. I do not know whether the minister ever had the opportunity of meeting railway employees, but certainly he must have realized that the morale of the C.N.R.'s 70,000 to 75,000 employees is at a very low ebb.

[Mr. Bourget.]

Mr. Chairman, those workers, who have been with the railway for 10, 15, 20 or 25 years or even more, have been living in uncertainty in recent years. They are worried about the future.

I hope the minister will confer with the C.N.R. authorities and discuss the matter with them.

I do not want to speak at length on this matter today, because I know that the minister has to leave soon. I hope, however, to take up this subject again when his estimates are before the house.

Once again, for the reasons set forth by the hon. member for Laurier, and for the few reasons I have mentioned myself, I suggest that this bill is altogether useless. The $35,000, $40,000 or $50,000 that we shall spend on salaries for these new directors could certainly have been put to better use.

I see the minister is shaking his head. Yet he knows very well that the issues now confronting the C.N.R. will not be settled by the appointment of those five new directors.

When making his statement, the minister did not justify this legislation on any valid ground.

Mr. Chairman, this is a far cry from the promises made by members now sitting on government benches. I remember, for instance, that before 1957, the former minister of transport always rose in immediate protest whenever there had been any dismissals.

Well, Mr. Chairman, for the last three years, the minister, when asked what he intends to do about those dismissals, always answers: This is not my business, but the responsibility of the railway management.

Mr. Chairman, the only legislation devised to help our national railways at this time, is this appointment of five new directors.

You may be assured that I am not prepared to endorse this legislation; to me it is completely futile. It can only increase government expenditures without bringing in anything in return.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of rising to discuss this bill. But I was astounded, and even shocked, by the words of the hon. member for Levis when he described this bill as futile.

Mr. Bourget: So it is.

Mr. Pigeon: The government's reason for introducing this bill is that it carries out a recommendation by a committee of the house of members from all political parties, one of whom, notably, was the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). The hon. member for Levis is therefore being inconsiderate of his colleague for Kenora-Rainy River, who recommended amending the act by enlarging the company's board of directors.

The hon. member for Levis said that the employees' morale was low. Mr. Gordon may be able, but if employee morale is low at this time, it is because Mr. Gordon shows no understanding for his employees.

There is a curtain of steel between Mr. Gordon and the employees of the Canadian National Railways.

As far as I am concerned, I approve the bill, hoping that enlarging the board of directors will help shelving Mr. Gordon and give new hope to the railway employees.

The hon. member for Laurier said yesterday:

The deficit of Canadian National Railways this year is probably one of the highest in its history.

And he continued along the same lines.

In fact, the C.N.R. is feeling increasing competition, mainly from highway transport operators.

I have here a statement from the present president of the C.N.R.

C.N.R. president Donald Gordon expects that his company may lose some $9 million in the first years of competition from the St. Lawrence seaway. Mr. Gordon has stated before the House of Commons railway committee that the company expects a portion of its traffic estimated at $18 million to be directly exposed to competition from the seaway, and another portion estimated at $12 million to be also be affected.

According to Mr. Gordon, the C.N.R.'s deficit is due to the competition from the seaway.

Those are the remarks I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to use much of the time of this house, but because of the present position of the C.N.R. and the government's decision to introduce legislation to increase the number of its directors from seven to 12, I must say a few words.

This increase in the number of board members, believe me, Mr. Chairman, will not remedy the ills of the C.N.R.

In my opinion, it is of minor importance that we should have seven, 12 or 20 directors. The important thing is to see that the management is improved.

I am one of those who thinks that railway management, not only the C.N.R. but also the C.P.R., has been pitiful for many years.

First of all, they allowed a very important field of operations to fall into the hands of other organizations without thinking of developing it themselves.

I recall that in 1936, talking to one of the C.P.R.'s vice chairmen, I pointed out that his company was losing its secondary line services to bus companies, and its freight traffic to highway transport companies because his company had not seen fit to develop those services itself.

Do you know what the company's vice chairman replied to me, in 1936? He said:

(Text):

It is only a passing fancy.

(Translation):

Well, this "passing fancy" is the cause of the present loss of revenues of our railways.

Therefore, no matter how many or few directors we have on the C.N.R., this legislation will not bring any significant change.

We know that when it comes to choosing directors, a private company like the C.P.R., for instance, will pick men who are financially interested, who are interested in getting dividends.

It may go and get the president or general manager of General Motors or Ford Motors, which make a very wide use of railways and other means of transportation for their cars; and other big manufacturers who may also be interested. But in the case of the C.N.R., those directors merely become civil servants like the others; they are getting no particular benefits, except seeing their names prominently displayed in government reports.

Well, I do not think this is enough. First of all, the C.N.R. services have to be improved.

In December, I travelled to Boston, and I must tell you I have never seen such poor service as the one between Montreal and Boston via the C.N.R. Frankly, it was disgusting, and I understand why people prefer a longer trip via some other line rather than go there via the C.N.R.

Let us therefore start by improving what we already have. As I said just now the number of directors is not so important. I do think, as the hon. member for Levis said a moment ago, that this legislation is more intended to create soft berths for party supporters as was done, incidentally, for the defeated candidate in Russell who was given a very important position just to keep him out of the way at the next general election.

If this is how it is proposed to improve the C.N.R., it is a mistake. The number of directors is not important, I repeat, but, as the hon. member for Levis said, if that money were offered to the research department of the C.N.R. to determine the cause of the evil, C.N.R. officials could take the necessary steps to improve the situation, and that would be practical and serious. It would be much wiser than to increase the number of board directors from seven to 12, which I consider useless, because they are merely civil servants having no authority to work, with parliament always keeping an eye on them, something they do not like at all.

If they could get something out of it, like directors of the C.P.R., who are shareholders and who receive dividends, we could then hope that 10, 12 or even 20 directors would improve the situation.

But what good will result from adding new directors who have no particular interest in the company? I think this would entail a useless expense which will bring no profit, but rather an additional deficit, to the C.N.R., and that will not help the railway workers either.

These last few years, the company appointed many superintendents and, at the same time, has cut down substantially on the number of its employees. This service should be reorganized, for not only is the public questioning the efficiency of the C.N.R. management but employees too no longer have confidence in the management. You might claim that some of the directors were appointed under a Liberal government. That is not the point. When there is something bad somewhere, I am not afraid to say so and even to admit as much. I say there is something wrong in that field, and it is not by increasing the number of directors that we are going to set things straight. It is a matter of finding the appropriate means of improving the whole system of transport in all its forms. I for one would say that the best way would be to provide the research department with more money, so that it can seek a way out of the present difficulties, and not to appoint 12 directors as suggested by the minister.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Vancouver South.

An hon. Member: Again?

[Mr. Caron.]

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Yes, again. Mr. Speaker, before I answer some of the statements made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) I should like to say this to the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) who stated so emphatically that he tried to find one argument for increasing the number of directors but could not find one valid one. If he would compare the operating statements of the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. over the past few years, he might find a few arguments. He might find an argument in the fact that the C.N.R. deficits over 1960 and 1959 were $110 million which were paid for by the taxpayers whereas in the same two years the C.P.R. contributed $53 million in the form of corporation tax payments. If you have a business operation and are not too successful and if you have very successful competitors, the wise businessman takes a look at the practice of his competitors and is not afraid to copy any of the practices which he feels may be of advantage to him.

Turning to the hon. member for Laurier, may I say that there are several matters I wish to discuss with him. I should like to quote from page 4844 of Hansard with regard to what he had to say about representation geographically on the board of directors. This is the way in which he starts out:

> There is, of course, another very serious matter to which consideration must be given and that is territorial representation. That question is inevitably going to arise if the directorship is increased. This question is going to arise if the number of directors is such that there is likely to be more than one representative for each province, and that is, of course, what is going to happen here. Twelve directors will mean that there will be more than one director for each province. When there is one director from each province it seems to me that unquestionably there is a solemn duty to represent the interest of that province without, of course, neglecting the national interest. If there are two from a province you may well find that sectional divisions will arise.

Then the hon. member goes on to say this:

> Then there is the question of the representation of the province of Quebec if there are 12 directors. With 12 directors it will be expected that the province of Quebec will be accorded equitable representation having regard to its population. If it does not get such representation I need hardly tell the minister that he will hear about it in due course because he has repeatedly stated that the C.N.R. was not fair and just to his province. I am not going to put on the record the statement he has made. I have used it before and I do not think this is the opportune time to repeat it.

Then the hon. member goes on to say in the next paragraph:

> It seems to me that the directors ought to be appointed from the point of view of their competence rather than from the point of view of geographical and political interests.

You get these statements coming from both sides of the mouth of the hon. member for

Laurier. If he wishes to quote his espousal of the interests of the provinces, he has one paragraph. If he wishes to say what a broad-minded gentleman he is, looking only for the best men to do the best job, he has another paragraph. All through this speech we can find this double talk. The hon. member can see that this is so, if he looks at the record.

The hon. member accused me of wanting narrow, regional representation, whereas my plea was for broad, regional representation very much along the lines that we have at the present time. However, I think we should have a larger representation from Ontario and Quebec simply because those directors could get together more often and more easily, and this board of directors must be a functioning and working board.

Then the hon. member for Laurier suggested that I was advocating political interference. He quoted from page 4848 of Hansard to substantiate that charge. This is just as much misrepresentation on his part as he accused me of last night.

> We were told in the committee, coming back to the setting up of this company, that it was not for politicians or members of parliament to put their noses into the business of this company, that this was part of the function of the management and we were simply there to receive the report of the management on the way the railway had been operated.

The hon. member for Laurier says this means I want political interference. For the hon. member's information, it means that I want the sessional committee to have the power to get straight answers to questions put by members of the committee, rather than having the president of the company hiding behind the fact that this information is not in the public interest, or it is before a royal commission, or any of the numberless excuses we were given in place of the information we sought.

This paragraph has to do with the securing of information from the railroad when its representatives are appearing before the committee. The hon. member was not of too much assistance in trying to dig out this information.

When I say we were also treated to a dissertation by the hon. member for Laurier on how the Canadian National Railways was set up, this is in essence true but it is not true in context. What I meant and what I should have said was that this lecture was given to us in committee by Mr. Gordon more or less on the prompting of the hon. member for Laurier.

The hon. member recalled to Mr. Gordon how the C.N.R. had been set up and how it was not responsible to parliament but reported to parliament through the minister. Mr. Gordon very kindly put on the record all the statements of Mr. King and others at the time the C.N.R. was set up. I am speaking strictly from memory, but I am quite sure that essentially I am correct in what I am saying about the happenings in that committee meeting.

The hon. member for Laurier, as reported at page 4843 of Hansard, stated categorically:

> We on this side of the house will oppose this legislation.

I venture to guess, Mr. Speaker, that there has been no Liberal caucus on this legislation and that the hon. member for Laurier is talking for the hon. member for Laurier and not for all his colleagues on that side of this house. I can assure the hon. member that I know many of his colleagues who hold the same views on this question as hon. members on this side of the house. At least one of them is on record three or four times as saying that this is a good move.

When the hon. member said I misrepresented what he said last night and referred to it again today, he quoted the following paragraph from page 4844 of Hansard.

> The deficit of Canadian National Railways this year is probably one of the highest in its history. The estimate given for 1961 is not too encouraging.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I quoted that paragraph from the beginning down to the end.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware of the fact that the hon. member did so. I was going to quote just as far as I had it marked here.

Mr. Chevrier: I understood the hon. member to say I did not quote it.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that; I said the hon. member quoted this passage.

Mr. Chevrier: I beg the hon. member's pardon.

Mr. Broome: The hon. member for Laurier quoted this paragraph first. Then he quoted the paragraph which is immediately above it. The paragraph immediately above is the one I was referring to and it starts this way:

> There has also been a fairly substantial reorganization of the various districts of Canadian National Railways recently. I am told this is in an effort to curtail expenditure, a move, incidentally, which is extremely unpopular with the men and with the public.

It was from this statement, which says that any efforts to curtail expenditure are unpopular with the public, that I drew the inference that the hon. member wanted larger and larger expenditures and therefore larger and larger deficits. What he said is quite clear; he said this is unpopular with the public, meaning the public of Canada. I do not understand how the hon. member for Laurier can say that I misrepresented what he said, because it is clear, although in the typical fashion of the hon. member for Laurier he leaves himself a bolt-hole in the next paragraph, in the same manner as he did with regard to the other question.

I should like to put on record a few comparisons. The hon. member for Laurier says there is no point in making comparisons with the C.P.R. because the C.N.R. is a crown company. The fact that they are both railroads and are both engaged in almost identical operations does not seem to have any bearing on the matter. The hon. member felt that the C.N.R., because its number of employees had been reduced, did not need additional directors in order to increase efficiency or improve over-all management. In fact, the inference was—although this was not said—that because the number of employees had been reduced, therefore the number of directors might well be reduced.

There is a chart in the annual report of the C.N.R. which gives the figure of employees of all services. One has to interpolate on this chart, Mr. Speaker, because these figures are not exact. However, the number of employees in all services of the C.N.R. is 97,000; for the C.P.R. the figure is 74,000. The mileage operated by the C.N.R. is 26,000, and for the C.P.R. it is 17,000. The number of directors for the C.N.R. is seven, and for the C.P.R. it is 24. But the C.N.R. has a very fine record in regard to the number of vice presidents. They certainly come up well there, because they have 17 vice presidents as compared with 12 on the C.P.R.

The total number of officers in the C.N.R. is very fine too. They may not have many directors, but they have 28 officers on the C.N.R. as compared with 19 on the C.P.R. I also wish to put on record the deficit position of the C.N.R. and the surplus position of the C.P.R.

All these things would, I think, lead any reasonable person to assume that there is something wrong with the operation of the C.N.R. I should like to make one suggestion to the minister, and it is not referred to in this bill I would ask the minister to ensure that, by regulation or however it may be done, the executive committee of the C.N.R. become a functioning committee and a real executive committee.

I say this because at the present time the executive committee of the C.N.R. consists of two directors and the president. They meet monthly, as I understand it, in order to ratify the acts of the president. However, it is not necessary that the same two directors be picked by the president each month to ratify his actions. The president may pick any director any month. The executive committee is not set up as a working committee of the board of directors, or so I have been given to understand following questions asked in the sessional committee. The president appoints the executive committee, and that is the point I was trying to make when I said the C.N.R., set up to have all the advantages of free enterprise, operates with none of the disadvantages. It is impossible to call the head of the railroad to account for the operation of the affairs of the railroad. That accounting is made to a hand picked group appointed by the president himself to ratify his actions, and this is the so-called executive committee.

If we refer to the C.P.R.—and I think it might be well to follow the lines of a successful operation—we find that the executive committee consists of seven directors who are named in the annual statement. It is they who ratify the acts and the decisions of the officers of the company. This makes sense. The other system under which the C.N.R. is operating certainly does not make sense. I do not know whether this should be written into the bill or how it would be undertaken, but I certainly believe that something should be done to set up a proper, functioning executive committee of the board of directors.

I think I have now made the contribution which I set out to make to this debate. I believe this is a good measure, and I am sure that hon. gentleman on the other side also believe it is a good measure. In my opinion it will do much to restore the confidence of the public and the confidence of many individual members of parliament in the operations of the C.N.R.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I had not intended to take part in this debate, but some of the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver South need to be dealt with, and dealt with in serious fashion. The hon. member has advanced one reason why we should be in favour of this bill, and I think that reason should be given somewhat more emphasis than he placed upon it. He said we should appoint five more directors to the board of the C.N.R. in order to end the deficit. That is what he said. Look at the C.P.R., he said. They have 24 directors and they pay income tax; the C.N.R. has only seven and it has a deficit. So we should take a lesson from the C.P.R., and by increasing the number of directors there will no longer be a deficit.

I suggest there are more fundamental reasons why the C.N.R. has a deficit. I consider the fact that this argument, though so infantile, is the only argument which has been advanced so far in favour of this bill, shows what a threadbare thing this measure is. It is for that reason we are opposed to it. The hon. gentleman got excited about the suggestion by the hon. member for Laurier that if there were 12 directors the government would still have to pay attention to territorial representation. I was amused last night when no sooner had the hon. gentleman sat down than his colleague from Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) and then, as soon as he could speak afterwards, his colleague from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) rose to say how important it was to have a director from Alberta. So that even though the high minded member from Vancouver South said British Columbia does not need a director he finds his colleagues from Alberta rising at once to say that if there are to be any more directors we should have one from Alberta.

An hon. Member: That would be a good thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: It may or may not be. I would imagine that the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) would support his colleagues from Alberta and would not support the hon. gentleman from Vancouver South. The fact of the matter is that those of us such as my hon. friend from Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) who have had some experience with government know very well that when you establish a board of this kind, particularly to administer an operation which is carried on in every province, if you have 12 directors and do not have a director from every province you are in deep political trouble. Indeed, hon. members opposite campaigned very vigorously not so long ago against us because, they said, we did not have a minister from Prince Edward Island. They were going to change all that. Do hon. gentlemen opposite suppose, considering how much the C.N.R. means to Prince Edward Island, that this government would dare to ignore Prince Edward Island when they have 12 directors to appoint? As a matter of fact I should not be a bit surprised if the defeated candidate in King's after May 29 should become one of those 12 directors.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is probably a better reason for bringing in this bill, from the point of view of hon. gentlemen opposite, than any reason they have advanced up to now. It may be that notwithstanding the self-denying ordinance of the hon. member for Vancouver South the defeated candidate in Esquimalt-Saanich will qualify as a director from British Columbia and it may be that the defeated candidate in Leeds will be a director—

Mr. Broome: On a point of order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is deliberately misrepresenting what I have said.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Broome: He is saying I have said things I have not said and I want to have the opportunity of pointing out—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may rise after the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has resumed his seat to correct any misrepresentation about which he complains.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want to misinterpret the hon. member and I think it would be more fair to him, if I have said anything which misrepresents him, to allow him to correct it at once.

Mr. Broome: The hon. gentleman said the hon. member for Vancouver South said that British Columbia does not need a director on the C.N.R. I did not say one was needed or not needed. I never even mentioned it. Second, he said that I said that adding five directors to the C.N.R. would automatically lead to the cancellation of the deficit. This is sheer childish nonsense and it was not said by me either directly or in any manner.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: No. My hon. friend allowed him to reply.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is right. He did not say there should not be a director from British Columbia. What he did say was that no attention should be paid to geography that we should appoint the best men wherever they are available. That is what he said, but it is not what his colleagues from Alberta said. As far as the other matter is concerned, I think the record will speak for itself.

I am advised that it is five o'clock. I shall have something more to say.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to say that it being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Mr. Churchill: Before you leave the chair, may I announce for the convenience of the house, and to accommodate a number of members on both sides who have various engagements tonight, that at 7.30 we shall carry on with the resolution stage of the War Veterans Allowance Act. Consideration of this bill will be resumed tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: Do I understand the leader of the house to say that tomorrow we shall continue with this bill in lieu of estimates?

Mr. Churchill: No. We shall complete the bill and then deal with estimates if that is satisfactory.

Mr. Pickersgill: We only sit until one o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: I imagine that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has not much more to say on the bill. Afterwards the minister would reply and we would complete the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Then we would go into committee. Is it the intention to deal with this bill in committee of the whole? As far as we are concerned, there is no objection to the procedure.

Mr. Churchill: It is convenient for the minister. If it is convenient for the other side of the house, that would be the arrangement.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not very convenient for me to have my speech cut in two in this fashion. If hon. gentlemen find it more convenient I have no doubt I will be able to pick up the thread later on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate moves the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is correct.

On motion of Mr. Pickersgill, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

CO-OPERATIVE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-12, respecting Co-operative Life Insurance Company—Mr. Pascoe (for Mr. Ormiston)—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Voting.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Winch: I have not a copy of the bill.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I was interested to note today something to which I think we should give consideration. I raise it now but I am not sure whether I should raise it as a point of order or in speaking on the bill itself. You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that this is a Senate bill. I have checked the committee hearings of the Senate and I have found that there is no report of the committee meetings of the Senate.

When a bill originates in the Senate the normal procedure is for them to give their whole consideration to it. People are brought before the committee of the Senate and questions are asked. A great deal of information is made available. That information should be made available to us.

In checking over the records of our own banking and commerce committee, which dealt with this bill, I find that no record was made of discussion of the bill in that committee. Therefore, this committee has not the advantage of the information that is normally given to hon. members and hence we have no way of knowing the reasons why objections were made to this bill. I raise this question particularly because our order paper indicates that the bill was amended in committee. We have no report of the discussion that took place on the amendment or what led up to the amendment. I will be surprised if there was any discussion of the amendment itself.

It seems to me that when a bill originates in the other place we should have the advantage of securing the evidence made available to the Senate itself. When a bill is introduced in the House of Commons and is sent to the banking and commerce committee the normal procedure is to have a record made of the minutes and proceedings, and those who are not members of that committee have the minutes and proceedings made available to them. In this instance there were two opportunities for this to have happened. First, when the bill went before the committee of the other place, and second when it went to our committee. No record of the proceedings of either place is available. This is something that should not be allowed to happen. I would suggest that this bill stand until records are available of the discussion and why the amendment was made. There is another reason why this bill should stand at the present time. I presume the sponsor is the only one who would be in a position to give us the information we may want, but he is not in the house at the present time. This would be an added reason why the bill should not be proceeded with now.

I strongly urge the committee to give consideration to this matter of not keeping records. It has happened in the past. This is my first experience of a bill going through committees of both houses and no record being kept of the information made available to hon. members who are not members of those committees. This lack of information makes it difficult for us to come to a decision on the bill or on the amendment to the bill.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, perhaps before you make a ruling on the argument of the hon. member for Timiskaming I may be permitted to briefly outline the background of the bill. I am surprised to find the C.C.F. group opposing a co-operative bill at this time.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, I must—

Mr. Peters: I have not opposed the bill.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, the hon. member—

Mr. Jones: The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre is speaking to the point of order.

Mr. Argue: Then, on a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Order. Is the hon. member speaking to the point of order, or is he rising on another point of order?

Mr. Argue: I am rising on a question of privilege affecting all the members of this group. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre has said that members of the C.C.F. group are opposing this bill. The statement is false and inaccurate and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Pascoe: I was dealing with the suggestion that the bill be put over for one day. It is a simple bill that could go through quite easily if I were allowed to give some of the background.

Mr. Argue: It will be just as good if it is called next day.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Under certain circumstances I might agree with what the hon. member for Timiskaming has said and, indeed, in committees, particularly committees dealing with pipe lines and other corporations which come to parliament and make promises I have raised the same point; but the point dealt with in this bill is so narrow and so technical I do not think there is any valid point of order or valid reason for delaying its passage.

Mr. Regier: What is your point of order?

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): I am on it. It is not a valid reason for delaying the bill to say there is no transcript of the proceedings.

Mr. Regier: The hon. member is making a speech.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): No, I am dealing with the point of order. The point of order was that there ought to be a transcript of the evidence in committee. I am suggesting the reason why a transcript of the evidence in committee would not put us any farther ahead. The explanatory note of the bill is so complete and the point is so narrow there is nothing to be gained by putting it over or having a transcript.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, Bill No. S-12 provides for an amendment to the act of incorporation of the Co-operative Life Insurance Company with head office in Regina, Saskatchewan.

Perhaps I can give the committee a brief history of its passage through the other place. First reading was given in the other place on February 9 and second reading on February 15. It was considered by the banking and commerce committee of the other place and reported without amendment on March 22, 1961. It passed third reading the next day. There are only two proposed changes and these are being made for the purpose of assuring policyholder members throughout Canada that control of the company will not be centralized in Saskatchewan and in particular at head office.

It might be of some interest and in order to give a brief outline of the history of the company. The Co-Operative Life Insurance Company was originally incorporated in 1945 as a co-operative company under the co-operative section of the Saskatchewan insurance act and almost immediately thereafter commenced to sell life insurance. In 1946 a petition was submitted to the government in Ottawa to obtain a dominion charter. The Co-Operative Life has operated since 1947—

Mr. Peters: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I inquire from what document the hon. member is quoting?

Mr. Pascoe: It is a letter from the attorney representing the Co-Operative Life Insurance Company.

Mr. Argue: What is his name?

Mr. Pascoe: November 1, 1957.

Mr. Argue: Who is he?

Mr. Pascoe: The late R. H. Milliken. The Co-Operative Life has operated since 1947 under its present dominion charter and has agents writing insurance in all Canadian provinces with the exception of Quebec. In effect, under clause 1 precautions are written into the act to prevent employees of the company from exercising proxies of other policyholders and thus to prevent the control of the company from falling into the hands of head office personnel. I think this is very clearly set out in the new section 4 (1) under clause 1 of the bill. Clause 2 of the bill would add a new section 4A to the above-mentioned statute. Its purpose is to prevent the control of the company from being concentrated in any one designated region. This will bring control of the operations of the company in line with a procedure that is followed by most of the co-operatives in western Canada, namely, the procedure of delegate voting. Delegates will be elected annually from each of the six electoral districts set up as follows: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and the Atlantic provinces including Newfoundland.

Bill No. S-12 was considered at a meeting of the standing committee of banking and commerce of the house on April 19. At that committee meeting the superintendent of insurance indicated that he was not opposed to the proposed changes. As you will note from today's Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day, the house's standing committee on banking and commerce made one slight amendment and that is noted on page 11 of Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day by the words "as amended". Perhaps I might be allowed to outline this brief amendment. The new section 4A, clause 2 of the bill, reads as follows:

(1) Each director shall be elected from a designated region in Canada and, to remain qualified, shall during office be ordinarily resident in such region: Provided—

Here is the amendment:

—that at least one director shall be elected from each designated region and—

Then the clause continues as follows:

—that a director shall not be disqualified under this section while he is removed from such region in the service of the company.

I think that explains the bill fully, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Would he inform the committee whether he is a member of this company?

Mr. Pascoe: No, I am not.

Mr. Argue: Then I want to raise violent objection—

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Argue: —to the accusation of the hon. member that those of us in this group were trying to block this measure because on inquiry I find that a number of members of the C.C.F. group in the House of Commons are policyholders and members of this co-operative. I am a policyholder myself. I hold a policy with this company and it costs me a little money. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is a member of the company as is the hon. member for Timiskaming. So I would imagine it would hardly make any sense for a man who has not supported this company by becoming a policyholder to accuse those of us who are policyholders and members of the company of trying to obstruct a measure in which we have a very definite and substantial interest.

We have shown that we are genuine supporters of the co-operative movement and of this life insurance company by doing the very practical thing of taking out a policy or a number of policies. I think this is one of the best companies in the life insurance business. I would say it is the best but I do not want to get into a long argument.

Mr. O'Hurley: Don't spoil it.

Mr. Argue: I am sure the company would accept applications from Conservative members also. They are not particularly fussy about those they accept as policyholders.

Mr. Rapp: There are some Conservatives who are members of the company.

Mr. Argue: I am glad to hear the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort, who wants to be the member for Humboldt-Tisdale-Melfort, say that. I am going to have something to say about that matter too when it comes up, and I want to assure him I have other amendments to suggest that might very properly be incorporated in the title of the constituency to make it more representative of the area that the hon. member represents. Since he has made this very important interjection, I would be very interested in knowing whether he is a member of this company.

Mr. Rapp: I am.

Mr. Argue: I am glad to hear that. He has also said that a number of his colleagues are members of this company. We would like to have that information too. I think it would be very interesting for the committee to know to what extent Conservative members of the House of Commons are members of this company.

Mr. Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, we are discussing a bill respecting the Co-Operative Life Insurance Company.

Mr. Peters: Are you a member too?

Mr. Jones: I should like to be allowed to speak. I have risen on a point of order and I should like to have the opportunity to make my remarks. In dealing with a matter like this, I do not think it is necessary to have violent and wild interjections by members from their seats. On the point of order, I think the hon. member for Assiniboia has strayed far from the purpose of the bill. As set forth in the explanatory notes, the proposed changes are designed to prevent employees of the company from exercising the proxies of other members and thus to prevent the control of the company from falling into the hands of head office personnel. That is a simple point and one that I think is easily understood. It is one that I hope all hon. members will be able to support, but surely, Mr. Chairman, in discussing this matter we can remain close to the actual bill itself.

Mr. Winch: Could I ask the hon. member a question? Will he agree to the same amendment being made to the acts of all life insurance companies in Canada?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I thank the hon. member for raising the point of order as I was beginning to feel that we were getting away from the bill at hand and into the question of who are members of this co-operative. I was also watching section 66 (1) very closely with respect to interest in the association. I would suggest that if the hon. member continues he direct himself to points in the bill.

Mr. Argue: Since you have raised the question, Mr. Chairman, whether we have some financial interest in this particular measure your comments on that point will be most interesting and informative. I want to tell the hon. member for Saskatoon that, contrary to his suggestion, I think I was very much in order because I was demonstrating in a very practical way, I believe—

Mr. Jones: That has already been ruled on by the Chair.

Mr. Argue: —why members of this group are very much in favour of the bill and how ludicrous it is for the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre to suggest that we might be opposing this co-operative of which we are members and of which he is such a lukewarm admirer that he has not even taken the trouble to become a member. I am rather amazed that a man who professes to be a supporter of the co-operative movement would make this confession in the house.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I would suggest to both sides that we return to a discussion of the points in the bill. I think the hon. member for Assiniboia has sufficiently explained his point.

Mr. Winch: I should like to get a clarification of a point which you raised, Mr. Chairman. I do not believe I have seen a bill of this nature before the house. I cannot remember having had this point arise before. The members of this group have said that they are keenly interested in the principle of this measure. The hon. member for Assiniboia, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the hon. member for Timiskaming have indicated that they hold policies in this company. This is an act which relates to a co-operative life insurance company.

I am going to ask you now, sir, to come to a decision on a certain point. I think you will agree that these hon. members have a right to speak on the measure but, in view of what you have just said, I am asking you to come to a decision on whether or not they have a right to vote on this particular bill. I should like to have your decision on that now.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I would refer the hon. member to standing order No. 11 which reads:

> No member is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest, and the vote of any member so interested will be disallowed.

There is no question of a vote at the moment, so I do not think I am called upon to make that decision. There is nothing in this standing order which prevents the hon. members from expressing their point of view during the debate.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but this is a very important matter which you, yourself, raised. Does the fact that a member of the House of Commons owns a life insurance policy in a co-operative life insurance company make him a shareholder in that company and, therefore, ineligible to vote? I am going to go beyond that because I happen to hold a policy in the North American Life Assurance Company, which is a federated life company, and does that mean I cannot vote in matters affecting federation life? I am sorry, sir, that you are really on the spot now, but this is a matter of principle and has to be answered.

Mr. Argue: Before you make your ruling, sir—

Mr. Jones: May I speak to the point of order—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): May I have one at a time?

Mr. Argue: Before you make your ruling Mr. Chairman, may I point out that I feel it would be very much in order for the hon. member for Vancouver East to vote on a bill related to North American Life Assurance Company because all that company will do is take his money. Those of us who are fortunate enough to belong to this company may some day receive some patronage dividends. We might, therefore, have a tiny financial interest in the bill.

I would point out to you on the point of order that the measure before us relates to employees of the company and proxy voting. I do not believe it has anything to do with financial returns to policyholders.

Mr. Jones: I do not want to delay the passage of this measure at all, but in so far as the point of order is concerned, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe you are called upon to make a decision. The particular bill that is before us does not affect any pecuniary interest of members. I, myself, am a member of this co-operative life insurance company, and have been for many years, just as many Conservative members are.

I might say that I do regret, however, the attempt of the C.C.F. to drag politics into the co-operative movement. One of the principles of the co-operative movement is that there should be no politics in it and that has been a basic principle of the co-operative movement since the days of the Rochdale pioneers. I should like to remind the C.C.F. members of that principle in order that they may stop dragging politics into this movement and let us get on with the discussion of the bill.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): The point of order has been dealt with sufficiently. There is no vote before the Chair so anything I might say on the question at this moment would be obiter. I would ask the committee to get back to a discussion of clause 1 of the bill.

Mr. Regier: I want to register a complaint. I spent all afternoon attempting to find out what arguments had been advanced in the banking and commerce committee. I, personally, placed about 18 phone calls and my secretary placed at least another 18 phone calls. I was, at long last, advised that there had been no verbatim record of the proceedings of that meeting which was held, I believe, on April 19 when the banking and commerce committee had this bill under consideration.

I phoned my national leader's office.

Mr. Argue: Not me.

Mr. Regier: I did not phone him, but I phoned his executive. They looked up the records. After all, my office might have failed, so I phoned up the office of the hon. member for Vancouver East; then the hon. member for Timiskaming; then, the hon. member for Timmins and the offices of other members. I had heard that there had been some controversy in the meeting of the banking and commerce committee. I have been unable to read about that controversy. I feel this is a very sad reflection.

We have before us an amending bill, and I approve of the amendment. However, I should like to know what the contributions of the members of this house were. I should like to know what their thinking was in relation to these amendments. I was unable to discover this. Only a few minutes before five o'clock, I was advised that there had been no record made of what was said in the committee meeting. I should like to register my protest. I do not know whether or not the head of the committee is here at the moment because I cannot see that far.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): That's easily understood.

Mr. Regier: You may agree and may not understand. I hope the hon. member who made that interjection will never have any of the physical difficulties that I have, and that he will always be able to see beyond the Tory party. I hope he will always be able to see all sections of this chamber. However, he decided to have for himself some fun, and he had it.

Mr. Pallett: He was referring to political myopia, not otherwise.

Mr. Regier: The head of the committee is absent as far as I know. The sponsor of the bill is absent as far as I know. I should like to reprimand the company for asking to sponsor their bill a man who is absent at the time the bill is up for consideration in this committee. I regret very much that I am uninformed at this time as to what the objections were or as to what the considerations were at the time the committee met. I believe that the House of Commons is ill informed on this bill. I therefore move:

That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Regier: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): I am rising on a matter of privilege.

Mr. Regier: This motion is not debatable and there is no question of privilege.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): The motion is not in writing.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): On a question of privilege, may I say this. I had no intention of alluding to the physical condition or infirmity of the hon. member speaking. I understood that the hon. member for Assiniboia had been present during all the committee hearings on this bill and therefore felt that the group in that particular corner of the chamber ought to have known what the bill was about. However, I certainly would not make any allusion to the physical condition or infirmity of the hon. member speaking.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask a question, Mr. Chairman, but it is not on the bill itself. Will you be kind enough to advise the committee on the point you raised a little while ago? Will you be kind enough to inform the committee whether it is your decision, as indicated by what you said a little while ago, that a person who is a member of the House of Commons speaking here this afternoon cannot vote on this bill because he is a policyholder of the Co-operative Life Insurance Company? You made a definite statement a little while ago, Mr. Chairman. I should like you to make clear whether you feel that anyone who is a policyholder of this company does not have the right to vote on this bill in committee. I hope you will explain that statement and your reasons therefor.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I have before me a motion that the committee rise and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Winch: I thought you said, Mr. Chairman, that you did not have it in writing.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I now have it in writing.

Motion (Mr. Regier) negatived: Yeas, 6; nays, 33.

Mr. Winch: Now that we are considering in committee an act respecting an insurance company, may I now repeat my question to you, in view of what you said about half an hour ago. What is your decision as to the right of a person who holds a policy in the Co-operative Life Insurance Company and who is a member of the House of Commons, to have a vote in committee on this bill? This is rather an important matter. It is one which can have very serious implications and repercussions. Every year we have before us a number of bills relating to insurance companies, many of which, unlike the North American Life or the Confederation Life, are mutual companies. In view of what you said a few moments ago—and I hope you have given some thought to the matter—will you now tell us your decision?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I must rule that the hon. member's point is not in order at the present time because no vote is being taken. Until a vote has been taken and an hon. member's position is questioned, I feel it would be a purely arbitrary expression of opinion from the Chair. I therefore rule that matter is not before the Chair at the moment. I would ask that we get back to consideration of clause 1 of the bill.

Mr. Winch: Then I challenge your decision.

Mr. Argue: Oh, no.

Mr. Winch: Do you mean you have to wait until a member votes and then decide whether or not it is in order?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I will refer the hon. member to Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms, fourth edition, citation 66 (2) which reads as follows:

(2) A member's right to vote on a question in which he is personally interested is one of those matters that must be decided by the house and not by the Speaker.

That being so, I will leave the matter at that.

Mr. Argue: How do you proceed?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): If any hon. member's right to vote is questioned, it is a matter for decision.

Mr. Brunsden: There are many ways of wasting time in the House of Commons.

Mr. Argue: You should know; you are the best waster of time I know of.

Mr. Brunsden: Thank you.

Mr. Argue: You are always interrupting, always on your feet.

Mr. Brunsden: There are many ways of wasting time in the House of Commons. To me this discussion is another time waster. We have here a bill which has come to us from the Senate and which asks for a minor change, in my opinion, in the Co-operative Life Insurance Company legislation. Most of us have insurance. Some of us are insured in line life companies as I am and as you, Mr. Chairman, probably are. Some of us are also insured in a co-operative life organization. I resent the suggestion that a person who has a policy under the Co-operative Life Insurance Company plan is denied the right to vote or to have a voice with respect to the policy of the company. It seems to me that we are completely outside of our orbit. We are not discussing the principle of the bill. We are discussing many things other than that. I suggest that this bill No. S-12 should forthwith go to the house and be passed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Regier: No, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Does the hon. member wish to speak on clause 1?

Mr. Regier: Yes, on clause 1. I am pleased that this Co-operative Life Insurance Company is asking that the right of proxy vote be discontinued. I heartily endorse this request of theirs. A limited number of months ago I attended a meeting of a co-operative. I happened to be a director and there was a nomination against me. There were about 100 people in attendance at the meeting and each person had only one vote. However, at the head table there was a vice president and another director. Between the two of them they had roughly 2,000 proxy votes.

I sent a note up to the head table at the board of directors meeting. I must point out that this is an organization almost equal in size to the organization we are now discussing. It has millions of dollars in assets. My note was, "Ought I to decline?" I received a note back, "Very definitely, no".

I knew that the men at the head table holding these proxy votes had all the power in their hands and were able to decide the issue. Very fortunately the board of directors was expanded in order to meet the complaint, and I remained on that board.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question. In his capacity as a member of the board of directors did he receive compensation?

Mr. Regier: I have yet to receive a nickel of compensation from this organization. Be that as it may, I only meant to tell the story as an example of the evils of proxy voting. Here was a board of directors who had this power in their hands. Only two directors asked me to remain on the board of directors. They had in their hands 20 times as many votes as there were people in the whole audience at the annual meeting.

I want at this time to express my pleasure that the Co-operative Life Insurance Company is abolishing this nonsense and this illegitimate business of proxy voting. I feel that if individual corporations abolish the practice of proxy voting it will be healthier for the economy of our country in years to come.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Residence qualification of directors.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a few words on this clause and the amending section 4A. We are interested in the report of the committee in relation to clause 2 of this bill, the third line of amending section 4A (1).

The committee agreed to add the words "that at least one director shall be elected from each designated region" immediately after the word "Provided". This is the amendment the committee of the house suggested, and I think it is a very good one.

[Mr. Regier.]

I think it is a very good policy to have the board of directors elected on a regional basis. Also, section 4A gives consideration to the fact that if directors are appointed from the east or other sections of Canada, though they live in the province of Regina where the head office of the company is located, they will still carry the residence of the province they come from and will continue to represent that province.

I think this is a worth while amendment. It is one that I was interested in, frankly, in the presentations made in the committee, because it would not only affect this company but also other companies that may have an interest in a regional clause similar to that in this particular bill.

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-2, to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company—Mr. Woolliams—Mr. Morton in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, speaking again on this bill I find myself in a position where I feel that certain facts should be impressed upon hon. members of this committee. I also feel that all hon. members are entitled to make known their thinking before they express their vote "Aye" or "Nay".

I do not believe that individual hon. members have the right to unduly prolong a decision, but I do believe that when there is a matter of principle at stake, as there is in this bill—

Mr. Brunsden: Tell us the principle.

Mr. Broome: I will come to the principle I am discussing. I will answer the hon. member for Medicine Hat, although the question he asks has been answered on half a dozen different occasions in this committee and on a number of private bills which I have put before this house. The hon. member for Medicine Hat has sat there and listened to the discussions and he should be familiar with the principle by now. The principle is, how shall the resources of this country be developed? This principle is of interest to every hon. member of this committee.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Or should be.

Mr. Broome: In direct answer to the question put by the hon. member for Medicine Hat I would refer him to a quotation I gave on May 12, 1961 which is reported at page 4745 of Hansard. In that quotation I gave the recommendations of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects as found on page 393. I shall quote them again particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Medicine Hat:

> We believe Canadians should have more tangible assurance than they now have that the people who are responsible for the management of such foreign-owned concerns will, whenever reasonably possible, make decisions that are in the best interests of Canada; that such concerns in effect become more "Canadian" in outlook. We do not suggest by this the development of a narrow nationalistic outlook; nor that the concerns in question should be restricted in their access to their parent companies and to all the benefits and advantages they obtain as a result. The following specific suggestions respecting desirable objectives for the operations of such foreign-owned concerns would not have these effects; we believe they would be of benefit to all concerned.
> (1) Wherever possible, such concerns should employ Canadians in senior management and technical positions, should retain Canadian engineering and other professional and service personnel and should do their purchasing of supplies, materials and equipment in this country;
> (2) They should publish their financial statements and make full disclosure of the results of their Canadian operations;
> (3) They should include on their boards of directors a number of independent Canadians and they should sell an appreciable interest in their equity stock to Canadians.

In many respects, the company—and I am not referring, now, to Aurora Pipe Lines but to Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas, which is the parent company—does live up to these recommendations, but in one essential, and possibly two, it does not.

I refer to the report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines at page 45 where the witness Mr. Burgis was questioned by the hon. member for Calgary South in regard to the financial structure of the company and the degree of Canadian participation. In answer to the question Mr. Burgis replied as follows:

> Yes, we take the point of view that this is a relatively small line and it would be quite usual for an oil company to build it as part of the normal operations. In terms of public financing—

This is the point:

> Back in 1957 our directors did offer public participation in the ownership of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas when there was no public clamour for ownership.

I want to emphasize that phrase "when there was no public clamour for ownership."

I did myself address certain questions to the sponsors of the bill and I must in all fairness say that the sponsors have secured all the information I asked for. If I did not ask all the questions I wanted to ask, that was my fault and not theirs. But I shall refer to an answer which amplifies this statement made by Mr. Burgis. I shall read from Hansard for March 28 at page 3428. This is a letter to the hon. member for Bow River and it reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Woolliams:
> With respect to the question raised by Mr. Broome in the debate on March 14 last regarding possible plans to increase the percentage of Canadian participation in the ownership of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited I would advise that the management of the company anticipate a continuing growth in Canadian participation. At the present moment the company does not have any need for additional equity capital to finance its operations and accordingly cannot make any definite prediction as to the timing or possibility of a further issue of treasury shares which could be offered to the Canadian public. However, we believe the past actions of the company in making a distribution of a portion of its capital stock back in 1957 before there was any strong public clamour for such action—

There is that phrase again.

> —is the best possible kind of indication of the company's attitude and thinking on this subject.

This indicates the blindness of Mr. Burgis as to what this is all about, because the offer back in 1957 was not made to the Canadian public. It was, in fact, an offering to the shareholders of Continental Oil and to the shareholders of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas. As a matter of fact, in 1957 only 1.7 per cent of the total stock of Hudson's Bay Gas was offered to the Canadian public—offered because that part of the Canadian public happened to have rights in one or other of the Canadian companies. I suggest that the senior personnel of the company who would have a fairly large interest in the company might well represent most of this 1.7 per cent of the stock, or some 278,000 shares.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Broome: I am afraid my time is limited—

Mr. Brunsden: It is only a short one.

Mr. Broome: No, I will not. I have not much time. Mr. Chairman, would you kindly tell the hon. member for Medicine Hat that I have the floor, and ask him to sit down.

Today, 2.96 per cent of the shares of this company are owned in Canada, because Canadians have purchased shares which were originally sold to Americans. This certainly confounds those people who say Canadians are not willing to invest in the resources of this country. The importance of this company should be realized. It is one of the 15 oil companies which make up the Toronto stock exchange western oils index; in other words it is one of the most important 15 companies in this field in Canada. Yet Canadian participation is only 2.96 per cent, which is what the company offered before there was any great public clamour for shares in this company. This is where Mr. Burgis is completely blind in his interpretation, because 2.96 per cent, and originally 1.7 per cent, does not represent Canadian participation in this company; it does not represent anything which was referred to by the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, or which has been referred to by hon. members who sit on the treasury benches, or which was referred to on May 12 when I put on record in the course of another discussion an address by Mr. Fowler, president of the pulp and paper association; it does not conform to anything which has been found to be proper, it does not conform in fact, to what the United States government itself has used as a criterion of what constitutes a United States company.

I say this because some time ago during the discussion of another bill I referred in this house to the Ilsley commission with respect to war claims where a pattern was followed that had been set up between the United States and Yugoslavia. The government of the latter country nationalized United States firms, and in regard to compensation, the United States set up—

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF ALLOWANCES AND INCOME CEILINGS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 15, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Churchill—Mr. Flynn in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952, to increase the monthly rates of allowances and permissible income ceilings; to allow for further exemptions in property and income; to modify certain conditions of service eligibility; to allow for administrative and organizational changes within the board and to provide for certain further changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, just before the house rose last night I was making a few remarks with regard to this resolution.

[Mr. Broome.]

Since I had only about five minutes available there was no chance to deal elaborately with the resolution; consequently I may find it necessary to recapitulate some of the things I said last evening. In the first place I will have to suggest a correction in Hansard at page 4868. In concluding my remarks I am reported to have said:

I do not know of any piece of legislation apart from the Disabled Persons Act which is more acceptable to veterans across Canada.

What I meant to say was, "apart from the Pension Act for disabled pensioners".

The Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act, with which we are now dealing, are the two basic acts which have been placed on the statute books for the assistance of veterans who have fought in Canada's wars.

Of the two acts some people feel that the War Veterans Allowance Act is the better. Others rely on the Pensions Act. I make no choice between the two; I think they are both very valuable. Over the years both have been amended from time to time to bring them up to date in relation to the experience gained in dealing with veterans of the wars.

Our first pension legislation goes back to the time of the Fenian raids and to 1885, after the Northwest Rebellion; but it was not until the conclusion of world war I, in fact not until 1930, that legislation was placed on the statute books dealing with the veteran who was not disabled by wounds. Over the years, from the conclusion of world war I until 1930, veterans organizations across the country, members of parliament of that day and other interested persons kept drawing public attention to the need of the unwounded veteran. Resolutions of committees were put forward, debates were held in the House of Commons and finally in 1930 the government of the day introduced a resolution, followed by a bill which, after consideration by a committee of the House of Commons and with amendments proposed thereto, came back, was passed and became the War Veterans Allowance Act.

It is rather interesting to look back at the debates of 1930 to see the reasons for introducing this type of resolution. If hon. members will examine Hansard for March 4, 1930, when the resolution was discussed, they will see that it was introduced by the Hon. J. H. King, who was minister of pensions and national health. In those days he was responsible for veterans' problems. The resolution that he brought before the house read as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting allowances to war veterans, to provide assistance for certain veterans who are not in receipt of pensions, or who, if in receipt of pensions, are only partially pensionable, or who are unemployable, and to provide for the administration, amounts, terms and conditions of such allowances, and for the payment of such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the proposed legislation.

After a lengthy debate on the resolution stage and again on second reading the act was put on the statute books but from time to time it has had to be amended and now in 1961, 31 years later, we are suggesting still further amendments to this very valuable act. The basis on which the Hon. J. H. King placed his argument ran somewhat as follows, and I will quote some of his remarks just to give the committee an idea of what was in the minds of the government and members of parliament at that time. Mr. King said, as found at page 248 of Hansard of March 4, 1930:

Mr. Speaker, this will constitute an endeavour on the part of the government to meet an outstanding need in the lives of our veterans, which need has been recognized for some years but not provided for up to the present. I might direct the attention of the committee to the fact that in 1928 the committee on pensions and soldier problems included the following in their return to this house.

These were the committee's suggestions:

Your committee finds that one of the most serious situations confronting the department and the country generally is that relating to the employment and care of ex-members of the forces suffering from disability, broken down or burned out. A number of suggestions have been made to your committee for dealing with such cases. The committee recommends information be gathered which will be of assistance in framing the government's policy. The committee consider this the most serious problem which has arisen in connection with our ex-soldiers.

Then the Hon. J. H. King continued:

Our present pension legislation is specifically designed to compensate veterans whose disabilities are traceable to war service, but it has become increasingly apparent that some provision inevitably must be made to provide for the aged and unemployable veteran whose condition may not be directly traceable, under our present legislation, to war service.

Then he concluded his remarks with this passage:

The legislation which will follow this resolution is the most far-reaching of all veteran legislation so far introduced, in that, for the first time, it recognizes and makes provision for the man who was discharged fit, who is now unemployable, but who has not been found, under our present legislation, to be entitled to pension. In making provision for the non-pensionable man, Canada will be a pioneer in enacting legislation of this character. It will be seen that we propose to pay an allowance to men with front line service, or to pensioners, or former pensioners, no matter where their service, at a stated age, provided they are in necessitous circumstances. It is provided also to pay this allowance to men in this class, irrespective of their age, if they are found to be in necessitous circumstances and permanently unemployable. Reservations have been made as in the old age pension legislation, restricting the amount receivable from this legislation and other sources combined.

It is not necessary for me to repeat what has been so frequently stated in this house, namely, that many men who rendered splendid service at the front are in need, and have been found non-pensionable. It is equally unnecessary for me to state that the effects of front line service have had a telling effect on the constitution and work expectancy of our veterans, so that many have aged before their time. This legislation provides for an allowance to these men. There is no doubt that in some cases the legislation will benefit men whose physical conditions are not due to their war service, but if we are to err we prefer to do so on the side of generosity toward those who served Canada so generously in their better days.

That, Mr. Chairman, represents the opinion of members of the House of Commons of the year 1930 because others who participated in the debate agreed with the summary presented by the minister at that time and added observations of their own. The experience of the country was that adequate arrangements had not been made through the Pension Act for veterans who had suffered from long service and who had no particular marks or physical disability to show for that service. Yet as the years went by and as the veterans became older the experience they had serving in the trenches began to tell upon them and they suffered accordingly.

The War Veterans Allowance Act established in 1930 has provided over the years for quite a number of individuals. Just to repeat one paragraph that I used last night, may I summarize the matter this way, that during the 30 years the act has been in operation 158,867 veterans and 28,075 widows and orphans have been given assistance and at the present time there are 47,204 veterans on the role and 19,266 dependents. That gives an indication, Mr. Chairman, of the number of people who have benefited from the act over the 30-year period I have mentioned. I have used figures which are shown in the annual report of the department for the fiscal year 1959-1960.

At the commencement of the legislation in the fiscal year 1930-31 there were only 2,219 veterans who came under the War Veterans Allowance Act and benefited therefrom. It was during the later thirties that the number steadily increased and it did not reach the peak, of course, until quite recently due to the fact that the veterans of the first world war are now of an average age of 70 years and a great many of them have reached the stage where they are not able to find employment and they have had recourse to this very valuable piece of legislation.

The act provides for seven classes of people, primarily veterans, of course, but also dependents. They can be considered in seven groups. The first is those who have survived from world war I or the South African war and a few dependents from the Northwest field force of 1885. The veterans there, not dependents, number 33,524. The second group of veterans comprises those from world war II and those who served with the special force in Korea. They number 6,676. Then there is a third class who served in both world war I and world war II, 992 of whom are assisted under this act. Provision has been made for veterans who served with commonwealth and allied forces and who are resident in Canada, 6,012 in number, or a grand total of veterans in these five classes of 47,204. Then, you have two additional classes, widows, who number 19,016, and orphans, who number 250. These veterans are found right across Canada in every province. I have a table here indicating that distribution. I think it is of interest to the committee to have some of this background material placed on the record at this stage. As other members participate in the debate, I hope they will add their observations with regard to the value of the War Veterans Allowance Act and also make their suggestions with regard to areas in which this act may be improved.

Subsequently, if the resolution passes and the bill passes second reading, we will refer the bill to the standing committee on veterans affairs for their detailed study and suggestions. I am sure we are all of the same opinion as the members of the house were in 1930, that this is a non-partisan operation in which we are working solely for the benefit of the veterans of Canada.

The distribution by provinces of the veterans and their dependents who come under the War Veterans Allowance Act is as follows: Newfoundland, 1,540; Prince Edward Island, 858; Nova Scotia, 4,650; New Brunswick, 3,199; Quebec, 7,572; Ontario, 24,316; Manitoba, 5,192; Saskatchewan, 3,015; Alberta, 4,634; British Columbia, 12,707. Each province has its quota of veterans under the War Veterans Allowance Act and in each province the Department of Veterans Affairs has an office operating to give care and attention to these veterans.

In addition, of course, there is the hospital service which is available to our veterans, not only those disability pensioners who are suffering from their wounds but also the veterans who are under the War Veterans Allowance Act. Just in passing, I might mention the fact that there are 11 veterans' hospitals located across Canada in Halifax, Lancaster, Ste. Foy, Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Montreal, Toronto, London, Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver, Victoria and, in addition, there are special wings in certain civic hospitals, veterans homes and health and occupational centres. The bed capacity in the hospitals is 8,450. Patients are admitted at the rate of about 50,000 per year, and some of that number would be people about whom I am talking tonight, people under war veterans allowance.

I referred earlier to the financial obligation that has been incurred. I will not give the figures over the years, but in 1955 the financial obligation was approximately $27 million. As a result of changes which have occurred in the act since that time and the increase in the number on war veterans allowance, the financial obligation rose in the fiscal year 1956-57 to $41 million and last year stood at $57 million. The proposal that we are bringing before the house today will increase the financial obligation. In so far as the veterans of earlier wars are concerned, it is a decreasing obligation each year because veterans of the South African war are now in their eighties and some in their nineties. The veterans of the first world war have not a great life expectancy and, as the records indicate, they are passing off our books at the rate of 3,000 per year.

Mr. Herridge: Do not look at me when you make that statement.

Mr. Churchill: I hope that the hon. member for Kootenay West continues to persevere and last in this house for a very long time, so long as his constituents think it is advisable he should do so.

There is one problem that has given us concern. It is the fact that during February and March we dealt with amendments to the Pension Act for disability pensioners and we raised pensions by 20 per cent across the board, with 33⅓ per cent for orphan children who had not been included in an earlier increase. On consideration of the problem, it seemed wise to deal with the War Veterans Allowance Act in the same session if at all possible. The reason is that there are approximately 13,000 disability pensioners who are in the lower brackets, 5 per cent, 10 per cent and 15 per cent, who are also war veterans allowance recipients. Having increased the rates under the Pension Act I knew immediately that was done some pensioners would feel that they had not received much of an increase because if they were on war veterans allowance, the amount of the increase in the pension was correspondingly deducted from the war veterans allowance. In so far as the approximately 13,000 disability pensioners who are on war veterans allowance are concerned, therefore, no increase has resulted. If in a year that the Pension Act is amended the War Veterans Allowance Act is also amended, then both classes of veterans are looked after and those who are under both acts are certainly given what is intended in the way of increases.

Although the amendment to this act was not forecast in the speech from the throne, it has been possible to bring it forward this session. I am sure that before very long the house will be able to deal fully with the measure and make it possible to pay to the people on war veterans allowance the increases that seem advisable.

The resolution before you, Mr. Chairman, suggests that the measure which will later be brought before the house will result in an increase in the monthly rates of allowances and permissible income ceilings; that it will allow for further exemptions in property and income; that it will modify certain conditions of service eligibility and will make provision for certain administrative and organizational changes within the board. That is the nature of the proposal which we are bringing forward.

Our hope is that these amendments will improve the War Veterans Allowance Act. These amendments will give an increase of income to people on war veterans allowance, will raise the permissible income ceiling, and generally will bring it up to date having regard to present difficulties and living standards. Although I do not think anyone is prepared to state that the war veterans allowance rates are adequate for all the needs of those who are under this act, nevertheless this is in keeping with what has been done in the past. There has been a steady rise in the rates. Then there are these other benefits, such as the hospitalization benefit, which are of considerable advantage to people on war veterans allowance.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry but I must inform the minister that his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

The Chairman: Has the minister the unanimous consent of the committee to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was about to conclude my remarks. I think I have perhaps now said enough to indicate to the committee that we treat this War Veterans Allowance Act with the greatest seriousness. It is an important piece of legislation. It came about through joint effort in 1930, preceded by representations from both sides of the house of that day and by representations made over the years by veterans organizations. The Canadian Legion and all other veterans organizations have given close attention to the War Veterans Allowance Act. At their annual meetings they have put forward resolutions suggesting changes for the better in the War Veterans Allowance Act and from time to time those changes have been incorporated into legislation which has been placed on the statute books. I feel sure that the veterans organizations will continue to make suggestions to us.

As I visit Legion branches and veterans groups I am impressed with the interest which the younger veterans—I refer to the veterans of the second world war and of Korea—show in the care and attention that is being given to the older veterans. Many a younger veteran has spoken to me of his pleasure at the increase in the Pension Act which we made early this spring and his interest in the proposal now on the order paper with regard to the War Veterans Allowance Act. The younger veteran wants to see the older veteran looked after. There is of course a community of interest among veterans. The younger veteran knows that his experiences in wartime were not any more severe than were those of the men who served in South Africa or the first world war; and he, recognizing that fact, wants the older veteran to be looked after. I hope that we can achieve that objective.

As far as the South African veterans are concerned, for example, I hope that not one of those men will suffer in his declining years through any lack of attention on the part of the House of Commons. If there is any field in which we have been negligent in assisting veterans of that period, let us correct the situation. The same thing applies with regard to first world war veterans. Men who have served their country well, who have suffered and who have not had the opportunities after the first world war to establish themselves as satisfactorily as they might have done, through no fault of their own, are the men whom a grateful country should assist. Let us not forget that the first world war veterans, after being demobilized, did not have the privileges which accrued to the second world war veterans in 1945 and subsequent years. The plans had not yet been laid. The country was inexperienced in dealing with a large number of veterans. Then he was struck by the depression of 1922, which is in the very dim and distant past now but which effectively put a number of people out of work, including myself. The veteran of the first world war went through the long drawn out depression of the thirties, the world wide depression which caused such a great diminution of trade and activity. The result was that the first world war veteran, even if he had recovered some of the ground he had lost during his service from 1914 to 1918, was barely established by 1929 or 1930 when disaster fell upon the country.

Then, following that great depression, of course, there was the second world war. Many of our first world war veterans have therefore had the full course in their lifetime. They went through the first world war, the great depression and many of them had the opportunity and willingly assisted in one way or another during the second world war. Many of them, of course, suffered the grievous losses of their sons in the second world war. Hence for the first world war veteran now getting on in years a grateful country cannot do more than provide assistance. That is precisely what the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act are for, namely to make sure that those who risked their lives in the service of their country should not suffer during their declining years. A very distinguished leader of this country at one time said this:

> Our duty to the returned men, their dependents, and the dependents of those who have not come back is clear... It is a demand that we treat their requests with generosity, which is more than mere justice. To the men who sacrificed their all in that fight for freedom we owe all the freedom we have today; though we default the interest on the national debt (which would mean national bankruptcy), we cannot afford to let one of our returned men or their dependents suffer.

That statement was quoted by a distinguished citizen of Canada and a former member of this House of Commons, namely Mr. L. J. Ladner; and he was quoting from a speech of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. At that time—and this is in 1930—Mr. Ladner said this:

> That statement of the Prime Minister merely reflected the prevailing sentiment and the great impulse of generosity and sense of duty which at that time animated the Canadian people.

I trust that the same spirit animates the Canadian people of the present day. We have passed through a second great world war and there is no one in Canada now who is not familiar with the peril in which this country stood at that time.

We have had the Korean war, in which many of our young men served, and we are fully aware of the services being performed by our men in the navy, army and air force in various dangerous posts abroad. All this service on behalf of Canada has maintained for us the freedom which we enjoy; the freedom to debate here in the House of Commons and on occasion to appear to be fairly annoyed with each other. But it is a bloodless type of fighting; we do it by words. It is only because of the sacrifices of our men in warfare, in the first and second world wars particularly, that we are able to carry on here in the House of Commons the parliamentary system and maintain the system of democracy which means so much to us.

It is on behalf of the men who served in those wars that I am bringing to the attention of the committee tonight this resolution dealing with the War Veterans Allowance Act, and I hope it will receive the approval of the committee.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I am sure all hon. members are very happy to have this legislation introduced at this session. We of the official opposition welcome it very heartily and we hope it will receive a speedy passage through all its stages and be made effective in a very short period of time.

As the minister has pointed out, no matter to which party we belong or on what side of the house we sit, we are all non-partisan when the welfare of our veterans is under consideration. Since we are so completely agreed on this principle there seems to be no need for any extended debate either on the principle of this resolution or even on the principle of the bill at second reading.

The minister has told us—and I welcome this information—that after the bill is introduced to the house it will be sent to the parliamentary committee on veterans affairs. I am sure it will there receive, as always, very sympathetic consideration and many useful suggestions will be made which will improve it and make it more suitable for the conditions it is designed to meet.

As the minister pointed out last evening and again tonight, the original War Veterans Allowance Act dates back to 1930. The objectives of this legislation were very neatly summed up in the original resolution which the minister put on the record tonight. That resolution was introduced in the house by the hon. member for Kootenay, the Hon. J. H. King, minister of pensions and national health in the cabinet of the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, on March 4, 1930.

The present resolution seeks to bring about the following further changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act. It seeks to increase the rates of war veterans allowance and the permissible income ceilings. It forecasts changes in property and income exemptions, and it will modify certain conditions of eligibility and service.

The minister sounded very magnanimous in his remarks this evening and I hope that when the bill is introduced we will find that its scope has been extended to include the members of the Newfoundland forestry units of world war II, the merchant navy, the rescue tug service, the firefighters and other groups which have not yet been covered by this legislation. All these bodies have a strong claim to the benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

As hon. members know—it has been pointed out in this house more than once—the Newfoundland foresters of world war II are excluded merely on account of a technicality. Then we have members of the merchant navy who served their country well and are now in need of some sort of assistance which can very well be provided under this act. These people gave valuable service to their country in a time of great need, a service that was duly recognized as essential. As a result of that service they today find themselves incapacitated, unable to support themselves and their families and reduced to dependence upon public relief and charity.

I hope the minister will also see fit to include the British-Canadian veterans who served in India and Afghanistan. The minister mentioned the veterans of the South African War. As recently as this morning, in the parliamentary committee on veterans affairs, evidence was given about these British Canadian Veterans who served on the firing line in India. I also hope that the 365-day requirement for veterans of world war I will be abolished.

I think it may be worth while to again repeat the original 1930 resolution which the minister has already put on the record. It reads as follows:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting allowances to war veterans, to provide assistance for certain veterans who are not in receipt of pensions, or who, if in receipt of pensions, are only partially pensionable, or who are unemployable, and to provide for the administration, amounts, terms and conditions of such allowances, and for the payment of such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the proposed legislation.

When we consider the categories I have just mentioned, in the light of that resolution I think it is very clear that it was specially designed to take care of these particular kinds of cases. I say this because the emphasis in the resolution is on veterans and not on any particular grouping, organization or unit in which they may have served.

As far as my own province is concerned, certainly the War Veterans Allowance Act is much more useful and could benefit a great many more people than the Pension Act. There are a number of persons in my province who served their country, as I said, in the forestry unit, the merchant marine and other services who would now find it almost impossible to qualify for a pension under the Pension Act because they do not have the documentation necessary to relate their disability to war service.

I suppose the key word in the original resolution is the word "veteran". I think that some of these people have possibly been excluded because we have chosen to place a certain interpretation on that word. I think in the light of the experiences of two wars and particularly of the last war we should be more liberal in our interpretation of what constitutes a veteran and think not so much of the particular unit in which a man served but of the service that he gave to his country and whether his country now has any obligation to him at a time when he is unable to look after himself. It seems to me not only a tragedy but a matter for shame that any person who has served his country and who is disabled should have to resort to public relief. I do not think this was the spirit of the intention of the people who introduced the original resolution.

As I said earlier, I see no reason why there should be any extended debate on this resolution. There is nothing controversial about it. We are all in complete accord with it. We realize that increases in the war veterans allowance rates and income ceilings as well as adjustments to property ceilings are necessary for two reasons, in the first place to bring the veterans allowance payments in line with increases which have taken place in the cost of living and, second, to restore the relationship in the scale of benefits as between war veterans allowances and pensions which existed prior to the recent pension increase. We recognize, as the minister himself has pointed out, that the recent increase in pension rates has made the introduction of this legislation almost imperative in order to restore benefits to those 1,300 pensioners who lost their W.V.A. and other benefits such as hospitalizations when the pension increases came into effect. These adjustments to the War Veterans Allowance Act will put them back on the same footing as they held before the increase was made in the pension rates.

We give this resolution our complete support and hope it will receive swift passage through the house. We shall certainly co-operate to the fullest extent with the government to achieve that result.

Mr. Herridge: I listened with interest to the minister reviewing the genesis and the history of this legislation. I remember well the days when consideration was being given to the need for legislation of this type to, at least, assist veterans in distress at that time. The minister mentioned Dr. King and said he was a member for the Kootenays. Well, one would expect this sort of legislation to be introduced by anyone from the Kootenays.

I am getting on in years and when anyone mentions something which happened in the years gone by, memory holds the door and

I think back to years past. Dr. King's election campaign of 1911 was the first campaign in which I participated. My father was the campaign manager for Dr. King in our part of the Kootenays and I spent days and days distributing Liberal literature attempting to convert a Conservative riding to Liberalism.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Herridge: Dr. King was a friend of my father's and of our family and I therefore have a personal knowledge of his interest in this question and of his interest in veterans generally. On that account he was well thought of by the veterans of the Kootenay area and he will be long remembered by those who knew him in pioneer days.

Since that time there has been a steady and somewhat gradual improvement in the legislation, usually as a result of representations from veterans organizations but to some extent because of the experience gained by those responsible for administering the law. The minister invited members to make suggestions with respect to improving this legislation. Mr. Chairman, I accept that invitation with alacrity and I intend to make a few suggestions on that account as well as to make a few general observations upon the legislation.

The minister failed to disclose the prize packet in full. He took the lid off and gave us an indication of the contents, arousing our curiosity without satisfying it by giving us details. I presume we must wait until the bill is introduced before we can satisfy our curiosity. However, I am confident that many veterans and their dependents have looked forward to the amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act particularly in recent months in the expectation that they will make their lives a little easier and a little more comfortable. There is no doubt about it that the Legion and other veterans' organizations, with their knowledge of the circumstances of individuals, are concerned about the needs of their members. On that account this is a subject which has been discussed very generally in the last year or two in Legion branches, at provincial conventions and at dominion conventions. As a result, resolutions have been adopted and recommendations made by the representatives of the dominion Canadian Legion and other national officers to the federal government and to the standing committee on veterans affairs. In addition, I am sure, hon. members of this house have received a voluminous correspondence.

I wish to express my agreement, for once, with the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo when he said that the general spirit of the veterans' affairs committee is non-partisan. That, I think, is well and truly said. I judge a member's genuine interest in veterans, if he is a member of the veterans affairs committee, by his willingness to attend the meetings regularly and spend his time seeking information concerning the details of the veterans affairs organization so that he may have a better understanding of the administration, the needs of veterans and so on.

Since the minister did extend a kind invitation, I am looking forward to the introduction of the bill. I do want to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that the Canadian Legion—and other organizations made similar proposals—has been interested in certain particular aspects of this legislation. So far as rates are concerned—and this is a very important thing in the case of the War Veterans Allowance Act; it is the foundation of the act—how much are you going to pay? In its representations to the parliamentary committee last year on the War Veterans Allowance Act the Legion said:

> In order to ensure that war veterans allowance recipients do not continue to suffer as living costs advance—the Canadian Legion recommends—
> That the rate for married recipients be increased to at least $140 per month and that a comparative adjustment be made in the rate of a single recipient.

When the bill is introduced we hope that it will meet the requests of the Canadian Legion based on the needs of the veterans and their dependents.

Then we come to the question of ceilings which is related to permissive income. In its brief the Legion deals with this question and the necessity for an increase in the ceiling to meet certain particular circumstances. This is the result of experience. You can adopt legislation with the best of intentions. I have been a member of the committee since 1945, and I know of the numerous amendments that were required, and I am sure other hon. members have had the same experience over the years of overlooking something that you did not expect; you did not anticipate a certain situation. I have had that problem particularly brought to my attention with respect to married veterans and common law wives and that sort of thing. Experience has made it necessary to amend legislation that had been considered quite satisfactory years before. Anyway, in connection with the ceilings the Canadian Legion recommends:

> That the ceilings on total permissible income under the War Veterans Allowance Act be increased to $1,200 per year for the single recipient and $2,000 per year for the married recipient.

We hope that when the bill is introduced it will meet the recommendations of the Canadian Legion and other veterans organizations.

Then we come to widows' allowance. This has to do with section 30 (11) (b) of the act. The Legion has been very concerned about this and recommends:

That where all other requirements are met, the war veterans allowance board be empowered to declare as eligible widows who would be qualified had the veteran made application during his lifetime.

I have always been interested in widows and their welfare, and I can think of particular instances in my constituency where, because of unforeseen circumstances, the widow of a veteran who served in the same company as I overseas was denied a war veterans allowance because he failed to apply for it during his lifetime. She was not qualified under the present act. I do urge consideration of this matter. I know the cases are few in number. Even though they are few, it is an important matter to the widow concerned.

I come now to the question of the merchant navy personnel. The hon. member preceding me dealt with this question. I can understand his particular interest in the question because he lives in a maritime constituency and would meet more merchant sailors than I would, but I wish to support his representations. I know he supports the representations of the Canadian Legion. In this connection, so far as the merchant navy personnel are concerned, the Canadian Legion recommends:

That the War Veterans Allowance Act be amended to include these veterans of the merchant navy and T.124 service.

There is no necessity to go into details because those who are interested in this legislation know exactly what it means.

I come next to the question of casual earnings. There has been a great improvement in the, shall I say, casual earnings situation over the years. The law, the regulations and the administration in the early days were pretty sticky on this point. It has been improved throughout the years but there is still room for amendment, particularly where you have veterans who have some small fixed income. They cannot earn $50 a month, but they may have $50 a month coming in as interest on a few bonds, and things of that sort. In all fairness I think it is the general opinion of the veterans affairs committee that consideration should be given to situations such as these. Because the Legion has considered this, it submits:

That since it is accepted that recipients are entitled to additional income in excess of the maximum rates and ceilings, the legislation should be amended to provide those recipients, who are unable by reason of ill health to enjoy this advantage, with a single benefit.

The Canadian Legion therefore recommends—that the act be amended to include as exempt income unearned income up to $50 per month for a recipient who is unable because of physical or mental disability to obtain employment.

I think it is a very reasonable recommendation and I trust that the casual earnings regulation will be amended to meet that type of situation.

Then, there is the question of interest on stocks, bonds and so forth. The present act limits to $25 per annum the exemption in respect of interest on bank deposits and bonds and dividends on shares in capital stock. The Legion recommends:

That the act be amended to increase the exemption in respect of interest on bank deposits and bonds and dividends on shares in the capital stock of any company to at least $50.

This is a very modest and responsible recommendation and I do hope the legislation will give it consideration.

There is a section in respect of personal property which is of interest to me, because of the particular circumstances of a number of veterans. The War Veterans Allowance Act from the first has permitted applicants to qualify while in possession of limited personal assets. Since the allowances provide only for minimum living expenditures, it is presumed that the provision in respect of personal property was to cover such eventualities as repairs to a recipient's home, replacement of furniture, medical expenses for dependents, funeral expenses for widows, and so on. This is a rather interesting recommendation:

In 1930 the limits were set at $750 for a single recipient and $1,500 for a married recipient. In 1948 these amounts were increased by $250 to $1,000 for a single recipient and $1,750 for a married recipient. In 1952 there was a further increase of $250 in respect of married recipients bringing the allowance to $2,000.

This shows a gradual improvement in the legislation and the regulations over the years. I continue:

There has been no adjustment whatever during the past eight years and none during the past 12 years in respect of a single recipient.

Therefore the Canadian Legion recommends:

That the personal property exemption be increased to $2,250 for a single recipient and $4,500 for a married recipient.

I hope consideration will be given to this recommendation.

Then we come to world war I Canadians who served in the United Kingdom forces. This has been considered. Representations have been made to the committee on a number of occasions throughout the years. It has been considered by veterans organizations. In this respect the Canadian Legion recommends:

That the act be amended to provide eligibility for those veterans with pre-world war I Canadian domicile who served in the United Kingdom with His Majesty's forces during world war I for at least 365 days prior to the 12th day of November, 1918.

In fact we were discussing this type of situation in the committee today. We hope the question will receive consideration.

Next is the question of world war I service in the United Kingdom. The brief of the Legion contains the following:

The Canadian Legion has in its files the cases of many veterans of world war I who volunteered for service anywhere in the world and who, through no fault of their own, served only in England.

On this account the Legion recommends:

That the act be amended to provide for those veterans who volunteered for active service in any of His Majesty's Canadian forces prior to the coming into force of the Military Service Act in June, 1918, and who served in the United Kingdom during world war I prior to the 12th day of November, 1918.

I think perhaps one of the hon. members from the government benches who will follow me will deal with another aspect of that problem. Then there is the question of eligibility for posthumous pension awards. In that regard the Legion recommends:

That the act be amended to provide that such awards shall be considered to have been in payment prior to the death of the veteran.

Then there is the question of the supplementation of the widows' pension and the Legion recommends as follows:

That the act be amended to provide for supplementation to those widows awarded a widow's pension up to the maximum permissive ceiling under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

That is to allow for a period of adjustment following the death of the husband and for particular circumstances. I trust that recommendation will be given some consideration. Then there is the question of the continuation of married rates which has been discussed on a number of occasions. In that regard the Canadian Legion recommends:

That section 5(2) be amended to provide for the payment of married rates in such instances if, in fact, he was in receipt of married rates either at the time of the death of the spouse or child, or at any time within the 12 months preceding such death.

That recommendation is based on a few cases that were brought to the attention of the Legion by various branches throughout the country. Then there is the question of dependent's medical expenses which has been a matter that has been advanced by various veterans organizations, has been considered in the committee and has I know, been considered by respective governments. The Canadian Legion recommends as follows:

That the amount of permissible casual earnings be increased by the amount of such medical expenses.

[Mr. Herridge.]

We urge consideration of those representations. Then I want to support the previous speaker who urged consideration of those commonwealth veterans who served in India and on the Afghanistan frontier. That question was brought before the committee this morning by representatives of their organization and we listened to their representations with interest. From what we can gather their number would be very few. It was suggested during the committee hearing that the number possibly would be 50 or something approaching 50. I am not going to deal at length with this matter because I know there is a member on the government side of the house who has previously dealt with this question fully and is well acquainted with it. I happen to have one veteran among my constituents who would be affected if the government saw fit to amend the act to permit those veterans who served in Afghanistan to receive the war veterans allowance.

Finally, I do want to suggest that I believe that veterans or dependents who were in receipt of the war veterans allowance and then went to Great Britain or some other country should receive similar treatment to persons who receive old age security. The veteran or veteran's dependent has to return to Canada and reside for a year in this country and then if they wish they may return to the United Kingdom or some other country after qualifying for the allowance again as a result of 12 months' residence in Canada.

I had a case brought to my attention just before Christmas of the widow of a veteran who served in my company in the first world war who had been in receipt of the war veterans allowance in Canada for a number of years. Prior to the 1960 amendment to the act that made it possible for a recipient to draw the allowance and live outside Canada, this widow had returned to the United Kingdom. When she heard about the amendment she was very anxious to take advantage of it so her brother lent her the money to return to Canada in order that she would be able to spend a year here. She will be here until next January. On arrival in Canada she requalified for the allowance within two weeks but she has to spend a year here before she can return to the United Kingdom.

I suggest that where the record can be easily ascertained and there is no question of qualifying, shall I say, where there has been a clear-cut award of the allowance to a veteran or to a widow, the widow or veteran should not be required to return to Canada and reside here for 12 months. I think such cases could be handled by the administrator of the Department of Veterans Affairs in London. The veteran or widow could go there and be interviewed by the appropriate official and qualify where it is a straightforward case.

I urge the minister to give consideration to an amendment that would avoid this unnecessary expense on the part of these persons. I think it is an unnecessary expense and in my opinion we should treat veterans and their dependents at least on an equal basis with those who qualify for old age security but who in some cases by no stretch of the imagination have fought in defence of Canada or have made the contribution that the wife of the veteran has made during his service overseas or has made since on account of the veteran's disabilities. In cases like that of the member for Kootenay West with his advancing years, his fidgetiness and crankiness and so on, I think the woman is entitled to some consideration and should be given consideration in these situations. I urge the minister to give consideration to that aspect of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I have reviewed the major recommendations of the Canadian Legion. I have little more to say at this time except that I must say that although the work on the veterans affairs committee sometimes does not appeal to some members, the intellectuals, shall I say, I think that those members who have served on the committee throughout the years have got a great deal of pleasure out of it because it does provide an opportunity to keep in close touch with the question of the needs and welfare of veterans and their dependents. That close contact and the time spent studying these matters at least gives a feeling of satisfaction that he has tried to do a little something for his comrades and their dependents.

Mr. MacRae: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this measure which is so important to veterans, a measure which I am sure is of interest not only to the veterans of this house but to all other members as well. There is an inscription on a soldier's grave in southern England in these words:

> God and the soldier
> Men alike adore
> When at the brink of danger,
> Not before.
> The danger o'er—both are alike requited,
> God is forgot
> And the brave soldier slighted.

The brave soldier slighted. I am sure the majority of Canadians feel that the veterans legislation of this country brought into effect over the last 40 or 50 years is certainly second to none in the whole world. That of course is as it should be because Canadians' record of service and sacrifice in the wars of freedom has been second to none as well.

I should like to compliment the Minister of Veterans Affairs on the energy and the understanding that he has brought to this department. He follows in the wake of many able ministers who have rendered distinguished service in this most important portfolio. Since we are dealing with war veterans allowances, I should like to compliment the minister also on the appointment recently of the new chairman to that board. In bringing Colonel W. T. Cromb to this board from western Canada, he brought a man who has distinguished himself in war and in peace, in the service of his country. Over the last few months, I have found he has given every sympathy and every consideration to the cases I have brought to him and his board, and, I am sure, to the cases of others.

Like most other members in this house, I suppose there is hardly a day goes by that each of us does not have a case of a veteran or a veteran's dependent come across our desks. Perhaps those of us who come from the maritimes—I say this in complete humility—have a few more cases than do members from other parts of Canada. For whatever reason, we seem to have had more men and women serving in the Canadian forces proportionately than any other part of Canada. I think the record will bear me out. Perhaps we could get into an argument about that. Our war casualties were heavy and, therefore, we seem to be getting more and more cases as the years go by. I know of families in which every man enlisted. I know of one case which six sons went to the war and five were killed. I know of one family in which eight sons went overseas and some never came home. I knew one community particularly well, because I was teaching there at the time, in which every able-bodied man enlisted. Only the youngsters and the old people were left at home. These men served in Hong Kong, France, Italy, at sea and in the air. Many of them were killed and wounded.

This is a most welcome measure, not only to those who are receiving war veterans allowance but to all Canadians. The present scale is $120 for a married recipient. They may then receive, under most necessitous circumstances, an additional $25 from the assistance fund. We know, of course, that this amount does not provide for the necessities of life, let alone the luxuries. In order to be fair, we must admit that the sum does provide a few of the necessities but it does not go far enough.

When the Pension Act was amended recently many letters were written to us from pensioners who were receiving small pensions. I am sure all hon. members received such letters. Of course, the pensions were increased but because of the ceiling on war veterans allowances the income of these veterans did not increase at all. Some of the letters were worded rather strongly. Although there were no aspersions cast upon my ancestry, some of these letters cast some aspersions upon our ability to benefit the veterans of this country. Most of these veterans will be taken care of by this amendment.

We are all familiar, of course, with the conditions of service required to qualify under the War Veterans Allowance Act. A veteran must have served in a theatre of war or, if not in a theatre of war, he must have enlisted in both wars or be in receipt of a small pension. The previous speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West, referred to the 365 days of service in England which are necessary in order to qualify for an allowance. This provision has been given considerable attention in past years. England was not considered a theatre of war for those who went overseas in the 1914-1918 war, but it was in the second world war. I had referred to me a while ago the case of an old man who had served for 11½ months in England. He was, therefore, unable to qualify and did not receive the allowance which he badly needed. He was furious and his people were furious, but there was nothing we could do.

I suppose hon. members will ask whether or not that provision is going to be changed. I think the time is rapidly approaching when it should be changed. As has been pointed out, the average age of the men who served in the first war is now about 70. There may be a few who are 60, but they would have been in their early teens when they enlisted. Old soldiers never die, they just fade away. It is regrettable, but they are rapidly fading away now. If we are going to do anything for these men who, through no fault of their own, just got as far as England in world war I, it should be done now.

We can go too far with this idea of the welfare state, and we most likely will. However, we are dealing here with a very special group of Canadians. I would, therefore, urge the minister to be as generous as possible.

The minister put on the record some statistics from the annual report of the department. I should like to put a few more statistics on the record, that are of interest.

Before going further, I should like to compliment the minister upon the annual report turned out by his department. The content is good; it is factual and I like the way the report is bound, with the name on the cover. I think this is the way the annual reports of all government departments should be bound at the end of each year.

The number of cases that have been approved over the years is rather interesting. In 1930 the act was brought into force, as the minister pointed out, and in that year there were approximately 2,000 cases approved. This figure remained steady until 1939 when there were 4,336 cases approved. It is interesting to note that the number of cases approved in the years 1939 to 1945 dropped off. In some years there were only about 1,000 cases approved. What was happening there? It is very plain to see that these men who had fought in world war I and who had been badly used up, rallied to the service of their country in 1939. We all know of cases of men who were badly wounded in world war I who were drawing pensions but who re-enlisted to serve their country. We find, therefore, that up until 1945 the number of cases approved was very small. In 1945 and 1946 the number of cases approved for war veterans allowances began to increase very rapidly. From 1950 to 1960 the number of cases has maintained a constant level at about 12,000 per year.

There is an interesting fact that came to my attention when I did my research on this subject. The number of first world war veterans is slowly declining. This means, of course, as I said earlier, that first world war veterans are regrettably leaving the scene, the numbers of widows and orphans on strength is still holding up. In 1960, as of March 31, the number of cases, that is for veterans and widows, stood at 67,683. While the minister did not give the figures, I think the records will show that the steady growth of cases will increase about 3,000 more this year. Now, if the veterans of the first war are declining in numbers, then evidently the increase must be coming from those who served in world war II. I have endeavoured without much success in the last year or two to ascertain from an actuarial point of view just when the peak would be reached in connection with war veterans allowance. No one has been able to tell me. I suppose it is because there are so many unknown factors, so many imponderables. However, it would appear that about 1980 we will reach the peak of pension cases and veterans allowance cases.

There are a number of other interesting factors concerning approvals in the last year that I should like to put on the record. The veterans of world war I, South Africa and the Northwest field force numbered 3,068 and reinstatements numbered 2,749. The number of approvals for veterans of world war II and Korea amounted to 1,668, and reinstatements, 971. The dual service allowances, that is for men who served in both world wars but who did not serve in a theatre of war, numbered 103 and reinstatements, 42. The number of approvals for commonwealth and allied forces amounted to 932, with 449 reinstatements.

I should like to query the minister on one point. I do not expect an immediate answer on this. When the minister referred to South African and Northwest field force veterans or Riel rebellion veterans, he implied that the eight who were still on the strength of the Northwest field force were dependents. I think I am right in drawing to the minister's attention that these are not dependents but are actually veterans of the Riel rebellion. Since then I understand that there has been one death and that there are now seven Riel rebellion veterans still alive. When you realize that it is 75 years since that particular bit of unpleasantness in this country, it means that these men must be somewhere in their mid-nineties. It is perhaps amazing that that is all the liability there is at this point. Just three or four years ago the last pension in the United States of America was paid in respect of the war of 1812. It seems to me that our neighbor was obliged to pay pensions for a long time for a war which it lost.

As to widows and orphans, this particular group seems to keep growing but is a liability that none of us would decry in any way.

There is another factor that has interested me in the statistics; I refer to the world war II group under 60 years of age. Rather surprisingly in that group there are 4,235 veterans of world war II who are in receipt of war veterans allowance. What that means in effect is this: This group of men unfortunately cannot maintain themselves and in the opinion of the W.V.A. board will never be able to do so. They have therefore been granted war veterans allowances.

There is one other point that interested me in the statistics. I refer to the number of British veterans who are in receipt of war veterans allowance. At the end of the fiscal year March 31, 1960, 8,757 British men and women who served in the imperial army were in receipt of war veterans allowance. This is a rather large number. It indicates the large number of men and women who served in the British forces—because this is a large number of people to be receiving veterans benefits—and who came to this country, this land of opportunity, after their service in world war I or in world war II.

Mr. Chairman, I have covered the points I had in mind. I should again like to compliment the minister on the fine service being rendered by his department, his officials and himself personally. The veterans of this country get sympathetic and courteous hearings on their pension and war veterans allowance claims. I as a veteran feel very happy that the men and women who served this country in time of war should have been so well treated, not only by this government but by all other governments over the years.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I recognize the hon. member for Grey-Bruce.

Mr. Roberge: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Is it not customary that, after a member supporting the government has spoken a member of the opposition be recognized?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I saw the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. I apologize for not recognizing the hon. member who has just risen.

Mr. Winkler: As the hon. member who has just spoken mentioned in his concluding remarks, I too wish to compliment the minister on bringing in this legislation at this time. I wish to point out that when the legislation was initially brought in in 1930, it was brought in in order to deal with a specific situation with regard to the veterans of that day who found themselves in increasing need and who were not eligible under the terms of the Pension Act as administered by the pension commission. I would venture to say that a sentence in the brief presented by the Canadian Legion to the Prime Minister and the cabinet applies then as it does now, namely that the war veterans were compelled to pay the same prices—and probably high prices—for goods and services as were all other people and consequently the government of the day saw fit to support this group of veterans in that way.

We all have agreed that legislation of this particular type is not contentious and the request has been made by a number of veterans that it be expeditiously dealt with. I feel that the veterans of the country deserve a voice here in the House of Commons probably more than we at times are prepared to give them and do in fact give them. Consequently I am going to make some reference to some of the remarks that have been made previously in the house. I hope that no pressure will be brought to bear on any member of the House of Commons to terminate the discussion at this resolution stage.

This may be in some respects somewhat irrelevant, Mr. Chairman, on the other hand it has a very direct bearing on the discussion as we proceed in my opinion. On a previous occasion when another piece of pension legislation was being amended, I made some remarks in this house. I do not say this in order to take advantage of the situation this evening nor do I speak with any political implication because, as a veteran myself I certainly feel that such legislation and discussion should not be contentious. In my brief years here as a representative of the people and of veterans, I have found that lip service is sometimes paid to this particular part of the question, but is not so much in evidence in other quarters in our operations here in the House of Commons. In speaking in the house on February 5, 1961—and I quote from page 1861 of Hansard—I said this to the minister at that time:

> —and I am sure he will in the not too distant future—introduce similar amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I made that statement without the knowledge that this resolution to amend the act would be forthcoming at this time and with the sincere hope and desire that the purpose for which the resolution has been introduced will be served. I feel in this way about it. Many veterans who are in receipt of war veterans allowance today, in my view, should be recipients under the Pension Act as administered by the pension commission. I say that for this reason. In 1939-40, when as very young men many students were accepted by the authorities of that day, they were not asked what their disability was. As a matter of fact they were not examined too closely. They were not made any promises either. They were taken for the service they could render. The men with whom I served performed this service with the full knowledge of what the price might be, without asking what the return would be or what awards might be made.

Therefore I feel that when a decision is rendered adversely against a veteran, where he has indicated that the problem with which he is confronted is attributable to a condition which existed prior to enlistment, my sympathies always lean on the side of the veteran.

Where a situation exists when a veteran becomes incapable of earning his own livelihood following his service due to a condition which is not attributable to service, I am always inclined to examine that veteran's background and experience and try to determine in my own mind what would happen to any of us under those circumstances. I can assure this committee that in many cases these people are possibly not being dealt with as fairly as I personally feel they should be. These are very serious matters to my mind and hon. members would be surprised at the number of such cases with which we have to deal.

It certainly is not a very enviable thing to examine these situations and review them.

Nevertheless I can assure the committee that I and these veterans who are now and will be recipients of war veterans allowance are extremely grateful for the measure that is being presented.

If I may, I should like to refer to another matter. This is a situation that was created on another occasion in connection with a statement made in the house in reply to a question put to the Minister of Veterans Affairs by the hon. member for Trinity. The hon. member observed:

> I wish to draw to the attention of the committee the necessity, in considering this item, to consider the revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act. The changes which were recently made in the Pension Act have resulted in pensioners being cut off from the supplements provided by the war veterans allowance and, worse than that, these pensioners no longer receive certain medical benefits which were previously available to them.
> I should like to suggest that the committee urge upon the government an early reconsideration of the War Veterans Allowance Act so that these people, who in many cases are very much in need, will receive proper consideration.

To the best of my knowledge this hon. member is not a member of the veterans affairs committee. This certainly does not exclude him from the privilege of asking this question of the minister. Immediately following that statement I said to the committee:

> I should like to say to the committee that this suggestion was made on numerous occasions during the consideration of the amendments to the Pension Act. If one refers to Hansard, one will find that this request was made by most hon. members who spoke.

Here is the way in which political advantage is taken by some hon. members. I do not say this because the hon. member to whom I am referring is not in the committee, nor do I make the next statement with any motive, but this may be the only opportunity I have of speaking in this regard.

I should like to refer for a moment or two to the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on veterans affairs. I refer to the evidence contained in the minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 6 dated February 23, 1961. This recommendation was moved by the hon. member for Renfrew North and was seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West:

> This committee recommends that the government give consideration to the advisability of amending clause 13 by deleting the words "in respect of any period before the first day of the month next following the day on which this act is assented to" and substituting therefor the words "in respect of any period before the first day of January, 1961".

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I feel I must rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman appears to be quoting from the proceedings in committee on a bill which was before this house and settled by this house at the present session of parliament.

As you, sir, are well aware, of course, it is not within the rules of the house or the committee to revive debates on another measure at the same session of parliament.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. Does the hon. member who has the floor wish to make a comment on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate?

Mr. Winkler: Not on that immediate point, Mr. Chairman. However, since the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has raised this particular point I should like to reply to the hon. member for a moment or two. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, during the last consideration of the pension—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I think I should rule on the point of order that has been raised. I would have to find that the hon. gentleman is out of order in referring to the minutes from which he was quoting. I would ask the hon. member to refrain from making any further reference to them.

Mr. Winkler: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think sufficient reference has been made. However, in dealing with the point raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, hon. members will recall that he interjected on a previous occasion in a debate on veterans affairs. I am happy to say that he was well and properly reprimanded by a member of the press gallery who is attached to a very reputable paper in the province of Ontario, and justifiably so, I think.

If the hon. member has not a distinct contribution to make on the point under consideration, better he should remain in his seat.

An hon. Member: You don't know the rules.

Mr. Winkler: When this matter is concluded at the resolution stage I think most hon. members will have placed their views before the committee. I hope at that time the terms of the bill are such as I believe they will be, and an expeditious passing of the bill will occur.

It was at the committee stage that I made the remarks referred to by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Although they were, in a technical sense, irrelevant, nevertheless I can assure the committee that they were made for a purpose. The purpose is what I want to avoid in this instance, and that is the reason I made the interjection.

I certainly, as well as all other hon. members probably, do not wish to turn back the pages to the extent that we must make reference to other hon. members' statements when we disagree with them, even if it is on the other side of veterans legislation. I can say, however, just to indicate that we were not all of one mind, that efforts were made by some government members to change the date, or the circumstances of the legislation.

But let us not attempt to make any individual political profit from this. Rather let us institute the measure which the government has brought down for the benefit of veterans, truly and sincerely, on the date from which the government wants it put into effect. After all, this is the second time this government has considered veterans' welfare since 1957, and it will not be the last time. Let us pass the measure as it comes before us without endeavouring to take some small measure of benefit to ourselves politically. Again, I congratulate the minister and his officials for bringing this measure in at this time.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: We heard a plea pro domo by the hon. member who just sat down, and I may tell you that I entirely disagree with the theory he expounded in the latter part of his speech.

If the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) would stop yapping, we might continue our discussion calmly and peacefully.

Mr. Tremblay: I was speaking to my colleague.

Mr. Roberge: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Roberval was speaking to a fellow member; but, according to standing orders, when a member has risen, no other member is allowed to speak.

As I was saying, I disagree entirely with the theory propounded by the hon. member who just concluded his remarks; if we accepted such philosophy, we might as well close down parliament and let the cabinet legislate as they please; for neither government nor opposition members would have an opportunity to make any suggestions in this house or in the various committees.

The resolution now before us—

(Text):

Mr. Winkler: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, that is not what I said.

An hon. Member: That is the way it sounded.

Mr. Winkler: You had better read it tomorrow.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, the resolution now before us is in four parts. The first one is designed:

To increase the monthly rates of allowances and permissible income ceilings.

That is the part I should like to discuss for a few moments.

Last night, when the minister made his statement on this resolution, he said there were 47,204 veterans now receiving veterans allowances. He also stated that some 13,000 veterans have had the sad experience (which was not intentional on the part of the government) to see their allowances reduced as a result of the 20 per cent increase in pensions brought about by the act we passed a few months ago. Now, those 13,000 war veterans represent approximately 30 per cent of the people eligible for war veterans allowances.

We shall have occasion to consider the legislation brought forward by the government. We shall scrutinize it and make such suggestions as we see fit. One such suggestion—in fact it is the only one I shall be making tonight—is that the government in the case of the 13,000 veterans I have just mentioned, should try to give retroactive effect to the improved rate.

In view of the fact that on March the 1st, which was the effective date of this Pension Act, those 13,000 war veterans had their allowances reduced, I see no reason why the matter could not be corrected now that we have this piece of legislation before us. Therefore, I would just ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) and the government to include a special provision in this bill, to make it retroactive for those 13,000 war veterans.

(Text):

Mr. Jung: Before I begin my brief remarks, may I say how delighted I am that you should be occupying the chair. Knowing that modesty is one of your many qualities, I wish to take this opportunity to place on record for the benefit of your constituents in Winnipeg South that you have on other occasions taken over the duties of chairman of the committee and discharged in a most exemplary manner the heavy responsiblities of that office. Lest hon. members think I may be prejudiced in your favour, let me say at once that the fact you are my colleague, my neighbour and the godfather of my twins has nothing whatsoever to do with it.

[Mr. Winkler.]

Earlier this year the Minister of Veterans Affairs addressed a public meeting in Vancouver and in answer to a question from someone in his audience replied that the government was deeply aware of the hardships facing those in receipt of war veterans allowances even though the War Veterans Allowance Act had been amended as recently as 1957. Subsequently some misgivings were expressed in certain quarters that notwithstanding the sympathetic interest shown by the minister the government had no intention of doing anything to alleviate the situation. I am therefore very happy that the minister has introduced this resolution, because it is an indication that the representations made by the private members of this party have borne fruit and that this government has indeed kept faith with the veterans of Canada.

As one who has served on the standing committee on veterans affairs since my election to this house in 1957 I take great satisfaction with regard to what we have done for the veterans. I know that many veterans in my riding will welcome this resolution. I have at least three branches of the Canadian Legion in my riding and there is another organization of which I am particularly proud because it is unique in Canada. I refer to the organization known as the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada, Pacific group No. 280, Chinese Canadians. This organization has as its life president Her Majesty the Queen, and to my knowledge this group, composed of over 200 Chinese Canadian veterans many of whom served with me and are my friends from boyhood, is the only unit of its kind in Canada and is another indication that Chinese Canadians have served their country in war as well as their fellow Canadians.

This unit will be holding its fourteenth annual meeting in Vancouver on Sunday, May 28, and I am sure that all hon. members will want to join with me in extending congratulations to this unit and in expressing the hope that their contribution, which was so worth while in time of war, will continue to an even greater degree in time of peace.

In the brief presented to the Prime Minister and the cabinet by the Canadian Legion on December 12, 1960, some seven pages out of 40 were devoted to proposed amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. In dealing with the War Veterans Allowance Act the Canadian Legion discussed increases in rates and ceilings; allowances for widows and orphans outside of Canada; widow's allowance payable under section 30(11)(b); merchant navy personnel; casual earnings; interest on stocks and bonds; personal property; eligibility for posthumous awards and supplementation of widows' pension.

In his remarks tonight the minister covered three of these subjects, namely increases in the monthly rates of allowance and income ceiling, further exemptions in property and income and modification of certain conditions of service eligibility. I am sure the increase in rates and ceilings will be welcomed by all but for some time, Mr. Chairman, I have been particularly troubled by the plight of the wife of a veteran who is receiving war veterans allowance because in one particular field, namely that of medical treatment, the wife is not covered. In theory the veteran receiving the allowance could quite easily and conceivably spend all of his pension in paying for the medical treatment of his wife who might have spent 10, 20, 30 or more years in looking after him and who by reason of advanced age is no longer in a position to work. This situation distresses me because without the assistance of his wife the veteran might have been in a very bad predicament. I would therefore suggest that some consideration be given to the advisability of extending medical treatment to the wives of those veterans who are drawing war veterans allowance so that this very heavy financial burden may be taken from the shoulders of those who can ill afford to carry it.

I want to emphasize that I understand the principle that medical coverage and treatment facilities under the act are designed only for veterans and therefore civilians do not qualify. None the less I think a very good case can be made out for the wives and widows of pensioners and other qualified persons. I also realize that practically every province in Canada has its own hospital insurance plan under which many people are covered. However, I still feel there are gaps which must be filled from the resources of the federal government. I am hopeful that a national health plan will be implemented by this government. If this is done the problem with which I am concerned will disappear. However, until such time as a national health plan is established I feel there is some urgency in providing medical treatment for wives and widows who have been of so much help to their husbands.

I wish to conclude by saying that much as I appreciate the proposed increase in the rates and ceilings now payable, I know that within a short time representations will again be made for a further increase. The complaint will be advanced that the level of payment is not keeping up with the rise in the cost of living. I would therefore make a suggestion not only to the Minister of Veterans Affairs but also to all members of the government that henceforth when consideration has to be given to an increase in pensions of this kind, rather than grant the increase in one lump sum we settle on an amount which will be adequate by present-day standards and also make the provision that any increases henceforth will be based on the cost of living index.

It may well be that this index will fluctuate from province to province, but I think that if we can supplement the basic rate, which is a reasonable and decent one, with a payment to cover the increased cost of living we will remove any need to have continual representations made because provision could be made for a periodic review by the war veterans allowance board. I think this proposal is sound. It would remove any possibility of increases of this kind in pensions being used as a political football.

To me, Mr. Chairman, there is something rather pathetic and repugnant about veterans delegations coming to Ottawa year after year pleading for an increase. By granting an increase we recognize the validity of their claim. If we could attach a provision for the payment of a sum to keep pace with the cost of living index we would all be spared the criticism that pensions are inadequate. Parliament would still have control over those funds because parliament would have to vote the necessary sum to cover those ancillary payments. Therefore there would be an opportunity for full discussion. Even with such a provision the payment would still lag behind the cost of living, but if there was a yearly review the gap would not be so disproportionate.

I have other remarks to make but I shall defer them until a more suitable stage of the proceedings. In the meantime I wish once again to congratulate the minister and this government for again keeping their promises.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, usually I do not take up much time in speaking and seldom do I speak on a resolution preceding a bill. This may be owing to the fact that I would rather sit back and listen to others express their ideas from which I may learn. But I do feel I should say a few words on this resolution. One reason is that at the time the amendments to the Pension Act were before the house several members—I do not refer to opposition members in particular—rather implied afterwards that I was not in favour of granting increases to those recipients of war veterans allowance. This is quite wrong and is one reason why I felt I should say something on the resolution stage.

I suppose my trouble at the time, and it always has been, and I hear a great deal about it, is that these are two distinct acts. The people who are in receipt of a disability pension have always claimed to me that they felt they earned it. Those members who are on the veterans affairs committee and were fortunate enough to be at the committee hearing the other day know that we had a delegation before us. The spokesman for that delegation made it very clear to us that those veterans who were in receipt of disability pensions really felt that they earned those pensions a little bit more than other veterans have earned theirs.

There may be an element of boastfulness in that feeling and I suppose that is the way I felt in expressing myself at the time we were dealing with that legislation. Now we are dealing with an act which provides assistance for a group of veterans who, regardless of their service, deserve assistance. The group to which this legislation applies is that group of men who at one time in their lives were willing to take the chances of any other soldier. Many of them were fortunate enough to go through the first world war and the second world war without catching a "blighty" as we used to say in the first world war or without incurring any disability that was disclosed by an examination, and these men did not receive a pension. While they were fortunate, there is no doubt that if men spend two or three years in the service, especially in strenuous positions in the front lines, there is a deterioration and disability does exist to some extent.

In any case, the veterans allowance legislation was brought into being to help those veterans who, probably through no fault of their own, found it difficult to re-establish themselves or who encountered sickness or trouble. In many cases they lacked education and some of them suffered from unfortunate circumstances such as may happen to all of us. These people arrive at a time in life when they cannot fit into a position where they can make a living. This legislation is for that group of people. I should like to say, and I mean it, that my heart goes out to all people, whether or not they are veterans, who find themselves in such a condition in the later years of their lives. These people have got to receive assistance from the rest of us who are fortunate enough to be able to maintain ourselves, pay our taxes and possibly lay a little bit aside.

As far as the veterans are concerned, as other members have said this evening I think they deserve special attention. I remember that in 1955, I believe, the then minister of veterans affairs initiated a thorough review of this act. The principle was established that a man who had seen service was aged ten years and provision was made to pay him the old age pension ten years earlier. As time has gone by and more consideration has been given to these veterans, benefits have been added until we have reached the point where an unmarried man or woman is allowed to have an income up to $1,000 including the war veterans allowance.

It was brought very forcibly to the attention of members of the committee and to all members of the house no doubt for the first time that in the vicinity of 13,000 veterans who had been receiving both a disability pension and the veterans allowance would get no benefit if the two acts were not amended in the same year. I know that all members of the committee felt the same way regardless of the party to which they belonged. They felt that we must endeavour to have the War Veterans Allowance Act amended this year so that those who had been in receipt of benefits under both acts would still be able to receive these benefits.

As others have done, I should like to pay my compliments to the minister because I know he has worked hard to get these amendments before the house. I am very glad they have been brought forward. I do not really think it is necessary for me to correct any impression that people may have got from the attitude they thought I had, but I really believe that war veterans allowance recipients deserve benefits far more than some disability pensioners because the disability pensioners do have a preference so far as many things are concerned. This group of veterans does not get a preference.

I suppose this is not the right place to mention it but I hope I am here when the amendments to the Civil Service Act are brought forward. A case involving a veteran brought this situation very forcibly to my attention. A man with some four years service in the second world war returned from service and he was fortunate in that he was not wounded. He was not disabled in any way and therefore he received no benefits. He came back, married and started a family and had a nice home. Through an unfortunate accident involving a tractor he was killed. The widow was left with three small children, the oldest being about 12 years of age now. She has to go out and work. She is a secretary and, all other things being equal, I think that as the widow of a veteran she should have some preference in civil service examinations.

This is the first time this matter has come to our attention. I can see no reason why a widow of a veteran who is responsible for educating three children and has no other income than that which she can earn should not be given every chance when she wants to go out and work. When she takes a civil service examination she has no preference. She has to take her chance with all the other secretaries. I just mention that at this time because it does have something to do with veterans.

I should also like to join other members in paying my compliments to the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs with whom I have come in contact. I really think that some of the speeches that were made on the amendments to the other act, to which I know I probably should not refer, did have some effect. I know of some pensions that have been granted in various parts of the country under section 70 where there had been difficulty in securing a pension before, and that is all to the good. As one member has said, there are many veterans in receipt of the veterans allowance who should be drawing nearly a full pension under the Pension Act but their cases could never be thoroughly established.

There is one other point I wish to mention. I have not made any particular study of the problem but I am inclined to think that the time is coming when those men who volunteered to serve in world war I should be permitted to draw war veterans allowance even though they did not get overseas. Actually, I think I could make a list of about 30 cases myself of men who would have given their right arm to get overseas in the second world war. They were kept in camps in Canada because they were good staff men. I do not believe these men should be penalized. I am not making this plea on behalf of the second world war men because a good many of them made good and they are not interested in this measure. However, I do believe that the men who volunteered to serve in world war I and who never got out of Canada should be brought under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I do not believe there are any other points I wish to mention at this time. However, there may be some points I want to mention when I see the bill. Nearly every member has mentioned gaps in the legislation which he hopes will be covered. I do not look for too much. This act and the Pension Act have to be reviewed and brought up to date every few years. I do not know to what extent these amendments will satisfy hon. members. No doubt they will not satisfy me any more than they will satisfy anyone else. We are always going to want something more in the act.

It seems to me there will be something for the veterans affairs committee to study every year. A delegation appeared before our committee this morning to present several resolutions. Just as we started the representative said that he was going to remove some of the resolutions because he understood that legislation which had been passed or was before the house met some of the points referred to in their representations. I feel this is a rather encouraging sign to find that resolutions which were drawn by organizations four or five months ago have already been covered by legislation. I believe the disability pensioners in my area are fairly happy. I think the war veterans allowance group will be happy too. There will be some veterans who will not be covered by this measure unless there is some change in the period necessary for qualification. Those veterans who did not get in enough time overseas are going to be disappointed. The department, the minister and the government, in their wisdom will have to decide just what extension can be given. I think we must be thankful for what we do get for the veterans. I am sure the veterans who will be in receipt of these increases will be thankful. However, we will go on fighting for more if we do not get enough.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, near the conclusion of what the hon. member who just sat down said, he made a reference to certain observations he might wish to make when he had seen the bill. I know how keen the Minister of Veterans Affairs is in his other capacity as leader of the house to get on with the business of the house, particularly these non-contentious measures, as quickly as possible without abridging anyone's right to make any suggestions, particularly on this kind of legislation. It does occur to me, sir, that it might facilitate the work, not just of the committee but of the house, if I said publicly what I have indicated privately to the minister, that is that I think I can speak for my friends on this side of the house when I say that if the minister would like, before the conclusion of this evening's sitting, to bring this stage to an end and ask for unanimous consent to go on with second reading of the bill, we would be willing to do so. I am not saying that there would not still be a debate on second reading, but we could get started on that debate by the end of this evening and perhaps get closer to the stage when this legislation would come into operation. I think I can speak for my friends on this side of the house when I say that we are ready to co-operate in that respect.

Mr. Payne: I should like at once to join with those who have congratulated the minister on assuming his new post. I do so as a former fellow officer of the Canadian armoured corps. I can assure the minister that the members of his old corps throughout Canada are proud to find one from our branch of the service in the role of Minister of Veterans Affairs. They feel, as I do, that the resolution the minister has brought forward tonight is of vital importance.

At the outset, I should like to draw attention to a few of the statistics which the minister mentioned in his opening remarks. It is a fact that over 12,000 war veteran allowance recipients reside in the province of British Columbia. This is somewhat over one fifth of the total in Canada, and if we calculated population on the basis of this distribution, the population of our province should be close to 3,700,000. This is far from the case. I mention this fact just to try to emphasize how vitally important this war veterans allowance legislation is to the people of British Columbia, far more so than to any other province in this dominion.

It has not been the privilege of all members during the past three years to serve on the veterans affairs committee. I happen to be one of those members who have not been so privileged.

The cost of living in urban areas has had an influence on the distribution of this heavy population of war veterans allowance pensioners in British Columbia. As a result of a desire on the part of many veterans in the prairies to move to a milder climate, many of them have come to the greater Vancouver area. Shortly thereafter, they find living costs are prohibitive. These pensioners have, therefore, moved up the coast. Those of us who are in the coastal regions up the coast from Vancouver therefore find in our area an inordinately high percentage of the 12,000 war veterans allowance recipients residing in British Columbia.

As I said earlier I have not been privileged to serve as a member of the war veterans committee so, as a member who represents literally thousands of war veterans allowance recipients, I should like to call attention to a few major points. I can assure the minister and you, Mr. Chairman, that those who are in receipt of war veterans allowances are grateful for this worth while and logically administered program. However, because of the cost of living, their interest has been great in seeing an increase in the amount of the pension.

I can assure you that the many hundreds and even into the thousands whom I represent will wish me to convey to the minister their gratefulness on seeing this change come into being. I think it is perhaps safe to say that nowhere else in Canada are these pensioners faced with living costs which make this change so urgent and so necessary. Many of those throughout my riding have discussed at some length the ceilings on their earnings. It is with great pleasure again tonight that we learned the minister has indicated that adjustment upwards in the ceiling will be established by the new legislation.

There is, however, one point which I should most meticulously like to draw to the attention of this committee at this time. I refer to the W.V.A. recipient over the age of 70 and his position with relation to the old age security pension. If it can be done, and if it is financially feasible, it would certainly be appreciated if the war veterans allowance recipients after the age of 70 were able to receive old age security benefits, as are pensioners from industry and other walks of life who have reached that retiring age, without in any way reducing their basic war veterans allowance.

I should like to join with my colleague from Vancouver Centre who discussed the situation of medical treatment and hospital care for the wives and the widows of war veterans allowance pensioners. I do this without criticism of this government. I feel it is well to point the finger where the finger should be pointed. In this case I refer to the regulations under the public health and welfare branch of the province of British Columbia. I would urge the minister and his department to make contact with them in a spirit of cooperation and good will in order to ascertain whether the province of British Columbia cannot do something in a fair and equitable way to see that these wives and widows are treated as are the wives and widows of all other non-war veterans allowance pensioners. I think this is a charge against the provincial government which they would be prepared to adjust in order to treat W.V.A. pensioners' wives and widows on an equitable basis provided the facts were strongly brought out and the situations were made known.

There is one other phase of this matter which has been discussed I believe by two hon. members who have spoken previously. It has to do with merchant seamen. I think very frequently the situation of merchant seamen is little appreciated or understood by many of those who are resident in areas which are not tidal. During the war many of these chaps were frozen in their positions. Many of them served at sea in Canada's merchant services and had no option, despite their wish to serve in Canada's armed services.

Another common misconception is, of course, that these Canadian merchant seamen benefited with rates of pay and other considerations comparable with those of merchant seamen from the United States. This unfortunately is not the case. Their rates of pay remained in a frozen state based upon the date that their retention was insisted on by arrangements Canada made in many cases with the British admiralty. In the course of service Canada's merchant seamen visited ports in theatres of active operations. I can take you, I would say quite modestly, to 38 merchant seamen who received severe injuries and wounds who are today incapacitated to a very large degree and are suffering from the services they provided to this nation at a time of dire need. I would urge upon the minister and the members of this committee that fresh thought be given to and a fresh look be taken at our responsibilities to Canada's merchant seamen who saw service, have suffered injury and are incapacitated through serving in active theatres of war.

Mr. Phillips: At the risk of offending the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks on this resolution. I was rather surprised when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate tried to close discussion on this resolution. I was thinking of the amount of time that he and his colleague, the hon. member for Laurier spent in discussing the bill to provide for 12 directors on the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I am rising on a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman has suggested that I was seeking to restrict this debate. I was not seeking to do anything of the kind. My language which will appear in Hansard tomorrow will make that fact very clear. I was seeking to do what the government asked the opposition to do, namely to co-operate in a reasonable way in trying to speed up the work of parliament, particularly that part of the work on which there was unanimity in the house. If there is anyone who wants to speak on this resolution and who has something to say, as I said earlier I do not think he should be restricted in any way whatsoever. But in view of the very sensible observations that were made by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton I suggested that perhaps it would facilitate debate if we passed the resolution and had debate on the bill. I suggested that as a step towards co-operation to the government. If the government or its supporters do not wish to accept that suggestion, it is entirely for them to decide. It should not be suggested, as the hon. gentleman has done, that that is an attempt in any way to restrict his freedom or that of any other hon. member to say anything he likes as long as it is according to the rules.

Mr. Phillips: Had the hon. member been a little bit more patient and had he allowed me a little bit more time he would have understood that what I was attempting to explain was that I was surprised that he placed the importance of the 12 directors of the C.N.R. above that of an extremely important measure such as this one.

Mr. Thrasher: It is of no importance.

Mr. Phillips: It is sincerely hoped that this is not the importance that the Liberal party—

Mr. Thrasher: To assist the veterans is of no importance? That is what the hon. member said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said that the 12 directors of the C.N.R. were of no importance; and relatively they are not of importance.

Mr. Phillips: When the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate visits Kings county next week, I hope he will discuss the 12 directors of the C.N.R. and forget the veterans pension.

Mr. MacEwan: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is it true that there has been a call for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the official Leader of the Opposition to go down and help to get some of the ice out of the strait?

Mr. Phillips: It is quite true that the hon. gentlemen referred to do on occasion generate a certain amount of heat, but if they accomplish that purpose it will be the only useful purpose they have achieved.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs on this measure and on the other legislation introduced this session.

We had, first, the increase in disability pensions, then the reduction in the amount of land required for small holdings, and this measure completes the triad. When the disability pensions were increased there seemed to be considerable confusion concerning the future of the war veterans allowance. Like many other hon. members, I am sure, I have received representations concerning war veterans allowance. A branch of the Canadian Legion in my riding forwarded me a resolution urging an early revision of this act.

In a constituency such as mine the war veterans allowance is more important than it is in an urban riding. In an urban riding we find people retiring on pensions from the civil service and various employer-employee pension schemes. In a rural area the farmers and fishermen do not have this opportunity to retire on pension and therefore much greater emphasis is placed on war veterans allowance.

I also find that the general public express a great deal of interest in veterans legislation. I find that when people are speaking to me on behalf of veterans or veterans' widows they are most emphatic that these people should receive special treatment because of their contribution to the nation.

In making his remarks the minister requested hon. members to make suggestions concerning improvements in the legislation. One complaint I have received on a number of occasions concerns the 12 month service provision prior to the armistice. I realize there is a great deal of controversy among world war I veterans concerning this qualification, but I believe world war II veterans would appreciate seeing this qualification eliminated or reduced. The number of veterans affected is very small; I understand it is in the vicinity of approximately 5,000. Perhaps the minister could give consideration to either eliminating this qualification or reducing it.

The saddest war veterans allowance cases that I have had drawn to my attention are those of widows of recipients of war veterans allowance. These widows receive the war veterans allowance for a year and then it is discontinued.

It is said that the widow is under 55 years of age and is able to work. However, in a small town, with children, it is difficult to obtain either full or part-time employment. I should like to see consideration given to the allowance being continued to widows, especially in cases where there are small children.

One other complaint I have received concerns the amount of permissible income. The complaints have been that it was not high enough, and formerly there was a monthly limit on the income that could be earned. This situation has been improved and clarified. This has enabled a great many people to earn extra income. It has also allowed a great many qualified people, such as nurses, to return to their professions. Formerly, if a nurse took a case she would be more or less limited to four or five days' nursing; then she would have earned her permissible income for that month and would either have to discontinue attending the patient or have her income deducted from her husband's war veterans allowance.

There are two further points I should like to draw to the minister's attention. The first is that I feel there is too much emphasis placed upon the aspect of permanent disability. A war veteran may develop a severe case of ulcers and be unable to work for a period of, say, a year. But as long as there is hope of him receiving medical treatment and achieving recovery he is not eligible for war veterans allowance. When the veteran is unable to work and has no income, this further aggravates his condition. I think this applies particularly to ulcer cases. I would appreciate consideration being given to this question.

The other complaint I have received in regard to war veterans allowance and the qualification for permanent disability allowance concerns the type of work available and the skill of the individual. A veteran who is qualified only as a labourer would have a difficult time carrying on with a partial disability. It is true that he could be referred to light work such as operating an elevator, or something of that nature, but in many areas this type of work is not available.

I hope the minister and the war veterans allowance board will pay more attention to this aspect of the legislation in the future. It is fine to say that a veteran can carry on light work, but if he is a labourer, farmer or fisherman it is very difficult for him to obtain light work. I think there could probably be more consideration given to this matter when these cases are being considered.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, my remarks at this time will have to be brief. I should like to confine them particularly to a problem concerning a small group of imperial veterans.

However, before I proceed along those lines I should like to congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs for initiating and bringing forward such a full program of benefits and assistance to our war veterans during this session of parliament.

First we had the 20 per cent increase in disability pensions. This was well deserved and well received. We now have this resolution to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act and to grant increases and other benefits which I am sure will be equally well appreciated.

When we look back to the days of the first world war it is interesting to note that the proposed increases to veterans allowance come at a time when the very youngest veterans who saw service at that time will now be 60 years of age, which is the age limit for veterans allowance. It will also provide much needed extra assistance to the elderly veterans and sweeten the declining years of their lives.

This problem I intend to bring up concerns imperial veterans. I brought it up last year and went into it at considerable length. However, I am not going to confuse the issue by reading over a lot of correspondence and different documents I have here on file. I would just like to state briefly that this problem concerns a group of imperial veterans who served on the Afghanistan frontier between 1914 and 1919. The records show there were about 5,000 of them altogether and it is possible there may have been Canadians among them, at least people who had lived in Canada prior to the war. It will be recalled that a great many Britishers who were here when the war started returned to their native land and joined the regiments with which they had been associated before they came to Canada. This group served on the Afghanistan frontier. There were about 5,000 of them. But there were many thousands of other British or commonwealth troops who served in different parts of India and on the frontier. But this small group of 5,000 did not get the British victory medal and for that reason they were not entitled to war veterans allowance. They received other medals. They received the Afghanistan medal. They received the Indian frontier medal and they also received the general service medal.

I should like to put on record a case with which I am familiar. It is the case of the widow of one of these veterans. Her husband served some 12 years in the imperial forces and, not through his choice, when the war began in 1914 he was sent to the East and he spent his time in India. He was one of this force which was on the Afghanistan frontier. He has passed on now, but his widow is in dire need of assistance and I should like to deal with this particular veteran's widow. Her husband, as I say, had about 12 years' service in the army. He served during the war from 1914 to 1919. He had three medals given to him for active service. He had the red chevron for 1914 and he had the blue ones for 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919. Unfortunately he had not been granted the victory medal and for that reason his widow is today not entitled to war veterans allowance.

This lady, who had such an outstanding husband who did not enjoy particularly good health while he was in Canada due to a tropical disease he had contracted while serving in India—malaria and other troubles —is today required to go to the welfare office every two weeks and pick up her welfare cheque. I know there are hundreds if not thousands of women who have to do that. Nevertheless, this is the widow of a veteran who had a very good record of service but due to some misunderstanding this small, group of British veterans he served with did not receive the victory medal and are not entitled to veterans allowances. This lady happens to be one who has to suffer because of it. As I say, some 5,000 troops were involved in this campaign. I have all the records here but, as I mentioned, I do not want to delay the committee by dealing with them now. My time is about up. Nevertheless this is in my opinion a very worthy case.

According to some estimates there are perhaps 50 of these veterans in Canada today. I do not, myself, think there are as many. I know of three men in southern Ontario. The hon. member for Kootenay West says he knows of one. I know it would be impossible to get the British government today to act and award victory medals to these men now but my suggestion is—and I made it last year and I notice that the British imperial veterans are asking for the same thing—is simply this: I strongly recommend to the minister that the 1914-1919 award of the Indian general service medal be accepted as entitlement to the war veterans allowance as well as the victory medal.

As I say, there is a very small group which would be affected. In dollars it would not amount to very much. Nevertheless it would be of great assistance to those who are suffering simply because there was a mistake made some 40 years ago.

The Chairman: It being ten thirty o'clock shall I rise and report progress?

Some hon. Members: Pass the resolution.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the leader of the house would indicate what the business of the house will be for the rest of the week. It might be useful to have it on record for reference.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow the house will not be sitting for more than two hours. We shall continue, and, I hope, complete, the second reading of Bill No. C-94 to amend the Canadian National Railways Act. Then for the balance of the week we shall consider the estimates of the Department of Transport, followed by those of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not fisheries, as previously announced by your colleague earlier?

Mr. Churchill: No.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

GERMAN-AUSTRIAN CANADIANS—PENSIONS AND ANNUITIES

Question No. 165—Mr. Argue:

1. Has a resolution, approved by the director of the trans-Canada alliance of German-Canadians on February 19, 1961, concerning the loss of German and Austrian old age annuities and pensions to German immigrants on becoming Canadian citizens, been received?

2. If so: (a) what action is requested of the federal government; (b) what reply has been made?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. Yes. Mimeographed copies of a resolution were sent to the Prime Minister and to the ministers of external affairs and National Health and Welfare. The Minister of National Health and Welfare replied on behalf of himself and his colleagues.

2. (a) The resolution urged the government "to enter into a reciprocal treaty with the government of West Germany and the government of Austria with the intent that no individual's rightful claim to social security from these countries shall be lost by becoming a Canadian citizen."

(b) The organization was assured that their representations had been carefully noted and would receive most sympathetic consideration in future social security planning.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 17, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

STARRED QUESTIONS

RAILWAY STUDIES BY WOODS, GORDON COMPANY

Question No. 328—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways, alone, or in concert with other railways, engaged the services of Woods, Gordon and Co. in the past three months for any study in the management, economic policy, or union relationship sectors?
2. If so, when is the study to be received?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is no and part 2 is answered by the answer to part 1.

C.N.R. CAPITAL STOCK PURCHASES, TRUCKING COMPANIES

Question No. 329—Mr. Fisher:

1. What was the total purchase price to the Canadian National Railways of the capital stock in the following companies, described as included in the Canadian National Railways system on page 27 of the 1960 C.N.R. annual report: Eastern Transport Limited, East-West Transport Limited, Empire Freightways Limited, Sydney Transfer and Storage Limited?
2. What was the recorded net worth in total of the above companies as of the respective dates when the Canadian National Railways acquired ownership of their capital stock?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows. The answer to part 1 is $1,400,000 in round figures. As to part 2, the disclosure of such information would be prejudicial to current negotiations.

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM BY PROVINCES

Question No. 333—Mr. Clermont:

1. Since December 21, 1960, with respect to each province: (a) how many municipalities, cities, and towns have made applications to the federal government in connection with undertakings to be carried out under the winter works assistance program? (b) of these applications, how many have been accepted? (c) what is the total estimated cost of the approved undertakings? (d) what is the estimated amount contributed thereto by the federal government by way of direct wages?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question contains a great deal of statistical information. I would ask either that the answer be taken as read and incorporated in today's Hansard or it be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Is the answer quite extensive?

Mr. Thrasher: Very extensive, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps it could be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXAMINATION BY MINISTERS

Question No. 334—Mr. Howard:

1. Has the Minister of Justice examined each private bill relating to divorce introduced during the current session of parliament in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights and, if so, upon what date was each such bill so examined?
2. Have any such inconsistencies been found, and, if so, what are they?
3. In the process of so examining such bills, was the evidence taken before the Senate divorce committee upon which each such bill was founded also examined?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The answer is as follows:

1. The Canadian Bill of Rights states that "the Minister of Justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the governor in council, examine ... every bill introduced or presented to the House of Commons, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this part (part I) and he shall report any such inconsistency to the House of Commons at the first convenient opportunity".

The following private bills relating to divorce, which have been presented to the House of Commons, have been examined as required by the Canadian Bill of Rights:

Bill No.	Date
SD- 1 to SD- 21	March 7, 1961
SD- 22 to SD- 44	" " "
SD- 45 to SD- 53	" " "
SD- 54 to SD- 75	" " "
SD- 76 to SD- 85	" " "
SD- 86 to SD- 94	" " "
SD- 95 to SD-108	" " "
SD-109 to SD-121	" 13, "
SD-122 to SD-148	" " "
SD-149 to SD-179	" 20, "
SD-180 to SD-205	April 6, "
SD-206 to SD-232	May 2, "

The following private bills relating to divorce, which have been presented to the House of Commons, have not yet been transmitted by the Clerk of the House of Commons to the deputy minister of justice and have, therefore, not been examined as required by the Canadian Bill of Rights:

SD-233 to SD-237.

2. No.

3. No.

Starred Questions

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGES, B.C.

Question No. 336—Mr. Herridge:

1. With respect to the nearly completed two-lane trans-Canada highway suspension bridge, spanning the Columbia, west of Revelstoke: (a) what is the bridge seat elevation at the west end? (b) what is the bridge seat elevation at the east end? (c) what is the crest elevation of water at bridge site, if the High Arrow dam is constructed? (d) does crest elevation of water permit clearance for navigation, floating trees, forest debris, and ice? (e) will reconstruction of this bridge be necessary if the High Arrow dam is built, and, if so, what is the estimated cost of same?

2. With respect to single track, main line Canadian Pacific Railway bridge, across the Columbia, west of Revelstoke: (a) what is the bridge seat elevation of this bridge? (b) what is the crest elevation of water at bridge site, if the High Arrow dam is constructed? (c) does crest elevation of water permit clearance for navigation, floating trees, forest debris, and ice? (d) will reconstruction of this bridge be necessary if the High Arrow dam is built, and, if so, what is the estimated cost of same?

3. With respect to provincial highway bridge crossing the Columbia, west of Revelstoke: (a) what is the bridge seat elevation at the west end? (b) what is the bridge seat elevation at the east end? (c) does the crest elevation of water permit clearance for navigation, floating trees, forest debris, and ice? (d) will reconstruction of this bridge be necessary if the High Arrow dam is built, and, if so, what is the estimated cost of same?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this question involves more than one department and will call for a lengthy reply; so on behalf of the Secretary of State I would ask that this question be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

TELEPHONE LINE TRANSFER, CAPE BRETON ISLAND

Question No. 337—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has the Department of Transport transferred the operation and ownership of its telephone lines in certain areas of Cape Breton island to the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company Limited?

2. If so, what mileage of line and areas are affected?

3. What are the terms of the transfer?

4. Did the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company pay for this line, and, if so, what amount?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The answer to this question is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) 117 miles of line in the Marion Bridge area, Victoria constituency.

(b) 178 miles of line generally in the Inverness-Richmond constituency.

3. (a) In the Marion Bridge area, the Department of Transport undertook to rebuild the pole lines immediately after the transfer.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company undertook to rebuild the wires and expand the service as required. The terms of the transfer include lines and ancillary equipment.

(b) In the Inverness-Richmond area, the Department of Transport, in lieu of rebuilding the pole lines, as was done in the case of the Marion Bridge area, agreed to pay to the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company the equivalent cost in the amount of $150,000, and the company undertook to do all the work required to expand the service, rebuild the pole lines, wires, etc. The terms of the transfer included all lines and ancillary equipment.

4. The consideration in respect of each transfer was the nominal sum of one dollar.

COLUMBIA RIVER—FLOOD DAMAGE TO INDIAN RESERVES

Question No. 338—Mr. Howard:

1. Will any Indian reserves or Indian graveyards be flooded as a result of the proposed Columbia river project?

2. If so, what is the area and location of each such reserve or graveyard, the estimated compensation accruing to the Indian bands for each reserve, and the estimated cost of relocating each graveyard?

3. With respect to the relocation of the graveyards, what steps have been taken to acquire additional lands, and what has been the degree of success experienced?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is that it is contemplated that some Indian reserve land will be affected; this is particularly so if the Okanagan-Similkameen basin portion is developed. So far no application has been received for any land, and until detailed information is available it cannot be determined if any graveyards are involved. Consequently I cannot answer the other questions.

C.B.C. BROADCASTS—REPRESENTATIONS BY FINANCE MINISTER

Question No. 340—Mr. Lessard:

1. Have any representations been made by the Minister of Finance to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation either by letter, telephone, or conversation, with regard to any television program broadcast or proposed to be broadcast?

2. If so, when, and how were they made, what was the nature of these representations, and to what program were they referring?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

GEORGE AND BRUCE RILEY

Question No. 343—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Was Mr. George Riley employed in the national park in Prince Edward Island?

2. If so, for what periods, and what were his duties?

3. Was Mr. Bruce Riley employed in the national park in Prince Edward Island?

4. If so, for what periods, and what were his duties?

5. Did Mr. George Riley also hold a position with the provincial government?

6. Was (a) Mr. George Riley (b) Mr. Bruce Riley, unemployed at the time he was engaged for employment in the national park?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answers to this question are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Continuously from November 28, 1960. He was employed as a carpenter.

3. Yes.

4. From November 28, 1960 to April 28, 1961. Carpenter.

5. According to departmental records, Mr. George Riley was employed for eight days in November, 1960 by the Prince Edward Island government.

6. As far as can be determined, both Rileys were unemployed when engaged for employment at the park.

WASHABUCK CENTRE WHARF REPAIRS, N.S.—FOREMAN

Question No. 344—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Was a foreman employed by the Department of Public Works to supervise wharf repairs at Washabuck Centre, Victoria county, Nova Scotia, during the winter of 1960-61?

2. If so, were instructions issued to the foreman that only supporters of the present government could be on this program?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 of this question is yes, and the answer to part 2 is no.

CAUGHNAWAGA INDIAN RESERVE—LEASE OF LAND FOR GOLF COURSE

Question No. 345—Mr. Howard:

1. Has any portion of the reserve lands of the Caughnawaga Indians been leased for the purposes of a golf course and attendant facilities?

2. If so, is any portion of the leased land used for the selling, serving or consuming of liquor; and what is the position, with respect to the prohibitive sections of the Indian Act dealing with liquor, of any person who sells, serves, or consumes liquor on the said lands?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answers to this question are as follows:

1. Yes, on October 1, 1920.

2. It is not known whether any portion of this leased land is used for the selling, serving or consuming of liquor. Sections 93 and 96 of the Indian Act would apply to this land.

NEILL ADVERTISING AGENCY, BRANDON, MAN.

Question No. 347—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. What is the street address and telephone number of the Neill advertising agency of Brandon, Manitoba, which handles advertising contracts from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources?

2. How long has this agency been at the present address, and what was the previous street address and telephone number of the agency?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the following are the answers to this question:

1. 201 Kennedy building, 107 Seventh street, Brandon, Manitoba. Telephone number, Parkway 6-2675.

2. Since April 15, 1961. Previous address and telephone number: Leech printing building, Eighteenth street and Park avenue, Brandon, Manitoba. Telephone number, Parkway 6-6054.

JACK STEPLER

Question No. 348—Mr. Martin (Timmins):

1. Has a Mr. Jack Stepler recently been appointed to a position within the Canadian high commissioner's office in the United Kingdom, and, if so, to what position?

2. What is Mr. Stepler's (a) annual salary (b) expense structure, both normal and extra, if any (c) date of appointment (d) duties?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the question are as follows:

1. Yes. Special adviser on press relations in the office of the high commissioner for Canada to the United Kingdom, London, England.

2. (a) $12,000 per annum.

(b) An allowance of $8,000 per annum, and travel and removal expenses in accordance with the provisions of the foreign service officer regulations.

(c) May 15, 1961.

(d) Answered by the answer to No. 1.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister. Was the highly remunerative $20,000 a year position to which Mr. Stepler has been appointed filled on the basis of a competition open to other interested people?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is a patent error in the question. I gave the information this morning that the salary in question is $12,000 and the allowances for the position are $8,000. The function of allowances, of course, as I am sure the hon. member must realize, is quite different from the function of a salary.

As to the details of the appointment, if the hon. member wishes to put his question on the order paper seeking information as to considerations relative to the appointment, that information will be given.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if this was another of those secret appointments?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to reply. There is a nasty insinuation in that last question as applied to the government, perhaps, but certainly as applied to the individual. I feel I should say this concerning the individual. He is a highly competent civil servant who has been appointed to this position. I think this is no time to be casting slurs on a person who has been appointed to this position.

Mr. Howard: May I speak to the point of order?

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear any point of order. The minister was replying to the question which the hon. member raised. I think a further supplementary question would be inadvisable.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—SECURITIES AND FEDERAL LOANS

Question No. 349—Mr. Caron:

1. Does the unemployment insurance commission hold any securities? If so, what is (a) the par value (b) the market value, of any such securities as of May 15, 1961?

2. Of the total loans made by the government to the unemployment insurance fund: (a) what amount has not yet been reimbursed as of May 15, 1961? (b) what is the par value of securities pledged for any such loans not yet reimbursed?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answers to this question are as follows:

1. Yes.
(a) $87,045,500
(b) $73,086,675.62.
2. (a) $124 million.
(b) $158,757,000.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

C.B.C. CONTRACTS FOR PRINTING, ADVERTISING, ETC.

Question No. 133—Mr. Pigeon:

1. During 1959 and 1960, has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (English and French networks) invited public tenders for the following expenses incurred by its national and international services (a) printing of publications (b) advertising and publicity (c) stationery and office supplies?

2. In any case, what are the names of (a) the printers to whom printing contracts have been awarded, and what is the amount of each such contract (b) the advertising agencies to which contracts have been awarded, and what is the amount of each such contract (c) the persons by whom stationery and office supplies have been supplied, and what amount has been received by each of them?

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM BY PROVINCES

Question No. 333—Mr. Clermont:

Since December 21, 1960, with respect to each province: (a) how many municipalities, cities, and towns have made applications to the federal government in connection with undertakings to be carried out under the winter works assistance program? (b) of these applications, how many have been accepted? (c) what is the total estimated cost of the approved undertakings? (d) what is the estimated amount contributed thereto by the federal government by way of direct wages?

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGES, B.C.

Question No. 336—Mr. Herridge:

1. With respect to the nearly completed two-lane trans-Canada highway suspension bridge, spanning the Columbia, west of Revelstoke: (a) what is the bridge seat elevation at the west end? (b) what is the bridge seat elevation at the east end? (c) what is the crest elevation of water at bridge site, if the High Arrow dam is constructed? (d) does crest elevation of water permit clearance for navigation, floating trees, forest debris, and ice? (e) will reconstruction of this bridge be necessary if the High Arrow dam is built, and, if so, what is the estimated cost of same?

2. With respect to single track, main line Canadian Pacific Railway bridge, across the Columbia, west of Revelstoke: (a) what is the bridge seat elevation of this bridge? (b) what is the crest elevation of water at bridge site, if the High Arrow dam is constructed? (c) does crest elevation of water permit clearance for navigation, floating trees, forest debris, and ice? (d) will reconstruction of this bridge be necessary if the High Arrow dam is built, and, if so, what is the estimated cost of same?

3. With respect to provincial highway bridge crossing the Columbia, west of Revelstoke: (a) what is the bridge seat elevation at the west end? (b) what is the bridge seat elevation at the east end? (c) does the crest elevation of water permit clearance for navigation, floating trees, forest debris, and ice? (d) will reconstruction of this bridge be necessary if the High Arrow dam is built, and, if so, what is the estimated cost of same?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN MARCONI COMPANY—FRATERNIZATION PROHIBITION

Motion No. 126—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and Canadian Marconi Company or any other person, organization, or company since August 10, 1960, with respect to persons discharged by Canadian Marconi Company pursuant to the following clause in the contract of employment between the said Canadian Marconi Company and any of its employees: "Native and Eskimo villages are considered out of bounds and personnel are prohibited from fraternization or association with the native population except in special circumstances. Infringement of these orders is cause for discharge."

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN MARCONI CONTRACTS WITH NORTHERN AFFAIRS

Motion No. 127—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all current contracts between the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the Canadian Marconi Company.

Motion agreed to.

DISCONTINUED RAILWAY SERVICES

Motion No. 128—Mr. Deschatelets:

For a copy of the complete list of all railway services, discontinued in Canada by the Canadian National Railways Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, since July 1, 1957.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would allow this motion to stand.

Mr. Deschatelets: Agreed.

Motion stands.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RED CHINA—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE RESPECTING RECOGNITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he has any comment to make upon a statement reported to have been made by the Minister of Agriculture in Vancouver yesterday to the effect that perhaps Canada should have recognized the de facto government of red China right from the start; that the Chinese are dedicated people, and that in his grain trade dealing with them recently he had found them most anxious to increase their trade with Canada but would do nothing that would hurt Canadian producers.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the news report in question. Perhaps comment might wait until the return to the house of the Minister of Agriculture.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MARITIME PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION BY MINISTER IN SHIPYARD STRIKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that workers employed at shipyards at Halifax and Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, and at Saint John, New Brunswick have taken strike action to support their demands for a decent wage, and since the $35 million in federal contracts held by these yards contain a clause guaranteeing the recovery to the employer of the cost of any wage increase, will the minister use his good offices to see that wages in these shipyards, now 30 per cent below those paid on the west coast, are increased and a settlement of the strike secured?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I received notice of this question on my way into the house. First of all I would point out that each of the disputes mentioned comes under provincial jurisdiction. As to the details of the contracts which these shipyards may have, I must inform the hon. member that I have no knowledge on that score, since this is a matter completely outside my jurisdiction.

Mr. Argue: Perhaps I may put a companion question to the Minister of Defence Production, to whom I sent a copy of my question. Since the government is involved with these contracts, and since the Minister of Labour says this is a matter which comes under provincial jurisdiction, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman will use his good offices to help bring about a settlement.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): We have a clause in our contracts under which we pay any increase in wages, and we shall certainly respect our contracts, but this is a question of collective bargaining. After the collective bargaining is finished we shall respect our contracts.

Mr. Argue: Is the Minister of Labour not prepared to take any part in these discussions whatsoever?

Mr. Starr: It has always been the policy of the Department of Labour not to interfere with provincial jurisdiction.

TRADE

GRAIN—RATE OF INTEREST ON CHINESE BALANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, and ask him if he is able to advise the house as to the rate of interest being charged on credit balances in connection with the wheat trade agreement with communist China.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): When that situation arises the rate will be established, but I think further comment might await the return of the Minister of Agriculture.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. McIlraith: A supplementary question. I do not want to comment on the continued absence of the Minister of Agriculture—

An hon. Member: Selling wheat.

Mr. McIlraith: —but we were not able to get information from him, and now he is not here. In the Winnipeg Free Press of May 13—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McIlraith: —there is a report of a statement by the chairman of the wheat board saying that the interest rate is 5½ per cent. My recollection is that the Minister of Agriculture was unable to give us that information in the house. Can the Minister of Finance find out what the rate is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not seen the news article in question. I doubt if it is an urgent matter, in view of the fact that the report is now four days old, but at the proper time information will, without question, be made available to parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Agriculture a related question. Can he provide the answer to the question I asked the Minister of Agriculture a week ago today as to the rate of exchange used in giving his estimate of the total value of this contract? The minister had taken this question as notice.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Agriculture): The Minister of Agriculture will be back shortly and I will bring this matter to his attention.

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LONDON MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister report on the international textile conference being held in London and at which I understand Canada is represented?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The conference is not concluded. It was to begin on Monday morning and to continue on the 16th and 17th. When the conference has been concluded and the Canadian representatives have made their report I will be pleased to make a report to the house.

Mr. Cardin: Would the minister tell the house how many countries are represented at this conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I indicated in my statement on this matter last week, it is a tripartite conference. The countries participating in the conference are the United Kingdom, the United States of America and Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Who is representing Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I indicated last week that this is a conference at the official level. Canada is represented by senior officials drawn from the various departments concerned, and the leader of the Canadian delegation is Mr. S. S. Reisman of the Department of Finance.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF CURRENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he could give the house an up to date report on the progress of the housing program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Questions of such scope are not ordinarily accepted on orders of the day.

Mr. McGee: I should like to say a word on the point of order you have raised, Mr. Speaker. If my memory serves me correctly, with great respect, a long series of such questions were asked by the opposition when housing starts were declining. These questions were entertained and answered at that time.

Mr. Speaker: I may have prejudged the issue, but if it is a general report on the condition of house building under the National Housing Act I should think it is definitely too broad in scope for submission as a question on orders of the day. If it is a question capable of a brief answer, and of current importance, that would be a different matter, but what the hon. member has said has not convinced me.

N.H.A.—REQUEST FOR LOWERING OF INTEREST RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. Will the government now give consideration to lowering the National Housing Act interest rate from 6¾ per cent to a level more comparable to the 5½ per cent interest rate being extended to red China, as has been announced by the chairman of the wheat board?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I really cannot comment on a news report on which apparently the latter part of that question is based, and I do not think it is appropriate to base a question on this matter which has already been the subject of a question in this house. So far as the two rates are concerned, they are based, and always have been based, on entirely different considerations. The one is a rate applicable to house building under the National Housing Act, and the other is a rate established by the banks of this country in relation to their advances to the Canadian wheat board. The factors the hon. member has chosen to bring into his question this morning present no basis of comparison.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he thinks it is appropriate for the chairman of the wheat board to give information to the public which ministers refuse to give in this house.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there has been no refusal on the part of ministers to give—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —information to the house that is appropriate to be given to the house, or to be asked for on orders of the day.

I draw attention again to the fact that the last question is based on a newspaper report. I have not seen the newspaper report and I do not propose to make any comments on it or base any answer on it, until I have seen the report and have had the opportunity of verifying it.

Mr. Hellyer: Tell us what the rate is.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the rate?

N.H.A.—INQUIRY AS TO STARTS AND COMPLETIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. M. T. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Could the minister please inform the house as to the number of housing starts and completions under the National Housing Act this year?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the question asked by the hon. gentleman. He has asked for the number of housing starts for the whole of this year. Surely that is not a matter that has urgently arisen since yesterday, and, therefore, should not be the subject of a question, as the Minister of Finance so vehemently pointed out just a few minutes ago.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I suggest that if it is in order to ask questions when housing starts have been fewer, it should also be in order to ask questions even though housing starts may have increased. Some hon. members may not wish to hear that housing starts have increased, but I would be pleased to hear such a reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is quite different from the earlier question which was asked. Although it might be objected to by the minister on the ground that it is asking for statistical information and should therefore be more appropriately put on the order paper, if the minister does not take that objection I see no reason why the question should not be answered.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the leader of the C.C.F. group for his question, and reply that N.H.A. loan approvals in April for 6,252 dwellings were nearly four times as many as the 1,611 reported for April, 1960. Of the 6,252 approvals, the life, trust and loan companies accounted for 4,117 dwellings, the banks for 3, and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for 2,132. During the four month period there were loans for 18,599 dwellings, an increase of 443.8 per cent above the 3,413 for the same period in 1960. Actual starts for the first four months of 1961 at 20,559 were up 47.5 per cent over the 13,940 reported for the same period last year.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the minister comment on the fact that construction contracts for other than housing during the first four months of this year are 24 per cent below those for the first four months of 1960?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, such construction is a matter which is in the hands of free, private enterprise. I am only concerned with reporting to the house for the department of which I have the honour to be the minister.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would be kind enough to give us the number of completions this year to date compared with the number of completions to the same date last year.

Mr. Pickersgill: He does not know the answer to that.

Mr. Walker: I will be very happy to get that information for the hon. member.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I have a further supplementary question. Could the Minister of Public Works tell the house how many thousands of completed houses are unsold?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, the number is less than might be expected under all circumstances and, as a matter of fact, is less than two weeks supply. I can get the exact number for my hon. friend, but in view of the great impetus to housing the number is remarkably small.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a matter of interpretation of the facts.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—PROTESTS RESPECTING SALMON FISHING REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Is the minister aware of the protests being made by the commercial salmon fishermen of Nova Scotia and in particular of Cape Breton regarding the severe regulations which are being imposed this year, particularly on those fishermen who operate salmon traps in exposed areas off the coast?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I am aware of the views of the commercial fishermen in the areas referred to by the hon. member. I should like to point out, however, that in the exposed areas referred to no weekly lift period is imposed as in other areas. I have been trying to find an equitable solution to the problem.

Hon. members are no doubt aware that, working with the provincial administrations concerned which have an interest in the Atlantic salmon fishery, chiefly from the sports fishing point of view, the department has been attempting for a number of years to get agreement on uniform regulations. There is no question but that stringent conservation regulations are needed on both the angling and commercial fishermen in the whole of the Atlantic coast areas in order to assist in our attempt to rehabilitate the runs of Atlantic salmon. Unfortunately, however, achieving the desired degree of uniformity has not yet been possible.

[Mr. Garland.]

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the Minister of Fisheries tell us what action he has taken to meet the protests of the commercial fishermen of Nova Scotia regarding the change in the regulations this year?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, when it became evident that these particular commercial fishermen in Nova Scotia were being faced with what they felt were severe restrictions, I immediately took up the problem with the appropriate authorities of the government of Nova Scotia. I regret to say, however, that I have been unsuccessful in persuading these authorities to change their strong recommendations regarding the regulations which, in their view, should be imposed on the commercial fishermen of Nova Scotia. I suggested to the appropriate Nova Scotia government authorities that their recommendations for such restrictive regulations should not be implemented all in one season but rather in stages. Because of the strong views of the province that there was urgent and immediate need for restrictive measures, I have been unable so far to obtain agreement to my suggestions.

[Later:]

Mr. Clement O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Who has the final responsibility for the regulations covering commercial salmon fishing in Nova Scotia, the Minister of Fisheries or the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, the regulations are passed by federal order in council, but we attempt to co-operate with the provinces concerned in an effort to make the regulations uniform throughout the Atlantic provinces.

[Later:]

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to clarify my reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. I wish to add that the federal government attempts to co-operate with the provinces by passing regulations that are in conformity with the provincial recommendations where the provinces have a special interest in a given type of fishery.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there any doubt that the federal authorities have the ultimate jurisdiction in this matter?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): No, Mr. Speaker.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

ATHOLVILLE, N.B.—INVITATIONS TO INAUGURATION OF NEW PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Has the minister sent out invitations to the inauguration of a new defence industry at Atholville, New Brunswick, which is to take place tomorrow?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, there is a ceremony tomorrow involving the blessing of the building or the inauguration of the project. I have had absolutely nothing to do with the sending out of invitations, and the only knowledge I have is that I will be taking part.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister aware that invitations to the official opening have been sent out in his name?

Mr. O'Hurley: I am not aware that they are in my name. I know I will be attending, but I was not aware of invitations being sent out in my name.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware that on May 12 there was a ceremony involving turning the sod on provincial land for the building which is being constructed by the provincial government to house this industry, and can the minister say why he was not there?

Mr. O'Hurley: I hope the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate does not mean to imply that I sent out those invitations also.

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I thought the minister would have liked to be there with the premier of New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the urgency of that meeting is in the past.

PARLIAMENT HILL

WEST BLOCK—SUGGESTED CHANGE IN COLOUR OF TEMPORARY WALL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. In order to preserve as far as possible the external beauty and harmony of parliament hill during the reconstruction of the west block, would the minister give consideration to changing the colour of the temporary wall around the west block from the present interior public works grey to an external and harmonious green?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member for Kootenay West suggesting that green is the colour of the New party? We considered making it blue, but we thought we might be suspect so we decided on a nice, quiet grey which would not show dust or debris.

STATEMENT CONCERNING UNITED STATES FLAGS FLOWN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Skeena who questioned me yesterday as to whether my department was derelict in flying the United States flag on parliament hill with only 48 stars, may I say that I have long suspected that on occasion in this house the hon. member must see stars, but I had no idea that he ever found a dearth of them. As a matter of fact we recruited a squad of stargazers who went out and counted the number of stars on the flags on parliament hill. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will be glad to hear that on each of the old glories everywhere on parliament hill there are 50 stars. However, to express the enthusiasm which we all feel for the presidential visit, we have flying throughout the city of Ottawa many old glories, old and new, containing 48, 49 and 50 stars. To relieve the anxiety of the hon. member may I say I am informed by the United States authorities that the official United States flag can contain 48, 49 or 50 stars. I hope that answers the question.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether any of them have 51 stars?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

WITHHOLDING OF BENEFITS DUE TO ABSENCE FROM AREA

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received information to the effect that at least four members of the delegation of the unemployed who visited Ottawa last month and therefore had their unemployment insurance benefits cut for that day have appealed this ruling to a board of referees?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): That is right.

Miss LaMarsh: Can the minister assure the house that when the decision of the board of referees is handed down it will apply to all those who lost their daily benefit and not merely to the four who appealed?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say at this time what the judgment of the unemployment insurance commission may be in respect to this matter.

PUBLIC SERVICE

HECTOR MCKINNON—INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if Mr. Hector McKinnon is acting for the government in any capacity at the present time and, if so, what capacity?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thought it was well known that Mr. Hector McKinnon is the leader of the Canadian delegation to the negotiating conference under GATT auspices at Geneva, and has been acting as such from the outset of that conference. He has been in Geneva for something like eight months and is, of course, continuing in that capacity.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING NUMBER OF DIRECTORS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 16, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) for the second reading of Bill No. C-94 to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, when the business of the house was interrupted at five o'clock yesterday afternoon I was in the midst of a speech on this very important bill. Since some question arose last evening about the respective importance of this bill and another measure that was before the house forecasting a bill I wish to make it abundantly clear that I regard this bill as of very little importance at all, and so do we on this side of the house. We think it is highly inappropriate to be concerning ourselves about changing the number of directors of the Canadian National Railways when there are so many important and urgent problems before this country.

An hon. Member: Let us pass it, then.

Mr. Pickersgill: An hon. member says "Let us pass it". We do not think even the waste of this money is justified at this time. That is the reason we do not want to pass it. We do not think this parliament should be asked to engage in further expenditures of public money at a time when we have deficits that are more nearly astronomical than anything this country has ever known before in peacetime, and that are rapidly exceeding those we had in world war II. When the unemployment insurance fund is bankrupt, when the government has not brought down—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's line of argument seems to be taking quite a different turn from that suggested by the subject matter of the bill. It would not be appropriate to debate the many matters which might be of importance simply to illustrate the point that this bill is not important.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am really rather astonished at the observations of Your Honour, which I do not take to be a ruling. I have been a member of this house for eight years and have witnessed its activities since 1938. I have never before heard it suggested that an hon. member cannot say that one of the principal objections to a bill is that it is taking up the time of parliament when other much more important matters should be engaging the attention of parliament.

Having made that point I was simply citing —and I was not going to debate any of them —some of the important matters that ought to be before us rather than this measure, matters that should be proceeded with, particularly in view of the fact that on April 24 this house decided, over some opposition, to sit exceptionally long hours to consider the important and urgent business of the country.

This is a sample of the kind of important and urgent business that Her Majesty's advisers bring before us, this bill to raise the number of directors from seven to 12, another stopgap measure such as the one we debated before this and the horse racing bill that we had earlier this week. The only matter of any consequence that we have had in this house up to noon on Wednesday is the war veterans allowance measure, on which there was unanimity and which could have been disposed of and sent to the committee by now if Her Majesty's advisers had had some important business to bring before us, which they had not. That is our complaint.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Churchill: Why is he so anxious to terminate the debate on an important measure like one to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not anxious to terminate debate on that measure at all. However, it seems to me that congratulatory speeches about the Minister of Veterans Affairs, one after another, are not debate.

Mr. Jones: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Saskatoon and parliamentary secretary rising on a point of order?

Mr. Jones: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I am rising on a point of order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has made an accusation that the speeches that were made last night in this house on war veterans allowances were a series of repetitions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member would indicate what his point of order is, he might then substantiate it.

Mr. Jones: I am trying to reach this matter, Mr. Speaker, perhaps on a question of privilege. I think it is a matter of privilege. I listened very closely to the speeches that were made. If I may, I should like to lay the foundation—

Mr. Speaker: So far the parliamentary secretary is only contradicting what was said. What he has said so far indicates no point of order or matter of privilege, to my mind.

Mr. Jones: If I may do so, I should like to state briefly the matter of privilege.

Mr. Hellyer: A moment ago it was a point of order.

Mr. Jones: The question of privilege is simply this. The statement made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was quite wrong and cast a reflection on all members of this house. The speeches they made were very thoughtful speeches on this particular subject.

An hon. Member: They were not congratulatory speeches at all.

Mr. Speaker: I think the aspersion cast on the members of the house was not severe enough to make it a matter of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I did not mention any member of the house at all. I made one simple statement. I said that speeches of congratulation to the Minister of Veterans Affairs were not debate. That is all I said. I did not refer to any member of the house. I merely made a simple statement that speeches of that character were not debate. I think Your Honour could not disagree with that statement. However, it is quite irrelevant, and I made it in answer to an irrelevant question asked by the house leader. I would not have thought of making it had it not been for the house leader's interruption.

If I might be permitted to proceed to discuss the measure before the house, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we could make more progress, though hon. gentlemen do not seem to wish to have it.

Mr. Jones: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Jones: In view of the remarks he has made to the effect that these matters that have come before the house in the last day or two are of such little importance, is he able to explain to us why the hon. member for Laurier made no less than 40 interjections, including three speeches, in one day and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate approximately 29 or 30 in one day?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no trouble at all in answering that question. That is precisely why I am speaking on this matter. The hon. member for Laurier on the previous bill was protesting that the government did not bring in a solution to the problem but brought back the same old stopgap. We as an opposition are trying to do what we have a right and a duty to do. We are trying to draw attention to the fact that, ever since the by-election campaign started, the government has ceased to do the public business.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are afraid to bring any contentious matter before this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The time for discussion of the order of the business of the house has expired. If the hon. member pursues the course he is following, other hon. members will be entitled to take the same course and the bill will not be referred to.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member was answering a question.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that we return to the principle of the bill, which is to increase the number of directors of the C.N.R. from seven to 12.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what I have been seeking to do ever since I rose in my place, Mr. Speaker, and I have been diverted from doing so by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The reason I rose last evening was to draw attention to the fact that no argument had been made by the Minister of Transport, who seems to be rather a spectator as far as this debate is concerned. I am not criticizing the Minister of Transport on that account.

Mr. Balcer: I have never been so bored in all my life.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the Minister of Transport made his interjection I was going to say that the Minister of Transport generally sets an example to the hon. gentlemen opposite that would improve the decorum of the house if they followed it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether it is because of influences external to the house, but there seems to be a general desire for all members to talk at once this morning. We shall not make any progress on that basis. I ask for their co-operation in restraining their comments until they get the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rose yesterday, Mr. Speaker to take issue with me the only solid argument, if you can call it that, which has been made in favour of this bill. I refer to the argument made by the hon. member for Vancouver South. The hon. gentleman was in his place earlier. We know there are good reasons why the hon. gentleman may not be in the house, and I do not want to allude to them. I certainly do not want to say anything that would be in any way a reflection on that hon. gentleman, particularly in the circumstances in which he finds himself at the present time and about which we all feel great sympathy.

However, I am obliged to take issue with his argument, and it is only with his argument that I am seeking to take issue. He made an argument and I should like to read it, because yesterday he said that I had been unfair to him. I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. gentleman in any circumstance, and I am deeply anxious not to be unfair to him in the present circumstance. I should therefore like to read what he said. As will be found at page 4906 of Hansard he said:

> Mr. Speaker, before I answer some of the statements made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) I should like to say this to the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) who stated so emphatically that he tried to find one argument for increasing the number of directors but could not find one valid one. If he would compare the operating statements of the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. over the past few years, he might find a few arguments. He might find an argument in the fact that the C.N.R. deficits over 1960 and 1959 were $110 million which were paid for by the taxpayers whereas in the same two years the C.P.R. contributed $53 million in the form of corporation tax payments. If you have a business operation and are not too successful and if you have very successful competitors, the wise businessman takes a look at the practice of his competitors and is not afraid to copy any of the practices which he feels may be of advantage to him.

In reply to that observation, as found at page 4908 of Hansard I said this:

> The hon. member has advanced one reason why we should be in favour of this bill, and I think that reason should be given somewhat more emphasis than he placed upon it. He said we should appoint five more directors to the board of the C.N.R. in order to end the deficit.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Perhaps that is a somewhat exaggerated way of putting what the hon. gentleman said. However, if we just leave the two statements side by side I think most people would come to the conclusion that what the hon. gentleman was saying was that if we increased the number of directors of the C.N.R. there would be a greater prospect that the C.N.R. would not have a deficit, and that it would be in a position similar to that of the C.P.R. If his argument did not mean that I do not think it meant anything; and I think it was intended to mean something. I just wanted to make it very, very clear that I had grounds for what I said; that I was not being unfair to the hon. gentleman in that matter.

The hon. gentleman also took some exception to another statement I made. I should like to clear that up also because again, as I say, I do not want to be unfair to the hon. gentleman. He took some exception to my drawing this conclusion from his observations in the committee stage when I said yesterday:

> So that even though the high minded member from Vancouver South said British Columbia does not need a director he finds his colleagues from Alberta rising at once to say that if there are to be any more directors we should have one from Alberta.

I did not mean to imply—and if I did the hon. gentleman any injustice I want to repair it at once—that the hon. gentleman said specifically that there should be no director from British Columbia. He did not say that. If I gave the impression in my words that he did say it specifically, I apologize. But the general language he did use was, "Take the best men wherever you can find them. Do not pay any attention to these considerations of geography other than broadly regional considerations".

That, of course, is the position the previous government took. That is the position that prevails at the present time with seven directors. When the hon. member for Vancouver South made his argument he was seeking to refute an argument that was made by the hon. member for Laurier, an argument that I do not think can be successfully refuted; the argument that if we have 12 directors the appointments will have to be not on a broadly regional basis but in fact, owing to all the practices which there have always been, no matter who was in office in this country, there will have to be a representative from every province or there will be a great deal of complaint from any province that is excluded.

To illustrate my point yesterday—and I repeat this because the argument does not seem to have been appreciated and perhaps repetition in that case is excusable to make the argument abundantly clear—I recalled that hon. gentlemen in 1957 campaigned against us in one of the provinces of this country because the Liberal cabinet did not contain a minister from that province. I suggested that if that province was ignored when these extra five directors were appointed, there would be a storm from the province, particularly as that province is as much concerned with the operations of the Canadian National Railways—which is the only railway in that province; it is one of the two provinces where the C.P.R. does not operate—as any other province except one, and the other one is of course Newfoundland.

I am quite sure that if there are to be 12 directors and there is no director chosen from Newfoundland, that will not be very well viewed in that province. I am quite sure this will be true of every province. At least three voices have been raised from the province of Alberta already to put in a claim for a director from that province.

What my hon. friend from Laurier said is quite true. I am not saying there would be anything essentially or necessarily wrong with having a director from every province, but we have had a great deal of experience with Canadian National Railways over the years, and there does seem to have been for a long period now, under two governments—for four years under the present government—a view that with seven directors the broad regional aspects of the country have been reasonably represented.

As my hon. friend from Laurier said, this does seem to be an odd time to be changing that policy, when there are so many really urgent things that need to be done. I think we have reasonable ground for expressing disquietude about the reasons given by hon. gentlemen opposite. I exclude the minister from that, but I refer to the minister's friends in their support of this bill. They are not really supporting it because they want five more directors. They rise to support it and spend all their time attacking the present management of the Canadian National Railways. If they want to attack the management of the Canadian National Railways, that is their business; but I might point out that the former minister of transport (Mr. Hees) said over and over again that he was completely satisfied with the present management of the Canadian National Railways and with the present situation with regard to the board of directors.

The present minister has never said a word in criticism of the management since he became Minister of Transport or since he became a minister. I believe my hon. friend from Laurier did say yesterday—I have not the reference here—that the minister may have been critical of the Canadian National Railways when he was sitting over here, but I am not attempting to dredge that matter up at all. The minister has been in office for some months now, and I have never heard one word pass his lips in criticism of the management of the railways. Indeed, it seems to me that on one or two occasions he has ascribed to the management of the railways responsibilities which are not theirs at all. However, that would introduce a separate topic, which I do not seek to do because I find within the scope of this bill plenty of things to say without going outside it.

I say that if the purpose of this bill is to undermine the management of the C.N.R., we should not be considering it at all. If the government are not satisfied with the management of the C.N.R. they should change it; they should not seek by this kind of device to undermine it. That is no way to run any kind of business. I think it is about time the government did make a firm statement, in view of the things that have been said by hon. gentlemen opposite, about what they do intend to do with the management of the Canadian National Railways.

Is the purpose of this bill to introduce five directors who will harass the management; who will undermine the management of the railways; who will act, if you like, as spies for hon. gentlemen over there? Is that the purpose of it? That seemed to be implied in some of the things we have heard about this bill. I suspect, having regard to the kind of appointments this government has made to far too many boards and commissions since it came into office, that this bill has an entirely different purpose. I suspect, as I said yesterday—

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonnell: Might I ask the hon. gentleman how long he thinks it is necessary to talk to prove that this bill is utterly irrelevant and that we should not be dealing with it at all? I am interested in the length of time he feels it necessary to talk on this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman has a good point. The hon. gentleman is suggesting that I should not emulate his colleague the Minister of Finance and use a sledgehammer to drive home a tack. I think he is right, and I do not think I will be spending very much more time on this topic. However, I was in the middle of a point yesterday which I would have made in two minutes had I had the two minutes and had I not ceded them to the hon. member for Vancouver South so he could take exception to something I said.

My point is this. I suspect, having regard to the precedents of the last four years, the kind of appointments the government is going to make. There is going to be a request for an appointment from Prince Edward Island, as I said yesterday, and I suspect that the defeated candidate in Kings will be the appointee from Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suspect that the defeated candidate in Esquimalt-Saanich—and I mean the defeated Tory candidate—will be the director from British Columbia. I suspect that the discarded provincial cabinet minister who is now seeking election as a Conservative candidate in Restigouche-Madawaska will end up on the board of the C.N.R.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: No doubt—

Mr. Martineau: May I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am in the middle of making a speech, which the hon. member for Greenwood wants to be short. I suspect the defeated Conservative candidate in Leeds, unless they prefer the defeated one in Peterborough or the defeated one in Niagara Falls, will be appointed from Ontario. Then if they are looking for a candidate from Quebec to keep a proper balance there is always, of course, the defeated candidate in Labelle.

So there will be no need, once this bill is forced through the house, by the majority, as I have no doubt it will be, to worry about the government making these appointments by the first of June. They will not have to wait, as they did in connection with the royal commission on medical care, for six or eight months though it was very urgent last December, we recall. They will not have to postpone it in the way everything else has been postponed, because on this occasion the opposition has made suggestions, which they complain we do not make, as to how this problem of theirs which they are going to create with this bill may be solved. I have made these suggestions perhaps half in jest, but only half; and if those precise appointments are not made, I suggest the appointments—there are only five—will be roughly of that character.

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): I wish to speak on this bill. I do not wish to take too much time, but I should like to answer some of the childish accusations which have been made by that party of gloom and despair.

I would draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Hull said the appointment of these five new directors was decided upon in order to give Conservative candidates jobs. Yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate talked about ward heeling. The hon. member for Laurier is afraid of political interference. I do not think people in glass houses should throw stones. When those people were in power for 22 years they built up an empire like Caesar had in Rome. Now they do not like to see it falling. They filled these corporations, they filled the C.N.R., with Liberal dead heels.

Now we want to put on five good, solid businessmen to bring this company out of a deficit position. I do not think it is right that we should be paying the top director $75,000 to run the corporation. We have to get some good businessmen on this corporation to see whether they can reduce this deficit which the Canadian people are paying. I congratulate the minister and his department for seeing that these appointments are brought forward at the earliest possible date.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate make his amusing speech. I wonder if he has the same problems with the C.N.R. in his riding that I have in mine?

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the C.N.R. in your riding?

Mr. Keays: No. I noted that this morning the hon. member spent most of his time correcting statements he made yesterday, or conveying a different impression from the statements he made earlier. I know he calls this a threadbare bill and says it is of no importance. I am wondering whether that is just because the bill consists of only a few words asking parliament to approve an increase in the number of directors from seven to 12.

He succeeded, however, in his last few words in telling us why the official opposition are against this bill. It seems he is worried that the nominations which will be made may not be very popular with the thinking of his party. But throughout all the speeches made by the opposition no one seems to have wished to speak about the real need for increasing the number of directors on the board. Hon. members opposite seem to think that the political question is much more important than the financial problems which this corporation is facing.

It is true that many members of this house have attacked the present administration of the C.N.R., and perhaps rightly so. This is possibly one of the reasons the C.N.R. has moved ahead and reorganized its system into operating zones where the superintendents of these zones have more leeway in taking decisions, and this alone should prove that the C.N.R. is willing to endeavour to better the financial situation of the company.

However, this in itself is not sufficient; and if the C.N.R. can bring in more directors, people from the world of finance or business, people who are acquainted with the problems which exist in different areas of the country, I am sure this alone will justify an increase in the number of directors. Any director nominated to this board and living in an area where there are special problems would, I am sure, be concerned with the operation of the railway in that area, and would be able to bring up and discuss intelligently at board meetings ways and means of improving the service, of improving the financial situation of the corporation, and of giving to the Canadian people at least the hope that the deficits now being experienced will in time disappear.

That is why I was a little concerned that the official opposition at no time brought in any argument as to why we should increase the number of directors. It is sufficient that these directors should endeavour to look closely at the situation and improve the financial situation of the C.N.R.

It seems that hon. members opposite are worried about regional representation. This is important, but if any person named to this board can contribute one iota of information which would better the situation it is immaterial from which area he comes, providing he does know of the situation and is able to bring his knowledge to the table round which the board will sit. Therefore I trust that this reason alone, the hope that the C.N.R. will be able to cut its deficit and increase the service, either passenger or freight, to all Canadians, is justification for increasing the number of directors from seven to 12.

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, the resolution which preceded this bill was on the order paper for a great many weeks. I thought it was very appropriate that the Minister of Transport should have introduced this bill for debate on May 15, the date originally scheduled for a national railway strike. One of the heaviest concentrations of C.N.R. employees exists in my riding; consequently I feel it is my responsibility to make a few remarks regarding this bill, and they will be very brief.

I was a member of the sessional committee which made the recommendation to the government to increase the number on the board of directors, and it is therefore a great satisfaction to me to witness this bill today. I have no quarrel with the suggested size of the increase, although I originally hoped the number might have been in excess of 12. However, 12 does seem to be a sufficient number, and will certainly improve the operation of the railway.

The annual railway report for 1960 indicated, among other things, that responsibility and authority are being decentralized to the regional and area management levels on a geographic basis, as distinct from a departmental basis. I believe that statement in the annual report will clarify and remove any doubt that may have been cast upon the intention of this legislation. As all hon. members know, we now have five regions of the Canadian National Railways in Canada. I have no idea as to the actual residence of the five living directors, but it is my hope and my suggestion to the government that each of the five regions will have two directors, so that as a consequence we will not then have to look upon provincial boundaries but on regions as a whole.

I believe this legislation indicates to the citizens of this country that the government at this time is very dissatisfied with the present management of the Canadian National Railways. I believe that the appointment of Mr. Gordon by the former government, was a mistake. Perhaps the criticism of Mr. Gordon represents the reason that the hon. member for Laurier, when he spoke on Monday, included the following statement in his speech, at page 4843 of Hansard:

We on this side of the house will oppose this legislation.

All hon. members know that once this bill is passed and the appointments have been made, the effect will be a tightening of the control and authority of the present general manager. I am of the opinion that so long as he remains president and chairman of the board of directors, the shippers and employees of the railways will never be satisfied. I make that statement without qualification and add that it would be effective even if the Canadian National Railways had a surplus, and even if working conditions had improved and were such that no demands were being made at the present time.

It is my opinion that the present board of directors, and the new and larger board of directors, should be called before the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping. I feel it is the responsibility of parliament to ascertain what effect the directors have on policy decisions of the Canadian National Railways. I believe answers should be provided to questions such as who recommends the promotion of senior members of the staff to positions as vice president; do the directors make those decisions, or are they made by one man alone? To what extent did the present board of directors study the huge reorganizational decision and to what extent does the board of directors supervise the plans before hump yards, presently under construction in Canada, are located and commenced; and I refer particularly to the commencement and construction of the hump yard at Moncton, New Brunswick.

I suggest these are important questions to be answered. They do not only involve management problems but rather policy decisions which result in the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars. I should also like to know the extent to which the board of directors took responsibility for the real estate development that took place last year and is continuing to this date, at Montreal. I should also ask whether that board of directors had the responsibility for the redevelopment at Moncton. As the member of parliament representing that area I welcomed the decision of management to do so, but I wonder about the extent to which the board of directors took part in the planning, leasing, etc.

This bill was the subject of debate on Monday and Tuesday of this week. I hope it will be passed today, and that no time will be lost in passing the required orders in council. I hope at the same time the government, in making the selection of the six new directors, will give serious thought to placing retired C.N.R. employees on this board of directors. I realize that we should have businessmen on the board, however, if working conditions are to improve; and if we are to establish better relations between the public and this crown corporation we must have individuals on the board of directors who know what is wrong. A businessman may have some idea in this regard, as he may be or may become a shipper, but this board of directors must also include retired railway workers who have given a lifetime of service to this crown company.

I have reason to believe that Mr. Gordon is employed at the present time on what can be generally termed as a day to day basis. If I am correct in that belief, perhaps he will agree with my interpretation of this bill; that this is an appropriate time for him to tender his resignation.

Mr. Fisher: Hear, hear.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, if the value of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is to be measured by the accuracy of that statement which he ascribed to me, then I suggest he might just as well send word up to Hansard to have his remarks of this day taken off the record. He suggested in his speech of yesterday, and I think he repeated it today, that I had advocated that if this bill passed, one of the new directors should be appointed from the province of Alberta.

That is not correct. I referred to the region served by the Northern Alberta Railways, and that is an entirely different situation. The Northern Alberta Railways system is a monstrosity created in 1929 by the then Liberal administration. It serves not only the northern half of Alberta, but is the focal point through which freight proceeds from the Northwest Territories into the northeastern part of British Columbia, into the Cariboo district, which is so ably represented by my good friend the hon. member for Cariboo. It now seems possible, if legislation implementing the recommendations of the Manning commission is proceeded with, to have an extension of some 400 miles into the Northwest Territories.

Speaking in regard to representation on a regional basis, I should like to say that I have always felt—particularly with reference to the Canadian National Railways board of directors—there should be regional rather than provincial representation. I related that fact to the recommendations contained in the MacPherson royal commission report, which obviously suggested that the difficulties which the authors of that report had in mind would be vast if there was a measure of change so far as passenger traffic, freight traffic, and diminution of service on a regional basis are concerned.

That was what I had in mind and for that reason I strongly advocate passage of the bill. The railway situation certainly needs attention, and I think that attention might well commence at the top with the administrative processes.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I misinterpreted the hon. member I did so inadvertently and I am quite willing to substitute northern Alberta for Alberta.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all through this debate my hon. friends opposite have said repeatedly that this bill is insignificant, unimportant and useless; that it will not help the C.N.R.; that it is a waste of money, and so on. All I can say is that with all these accusations against the bill I think it is only proper that we should have a look at the background of the legislation and try to find out who were the original dreamers, the insignificant people who first conceived this idea.

I have been looking at the report of proceedings of the sessional committee where this matter was discussed. First of all, the great proponent at that time of an increase in the number of directors was none other than the deskmate of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). We all know that the committee unanimously recommended that the government should bring in such a bill which is now called insignificant, unimportant and so on by hon. members across the floor. Among those members who voted for this recommendation in that committee were the hon. member for Port Arthur, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, the hon. member for Lapointe, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo and the hon. member for Fort William.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that this bill does not mean anything. He got up to speak about 20 times on the bill. I would not say that he has made three major speeches—

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor would I.

Mr. Balcer: —but he has certainly made three lengthy speeches in which he has said that this measure is unimportant and so on. I must admit that I am somewhat at a loss in trying to understand his attitude as to the importance of various matters that are brought before the house. Only last week we brought forward a matter of such importance as a brand new shipping policy that will provide a lot of work for Canadians but we have not heard from him about it. Yet he finds the time to make three speeches on this bill which he calls unimportant and insignificant.

I will not pretend that the fact that we are increasing the number of directors of the C.N.R. will settle all the problems of the railway. Of course not. But I must say that I certainly fail to find any sense in the argument of the hon. member for Laurier when he says that we should not take this step because there is unemployment in Canada and because the C.N.R. has a deficit. I think precisely the opposite view should move the house to support the bill, because the C.N.R. is extremely important business. It has an operating revenue of about $700 million, and the management has to make tremendously important policy decisions which mean a lot to the future of this national railway. I think that to strengthen the board with good Canadians who will have at heart the welfare and improvement of our national railway is a move in the right direction.

As I said in my opening remarks on the bill, if one looks at the United States railways one will see that the largest and most important ones, which are all smaller than the C.N.R., have boards of directors with memberships ranging between 15 and 25, and our own Canadian Pacific Railway has 24 directors. An argument was made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River both in the house and in the committee as to the importance of an organization like the C.N.R. having as directors good businessmen who will bring traffic to the line and who will bring to the board as directors their experience as successful Canadians in their various fields of endeavour. I think this is all to the good. In my view this move will really help the C.N.R. and it will be money well spent.

I know my hon. friends across the floor during this debate have taken an attitude that is not very commendable in saying that because these people are going to be paid, this is money wasted when there is unemployment at the present time and some Canadians are suffering. I sincerely believe that this is no argument at all, because what we are recommending is the strengthening of one of the largest enterprises of the Canadian government.

Canadian National Railways is a tremendous public undertaking. The government has the responsibility for this railway. It must see that the railway is well managed and that management has the proper support and the tools with which it can do a good job. By doing what we are doing today I think we are helping the C.N.R. We will bring to the board of directors great Canadians. When we look at the people who have served on the board in the past I think we can have confidence that we will have great Canadians as directors who will bring to the C.N.R. their vast experience, their Canadianism and the will to render a great service to the Canadian public.

During the taking of the vote:

Mr. Letourneau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct an error. I do not mind being called Legere, but my name is Letourneau.

After the taking of the vote:

Mr. Speaker: To make the matter clear may I say this. A vote was recorded for Mr. Letourneau but not for Mr. Legere, whose name was called in error.

I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be considered in committee of the whole? Next sitting of the house.

At one o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to order made on Thursday, May 11, 1961.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM, 1960-61

Question No. 224—Mr. McCleave:

What are the latest figures available regarding the municipal winter works incentive program 1960-61, for (1) Canada (2) each province, the Yukon, Northwest Territories, and Indian bands, with regard to: (a) applications received (b) applications accepted (c) applications rejected, pending, or withdrawn (d) estimated total cost of projects (e) estimated total direct payroll cost of projects (f) estimated cost of projects to May 31 (g) estimated direct payroll cost of projects to May 31 (h) estimated federal government share of direct payroll costs (i) estimated number of men to be hired to May 31 (j) estimated man-days work to be provided to May 31?

APPENDIX

ADDRESS
of
JOHN F. KENNEDY
President of the United States of America to MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC in the
HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA on
Wednesday, May 17, 1961

The President was welcomed by the Right Honourable J. G. Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Mark Robert Drouin, Speaker of the Senate and the Honourable Roland Michener, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. President, Speaker of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Commons, members of the Parliament of Canada. Today it is my honour to welcome here, on behalf of the Canadian parliament and people, one who comes to us not only as a renowned leader of the free world but as a good neighbour and friend.

(Translation):

Mr. President, Members of the Parliament of Canada.

Today it is my honour to welcome here, on behalf of the Canadian parliament and people, one who comes to us not only as a new but as a renowned leader of the free world, and also as a good neighbour and friend.

(Text):

Mr. President, the extraordinary welcome from the people which you have received is a demonstration of their admiration and affection not only for your country but for you and Mrs. Kennedy. As you passed through the streets yesterday and today, Mr. President, you must have been conscious of a divided attention, and all who had eyes to see could see why that was so.

This is an unusual gathering, Mr. President, bringing together as it does the members of the Senate and the House of Commons. I believe with your experience in both legislative branches of parliament you will feel particularly at home in the parliament of Canada, for I am told that on occasion the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives are not always in agreement either with themselves or with the President. In that regard they seem at the moment to be similar in class and kind to what we have here.

In these houses of parliament, as with yours, we cherish our right to live under a system of government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed, our right and our glory being that here in our institutions, opposing views are respected. Here, as in your country, views are not only uttered but are debated. Men who are free to speak are also compelled to answer, and it is our common right to live our lives according to our lights and without any dictation from any ruling clique. Today, sir, I bring to your attention the words of Robert Frost, the poet of your inauguration, who recently in the city of Jerusalem signed the guest book of the university there with these words:

> Something there is that does not love a wall—it is friendship.

When you spoke in New Brunswick to the university there four years ago you quoted from the same poet:

> Good fences make good neighbours.

We in Canada believe that good fences are necessary. We are determined that as to our two countries, no one shall be permitted to build a wall between them. We have fences between us, but they are not hostile barriers; but rather, by way of co-operation, evidences of distinctiveness that each of our countries cherishes and of the independence and sovereignty that each must respect in the other.

Throughout the years there has been a movement of peoples between our countries. Hundreds of thousands, if not millions, have gone from Canada to the New England states, and great numbers from the United States have settled in Canada. Indeed, sir, Massachusetts holds a special place in my heart and sentiment, for two of my wife's ancestors, Brewster and Warren, were of the Mayflower company that laid the foundations of democracy in the new world in the British tradition.

I summarize the relations between our countries as represented in your presence here today by that inscription on the St. Lawrence seaway granite plaque which reads:

> This stone bears witness to the common purpose of two nations whose frontiers are the frontiers of friendship, whose ways are the ways of freedom, and whose works are the works of peace.

We have our problems in trade; we have them in defence. I am of those who believe this, that no nation in the world today by itself can provide for adequate defence. Canada cannot. I say to you, sir, that one of the abiding things of this gathering has been the fact that we realize this fact, that we together have a responsibility to each other to maintain jontly our defences for the benefit of freedom.

That brings me to the next question, and it is this; the need for unity in addition to security. Co-operation in defence and economically is a price that all freedom loving nations, great and small, not only in NATO but everywhere in the world, must pay; for the prize of co-operation may be freedom itself.

I think great benefit comes to us by your visit, sir, in that you again have the opportunity of stating some of the principles upon which the western world stands. I have felt that we have failed among the western nations to state in simple terms the things in which we believe so that all mankind may understand that those principles shall recognize the equality of all peoples, that each and all shall work for the benefit of the other.

Great responsibilities rest upon those such as yourself who are the leaders of the free world. Leaders will not always be right in their decisions. Sometimes they will be on the wrong side. That is of the essence of democracy; but as long as they are never on the side of wrong, freedom will not suffer.

You have a great responsibility as the leader of the world's most powerful nation; young in years, old in experience, scholar, veteran, author, statesman. When I was in Ireland a few weeks ago—and Ireland is the rock whence you were hewn, sir—I was told something of your ancestry, shown the arms of the O'Kennedys of Ormonde and of the Fitzgeralds, renowned in Irish history as the "Geraldines". And I was shown a poem about the Geraldines written by the poet-patriot Thomas Davis who, incidentally, was the most famous Dublin associate of one of Canada's fathers of Confederation, Thomas D'Arcy McGee, one verse of which has significance today:

> "These Geraldines! These Geraldines! rain
> Wears away the rock
> And time may wear away the tribe
> That stood the battle's shock;
> But ever, sure, while one is left of all
> That honoured race,
> In front of freedom's chivalry is that > Fitzgerald's place."

That is your place today, Mr. President. And I express the wish, not only on behalf of my fellow Canadians but of all people who love freedom everywhere that you may be richly endowed—in thought with faith, in words with wisdom, in deed with courage, and always in service.

In these qualities is greatness. These qualities I have in mind when I present to the Senate and the House of Commons the President of the United States.

Hon. John F. Kennedy (President of the United States): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Prime Minister, members of the Canadian Houses of Parliament, distinguished guests and friends.

I am grateful for the generous remarks and kind sentiments expressed toward my country and myself, Mr. Prime Minister. We in the United States have an impression that this country is made up of descendants of the English and the French, but I was glad to hear some applause coming from the very back benches when you mentioned Ireland. I am sure they are making progress forward.

(Translation):

I feel I am truly among friends.

(Text):

It is a deeply felt honour to address this distinguished legislative body, yet may I say I feel very much at home with you here today, for one third of my life was spent in the parliament of my own country, the United States congress. There are many differences between this body and mine. The most noticeable to me is the lofty appearance of statesmanship which is on the faces of the members of the Senate, who realize that they will never have to place their case before the people again. I feel at home here also because I remember in my own state of Massachusetts many friends and former constituents who are of Canadian descent. Among the voters of Massachusetts who were born outside the United States the largest group by far was born in Canada. Their vote is enough to determine the outcome of an election, even a presidential election. You can understand that having been elected president of the United States by less than 140,000 votes out of 60 million, I am very conscious of these statistics.

The warmth of your hospitality symbolizes more than the courtesy which may be accorded to an individual visitor. It symbolizes the enduring qualities of amity and honour which have characterized our countries' relations for so many decades. Nearly 40 years ago a distinguished prime minister of this country took the part of the United States at a disarmament conference. He said "They may not be angels, but they are at least our friends." I must say I do not think we have probably demonstrated in the 40 years since then that we are angels yet, but I hope we have demonstrated that we are at least friends.

I must say that in these days when hazard is our constant companion, I think friends are a very good thing to have. Your Prime Minister was the first of the leaders from other lands who was invited to call upon me shortly after I entered the White House, and this is my first trip as President—the first trip of my wife and myself—outside our own country's borders. It is just and fitting and appropriate and traditional that I should come here to Canada across a border which knows neither guns nor guerillas.

But we share more than a common border. We share a common heritage traced back to the early settlers who travelled from the beachheads of the maritime provinces and New England to the far reaches of the Pacific coast. Henry Thoreau spoke a common sentiment for them all: "Eastward I go only by force, westward I go free. And now I must walk towards Oregon and not towards Europe." We share common values from the past, a common defence line at present, and common aspirations for the future—our future, and indeed the future of all mankind.

Geography has made us neighbours. History has made us friends. Economics has made us partners. And necessity has made us allies. Those whom nature hath so joined together, let no man put asunder.

What unites us is far greater than what divides us. The issues and irritants that inevitably affect all neighbours are small indeed in comparison with the issues we face together, above all the sombre threat now posed to the whole neighbourhood of this continent and in fact to the whole community of nations. But our alliance is born not of fear but of hope. It is an alliance which advances what we are for, as well as opposing what we are against.

And so it is that when we speak of our mutual attitude and relationship, Canada and the United States speak in terms of unity. We do not seek the unanimity that comes to those who water down all issues to the lowest common denominator, or to those who conceal their differences behind fixed smiles, or to those who measure unity by standards of popularity and affection instead of trust and respect.

We are allies. This is a partnership, not an empire. We are bound to have differences and disappointments, and we are equally bound to bring them out into the open, to settle them when they can be settled, and to respect each other's views when they cannot be settled.

Thus ours is the unity of equal and independent nations, co-tenants of the same continent, heirs of the same legacy, and fully sovereign associates in the same historic endeavour; to preserve freedom for ourselves and all who wish it. To that endeavour we each must bring great material and human resources, the result of separate cultures and free economies. And, above all, that endeavour requires a free and full exchange of new and different ideas, a full and frank consultation on all issues and all undertakings. For it is clear that no free nation can stand alone to meet the threat of those who make themselves our adversaries, that no free nation can retain any illusions about the nature of that threat, and that no free nation can remain indifferent to the steady erosion of freedom around the globe.

It is equally clear that no western nation on its own can help those less developed lands fulfil their hopes for steady progress. And, finally, it is clear that, in an age when new forces are asserting their strength around the globe, when the political shape of the hemisphere is changing rapidly, nothing is more vital than the unity of your country and mine.

And so, my friends of Canada, whatever problems may exist or arise between us, I can assure you that my associates and I will be ever ready to discuss them with you and to take whatever steps we can to remove them. And whatever those problems may be, I can also assure you that they shrink in comparison with the great and awesome tasks that await us both as free and peace loving nations.

So let us fix our attention not on those matters that vex us as neighbours, but on those issues that face us as leaders. Let us look southward as part of the hemisphere with whose fate we are inextricably bound. Let us look eastward as part of the north Atlantic partnership upon whose strength and will so many depend. Let us look westward to Japan, to the newly emerging lands of Asia and, beyond Asia, to Africa and the Middle East where live the peoples upon whose fate and choice the struggle for freedom may ultimately turn. And let us look at the world in which we live and hope to go on living, and at the way of life for which Canadians and Americans alike have always been willing to give up their lives if necessary to defend and preserve it. I was reminded again of this on my visit to your war memorial.

First, if you will, let us consider our mutual hopes for this hemisphere. Stretching virtually from pole to pole, the nations of the western hemisphere are bound together by the laws of economics as well as geography, by a common dedication to freedom as well as a common history of fighting for it. To make this entire area more secure against aggression of all kinds; to defend it against the encroachment of international communism in this hemisphere; and to see our sister states fulfil their hopes and needs for economic and social reform and development, are surely all challenges confronting your nation and deserving of your talents and resources, as well as ours.

To be sure, it would mean an added responsibility, but yours is not a nation that shrinks from responsibility. The hemisphere is a family into which we were born, and we cannot turn our backs to it in time of trouble. Nor can we stand aside from its great adventure of development. I believe that all the free members of the organization of American states would be both heartened and strengthened by any increase in your hemispheric role. Your skills, your resources, your judicious perception at the council table—even when it differs from our own views—are all needed throughout the inter-American community. Your country and mine are partners in North American affairs; can we not become partners in inter-American affairs?

Second, let us consider our mutual hopes for the north Atlantic community. Our NATO alliance is still, as it was when it was founded, the world's greatest bulwark of freedom. But the military balance of power has been changing. Enemy tactics and weaponry have been changing. We can stand still only at our peril.

NATO force structures were originally devised to meet the threat of a massive conventional attack, in a period of western nuclear monopoly. Now, if we are to meet the defence requirements of the 1960's, the NATO countries must push forward simultaneously along two major lines.

First, we must strengthen the conventional capability of our alliance as a matter of the highest priority. To this end we in the United States are taking steps to increase the strength and mobility of our forces and to modernize their equipment. To the same end, we will maintain our forces now on the European continent, and will increase their conventional capabilities. We look to our NATO allies to assign an equally high priority to this same essential task.

Second, we must make certain that nuclear weapons will continue to be available for the defence of the entire treaty area, and that these weapons are at all times under close and flexible political control that meets the needs of all NATO countries. We are prepared to join our allies in working out suitable arrangements for this purpose.

To make clear our own intentions and commitment, to the defence of the western world, the United States will commit to the NATO command area five—and subsequently still more—Polaris atomic missile submarines, which are defensive weapons, subject to any agreed NATO guidelines on their control and use, and responsive to the needs of all members but still credible in an emergency. Beyond this, we look to the possibility of eventually establishing a NATO sea-borne force which would be truly multilateral in ownership and control, if this should be desired and found feasible by our allies once NATO's non-nuclear goals have been achieved.

Both of these measures—improved conventional forces and increased nuclear forces—are put forward in recognition of the fact that the defence of Europe, and the assurance that can be given to the people of Europe, and the defence of North America, are indivisible; in the hope that no aggressor will mistake our desire for peace with our determination to respond instantly to any attack with whatever force is appropriate, and in the conviction that the time has come for all members of the NATO community to further increase and integrate their respective forces in the NATO command area, co-ordinating and sharing in research, development, production, storage, defence, command and training at all levels of armaments. So let us begin. Our opponents are watching to see if we in the west are divided; they take courage when we are, and we must not let them be deceived or in doubt about our willingness to maintain our own freedom.

Third, let us turn to the less developed nations in the southern half of the globe, those whose struggle to escape the bonds of mass misery appeals to our hearts as well as to our hopes for a free and stable world community. Both your nation and mine have recognized our responsibilities to these new nations. Our people have given generously, though not always effectively. We could not do less, and now we must do more.

For our historic task in this embattled age is not merely to defend freedom. It is to extend its writ and to strengthen its covenant to peoples of different cultures and creeds and colours, whose policies or economic system may differ from our own but whose desire to be free is no less fervent than our own. Through the organization for economic co-operative development and the development assistance group we can pool our vast resources and skills and make available the kind of long term capital, planning and know-how without which these nations will never achieve independent and viable economies, and without which our efforts will be tragically wasted. I propose further that the O.E.C.D. establish a development centre, where citizens, officials, students and professional men of the Atlantic areas and the less developed countries can meet to study the problems of economic development.

If we in the Atlantic community can more closely co-ordinate our own economic policies —and certainly the O.E.C.D. provides the framework if we but use it, and I hope you will join us in doing so—then surely our potential economic resources are adequate to meet our responsibilities. Consider, for example, the unsurpassed productivity of our farms. Less than 8 per cent of the American working force is on our farms; less than 11 per cent of the Canadian working force is on yours. Fewer men on fewer acres than almost any nation on earth, but free men on free acres, can produce here in North America all the food a hungry world can use, while all the collective farms and forced labour of the communist system produce one shortage after another. This is a day to day miracle of our free societies, easy to forget at a time when our minds are caught up in the glamour of beginning the exploration of space.

As the new nations emerge into independence they face a choice, shall they develop by the method of consent or by turning their freedom over to a system of totalitarian control? In making that decision they should look long and hard at the tragedy now being played out in the villages of communist China.

If we can now work closely together to make our food surpluses a blessing instead of a curse, no man, woman or child need ever go hungry again. And if each of the more fortunate nations can bear its fair share of the effort to help all the less fortunate—not merely those with whom we have had traditional ties but all who are willing and able to achieve meaningful growth and dignity—then this decade will surely be a turning point in the history of the human family.

Finally let me say just a few words about the world in which we live. We should not misjudge the force of the challenge we face, a force that is powerful as well as insidious, that inspires dedication as well as fear, that uses means we cannot adopt to achieve ends we cannot permit.

Nor can we mistake the nature of the struggle. It is not for concessions or territory. It is not simply between different systems. It is the age old battle for the survival of liberty itself. And our great advantage, we must never forget, is that the irresistible tide that began 500 years before the birth of Christ, in ancient Greece, is for freedom, and against tyranny. That is the wave of the future, and the iron hand of totalitarianism can ultimately neither seize it nor turn it back. In the words of Macaulay, "A single breaker may recede, but the tide is coming in."

So we in the free world are not without hope. We are not without friends. And we are not without resources to defend ourselves and those who are associated with us. Believing in the peaceful settlement of disputes and in the defence of human rights, we are working through the United Nations, and through regional and other associations, to lessen the risks, the tensions and the means and opportunity for aggression that have been mounting so rapidly throughout the world. In these councils of peace—in the United Nations emergency force in the Middle East, in the Congo, in the international control commission in southeast Asia, in the ten nation commission on disarmament—Canada has played a leading, important and constructive role.

If we can contain the powerful struggle of ideologies and reduce it to manageable proportions, we can proceed with the transcendent tasks of disciplining the nuclear weapons which shadow our lives and of finding a widened range of common enterprises between ourselves and those who live under communist rule. For, in the end, we live on one planet and are part of one human family; and whatever the struggles that confront us we must lose no chance to move forward toward a world of law and a world of disarmament.

At the conference table and in the minds of men the free world's cause is strengthened because it is just. But it is strengthened even more by the dedicated efforts of free men and free nations. As that great parliamentarian, Edmund Burke, said, "The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing." To do something is in essence why I am here today. This trip is more than a consultation, more than a good will visit. It is an act of faith, faith in your country and your leaders, faith in the capacity of two great neighbours to meet their common problems, and faith in the cause of freedom in which we are so intimately associated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to call now on the honourable the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons to thank the President for his address, and at the same time to express the appreciation of the members of both Houses of Parliament for the gracious gesture on the part of the President in that he will meet all members in room 16 on the conclusion of this gathering.

(Translation):

Honourable Mark Robert Drouin (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President, allow me, on behalf of the members of the Senate of Canada, to tell you how delighted we are to welcome you among us, and to express our gratitude to you for the admirable address you have delivered with so much eloquence.

(Text):

If I may, Mr. President, I should like to tell you in English that the Senate and the House of Commons had no trouble today in coming to agreement to greet you and Mrs. Kennedy in Ottawa, and if you should be pleased to return and honour us with a further visit I am sure that a truce can be arranged and that we will greet you again with the enthusiasm that you realize is in this assembly.

(Translation):

It is not without deep emotion that we have just heard you speak of the things that unite us. We are not the only ones to have heard the ideas you have expressed, the declarations of principle that you have just made. Your words were addressed to the Canadian people and beyond the Canadian people you were also addressing all those peoples of the universe who, according to our laws, are free peoples. Finally, and mainly perhaps, you were thinking of another world when you spoke to us of peace, taking us to witness. We know that world, it ignores us and menaces us in turn, that world is inimical yet has the same right as we have to live on man's planet. The political and human principles you entertain you have wished to express them for the first time on foreign soil before the Canadian parliament. If you chose to do so it was not indiscriminately. You may rest assured that the Canadian people appreciate your friendship towards us far more deeply than I can express it. Your presence in this house is a brilliant symbol for us.

In the difficult times we are going through, you may rest assured that Canadians are not merely fairweather friends. Twice the young men of our two countries in the prime of life have crossed the oceans to fight for liberty and for that democratic civilization to which both our countries belong. Today, you are the head of those democracies. And we wish to assure you that the Canadian people working in co-operation and harmony with yours will bring you the support of its resources and friendship.

Your concern to extend beyond the borders of America a generous image of your country honours us because this policy rests on truth. My compatriots I am pleased to say, are, I believe, your voluntary and understanding ambassadors throughout the world—we want the free world to recognize the disinterested generosity of the great American people. We proclaim your proverbial generosity—we want people finally to thank you—to thank you for your philanthropists and your foundations that have helped to rebuild so many cathedrals and assisted so many in distress through the centuries and beyond all frontiers—to thank you for the incalculable benefits derived from the Marshall plan that enabled the whole of Europe to recover rapidly —to thank you for the considerable assistance you grant to underdeveloped countries—to thank you for being the rampart of truly free democracies—finally, to thank you on behalf of those who do not know how to thank.

The long and friendly history of our relations shows that two nations, although of unequal force, can live together peacefully and prosperously.

By your presence here you bring us the ever present friendship of your country. As for ours, you can feel it in the atmosphere of this assembly. You yourself have integrated in your person the knowledge and power to act. You have already qualified courage as the most admirable of all human virtues and you were right. Your political career which in spite of the summits you have already attained is only just beginning, has given us time and again proof of that courage which you were pleased to exalt in others. Your country has entrusted its future to a young, piercing and dynamic mind. It is to some extent our future and that of western civilization that you carry within you. Let us remember that our greatest ally is liberty. Democracies remain while dictatorships pass. A free man can never be vanquished—a free man is always the stronger. A reign of terror is always of short duration. Contemporary history brings us striking proof of this fact. Within recent times how many dictators have died an ignominious death and on their tombs democracy has blossomed again.

I could not forgive myself, Mr. President, if before finishing I did not add that coming from Quebec, that province which through its civilization, its language, its traditions and its religion differs from all the other provinces of Canada but which nevertheless is an integral part of this country and makes it a strong and united country, coming, as I say, from that province, I am not afraid to state that the presence by your side of your ravishing wife adds to the attachment we feel for you and all that you represent. Indeed, it is common knowledge that even before you were elected President of the United States, many Canadians hastened to look through the civil status registers in the hope of discovering that Mrs. Kennedy was of Canadian descent. Unfortunately, this search did not bear fruit. But we soon gained comfort from the knowledge that your wife, like us, was of French descent.

Her charm, her grace, her beauty and her vivacity have conquered all our hearts. Your union thus doubly justifies our attachment and our affection for you and your children. Thus, I bow to Mrs. Kennedy in expressing our confidence in you, Mr. President, and our every good wish for the greatness and prosperity of your country. May God be with you!

Hon. Roland Michener (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President, in the name of the House of Commons, in whose chamber we are assembled, I have the honour to offer you our sincere and profound thanks for your presence here today and for your encouraging message of friendship. I am sure that in this respect the House of Commons reflects the sentiments of all Canadians, not only the distinguished leaders of church and state and the guests of parliament who are present, but all Canadians everywhere. Many of them have seen and heard you this last half hour on television. All of them are pleased with your visit. They are all deeply sympathetic with you as you undertake the great responsibilities of your office, responsibilities which have so much significance not only for us as a neighbour, as a partner in NATO and in the free world, but for the strategy of peace in the world at large.

Beyond that, they are deeply interested in you as a person; as a young man who adds resourcefulness and integrity to a profile of courage. If you look about the House of Commons you will see many young men; in fact there are 54 members who have not reached their 44th year. As a group we may be slightly prejudiced in favour of youth and enterprise, in your favour shall we say. There is no doubt whatever of our attitude toward charm and beauty and, therefore, of our wholehearted delight with your wife and with her presence here today. We not only thank you for bringing Mrs. Kennedy but rejoice in the good fortune which gives you such a beautiful and talented helpmate.

Having regard to some things that have been said today, and in taking unto myself and to my words this broadly representative character, I must make one exception. None of us in this house would dare to speak for what we refer to rather obscurely as the other place—in the plainest English, the senators. Of course they have already been most eloquently represented by my colleague, their Speaker, whose impeccable French, the envy of all would-be parliamentary bilinguists, has given our sentiments most perfect expression.

I can tell you privately, Mr. President, that although we are glad to have the senators with us and to seat them in this chamber, we are not sure that our love is reciprocated. When we are invited from time to time to their chamber— "summoned" is the appropriate word—our fraternization is somewhat restricted by a brass barrier which they have placed just where the red carpet begins. Perhaps in Washington these legislative rivalries have not been thought of.

However, both the Canadian Senate and House of Commons collaborate most sincerely to welcome you. We collaborate in other ways which would interest you. Twice a year a delegation from our two houses meets a delegation of your Senate and House of Representatives in parliamentary exchanges which are carried on under the name of the Canada-United States interparliamentary group. These have been most cordial and fruitful. Taken together with many other exchanges between our two countries, private and official and at all levels, they are evidence of how closely the social and economic life of our two countries has been interwoven. They are evidence, too, of our determination not to let our proximity produce any unnecessary friction or misunderstanding, of our determination to be good neighbours rather than just neighbours.

We regard your visit, Mr. President, as the highest expression of these neighbourly interchanges, a sort of coping stone added to a solid structure of good will. It serves to bring to focus all our desires and hopes in this most important area of international co-operation.

To our thanks to you and to Mrs. Kennedy may we add our best wishes for continued success and enjoyment of your visit, and express our hope that as you have come first to us in Canada we shall continue to deserve and receive that priority in your affections.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 18, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSTPONEMENT OF ARRANGEMENTS FOR PHOTOGRAPH OF HOUSE IN SESSION

Mr. Speaker: May I inform the house that when it became apparent that there would be notable absences of members from both sides of the house today, I took the liberty of postponing the proposed portrait. When the budget address is given I hope we may be able to get a more representative picture of the house.

PRESIDENT JOHN F. KENNEDY

ADDRESS TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT TO BE APPENDIX TO "HANSARD"

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent and in keeping with the practice of the house on past similar occasions, I should like to move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson):

That the address of the President of the United States of America, Mr. John F. Kennedy, delivered yesterday before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, together with the introductory speech by the Prime Minister and related speeches, be included in today's House of Commons debates as an appendix and in yesterday's in the bound volume, and thus form part of the records of this parliament.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUE ON DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN U.S. PRESIDENT AND PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table two copies in English and in French of the joint communique issued by President Kennedy of the United States and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) bearing today's date, following discussions held on May 17, 1961, in Ottawa.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FURTHER LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the house leader when we can expect some of the long list of proposed bills to be put on the order paper, which is now fairly well cleared up?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): They will be ready for the house just as soon as the house is ready for these other items. We are going on now with estimates for the balance of this week. There will be plenty of material available for the opposition next week and the following week.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-U.S.—JOINT STUDY ON ECONOMIC AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of President Kennedy's strong plea for stepped up economic aid. I am wondering whether the Canadian government is giving further study to this proposal, whether any committee has been set up to study it, or whether there are any plans for joint study with the United States.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be the wish of the house to defer questions concerning the discussions which have been held between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States during the visit of the past two days until the Prime Minister's return to the house this evening or tomorrow morning.

CUBA—INQUIRY AS TO RETURN OF REMAINING CANADIAN MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Sixty-one Canadian missionaries arrived yesterday from Cuba, and a press report this morning mentions that there are still 57 such missionaries remaining in Cuba. I should like to know whether there is any possibility that the government will furnish the means of transport for these missionaries.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to take this question as notice and see that a reply is provided at the earliest possible moment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

SUGGESTED REASON FOR INCREASED ACTIVITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. While all hon. members are pleased to see house building activity showing signs of recovering from the near collapse of a year ago, is the Acting Prime Minister aware that the higher level of starts reflects the desire of the lending institutions to place their funds before the N.H.A. rate is reduced?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I could hardly imagine a more argumentative question than that. If you will allow me some measure of latitude to deal with it as I think it should be dealt with, I shall be glad to do so. I think you might rule, however, that it would have the attributes of a debate on the subject.

Mr. Speaker: I think the minister is correct, that the hon. member is not so much interested in getting information as in making a point.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—THREATENED STRIKE ACTION BY CARPENTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I should like to direct a question to the minister's parliamentary secretary. He may take the question as notice if he has not the information. My question rises out of a telegram I received which reads as follows:

> Carpenters at Moosonee voted overwhelmingly in favour of strike action. Conciliation board report directs parties meet with government departments involved.

Has the minister received a request for intervention in the dispute concerning carpenters presently employed on the radar installations at Moosonee, Ontario, and if so, can he indicate to the house whether he is prepared to appoint an official of the department?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to take the question as notice.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

JOHN WASLYCHEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. My question is based upon a starred question of May 3 which was made an order for return. This question asked for certain statistical information about the late Mr. John Waslychen, who was an inmate of the British Columbia penitentiary. I wonder whether the minister can inquire to see whether or not this information might be made available before the estimates of his department are considered.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I was inquiring about that matter just before coming down to the chamber. I was shown a draft return which I felt was acceptable, except that I thought one part of the answer should be expanded to give the information asked for. That should be done within the next couple of days.

GRAIN

WHEAT—DECREASE IN EXPORTS THROUGH PORT OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to ask a question of the acting minister. Has the minister been made aware that the exportation of wheat from the port of Quebec is continually decreasing? If so, what action is contemplated by the government to remedy the situation?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the situation which the hon. member mentions. However, I will be very glad to refer this matter to the department in order to secure an answer at the earliest possible moment.

(Translation):

REPORTED DIFFERENCE IN RETURNS TO EASTERN AND WESTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture or in his absence, for the Acting Minister of Agriculture. My question arises from a report publishd in Le Devoir of this morning to the effect that farmers in the lake St. John area are being subjected to unfair competition due to the fact that they are paying from $10 to $20 more per ton for feed grain than the western farmers. I am therefore asking the minister if any action will be taken to correct this situation.

(Text):

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): I shall be happy to bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

(Translation):

PUBLIC SERVICE

MONTREAL—REPLACEMENT OF CHIEF OF VETERINARY HYGIENE BRANCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Latour (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

To provide for the replacement of Dr. Labelle, head of animal health division, Department of Agriculture, Montreal office, the civil service commission has announced competition number 61-P-AGR-24.

Could the minister tell me the names and addresses of all the applicants and also whether all the candidates have been properly called before the civil service commission and heard by the members of the commission or their deputies?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice and see to what extent it can be answered.

Mr. Latour: Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question, could I ask the minister—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question has been taken as notice, and a supplementary question would not be appropriate.

(Translation):

LIVESTOCK

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO POSITION RESPECTING HOG CHOLERA

Mr. J. O. Latour (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture, or whoever replaces him, a question?

An epizootic disease called "hog cholera" has been noted in the province of Quebec for several months. According to available information from other quarters, Dr. Troalen of Montreal, an official of the animal health division of the Department of Agriculture is responsible for research with regard to the cause and cure of epizootic disease.

On April 12 last I wrote to the Minister of Agriculture asking for a report on the situation. Would he inform us now whether he is going to produce it in the near future?

(Text):

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): I did not receive notice of this until after I came into the house. I will have an answer prepared later.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CENSUS

POSSIBLE USE OF INFORMATION FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I see that both the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his parliamentary secretary are away today; nevertheless I should like to put this question and ask if the minister would consider making a more specific and thorough statement on the information gained by the census figures to be taken next month, in view of the general speculation and criticism in many parts of the country that this information may be used for political purposes.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I doubt very much whether that question is in order at this time, but I will refer it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

AIRPORTS

LAKEHEAD—TENDERS FOR EXTENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. On March 2, in the course of an address to the annual meeting of the Fort William chamber of commerce, the minister made a statement to the effect that an extension to the lakehead airport costing approximately $650,000 would be made this spring.

Can the minister inform the house whether tenders have been called in connection with this project and, if so, whether any contracts have been awarded?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): It is a fact that I made such a statement, but unfortunately there have been several revisions to requirements, particularly in connection with operational requirements for such facilities as telecommunications and traffic control, and this has delayed final layout planning. The project is still on our active list for tender call later during the current fiscal year. It has reached the stage of readiness for submission to treasury board for approval in principle of size and cost involved.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—FORMATION OF JOINT CANADA-U.S. COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): I had a question to address to the Prime Minister, but in his absence, since it deals with external affairs, I should like to address it to the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Did the Prime Minister and the President of the United States have any opportunity to discuss the Richelieu waterway during their meeting in Ottawa yesterday?

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am surprised that the hon. member for Assiniboia should appear to be awaiting the answer to this question with such interest.

I shall be glad to accept the question as notice and see that it is forwarded to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Argue: You disappoint me.

An hon. Member: You are always disappointed.

UNITED NATIONS

UNESCO—APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL COMMISSION EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister, asking him whether he can explain to the house whether or not employees and staff members of the national commission for UNESCO, which is under the Canada Council, are appointed after competition.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, surely that is not a question to be asked on orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that question would be more appropriate for the order paper.

(Translation):

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

USE OF LAND FOR HIGHWAY PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday the hon. member for St. Henry asked me whether I had received representations from the authorities of the city of Montreal concerning the replacement of the road-bed of C.N.R. lines in Montreal. As I had not understood his question properly, I should like to correct my answer.

We did receive a brief from the city of Montreal which dealt with several subjects of interest to both the municipal and federal authorities, including representations on the matter put to me by my hon. friend. I want to say to him that my officials, as well as those of the Canadian National Railways are still negotiating on this matter with the Montreal authorities.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us when this brief was received?

Mr. Balcer: I have the brief here, but unfortunately no date appears on it. If I remember right, it was received at least four or five weeks ago.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, since the Leader of the Opposition asked his penetrating supplementary question on Tuesday, and the Prime Minister replied that the question should be directed to the Minister of National Revenue; and in view of the fact that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Revenue are absent today, I wonder whether the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys could give the house any information as to whether the government is making any change whatsoever in its subsidies for the coal mining industry so there will not be a complete shutdown of these three mines.

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I cannot make any statement at this time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

402. Departmental administration, $3,395,700.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, on Saturday afternoon I referred to the fact that it would be better for this government to bring in a bill to help shipping rather than by a $1 item in the estimates. I said at that time I thought the government should be able to give an estimate as to the requirements in this respect, and if the estimate was not high enough no member in this house would refuse to vote a further supplementary estimate. I do not propose to refer to that further at this time, but I do wish to refer to a matter which has to do with several people in my district.

The oldest street car line in Canada ran between St. Catharines and Thorold. It was horse-drawn. It started in 1874. This line was electrified in 1882, and over the years it was gradually extended from St. Catharines to Port Dalhousie, to Niagara-on-the-Lake, and from Thorold to Niagara Falls to Fonthill, to Welland and Port Colborne. Those lines provided suburban passenger and freight service among those municipalities, and they had switching rights to the regular railways for their freight. From 1908 to 1923 those lines were operated by the Canadian Northern Railway, and in 1923 they were taken over by the Canadian National Railways. The railway was known as the N.S. and T., the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway.

With the development of motor transport the passenger services have been taken over by motor buses. The services have been gradually curtailed until today, as far as passenger service goes, the Canadian National Railways serve just the city of St. Catharines, the town of Thorold, and the plants south of that town. The rail services, however, carry a certain amount of freight.

On April 7, 1961 the employees who have been paying into a pension fund of the Canadian National Railways since January, 1935 received notice that the Canadian National Railways would cease to operate in this area after August 1 of this year. It may be that the Canadian National Railways will have someone taking over their franchise and equipment, presumably a municipality, but 75 employees, many of whom have contributed to the C.N.R. pension fund for many years, will be seriously affected.

Sections 112 and 113 of the pension plan, contained in a booklet supplied to the C.N.R. employees, seem to indicate that every employee who joins the service after January 1, 1935 and before attaining the age of 45 years, may be entitled to $300 per annum as a contribution by the company toward his pension plan. Section 121 is intented to provide for those employees who leave the railway service, or who retire early. In short, it provides for the return of the employee's contribution with interest and the cancellation of the employer's contribution. At page 7 of the pension plan booklet the following is found:

> Your service will not be considered terminated if you are laid off but only if you leave or are discharged.

In the present situation the employees are not taking vountary leave, nor are they being laid off for any personal reason. Their jobs are being terminated because of decisions of the Canadian National Railways relating to a change in policy. These employees cannot be absorbed into the other branches of the service and are being forced into unemployment. They can, under a formula, qualify for pension for early retirement, but it seems to me that the company's contributions do not have anything to do with these early retirements payments. These early retirement payments in my view represent the return of the employees' own money.

For example, one man who will be short of 65 years of age by eight months, with 43 years' service, will receive only two fifths of his full pension. Another who will lack six months service for full retirement benefits, with 38 years' service, will receive only two twelfths of his full pension. I have here a list of 75 names of faithful employees of the C.N.R. Not one will receive more than two fifths or 40 per cent of his full pension and others with 33 years' service, and over age 60, will receive much less, or about 17 per cent of their full pension. After all, this looks like a return of their own contributions, paid back to them in pension form. The payments made by the railway in respect to their pensions have nothing to do with any money they receive back. Seventy five families in my area will be affected and I believe the economy of our area will be adversely affected. The people of Canada, through the Canadian National Railways, under this proposed scheme will be breaking faith with these employees.

This issue points up what I have mentioned in this house on earlier occasions, the need of earlier vesting in pension plans. If we had earlier vesting in pension plans these people would have a portable pension. No doubt some of these men would be hired by the authority that takes over these particular bus lines, but they would have to start from scratch in building up a new pension plan. In the meantime, those with 40 years' service and even those with more than 30 years' service will be too old to obtain other work and will be left out on a limb. This is not fair, and such a situation should not exist in our society. I wish to hear from the minister on this question, and I appeal to him to do something for these people.

If the C.N.R. has paid $300 per man over the years, that represents a lot of money. In all fairness I think some of this money should accrue to these employees. These men should have some vesting rights. It does not seem to me to be fair that a man should pay into a pension fund up to within a few months of retiring—and according to law he has to serve right up to the last day—before he has any vesting rights in respect to the employer's contribution. In this case the people of Canada are leaving these employees out in the cold without much pension even though some of the employees have almost reached retiring age.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I did not hear all the remarks of my friend the hon. member for Welland, but I am happy to support some of the statements he has made. I wish to thank the hon. member for advising me that he intended to speak on this matter at this time. It is a question that affects a great many people in the riding which I have the honour to represent.

These employees of the Canadian National Railways are being displaced by reason of the fact that the company is discontinuing the local bus service some time in the near future. I suggest to the minister that in view of the long and important transportation service the C.N.R. has supplied to the people in the Niagara peninsula he take a personal interest in this matter of discontinuing the service.

The city of St. Catharines alone has a population of approximately 84,000 people, and this local public transportation system is extremely important. Therefore I recommend to the minister that his department co-operate to the fullest extent with the municipalities in that area in providing a continuing service to the public, as well as in adequately and generously providing a fair settlement of pension and other employment separation problems for all employees who will be displaced.

I understand negotiations are under way between the council of the corporation of the city of St. Catharines and the Canadian National Railways to provide ways and means whereby the city may purchase the assets of the local company and operate the service as a municipal public utility. I also understand that negotiations are under way between the employees of the C.N.R. bus operation in St. Catharines and the C.N.R. officials. I offer my wholehearted support to both the city of St. Catharines and the railway employees in their negotiations with the Canadian National Railways and I urge the minister to make sure that there is ample time allowed for a just and reasonable settlement of both the employees severance problems and the question of future ownership of the company before the C.N.R. discontinues operations.

I extend to the minister my full support with respect to the statement of new government policy concerning shipping operations and shipbuilding. In my opinion this is the most important and constructive decision this government has made in recent years. It is a policy designed to save the Canadian ship operators from complete deterioration which might well have taken place if Canadian ship owners had been forced to continue transferring their ships to British or other registry in order to remain competitive with the foreign vessels trading in our inland waters at the present time.

Shipbuilding which is an old industry in Canada, and a long established industry in my riding will benefit greatly from the proposed new regulations providing for ship construction subsidies. Subsidies toward the cost of shipbuilding may be new in Canada, but they are not new in almost all other countries which engage in shipbuilding. While I do not think subsidizing industry is a permanent solution, Canada's shipbuilding industry has had to contend with serious problems of competition from subsidized European and other shipbuilding yards, and I am sure this new assistance will speed up maximum production in all Canadian shipyards and will provide thousands of new jobs not only in the shipyards but also in other allied trades.

I wish now to say a word about Canada's proposed new coastguard service. This is a matter about which I have spoken in this house on several occasions over the past few years. I have urged that Canada should have at least one first class salvage and rescue vessel on each of the great lakes capable of providing fire protection and doing towing and general salvage and rescue work. I have long felt that we rely too much on the United States coastguard service. With the coming of the seaway and the recent tremendous increase in pleasure craft on the great lakes a service of our own, to work in conjunction with that of the United States, in my opinion is urgently needed.

I again draw to the attention of the minister the need for regional airports with adequate facilities for non-scheduled and scheduled passenger and freight transportation in areas that are highly industrialized and are not adjacent to major airports of Trans-Canada Air Lines. In the Niagara peninsula, part of which is in my riding, we have such a requirement. Most of the municipalities in the area have formed a commission and operate an airport which is owned by the Department of Transport and is located near the city of St. Catharines. Over the past three years the Department of Transport has provided such facilities as night lighting and directional beacons, and has purchased additional land for future expansion.

However, the big problem today is the fact that the runways were built for light planes and are both too short and too light in construction for DC-3 planes to land and take off from them. Some of our industries with large company planes have been obliged to house them at Buffalo or Niagara Falls, New York, which is a great inconvenience. We have a very active Royal Flying Club with a large number of small planes, as well as many privately owned small planes. It is a customs airport, but it lacks the essential runway with a length of 4,000 feet to 5,000 feet.

In the Niagara peninsula there is no airport with runways over 2,800 feet in length, and they are all of light construction. Therefore an airport with suitable facilities is badly needed in the area and the St. Catharines regional airport would appear to be the most suitable one for development. With the large amount of industry in the peninsula requiring airport facilities, and with the possibilities of shipping by air fresh fruit and vegetables grown in abundance in the area the need for a regional airport is most urgent and its success and use would seem to be assured.

This is a matter that has been before the Department of Transport for some time. While they have been generous to us—as I say, they have given us certain facilities—nevertheless I contend that the Niagara peninsula, which has a large area and a large amount of industry of one kind or another, certainly has the need for a regional airport with runways from 4,000 feet to 5,000 feet in length. The Department of Transport pilots have problems when they go in there with their planes. As a matter of fact the minister of immigration caused a little bit of excitement when she visited there some time ago and her plane went through the light runway.

I should like again to register my opposition, on behalf of the people of my riding, to the principle of tolls on the Welland ship canal. These tolls, together with tolls on the St. Lawrence river seaway canals, make lake Ontario a toll-locked lake and different from the other great lakes in Canada. Industries located on lake Ontario are thereby penalized. We agree that the full cost of operation and maintenance of the Welland ship canal should be recovered by way of service charges such as linesmen's fees, wharfage, lockage fees, etc., but we are opposed to the principle of tolls to recover capital costs. The Welland ship canal was completed some time in the 30's and is all paid for with the exception of some deepening that was done lately; and while the toll charges at the present time are not too heavy, nevertheless in the future, if the twinning of the single locks were done, the toll charges if increased could then become a great disadvantage to industry in the area.

I urge that consideration be given to an early start on the twinning of the remaining single locks on the Welland ship canal. The need for this action is becoming most acute. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that in the past two years there have been many traffic jams on the canal which have held up the flow of traffic very badly. The need for twinning is becoming more urgent every day. We often hear rumours about an all-American canal being built from lake Ontario to lake Erie. I think its construction could perhaps be stalled or held off for some time if the remaining single locks on the Welland canal were twinned. There certainly is not at the present time sufficient business for two canals connecting lake Ontario and lake Erie. However, there is certainly room for improvement on the Welland canal, and this improvement might very well be accomplished by the twinning of the remaining single locks.

In making those recommendations to the Minister of Transport, I must also congratulate him on his appointment. We of the Niagara peninsula are looking forward to having him come to our area some time in the near future to have a good look at this Welland ship canal, the scenic beauties of the Niagara peninsula and the many historic and interesting places in the area.

Mr. Carter: I should like to extend my congratulations to the minister on his new appointment and to wish him well in his new field of endeavour. I should also like to express to the officers of his department my appreciation for the consideration they always give to the problems I bring to them both here in Ottawa and in the regional office at St. John's. In particular I wish to express my thanks for the services of the icebreakers to our lobster fishermen this spring. Those icebreakers cleared away the ice and enabled the fishermen to start the fishery at the beginning of the season.

In connection with the icebreaking service I wish to bring to the attention of the minister one or two complaints I have received from Port aux Basques and North Sydney. The minister very well knows that unusual ice conditions prevailed this year. Sydney harbour and Port aux Basques harbour were blocked with ice for a long period of time and ferry communication between the mainland and Newfoundland was interrupted for a period of eight or nine days while the ferry was stuck in the ice and was unable to get into Sydney harbour. At the same time the icebreakers were employed in keeping other harbours open. Perhaps because of the unusual severity of ice conditions not very much could have been done this winter.

However, I have been asked to remind the minister that this ferry service between North Sydney, Nova Scotia and Port aux Basques, Newfoundland is part of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada. We feel that, other things being equal, it should receive priority so the service can be maintained whenever conditions will permit. We feel it should be on the priority list for the service of icebreakers when they can be used in this way, instead of perhaps being employed to keep other harbours open where the priority is not of the same order.

Last Friday the minister announced a new shipping policy for Canada. Whatever our attitude may be toward subsidies—and I do not think anyone can deny that there are both advantages and disadvantages in government subsidy of any industry—I think most hon. members will agree that the shipping and shipbuilding industries are special industries, essential to the economy of Canada, and must be kept alive at all costs even if they require subsidization.

The actual benefit the shipping industry will receive from the policy announced by the minister last Friday cannot be assessed until we know what the regulations are going to be which will govern that assistance. So far these regulations have not been made known; therefore we are not in a position to evaluate just how effective this assistance will prove to be. It seems at the moment that while it will remove one of the obstacles with which the shipping industry has to contend—I refer to the extra cost of ship construction—most of our ships have been forced to foreign registry not so much by the capital investment involved in construction but by the operational costs of the ships after they are built. As far as we can see from this announcement, the new policy will not in any way provide assistance toward the cost of operation.

When the minister draws up these regulations I think it would be well if he kept in mind that the shipping industry itself is in a state of transition. I hope that ships built under this new policy will be modern in every sense. I hope the ships which are built will not become obsolete in a few years and before their useful lifetime has run out. There are two trends which are noticeable in the shipping industry at the present time. One is the trend toward ships with larger carrying capacities, and the other is toward ships for specialized cargoes.

We all know about the success of the Norwegian shipping industry. That country has done a great deal toward encouraging the building of specialized ships. In fact ships are being built to carry only Volkswagens from Europe to this country. That is the kind of specialization I am thinking about. I think we should keep that in mind when these regulations are being drafted.

The other point I want to ask the minister to consider in drawing up these regulations is this. I ask the minister to make sure that the regulations will cover the construction of wooden coastal vessels for Newfoundland. The announcement of the minister made special reference to wooden ships for the fishing fleet, but nothing was said about wooden vessels for the coastal trade. In Newfoundland we have people distributed around the coast line living in a large number of very small harbours. The only way supplies can be carried in and out to these people is by small wooden ships of anywhere from 50 tons up to perhaps 200 tons. These are the kind of ships which could be built in our own shipyards, and I am sure the minister wants to encourage the shipbuilding industry in Newfoundland as much as in any other province. Therefore I do hope the minister will take note of this special need as far as Newfoundland is concerned, and will frame the regulations so they will cover this particular kind of coastal ship.

I would also hope the minister will see fit to include in the regulations some subsidy or assistance toward the cost of life saving equipment. This has become imperative under the Canada Shipping Act. The kind of rubber life saving raft which is demanded today is a very expensive piece of equipment. These rafts cost anywhere from $1,000 to $5,000, and a ship may have to equip itself with two or three of them to meet the standards of safety required under the act. This is one of the instances where regulations under the Canada Shipping Act impose extra costs on Canadian ship owners which are not imposed on ships that operate under foreign registry.

In addition to the increase in shipping costs I should like to bring to the minister's attention the need for additional navigation aids, not only in my own district but in the whole of Newfoundland. When Newfoundland became part of Canada the Department of Transport, very wisely I think, decided that before increasing the number of navigation aids they should modernize and replace those which were already in existence.

This has now been done, and we are very grateful. However, there is a great need for additional navigation aids. To impress this fact upon the minister I suggest that he look at a number of charts. If the minister will get a set of charts of the Newfoundland coast and compare them with charts of the coast of Nova Scotia and other maritime provinces, he will see that the navigation aids along the Newfoundland coast are much fewer and much more widely dispersed than they are on the eastern coast of mainland Canada. If the minister will compare the charts of the Atlantic coast of the maritime provinces with the charts of the great lakes he will find an even greater contrast. There are many more navigation aids around the great lakes than there are around the Atlantic coast line.

We know that part of the reason for navigation aids is to facilitate the movement of shipping, but their primary purpose is to save lives. The life of a person in one part of Canada is just as important as it is in any other part of Canada. Therefore I do ask the minister to look at the charts, and I will provide him with a list from my own riding of locations in which we think more lighthouses and light and whistle buoys are required.

Before I sit down I should like to ask the minister to consider a change in policy with respect to the administration of public harbours. We have in Newfoundland a number of harbours which are used by sufficient shipping to require some kind of orderly control and administration. However, they are not big enough to be classed as national harbours, and the practice has been to declare them public harbours under the Canada Shipping Act and to appoint harbourmasters to administer them. I do not think this is the best way of administering these harbours, and I ask the minister to consider extending the power and authority of the pilotage commissions to enable them to administer harbours of this kind.

We have pilotage commissions in many harbours, and there is no good reason why they should not be given powers under the shipping act to administer such harbours as I have described. In my opinion it is much better for the administration of harbours to be under a local body which can deal with matters as they arise than for them to be under the control of a single person who must be guided by the regulations which are handed to him. If further decisions are required he has to get in touch with St. John's, and St. John's in turn may have to get in touch with Ottawa, a process which sometimes causes a delay of up to four or five days during long week ends in summer. Thus there is a need for more local autonomy in the administration of these harbours, and I think that could well be provided by using the pilotage commission in the manner I have suggested.

When the minister replies I should like him to make clear to the committee what the position is now with respect to the provincial acts governing pilotage in Newfoundland. At the time of confederation we had two acts, a special one for the harbour of St. John's and another for harbours outside St. John's. Then we became part of Canada and subject to still further legislation under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act. I should like to know whether the original Newfoundland pilotage acts have been incorporated in the Canada Shipping Act, or whether they have now lapsed.

I should also like to ask the minister to provide any information he can about the progress which is being made with respect to establishing a free port or a transshipment port at Mortier bay. From time to time we see press releases about the progress being made, and indications that certain firms in Europe are interested in this project. We see indications that a group on the mainland is interested in developing the port of Churchill, and that this development is linked with developments of Mortier bay. I think it would be a good thing if the committee knew just what has transpired during the past year in this respect.

Mr. MacEwan: I have a few observations to make on these estimates of the Department of Transport, which are most important throughout the country and especially important to the constituency which I represent. I should like to thank the minister and the officials of his department for the co-operation which has been shown to me since the hon. gentleman took office, a co-operation which I know will continue. The minister is well acquainted with my area, having served in the Pictou area during the war with the Royal Canadian Navy.

First of all I wish to congratulate him and the government on the shipbuilding policy which was announced a few days ago. This is most important to Pictou and to its largest industry, which happens to be Ferguson Industries Limited, a shipyard. I understand a telegram has been sent by that firm to the minister in connection with this new development. I believe the firm was holding its annual meeting this week, intending to discuss aspects of the new program, and I also believe that officials of the company have been in touch with other firms on this matter. The new policy should be of great help in providing employment in this shipyard. Vessels are refitted from time to time for the Department of Transport, vessels belonging to the department, and I hope the minister will keep us in mind in the Pictou area when such work is being done.

There is another matter which was brought up the other day by the hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island. It concerns the ferry route which runs between Cariboo, Nova Scotia and Wood Island, P.E.I. The Minister of Fisheries, who is here with us, is also most interested in this route, which is operated by Northumberland Ferries Limited, a private company. The company operates two vessels, the Lord Selkirk and the Charles A. Dunning. The latter has seen long service and needs to be replaced. I have been in close touch with the maritime commission in connection with this matter, and also with the operators of the service. I know that the Minister of Fisheries, the hon.

member for Queens and myself are hopeful that recommendations will be made by the maritime commission to the Department of Transport and to the government generally so that a new ferry may be built for this route.

I think perhaps I should place on record a few statistics which I have here showing the notable increase in the number of vehicles and passengers carried on this route. I have here the figures for the years 1959 and 1960. In 1959 the number of automobiles ferried from May to August was 32,296. During the same period in 1960 the number was 41,314, an increase of 19,018 during that one year period. I know, speaking of Cariboo in my own constituency, that during July and August there is heavy tourist traffic. I have seen vehicles lined up for many car lengths from the ferry wharf, showing that a sister ship for the Lord Selkirk is needed for this route. As I have indicated, the Charles A. Dunning is now very old. It will take at least a year and perhaps two years to build a new ship, but I believe that consequent on the increase in traffic a new ship is certainly warranted. Incidentally, a fine job could be done at Ferguson Industries. Returning to the figures, I would add that in connection with passenger traffic for 1959 and 1960 there was an estimated increase of between 6,000 and 7,000 in the number of persons carried.

That is one matter of great importance. In connection with another subject, I should like to commend the minister for reviving the route from Pictou to Prince Edward Island to the Magdalen islands. The terminal is in Pictou. The office staff live in Pictou and some of the crew of the new ship also live there, I believe. I am very happy that this service has been continued although the new ship, I understand, is stuck off the coast in the ice now and is being assisted by one of the icebreakers belonging to the department. This service is most important to the port of Pictou. It helps the area and gives work to men there.

In July of 1959 the port of Pictou, on the north shore of Nova Scotia, suffered a disastrous fire which almost completely destroyed the waterfront. However, through the efforts of the Department of Public Works, facilities are now being built there. A new quay wall has been built, and I expect an announcement will soon be made regarding the construction of a new pier C costing in the vicinity of $540,000, which will certainly be of great assistance to this fire-ravaged port.

The matter of railway services and facilities is of great importance to my constituency, not only having regard to the employment associated with the provision of those services but also because of the fact that the largest employer in my constituency is the Eastern Car Company, the Dosco plant, which manufactures freight cars. During the past year the employment situation at that plant has not been good. As has been pointed out by the president of the Canadian National Railways, the need for new railway cars is not as great now as it has been, because much of the rolling stock of that railway has been modernized during the last ten years. This same situation is probably equally applicable to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

I am sure the minister is well aware of the representations I have made in reference to railway car orders. This plant has received orders this year for approximately 300 insulated heavy type railway cars from the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I hope that, in view of tenders which have been called by the Canadian National Railways, this plant will receive at least a portion of that contract. The other two main plants supplying railway cars in Canada are the National Steel Car Company of Canada, at Hamilton, and Canada Car, Montreal.

The employment situation in my constituency is perhaps different from the situation in the areas where those two companies are located, in that the largest employer in my area is the supplier of those railway cars, and when there is a lack of employment there the men are not able to find work in other plants, as are individuals working for companies in the larger centres.

It has been pointed out and recommended by others, as well as by myself, that there is a need for this plant to go into different lines of production. In this regard, I am aware that the company has recently appointed a manager of product development, in an attempt to develop the manufacture of other types of products and to diversify the activities of that company. I hope their attempt in this regard will meet with success so the company can provide continuous employment.

Perhaps I should also refer to volume 1 of the MacPherson royal commission report while I am speaking about railways. I would like to quote one statement from that report at pages 67 and 68, as follows:

> We are also convinced that these remedies will help to ensure that the railways will take their proper place in a Canadian transportation system designed to encourage and facilitate national unity and national development to the greatest degree.

I feel that many of the recommendations contained in this volume of the MacPherson report are good recommendations. Undoubtedly the government will take them into consideration in preparing future legislation or policy in respect of the two national railways.

An hon. member has stated in this committee that nothing has been done to help the maritime provinces in the problems they face regarding freight rates. I should like to say that I am looking forward to the receipt of the second volume of the MacPherson report, which will undoubtedly contain further recommendations to which the government will give consideration. As the old saying goes, Rome was not built in a day, nor will the problem of equalizing freight rates be solved in a day. This is a very difficult problem, particularly with reference to the maritime provinces; but I am sure this government, after considering the recommendations made by the MacPherson royal commission, will be able to suggest possible solutions to the problems facing these areas.

There are several other matters to which I intend to refer, but I shall do so during the consideration of individual items. I should like at this time, however, to refer to one other matter of great importance to the residents of Pictou island, which lies approximately seven miles off the coast of Nova Scotia. The only means of communication between this island and the mainland during winter is provided by an airplane which flies between the island and Prince Edward Island. This airplane is capable of carrying the mail and one passenger, and was formerly operated by a gentleman locally referred to as "the flying farmer". At the end of last winter that gentleman ceased to provide this service, and was replaced by a gentleman known as "the flying padre". The air strip which exists on the island is not a good one, and does not lend itself to easy landings and take offs especially during winter months. In order to facilitate this service on a year round basis a new and better air strip is required.

I drew this need to the attention of both the present minister and his predecessor, and was advised that the necessary land must be purchased by the province or municipality and donated for this purpose before the Department of Transport could do anything in this regard. I was also advised that there must be a local guarantee to maintain the air strip, once it had been built. Following the receipt of this advice, officials from the Moncton division of the department made a trip to the area and have since suggested that there are strips there which could be utilized.

I brought the situation to the attention of the government of the province of Nova Scotia, and was informed that it was more of a municipal problem. Since that time I have approached a municipal councillor who will undoubtedly put the problem before the county council, and I hope it will come forward with a solution. I am sure the necessary land in the area can be purchased for a very low price, and that maintenance would amount to very little as compared to the importance of maintaining communications between that island and the mainland especially during the winter months.

That is all I wish to say at this time, Mr. Chairman, but I feel I should repeat that the services provided by this department are very important to the residents of my constituency, and commend the minister for his co-operation to date in this regard.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I understand that during the discussion on this vote hon. members are entitled to raise matters concerning transportation in Canada both in a general and a particular way. As this government has not yet seen fit to face up to the necessity and inevitability of providing a national transportation policy, it automatically follows that what I have to say deals with transportation in particular. Transportation is of tremendous importance to the Canadian people and Canada's economy, and I hope the minister, with his vast knowledge, will honestly and openly give this committee information regarding exactly what is happening in the transportation field in Canada.

I wish to particularize with reference to three points. The first deals with the passenger service which is now being provided by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have been very interested during the past two weeks in press releases issued by the officials of both railway transportation systems. I have also been interested in the passenger service being provided by these railway systems, and the endeavours to encourage the officials of the two systems to make an effort to meet the needs of Canadian people for passenger service.

I must regretfully say that while I have been interested in these press reports issued by both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway in regard to passenger service, I have had to come to the conclusion that it is just so much eyewash. I suggest that actually the officials of the two railway systems are doing everything possible to discourage the provision of the passenger service part of their operations. I believe we are entitled to learn from the Minister of Transport just what is going on behind the scenes and what is the passenger transport policy of the national railroads of Canada.

Let me give an indication of why I have come to this conclusion. I should like to give the minister a few examples and ask him to examine what happened two days before Christmas and two days after New Year's as regards railroad passenger policy and accommodation between Calgary and Vancouver. What did happen? I received my information not only from those who were on the trains but also from the railroad men themselves. They are interested in passengers and in their comfort. Then why, in the period I have just mentioned, was the accommodation on the trains between Calgary and Vancouver and Vancouver and Calgary such that many passengers had to stand up all the way? Why was it that on the train that went from Banff to Vancouver there was no dining car or coffee car, so that in that 24 hour run it was not even possible to get sandwiches? Why was it that although under the special plan of the railroad when you bought your ticket you bought not only your travel but your meals, no meals were served?

I have spoken to those who had such tickets on those trains, but there was no dining car and no coffee car on the train. I am not going to give the exact trains, because I do not want the men persecuted. I have spoken to one of the conductors who was faced with having to accept tickets which entitled the purchasers of those tickets to food on that train. He got so fed up trying to explain it was not his fault that he went into the baggage car and stayed there for a great part of the trip. I got this information from the man concerned.

When you are confronted with that kind of situation you ask, as I am asking now, do we believe what they say in the press or do we believe the experience of the passengers and the railroad men? Let me give one further example. When I was getting ready to come down here at the opening of this session I put in my application for a certain reservation on the train. I was told I would have to wait to have confirmation whether there was any space available. Two days later it was confirmed that space was available. When I got on the train I was one of four in the car.

Let us go even further. I am going to tell the minister of a Vancouver businessman who had to go from Vancouver to Montreal and decided to take his wife along with him. He made application to reserve a room for himself and his wife in a car, and he was told there was no space available, that they would have to take separate duplex roomettes to Winnipeg, and from Winnipeg they would transfer into the one room on the train. When that man got on the train—I did not know the man myself, two porters told me about it—they had the two duplex roomettes, but the man found that most of the car was vacant. Thereupon he asked the sleeping car conductor if he could have one room for himself and his wife to Winnipeg, because he had a room reserved from there on. He was sold a room; and this is one of the coincidences that sometimes occur. You know, Mr. Chairman, he obtained exactly the same room which he was to have from Winnipeg to Montreal, and he obtained it in Vancouver when he boarded the train.

It is because of things such as these that we ask, do we believe the newspaper publicity issued by the top brass of those railways, or do they have a policy, all the railroads put together, by which they are trying to get out of the passenger business? I know that hon. members whom I see right now have had similar experiences, or have had similar information given to them. I think we are entitled to know just what is in the minds of the heads of the railways as regards their policy on passenger service.

This leads me automatically to my second point, Mr. Chairman, namely the policy of our national railways in buying outright or a controlling interest in trucking and passenger service over the roads of Canada. I know that every hon. member receives periodically letters and information from the road transport companies of Canada. They are continuously complaining about the competition of the railroads. On the other side of the fence the railroads are complaining about the competition of those who use our roads for trucking and passenger service.

To me it is rather fantastic that both the railroads are, and have been for years, buying up the major trucking and road passenger services in Canada. What kind of sham battle is going on between the railroads and the major trucking companies of Canada when they are all owned by the C.N.R. and the C.P.R.? Surely, sir, there is a sham battle going on, and it is time it was brought out in the open and we were given the true picture which exists as between the railroads and the trucking and road passenger companies which they own. Surely the time has come for this sham battle to cease and for us to be given the actual picture of the co-operation and the competition between the two, and why one should attack the other when they are both owned by the same company.

This sham battle indicates the imperative and immediate necessity of the government giving consideration to bringing the entire transport system of Canada, whether it be by railroad, by road or by sea, into proper perspective and outlining a national transportation policy which will be in the interests of our people, whether it be freight or passenger service, so that it may be carried on in the most efficient manner as far as the economy of our country is concerned. A sham battle is not in the interests of anyone concerned. It is not in the best interests of any corporation or citizen, nor is it in the best interests of the economy. Statements made in the press for publicity purposes do not mean anything if the actual operations belie the statements. These matters are of such importance at this time that I hope the minister will clarify the situation. I hope he will tell us whether or not the government is facing up to the problem of a national transportation policy for Canada and, if so, what is being done about it.

Transportation is a vital necessity in our country, and it should be placed on a practical, efficient basis. I do not need to point out that Canada is a vast country, approximately 4,000 miles across and one third larger than the United States in size. Canada is an export nation. In the final analysis the efficacy or inadequacy of Canada's transportation system can make or break this country in terms of it occupying a major role in the export field. Perhaps the minister would give us an indication of what is really taking place in the field of transportation.

Until a few years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway provided a ferry service between the British Columbia mainland and Vancouver island. A few years ago the service was terminated during certain periods of the year because the company was losing money. No competition had to be met by sea, although Trans-Canada Air Lines provided competition by air. T.C.A. still operates a competitive service and the number of flights between Vancouver and Patricia bay is now at an unprecedented level.

What happened? Because of the deteriorated condition of the C.P.R. service the government of the province of British Columbia felt that it had to take action. This is a government which abhors anything of a socialist nature, is opposed to public ownership and is fully in support of free enterprise. This government decided to go into the ferry business, and built two large modern ships to ply between the British Columbia mainland and Vancouver island. I recently read in the newspaper that in the first 12 months of its operation the government ferry sevice made a profit of approximately $800,000. The operation has been so successful that two additional ships are being built. Apparently private enterprise failed in this field through the C.P.R., and public ownership through the service provided by the government made a profitable return. The position of the government ferry service is similar to that of Polymer and Eldorado in the federal field. This leads one to speculate about the policy of the C.P.R. in operating this service and allowing it to deteriorate to a point at which the provincial government had to move in.

The three fields about which I am curious and concerning which I should like a full statement from the minister are the passenger services of the railways, the trucking industry on our highways and the steamship services. I ask the minister to do something that no minister of transport has ever done. I urge him to give the committee a full exposition of all aspects of transportation policy. I urge him to give us an explanation of the difference between the statements made by those in control and what we see as a result of the actual operation. Most important of all, I ask the minister to give us an indication that the government recognizes the seriousness of the situation, and to tell us what is being done to provide a national transportation policy for Canada so we may have a profitable transportation system that will benefit the economy and the Canadian people.

Mr. Payne: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights and privileges of all hon. members of the House of Commons and regarding the opportunity provided us to discharge our responsibilities to those who placed us in this chamber, the electorate of Canada. I refer to the inability of members to be recognized by the Chair. I suggest that it would be right and proper in this situation to revert from committee so that I may discuss this question in some detail with Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think this is an extremely unusual procedure. I did not know it was the practice when we were in committee of the whole as we are now, discussing the estimates of the minister, to ask us to call the Speaker back into the chair to discuss a question of privilege that could have been raised earlier when the Speaker was in the chair and that could, I suppose, be raised later today or even tomorrow. On its face it would appear to me to be an unusual procedure, and I do not think we should be called upon to interrupt our present proceedings.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the hon. member who raised this question of privilege what he means. As I recall our rules the hon. member can follow this course in only one way. He is challenging you, sir, as chairman of the committee and is saying in effect that Your Honour has a bias in the recognition of speakers. If that is what the hon. member means he should say so directly. He appears to be accusing Your Honour of having a bias in the recognition of speakers.

The Chairman: Whether or not the hon. member's statement represents a challenge to the Chair, I think the procedure is as follows. We cannot call the Speaker back on a question like this unless there is an appeal from a decision of the Chair, which appeal is to the house. The second thing I would say is this. There is a procedure that is available. Any hon. member may move that a certain member be now heard, and it will be up to the committee to decide whether or not the member be heard. I do not think the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was discussing the bias of the Chair or anything like that. The problem of the chairman is that he cannot recognize all hon. members at the same time.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I move that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano be now heard.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I second that motion.

Mr. Payne: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Before the hon. member speaks, I will put the motion. I think the motion should be in writing. However, I suppose it can be taken as made.

Motion agreed to: Yeas, 61; nays, 0.

Mr. Payne: Mr. Chairman, my grievance is as follows. Fundamental to the discharge of our responsibilities in this chamber, is our ability to be heard in this chamber. On occasion I have found that I have been faced with a list which is held—

The Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member resume his seat?

Mr. Payne: Yes.

The Chairman: The question which the hon. member is now discussing has nothing to do with the estimates before the committee. As I indicated previously, I do not think there is a question of privilege. I would therefore ask the hon. member to discuss the estimates of the Department of Transport at this time and not to refer to the question which has been disposed of by the decision of the committee.

Mr. Payne: Mr. Chairman, I understood you wished me at this time to discuss the point of privilege which—

The Chairman: No; I think the hon. member misunderstood me. The committee has decided that the hon. member may now speak on the estimates which are before the committee. The hon. member has the floor but he has it for the purpose of participating in the present debate and not for the purpose of discussing the question of privilege or the matter which I indicated was not a question of privilege in any way.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Payne: I wish to thank you, Mr. Chairman, and the members of the committee for the consideration I have received. I will not go further and enlarge upon the reasons why I imposed on the committee in this way. I am indeed grateful for this consideration.

The main subject for discussion, as far as my remarks are concerned at this time, has to do with the port of Vancouver. The reason for discussing that subject on item No. 1 is to be found in the limitations that exist surrounding the terms of and the regulations under the National Harbours Act.

At the outset I should like to say that my congratulations go to the minister in his new portfolio. I would point out that his predecessor has given tremendous co-operation with regard to the bringing into effect of a new policy in the general area of the port of Vancouver. It is with great regret that we have seen the former vice chairman, namely Mr. Robert Rankin, leave the national harbours board and take a new and extremely important role as president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I say that most sincerely, because Mr. Rankin took an intimate and personal interest in the problems which I will now discuss. As a result of his replacement by Mr. Howard Mann may I say we look forward with pleasure to an association that will develop. I am sure that Mr. Mann is an able and capable individual, and that he will follow up the great work done by Mr. Rankin.

I have discussed the port of Vancouver on a number of occasions and in a good deal of detail both at this session and at previous sessions of this parliament. The great need of our port, the great lack that had developed through no planning over the years has become greatly apparent in the past few months with the sale of large tonnages of grain to the Orient.

It is rather interesting to note that most of the problems inherent in grain handling and the large shipment commitments to mainland China developed not from lack of loading space, as it is popularly thought, and to which the problem is usually credited, but rather through inefficient arrangements surrounding the port and quite beyond the authority of the national harbours board. When the Minister of Agriculture returns from his current visit to the west coast, where he has been investigating the handling of grain, I am quite sure he will confirm the suspicion he has held in this regard.

With respect to this great natural facility there is no liaison, no control factor or no management to administer and control the movement of rail traffic. No plans have been laid for many years to make available access to the wharfage. We have confused switching charges and arbitrary arrangements not directed toward the improvement and service of the port of Vancouver but frequently entered into by the various railways, which are competing for input of freight at points as far removed as Edmonton, Prince George and elsewhere in the hinterland.

The former minister of transport caused to be brought into being an interdepartmental study group. This body was announced a little more than a year ago. It consisted of members of the civil service from the Department of Public Works, Indian affairs, the Department of Transport and personnel from the national harbours board. It is my understanding that this body has now reported. I hope that in his remarks the minister will bring to this committee some news or some word of the findings and recommendations of this body.

I hope the minister will recognize the need for establishing at an early time a much broader study, which should develop a broader authority with powers extending back of the harbour line so that proper planning in conjunction with the communities surrounding this national facility can be undertaken, as they are now undertaken in other ports of Canada. I point to the planning and land assembly programs which have been undertaken in the ports of Saint John and Montreal, to name but two.

I urge that at the same time the minister recognize the immediate necessity for bringing into being a technical body prepared to go ahead and act, taking over the interests of the railways if necessary, to provide this port facility with the services it so urgently needs. This port is a national trust. It is one of the greatest facilities this nation has been given. It services the Pacific and the great Orient trading basins, representing potentially 65 per cent of the world's population.

The problems surrounding this harbour are today apparent, and it is with some shame that I report to the committee—the committee was warned about this last year—that the Pacific and Orient line have put into service large new passenger ships. The facilities are not there to berth these vessels. Indeed, those who travel by this route and enter Canada's western gateway inform us that for facilities our port qualifies as the worst they have seen, barring only one port in India. In previous years I have reviewed the vast tonnages and the great movement of vessels into and out of this port. This is an all-year harbour not bothered by ice and not curtailed in any way other than by a lack of planning and foresight created by man.

To those who come from the prairies this national trust means as much as it does to anyone living on the west coast itself. I urge the minister to take a keen and vital interest in following up the good work started by the former minister of transport and so ably handled by Mr. Rankin, so that we may not be guilty of impairing seaborne traffic so essential to Canada's economy.

There are two other subjects which I should like to discuss. We heard the other day, and at some length, the hon. member for Laurier discuss T.C.A. He did so pretty much as the ancient mother sheltering her brood. The hon. member brought into focus none of the facets which are today so important and which are certainly apparent to me from western Canada. I refer to the welfare not only of one but of all the great air carriers of this nation which are prepared to operate on the basis of private enterprise, which are prepared to give a service equal to that of any air carrier in the world, and which are prepared to pay the same taxes as are paid by any other industry in this country.

These air carriers are today facing problems. Some of these problems may be of their own making, but a great many are the making of the previous administration. The opposition today like to point to bilateral air agreements and find fault with this administration, when most of them were initiated by themselves.

To give the committee illustrations I would refer to the great west coast of the United States, that country's second most populous area. Did Canada make a magnificent deal? We secured landing rights in the most northerly and least populous city of Seattle only. At no other point on the Pacific west coast of the United States can Canadian air carriers land, nor do we have any privileges other than those granted by virtue of need and necessity for emergency.

We have an air carrier—I think it is fair and proper to name it—Canadian Pacific Air Lines, which I understand has asked for the privilege of sharing in the increase in growth of Canada's internal air traffic. I think this is a fair and just request. We have here a government agency T.C.A. spending millions of dollars on recapitalization for re-equipment and plant, always prepared to throw an extra plane into service on any line so they can show a most unfavourable revenue and passenger mile picture, and using this as a tool to deny private enterprise the right to do a job.

We can find enough money to throw millions of dollars into T.C.A. but we deny private enterprise the right to give a service it is prepared to give and for which it is prepared to pay taxes while so doing. We can find money for this sort of thing, we can find millions of dollars for a new equipment program.

Against this I should like to throw into focus the great needs of the port of Vancouver; a port which is a national trust and a national responsibility; a port which for hundreds of years to come will be the major mover of the heavy tonnage of commerce of this nation.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Payne: I am sure all members of the committee would wish me, before proceeding with my remarks, to welcome the hon. member for Essex East who, I see, is back in his place after a sojourn in hospital.

At one o'clock I was discussing certain matters concerning the policies of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I had made brief mention of the heavy capital spending program upon which this crown corporation is in the midst of undertaking at this time a program which represents the acquisition of new aircraft at a cost in excess of $200 million. I would point out that this large sum represents an expenditure by and on behalf of the people of Canada, since this is a crown corporation controlled in an indirect form through the shareholdings by the Canadian National Railways, another crown corporation.

Here surely is a case where the people of Canada and certainly the members of this chamber should take a serious look at this serious situation. Huge sums of money are being spent on aircraft to provide a service which private enterprise is ready and capable of providing, a service which private enterprise has amply proved its ability to supply. Surely this is a direction in which the spending of public money is not justified.

As I said earlier, the national facilities which do require the expenditure of money on the part of the nation are our ports, not only the port of Vancouver but other ports; the facilities which allow the industry and commerce of this country to be carried on and which determine the ability of this exporting nation to meet and service its export requirements. Surely at this time we should take a serious look at what certain of these crown corporations are doing—I refer particularly to T.C.A.—and what they are calling for by way of public funds to provide a service which, as I said, could and would be provided adequately and at competitive rates by private enterprise which, in addition to discharging these functions, would pay tax revenue to the nation.

[Mr. Payne.]

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. member a question? Who for years pioneered this service in Canada?

Mr. Payne: In answer to the hon. member for Vancouver East I would say there is no doubt T.C.A. did play a certain pioneering role, but I would point out to the hon. member that many another air line in Canada pioneered routes and provided service for the public in regions where T.C.A. never made a move. I would remind the committee of the work done by Mackenzie Air Service and Canadian Airways, which opened up the vast mineral area to the north of Vancouver, serving the upper regions around Aklavik and the Mackenzie river and bringing progress to the Canadian north. It was not only T.C.A. which pioneered; these other lines pioneered. In addition, they provided service on a competitive basis and paid taxes, too, while the T.C.A. pioneering effort, if you can call it that, was to establish a service between the major centres of population in Canada, frequently at a loss and requiring heavy subsidy.

I say now is the time when we must give some thought to where public spending should go. Should we be paying $250 million for aircraft which private enterprise could provide on a competitive basis for our external and internal air services, or should we spend that money on the port facilities of this nation in order to increase the efficiency of our export industry? Mr. Chairman, I think the answer to this question is simple.

There are two further points I should like to mention briefly. Last year the predecessor of our current minister announced the formation of the Canadian coastal protective services. I realize now, as a result of the announcement made earlier this session, that the current Minister of Transport is actively pursuing the establishment of this program, and has arranged for the provision of certain craft which will make this service much more effective and efficient. On behalf of the people of my area I wish to congratulate the minister for this move, and trust that it will go forward with haste, as I am sure the need for coastguard service, on the Atlantic as well as the Pacific coast, is urgent.

I should also like to congratulate the minister in regard to the shipbuilding assistance program recently announced. Western Canada's largest shipyards are located in my area, and I can assure the minister that this program of assistance will be most useful in the provision of urgently needed new coastal ships. This assistance will help in the provision of new deep-sea bottoms on the oceans of the world, and will mean a great deal to the thousands of families whose breadwinners work in our shipyards. I think this is a fine and imaginative program, and one which must give the minister a good deal of pride and pleasure.

I should also like to congratulate the minister for his recent announcement regarding the provision of new weather ships. These ships are indeed needed on the west coast. The old frigates, which have been serving in the Pacific, have provided poor accommodation for the crew who reside on these craft during some of the most rigorous weather that the oceans produce. These old vessels have not only been deficient in respect of conveniences and amenities for the crew while away from home, but are deficient in respect to the work they can perform at sea. I feel the provision of these new ships will make a great contribution to the provision of meteorological information which the Department of Transport so ably carries out.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I should like first of all to wish the Minister of Transport every success in this new portfolio which we all realize is a difficult one, including as it does the fields of air, land and water transportation.

I intend today to speak in regard to the Trent valley waterway. This waterway runs through the heartland of Ontario and is 230 miles in length, including 32 miles of canal locks, from Trenton on lake Ontario to Port Severn on the Georgian bay. This waterway, believe it or not, was started in 1830 by the imperial government as a means of defence, and transportation, and colonization in an attempt to open up the area. As hon. members know, this waterway was used by Champlain almost 350 years ago when he travelled form Georgian bay along the Trent waterway by portages where necessary to lake Ontario across the end of lake Ontario and attacked the Iroquois at approximately where the city of Syracuse, New York now stands.

The money provided by the imperial government for the development of this waterway was spent for the purpose of defence. The development of the waterway lagged for a good many years, until a man by the name of Mossom Boyd of Bobcaygeon acquired money to continue the project; but when he applied for permission to go ahead, it was denied. It was not until 1880 that Sir Charles Tupper became interested in the waterway and initiated an investigation as to the feasibility of finishing it. Following that investigation Sir Charles Tupper came to the conclusion that the waterway must be completed as fast as funds were available to do so, but unfortunately Sir Charles Tupper was appointed high commissioner to Britain before the project could be completed, and it was allowed to lag again following his departure.

In 1892 Sam Hughes, later Sir Sam Hughes, of Lindsay became interested and undertook to have the government complete the canal. In 1896 the government changed and under the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier the canal was again allowed to lag. The people living in the area brought pressure to bear on the government of the day, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier appointed a royal commission to determine whether the waterway should be completed. This royal commission, I believe, was headed by Sir John Bertram. This commission presented a report recommending that the waterway be completed as soon as possible and the project proceeded under the Liberal government, which was defeated in 1911, but was carried on by the Conservative government of that day under Sir Robert Borden. In 1914, with the commencement of the first world war, the project was carried on as a stopgap measure by the provision of a marine railway from Swift Rapids to the Big Chute. A promise was made at that time to complete the canal with locks immediately following the end of that war. Over 40 years have now passed since then, and the same bottleneck exists now that existed at that time.

Hon. members may wonder why the government of that day ever built the marine railway there. I suggest it was simply a measure to put in a stop dam to provide water to produce electric power for the munitions plants in the town of Orillia.

During the years this waterway has become a great water highway. More boats pass through the waterway in a day now than during a month at that time. Hotels, summer camps and cottages have been built all along the route, and marine motels are now being built. The investment in tourist camps and motels which has been made by the people of this area has amounted to millions of dollars. The investment in buildings is not the only expenditure that would be made. In addition there are the cost of upkeep and maintenance, to say nothing of the new buildings that would be built if the bottleneck of the marine railways was removed representing millions of dollars paid to labour. For the staffing of those motels, hotels and marinas, thousands of dollars more would be spent in labour costs. Many of our university and senior high school students would find work in those places during the summer holidays in increased numbers.

To repeat the opening up of this waterway at the north end will bring more buildings, more cottages, more hotels, more marinas and more motels. It will provide many hours of employment in the erection of the buildings, and then in the maintenance and staffing permanent employment will be provided, which will be greatly accelerated over the years to come. The building of lift locks will provide a great many jobs, many more than marine railways, which are incompetent and unsafe at best, or cradles or any other scheme that I know or have read of. Lift locks should be installed as soon as possible first because of their efficiency and second, because of their speed in handling boats, their saving of water and their safety and passenger comfort. Occupants can stay in their boats while the boats are carried up.

I just wish to make this statement. At one lock there is a lift of 65 feet and at the other it is over 50 feet. This is the equivalent of six to seven storeys or six to seven stairways in the ordinary house. A great many people who own these boats are getting along in years. I have seen them on more than one occasion face these steps with dread and fear. The marine railways are absolutely incompetent to handle the boating public today, as are any other form of cradles or other works. With the hydraulic lift lock they can stay in their boat and be raised without any waste of water. Also, larger and heavier boats can be handled. Only 15 tons can now be carried over the marine railway. This is doubly necessary now because I have been recently advised that there is some difficulty in letting the smaller craft go through the Welland canal. It appears very likely, therefore, that more boats of a heavier type will have to be handled through this waterway. This will mean additional sources of revenue.

I just wish to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that the marine railway cuts down the size of the boats that can be handled because it cuts down the canal to a total length of something like 50 feet long, 13 feet 6 inches wide and 4 feet draft. The rest of the canal has a uniform width of 3 feet and 6 feet draft. Its shortest length is 84 feet and its longest 175 feet, with a draft of 6 feet. Therefore it will be seen that its depth is cut just about 50 per cent when it gets to the marine railroad. In other words the bigger and deeper type of craft are to all intents and purposes prevented from making this trip.

Let us get on with the completion of this waterway. There does not appear to be any further reason for delay in its completion. As I have stated, it is needed economically, especially from the tourist point of view. We have an adverse balance of over $200 million in our tourist trade alone, or just one quarter of our total adverse balance. This waterway should be of incalculable help in correcting this deficiency.

In conclusion may I say there are a few other areas of this waterway in which I would like to see some improvements made. First, I should like to see sewage disposal tanks provided in appropriate areas for the sewage from the boats. Second, there should be a distinctive type of summer uniform provided for the operators, who are doing excellent jobs. As you go through this waterway in the heat of summer you sometimes see those fellows with their shirts off, wearing all varieties of clothing. A man comes along operating a boat and he finds that these men are not wearing any distinctive badges to indicate that they are the people who are operating the Trent canal. Let us dress them up so they will be a good advertisement for the waterway and boat men will know who is in authority. Summer uniforms, a sailor hat—even a little epaulet on the shoulder, would indicate that those men were working for the Trent waterway. The employees on the whole are excellent fellows. They give courteous service. Let us then dress them so the United States tourist going through will give them respect, and they will have the admiration for this country that we deserve. Let us get on with the completion of this lovely waterway, one of the finest, if not the finest, in the world.

I just wish to draw attention to the fact that the Rhine river which runs from Rotterdam in Holland to Switzerland, a distance of 600 miles, carries all the commerce of that particular area. We have not done anything to tap the great potential of this great waterway, one of the finest in the world. Let me put on the record what a very fine boatman of this province thinks about this waterway, a man who has written some books on the subject and I refer to Mr. Ken Wells of Moonstone. He had this to say:

> Entering through locks at Port Severn, into Gloucester pool—Gloucester pool you will not soon forget. It is utterly lovely with high tree-crowned shores and a scattering of rounded islands, through which a well marked channel winds towards a narrowing at its upper end that is again the Severn. The Severn is a river as green as jade, flowing between granite banks that lift in places nearly a hundred feet above its surface. Here, there is a cover and water lilies growing; there, a rock face which you can tie to while you have lunch or dinner. Your river cruise will end at the marine railway, which a penny pinching government has provided instead of a lock, to carry your boat over a powerhouse dam. It will, unless you are prepared to chance a lift, have to be repeated a few miles further up when a second powerhouse dam and a second marine railway will be encountered. If you do not object to this—

Let us get rid of the bottleneck.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I followed with a great deal of interest the statement made last Saturday by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) in introducing the estimates of his department. He did fail to mention a number of subjects and problems of particular interest to the city and port of Montreal, and I shall deal briefly with that in a few moments.

However, I should like first to comment on the program of assistance to shipping and shipbuilding which the minister announced last Friday. In reply to a question put to him on Saturday the minister indicated that in order to provide the funds needed to implement this scheme, the government would resort to the rather unusual method of including an item in the estimates instead of introducing legislation. Furthermore, it would not be an ordinary item, but according to the minister's own admission, a $1 estimate. I feel this is a rather unusual procedure and that such action on the part of the government is to be regretted. Such an attitude is contrary to the procedure traditionally followed in the case of such important subsidies. In any event, I do hope that this scheme will fulfil the aims of the minister and the government in relation to employment and to the restoration of Canadian shipbuilding.

In fact, I use the word "restoration" purposely, because one of the most important shipbuilding firms, Canadian Vickers Limited, is located in my constituency.

In the matter of assistance to shipbuilding, it was about time that the government woke up, because everyone knows that since 1957, the situation has been seriously deteriorating.

Reference was made to that fact in Le Devoir of Saturday, May 13, on the basis of information found in the Canada Year Book. The paper mentioned that in 1957 there were more than 68 shipyards giving jobs to 18,417 people and paying up to $71 million in salaries with a commercial production estimated at $167 million.

And Le Devoir added:

Since 1957, several companies had to close down, and those which stood up and were not stifled reduced the number of their employees by half.

I therefore hope that the several hundred people in my riding who were dismissed from those shipyards since 1957 will be able to find some work again after a four year interruption.

Mr. Chairman, as the representative of a Montreal riding, I had hoped that the minister would mention various significant projects about which we are always pressing him during the question period, on the orders of the day. It seems to me that this was a good opportunity for the minister to let us know the position of the government with regard to various quite important projects and issues concerning the city of Montreal and the south shore. I mean more particularly the construction of a bridge to the east of Montreal, improvements to the port of that city, projects for making use of properties belonging to the Canadian National Railways along the river, construction of an east-west elevated roadway, financial assistance in relation to that improvement as well as other questions with which I shall deal more fully later on.

Let us deal, first of all, with the matter of a bridge in the east of Montreal. Hon. members will remember that we, of the Liberal party, have been advocating this project since 1955 and that at that time, it was being necessarily delayed by the St. Lawrence seaway work and by the beginning of the Champlain bridge project.

On several occasions, namely on March 9, 1959, and on August 29, 1958, as well as in previous years, I have referred to this project for the east of Montreal. My colleague the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes) has also taken every opportunity of dealing with this matter. And now in 1961, after four years under Conservative government, no progress has been made since 1957, even though the situation has changed a great deal; the seaway is completed and work on the Champlain bridge was started a long time ago. In addition, if I am not mistaken, during the last election, all Conservative candidates of the island of Montreal, as well as the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), had put this project to the foreground of their platform.

Mr. Pigeon: Which project?

Mr. Deschatelets: The project of building a bridge in the east of Montreal. If my memory serves me well, the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm had even asked that this bridge, or one of its approaches, be located in his riding.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I made that request in this house and not during an election campaign.

Mr. Dupuis: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Pigeon: I made this request when I was asking a question in this house, and the hon. member says that I made it during an election campaign.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I ask you to be lenient with the hon. member, because there is no question of privilege. However, he will not have many years to make up for lost time, because he lacks a little experience.

I have here the May 15, 1960 issue of the newspaper L'Echo des Monts, in which the previous minister of transport, Mr. Hees, vetoed the proposed building of a bridge in the east of Montreal. Moreover, on February 9, 1960, Mr. Hees wrote a long letter to the mayors of the towns on the south shore of Montreal. I will only read the last sentence of the letter, for it is too long to be read into Hansard in its entirety. He concludes with these words:

I therefore regret to have to inform you that I cannot accept the responsibility for that project.

That project being, of course, the building of a bridge in the east of Montreal, which had been promised and in respect of which the Associate Minister of National Defence had said that construction would begin a year or two ago.

Well, Mr. Chairman, that bridge has become an urgent need for the city of Montreal. That is why, in a non-partisan spirit, I should like first of all to ask the Minister of Transport to tell us if the present government is considering the building of a bridge in the east of Montreal. Moreover, I should like to bring to the minister's attention the following fact: The obstacles arising from the works on the development of the St. Lawrence seaway and on the building of the Champlain bridge have now disappeared. And if the Minister of Transport will refer to the correspondence exchanged on this subject in the past, he will see that the matter has become of great urgency.

May I now quote a few words put on the record on June 2, 1960, especially a statement made by the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who then said:

Let me say a final word about the construction of a new bridge between Montreal and the south shore east of the Jacques Cartier bridge. I have on more than one occasion beginning in 1957 referred to a report which is in the Department of Transport entitled "The St. Lawrence Ship Channel and Montreal Harbour Committee of 1950; Report on the terms of reference thereof". This is a report which dealt with the construction of facilities in the Montreal harbour and east of that harbour that would have to be undertaken following the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway. The report is a voluminous one. I have only the report dealing with one reference but there are four or five references. Somewhere in this report it is stated that a bridge should be constructed east of the Jacques Cartier bridge linking Montreal and the south shore.

Mr. Chairman, before turning to other matters, I ask the minister to reconsider the position taken by his predecessor who had refused to implement that project. I ask him to tell the house that this government intends to start work in the near future on this project which is so vital and urgent, not only for the city of Montreal, but also for the south shore and all the metropolitan area.

Mr. Chairman, I wish now to say a few words about improvements that are urgently needed in the Montreal harbour. I have here an article published in La Presse on September 12, 1960. It is entitled:

This stranger, our harbour.

The Montreal harbour has its back to the city and it seems that everything is done to keep the Montreal population away from it, to make it difficult of access, while it is the opposite that is true in all other maritime centres of the world, whether it is New York, Boston, Hamburg, Naples or London. The harbour is a marvellous place to see and it is one of those economic centres for tourists and local citizens to visit.

I find most unfortunate the attitude taken on the matter by the national harbours board. A striking example of this unpleasant and intolerant attitude, is the fact that, early this spring—the minister will remember—fishing was forbidden to my fellow citizens in the harbour of Montreal. Since the beginning of things the people of Montreal, when spring comes, have been going down to the harbour for a little line fishing. There were a few hundreds of them, most of whom could not afford to go fishing outside the city. It had become a tradition. Now about three weeks ago I was amazed to hear that the harbour had been completely forbidden to the fishermen.

I asked the minister at the time to tell us who was responsible for such a silly order, for it was really a piece of stupidity. Fortunately, this regulation was subsequently reconsidered by the national harbours board and anglers were again admitted to the harbour.

Well, let me remind you that in 1956-57, the Liberal administration voted about $57 million for the improvement of Montreal harbour. Projects of unusual importance were carried out, so that Montreal is now the first port of the country. Indeed, Montreal harbour is one of the finest in the world. The time has come, I think, when after having taken care of the economic aspect of the harbour, we should look to the human side of it.

Last year I made a suggestion to the predecessor of the Minister of Transport in order that the Montreal population and tourists might again have access to the harbour. I had then suggested setting up a small park with benches, on the harbour site, in a word that some section of the harbour be reserved for that purpose, so that people might listen to music and peacefully watch ships coming and going.

One could even think of an observation point such as the ones that were erected when the St. Lawrence project was underway so that people could, from an elevation of about 50 feet have a full view of the port activities. I cannot think of anything better for the younger set. If we proceeded along this line tourists could then be shown the first port of the country, one of the finest and most important in the world.

I therefore suggest to the Minister of Transport that he asks a landscape architect to go to Montreal harbour and consider the possibility of developing a sector of the harbour which would be accessible to the citizens of Montreal and of the surrounding area. I should like the minister to tell us about that later in his reply.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to put my views on the record about the use of C.N.R. properties along the river in Montreal, which the city needs badly for the construction of an east-west elevated roadway.

If I am not mistaken, the Minister of Transport was a member of the government delegation which met the Montreal authorities approximately two months ago. But his comments have been rather scarce since those discussions. We were not told just what went on then and it is only this morning that the Minister of Transport, answering my colleague, the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Lessard), told us that four or five weeks ago the authorities of the city of Montreal had sent him a brief concerning the possibility of using that land.

Now, that brief was received five weeks ago by the minister. I feel that we should have been told today what is the government's stand concerning the request of the Montreal authorities. Apparently, the government did as usual and said: "In due time we will let you know", and the problem was shelved until someone brings up the question again. I therefore urge the minister to tell us what stand the government intends to take on the brief sent by the city of Montreal. It is a very important matter, as can be seen from an article in the newspaper La Patrie of Sunday, March 12, 1961, which has to do with the construction of that elevated expressway over Montreal harbour:

> Here is a real project fit to be developed immediately, according to our present municipal leaders. All will depend on the co-operation and dispatch of the Ottawa people. So far, there have been only discussions and comparing of ideas about the matter. At present, Montreal harbour holds up traffic a great deal, just as the same situation used to affect New York. They only had to build an elevated roadway over the harbour to relieve congestion in that area.

Just one word now, Mr. Chairman, about another project which indirectly concerns the minister, that is, assistance to the subway. We were somewhat amazed, about a month ago, to hear that the Montreal civic authorities could not find in this country the financial means to carry out that project and had to ask for assistance from abroad. Yesterday, La Presse informed us that this subway financing is not easy to effect because of the government and the Bank of Canada policy which bars the entry of foreign capital. That is why I am asking the minister to indicate whether it is the government's policy to check the help coming from foreign capital and if so, where will our municipalities get their financing? I should like the minister to say a few words about this particular project in his reply.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the case of the Soulanges canal. But before I make a few comments on that subject, I should like to quote the following portion of a speech broadcast over CJMS station Montreal on April 20, 1961:

> In other words, it was proposed to create on the doorstep of Montreal—the Soulanges canal is but 25 miles from the metropolis—a genuine paradise, an oasis of fresh air where the less fortunate families who live in greater Montreal could have spent enjoyable hours just by paying a bus fare without the head of the family having to travel alone hundreds of miles to practice his favourite sport, fishing.
> That was too nice. Politics and the financial interests of private individuals and groups just had to intervene to bring about the failure of this project which everybody recognized as a great social and tourist enterprise.

Following that letter, I would like to read into Hansard in connection with the Soulanges canal project, this letter which was published in the May 8, 1961 edition of Le Devoir under the signature of Mr. J. M. Bourbonnais, the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges. I will only quote the last part of the letter:

Hon. Leon Balcer is entirely willing to transfer the Soulanges canal at the conditions set forth by Hon. Gerard Levesque. Hon. Balcer even offered to let me make that announcement on the opening night of the sports exhibition at the Mart, last March. Therefore, I am the only one who is opposed to the project as federal M.P. for Vaudreuil-Soulanges and I am ready to take all the blame. I have stated publicly my reasons for taking that stand. Just look at the facts, but please, be objective and tell the truth.

That letter was addressed to Mr. Filion of Le Devoir. Well, that is an unusual situation. The province of Quebec sets up a vast project and asks the federal government for the transfer of the Soulanges canal at certain conditions. The hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges himself states in that letter: I am the only one who objects at the offer made by the province of Quebec. Therefore, the Minister of Transport is in favour of the original offer.

I would then ask the minister to tell us why the government would yield to the demands of a member—and I do not want to discuss the reasons the member may have to take such a stand—but how can the Minister of Transport abdicate his responsibilities because a member of that area stated: No, I do not want it.

I do not intend either to discuss now the judgment of the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges. They say he has a very good judgment; I do not question that. But, when the bell rings, it is indeed unfortunate that he should forget it in a drawer of his desk instead of bringing it to the house.

Therefore, I would ask the minister to make some more remarks on this problem of the Soulanges canal, but before he does so, I tell him this: This is mainly a project of provincial interest, and nowadays it is of interest to the whole province.

I warn the minister that the Canadian government must have some really good reasons if it decides to turn down the offer of the province of Quebec and we will expect to be made aware of those reasons. I trust—

Mr. Balcer: Would the hon. member explain what offer of the province of Quebec he is referring to?

An hon. Member: The $1 offer.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, the $1 offer.

Mr. Deschatelets: Everyone knows that the province of Quebec has asked the government that the whole Soulanges canal be transferred to them, including the Cascades area, for $1.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

Mr. Balcer: Then that was a request, not an offer.

Mr. Deschatelets: I think the minister greatly underestimates this matter, and the letter from the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges proves it. It is absolutely ridiculous for a member to say about that project: "I object, it shall not go through", when the same member adds: "I am the only one to object".

I leave that project to the minister's consideration and I urge him to raise the matter again in this house because he will hear about it again should the situation remain as is it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about C.N.R. employees. About two months ago, the hon. member for Laurier introduced a motion to adjourn the business of the house, because in Montreal from 200 to 250 C.N.R. older employees were to be laid off, as a result of the sale to the province of Quebec of the McGill street buildings.

There you have another problem taken rather lightly by the minister, supported in that by some of his colleagues, among whom the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson), who said: "It is up to the province of Quebec to give jobs to those people; we have nothing to do with that problem."

Right from the start, we urged the government to make representations to the Canadian National Railways, asking them to keep those older employees and see to it that they be employed in the new building the company will soon occupy. This is the responsibility of the C.N.R. On the other hand the government has the responsibility to see that in a situation such as this, the C.N.R. keep on its payroll people who, otherwise, will be laid off.

Today, we say that "unemployment is everyone's concern". Industries where work is going at a slow pace are being told to keep their employees as long as possible, because unemployment is everyone's concern.

Well, in this regard, I cannot see why the C.N.R., which now has those employees on its payroll, should not keep them because, according to the projects of this company in the new building, it would award contracts for office cleaning, which would mean that those people would be out on the street.

Again, I urge the government to reconsider this situation because the hon. member for Laurier and all the opposition members from the Montreal region are quite sensitive on this matter. I hope the Minister of Transport, in his reply, will tell us whether a decision has been arrived at, what representations have been made to the C.N.R. and whether there is some hope that those employees will be kept in their jobs.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal briefly with another point—

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Before the hon. member moves to another subject, I have to advise him with regret that his time has expired. The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. McGrath: I am prepared, if the committee gives its consent, to allow the hon. member to finish his remarks.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Does the committee give consent to extending the time permitted to the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: I am grateful to the committee for allowing me to continue. I shall not abuse the privilege. I should just like to add a word or two on a point which is of special interest to the eastern section of Montreal. I refer to the old railway lines extending from the old Moreau station, which cross Ontario street, and fan out through eastern Montreal, blocking all traffic north of Ontario street. Of course, I am not criticizing the minister on that score, but I do want to draw the problem to his attention.

First, I would urge him to make a personal visit to this area and have a look at the monstrosity of those old railway tracks which threaten the lives of children and block traffic at all hours of the day, even in the rush hours.

I must say to the minister that the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes) and myself have been interested in this matter for many years, and that we are quite aware that this C.N.R. line is no longer profitable; every year, the line loses many customers, and its only practical use today is for the transportation of oil from eastern Montreal.

I therefore ask the minister to look into the possibility of having those tracks removed and relocated along the port of Montreal, thus clearing up the whole eastern section of the city. Should the occasion arise in the near future, I would ask the minister to consider the matter and let us know in due course what action he contemplates to correct the situation.

(Text):

Mr. McGrath: I wish to say at the outset that like most hon. members from Canada's western and eastern seaboards and from the great lakes area I welcome the recent announcement by the Minister of Transport of the government's new policy with regard to shipbuilding. This will give a new lease on life to the shipbuilding industry in Canada and bring new hope to the hard pressed fishing industry. Like all hon. members who are sincerely concerned about this subject I hope the announcement has come sufficiently early to reverse what has been a dangerous trend particularly in the fishing industry, namely to undertake the construction of trawlers in European shipyards. I hope that as a result of this new policy this work will go to our own Canadian shipyards. Perhaps when the minister replies to the discussion on this, the first item of his estimates, he will elaborate on this point, particularly with regard to the application of these subsidies to coastal shipping, that is to say, the smaller type of vessel which operates in the coastal trade in the waters around Newfoundland and the maritime provinces.

I wish to deal with a subject which, I believe, requires clarification at this time. Perhaps the minister will be accommodating in this regard. I am referring to a question which has been under study now for several years. In fact it has been under study since 1958 or 1959, I am not sure which. I refer to the subject of a passenger-automobile ferry to operate between the east coast of Newfoundland and the mainland of Nova Scotia.

For the benefit of some hon. members it might be worth while explaining that the regular ferry services operated by the C.N.R. between Newfoundland and the mainland cover only the western portion of the island of Newfoundland. It is estimated it will be ten years before any great progress is made toward the completion of the Newfoundland portion of the trans-Canada highway. Arguments have been advanced by competent spokesmen in Newfoundland, including members of the Atlantic provinces economic council, that a new ferry is essential for the economic progress of the Atlantic provinces since it would provide a vital link for approximately two thirds of the population of Newfoundland with the maritime provinces of Canada and, indeed, the rest of Canada. It would enable the people of eastern Newfoundland to maintain regular automobile and truck traffic with the mainland. The arguments in favour of this service are numerous; it is not necessary to go into them all at this time.

I should like to quote an article which appeared in the St. John's Telegram of April 25, 1961 and an article which subsequently appeared in the same paper, issue of April 28, to indicate the uncertainty surrounding this project. As I say, it is supposed to have been under study for the last several years. Here is the news item which appeared in the St. John's Telegram on April 25 under the heading: "East Coast Ferry Definite":

> The executive manager of the Newfoundland board of trade said Sunday the federal government has definitely decided to provide an east coast ferry service with the mainland for Newfoundland.
> The executive manager said transport minister Balcer had assured him during a recent Ottawa visit that a new ferry would be built to operate from some port on the Newfoundland east coast.

A little later on the report says:

> Mr. Balcer had announced several months ago that a government committee was studying the possibility of providing Newfoundland with such a ferry service.

Mr. Winch: May I ask if there is anything in the estimates of the department for this project at the present time?

Mr. McGrath: No; not to my knowledge, at any rate. Then, on April 28, 1961, there appeared in the same paper an article entitled "Ferry, yes? Ferry, no?". It says:

> Transport minister Balcer said Thursday the question of a ferry service linking the east coast of Newfoundland with the mainland "still is under study".
> He declined to confirm or deny a report from St. John's that said he has assured a board of trade official the service would be established.

I will continue the quotation:

> Anthony Ayre, executive manager of the Newfoundland board of trade, was reported to have said in a radio interview recently that Mr. Balcer had told him there would definitely be such a ferry service.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not present any further arguments either pro or con in respect of this proposed service, but I should like to inform the minister that the municipal council of the city of St. John's, as well as labour and service organizations of Newfoundland, would be very grateful to the minister for some indication as to government policy in this regard. If it is intended by the government to provide such a service then, of course, the question in everyone's mind is, how long will the study take? I am sure all my constituents, as well as hon. members of this committee, are anxious to know what the results of the study will be, and whether or not the government will decide to provide this ferry service. From indications to this date, it is my understanding that the government will provide this service, but there has been no definite statement made in the last few years.

Mr. Chairman, I should also like to bring to the attention of the minister, at this time, as I did last year in this committee the situation regarding the ever growing marine services division of the Department of Transport. I should like to refer particularly to the inequities which exist between the rates of pay to personnel manning ships in the Newfoundland agency, the maritimes agency, the Quebec agency and the British Columbia agency. I understand these rates of pay are determined by the Department of Labour, on the basis of prevailing rates for similar types of jobs in these areas. The situation is, however, anomalous in that seamen and officers working on Department of Transport ships operated by the Canadian National Railways receive the same rates of pay as their counterparts in other parts of Canada.

On the other hand, seamen working on ships operated by the marine services division receive varying rates of pay depending upon the area in which they work. As an example of this situation, seamen working in Newfoundland on Department of Transport ships receive $185 per month, although I understand this has now been raised to $200 per month. Their counterparts, working on similar ships, performing similar duties in the maritime provinces, receive $229 per month, plus a $5 per month stevedore allowance. I am not sure of the prevailing rates of pay in the Quebec agency, but it is my understanding that they are higher yet. I suggest this inequitable situation should be corrected. I feel a Canadian seaman working on a Department of Transport ship operating off the coast of Newfoundland should receive the same rate of pay as that which applies to a Canadian seaman working on a Department of Transport ship under the maritime agency, the Quebec agency, or the province of British Columbia agency. These ships are all operated by the federal government of Canada, and the same rates of pay should apply throughout the country. I am sure the hon. members of this committee would be interested in hearing the minister's comments in this regard.

I should like to compliment the minister and his department for the excellent work which has been carried out during the past winter and spring in an attempt to cope with the extraordinary ice conditions which prevailed along the coasts of the Atlantic provinces. The ice conditions existing off the coast of Newfoundland were worse this past season than they have been during the last 10 years. The provision of the two new icebreakers—the Sir Humphrey Gilbert and the Wolfe—has been of great help at a very opportune time. I should hate to think what the consequences might have been during this past winter season were it not for the provision of these two additional icebreakers.

The situation in my constituency has been very difficult, and it is still uncertain whether the ice has actually gone out.

The Bell island-Portugal Cove ferry service was particularly hard hit this winter as a result of ice conditions. But for the provision of these two new icebreakers, the unfortunate people of Bell island would have been isolated, and would have suffered great hardships as a result of the lack of daily supplies.

I should also ask the minister to indicate when he expects to bring forward legislation setting up the St. John's harbour commission to administer that very important harbour which is now under development by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the opportunity, when we are considering the various items of this department, to ask further questions of the minister concerning the jurisdiction of the Bell island ferry service. I suggest there should be some definition brought forward by this government regarding the operation on this service of a ferry which is owned by the federal government, but which operates under provincial franchise. There have been many difficulties resulting from this situation, but I do not intend to burden this committee with them at this time. I ask the minister to give this situation consideration in the preparation of his reply, and to indicate the steps which have been taken toward the solution of this situation regarding the jurisdiction of this service, so that the service can be properly operated and provided with federal subsidies if they are required—as in other provinces.

Mr. Granger: I should like to congratulate the minister on his appointment. I have two of the largest airports in Canada in my riding, namely Goose and Gander. Coming from the Atlantic seaboard where sea transport is so important, I have a particular interest in the estimates of this department. Before going any further I should like to express my appreciation of the interest which the minister has taken in communications on the Labrador and of the steps he is in the process of taking to provide better communications on that coast. I should like to assure him that the service thus provided is out of all proportion to the cost involved, and that a vital service to isolated areas will be supplied by those additional radio telephone sets.

While speaking of communications, I should like to mention as well the good work which Canadian National Telegraphs have done. In saying this I should mention that over the years since Newfoundland entered confederation they have extended a better service to parts of my district. I should like to emphasize the necessity of expanding the program so that all the places which have an indifferent service, such as parts of Green bay and White bay, may in time and before too long have a better communications system and long distance telephone connections.

My hon. friend from St. John's East mentioned icebreakers. I think I should also make a comment about the icebreaker service in Newfoundland. It is only fair to say that this year ice conditions were entirely unusual. I realize the department cannot build a fleet of icebreakers to take care of an unusually bad year. In normal years some of them would be lying up. I think every reasonable person would agree with this statement. But the presence of a Russian icebreaker off the Newfoundland coast, and this icebreaker flying in men by helicopter to kill seals, should be an indication to us that it will be necessary in the future to supply icebreaker support to the sealing fleet. I believe that as much as possible this was done during the past season. As I said, this year was a most unusual one. The ice was exceedingly heavy and covered exceedingly vast areas; but for future planning the use of icebreakers in conjunction with the sealing fleet should be kept in mind because, as I said, the presence of a Russian icebreaker off the coast of Newfoundland is a sign of the times which none of us can afford to ignore.

Again, I think icebreakers should be utilized to extend the periods of service of the Canadian National coastal boats which serve northern Newfoundland and Labrador. Those boats have given an excellent service, but the period of operation is restricted. There is a growing feeling that, with the availability of icebreakers, in normal years the period of operation of C.N.R. boats should be extended. I said a moment ago that the service which the C.N.R. coastal boats has given is excellent; but in the late fall it does not appear to be adequate for the great northern peninsula or Labrador. It has been suggested that instead of steamers leaving St. John's and/or Lewisporte and making a trip right around the northern part of the island to Corner Brook and then back again, it might be an improvement if the ships sailed from Corner Brook and St. John's and met at St. Anthony or Cook's Harbour and then returned; in other words, if this long run were split up into two return trips. One ship would leave St. Anthony and return and the other one would leave Corner Brook and return. People in that area have suggested that. I am not an expert on these matters but I should like to pass along the suggestion which has been passed along to me.

Then there are a number of small items which I think could be looked into such as hand trucks and so on being supplied to the wharves in Newfoundland and Labrador at different ports. What I should like to speak about particularly, however, is the situation in which the town of Gander finds itself today. Gander grew around the great Gander airport, the airport which really gave Canada international status in air commerce. When we entered confederation and Gander became part of Canada the position and the bargaining power of Canada as a nation with respect to commercial aviation were enormously strengthened. Gander was developed and in time a modern town grew up around a really fine airport, and eventually a really splendid terminal was built there. In addition Gander airport has navigational facilities and other aids to air transportation which are as good as those of any airport in the world. It is a truly great and magnificent airport.

Trends in air travel during recent years have tended to make Gander an alternative rather than a regular stop in trans-Atlantic travel, for fewer and fewer air lines stop at Gander as a regular course. At the moment I do not think there are any air lines which make it a regular scheduled stop other than Trans-Canada Air Lines. When an airliner leaves New York now, say, for Europe, instead of making Gander an alternative they choose to make Goose an alternative stop. As hon. members know, Goose is a great military airport. Air transport now has a tendency to stop at Goose where it is not wanted instead of at Gander where it is needed. I think one of the reasons for this is that at least one if not two of the runways at Gander should be lengthened from the present length of 8,600 feet. In marginal weather pilots like a little longer runway. In good weather the runways are, I believe, considered adequate; in marginal weather they are not. If the weather is marginal and the pilot feels he cannot make the trip across the Atlantic without needing more fuel he has to decide whether to land at Gander or Goose, and he decides in favour of Goose and Gander is deprived of that much revenue. I have felt for a long time, and I have made the suggestion here before that it would be a sound investment if the Department of Transport added another thousand feet to one or better still to two of the runways at Gander. It is I think fairly evident, at least according to the information I have received, that with longer runways the Gander airport would be used more.

The investment which the Canadian government has in Gander is quite heavy. The investment which individuals who live in the town which grew up around the airport have in Gander is considerable. I am told that at the present time there are 20 houses for sale in Gander and that in the near future there will probably be 20 more. The people of Gander are really concerned about the future of the place. My own opinion is that Gander is going through a temporary period of low activity. I rather think, and this again is a personal not a professional opinion, that as time goes by and there is a growth in air freight and an enormous growth in air travel, Gander will again come into the picture. I am referring, of course, to a growth in air tourist travel which, I understand, is the bread and butter of the passenger carrying commercial air lines.

In the meantime, there is a considerable amount of uneasiness. I am bringing this matter to the attention of the minister in the hope that, at the appropriate time, he can make a statement outlining what he believes to be the future of Gander. It has been suggested that, with the growth of air freight, Gander might become a transfer point for air freight. This freight would arrive at Gander in one type of plane and be transferred to a different type of plane for carriage to Europe. If that occurred, of course, it would be a very welcome development. I would ask the minister to bear this in mind as well.

A suggestion has been made that Gander might be declared a free port in order to make it more attractive for air travel. This is one suggestion that has been brought to the attention of the minister and his colleague the Minister of National Revenue. These are some of the things which I feel should be given careful consideration because a lot of people depend upon this airport for their living and they hope to be able to remain there. Gander was born of aviation and it seems to me that for the present, it must live by aviation. I ask the minister to look into this problem, which is a very real one: what is the future of Gander? Are developing trends in aviation likely to bring business back to this airport? Will fewer of these air lines use New York, which is becoming crowded, and instead take off from points on the mid west and perhaps stop at Gander before going on to other parts of the world? These are some of the questions which the citizens of Gander are asking themselves today and which I, on their behalf, pass on to the minister in the hope he can let us know what is likely to happen to this airport.

There is another matter in connection with Gander that I should like to mention. The hunters like to come from the United States to hunt in central Newfoundland. When there was a direct service from New York into Gander, more of them came than is now the case. I understand, unless there has been some change recently, that in order to get to Newfoundland from New York you have to go to Montreal. This is quite an expensive route. Perhaps the minister could keep this problem in mind and consider the possibility of having an air service which would link the east coast of the United States with Gander rather than routing such traffic via Montreal.

Despite the size of Gander and despite all the facilities which exist there, it is a part of the Atlantic region, if that is a correct term, of the minister's department. There have been suggestions, and I might say that I believe they are justified, that Gander should be a region by itself. In this way the officials at Gander could communicate directly with Ottawa with regard to the main problems which they have. As I said, at the present time the employees of the air lines are being transferred. There are only a few of them left. There are fewer scheduled flights going into Gander and there is a feeling that perhaps Gander does lack security. However, I am an incurable optimist and I feel this is a temporary period of low activity which new trends developing in aviation will correct. I would hope that for the sake of the people who have their life savings invested in Gander, as well as for the sake of the government which has a considerable investment there, the minister will be able to give us an assessment of the future of this airport. Perhaps I might express the hope that it would be a favourable one. However, it is more important to know the facts.

I might add that the new hotel at Gander is a great asset. If direct flights into Gander are resumed, this could very well be a tourist centre and perhaps a place where business conventions would be held. We seem to come back to the same point all the time, that Gander depends on the airport. We have a magnificent airport with magnificent facilities, and I do hope these problems receive the careful, sympathetic and effective attention of the minister and his officials. There is much at stake, both from the standpoint of dollars and cents and from the standpoint of the people themselves who have a great stake there.

In closing, I should like to mention also that the development of Labrador will depend to some extent on the construction of small airports. This is the case in northern Newfoundland as well. From time to time I have had occasion to write the minister about the needs of my area in respect of airstrips. I hope to continue to do that. I shall content myself by asking now for sympathetic consideration of the need for airstrips to aid development in the north.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal for a few brief moments with the relationship of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada with the board of transport commissioners, with particular reference to a question directed to the Right Hon. C. D. Howe in 1938, when Mr. Howe was minister of transport. As reported on page 935 of volume I of Hansard for the 1938 session, here is the statement made by the Hon. C. D. Howe in reply to a question from an hon. member:

> We must all recognize that the Bell Telephone Company has a monopoly of a great public service in the districts in which it operates, and it is entirely sound government to provide that a public service monopoly shall be regulated as completely as possible.

The Bell Telephone Company has not even invented the automatic telephone. It has had to pay constant royalties to use it. It is inconceivable that this firm should be vested with such arbitrary and uncontrolled powers and should be able to blow hot and cold across the country, force its decisions upon any area, double the cost of service, take money from one profitable district and use it to destroy private companies providing equal and often better service. That is the purpose behind the rising rates, and no matter what we are told, no federal or provincial board can order the company to service any particular territory, or to substitute such a service for another; the board of transport commissioners has become a mere rubber stamp, it is used to condone rates on the basis of figures submitted by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, and does not even have the authority to scrutinize the amounts paid to Northen Electric, which is 90 per cent controlled by Bell Telephone.

Here is a quotation from a speech made at one time in this house:

> The part played by the Western Electric Company, Incorporated, in its relations with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, is similar to the part played in this country by the Northern Electric Company in connection with the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

The board of transport commissioners has to accept the statements of profit and loss as submitted, and cannot go beyond that.

The charter granted in 1880 provided that the company was to service all of Canada. It was soon realized that the company was not interested in going outside profitable centres such as Quebec and Ontario. A little later, an amendment was made to the company's charter, and with the approval of the house, it was decreed that the company could go here and there across Canada.

The letter of the constitution was complied with, but only one company was granted the largest monopoly of public utilities and finance that could possibly be conceived in North America and in the world.

The company can now disregard the population and even the governments. As long as its public relations are running smoothly with plenty of dollars, the company thinks it can do anything it likes and is justified legally in doing so, as a result of its 1880 charter and of its ever increasing powers. Capitalization has now reached $1 billion.

If you refer to the epic and so justified struggles of the year 1902 and other periods, you would think they took place in 1961. At the time, 22 years after the company was set up, such abuses were pointed out and criticized in this house and in the other place. The Toronto board of trade then came to the defence of the Canadian people. If we look over the record for that period, we note that the company suggested that the subscribers were cry-babies. Who is right today?

Here are some concrete results:

(a) The board of transport commissioners has no authority whatsoever over the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, except as far as rate increases are concerned.

(b) The provinces have no jurisdiction.

(c) This is a tremendous game and the same club is always on the winning side, namely the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, while it keeps on saying in a paradoxical way: "At your service".

The company can even go as far as claiming with impunity—and with legal justification—that it has the "absolute" right, without any restriction whatsoever, to build, erect and maintain its telephone lines along, through or on all highways, streets, roads, bridges, waterways or other such places, located in Canada.

I should like to point out to the house certain obvious results: The company divides arbitrarily the territories within a municipality, thus showing discrimination and spreading discord among local citizens, as is the case throughout central Ontario and Quebec.

The company takes pleasure in waiting that all development is completed in a given area, be it in the vicinity of Montreal, Toronto or Hamilton, and coming in afterwards in order to collect the revenue of communications by making all kinds of imaginary drawings, circles, or zoning, and nobody, neither the board of transport commissioners, the Ontario service commission nor the public utility control board of the province of Quebec, can say anything.

When the company decides to strangle a competitor or a territory, everybody has to kowtow to it.

An investigation would show readily how many federal services are stifled by this company. It must be realized that the railways which are entitled to operate in the field of telephone communications, are the first to suffer from the control of the Bell Telephone Company and eventually the Canadian taxpayers must suffer the consequences while the company reaps high profits by charging rates that are becoming prohibitive. And such is the situation, Mr. Chairman, since the Bell Telephone Company of Canada has had its charter.

You should take a look at the spider's webs interwoven by the company so as not to lose the significant profits arising from long-distance calls of people who have common interests with a large city like Toronto or Montreal. I will let my colleagues from Toronto give their examples, but we have pleasant ones around Montreal. In fact, you can phone directly from Saint-Mathias to Montreal, by-passing Chambly or Longueuil, without having to pay any long distance charge, but if you phone to Chambly or to Longueuil, which is on your run, you are charged the famous long distance duty.

Also, if you go over the statements made by the company before the committees, here in Ottawa, you will see that the company easily solves any problems. Indeed, when parliament refused to grant an increase in the registered capital of the company which would have made it possible to buy other companies and to charge the expense to the subscribers of other areas, bringing about an inevitable rise in rates, you will note that two different answers covering the same period are given by the company. On Thursday November 28, 1957 the company stated here in Ottawa that, during a given period, it has taken over 40 companies, of which 17 were subsidiaries. It protested against intending to control the market. Now then, in a letter and a brief dated August 7, 1958, having forgotten, too soon perhaps, its previous testimony, the company writes unhesitatingly that it has purchased 150 independent companies and bought part interests, in 29 others, during the same period of 1957. Quite edifying indeed.

An investigation would also enlighten us on the underhand dealings going on in Fort William and Port Arthur where the telephone utility, which is adequate and controlled by the municipal authorities, is constantly assaulted by the company.

An investigation on the dealings of the company in Dryden could enlighten us on the usefulness of the expenditures which were made. The same applies to a great number of areas. Only an investigation that would compel the company to appear before a committee of parliament would inform the population.

The company complains of having to support substantial development expenditures. An investigation would show whether the people from central Quebec and Ontario, especially where the telephone service is inadequate, are not paying for the invasions of the company.

The activities of the company in respect of the council of Jaffray-Melick, in Ontario, where the company set up lines without asking permission, should also be investigated.

We should also investigate and find out whether the profits of the company are not swallowed up by Northern Electric.

A quick survey around Montreal, Toronto and other large cities would reveal that the subscribers at Ste. Martine, Howick, St. Urbain, and a good many localities barely 30 miles from Montreal, are still using manual telephone sets in this the twentieth century. The issue was raised by Montreal newspapers, especially by La Presse. And how is the company operating where it will not even give adequate service?

Let us compare the revenues derived by the city of Kenora from its 4,000 long distance telephones—the Bell Telephone Company being excluded from that district—with the ones the city of Fort William or Port Arthur gets with more than 18,000 telephones, in an area covered by the Bell Telephone Company.

Let us read once more Arnold Edinbourgh's special report in Saturday Night on the waste of money involved in the construction of the mid-Canada line. You will see that the building company was the Bell Telephone Company and what a deadly feud developed between this company, converted all of a sudden into a contracting company —which is a line quite removed from its own—and the specialized services of the army and air force. An inquiry would perhaps disclose what objectives the Bell Telephone Company had in mind. Hundreds of millions of dollars were wasted.

What is the Bell company doing in Fort Francis, Ontario where each side of the streets is provided with a double service and where the calls are long distance calls even between citizens of the same area or community?

Since it is impossible to operate a school bus without permission from a provincial board; since all public services, are supervised and controlled by government agencies, whether it be shipping, air transport, radio or communications, it is unthinkable that there should be nothing of the sort for the Bell Telephone Company which hangs on to an 1880 charter giving fantastic power in 1961.

The Canadian Independent Telephone Association is a responsible organization with members all over Canada. At the October annual meeting in Toronto, a resolution was passed appointing a committee of three members one of whom is Mr. G. Laganiere. That committee is preparing a brief asking outright for a revision of those obsolete laws which today are complicating things, and requesting that the government give full and total jurisdiction to the board of transport commissioners for Canada.

We have had enough of such arrogance.

Public interest requires that such legal status be ended, certain powers were given this company for the benefit of Canada as a whole. For a long time now, it has not been discharging its duty to this country. It has not even been discharging it in Quebec and Ontario, except in larger centers. Even today, it neglects less profitable territories, even around large cities, in order to increase its revenues from long distance calls in the far north, knowing that other companies are operating there.

The Quebec and Ontario independent companies, whether private or municipally-owned, operate about 700 centrals and the Bell company 7,400. The telephone systems in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are independent from the company. The legend of the big company has lasted long enough. It left Alberta in 1906 and Manitoba in 1908, and it never existed in the other provinces. So, for a long time it has not been working "for the benefit of Canada" as a whole. The time has come to have this situation reflected in the law of the country and to restore some order in that field. Let us not forget that in 1885, the act protecting the Bell company was repealed for a time, and for a very simple reason: resentment had been stirred by the company's tardy progress in supplying the smaller rural and urban centers with the telephone. All the more reason then for this company today to busy itself improving such services as exist presently, and it will have enough to do. We might get better rates then and not be left any more at the mercy of that company.

Mr. Chairman, I have always been against public ownership. I would oppose the nationalization of that company, but I ask the government to consider the possibility of modifying the act so that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada may respect a little more the regulations of the board of transport commissioners and not act just as it pleases; it would be in the general interest of Canada as well as in the interest of those other companies to which I referred a moment ago.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to refer to the municipality of Repentigny, a progressive city located in the riding which I have the honour to represent here. I can assure you that the citizens of l'Assomption riding, including those of Repentigny, are disgusted with the treatment they got from the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

That company had known for a number of years that Repentigny, due to its geographic location, would become the most important suburban municipality immediately east of Montreal, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence.

Now in order to show to what lengths arrogance and despotism can go, let me say that the island of Montreal is almost perfectly oval. The island then is not circular. It has always been known that the suburban development is taking place around Montreal island, in municipalities connected with the island by the banks of the different rivers.

The Bell Telephone Company of Canada, in its offices on Beaver Hall Hill in Montreal, has outlined circles in its plans, probably with pencil and compasses, without considering the growth of those centers or the movement of the population. So the directors of this company made three circles there, with their compasses. This plan has become a holy document. Never mind the representations from the citizens of Repentigny. As a result, the telephone service developed according to a circle instead of an oval. I will spare you all other vexatious incidents in the building of the telephone exchanges and the whole history of the famous 15 mile radius.

Thus, the municipalities of St. Anne de Bellevue and of Repentigny, each at one end of the oval, are not inside the circle of direct communication with Montreal, said in unequivocal terms the officials of the company. Then started the fight over the telephone exchange. If the exchange were built within 15 miles from the compass point, which is at Beaver Hall Hill, my constituents could have direct telephone communication with Montreal, without having to pay long distance charges. Statistics show that the revenue from long distance calls adds up to an imposing figure.

The company bought a first piece of land, again outside the famous 15 mile radius. It bought a second piece of land, again outside the 15 mile radius. Carelessly as if to settle the case, the company without any hesitation even violated the municipal bylaws concerning town-planning, as well as construction and zoning bylaws, and even undertook construction and excavation in a residential zone without securing any permit from the municipal authorities of the town of Repentigny. A company executive even said that he did not give a hoot.

The municipal council, which I wish to commend and congratulate, an energetic and resolute council, supported and helped by the continued efforts of the chamber of commerce and other organizations, with the authority of its municipal bylaws and knowing well that no one in the country had any jurisdiction in that field, forced the officials of the Bell Telephone Company to stop the work already started without the consent of the municipal authorities.

I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that for once somebody dared raise his voice and resist the officials of that company which tries to dictate, without the slightest tactfulness, its own views to the Canadian people, including the people of Ontario and Quebec as well as those of Repentigny.

The citizens of Repentigny launched a great movement of national interest with the support of newspapers such as La Presse; they were everywhere at the same time demanding for the sake of justice and common sense, a complete revision of all acts concerning the Bell Telephone Company and asking the establishment of a royal or parliamentary commission.

The company developed some kind of service never heard of, I think, in North America, and odd to no end, probably in order to save face. At home it is called "one and a half direct service with Montreal". One may place a call from Repentigny, St. Anne de Bellevue or Belœil with Montreal without long distance call charges, but whoever wants to place a call from Montreal to any of those places must put through a long distance call. The company saved face, but it also increased its revenue from long distance calls.

In all this, believe it or not, no controlling body or commission has any jurisdiction over the decisions of the Bell Telephone Company. In fact, it does as it pleases. Mr. Chairman, can you imagine such arrogance and such disorderliness? As I said, no one has any jurisdiction. The 1880 charter is invoked. The Bell Telephone Company can do as it pleases. It can deny the residents of a given area the telephone service if it so wishes, even if the whole population asks for it.

I therefore urge that the act be amended. No one will have any cause to complain since all public utilities in the world come under the control of an administration or a commission. That way, we would do justice to the Canadian people and do away with a monopoly that everyone disapproves.

Mind you, Mr. Chairman, I am in favour of private enterprise. I would be against nationalization of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. On the other hand, we must recognize that that company treats its employees well; they are well paid. But I urge that the company be subject to the necessary requirements. And following all the quarrels between those concerned, the municipalities and the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, I submit that the best way to settle that problem would be to amend the act in order to compel the company to follow the instruction of the board of transport commissionners, just like transport operators and others have to obey their control regulations.

Mr. Tucker: I do not intend to speak at any great length, but I feel I should say how pleased I was to hear the Minister of Transport announce last Friday that the Department of Public Works would construct for the Department of Transport at Clarenville, Newfoundland, a marine haul-out and fitting-out wharf. This, the minister said, will permit the inspection and repair of ships up to 500 tons. I am sure that this release was welcomed not only by many of my constituents but also by many coastal boat owners in Newfoundland. I hope the haul-out at Clarenville will be so successful that the government will take steps to construct a similar one at Harbour Grace, Newfoundland.

I wish to make a few remarks at this time about some matters which are very important as far as the advancement of Newfoundland is concerned. Last year, speaking on the estimates of the Department of Transport, I made reference to the inadequate hotel accommodation at St. John's but to date there has been no improvement. As the Minister of Transport is aware, St. John's is the eastern terminal point of the Trans-Canada Air Lines, the trans-Canada highway, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National Steamships. It is also the terminal point of the Canadian National Railways Newfoundland services. We have very few modern hotels in St. John's. The largest is the Newfoundland hotel which is owned and operated by the Canadian National Railways. This hotel is not large enough to take care of the requirements of the people of Newfoundland, much less those of the travelling public from the Canadian mainland, the United States and Europe. The Newfoundland hotel does not provide sufficient facilities for the holding of conferences, conventions, dinners and so on. As a result, many of the functions which would otherwise be held in St. John's are held in some other city or town on the mainland.

In 1958 the Newfoundland hotel operated, after interest and depreciation had been allowed for, at a net profit of $153,224 and in 1959 it operated at a net profit of $152,039, making a total profit of $305,363 in two years. Last year again the hotel operated at a profit. We have heard a great deal in this house recently about tourism and our tourist trade especially when we were discussing the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. We heard much of the importance of learning more about and seeing more of our own provinces, yet we are unable to get the Canadian National Railways to improve conditions in the capital city of St. John's which has a population of more than 80,000 within a few miles radius. I believe the present minister is well aware of the existing conditions, but if he is not I suggest he visit the hotel and then take advantage of his trip to visit some of the other towns in my riding where he spent some time during the second world war and where, I am sure, he will receive a royal Newfoundland welcome.

As far as trade is concerned, historically, Newfoundland has in the past looked eastward to Europe rather than to the North American continent. Prior to 1949, the date of our entry into confederation with Canada, we sold our fish in the Mediterranean markets and the bulk of our imports came from Europe and the United Kingdom. These imports entered Newfoundland through the port of St. John's which was the main distribution centre for the province. A portion of the imports was consumed in St. John's and the surrounding area and a great deal of the remainder was transported to coastal communities in small coastal vessels and privately owned schooners. Only a small part of this merchandise was carried westward overland by rail. The Newfoundland Railway was built mainly for passenger service and to handle only a small fraction of our imports and national trade. Newfoundland is today Canada's third largest customer. The province purchases about $300 million worth of merchandise yearly from the mainland, mostly from central Canada. Since 1949 the old trading pattern has been reversed. Confederation made Newfoundland a captive market and the bulk of the goods now entering Newfoundland comes from mainland Canada. The western terminal of the Canadian National Railways is at Port aux Basques but very little of the freight remains there. Most of it is loaded on the Newfoundland Railway and the greater part is transported across the 547 mile stretch of railroad to the eastern terminal at St. John's. The population of Newfoundland has grown until it is now around the half million mark and it is about three times larger than it was when the railway was built. This growth in population has in itself increased the amount of freight to be handled.

The Newfoundland Railway was built to meet conditions which existed prior to Newfoundland becoming a part of Canada. The C.N.R. has renovated the Newfoundland Railway and tried to modernize it in the hope of enabling it to carry the additional load which is now about ten times as great as when the railway was built. The plain fact is that this cannot be done satisfactorily and money spent in this way is not being spent to the best advantage having regard to the future requirements of our people and the quality of service which they have a right to expect. What is needed is a completely new system of rail transportation. This should include the replacement of the present antiquated system by a system of standard gauge the same as is provided for every other province in Canada. The Prime Minister said in 1957 when he was in St. John's that he favoured a standard gauge railway for Newfoundland, according to a report in the Toronto Globe and Mail of April 16. I should like to quote the statement made at that time by the Prime Minister, reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of April 16, 1957, as follows:

> Newfoundland's narrow gauge railway should be converted to the standard gauge because the present line retards development, adds to the cost of transportation and therefore makes it more difficult for Newfoundland industries to compete in domestic mainland markets on the same basis as other provinces.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Those were very true words on the part of the Prime Minister. They have not been denied, and I should suggest that if he meant what he said, surely the time has long since passed when definite action should have been taken. I am sure the residents of the province of Newfoundland would appreciate a statement from the Minister of Transport in this regard.

Last Friday the Minister of Transport made a statement regarding government policy in respect of the Canadian shipbuilding industry, and said that subsidies of 40 per cent of the cost of building Canadian ships in Canada, other than fishing vessels, would be paid. This subsidy would be continued for three years, to March 31, 1962, and then reduced to 35 per cent of the cost. He also stated that a capital subsidy of 50 per cent of the construction cost would be paid in respect of steel hull trawlers, with special assistance of $250 per ton to be paid toward the cost of wooden fishing vessels over 45 feet in length. We in Newfoundland should like to see a subsidy paid in respect of boats 35 feet in length and over, and I would appeal to the minister to give consideration to this suggestion.

In 1958, 37,841 passengers were taken between the mainland and Port aux Basques. In 1959, there were 58,434 passengers carried on this same trip and in 1960 there were 62,011 passengers carried. In other words there was an increase of 24,170 in the number of passengers carried between 1958 and 1960 on this route.

In 1960 there were 11,652 passenger automobiles carried, which was an increase of more than 3,600 over the number carried in 1959. Approximately 300 more autos were handled last year under the freight plan than during the previous year. I suggest it follows naturally that many of the passengers in these cars motored to St. John's, the capital of Newfoundland, and I further suggest this points out the urgent need for additional freight and passenger service between the mainland and the east coast of Newfoundland. This subject was mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for St. John's East, and I offer my support of his suggestions in that regard.

At the present time, the Department of Public Works is improving the harbour facilities at St. John's, and I would suggest that a passenger, passenger car and freight ferry service could be established there without any additional cost for landing facilities. It is my opinion that this ferry service should operate from St. John's to Halifax because of the tremendous benefit to be derived therefrom, in that tourists would certainly take advantage of such a service. I understand the Department of Transport has this matter under study. As a matter of fact, the minister at page 4282 of Hansard for May 3, 1961 is reported to have said:

—in reply to the second part of the hon. member's question I cannot say at the present time when it is expected that the study will be completed.

I should hope that before much more time elapses the minister will make an announcement indicating that such a service will be provided.

The minister will recall that I made an appeal to him on several occasions during the months of March and April of this year regarding the provision of icebreakers to assist the sealing fleet operating off the northeast coast of Newfoundland. That fleet consisted of five vessels; four from Newfoundland and one from Nova Scotia. The assistance was urgently needed because an attempt was being made at that time to revive the sealing industry in that area, and it was felt at the time if this effort failed the industry in that area would be finished completely. To prevent the failure of this operation it was necessary for icebreakers to assist this fleet in penetrating the ice to the seal patch. Unusually severe ice conditions prevailed and these ships were at a disadvantage to the Norwegian ships and a Russian icebreaker. Experience has shown that our ships, though small, are sufficiently able under normal ice conditions to carry out this sealing operation.

The department supplied icebreakers enabling the sealing ships to get to open water off St. John's harbour early in March, shortly after they began their voyage, but the minister indicated that his department was unable to supply icebreakers to enable the sealing ships to reach the patch of seals. Consequently the seal hunt this year was almost a complete failure.

I should like to read an article which appeared in the St. John's Daily News on May 4, 1961 under the heading: "Better Sealing with The Breaker":

Captain Peter Troke of the sealer Arctic Eagle—

The ship was renamed. She was the Kyle when owned by the Department of Transport. The article continues:

—has said that if the Newfoundland sealing vessels could have had the services of a federal icebreaker for a longer period at the beginning of the sealing season in early March, the results of this year's hunt would be much better. The sealing fishery was a failure.

The Kyle was successful in docking at Bay Bulls yesterday after a month at the ice during which time she managed to take only about 2,000 pelts.

I suggest the minister should do one or both of two things regarding this situation. First, he should change the government's policy to enable this kind of assistance to be given to the sealing industry and build additional ice breakers for this purpose; second, provide special assistance under the new shipping policy regulations for the construction of ships that can be employed both at the seal fishery and in the coastal trade as well, because the seal fishing is only for a few weeks' duration. If icebreakers are provided for this purpose, I should suggest to the minister that a sealing captain be provided to assist the regular captain while breaking ice for the sealing fleet.

I can appreciate the difficulties which face the minister with regard to providing assistance this year, but in view of the circumstances which existed on the east coast of Newfoundland, I feel the department should have made special arrangements to assist the five Canadian vessels at the beginning of this sealing hunt. The individuals who initiated this attempted revival were the very courageous owners of the ships, and faced the possibility of having this industry taken over and operated by ships of foreign countries. I should be grateful to the minister if he would indicate why icebreakers could not be provided to this Canadian sealing fleet at a time when they were only ten miles from the sealing patches. If such assistance had been provided this seal hunt would not have failed, as it did.

In closing, I wish to offer my congratulations to the minister in his appointment to this very important portfolio, and to thank the minister and his officials, including the officials of the Canadian National Telegraph Company, for their help which has been readily extended to me in regard to problems concerning this department.

Mr. Jung: Mr. Chairman, before I begin my remarks may I also extend my congratulations to the minister on the assumption of the very heavy and responsible portfolio of Minister of Transport. Those of us who have come to know the minister have been impressed by his sympathetic interest and by the courtesy which he has shown to the private members, and we all wish him well in his new duties. I want to assure him of our co-operation.

Last year his predecessor invited a number of members of parliament from the east and west coasts to a meeting in Ottawa in connection with the establishment of a coastguard service. Representing as I do a very important seaport, I took advantage of the minister's invitation and I was very pleased to participate in those early discussions. I see that in this year's estimates provision has been made for the building of a number of cutters, two of which will be used on the west coast. I am sure that the mariners in British Columbia will welcome the announcement and I hope that marine search and rescue facilities along the west coast will be greatly improved by the addition of those two vessels.

I hope that when the designs are submitted for those cutters consideration will be given to the peculiar problems in weather and ocean conditions affecting the west coast. I hope that there will be the latest rescue equipment on board such as inflatable balloons which can be used to keep sinking vessels afloat until heavy rescue equipment can be brought up, which will prevent a recurrence of a certain tragic incident that we had last year on the west coast, and which might have been prevented if such equipment had been available.

The port of Vancouver is the busiest port in Canada, Mr. Chairman. I have the privilege of representing that part of Vancouver known as Vancouver Centre, which includes the major installations along the waterfront which extends for 98.2 miles. The national harbours board, in its annual report, said that in terms of ship activity Vancouver last year saw the arrival of 28,792 ships of all categories of which 1,771 were deep-sea or ocean-going vessels. Montreal in the same period saw the arrival of more deep-sea vessels, but her total ship arrivals numbered only 6,211.

I am quite proud of this shipping record for Vancouver especially when Vancouver is now the busiest wheat port in the world. The recent sale of wheat to communist China will add to Vancouver's leadership. Hon. members might be interested to know what the Vancouver Province had to say about this sale on May 3. The article on the front page of the Vancouver Province of that day carried the headline:

Huge grain sale to China means busy times for B.C. ports.

The article takes note of the record sale of grain to communist China and it goes on to say:

Just about everyone in B.C. will benefit from the big boom the sale will precipitate in deep-sea shipping.

Payrolls alone in the four B.C. ports will go up about $45 million in the next three years. The sale will bring 750 ships to B.C. ports. Vancouver handles 91 per cent of B.C.'s grain trade. The 750 ships represent almost half the total of 1,565 ships that came to Vancouver in 1960, a record year.

Carpenters will be needed to fit the ships; provisions will be purchased locally, and the visiting seamen will spend thousands more on shore.

Port officials estimate the community receives about $7.50 in wages and handling costs for every ton of grain shipped overseas. Under the agreement, five millions tons of wheat and one million tons of barley will be shipped from B.C.

All four ports will be operating at capacity for the next three years at least—a new test for all of them.

Vancouver has been the largest grain exporting port in the world for the last several years and will add to her leadership.

Shipments to Japan and other big buyers of Canadian grain in the port of Vancouver will not be affected.

Berthing facilities in Vancouver and New Westminster will be improved considerably this year to handle the new flow of shipping.

Funds have already been allocated for deepening the United Grain Growers' No. 3 jetty to 35 feet. This will also include new piling and virtual reconstruction of the pier.

The new suction dredge Fort Langley will be ready to go on the Fraser river in August.

This will assure the port of New Westminster a deeper channel and the cut to the grain elevators will be kept open for year round shipping.

B.C. ports are now handling an average of 17 million bushels of grain a month. When the new shipments begin this summer, an additional 7½ million bushels will be exported every month.

From what I have quoted from the Vancouver Province, it is obvious that Vancouver stands to gain very much from the increased port activity. I therefore want to place on record my gratitude and the gratitude of the people of Vancouver to the Minister of Agriculture, and indeed to this government, for the energetic efforts which have been expended in promoting foreign trade and sales.

Before world war II Vancouver was known as Canada's gateway to the Orient. This glamorous title faded a bit after the war, but I think this recent grain sale will give the necessary impetus to all concerned in Vancouver to do something about recapturing that position.

The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have indicated that the government intends to continue its efforts to increase foreign trade. If that is so, then I foresee a period in the near future when Vancouver will become not only the largest grain exporting port in the world but also the busiest port in the world. I am positive that that period will come, but it will not come if we sit back and wait for it. We must be sure that we shall have adequate harbour facilities, storage and staging areas, railway depots, adequate fire and police protection, sufficient power resources, and so on. Because all this requires planning on a huge and long range basis, I wish to suggest that the minister consider the advisability of creating a greater Vancouver port council. This port council should include representatives from the technical planning board of the city of Vancouver, the city of New Westminster, the city of North Vancouver, the board of trade, the national harbours board, and representatives from the Department of Trade and Commerce, the provincial government, transportation, which will include railways, shipping and air, and representatives from farm organizations and labour unions.

The need for such an organization was emphasized when the Minister of Agriculture was recently in Vancouver discussing with various officials the problem of getting out the wheat to China. On March 6 and 7 of this year, the Minister of Agriculture invited representatives from the railways, grain exchanges, shipping federations, union officials, the national harbours board, and the Canadian wheat board to a meeting, and he stated that he hoped, through the co-operation of these organizations, methods of increasing the movement of grain through Pacific coast ports would be worked out.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the port council should decide as its objective to make Vancouver the finest harbour in the world and then proceed to draw up the necessary plans to develop Vancouver along those lines. Obviously, no one organization will be able to do this and it would be quite futile to have magnificent harbour and industrial facilities if there were nothing to make use of these facilities. The port council should therefore also put forward a very vigorous effort to attract industry to the Vancouver area, and this is where the board of trade can come in. At the same time, I suggest that labour unions should be prepared to offer a period of stability in labour relations in order not to discourage industrial prospects. The provincial and federal governments should be prepared to grant tax concessions as an inducement to industry to locate in the Vancouver area. The municipal authorities should, through their technical planning board, make sure that there are sufficient areas set aside for industrial development.

As I have said before, this would be a tremendous undertaking and the results would not be immediately apparent. None the less, I suggest that the time has come when an organization such as I have envisaged should be created. The representatives of this port council must be prepared to use their imagination and to look ahead to the tremendous trade opportunities which lie across the horizon. At the same time we should not forget that, apart from the basic industries of British Columbia, the other major industries are situated in eastern Canada and those industries should be encouraged to start planning for the time when we will be able to take full advantage of trade across the Pacific.

The national harbours board, which is under the direction of the Minister of Transport, is in a good position to initiate this project. With official recognition from the minister, I am sure that we will have an instant response from responsible leaders of the business community in Vancouver. I took the liberty of writing to the port manager of the national harbours board, Vancouver, and asking for further information which would help me prepare a speech in this connection. I today received a reply from Captain Johnson, the port manager, which is as follows:

My dear Mr. Jung:

We thank you very much indeed for your letter on May 12, 1961 requesting certain information from this port in order that you may formulate your speech.

We are very much interested in your request and feel that it should be treated with the fullest concern and therefore it has been turned over to our port promotion and information department.

If you have an early deadline for this information, would you please wire this office collect and let us know what that date is and we will endeavour to rush the information to you, if necessary.

Again thanking you for your interest in this port,

Yours very truly,
B. D. L. Johnson
Port Manager

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, I have not had the time to get this information from the board because I did not know I would be speaking so soon. Nevertheless, I feel this is a project which should receive sympathetic consideration and I commend this proposal to the minister. I suggest that consideration be given to convening a preliminary meeting of this organization, and, initially, this meeting might be on a voluntary and co-operative basis. Should these initial meetings prove successful, then we might consider expanding the present national harbours board in Vancouver into a larger organization known as the greater Vancouver harbour port authority, to enable it to discharge the responsibilities which I have listed.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, we have nothing to lose and everything to gain by holding exploratory talks along the lines I have suggested.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, even if I come very late, I should like to join all the previous speakers in offering my congratulations to the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) who has stepped into the shoes of men such as the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), the former hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount and his predecessor, now heading the Department of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees).

Some of my colleagues in this house who do not belong to the same party as I do, often attack that man—I am embarrassed to see him here because I would have liked to say in his absence what I think of him. Some of my colleagues often attack the former minister of transport, now, the hon. member for Laurier, because he now represents a Quebec riding.

I find it really distressing that hon. members from my own province should make an exhibition of themselves in front of hon. members from the nine other provinces of this country, and wash their dirty linen in front of everybody, in this House of Commons.

The hon. member for Laurier associated his name with one of the largest Canadian undertakings, namely the St. Lawrence seaway. I am sure that that enterprise will have deep effects on the whole economy of our country, and, as a matter of fact those economic effects have already been felt in Canada.

Many years ago he started personal studies of the seaway project. He even sacrificed himself when the then prime minister of Canada, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, asked him to accept the presidency of the seaway authority. It was a sacrifice for him, but at the same time he built something for his country.

I am sorry to see some of my colleagues who are trying to ruin his reputation by mean accusations. Their efforts are vain because we are standing by him and we will see to it that the people have a true knowledge of this man.

The present Minister of Transport also succeeded to one of my former bosses, Mr. Marler, who, I think, because I worked almost three years under him, did something for his country. He was not a politician, he was a businessman. He devoted all his heart, all his soul and all his intelligence to his country. He had a great intelligence and understood the problems of the nation.

The present incumbent of the office succeeded to the now Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I must say, without any intended reflection on his predecessor, that even though the present minister does not smile as easily, I am sure that he has the same devotion to his office and the same sincere desire to discharge his duty. I wish to congratulate him and wish him well, and above all, I hope he will understand the problems faced by all ten provinces in this country.

In the next few minutes, I would like to bring to his attention some problems of my area. In doing so I am inspired more by love for my district than by my allegiance to my political party.

Some who came before me and who did not have my political convictions have already talked on behalf of what I want to ask the minister.

The hon. member for Chicoutimi suggested it long before me, and so did the mayor of Chicoutimi, I am referring to the dredging of the Saguenay river.

For four years, we have been trying to attract foreign industries. We are told that because of a lack of transportation, our situation is slightly unfavourable. Through the Department of Transport, I would like to spur the interest of the national harbours board in the Saguenay river.

We need new industries in our district. We need them because the heavy industries established in our parts had to lay off a number of employees due partly to a deterioration of our foreign market and partly to industrial automation. Those men have become experts and specialized labour, trained for heavy industry, the large industry, the electro-chemical industry. There is in our district a potential labour force which would like nothing better than to contribute to the development of the area while honourably earning their families' living.

I ask the Minister of Transport to examine that problem and not to take two or three years before putting in his estimates a vote for the dredging of the Saguenay river which, even though it does not flow through my riding, belongs to my district. I feel that a member when he is talking must forget about being re-elected and bear in mind above all the welfare of the whole district surrounding his constituency.

I am sure the hon. members for Lake St. John (Mr. Parizeau) and for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) share that opinion and that one day they will speak out in this house, not because I advocated it nor because the hon. member for Chicoutimi advocated it, but because they love their region and want the common good of the community in which they live. The Lake St. John region is one of the most promising in Canada. Indeed, it has already done a great deal.

We have at Passe Dangereuse or Chute des Passes, a power station which generates one million horsepower. Shipshaw is one of the most productive power stations. We have the aluminum industry, the Price Brothers mills, the Consolidated Paper mills and the Lake St. John Paper mills in Dolbeau. The possibilities of that region are almost unlimited, if we would just help a little in the field of navigation.

The Minister of Transport is, I know, familiar with navigation, since he lives in Three Rivers. I do not have to tell him the importance of navigation on the development of a given district.

More than half of our population is under 21. That, I think, is exceptional. Our young people want to work. Every year, young people come out of technical schools and others, enter the abour market only to find that there are no opportunities for them. The government must show some interest in the matter and look after us; it could start by deepening the Saguenay river.

In another county there is another problem to which the hon. member for Chicoutimi has already referred: the St. Honore airport.

On several occasions, I have asked the minister's predecessor to try to do something in that connection.

The Department of Transport often states, and quite rightly, that it is interested in the development of civil aviation in Canada. According to the high officials and technicians of the department, the landing strips at that airport are in an exceptionally good condition considering the length of time the airport has not been used. At one time, I asked for a report on the matter. I know that the minister is extremely busy and that the administration of his department forces him to cover all sectors of the country's economy, but since I have received no report, I would like to know once and for all whether something definite could be done for the St. Honore airport and for the development of civil aviation in my area.

Investigations were carried out and the results were never made known to me. I do not usually speak like this in the house but I have been referring to this matter of the St. Honore airport for at least three years; my colleague from Chicoutimi is just as interested in the matter as I am, if not more so, and I would like the minister to see that his officials tell us definitely what they think of the whole matter and what the department can do about it.

There is another problem which is causing me concern just as it does to other members of my area, I am sure, namely the possible combination of the C.N.R. express and freight services. In the past three or four months, I have met several employees who have heard of such a combination of services which, I am told, would be conductive to many lay-offs.

If the only people affected were those 24, 25, 28 or 30 years of age, I might understand the situation, but when the situation affects people who have worked 30 to 35 years for a public concern such as the C.N.R., who had a special training in a particular field, how can we expect those people to find employment elsewhere when for most of their life they have practised a trade which has no equivalent in other fields of private enterprise?

There is a human problem there that must be considered and I ask the Minister of Transport to take this up with the president of the C.N.R. I know, having worked in that department, that he might reply that the matter is entirely up to the C.N.R.; but I know of people who, when they used to sit on this side of the house, had rather bitter words for us about the whole problem of railway management. They are in power now. They are in—perhaps I should say they are "all in", Mr. Chairman, considering the way they act. They are in there, and if they remember what they said at the time they sat on this side of the house, if they are sincere, and I have no doubt they are, let them try their luck with the C.N.R.'s representatives and discuss, not only the economic problem, but also the human problem.

My colleague from Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) referred to the Soulanges canal lands. First of all, I do not have all the facts relating to this Soulanges canal. I know one thing, however, and in this regard I leave out of consideration my political affiliation with those who are in Quebec city, but I know what they intend to do with the Soulanges canal, and the minister also knows, I am sure, because they have written to him. Besides, the minister of youth and the minister of game and fisheries have publicly stated the aims they would pursue if the province could acquire the Soulanges canal.

I am a little sorry that the member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Bourbonnais)—I did not know about it, it was my colleague from Maisonneuve-Rosemont who told me this afternoon—should have been the only one, according to the letter he published in a newspaper, to oppose the general welfare policy of the Quebec government.

When it is a question of our province, it seems to me that we could at least follow in the footsteps of our colleagues from other parts of Canada who, whatever their political affiliation, always agree as regards the general welfare of their own province.

Whether we are Liberals, Conservatives, members of the C.C.F. group, or independents, whenever the common welfare of a province is at stake, we should forget our particular political allegiance. And, if the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges does not understand it, I hope that—even if he does not understand its platform—he will have enough regard for his own party to work for its re-election by favouring a policy which would benefit the citizens of our province. That is what I expect of those in authority, not only for my own province, but for every province in this country.

I want to say a few words about our merchant fleet. We heard so much about our merchant marine from the hon. gentleman who today heads the Department of External Affairs. When I was in the Department of Transport, I heard him make many a speech about our commercial fleet. He left almost nothing unsaid against the former ministers of transport with regard to our merchant navy.

One might have expected that, when the Conservatives would be in power, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs would be appointed minister of transport, so that he could practise what he had preached. But no, he was first appointed to public works, and then to external affairs. Moreover, instead of improving our shipping, they were satisfied to use the few remaining ships of the Canadian National Railways.

Recently, the Minister of Transport—and I must congratulate him for it—announced a new departmental policy on shipbuilding in Canada. However, two or three days afterwards, or even the very next day, the Minister of Veterans Affairs went on a trip to western Canada where, it seems, a by-election is going on, and said: "Our merchant marine is adequate to transport the wheat we sold to communist China."

But for over four years now the Conservatives have been managing the affairs of this country. And yet, that was one of the great promises made to Canadian voters. Today we are told: "We shall have a merchant marine when the need arises." Either they were sincere or naive when they were accusing us of having no merchant marine. I hope they were sincere. But, when I consider what happened in those four years I have my doubts about their naiveté.

Before resuming my seat, I should like to suggest to the minister—and this will be doing him a service because there are so few of us who think of helping him, poor man—that his department has become too important a body, affecting too many sectors of our economy, to be under the authority of only one man.

It is not that I do not find the present minister intelligent—and I am saying this seriously—but there is much talk about civil aviation and I think it is high time provision were made for a separate civil aviation division in the department. Or else let a new department be set up, if it is more agreeable to the minister, or perhaps Conservative members will have a more attractive suggestion. But let that department be divided. It is becoming too big; it affects too many sectors of our economy, for only one man to handle everything. I worked there for three months and I realized to what extent civil servants are devoted and competent in their field.

Besides, the minister must have realized this, since the time he has been there. At least I hope so. If he wants to prove to us he understands to what extent the Department of Transport is important to Canada, if he wants to give us concrete evidence that he understands that civil aviation is in constant development, and that the things of tomorrow are nearly those of today, I hope he will convince his colleagues of the cabinet that a department of civil aviation is imperative. It seems the minister just said a few words about that.

Mr. Balcer: Do you want half of it?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I lack that ability. But my colleague from Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) will accept it eagerly. Just the same, I rely on the minister, knowing that his officials are working so hard in the department. I have seen them at work and I have known them. If he fails to think of his men, we want to tell him about it. I hope he is working hard as a minister. Therefore, let him think of himself, and it will help him convince his colleagues in the cabinet.

I have been listening with close attention to my colleague from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) who expressed certain grievances against the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. I am not aware of the facts he quoted to the house, but I can tell him one thing. I had occasion not too long ago to meet the directors of one of Canada's largest firms, and I well remember them asking me this question: "What do you think of this service?" I said: "I am no more in favour of socialism than you are, but what do you want? What are you doing to avoid it? You complain about having no say in the administration of your country or province, but what have you done to deserve it?"

I realize that a company director or president cannot be expected to resign from an industry to go into active politics. One thing I fail to understand, however, is that too many people are engaged in small private businesses and fail to realize that apart from active politics, they can have meetings with the people responsible for running the country or province. But they have no time for that; people often complain that they have no time for politics, but if they wait another five or ten years, many of those now in private enterprise will have no time for politics because they will all be civil servants.

Private enterprise must realize that it has a great part to play in the economy of our province and country. Gone are the days when politics could be left to anyone, to the demagogues or those who are motivated by one thing only: personal interest.

Mr. Chairman, I have been wandering a bit, but coming back to the point, I should like to remind the minister of the Saguenay waterway scheme. I hope he will look into it. I see he is smiling; I have confidence in his smile. I again urge him to consider my area.

Mr. Balcer: Do you expect me to cry?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I hope he will consider my area. In that way, he will be helping the economy generally. In considering other areas, he will be helping the economy of every province and of the country as a whole. That is my request to a man who is now vested with the authority of the Minister of Transport.

(Text):

Mr. Broome: Before coming to the substance of my remarks I should like to pay a compliment to the Minister of Transport. I do not mean this as empty words. I believe sincerely that the minister has taken hold of this department and is giving it leadership which is second to none. He is a strong man, and he is worthy of all the compliments I can pay him. He may not get up and perform a lot of histrionics in the house but in the solid work of running a large department of government the hon. minister has few peers. While I am saying a few "thank you's" I should also say how grateful I am to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate for the gracious things he said last Wednesday.

I should like to talk about air lines, particularly. Many aspects of the work of this department are of importance to my province and to my area but the air lines is one of the most important of the fields which concerns us. I should like to refer to the current annual statement of Trans-Canada Air Lines and to quote from this statement, not at length but here and there, in order to make a few points. On the first page it states:

> Revenue growth started slowly reflecting the changed competitive situation. There was, however, marked acceleration in the latter half of the year under the stimulus of new equipment and lower Atlantic fares.

When you look at the table accompanying this statement you find that revenue from Atlantic fares did rise by 25 per cent but domestic revenue went up by 10 per cent also, which would appear to be a reasonably large increase. Checking over the balance sheet you find that capital commitments and contingent liabilities reflecting a balance of payment for equipment and construction amount to some $35 million. Of course, the fact that this air line has had a deficit for the first time in a good many years has been mentioned many times in this house. A deficit of some $2,600,000 has been mentioned but I have not yet heard anybody say anything with regard to the surplus. The balance sheet as of January 1, 1960, showed a surplus of $6,800,000, all of which disappeared this year. An explanation is given in a note on page 7 which says:

> The surplus balance of $6,842,000 has been appropriated to establish a reserve against anticipated net differences between book value and the amount realized on the disposal of the piston engine fleets, their major components and supporting inventory.

Further on, the report points out that T.C.A. is the seventh largest air line in the world. As such, it should certainly be of a size to enable it to take advantage of the efficiency which comes from a large operation to operate at a profit. Perhaps we are paying a high price for the prestige of having the first all turbine fleet in the world. Perhaps we are paying a high price for forcing the obsolescence of aircraft such as 12 super constellations. All that surplus of 1960 disappeared because of the fact that these aircraft have not been in service long enough for the normal depreciation to take place to take care of the difference between their normal sale value and what the book value shows. This is where the surplus went.

I am also interested in looking at the timetable of T.C.A. overseas services. Under the T.C.A.-B.O.A.C. agreement are listed some 22 flights each way weekly over the Atlantic, 22 by T.C.A. and 22 by B.O.A.C. If you refer to the Aeronautics Act, part II, chapter 2, you will find, Mr. Chairman, that in section 15, subsection 7 it says:

> The board shall upon application grant to Trans-Canada Air Lines a licence to operate a commercial air service under such terms and subject to such conditions as will enable Trans-Canada Air Lines to perform any agreement made under sections 15 or 24 between the Minister of Transport and Trans-Canada Air Lines or between the Minister of Transport and any corporation created under section 19 of the act.

We have an anomaly here. We have an air transport board which is supposed to exercise control over air transportation in Canada, yet this board cannot control the operations of T.C.A. at the present time. Today the board is obliged to issue to T.C.A. without any hearing, public or otherwise, such licences as T.C.A. may require. Thus, in the absence of licensing power over T.C.A., the board is deprived of the normal controls relating to licensing which it exercises over all other scheduled carriers. The fact that T.C.A. services are covered by one licence means that T.C.A. can adapt and amend its schedules or flights in any pattern it wishes in order to cover those points. It is only when the company wishes to reach a new city or to extend to a location which it had not covered before that there is any vestige of control over this air line.

How does this affect other air lines? Other air lines have individual licences covering each route and they cannot make any changes without consent. For example, Canadian Pacific Air Lines has a licence to fly Vancouver-Edmonton-Amsterdam. Canadian Pacific Air Lines also has a licence to fly Vancouver-Penticton-Castlegar-Cranbrook-Calgary. But Canadian Pacific Air Lines cannot fly Vancouver-Calgary-Amsterdam because a licence to land and take off at Calgary is not part of the overseas licence issued to them. I contend that Trans-Canada Air Lines should have to show cause when they wish to fly over new routes. They should have to show that there is public necessity for such flights. The president of that air line said at a hearing in Ottawa some two years ago that he would be willing to fly his planes empty beside a competing carrier in order to drive that carrier out of business. This should not be possible.

We have a condition now where advertisements are appearing in Vancouver newspapers advertising flights by United States air lines to Europe. West coast people who wish to travel to Europe now fly by American air line because they can fly directly from Seattle to London which is the destination of most west coast passengers going overseas. Canadian Pacific Air Lines, one of our flag carriers, cannot do this. It cannot fly Vancouver-Edmonton-London. It must fly to Amsterdam, and then those passengers whose destination is London complete their journey on the K.L.M. system. Much of the traffic has been forced to United States air lines as a result of this situation. This situation has not helped Trans-Canada Air Lines. If it had, why would there now be 22 flights a week across the Atlantic by B.O.A.C. and 22 flights by T.C.A.?

It seems all right to have this competition between air line carriers operating out of Toronto and Montreal to London, but it is not all right according to T.C.A. and the air transport board, that our own second flag carrier should operate from the west coast to London over a route which was pioneered by that company—I refer to the polar route—although T.C.A. announced some weeks ago that it intended to fly that route. I understand that T.C.A. did not have to apply for permission to do so because it was able to land at cities for which it already has licences. It just simply announced it was going to fly the polar route.

The government, through the former minister, as well as the present minister, announced that competition was to be controlled to the best interests of both carriers, but I suggest that competition is only controlled in regard to one; the other not being subject to the same control. The other carrier could make 50 flights per week if it wished to do so in order to give a frequency of service to drive its competition out of business even though this might result in a severe financial drain on the federal treasury.

I have in my hand a Trans-Canada Air Lines advertisement regarding trans-Canada and overseas flights. The paragraph appearing at the bottom of this advertisement reads as follows:

Also through jet flights from Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Cleveland and Halifax to Shannon, Glasgow and London.

The only sensible control on competition should have regard to regulations requiring air lines to plan their flights in such a way as to meet reasonable traffic demands, having regard to public convenience and economic considerations. The contention of hon. members from the west—I mean British Columbia when I say "the west"—has been that competing carriers should share in the growth of air line traffic, and not that one carrier should consider all growth to belong to it.

Trans-Canada Air Lines occupies a dominant position in eastern Canada passenger traffic and would, I suggest, still have 80 per cent of all traffic growth in the country, but the remaining 20 per cent increase, which exists generally in the west, represents a portion of passenger traffic in which C.P.A. should share.

I suggest the establishment of an all turbine fleet has involved a very high cost. This is particularly so because of the fact that 12 super constellations now sit in mothballs, although they still had considerable service life. The lost from the sale of these 12 super constellations has undoubtedly accounted, in large part, for the elimination of the $6 million surplus which existed on January 1, 1960, but which does not exist today.

Mr. Chairman, I intend now to refer to the Wheatcroft report. I suggest it has reference to this department's estimates because it was following this report that the competition situation was opened for review.

Mr. Wheatcroft stated that the advantages of air line competition were: (a) more adequate service; (b) more efficient service; (c) more rapid technological progress; (d) more rapid traffic development; (e) a yardstick of efficiency, as no other method had yet been devised to achieve this as effectively as direct comparisons between competitive companies serving the same markets; and (f) the satisfaction of choice.

Hon. members who have travelled across the country by air will realize the drastic improvement which has been made during the last two years. I suggest that the travelling public has demanded this improvement, and has benefited from this competition. Mr. Wheatcroft also stated that the advantages of competition would be justified only if they did not involve a significant increase in the unit cost level of providing the air service. I think that is an important statement.

Mr. Wheatcroft pointed out, at the time of this report some two years ago, that the size of Trans-Canada Air Lines, at 270 million available ton miles per year, was well over the economy of scale size of about 150 million available ton miles per year. On the other hand, he observed that Canadian Pacific Air Lines, at 66 million available ton miles per year, was well below the level at which it could enjoy all the economies of large scale operations. The comparable figures for 1959, in this regard are, T.C.A., 357 million available ton miles per year, and C.P.A., 97 million available ton miles per year.

The figures I have mentioned, taken from Mr. Wheatcroft's report, bear out a statement made in the Trans-Canada Air Lines annual report, that it is now the seventh largest air carrier in the world. I suggest this is of great credit to previous governments, to the present government, and to the personnel of the air line itself. However, at the same time as this statement is made, the officials of Trans-Canada Air Lines profess concern because of the competition of one transcontinental flight per day by the second Canadian flag air line. Those officials are also worried about the result of allowing one Canadian flag carrier, out of approximately six air lines flying from Canada to London, to land in that city. I should like to present a few examples of how this competitive air line is treated.

Canadian Pacific Air Lines flies a route from Vancouver to Mexico city, to Toronto and Montreal, but is not allowed to carry traffic between Toronto and Montreal. This is the same as Canada's treatment of foreign carriers. Canadian Pacific Air Lines is apparently subject to the same regulations which apply to foreign carriers. At one time, during the regime of the previous government, this company could not fly into Edmonton, but had to land at Yellowknife, making it more difficult for people to use this service. The present government has changed that situation and allows C.P.A. to land at Edmonton. However, a passenger, under present regulations, cannot travel from Vancouver to Edmonton by Canadian Pacific Air Lines, although that air line flies from Vancouver to Edmonton to Amsterdam. That is how Canadian Pacific Air Lines is being treated, as if it were a foreign and not a Canadian carrier. That air line should be able to fly Vancouver-Edmonton-Amsterdam and on other days Vancouver-Calgary-Amsterdam, and carry passengers between Canadian points.

On the other hand, Trans-Canada Air Lines is allowed to change its routes at will. I would suggest that if T.C.A. would devote half the effort which it is now putting into fighting this other Canadian air line toward improving its service and developing and extending their lines into the United States and tapping the markets which they have not yet tapped, it would be much better for both air lines.

Other members from British Columbia will have something to say on this subject. I am sure they will be touching other areas in addition to the areas I have covered in order to indicate that some changes must be made in the operations of the air transport board and of Trans-Canada Air Lines, which will make the board a functioning board and which will bring the government's own lines under the same rules and regulations that apply to other lines. This is the first essential. The second essential is that the private operator should not have to have this ridiculous dog's leg arrangement to Amsterdam and then through K.L.M. to London, but should fly there direct and thus stop feeding Canadian passengers to United States air lines because a Canadian air line cannot give the same service.

Canadian Pacific Air Lines is equally worthy of support, and equally worthy of commendation because of the job it has done in building up a rag-tag of routes around the world, which were not wanted by T.C.A. and which in many instances they had to negotiate themselves, into an outstanding world air carrier.

I have heard that negotiations have been going on between T.C.A. and Japan Air Lines, in regard to onward passengers from within Canada going to Tokyo, whereby the government air line would direct traffic from C.P.A. to a foreign carrier, something like the B.O.A.C.-T.C.A. agreement. The same thing, of course, could be done with respect to Hawaii or any of the points reached at the present time by Canadian Pacific Air Lines.

The thing is, Mr. Chairman, these two companies must work in co-operation; they must work in the best interests of both companies, and this can only be done by government regulations. What hurts one is equally bad as what hurts the other. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say I am glad we have as head of the Department of Transport a minister who is willing to really get in and work on the problems which beset his department. I do hope that before too long he will be able to give some relief to a company which is a tremendous dollar earner for Canada, a tremendous producer of revenue from foreign lands, and which is one of the finest and best operations on the west coast, a company which has a major place in the over-all economy of the west coast.

Mr. Lessard: Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Chairman, I would be remiss in failing to say a few words on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Transport.

A number of important and urgent projects of benefit to greater Montreal have been put forward by various members of the opposition, and particularly by the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Messrs. Chevrier and Deschatelets). I shall deal only with the more important ones.

The first one concerns the construction of a bridge in eastern Montreal. I think the minister recognizes the need, as this is an absolute must.

The second project is the use of C.N.R. land for the erection of east-west elevated highways.

The third concerns improvements to the port of Montreal, and particularly the development of a miniature park to allow local citizens and tourists to gain entrance to the port.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are urgent and necessary projects, of interest both to the federal government and to the Montreal authorities.

Mr. Chairman, apart from sitting in this house as member for St. Henry, I sit as member of the Montreal city council. I have often wondered what should be done to facilitate the implementation of those three schemes, which are so important for the economic development of Montreal.

In reply to a question I raised this morning concerning the erection of the elevated east-west highway, the Minister of Transport said he had received a brief from the city, about a month or five weeks ago. This was news to me.

I do not think such long distance discussions are a proper approach to our mutual problems. In that connection, I have a suggestion for the minister, and I hope he will give it serious consideration.

In dealing with such important schemes involving both the city of Montreal and the government at Ottawa, perhaps it might be helpful to set up a joint committee made up of a few city councillors and officials of the national harbours board, who could study the schemes and report to the minister.

I think this suggestion might facilitate and hasten the implementation of important works, if we want Montreal to remain the metropolis of Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, first of all, along with other members, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister on his appointment, not only because it is customary to do so but because I believe that in the time he has been minister he has already proved himself to be extremely capable. I know that his tenure of office is going to be a very valuable one to the transportation industry.

I want to say a few things tonight about transportation policy as it relates to labour relations. There will be some aspects of my remarks that, perhaps, will be of concern to the Minister of Labour as well, but I feel they are more directly related to the field of transportation than they are to labour. I do not wish to rehash all the things that happened during the recent threatened railway strike. However, I believe that the positions that were taken by the various political parties at that time are of concern at the present time and will be more so in the future. This is one of those occasions when we have been able to get the opposition parties to state their policy and take a position with regard to it.

The committee will recall that when we were threatened with a strike the government took the position that collective bargaining should be the means of settling it and that they did not propose to offer any subsidy to cover wages. These were the two main statements that were made by the government. On the other hand, the position of the Liberal party has been quite clear for some time. When there was a railway strike in 1950, they imposed compulsory arbitration and advocated the same thing during the present situation. Then, we had the position taken by the C.C.F. party which advocated a subsidy to cover the wages of the railway employees. I thought that was a rather surprising position for that party to take because, over the years, they have always claimed that they were the spokesmen for labour in this country. I have never agreed with that view. I believe the actions they have taken in this regard prove substantially that they speak for special interests only. I would suggest they probably speak for those sections of organized labour which happen to contribute to funds for their party.

On other occasions when we have had protests made by unions, the C.C.F. group was very quick in bringing them to our attention. However, there was one protest that came from the employees of the trucking industry about which I have heard absolutely nothing from that party. While they were advocating a subsidy for wages of 111,000 railway employees, there were 90,000 employees in the trucking industry who were entirely opposed to such a policy. I think the action they took in recommending a subsidy for one segment of labour was a very wrong one.

I should like to bring to the attention of the committee a resolution that was passed by the Canadian conference of teamsters and sent to the Prime Minister. It reads as follows:

We, the undersigned truck drivers and employees of the trucking industry of the Dominion of Canada, are most violently opposed to past subsidies, and the proposed future subsidies granted to the Canadian railroads, which are to come out of public funds to the extent of better than six dollars per head. We therefore endorse the following resolution to be submitted to your government for immediate action:

Whereas: the Canadian government, over the past years has donated to the two Canadian railways, through subsidies, many millions of dollars out of the public treasury, and

Whereas: over the period of time during which the railroads have been receiving these millions of dollars, the same two railroads have been instituting non-profitable practices, such as: agreed charges on bulk commodities, at rates far below their operating costs, and piggy-backing at rates much lower than the recognized tariff rates, and

Whereas: both these practices place the trucking industry of the Dominion of Canada in an extremely difficult position, which will eventually eliminate many trucking companies, and

Whereas: through agreed charges, hundreds of truck drivers and trucking employees have been displaced, to further aggravate the unemployment situation, and

Whereas: during the past ten years, while the railroads have been receiving millions of dollars of public funds, the same railroads have been buying up truck lines to a point where they now control truck lines from coast to coast, at the expense of the public, and which, in a very short period of time, will result in a monopoly of the transportation industry such as existed before the trucking industry came into existence, and

Whereas: no other industry in the Dominion of Canada, under our private enterprise system of business, has been given the privilege of operating and paying dividends consistently from the public treasury.

Therefore be it resolved that the government of the Dominion of Canada cease the practice of making donations or subsidies to the Canadian railways, and be it

Further resolved that the government of the Dominion of Canada implement controlled minimum transportation rates and regulations which will allow all types of transportation a fair existence, to the common interest of the general public of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Winch: That is what I pointed out this afternoon.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): That was not the position taken by the hon. member's party during the debates. I wanted to bring to the attention of the committee that when we consider a subsidy for wages, we must recognize that it is unfair to subsidize one group of employees when another group might well be affected.

Further, in relation to the labour question that has arisen and the positions that have been taken by the parties may I say this. The government has taken the position that collective bargaining should be allowed to take its course and that it should be the means of settling disputes. However, I should like to point out that the railroads have now gone very substantially into the trucking business. In fact, the Canadian Pacific Railway is the largest trucking organization in Canada and the Canadian National Railways operate the second largest trucking operation in Canada. The Canadian Pacific Railway has now started upon a course of integrating all of their trucking operations with their rail operations. They started this policy first of all in the province of British Columbia where they were operating several truck lines. They were operating Canadian Pacific Transport, O.K. Valley Freight Lines, Island Freight Service and a number of others. They have decided to join those lines all into one organization known as Canadian Pacific Merchandise Services Limited and they have indicated their intention to pursue that policy all across Canada. All of their trucking operations will eventually be integrated into Canadian Pacific Merchandise Services and will comprise some 9,000 employees.

When this happened and this new organization was set up there, of course, had to be some bargaining agent for the employees of that organization. The teamsters' union went around and signed up a majority of the employees of Canadian Pacific Merchandise Services and applied for certification to the Canada labour relations board. The board told them that this was not an appropriate bargaining unit and that the people could not belong to the teamsters' union but must join one of the railroad brotherhoods even though some of the employees involved had previously belonged to the teamsters' union.

The point I wish to make in this regard is that if this policy is going to be pursued all across Canada, with the tremendous hold that the railways are getting upon the trucking industry it is going to mean that we are going to have all of our transportation services tied up under one union. If the government feels that we are to have collective bargaining I would suggest that the policy which should be followed is that those in the trucking industry should not be in the same union as those in the railroads, so that they would not all be tied up at the same time. I think that the Canada labour relations board were wrong in the decision they made at that time.

I have here a copy of the evidence that was taken at that time setting out clearly the intentions of the railroad. Not only do they intend to integrate all their services but they make it clear that they are out to compete with the trucking industry. I am quoting now from the evidence of Mr. Jacobson who was a witness for the Canadian Pacific Railway in the matter and I am referring to page 58 of the evidence before the Canada labour relations board on Wednesday, July 13, 1960. The chairman of the labour relations board had asked a question of Mr. Jacobson who was testifying. He asked this question:

Q. The purpose of Canadian Pacific acquiring these subsidiary trucking lines was so that they would use the rail services or the road services according to how it might fit into the total picture; was that the purpose?

The answer given by Mr. Jacobson was:

A. Primarily the purpose was to engage in competition in the truck transporting industry over the highway—

That makes it clear that the railroads have set out on a policy to control the trucking industry and I believe that they have made substantial headway in that regard. As I have already pointed out, the C.P.R. is the largest trucking operator in Canada and the C.N.R. is the second largest one. I do not think that anybody in this country would wish to see the railroads get back into the monopoly position which they had for 100 years in this country. Every royal commission over the last number of years has come to the conclusion that the one factor that has helped in bringing down freight rates has been competition. If the alternative means of transportation are to be controlled by the railways, I suggest there cannot then be that degree of competition which otherwise would exist. I believe this is something that must command the immediate attention of the government because there really has not been any inquiry made into it. Trucking generally has been left in the hands of the provinces and there has really been no authority on the part of royal commissions to go to the lengths that are necessary in order to determine just exactly what the position is.

I have raised this matter on two or three occasions previously, but I believe it is far more serious now than it has been in the past, particularly when we relate it to the decisions that have been given by the Canada labour relations board so that we could have the whole of our transportation industry tied up. The MacPherson royal commission has pointed out that we would have had a very serious situation during the rail strike in 1950 if it had not been for the trucking industry. It becomes quite evident that if the trucking industry is now to be tied up at the same time as is the rail industry if a strike should occur, we would not be able to withstand it at all. The government would then not be able to follow this policy of allowing collective bargaining to take place because I am sure that the country would not be in a position to withstand a strike and the consequences of having all our means of transportation tied up. I would therefore ask the government to give very serious consideration both to policy and the Canada labour relations board. It may well be that the legislation under which that board operates will need to be changed in order to cover the situation. I ask the government to give very serious consideration to the acquisition of truck lines by the railways.

I wish to say a few words about transportation policy in general. I noticed that the hon. member for Laurier made a few comments the other day in which he set out a rather detailed description of those things which had been done by the former administration. I do not want to go back as far over the whole history as the hon. member, but I do believe there are one or two things he perhaps overlooked which are of current importance and will be of importance in the future.

The hon. member for Laurier pointed out that the previous government had appointed the Turgeon royal commission in 1950 to investigate the problems connected with transportation and that a considerable amount of legislation was passed after the hearings of that royal commission in relation to the equalizing of freight rates in this country.

I suggest to the committee that the legislation the hon. member described to us as having been passed at that time did not solve the problem and could not have solved it because of the fact that the equalization had no effect on those rates which are known as competitive rates under the Railway Act.

These rates were set so that the railways could meet truck competition, be more flexible in their rates and set them very rapidly in order to meet this competition. That is, of course, as it should be and I am sure nobody in the country would want to see it any other way. However, it did mean that the board had no way of equalizing rates, because the railways were forced to reduce some rates where there was competition and they did not have to reduce rates where there was no competition.

One thing that arose from that legislation, as the hon. member for Laurier pointed out, was this. I refer to page 4879 of Hansard for May 16, where the hon. member is reported as having said:

> Another feature of this legislation was the one and one third rule which is contained in section 337 of the Railway Act.

Of course, that one and one third rule means that on transcontinental freight where a rate is set, the rate cannot be more than one and one third times as much to an intermediate point. That fact alone indicates that there could not be equalization of rates if an intermediate point could carry a rate as much as one and one third times that of the ultimate destination.

However, even that was taken away in subsequent legislation because apparently the former administration was not as completely satisfied with the Turgeon report as the hon. member for Laurier indicated. The former administration appointed the Turgeon commission a second time, in 1954. At that time they were dealing with the question of agreed charges on railroads. It was a rather interesting situation, because the 1950 Turgeon commission was entirely opposed to agreed charges on the railroads. I shall read one statement which is contained on page 92 of the report of 1951:

> The point involves a question of whether the procedure should be simplified when the power granted to the railways is such an extraordinary one. The agreed charge method of rate making, even under the present practice, is contrary to well established principles of rate making under the Railway Act. It binds the shipper by agreement to ship all or an agreed portion of his goods by the carriers with whom he makes the agreement for a long period, usually for at least a year, and it gives the shipper a rate lower than the rate in the tariffs published under the Railway Act. This extraordinary procedure should be accompanied by the publicity and safeguards now required by the Transport Act. It must be remembered that the Railway Act now gives to the railways power to meet competition by the publication of competitive tariffs with a minimum of delay. The Transport Act adds to this power and empowers the railways to enter into agreed charges where the publication of competitive tariffs or special tariffs will not secure the object of the agreed charge. Such a power should not be exercised without close supervision. The procedure should not be simplified. It is important also that shippers and carriers should have an opportunity of being heard, so that the board may be made aware of all aspects of the question.

The report goes on to make a good many more remarks in that respect. However, I now want to come to the second Turgeon royal commission. The second royal commission inquiring into transportation dealt only with the application and effects of agreed charges. It held hearings in 1954 and reported in 1955.

This royal commission was brought about by a letter which the premier of Alberta wrote to the prime minister of Canada early in 1954. The letter stated, in effect, that through the application of agreed charges, Alberta was being deprived of the benefits of the one and one third rule which had been recommended in the 1951 royal commission report and which was incorporated in the Railway Act later that year. The government of Alberta had complained at the hearings of the first Turgeon royal commission, in 1949-50, about anomalies in the transcontinental competitive rates from central Canada to the Pacific coast as compared with the normal rates on the same traffic from central Canada to Calgary and Edmonton. The transcontinental competitive rates to Vancouver were made to meet the competition of steamships which operated through the Panama canal or direct to the Pacific coast ports.

The second royal commission came out very strongly in favour of agreed charges on the railways. That did away with the effect of the one and one third rule, because it was ruled subsequently that agreed charges were not covered by the one and one third rule, so that rates in Alberta can be double or three times what they are to Vancouver in some instances.

That was one piece of legislation which certainly did nothing to equalize freight rates but actually considerably enlarged the discrimination. There is another bad feature of that legislation, in my opinion. This is that it did not require the railroads to be compensated for the cost of carrying goods under agreed charges.

The Railway Act states that the rate must be compensatory to the railroad; it must compensate them for at least their out-of-pocket costs. However, under the agreed charge legislation in the Transport Act there is no such stipulation; the railroads can set any rate they wish. An agreed charge is simply an agreement between the carrier and the shipper. I suggest this is unsound legislation because, as can already be seen, under the Railway Act the railways had sufficient power to meet competition from the trucking industry because they could set a competitive rate. If they were meeting competition from the trucking industry, they were able to set any rate they wished in order to meet that competition, provided it was compensatory to the railroad.

That is the main difference between the agreed charges under the Transport Act and the competitive rates under the Railway Act. I believe the government should take a very close look at the Transport Act for that reason. I am not going to go into that matter any more fully at this time, because I have already indicated my intention to proceed with a bill to amend that act, which I have placed on the order paper of the House of Commons.

However, the amendment in the bill I have placed on the order paper does not begin to cover the whole situation; it would only alleviate one aspect of it by making an appeal possible for the trucking industry. I think this is very little to ask, when the railroad has such extraordinary powers.

I also believe that having the power to set rates which are not compensatory may have influenced the railroads to set rates which are placing them in an even more difficult financial position than they otherwise would be. Certainly the rates on the railroads should be subject to examination by a competent authority.

At the present time, as I have indicated, the board of transport commissioners has no power over agreed charges. They simply receive them, file them and they automatically come into effect. There is a very limited appeal under the present legislation from the effects of that act, and in fact the people who would have a right of appeal under the legislation would be very unlikely to appeal because they are the people who would benefit from the low rates.

Unless an appeal is made and it is referred to the board of transport commissioners, they have no power to examine the rates to discover whether or not the railroad is being properly compensated for the goods they are hauling. A good deal has been said during the discussion in this committee, a great deal of it of a political nature, about freight rate increases over the years. I do not think we should get into a political hassle over which government was in power when freight rates were increased in the past. I think it is to be expected that there would be freight rate increases. Costs of every other description have gone up and I do not know why we should expect that rail rates should not have increased as well. However, the discriminatory effects of the increases are another matter. In order that the record may be clear in connection with what has happened by way of freight increases I wish to quote what the royal commission has had to say about that subject. They have been discussing the question of horizontal freight increases and on page 15 of their report they state:

> There have been 12 such increases, including interims, approved since 1948 which has resulted in a permitted level of increase amounting to 157 per cent. However, even abstracting the effect of statutory rates, the consequences of the competitive situation are revealed by the fact that with this permitted amount of increase in rates the railways had only been able, by the end of 1958, to obtain an increase in average revenues per ton mile of less than 55 per cent.

I think some of the statements about freight rate increases which have been put on record have been very misleading. I say they have been misleading regardless of which party was in power, because I do not believe the government has all that much control over freight rate increases. Wages and costs of every description have been rising and I believe it is only to be expected that freight costs should increase. I am sure they have gone up in other countries just as they have gone up here.

Then, again, there was another statement which the royal commission had to make on page 12 which, I think, puts the position of our freight rates into better perspective. Here again they have been talking about freight rate increases and on page 12 the commission is reported as stating:

> In this connection it is of interest to note that notwithstanding its recent rapid growth the cost of the transportation function relative to the gross national product appears to have declined from about 8½ per cent in 1946 to something in the order of 6½ per cent in 1959.

This is not to say we have no problem in connection with freight rates in this country but I believe this quotation puts the position in better perspective.

The question has been asked by some members of the opposition why the government has not rushed to implement some of the recommendations of the MacPherson royal commission. First of all, the suggestion was made that the government had had the report for months but was doing nothing about it. Then it turned out that at the time the statement was made the report had been in the hands of the minister for less than a month. However, there is a statement contained in the report itself which I think advances convincing ground for not rushing in to implement some of the recommendations which are contained in the first volume of the report.

I drew to the attention of this house the other day that this was only the first volume of the complete report and that I thought it would be precipitate to rush in and implement the first proposals we came across. This is a statement which the commission itself makes in the preface to the report:

> Volume II will, among other things, examine these particular problems. To say that they are less vital than those dealt with in volume I would be to understate their importance. The growing intensity of these special problems—local, regional or industrial in nature—is, as we are well aware, immediately responsible for the appointment of this commission. However, we feel strongly that we are in a better position to treat them now that our analysis in volume I has given us insight into the structural nature of the transportation foundation upon which they rest.

So the royal commission itself feels that the first volume is a broad study of the whole transportation picture and that the question which led immediately to the setting up of the commission has not even been dealt with in the first report. I think any criticism of the government for not proceeding immediately to implement the recommendations of this report is completely unwarranted. The commission goes on to state that further recommendations will not be long delayed. I hope this will be the case because there are many important problems which still have to be dealt with. I am sure the present minister is well aware of the situation, as he has clearly indicated by the actions he has already taken, and that he intends to take those steps which are necessary to correct the difficulties we are experiencing in transportation at the present time.

One of the matters which the hon. member for Laurier brought to our attention concerned some of the subsidies which had been paid under the previous administration. The hon. gentleman felt that these were the results of good pieces of legislation, and no doubt they helped to some extent to relieve inequities at the time they were passed. However, as a long term transportation policy I do not believe they were good. I have stated in the committee now that I do not believe embarking on a long term policy of subsidization is the proper course to follow. I think this is recognized by the MacPherson royal commission report, even though the commission recommends further subsidies for a limited period of time. I think one of the things which the commission itself has not fully recognized is that once subsidies are paid it is difficult to stop them, irrespective of any recommendation that they should be paid for one or two years only. This is true of the subsidy we are now paying under the Freight Rates Reduction Act. We were told at the time it was going to be for a year only, but we have had to extend that period on two occasions. I use that example by way of illustration.

I should like to quote what the royal commission had to say on page 21 of this report with regard to previous subsidies. The commission is speaking about subsidies which have been paid in the past, and it says:

> Measures such as these, while they help to alleviate freight rate inequities cannot by themselves solve the underlying problems. Moreover, in the form in which they have been applied they may tend to distort the competitive market in transportation with resultant adverse effects upon the transportation system as a whole.

I think that is a clear-cut indication by the commission that even though subsidies are recommended in this instance they feel strongly that a policy of subsidization should not be entered upon as a long term policy but should be strictly curtailed and should only be sufficient to compensate the railroads for services they are obliged to carry on even though those services might not be economic.

As far as the latter subsidies are concerned, I am surprised that the commission should have recommended them. It is, of course, to be realized that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a private company. It has not lost any money, and it does not seem to me that the government should be paying a subsidy to a private company which is not even losing any money, particularly when the commission has recommended that the company be allowed to curtail some of the uneconomic services which it has been operating. The commission has recommended, with a sense of urgency, that the company should abandon these unprofitable operations but it seems to me that the payment of a subsidy in these circumstances could do nothing but destroy this sense of urgency. Obviously, if a subsidy is paid for carrying them on there will be so much less desire on the part of the railroads to discontinue these branch lines particularly when there are pressures throughout the country in favour of their retention.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the hon. member be allowed to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am grateful to the committee for this opportunity to conclude my remarks. I assure hon. members I shall not be too long.

May I add that I realize there are a lot of social implications attached to the measures which have been suggested, in particular to the proposal that the railways should curtail their uneconomic passenger operations and curtail the operation of branch lines which are uneconomic. I believe this presents a serious problem and one which must be given careful study. I know that across the prairie provinces, particularly, farmers have depended for a good many years on these branch lines. Of course, they have the benefit of the Crowsnest pass rates for their grain. The result of tearing up these branch lines would be an additional cost to the shipper in transporting his grain to a rail centre. I feel we should consider whether it is costing more to keep these rail lines in operation, than perhaps it would cost to provide some other form of compensation, or would cost to provide alternative transportation facilities for the moving of grain to rail centres.

The hon. member for Assiniboia asked, a day or two ago, for assurance that the government would not advocate a policy of tearing up these branch lines on a wholesale basis. I think that assurance is unnecessary because the royal commission has not even hinted at such a procedure. The commission report has recommended that alternative transportation systems are to be made available in the case of the abandonment of a branch line, and I am sure the government will not rush into any such wholesale project.

Regarding the loss suffered by the railways in the provision of passenger service, I suggest this is a field from which the government of Canada should encourage the railways to depart as quickly as possible, particularly when alternative transportation systems are available which are comparable and sometimes even lower in cost.

When I was attending the United Nations session at New York a short time ago my wife made arrangements to return home, and found that it was cheaper for her to do so by air than by rail. If that situation persists generally, particularly in view of the fact that bus transportation has progressed to its present fast, efficient and inexpensive service, there certainly is no necessity for carrying on this uneconomic railway passenger service.

Last year the railways lost approximately $65 million in providing this service, as a result of which the government is being asked to provide a subsidy to offset the loss. The money to be provided as subsidy to the railways must come out of the taxpayer's pocket and I am sure the taxpayer will not be happy to continue on this basis unless it is absolutely essential. I suggest that it is not essential to do so, in view of the other efficient and economical forms of transportation that are available.

I feel the government should consider this aspect, and the recommendations contained in the royal commission report in respect of it, at once. I do not believe our railways should be allowed to continue these uneconomic operations. I do not refer, of course, to the essential commuter services which are provided for individuals who must necessarily travel back and forth to work, but I do not believe that is an uneconomic service.

The railways have made many applications to the board of transport commissioners to discontinue some of these operations but have been refused throughout the years. However, I feel that these services will eventually have to be done away with. I suggest that if we must continue to subsidize them, it would be far better for the railways to withdraw this type of service on an orderly basis, particularly where there is another satisfactory means of transportation available. I think it would be wise to initiate an orderly program of withdrawing these uneconomic services provided by the railways in an attempt to place the railways in a position where they can support themselves without subsidies. If we do not do this, we will surely arrive at the point where we cannot subsidize them any longer, and the financial structure of the railways will collapse. I have no doubt that this will eventually happen, if we continue with our present program, ending each year with a deficit, as did the C.N.R. last year, amounting to approximately $65 million. I do not believe these services should be continued on that basis, and suggest that the government should consider all of the social implications and recommendations of this royal commission report. The government will, of course, wish to consider the contents of the two volumes of the report yet to come, before entering into any long term program such as I have suggested.

Mr. Chairman, I have drawn these facts to the attention of the minister, and the government, and I hope that consideration will be given to them at this time.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I could not let pass the estimates of the Department of Transport without rising to voice in the house the disappointment of my riding of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville and of my neighbour riding of Chambly-Rouville—represented here by an hon. member who has already started making a fuss although he is not sitting in his own seat—and of the Richelieu-Vercheres area.

Mr. Johnson: Ignoramus.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville to hold his tongue while I am speaking. The term "ignoramus" applies much more to the M.L.A. for Bagot and to the hon. member himself.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Johnson: Stupid.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I ask you to request the hon. member to withdraw that word since the whole committee heard it.

The Chairman: I think that the word may be unparliamentary, and I would ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

An hon. Member: Even though it is true?

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, I said imbecile. If the hon. member for St. Jean-Ibervnlle-Napierville feels that the word applies to him; if he wants to take it for himself, he could do so. If he thought this word was meant for him, I am sorry that I used it and I will take it back since he feels insulted.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member does not want to withdraw his word without reservations, I would ask him at least to keep quiet when I have the floor. I would also ask the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) to be kind enough to contain himself. I know that he is a bit of a show-off, but it would do him good to contain himself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I genuinely intend to inform the Canadian government of the disappointment of the people of the whole Richelieu district who are again this year faced with the fact that the federal government for another year will not give any consideration to the well-founded petition of the chambers of commerce, the boards of trade, the municipalities, the members of parliament for the area, to the effect that a study of the Richelieu waterway be undertaken immediately.

In 1958, a delegation from our area, headed by mayor Fiset, of Sorel, met with the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the railway committee room. On that occasion, the Prime Minister promised in the presence of the then minister of transport and of many members of parliament that he would immediately look into the matter of the Richelieu waterway project. Well, Mr. Chairman, that was four years ago and yet, again this year, we notice that there is no item in the Department of Transport estimates for a study of the Richelieu seaway project.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I say that by refusing to give immediate consideration to that project, the minister is delaying works which, in the opinion of well-meaning people, would remedy the economic recession with which we are faced today not only in our area but throughout the province and the whole of Canada. I see that the Minister of Transport is shaking his head.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. The hon. member says that I refuse to consider the problem of the Richelieu waterway. I have never said that. I even repeated at least ten times in the house that the officials of my department were continuing to make a technical and economic study of the project.

Mr. Dupuis: So, Mr. Chairman, the minister says he did not refuse. He says his department is considering the matter; but he is giving us no assurance, as far as results are concerned, absolutely nothing. The minister not only disappointed the one who now has the floor, but the chambers of commerce which had come to Montreal in December to hear him. At that time, the minister said the waterway project was not self-sustaining. That is what the minister said in December 1960.

For many years, all the experts in this field have been claiming that the Richelieu waterway project is feasible for Canada and the United States. In recent years, the American government voted moneys so that U.S. army engineers could study the project.

The Conservative government of Canada is doing absolutely nothing, and the minister claims in this house that he is not against such a study. It may be true that he does not refuse to study the project, but it is also true that there have been no results since his appointment, and his predecessor has done nothing at all to promote the study of the Richelieu waterway.

Mr. Chairman, as I said before, in the last four years, that is, since the delegation from Sorel came to Ottawa in 1958, members of the opposition have done their duty. Every year, the hon. member for Laurier has taken up again the matter of deepening the Richelieu. He asked the government to study this important project. Every year since 1958, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) has repeatedly asked the minister to look immediately into the possibility of deepening the Richelieu. Never, under any circumstances, in four years have we seen our friends opposite take the slightest step in order to promote the Richelieu waterway project.

Mr. Johnson: That's not true.

Mr. Dupuis: The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville says that it is not true. But I do state that in four years he has not uttered a single word about it.

Mr. Johnson: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. This is precisely an example of the unfairness of the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville. Indeed I made a speech on this matter in 1959.

Mr. Chevrier: Order.

Mr. Johnson: I made one this year and last year; therefore, the hon. member has no right to say that.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no question of privilege there.

Mr. Johnson: You are full of wind.

Mr. Chevrier: What did you just say?

(Text):

Mr. Jones: The Chairman is on his feet.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville to repeat what he just said.

The Chairman: I must start by dealing with the first issue. I would ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville to wait until the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville has finished if he wants to make certain comments.

Should the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville wish to yield the floor to let him make his remarks now, he is entitled to do so, but the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville must seek his permission.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville to repeat what he said a moment ago.

Mr. Pigeon: He has no orders to take from you.

The Chairman: I fail to understand how an hon. member can rise on a point of order and ask a member to repeat what he has said.

If the hon. member for Laurier is complaining of what was said by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, that is a different story. But it would not be in order to ask him to repeat.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member used an expression which cannot be repeated. He should be ashamed of using such expressions in this house.

Mr. Dupuis: As you can see, Mr. Chairman, if the member for Chambly-Rouville would only keep quiet when someone is speaking he would spare us all those discussions which lead nowhere.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to call the member to order. I cannot continue if he keeps this up.

Mr. Tremblay: Let us have another speaker then.

The Chairman: I beg all members to keep in mind that they should not interrupt the speaker, and I would ask them to let the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville proceed with his remarks.

Mr. Dupuis: The member for Roberval said—

I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to call the member for Roberval to order.

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville to be less touchy.

I do not believe he was disturbed to that extent.

If he feels that the slightest noise in this house brings him short, I think he is going a bit too far. On the other hand, knowing the hon. member, I would say that he is not too nervous and that normal interjections do not disturb him.

I pray the hon. members to let him continue.

Mr. Dupuis: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for recognizing that I am not too nervous.

For my part, I am pleased to let you know that I want to proceed with my speech and that I would like some order in this house.

The Chairman:: Order, order.

(Text):

Mr. Woolliams: Go ahead, let us hear it.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Before my hon. friend the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville interrupted me, I was saying that he had not risen in the house since 1958 with regard to the Richelieu project.

It is true that he did not raise his voice in the house. What else can I say? I just checked, before coming in, in order to be quite sure—

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege. This needs quite a lot of cheek to say. If the hon. member does not read the record, it is no fault of mine. If he is too busy selling records in Quebec—

The Chairman: Order. As I said, the hon. member will have the opportunity to make corrections. I shall therefore ask him to let the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville continue his remarks.

Mr. Dupuis: I would point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville—

Mr. Asselin: We are anxious to hear your speech.

Mr. Dupuis: I am anxious to begin. As I said—and I repeat—the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville never rose since 1958 to deal with the Richelieu project, until last week, on a Saturday, when he probably felt the election coming and that his status of silent member might have an unfavourable effect at the polls.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege. The hon. member says I am a silent member, but for the past ten minutes he has been upbraiding me because I talked.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I shall go on with my remarks.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I shall go on with my remarks.

I would point out to Your Honour that the atmosphere in the House of Commons is losing much of its dignity since the arrival of some Union Nationale members.

Mr. Johnson: Since your arrival, mainly.

Mr. Dupuis: I say it is deplorable that in the estimates of the Department of Transport there is no vote providing for a study of the Richelieu waterway project.

When, following his speech in Montreal, I asked the Minister of Transport in this house to tell us on what basis he stated that the Richelieu project would not pay its way the minister just answered that such was the view of departmental experts.

We wanted to know which experts? What report did they submit?

We asked him to table the said report for the enlightenment of our people. The minister did not want to do so. He even asked me to withdraw my motion for those papers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wonder what makes the Minister of Transport act so mysteriously?

If the Richelieu waterway project is not economically sound, let him prove so, let him give us some figures, some facts, let him quote some engineers' reports, since he says he has such reports.

Thus we might put the discussion on a solid basis.

But the minister just says: I have some reports to the effect that.... But he takes good care not to table those reports.

Mr. Chairman, as long as the present Minister of Transport refuses to table those reports which he says he has to the effect that the Richelieu waterway project would not pay its way, we shall keep coming back to that subject.

On the other hand, the chambers of commerce will all go on asking that consideration be given to the Richelieu waterway project in order to establish clearly and positively whether the project is economically sound or not.

The Minister of Transport, on the one hand, asserts that the waterway would not be economic, while on the other hand, every engineer and town planner and expert in the field, both in Canada and the U.S., says the scheme would be economic.

Mr. Chairman, I would rather believe people like Lieutenant-Colonel Dansereau, who at the same meeting sponsored by the chamber of commerce, had this to say, and I quote:

> It is about time Canada and the United States made a joint study of the Richelieu waterway scheme.

I would rather believe such people than the minister, who tells us he has unfavourable reports but refuses to table them in the house.

Mr. Balcer: I have no right to table them.

Mr. Johnson: Why table them?

Mr. Balcer: I have no right to table them.

Mr. Dupuis: You keep repeating you have no right—I say you do have a right to quote figures and facts.

We do not even know what would be the course of the waterway, we do not know where it would be located, yet the minister says the scheme would not be economic. Well, I say to the minister that we, the members representing that area, believe, just as the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville indicated last Saturday, that the scheme would be economic. We in the area believe, as the chambers of commerce and the board of trade have indicated on many occasions, that the Richelieu waterway would be economic. We also believe, as was stated many times by the New York-Vermont interstate commission, that a Richelieu-lake Champlain waterway would be quite economic both for the United States and Canada. We also believe the report of the joint Canada-U.S. joint commission, to the effect that the development of the Richelieu would be good business, but that it should not be rushed, and that we should wait and see the results of the St. Lawrence seaway.

Now, the St. Lawrence seaway scheme was started under the Liberal administration, and was officially opened by the Conservative party, in 1958.

Since 1958, according to the report of the Canada-U.S. joint commission—which incidentally is made up of reliable people—Canada should have been studying the problem of the Richelieu waterway. Since 1958, the American government has been sending the Canadian government notices, requests and demands urging the joint study of the waterway scheme. And what has been done on this side of the border? We have adopted a completely negative attitude. Yet it was those same people who, in the last elections, said they would undertake great public works so that people would not suffer from unemployment. Not only do they refuse to undertake the work, but they refuse to spend one single penny to initiate a study of the scheme.

I think the present Minister of Transport, who comes from the province of Quebec, should be ashamed for rejecting the demands of a whole area and refusing to initiate even a survey to establish whether or not the scheme would be economic. He can offer absolutely no excuse—

Mr. Tremblay: Demagogue.

Mr. Dupuis: Such an attitude on the part of the minister cannot be condoned.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

No one expects work on the Richelieu waterway to start tomorrow morning. We are just asking that the economics of it be looked into. The minister cannot have us believe that the officers of his department, who are very busy people, can effectively look into the problem of the Richelieu waterway. The officers of his department have neither the time nor the intention to prepare a report, particularly if the present situation is maintained.

Since 1958, the American authorities have realized that the civil servants had no time to look into the problem, so they appointed a commission of experts from the U.S. army, and voted funds to conduct this survey. The Americans are now in a position to say that the waterway would be economic. In fact, the American government has figures, suggested locations and results.

On the Canadian side, however, we have lost four precious years and do not yet know where we stand. If the Diefenbaker government had been consistent when representations were made by a delegation from the Richelieu area that came to Ottawa in 1958, it would immediately have gone into action and would have appointed engineers. It would immediately have initiated a study of the Richelieu waterway scheme, and now, after four years, we would not be left with nothing. On the contrary, we would have the result of a serious and careful study, we would be four years ahead.

What have we had under a Conservative government? Four years of indifference, procrastination, and neglect, four years of nothing.

Well, Mr. Chairman, if the Minister of Transport cannot find a way to begin this study, to try to remedy the economic situation that is bad not only in the province of Quebec but elsewhere, if the government—

Mr. Tremblay: Especially in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Dupuis: I remind the hon. gentleman from Roberval that, of course, it was inherited from Mr. Duplessis.

Mr. Tremblay: Especially in the province of Quebec, with Mr. Lesage.

Mr. Johnson: If Mr. Lesage is the heritage left by Mr. Duplessis, we will waive it.

Mr. Dupuis: Why don't you call in the children from St. Hyacinthe and complain to them.

Mr. Johnson: I am not the one who does that; Mr. Lesage writes himself letters.

The Chairman: If the hon. members have problems to settle, I suggest that they do it elsewhere.

Mr. Tremblay: Go on with the comedy, its funny.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. It seems to me that we must maintain a certain decorum in the house and that all members are bound to do this, even those who, I would say—I do not want to use an expression often heard in this house—are just ignorant or stupid, and that even hon. members in the class of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) should be forced to abide by the rules.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel) has just repeated what I said earlier—that the hon. members should not interrupt the member who has the floor. However, one cannot expect the house always to be silent, but at times the noise is more aggravating than at other times. I think the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville should now be able to go on with his speech.

An hon. Member: He has plenty of time.

Mr. Dupuis: Then, Mr. Chairman, I continue.

All has been said on the Richelieu waterway. I do not intend to go over that subject and quote all of its history as the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville did last Saturday, following the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin).

Of course, the Richelieu waterway would shorten the distance between Montreal and New York by 1,200 miles. Naturally, this 1,200-mile short-cut would provide innumerable advantages to companies and industries. And the waterway is also desirable for the tourist industry, since it would attract numerous tourists to this country every year.

Everybody is asking for that project but the present Conservative government through its Minister of Transport, is evading the question and like an ostrich, burying its head in the sand.

Thousands of unemployed are asking for something, the economy is suffering, not only in my district but elsewhere, but the government persists not only in refusing to act, but even in refusing to undertake a study of the problem.

Mr. Chairman, we will very shortly be judging the last four years of Conservative administration; next year we will see the Conservative administration has achieved absolutely nothing in any field; and we will then be able to say that, if the Conservative government refuses to the constituencies of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, Brome-Missisquoi, Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, Chambly-Rouville and Richelieu-Vercheres to undertake a study which would save them, we, of the Liberal party, who will be in office very shortly, will undertake those studies for the benefit of that region.

(Text):

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I should like to speak for a minute or two on this particular item. My main concern is, perhaps, with the Canadian National and its operations. The Canadian National operates numerous branch lines in my constituency. I am well aware of the causes for laying off men from railways such as dieselization, the centralization of car shops and repair shops, the advent of the steel wheel, roller bearings, steel box cars and so on.

The thing which concerns me particularly, and concerns my constituents, is this new regional set-up with regard to management. There are five vice presidents and each vice president is to manage his regional area. This may well result in an improvement in the management of the Canadian National. It may speed up railway operations and make the railways more competitive. However, there is a great fear among railway workers that railway operations are becoming top heavy, that we are getting fewer and fewer workingmen and more and more administrators. Then, too, costs go up to a greater extent with additional superintendents and vice presidents. In this connection, I am thinking particularly of expense accounts. Certainly, some of the vice presidents can run up large expense accounts. We have never had any figures given to us to indicate what the total of these expense accounts would be which are run up by the various managers and vice presidents of the Canadian National.

Another thing that concerns me is the lengthening of the sections and reduction in the number of section men across Canada. I can well understand that dieselization would bring about a reduction in car repair shops but why should it bring about a reduction in the number of section men and the lengthening of sections, particularly when there is no improvement to the track in those various areas? Does this procedure cause more accidents on the railway line? We are certainly all well aware of a number of accidents over the past years that have been brought about for one reason or another. Could those accidents have been prevented if the section crews had not been reduced in some areas?

Another matter about which I have been wondering is whether the increased amount of advertising has paid off. We are now spending in the C.N.R. approximately $2 million on advertising alone. Has the deferred payment plan for passengers increased revenue derived from passengers? Hon. members may think that these questions could be well asked in the sessional committee which deals with the C.N.R. However, may I say that I have not been fortunate enough to become a member of that committee, as far as I know, and I am therefore putting these questions forward.

This afternoon I noticed that the hon. member for Vancouver East made a speech with regard to C.N.R. operations and how irritating conditions were for a passenger travelling on the C.N.R. trains. I must say that I have noticed things similar to what he mentioned. I note that these things were brought to Mr. Gordon's attention in the report of 1959 by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose. He dealt with them at length at page 81 of the minutes and proceedings and evidence of the committee. He told Mr. Gordon that he should have somebody make some inquiry into these conditions with regard to passenger service on the trains, and mentioned instances of persons having boarded and found the coaches practically empty in some cases but yet it was difficult to get a reservation on a particular line. Mr. Gordon as much as told him at that time that these conditions did not exist and that, if they did exist, he did not know about it; and he as much as said that he was not going to do very much about it if they did exist.

The hon. member for Vancouver East went on to speak about the sham battles that take place, and are becoming more and more evident day by day, between the railways buying up trucking firms and so on. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, as will be found in the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the 1960 committee, made a motion to the effect that these figures be given and that no money be appropriated for the C.N.R. in order to further these expenditures for trucking interests. This can be found at page 221 of the proceedings of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping. But what did the hon. member for Port Arthur say at that particular time? I am reading from the third paragraph on page 221. He said:

> I would like, if I may, to speak against Mr. Browne's motion.

Then he goes on to state some of his reasons. However, the point I wish to raise here is this. Two days ago the hon. member for Port Arthur got down on his knees, figuratively speaking, and pleaded with the members of the House of Commons that they help him in the sessional committee this year to get facts and figures on the operations of the Canadian National Railways. Here was a specific motion made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway with regard to facts and figures on the operations of the C.N.R. What did the hon. member for Port Arthur do? He rose and spoke against the motion. Yet he has the gall to rise in his place here in the house and plead with us to help him to get facts and figures. It was purely a publicity speech for his own purposes designed to enhance his personal prestige in his own constituency. He made no real attempt in the committee at various times to promote the ideas in which he professes interest.

Hon. members know that this is not the only time this situation has arisen. Going back to the committee of 1959, I find that a similar situation arose when the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., wanted information with regard to the Victoria harbour and the docks there. He suggested that this information be given to the committee as found at page 197 of the 1959 report. Various members spoke for and against the motion. I looked for the name of the hon. member for Port Arthur in order to find whether he had said anything about the motion. Here is more evidence as to whether or not he wanted facts and figures at that particular time. I went from page 197 to page 208 and as found at page 208 the hon. member for Port Arthur said, "I do not like that motion". Then as found at page 209 he went on to speak with regard to another subject. Here again is evidence of the sincerity of his approach in pleading with the members of the House of Commons to support him allegedly the lone person asking for facts and figures in regard to the operations of the C.N.R.

Another instance arose. The hon. member for Vancouver South will likely remember it better than I do. It was with regard to R.C.A. Victor and their transmitting facilities on the C.N.R. I have not had the time to look up the exact quotation with regard to the hon. member for Port Arthur. At that time he did not support the hon. member for Vancouver South in the motion with regard to facts and figures on that particular aspect of the operations of the C.N.R. Yet he pleads with members of this House of Commons to support him in getting the facts and figures on the operations of the railway.

I have read through the remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur in the last two years with regard to the operations of the C.N.R. He has been greatly concerned with the personnel and I agree with a great many things he has said with regard to the operation of the C.N.R. in the matter of hiring of personnel and lay-offs. I know how this matter concerns men working on the railway. However, I fail to find in the last two years any instance where the hon. member for Port Arthur had asked for facts and figures. Here was the closest instance I could find. It is found at page 94 of the 1959 committee report. He said this:

> I am not asking for them, but I wonder if you have figures which would indicate the number of revenue passengers you need, say between Montreal and Vancouver to make the Super a paying proposition?

Then Mr. Gordon said this:

> I do not have them with me. They could be secured.
> Mr. Fisher: I do not want them.

This sort of thing occurred time and again. He made no real inquiry into the facts and figures with regard to the operation of the C.N.R. He was concerned about the personnel. In this matter I agree with him and I share his concern as to the reduction of employees of the C.N.R. I have a number of C.N.R. employees in my constituency. I find that they are more concerned about their jobs on the railway than they are about anything else. They are more concerned about their jobs than they are perhaps even about pay increases. I think that the committee inquiring into the C.N.R. this year, when it begins to function, should concern itself more with the actual prospects of the C.N.R. and their operations, whether or not these operations are a paying proposition, and that it should obtain facts and figures as to whether or not it was profitable for C.N.R. to sell certain various hotels or to lease other hotels, and that it should get down to the actual operations of the railway and tie that information in with the men that are employed on the C.N.R.

But when we consider the new party's approach to the C.N.R. and its whole operation, they suggest, "Take over the C.P.R. too". I do not know how this would improve or enhance the railway workers' jobs. I do not know how it would bring greater stability among railway workers, and I think this is their primary concern today.

To my mind it would bring about a greater amalgamation of the two railways and the firing of a greater number of employees, because in certain passenger lines, particularly transcontinental lines, one might be dropped and the other continued. This would have the effect of reducing the number of men employed by the C.N.R.

Not very long ago the hon. member for Port Arthur suggested to this house that Donald Gordon should be fired. He put it as plainly as that and said it three or four times. I am not going to lead the committee into thinking that I disagree with him on this particular point, because I do not. I have studied the hon. member's remarks, and without doubt he has a great deal of information and knowledge in regard to the operations of the C.N.R., but I think he has been a secret admirer of Donald Gordon for a number of years.

I should like to refer to the famous Donald Gordon statement which is to be found in the 1959 committee report. I am sure most hon. members have heard it by now and are well aware of it. I refer to Donald Gordon's remarks when it was suggested he should be fired:

> —the management of the C.N.R. an efficient management, or otherwise; and if you come to the conclusion it is not, for God's sake tell us and fire the lot of us.

When he suggested this, the hon. member for Port Arthur did not immediately say, "Yes, we should fire you" or anything of the kind. He was rather silent. He made one short remark after that, "That is up to the House of Commons to decide", or something like that. But at no time, to my knowledge, in the three cases I have cited, has the hon. member ever gone against the wishes of Mr. Gordon in supporting the motions that were moved with regard to the trucking industry, the harbour at Victoria or the transmitting services of R.C.A. Victor.

Therefore I question this idea of his to fire Donald Gordon. I think it is one he gathered just recently when he was back home among the railway men and they told him that Donald Gordon was pretty unpopular. I think he grasped the idea and perhaps said, "I will see that he is fired", or, "I will try to have him fired; I will suggest it to the House of Commons". It would be a mighty popular suggestion to his people back home, and this is no doubt why he said it.

An hon. Member: It was just politics.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I do not want to deal with the recommendations made in the royal commission's report at this time. They have been talked about enough. I will not refer to them now, particularly as the first volume is the only one that is out as yet. But as for this idea of the C.P.R. being taken over by the government, I cannot see how this would improve the government's or the workers' position. It may cut down transportation costs by a small amount, or a great amount; I do not know. Apparently none of the royal commissions which have studied transportation costs have been able to figure out what they are. Nobody has been able to arrive at a concrete answer as to a great many of the cost problems in railroading. Therefore I think it would be hard to prove that by taking over the C.P.R. we would actually be cutting down transportation or freight costs by a great amount. But we would certainly be weakening the position of the men now working on the railroads. We would bring about chaos within their ranks with regard to holding a job and seeking employment in general.

My own view is that the C.N.R. is much like the operation of a hockey team or a ball team. The morale is mighty low. I am sure all hon. members have travelled on the C.N.R. and have found that the morale of the people working on the C.N.R. is low. I know that whenever a team's morale is low they are not going to win very many games. There is one thing that always enhances the morale of a team, and we see this done often in football and baseball. They are always firing coaches to improve the morale and get the winning spirit back in the team.

I think this applies to the C.N.R. We must fire the coach to improve the morale of the team. This would bring about a greater improvement in the deficit figure and in the revenue of the C.N.R. than anything I can think of right now. Firing the coach would bring about a greater improvement because the morale would immediately be boosted and the workmen's efficiency might improve. To some extent I agree with the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose and the hon. member for Vancouver East, that there is room for improvement in the efficiency of operations in the C.N.R. and the total efficiency of the workers. As I have mentioned, the morale is low, and I think by firing the coach the morale would immediately pick up.

I also have one more thought that I might just as well leave with the committee. It is with regard to the coach's salary. We are now splitting up the administration of the C.N.R. into five regions, as I understand it. Five vice presidents are going to have managerial control over their particular regions. They are going to have control as to setting the rates in each region and as to getting out and seeking freight to haul in those regions.

Therefore those vice presidents are going to carry a greater load of the responsibility in the operations of the C.N.R. To my reasoning this will automatically reduce the work and the responsibility of the president of the C.N.R. Therefore I think—and I recommend this to the committee—that the salary should be cut in half and that a new coach should be hired.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I simply want to ask the hon. member a question. I did not catch the start of some of the things he was crediting me with, but did he say that I did not support the motion of the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. two years ago in committee when the hon. member requested information?

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

I am almost positive that motion went to a vote and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, and perhaps one other hon. member and myself, were the only ones who supported the motion of the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I do not want to state something that is not correct. I am very sorry if the hon. member did support it. I was basing my remarks strictly on the record.

The hon. member for Victoria raised the subject, as reported at page 197 of the committee report. I looked for the name of the hon. member for Port Arthur and I failed to see it. I am just taking a rough check to see if I overlooked the hon. member's name. It does not appear until page 208, at the bottom of the page. I will send the report over to the hon. member for Port Arthur if he wishes. He is reported there as saying, "I do not like that motion". I do not know how he voted; it is not in the report.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): The hon. member for Kettle Valley West.

Mr. Herridge: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman; it is Kootenay West. Apparently you, sir, have the idea that I am going to speak on a favourite topic.

After the torrent of words uttered by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville my effort this evening will appear like a slow-flowing, babbling brook. After listening to the hon. member for Acadia, with his lion-like form of eloquence, I shall appear like a lisping infant.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to briefly mention one matter that is of some concern to myself and a number of other persons who are interested in the prevention of pollution of our lakes, springs, rivers and waters generally. I rise because I have a particular and personal knowledge of the pollution of some of our smaller streams and lakes in British Columbia, as the result of mining companies being permitted to dump tailings into them. This has in a very short time destroyed fish life, spoiled the water for drinking purposes and so lessened the value of the area that persons no longer wish to boat on these streams and lakes. Crystal-like sheets of water have been changed into turgid, and in many cases, slimy sheets of water. So far the pollution has been on a limited scale, and in recent years the government of British Columbia has taken action to prevent the continuation of this vandalism by making it obligatory for mining companies to install settling ponds; they are no longer allowed to dump their tailings except in special circumstances in very deep water.

I was interested in a proclamation announced in the January 25 edition of the Canada Gazette Part II, volume 95 under the heading "Navigable Waters Protection Act—Proclaiming Water Lot in Labrador Exempt from Section 20 of the Act." I shall read just a section of this proclamation which gives me great concern.

Whereas in and by section 22 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, chapter 193 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, it is provided that our governor in council may, from time to time, by proclamation, declare any navigable rivers, streams or waters or part or parts thereof, exempted, in whole or in part, from the operation of those sections of the said act which prohibit the deposit of rubbish or other material in navigable waters,

And whereas an application has been made by the Labrador Mining and Exploration Company Limited for exemption from the operation of section 20 of the said act of a water lot being all and singular that piece of land covered by the waters of Wabush lake in the electoral district of Labrador North described as follows—

I am not going to read out the description of this land. The proclamation continues:

And whereas it is expedient and our governor in council has advised that a proclamation do issue declaring that the area described above be exempt from the operation of section 20 of the said act.

Now know ye that we, by and with the advice of our privy council for Canada, do by this our proclamation declare the area described above exempt from the operation of section 20 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act as aforesaid.

I raise the matter on these estimates because I understand there is a dual responsibility with respect to the administration of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, shared by the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport. It may be that special circumstances do justify this exemption under section 22 of the act, but I am raising this matter because I think all Canadians and especially members of this committee should be completely aware of what may lie ahead if our waters are allowed to be further polluted.

I wish to ask the minister a series of questions. Where is Wabush lake which is mentioned in this announcement? What is its size? Was the Department of Fisheries consulted before exemption was given under section 22 of the act and this company was given permission to pollute this water by dumping its mining tailings into the lake? Would the minister mind telling the committee the character of the residue in the mining tailings, whether they are of an acid type or not? Will this pollution of the water in accordance with the permission given destroy the fish in this lake, and will it destroy the possibility of the development of this lake for recreational purposes? Is it sufficiently close to ordinary transportation facilities to be developed in the near years ahead for recreational purposes? I should like the minister to explain the reason why this exemption was given, because I think this is a matter of importance, particularly in view of the increasing interest of Canadians in the pollution problem with respect to our waters and the growing demand for the protection of the fresh water we have left in this country.

Mr. Matthews: Along with other members I should like first of all to congratulate the Minister of Transport on the fine work he has been doing. I do not know whether or not he is tired of hearing this, but his department and the hon. gentleman himself have been very co-operative and have helped me in a great many ways, so I am pleased to have this opportunity of thanking them.

The Department of Transport is one of the most important departments of our government, and presents perhaps the greatest challenge of our times to the people of Canada. Air transport in the world today is ever changing and Canada is just on the doorstep of the great things to come in this new age, the age of jet transportation.

Heavy jet aircraft introduced during 1959-60 have stepped up the pace of aviation and the jet aircraft to come will be larger and heavier than ever in the near future. The large aircraft manufacturers are spending millions of dollars on research; their designers are working on their drawing boards; their engineers are building models and testing them in their wind tunnels, and it is very necessary that countries that want to be part of the great future in air travel keep abreast of these advancements.

Until a few years ago, an air crash did not take nearly the toll of human life that it does with the new jets of today carrying over 100 passengers, and the jets to come will carry many more than today's air liners. The Department of Transport have their part to play in the matter of safe air travel and it does not stop with the inspection of aircraft. It should be the duty of the Department of Transport to build and maintain our airports and runways. These runways must be properly built for the new age, they must be wider, longer and more strongly constructed.

The terminal airports of our trans-continental and trans-ocean air lines which will use these future giant jets should be reserved exclusively for the use of these large aircraft. Feeder line aircraft should use another runway. The large jets should be able to make a direct approach, not a circuitous approach, as some of the air disasters have been caused by fast aircraft making a circuit while they have waited for a clearance from the control tower.

In the future, all aircraft other than trans-continental should have their own runway adjacent to the trans-world, or jet runway, and it is my thought that the Department of Transport should plan along these lines and start at once with their planning.

This age is indeed a challenge to Canada, but Canadians have met many challenges since the days of confederation and will meet many more. In the history of aviation, Canada and Canadians have been second to none. When we think back to the days of world war I, and the record that Canada achieved both in the building of aircraft and the training of airmen; when we remember the great Canadian bush pilots and the building of civilian air lines, we know that Canadians will always be in the van in the future development of our air transportation.

Mr. Chairman, in the early days I flew aircraft in Canada when there were no airports. We used fairgrounds. In those days there were no landing lights, and there were no rules or laws to be broken. We flew at night without running lights, and without landing lights. It is interesting for me to think back on those early days of flying. I remember that at one time in the city of Victoria we were trying to get permission to use a fairground for flying. One of the aldermen got up and said he was very much opposed to granting permission to any of what he called these infernal contraptions flying around. The aeroplane, in his opinion, was certainly not here to stay, and he was very much opposed to granting permission. However, there happened to be two or three younger men on the city council and finally they gave us permission to go ahead and put in an air field. It must be remembered we had no landing lights and no running lights; we had no radio to guide us, and once we were in the air we were on our own. We could fly at any time in those days. There were no regulations laid down by the Department of Transport covering this type of flying as there are now. We were all freelance flyers then and could fly at night if we were foolish enough to do so.

I remember in 1923 I was commissioned to fly a flying boat to Seattle to meet the President Jefferson liner from the Orient, to pick up pictures of the Japanese earthquake, and fly them to the Illustrated News of Los Angeles. I did not get very far. I had two passengers with me when I left the harbour some time after midnight, but unfortunately when we got airborne we developed motor trouble and had to land again. I always felt it was a log that we hit when landing, but it could have been anything. We turned over two or three times and ended up neck deep in water, and stayed that way until assistance arrived.

I have recounted this story to give hon. members an idea of the very fine and necessary work the Department of Transport has done in this field since the early days. With today's existing regulations we cannot get into that kind of trouble. I should perhaps also mention that we did not have to get clearance from Seattle, Washington, nor clearance when we arrived in Victoria, British Columbia. When we did finally pull the plane up, officials from the department of immigration arrived as well as officials from the customs branch, and it is very interesting to remember that those officials did not know how we should be entered in their reports, or what classification applied. Today all these details have been taken care of through the application of the many regulations and rules. I would suggest the implementation of these regulations by the Department of Transport had a good deal to do with the development of air transportation.

In those early days of barnstorming, pilots had to sell the idea of flying to their potential passengers. I am sure this spirit of competition had a lot to do with the building up and developing of present day air line services. I suggest that feeling of competition is still valuable and will be of value in the future to the improvement of air transportation facilities. I can well remember the airports of the early days. They were nothing compared to airport facilities of today. In those days, if a flying service had five or six planes lined up in a row, that service secured the major portion of the air traffic. Individuals would perhaps make ten week-end visits to the airfield and talk to three or four different pilots before finally being convinced that they should go for a ride. The pilot who had the best sales pitch was the one who acquired the business. A ten minute trip in those days cost $15. There was no jealousy between the pilots and the operators of the flying services because they felt the pilot who secured business in this field was doing his duty to convince people that this was a safe and good way to travel, and this type of salesmanship was responsible for the development of a great deal of interest in flying.

I believe our air lines are today on the doorstep of a tremendous advance in the transportation system, and I feel we should have two major air lines in Canada because with the proper development of this business one air line eventually will not be able to handle the traffic. I understand that Trans-Canada Air Lines are now accepting first class transportation only. I feel that the Canadian Pacific Air Lines under the able leadership of Grant McConachie, who is one of our pioneer flyers who did a tremendous job for Canada in creating interest in this field of transportation, should be licensed to operate flights to London. If this air line used propeller type aircraft, such as the Britannia, many people would be able to afford to fly to London and return who are not at present day prices able to do so. I feel this would be a step forward in the development of the Canadian air transportation industry.

There are many people today who do not even consider making such an air trip because they feel the cost, in addition to the expenses of living ten days in a city such as London—visiting all the places and seeing all the things they should see there—is more than they are able to afford. However, with the provision of a cheaper service, such as I have suggested, I feel there would be an increase in air traffic. I would suggest that without this service provided by Canadian air lines, this potential increase in air passengers will be taken by foreign air lines. I am sure that Canadian Pacific Air Lines, which has always been a pioneer in this field, would do a marvellous job in this respect. When one considers the potential development which could take place in this direction and the benefits our air line services could derive in this regard one must come to the conclusion that this is a worth-while step to be taken.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to make it very clear that I believe Canadian Pacific Air Lines should be given the privilege of operating flights to and from London. I firmly believe there should be two large Canadian air lines operating with equal rights and licences both in Canada and international areas. I believe that competition in this field is necessary to the development of Canada's air transportation system so that it will continue to be considered among the best in the world.

I should offer as a further reason for the expansion of our air transportation system particularly in Canada, the necessity of having completely Canadian controlled air transportation facilities in the event of another war. I am not suggesting that war is an inevitibility, but I do suggest that during these days of continuous threat from foreign powers, we must build up our transportation system by increasing our facilities, and training more and more pilots. With two major Canadian air lines, many of these developments would take place normally.

Turning now to the situation regarding the Nanaimo airport—and I have drawn this to the minister's attention on other occasions—it is essential that the landing strips be lengthened. There is plenty of land available to the Department of Transport to do this. With the advent of jet cargo planes, both for defence and commercial use, it is very necessary that this work be commenced as soon as possible. The coast route to Alaska could be serviced from the Nanaimo airport. The Pacific route to the Orient could also be served from the Nanaimo airport, and transcontinental runs could originate from that same airport. In view of the fact that Nanaimo has become a regional defence centre I suggest that it is very important that our air terminal facilities be improved. Nanaimo is centrally located on Vancouver island and must have the central emergency air service to take care of any necessary evacuation and emergency flying, as well as mercy and rescue flights.

To ensure the provision of these services I suggest that the Nanaimo airport runway must be lengthened by 1,850 feet and rebuilt to sufficient strength to receive aircraft of a gross weight of 200,000 pounds. Taxiways must be lengthened and strengthened, and a ramp area would have to be constructed in such a manner as to accommodate aircraft of the size of the DC-8, the Boeing 707 or the Vanguard and Britannia. Airport lighting will also require major improvement, and a passenger terminal would have to be built with facilities to accommodate more than 100 persons, but not more than 200 persons. The purchase of fire fighting equipment and airport maintenance equipment would be very expensive. However, such equipment is mandatory for the type of airport envisaged.

I also suggest that negotiations with field suppliers prior to the construction of the ramp area is essential in order to ensure that adequate fuelling facilities are available. Basic radio facilities and navigation facilities would have to be installed—such as I.L.S. and V.O.R. This would also be very expensive. Additional communications and staff facilities would be required in order to provide proper meteorological services and air to ground communications.

An alternate airport for international air services must contain such facilities as accommodation for customs, immigration and health. Nanaimo has less fog than other west coast cities. Airplanes cannot fly into Vancouver at certain times of the year and have to go up to Ashcroft but at Nanaimo we have less fog than Victoria and less than they have at the R.C.A.F. airport at Comox. All of these things should be taken into consideration because today an accident is a terrible thing. You have a loaded jet with over 100 people. Someone has to answer for the accidents when they happen. An examination is made to find out who is to blame. In this day and age there is no reason why there should be poor airports on the trans-continental runs.

I urge the Minister of Transport to give this matter serious thought as there is no doubt in my mind that some day the western terminal of trans-continental airlines will be in Vancouver. I made a statement which appeared in the Daily Colonist, back in 1923 that in the near future there would be an air service between Victoria, Seattle and Vancouver. Many who read that statement in the Colonist did not believe it, but, as we know, it has been a fact for some years now. I repeat, I believe that Vancouver island will be the western terminal of Trans-World Air Lines in the future.

I am sure the minister will give these suggestions proper consideration because he is very anxious to do and is doing a very fine job for aviation in Canada and in respect of the many other fields which come under his department. I know he will do what is right. I would certainly like to have the minister out in Nanaimo with me. I could show him just what I have in mind there. I am sure he would agree with me it has more possibilities than any other place on the coast.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, on rising to speak on the first item of the estimates of the Minister of Transport I should like to avail myself of this opportunity, on behalf of myself and my constituents and in collaboration with my colleagues, to express my congratulations to the minister in his new portfolio. I have found that I receive very good co-operation from the minister on problems that affect my riding. I feel, judging by the compliments I heard coming from my colleagues, that he will have a long and successful tenure of office in this portfolio.

The subject that brings me to my feet tonight is something that is very serious and affects a great number of my constituents in the northeast area of the constituency of Moose Mountain. I refer to the people who live along and adjacent to the Reston and Wolseley line of the C.P.R. To give the committee a few statistics on it, the construction of the line was commenced in the year 1905. and completed in 1908. The construction was started at Reston and reached Wolseley three years later. The distance was 122.18 miles of rail and 5.68 miles of side track on the division. It paralleled the C.N.R. line for approximately 100 miles, and crossed the line at Maryfield. In 1958, 1,156 carloads of freight originated along the line and 310 carloads were brought into the stations on the line. Revenue earned in 1958 amounted to $326,757. The southern portion of the line is 85 pound steel and the remainder 56 pound steel. The 85 pound steel was laid only a short time ago.

The problem is this, Mr. Chairman. On December 2, 1959, the C.P.R. made application to the board of transport commissioners to abandon this whole section of line. As I said a moment ago, you can imagine the concern and worry of the people living adjacent to that line when word came through. Immediately upon application by the Canadian Pacific to the board of transport commissioners to abandon that line a meeting was called of the people affected, and the then minister of northern affairs and national resources, now the Minister of Agriculture, and I attended the meeting. A retention committee was set up, chaired by Mr. A. G. Kneeshaw—Mr. Sundstrom was secretary and Mr. Bildfell was treasurer—with members from every municipal administration along the area. They developed a very good brief or representation to make to the board of transport commissioners in their application to oppose the abandonment application. I should like to give the committee a few figures because I think those gentlemen are to be congratulated on the very good job they did in developing this brief. I give this information because I think this problem is pertinent to a lot of other places in western Canada and is of particular interest at this time when we hear recommendations from the MacPherson royal commission on the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National suggesting the necessity of cutting down services on these lines.

The population living along this line is considerable. I should like to give the committee a list of the names of the towns affected. They are as follows: Ewart, Ebor, Maryfield, Fairlight, Walpole, Wawota, Dumas, Kennedy, Bender, Neelby, Windthorst, Baring, Deveron and Adair. Chief among these 14 towns or villages are the towns of Maryfield, Fairlight, Wawota, Kennedy and Windthorst.

In these particular villages and towns are 23 elevators. I mention elevators because years ago in the west when this line was put through it was with the chief idea of transporting livestock and grain which were produced in those rural areas. As a result, the construction of these numerous elevators has been a very important part of the economy of those particular towns. I should like to say to the committee that it is still very important. I was interested in some of the figures compiled by the retention committee. It seems that in the nine year period from 1931 to 1940, the average production of grain at that time was 814,100 bushels. In the 11 year period from 1949 to 1959 the average was 2,280,000 bushels, almost three times as much. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that it is very important to the people living along that line that this fact be considered because we still think there is no other medium besides railways to move efficiently and effectively bulk products such as grain. We do have a road system out there. It is not as modern as some of the roads in the more populated areas. They are gravel roads which are used for the trucking of a certain amount of livestock, but the basic commodity is still grain and it is the basic concern of the people in the area.

Let me give a brief run-down of the population and some of the cost figures. I should like to include some of the figures of the population of the villages and hamlets affected. They are: adults, 617; children, 412; total, 1,029. The population on farms is as follows: adults, 1,326; children, 1,153; total, 2,479, or a grand total of 3,508, who are directly affected, both socially and economically, by the application to remove this line.

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, there would be too much objection to the over-all principle of a cut-back in service on the railroad, but when the application was for the total abandonment of it you can imagine how serious it would be to this portion of the population.

Let me give a résumé of the household property. These figures were arrived at by the retention committee through sending out a questionnaire to every householder affected by the railway abandonment. The questionnaire was quite lengthy and interesting. They got a very comprehensive and informative set of figures. The total value of householder property affected is $1,569,470. The amount spent in construction and remodelling since 1940 totals $813,380. The estimated loss if this line were abandoned is $784,645.

In so far as business properties are concerned, I might say that the value of land for privately owned and public buildings including halls, rinks, churches, schools, etc., is $73,066; value of buildings, $1,145,950; value of equipment and stock, $790,868. The total value amounts to $2,009,884. The estimated cost of rehabilitation should this line be abandoned is $411,400.

I have been dealing with the urban area, and I should like now to deal with the rural area. The number of farm units affected is 662. The number of acres of farm land in the affected area amounts to 420,630; the number of acres cultivated, 242,027. There are 480 owners, 120 owners and tenants and 62 tenants in this area. The estimated value of farm land is $8,956,985. The improvements since 1940 amount to $2,252,650. The value of machinery purchased since 1940 is $6,388,994. The total value of all buildings and machinery on farms amounts to $8,641,644.

The area affected is a prosperous mixed farming community. This committee secured figures to indicate the total amount of livestock on this particular land. The livestock total is made up as follows: cattle, 21,124; sheep and swine, 3,341; chickens, 27,390, with a total value of $2,942,340. The total elevator capacity of towns on the line is 1,052,000 bushels. The amount of grain storage required is estimated at 953,500 bushels. The estimated cost of providing this storage is $358,150.

The committee also gathered some statistics concerning what it would cost the municipalities to provide roads in order to assist the farmers in moving their grain by truck should the line be abandoned. The estimated mileage of the new roads necessary is 144 miles. The estimated cost per mile is $3,860. The estimated cost of bridges is $27,900. The estimated loss to buildings and property would be $84,500, for a total of $116,260. The estimated yearly cost of extra road maintenance is $19,442.50 and the estimated yearly loss of taxes, $10,991.04. The total of these two items is $30,433.54.

In so far as the villages affected are concerned, the number of persons who would be put out of work is 33. Since these 33 people are the heads of families, the total number of people involved would be 126. The yearly loss of taxes on railway property would amount to $2,832.99; the yearly loss of taxes on elevator property, $6,749.02; the yearly loss of taxes on other businesses, $2,996.37. The total of these items is $12,578.38 The total estimated loss to municipalities and villages, therefore, would be $159,271.92.

These figures roughly represent urban and rural property, businesses, livestock, machinery and so on with a total value of about $25 million. Then, of course, there would be the social and economic effects on the lives of about 3,500 people. Following these representations to the board of transport commissioners a hearing was held by the board at Moosomin on June 20 of last year and an order was issued by the board on December 12, 1960. This order reads as follows:

In the matter of the application of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, under section 168 of the Railway Act, for an order authorizing the abandonment of its operation between Reston, in the province of Manitoba, and Wolseley, in the province of Saskatchewan, being all of the Reston-Wolseley subdivision, a distance of 122.18 miles:

H. H. Griffin, assistant chief commissioner; J. M. Woodard, commissioner; W. R. Irwin, commissioner; ...

It is hereby ordered as follows:

1. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is authorized to abandon operation of its Reston-Wolseley subdivision between Reston, in the province of Manitoba, and Wolseley, in the province of Saskatchewan, a distance of 122.18 miles.

2. The said abandonment shall not take place earlier than the first day of August, 1961, on not less than ninety days' prior notice forwarded to the municipalities, towns, villages, elevator companies and elevator associations located along the line to be abandoned; a copy of the said notice shall also be filed with the board.

This decision, Mr. Chairman, caused a great deal of surprise and alarm among the people of the area because they felt that the strong representations they made and the statistics they presented concerning the effect of the abandonment on their economy, would have caused the board of transport commissioners to find in favour of their petition. As a result of this finding, the committee had recourse to two alternatives. The first was to apply to the Supreme Court of Canada on the basis of legal technicality, if there were any, existing in the order. Of course, the members of this transport board are qualified gentlemen and there were not any such loopholes in the authorization. The other alternative the committee had was to apply to the governor in council under section 53 of the Railway Act which reads as follows:

The governor in council may at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the board, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope and application; and any order that the governor in council may make with respect thereto is binding upon the board and upon all parties.

I might say that the railway retention committee has taken advantage of the provisions of section 53 of the Railway Act and has made representations to the governor in council to have this order rescinded. I should like to suggest through you, Mr. Chairman, to our good minister that he give every consideration to this application to have the order rescinded. I feel that this should be done on the basis of the following grounds, and I shall mention at least three important factors.

First, I feel that the decision was premature and the board should have awaited the report of the MacPherson royal commission. In the second place, when one compares the evidence and facts presented in connection with this application for the abandonment of the Reston-Wolseley line with several other applications for abandonment made at approximately the same time, one finds glaring inconsistencies in the order authorizing the abandonment of the line. I feel that this is something that should be looked into. The third point concerns some compromise arrangement. Not too far distant from the Reston-Wolseley line is another line operated by the Canadian National which I mentioned earlier crosses at Maryfield, and I feel that rather than cut out all the services on either one of these lines a compromise arrangement might have been made whereby these two lines would have been merged into a circuit; then the railways might operate one train a week to remove the grain from along the route and the freight from the towns in the affected area.

There is one other point that should be mentioned, namely the economic factors involved in connection with these rural villages and towns if there were a complete abandonment of the line. We all realize that the railroads developed the west and made it known as the breadbasket of the world in the last 50 years.

I might suggest that this is one of the better farming areas in that part of Saskatchewan. It is interesting to note that it has one of the highest concentrations of population in that part of the farming area. It is also interesting to note that it has one of the highest livestock populations per capita of any place in Saskatchewan. In addition, the area is noted for some of the highest quality livestock. This fact was most forcibly brought to my attention a year ago last fall when I was attending the royal winter fair in Toronto. I made inquiries from some of the people in charge of the livestock exhibits there. They told me that 101 head of cattle had been selected from Saskatchewan for exhibition at the royal winter fair. I was greatly interested and proud to note that, out of the 101 head of livestock being exhibited at Toronto, 36 head came from the riding of Moose Mountain. This information indicates the calibre of the livestock raised there and of the people engaged in producing these high quality products.

I feel that the mechants and business people in these towns, particularly the major ones I mentioned, would suffer great hardships both economically and socially, if the line were completely removed and they were forced to sacrifice their businesses, because that is what it would mean. It is extremely hard to remove a business lock, stock and barrel and to find an economic opening somewhere else, as in some neighbouring town. The result is that these people would never be able to overcome the economic loss they would suffer through abandonment of that line.

As I mentioned earlier, the elevator companies affected would also be serious losers in any move like this. I should like to mention in passing that there are seven different grain companies situated on this line. These are the Manitoba pool, Searle Grain Company, Saskatchewan wheat pool, Parrish and Heimbecker, National Grain Company, Lake of the Woods Company and N. M. Patterson Company. The other 16 elevators out of the 23 elevators I mentioned are made up of the wheat pools, either the Manitoba pool or the Saskatchewan pool, and I think one other town has a National Grain Company elevator.

I think one of the salient features is the fact that, in the handling of agricultural products in the west, grain elevators perform one of the basic functions. Most people from the west will appreciate what I am referring to now. If the line were abandoned completely, it would mean having these elevators demolished at some cost and possibly having them reassembled at other points at a loss or possibly it would mean a complete loss. In addition, abandonment of the line would make it necessary for people living in the rural areas to transport grain over greater distances, as I have pointed out, at greater cost to municipalities trying to provide roads and so on.

On the basis of the foregoing information I most emphatically protest the proposed abandonment of the Reston-Wolseley subdivision of the Canadian Pacific Railway and would ask the minister to give this matter, when it comes to his attention before the governor in council, his very earnest and serious consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, at the very outset of my remarks I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) to a problem concerning more particularly the municipality of St. Hubert in my constituency of Chambly-Rouville.

My suspicion that a problem will come up in a year or two arises from an article which I read in the Montreal Gazette of April 19 last, concerning the establishment of a NORAD control centre at St. Hubert airport. No doubt you will allow me to read into the record part of this article in order to point to the nature of the problem and explain it, and above all to indicate the solution which I intend to suggest to the Department of Transport in order to settle it. Here is the article of the Canadian Press which apparently originated in Ottawa:

(Text):

The headquarters of the largest and possibly most vital of the regions through which North American Air Defence Command exercises operational control over combat forces will go underground next year, informed sources said yesterday.

The headquarters will be moved from the R.C.A.F. base at St. Hubert, to an underground combat centre at Trout lake near North Bay.

The move is merely awaiting completion of the centre which will house the SAGE—semi-automatic ground environment—electronic system which will control the operations of both manned and unmanned interceptors.

(Translation):

This is not confirmed news, but merely a rumour circulating in military circles and more particularly at army headquarters.

In that case, it seems to me that St. Hubert airport would become a less important military airport and that the number of civilians now working there would probably decrease.

Mr. Chairman, if it is true that such a decision is to be taken by the Department of National Defence, I shall accept the sound reasons advanced for it since this is an important defence problem.

If such a decision were to be arrived at, the government would have the responsibility of using that airport for civilian purposes. If it is decided to remove all the airmen now posted at St. Hubert, the airport will be free and may become a completely civil airport. If they only cut down the military forces, the airport will still be available for civil purposes. I would therefore suggest to the Department of Transport to consider the possibility of making use of the St. Hubert facilities for civil purposes and it is my opinion that this could be done as soon as the authorities of the Department of National Defence decide to move out since there is already some talk about decentralizing the Dorval services. And it will probably be necessary to plan for a civil airport in some other place for test flights or for passenger or freight services.

Mr. Chairman, I offer that suggestion to the Minister of Transport, knowing that he will refer it to the proper person and that he will see to it that his officials study it calmly in order to determine whether it is not possible to reach some practical decision.

I offer that suggestion in quite a selfish intention in my capacity as the member for Chambly-Rouville since the idea is to prevent family wage earners in the St. Hubert, Chambly, St. Bruno, Beloeil and St. Hilaire area from losing their livelihood because of that necessary and warranted decision of the Department of National Defence which could have a serious impact if the government should decide not to make use of that airport.

I know the wisdom of the Conservative government, the Conservative cabinet, and particularly the wisdom of the Minister of Transport and I do not think that there will be any recurrence of what happened under former regimes, according to reports—we will not see any completely abandoned airports that are not used for civilian purposes, when civilian aviation facilities are greatly needed.

Mr. Chairman, may I now examine another problem, namely the problem of passenger transportation from downtown Montreal to Dorval airport. I asked a question to the Minister of Transport in that connection. I asked him if he would forward a suggestion to the railways. I asked him if it would not be possible for the railway companies to provide rail transportation between Dorval and the large hotels and railway stations in downtown Montreal.

I received letters of appreciation in this connection, indicating that such a solution in itself was excellent. There were even some newspaper articles. The next week the Montreal Star published a study of the question. It had to do with questions to the railway companies and the air lines.

The air lines were obviously most favourable, but the railways were reticent. Yet, if the C.P.R. does not want to do anything, the C.N.R. could possibly examine the possibility of such a service.

Allow me, sir, to quote part of an article written by Alfred Ayotte about that matter in La Presse of March 4, 1961—please forgive the personal references, my modesty will suffer—I quote:

> The suggestion of the member for Chambly-Rouville, Mr. Maurice Johnson, to establish a railway link between the Dorval air terminal and Montreal central station is excellent. We must add that it is excellent in principle, because according to information we have been able to gather, there would be some difficulties in the implementation of such a suggestion. The Minister of Transport, Hon. Mr. Balcer, has passed on to the C.N.R. Mr. Johnson's idea and he has admitted that it has created keen interest among the public.
> After what the newspapers have published about the existence of a taxi monopoly at Dorval airport and the inconvenience that resulted for patrons, a railroad would be a relief.
>
> Railway travel offers two advantages: speed and low fares. Would it not be wonderful to leave the plane and get aboard a commuter train to reach downtown Montreal in a short time as it is done in Belgium and as it is probably done in Italy? Indeed, some airports are serviced by trains elsewhere in the world.
> A little train takes only twenty minutes to cover the distance between the Brussels airport and the Belgian capital.

After a rapid calculation, I would say that it would take about that time to travel from Dorval to the centre of the city. I will now continue my quotation:

> Travellers only have to go down a staircase to reach ground level. In Brussels itself, the trains reach the station underground. The fare is only the equivalent of 50 cents, in Canadian currency.
>
> Will we be getting the same thing in Montreal? The railroads are non-committal on that point. They are considering the question from a financial point of view and wondering whether a line a few miles long or a few acres of tracks and the inauguration of frequent commuter trains on tracks which are already quite busy, would be profitable.
> If they go by the number of passengers in 1960-61, they may well doubt that such a new train service would be profit-making; but if they stopped to consider that in five to ten years from now, the number of passengers will have greatly increased, they would be justified to conclude that the income would justify the expenditure.
> In any case, the idea is in the air. It is now up to the railway people and to the Department of Transport to consider the matter and appraise the cost of railway development near the air terminal. If the project could materialize, it would bring about the solution of a ticklish transportation problem.

I would add, Mr. Chairman, that it would perhaps be desirable, when the railway companies change their schedules or their services, either by adding or removing trains, that their decisions be made known to the public. It did happen that railways had some lines in operation on a temporary basis, in anticipation of a special event or that they established new permanent lines without advertising them, in order that the general public might be informed and be able afterwards to use the facilities offered.

As an example, I take the case of the train between Granby and Montreal, when the Canadian National had established a train service in 1959 between those two places, for the duration of the centenary of Granby. Recently, representatives of the Canadian National were complaining of the lack of passengers on that train. It so happened that nobody knew, that publicity was lacking, perhaps as much on the part of the organizations responsible for the centenary celebrations, but certainly on the part of the Canadian National. That is why the service did not have the success desired or hoped for.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore submit this problem to the attention of the minister. I would ask him to put the necessary pressure on the railway companies, in order that they may consider this problem and take a decision, rather than have the matter shelved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I take the liberty of commenting on a matter which does not come directly under the Minister of Transport. I do not want the minister to think that I am in any way blaming his department or his officials in this regard. However, I should like to deal with this matter just the same, because it is of general interest and the company involved, the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, must, to a certain extent, be subject to the authority of the board of transport commissioners which comes under the Department of Transport.

Time and time again, in cases of emergency, people have to dial a number to reach someone, without knowing that number. In such cases, they dial the numbers of the Bell Telephone Company information service.

God knows how long the operators take before answering. We have the same thing in the long distance service at night. Of course, I cannot believe it is the operators' fault, unless I am shown evidence to the contrary. It seems to me that their number is much too limited for the requirements of the job. It is time that the company attempt to better that service because, when it applies to the board of transport commissioners for an increase in rates, it will be extremely difficult for the customers to accept any increase.

When the company applied for an increase not so long ago, if I remember correctly, it alleged some extension to or improvement of its services. Since then, I did not notice anything of the kind with regard to information or long distance services. As I said before, it is certainly not the operator's fault if there are too few of them. It is the company's fault which refuses to employ enough people to ensure good service.

Mr. Chairman, as the voters in Chambly-Rouville know, I am particularly interested in the Richelieu seaway problem. I heard my colleagues make some improvised speeches on the subject. I also heard the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), earlier this evening, make a statement on that seaway issue. I would like to be able to examine the issue calmly and see what he did say in his speech. The hon. member dealt with the economic soundness of the project. If my memory serves me right, he said that according to various people the project would be economically sound. Now, I shall ask the hon. member, to name those people and authorities because that is precisely the most important point in respect of the Richelieu seaway project.

We cannot but wonder whether, once it is built, that seaway would pay its way. Unfortunately, I did not find any authority or any qualified and competent person having studied the problem who could tell us authoritatively whether the project would be economically sound.

Please note, Mr. Chairman, that I should like to hear someone say so, but I would like to know the people, and be given the references according to whom and which the seaway would be sound, if it were built. That is the most significant point, and because the economic soundness of the project is still unknown, the chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec does not ask this government to undertake the Richelieu seaway project now, alone, or jointly with the government of the United States, without previous consideration.

The Quebec chambers of commerce which are anxious to arouse public interest for this project, dare not maintain that the seaway would be economically sound. What is requested by the chambers of commerce of the province of Quebec and by all the experts who have studied the problem, is that a study be made of the feasibility of the scheme. At the December meeting, which was attended by the member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) and the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville—whom I did not see before the banquet in the evening—and also by a number of people interested in the scheme, no one among all the experts and among all those who had studied the scheme was able to answer this question of the economic feasibility. I even raised the question with a representative of the port of New York who was giving a talk on the subject. Questions had to be put down in writing, so I wrote my question, and when it came up, the chairman of the panel—it was no doubt a diplomatic gesture—referred the question to a town planner who had been studying the problem. No, I am sorry, he asked the question of another person, a Montreal economist, I think, who came up with some general considerations but would not come out with a definite conclusion.

Though I have been dealing with this matter of economic feasibility, Mr. Chairman, I would not want the voters or rather the people concerned in the Richelieu area, to think I am against the scheme. I merely raise the question in the hope of getting an answer. I suggested last week, as I did in other speeches and in private conversations, that the question be referred to a joint commission including a group of American representatives, or to a strictly Canadian body. After all, we must ask ourselves whether the Richelieu canal, once developed, would be in the best interest of Canada. That is the point.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in any sense anti-American. However, I am now reading a book written by an authority in the field, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), and I remember the Americans were not too enthusiastic about the St. Lawrence seaway. They had to be coaxed into it, and the Canadian government had to take the lead. Then when it comes to the Richelieu waterway, the Americans suddenly start pushing very hard. One is inclined to wonder whether they are not primarily seeking the interest of the United States, which would of course be quite legitimate. However, we must again ask ourselves, before getting involved, whether this scheme is economically feasible.

Having argued that the scheme would be economic, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville stressed the urgency of getting the work started and finally wound up by saying that everyone was asking for a study, and not for an immediate start on the actual work. That is the basic contradiction in the speech of the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville. We shall have to wait for the official translation of the speech made by the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville before quoting from it, but if I remember correctly, he said the St. Lawrence seaway had been inaugurated by a Conservative government in 1958. If I am not mistaken, Mr. Chairman, I think it was in 1959. I trust that the hon. member will correct his statement later. Anyway, the official opening was made in 1959 by a Conservative government.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to bore the house, but I think it is important in order to set the record straight that I take up certain statements the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville made about me. He criticized me, it seems, for not dealing with the deepening of the Richelieu. I dealt with that project only last Saturday. Besides, for his information, I would ask him to refer to the speech I made on June 11, 1959, in this house. I would suggest that he read it, so that he will be better informed and, perhaps, learn to make a speech with a purpose.

Since 1959, indeed since 1958, instead of crying from the house-tops that the government was doing nothing, I have endeavoured to get interviews to discuss this problem with the federal government authorities in order to get them interested in the problem. So, I firmly hope that the government will listen to my representations.

However, Mr. Chairman, I did not allow myself to discuss this project with political passion.

I could remind the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville of the courtesy he showed when he organized at his place a seminar of members of parliament, supposedly representative of the Richelieu region, but including only Liberal members.

[Mr. Johnson.]

As there were not enough Liberal members at the federal level, he added Liberal members of the provincial legislature, who of course have no direct interest in the study of this project, because it is the responsibility of the federal government, and not that of the provincial government, to settle that problem.

Mr. Chairman, when we criticize the Liberal members for having become talkative on the Richelieu waterway only in the last couple of years, I find it strange that they answer that they, at least, have done something.

It is indeed strange to note that the member for Laurier was the minister of transport when the St. Lawrence seaway was developed. It was claimed that his acceptance of becoming head of the seaway authority meant a sacrifice for him.

Surely the hon. member for Laurier knew that it was possible for the engineers, investigators and others studying the St. Lawrence seaway project to investigate at the same time the feasibility of a deepening of the Richelieu.

I understand that at the time the member for Laurier was looking westward from Ottawa, not eastward. He had his eyes set on Stormont. Since then, I understand he has moved to Mountain street, in the riding of Laurier.

Mr. Chairman, it is an odd thing to do for the former minister of transport and former president of the seaway authority and now member for Laurier to claim that this problem should be considered.

I repeat: why did he not see to it at the time that the St. Lawrence seaway authorities consider the deepening of the Richelieu when it was the time to do it, when everything was organized for a complete study and, especially, an economic survey?

Mr. Chairman, to come back to this matter of economic feasibility, let me put on the record a last explanation.

I have asked the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville to quote the authorities who could prove that the deepening of the Richelieu would be a paying proposition. I have here a survey entitled:

Improvement of the Champlain Waterway: An Exploratory Investigation by Richard Clark Tefft—Abstract of Thesis—Submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Arts in Political Science in the Graduate School of Syracuse University. January, 1956.

(Translation):

Here is what it says about the economic feasibility of the Richelieu river project.

(Text):

Finally, I do not think that the ultimate decision as to whether or not the waterway should be deepened and, if so, to what depth, should be overly influenced by cost-benefit ratios. I do not deny the usefulness of ratios, but a dollar and cent sign cannot possibly be hung on the defence value of an improved waterway. Then too, I am struck with the highly problematical nature of benefit estimates. They cannot accurately take into account the future, if for no other reason than that they do not know what it will be. This is particularly true in a region that appears to be about to undergo the unusually rapid change that seems to be in store for the Champlain basin. It seems to me that only the most subjective measures of benefits can be made of this project and that the value of a deeper channel cannot be judged only in terms of the waterway. To be meaningful its value must be determined as an integral part of the entire regional development now in process including the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, the proposed northway, and the New York state thruway.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must tell him that his time has expired.

(Text):

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal briefly with tolls on the Welland ship canal. In 1958 the tolls committee of the St. Lawrence seaway set tolls for the operation of the canal in order to amortize the $29 million in capital costs involved in deepening the canal, over a period of 50 years. This was done on the basis of a 1959 tonnage forecast of 40 million tons, and a 1960 forecast of 43 million tons. During those two years the total tonnage that passed through the canal was 25 million tons below the estimate.

The income forecast for 1959 was $2 million, and the actual income was $1.2 million. The estimated income for 1960 was $2.2 million, but the actual was $1.3 million. The income was therefore down $1.7 million under the estimate. We find also that the cost of the operation is much higher than the estimate. As a result of this, the net revenues do not meet the operating costs.

I have always taken the position that charging tolls on the Welland canal would in effect toll lock all the ports around lake Ontario, as well as those on the Welland canal. Ships and cargos have free access from lake Erie to the head of the lakes. Ships cannot get out of lake Ontario without paying a toll, and I suggest this is an unjust discrimination against the ports on the shores of lake Ontario.

Most of the plants in Ontario which make use of waterborne traffic are situated on the shores of lake Ontario and the Welland canal. Industry located along the Welland canal when it was toll free. Industry has expanded and developed there on the assumption, and rightly so, that the canal would always be toll free.

The Welland canal was adequate for the purposes for which it was designed before its deepening, and the deepening of the canal did not provide any assistance to the plants to which I have referred. During the first year, its deepening was a hindrance rather than an assistance, because their own canal boats were held up by the slower European boats using the canal. I know of two or three instances when plant boats were held up as long as 12 hours.

Paper companies could not make use of deep draught boats because they obtain their pulpwood down along the St. Lawrence and around the shores of lake Superior, in areas that did not have deep harbours for loading. They therefore must use shallow draught boats.

There have been rumours in the area of the Welland ship canal that the canal is going to be twin locked. New industry will not settle there, nor will the industries which are there enlarge, because of the uncertainty of the policy of the government in this connection. I say this is uncertain, because of the fact that if new locks were built, and the cost was amortized over a period of over 40 or 50 years, the position of the plants along that canal would be economically untenable.

The tolls on the Welland canal were imposed, as I have said, in an attempt to amortize the original cost of deepening over 50 years as well as to pay operating costs.

At the present time the United States is spending $150 million to deepen the channels in the Detroit river, the St. Clair river and St. Mary river. I have seen references in the press two or three times reporting that the Americans have said they have the right to recover tolls in connection with the deepening of that part of their waterway if we collect tolls because of the deepening of the Welland canal.

I may say also that industries situated near the locks at Sault Ste. Marie have access to their properties without paying any toll. I think it is only right that industries along the Welland canal should have the same privilege.

The tolls structure was to be examined in five years. This would be in the fall of 1963. It strikes me that the capital cost, including the deficits, might easily be somewhere between $35 million and $40 million instead of the estimated $29 million. Therefore, at that time we would need to amortize the $35 million to $40 million over 45 years instead of the $29 million over 50 years. To my mind that would put up the tolls even if we did not have any twinning of the locks. This creates uncertainty in the minds of people in the industries in that area. They have two uncertainties, one because of the deficits, and the other because of their fear of twinning of those locks. If the locks are twinned and they are charged for it in tolls it certainly will be disastrous for their industries. I would say that industries in my part of the country look at this matter with some concern. I should like to hear the minister pass some comment on it.

Mr. Small: I had almost given up hope that I would get on tonight. I am always glad to take the adjournment.

I covered a certain amount of the subject matter in connection with the Canadian National Railways when I spoke last but there are one or two things that I should like to clear up. The hon. member for Vancouver East touched on the matter of passenger service and dealt particularly with reservations. Without repeating what he said I can verify or corroborate everything that he said in regard to the matter of reservations and of having to wait and when you get to the train you find space had not been all booked up as you had been told. But the part that impresses me very much—and I think most hon. members have come to the same conclusion—is that the directors, whether it is the head of the board of directors or others, have come to the conclusion that they should try to fold up the passenger service in this country because it is not a paying proposition. Therefore, they are going to do their best to get rid of it. It is not a very easy thing to do because the minute a passenger line is slated for cancellation of course the members in that particular area are seized upon by their constituents and are asked to see that something is done about it through bringing it to the attention of the Minister of Transport.

Hon. members have been congratulating the minister all night. Probably the minister deserves our sympathy and condolences in his holding of this position because generally he is the whipping boy. He has to take the whip lash of every person in this house who has a grievance from his constituents, or from a person who was laid off by the railway. They come to the house and they confront him with the situation and he has to tell them that he will take it up with the president or the chairman of the board of directors. Then he comes back with the story that they have done their best but they could not avoid laying them off. They have to give them all a chance. This is what the Minister of Transport has to go through. It is not only this minister but the previous minister. They all go through the very same thing. The pattern is the same. They have to go off and come back with a story which alleviates the situation. Peace reigns until the next time someone is laid off. The whole sum and substance of the problem is that the railway passenger service is not paying and the managers of the railway have to fold it up.

What I say is that if the passenger service is not paying, then the wisest thing to do is to terminate it. But if the railroads are going to continue it, then they should give service. It is no use running a service that is down at the heels and is on a hodge-podge basis. If they are going to give service they should give the very best service there is. I do not think they are even trying to do that. If they were trying to give service, then they would have the trains running on time and they would be giving of their best; they would be giving what could be called a high-class service.

I have spoken time after time in the house and tried to depict what took place at the Ottawa station and also at the Toronto station. Whenever I ran into what I called shabby or sloppy service I would bring it up. When I first started I tried to put a little humour into it and depict it as I saw it. I tried to make sure I was not being too severe, but what I did was just entertain hon. members, and they thought it was nothing more than good humour. But when I started to comment upon the board of directors who I thought should do something about it, well, then, I saw there was a little change. They did attempt to do something about the situation in Ottawa; but surely they did not have to wait for 20 years to try to do something about improving the service in Ottawa. I will say this for them. They have taken the trouble to so bring in the trains as to make it easier for the people to get off the trains and come to the station. They now do not have to walk so far. The reason why I took this attitude was that I had seen some passengers who could hardly walk; they were lame or handicapped, and there was no service to help them carry their grips. Some of the people were obviously infirm or had heart conditions. They were subject to the inconvenience of having to walk a long distance.

Then I checked into the way in which the freight and also the baggage were handled, in the stations. I do not blame men for trying to earn their living; they are doing what they are told. They took the baggage from the express and they put it on a lorry. What did they do with it? They ran it over to No. 3 bay and put it on another car, waiting there, instead of taking a truck or a car as it comes in to the bay and then transferring it over to another vehicle. That would save a lot of time and not inconvenience the passengers or the people in the station. One fellow said to me, "Why do they not do it this way?" I looked at him and said, "My dear friend, do you not understand why they do not do it that way? It is quite obvious they do not do it that way because it is the simple and proper way. That is why they are not doing it that way".

Mr. Chevrier: Ten thirty.

Mr. Small: May I take my turn next time?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business will be for tomorrow and Saturday, and could we get some indication of what we will be doing next week?

Business of the House

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will carry on with the estimates of the Department of Transport and follow with the estimates of the Department of Justice; that is, for Friday and Saturday. Monday and Tuesday—

Mr. Chevrier: Pardon me; does that mean if we do not finish transport we shall take some other department on Saturday?

Mr. Churchill: No, we intend to finish—I am sure everybody wants to finish transport tomorrow—and this would leave Saturday open for the Department of Justice; but we will complete transport first. Then, on Monday and Tuesday we will deal with legislation and the house will be prepared for the items now on the order paper. I will announce tomorrow night the exact order in which they will be taken.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. PRESIDENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Following the usual custom I intend to make a statement concerning some of the matters which were discussed between President Kennedy and myself, in order to amplify to some extent the terms of the communiqué which, as is the case with all communiqués—and I emphasize the comprehensiveness of that statement—did not cover in particular, or deal in detail, with what has taken place, for reasons which will be obvious to most people.

The President placed before parliament his views on certain major issues before us, and what he said to me personally was, of course, consistent with what he said in parliament although amplified in considerable detail. The scope of the discussions was set forth in the communiqué. While the nature of some of the subjects discussed denies that they be given public utterance, I think I can properly report on some of the main topics of the discussion.

As far as the world situation in general is concerned, there is a continuing crisis as the Soviet union wages its campaign for global domination, and the dust clouds of soft words and the periodic soft answers must not be allowed to delude anyone into believing that the Soviet challenge will not continue with unabated, or even increased, determination. However, today an announcement was made which all the world hopes will lead to an amelioration of relations between east and west. I refer, of course, to the prospective meeting between the President of the United States and Chairman Krushchev. Immdiately on his arrival, when we met together personally, the President gave me that information, and we both expressed the hope that out of that meeting in Vienna in consequence of the personal exchange of views might come, in the interests of humanity as a whole, that degree of agreement which has been the expectation and the hope of manking since 1946.

As far as our relations with the United States and the western hemisphere are concerned, President Kennedy laid strong emphasis on them, both in his public and in his private discussions. We reviewed the problems facing all the countries of North and South America, and noted the situation, among a number of these countries, in connection with different ranges and stages of economic development, and the special situations in regard to their social and political structures which have such a bearing on both their development and stability.

The President would welcome Canada's participation in the organization of American states. This, of course, has been discussed and was recently discussed in this house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. So far as this question is concerned, which has been a continuing one throughout the year for the consideration of governments of Canada, it is still in that category and, of course, no commitments were made, or would be made, without parliament being made aware in advance of any such action.

I was much impressed with the emphasis which the President placed on the importance of the problems confronting our two countries' hemispheric affairs. I assured him that his views would be the subject of serious consideration. I referred to his reviews respecting membership in the organization of American states and the other problems that are incidental to that membership, and I should hope, that at an early date parliament will have the opportunity, if it so desires, of discussing this question.

With reference to Cuba, I made it clear to the President that the Canadian government has no intention of acting as mediator between the United States and Cuba. Indeed, as stated before, there was no foundation for the press report that such an offer had been put forward.

We discussed the affairs of southeast Asia, and particularly the situation in Laos and South Viet Nam. We are agreed on the objective of establishing a truly independent and neutral Laos, and of the necessity of securing general support for effective control machinery; because only if this is done will the Laos situation be resolved and peace and stability attained in southeast Asia. We discussed the experience of the international control and supervisory commissions, on which Canada has been serving, and the vital importance of the role of these commissions was emphasized.

It is natural that the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations at the next session of the general assembly should have been canvassed, and we agreed to consult together, therefore, in the next few months in respect of this subject, because it will not come up for consideration until September.

The policies and programs of our countries in relation to underdeveloped nations received attention. We recognize that we now have, in the development assistance group, a new forum for reviewing and co-ordinating our programs in this field. I placed before the President, with some degree of pride, the outstanding record of Canada in aiding other countries since the end of world war II, and I also pointed out the very substantial increase in Colombo aid and in the general scale of aid that has been given since 1958.

There was some considerable discussion in the field of economic affairs. I pointed out that Canada has a tremendous balance of payments deficit in commodity trade, and that this was a matter that had to be resolved. Each of our countries is by a wide margin the other's most important trading partner. With the great volume and complexity of our economic relations it is realized that problems will arise, but what is of paramount importance is that these problems be met through discussion, by regular consultation and free exchanges of views and the continuing spirit of good will.

The European economic community and the tariff relationships now being worked out were discussed at length. Both countries have been working actively to ensure that trading relationships with this community should favour the maintenance and development of a large volume of trade in each direction. The importance of trading relationships with Europe would be considerably enhanced if the United Kingdom government decided to join the Six in the common market.

The problem that is common to both of us, namely farm surpluses, especially wheat, was discussed. We agreed to continue to work closely together in this field. I know the house will endorse the views expressed by the President on Wednesday about food surpluses and how to make constructive use of them. The food for peace program already embodies many of those ideas. I express my appreciation of the support which the United States has given to the Canadian suggestion for a food bank made at the U.N. and the F.A.O. My expectation is that some more specific proposals in this regard will be placed before the United Nations assembly in September.

Questions of defence were discussed mostly in connection with NATO. Emphasis was laid on the increase in the capability of the alliance to wage war defensively with conventional forces in order to reduce the likelihood of having to rely more extensively upon nuclear weapons for defence.

In so far as NATO is concerned, the views I expressed to the President were that with a population of about 400 million people and with a gross national product four tims that of the Soviet union, the NATO nations possess great strength, but that the strengthening of unity in NATO is a continuing imperative and must not be neglected. I believe that the leaders of the NATO countries will have to advance further than the steps already taken to strengthen wider unity, not only in defence but economically and even politically.

The position of affairs in West Berlin was discussed. It is of great importance to Canada, and Canadians should realize this fact; for Canada has undertaken, along with its NATO allies, serious commitments in regard to West Berlin and the maintenance of the freedom of the people of that city.

The President told me of what was taking place in Geneva from the point of view of the United States, and of the endeavour in particular to reach agreement on a pact to end nuclear testing. I believe that as we endeavour to bring about disarmament, an effective treaty to end nuclear testing is a basic step before any disarmament of a more general character can be achieved. I believe we must continue to press for controlled disarmament and in particular, in the light of the progress of the last few years in the upper skies and the recent achievements of Commander Shepard and Major Gagarin, we face the stern fact that without international control of space the future will be even more perilous than the present.

In so far as our purposes are concerned, I am of those who have advocated not only to the President but on other occasions that we in the free world should explain our purposes, our ideals, our aims, to the non-committed world to a degree that we have not done heretofore. I found in my trip to Asia some years ago that too often the interpretation of what we stand for has been left to the whims of the communists. Indeed, I believe that in 1918 when President Wilson made his declaration, and again in 1941 with the Atlantic charter, these declarations had a tremendous effect; and I feel that today the ideals of the free world should be restated in simple terms so that all mankind will know that we have joined in a declaration of principles, and that all with recognize in these principles the equality of races and will condemn discrimination in any form.

I think all of us were very pleased at the manner in which Canadians received the President and his wife. I want to say particularly now much I appreciated the fact that, while no arrangements had been made for him to meet the members of this house and the other place, as soon as I suggested it to him on the evening of his arrival he said he fully understood that this would be the proper course to follow and in keeping with the responsibility discharged by the parliamentarians of this country. We recognize President Kennedy as the courageous, inspiring leader of the free world. He bears a tremendous burden. His concern is great: his dedication is great. I think our meeting together was worth while in every sense of the word, for it underlined that spirit of co-operation between our nations that is a model for all mankind.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the house are grateful to the Prime Minister for the statement he has made, and which gives some indication of the extensive character of the discussions between himself and the President of the United States on the occasion of the latter's visit to our country. As the Leader of the Opposition said, speaking outside this house, the visit of the President of the United States was both a happy and an important event. It was to be hoped that the agreeable character of this visit was shared not only by Canadians but by citizens of the United States generally. It is well that we should underline the importance of a visit from the head of state and the head of government of the most powerful country in the free world. This visit of President Kennedy will take its place with the visits of some of his predecessors, notably President Roosevelt, President Truman and President Eisenhower.

The Prime Minister has said that the communiqué which followed the discussions between the two heads of government was of such a general character that it should not be presumed to have covered even in any measure of generality the discussions which took place between him and the President. I am sure the Prime Minister will not misunderstand me if I say that while his statement this morning was much more extended than was the communiqué itself, nevertheless the statement this morning likewise is in such general terms that it is not possible to derive a clear appreciation of the full nature of the discussions that took place. I am not complaining; the character of international affairs requires that negotiations should at certain stages be conducted in secret. However, it is only proper to point out that the range of subjects which formed the basis of discussion between the President and the Prime Minister was of such a character as to give us at this time not much more than an indication of the nature of the discussions.

It is important to note that the Prime Minister said the June confrontation between President Kennedy and Chairman Khrushchev was a matter that was mentioned during their talks. This is an extremely important development. We can only hope that the necessary preparations will attend both President Kennedy and Chairman Khrushchev in this very important meeting which, I take it, is not of the nature of a summit meeting in the sense in which that meeting was understood last May. It is to be a brief meeting between the two heads of government. In any event, I am sure the Prime Minister would want Canadians generally to note that too much should not be expected from such a meeting. It would be better to have concrete results flow unexpectedly rather than to raise the anticipations of the Canadian and other nations and their peoples.

The Prime Minister said that he and the President discussed matters having to do with our relations with South and Central America. Indeed, in his memorable statement in this house the President called upon Canada to share to an even greater measure the responsibilities of hemispheric consultation and direction. The statement he made about Canadian participation in the organization of American states was couched in such terms as to warrant one in believing he had some reason for thinking that the government was going to make an important decision in this regard.

As the Prime Minister has said, it is not without significance that in the foreign affairs debate in this house two weeks ago, proposals were made for Canadian participation in the organization of American states, notably by the Leader of the Opposition. Since that time there has been a manifestation of increasing Canadian interest in the participation by Canada in the organization of American states and at the same time, in the face of what the Prime Minister has said today and what the President of the United States said in his speech here on Wednesday last, it would seem that the Canadian government is giving active consideration to participation in the organization of American states. If the government does announce its intention to participate in the organization of American states, the Prime Minister may be assured, it will receive the support of the members of the party on whose behalf I am now speaking, for we believe that the time has come when this step should be taken.

The Prime Minister referred to a whole series of other matters that were discussed, including the situation in Asia and the situation in the Caribbean, as well as that in South America and in Central America and the admission of communist China to the United Nations. In that regard it is significant that the Prime Minister this morning said that further discussions between Canada and the United States will take place regarding this matter. The Prime Minister did not say whether, in his discussions with the President, note had been taken of the recent arrangements made with communist China for the sale of Canadian wheat and the relation of that arrangement, as noted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to the matter of Canadian recognition or Canadian acceptance of communist China in the United Nations.

Without traversing all the matters that were mentioned, among them the relation of the United States and Canada to the common market, I can only say that undoubtedly the Prime Minister meant to emphasize this morning the fact that he fully agreed with the President in what the latter had said as to the importance the government of the United States attaches to the organization known as O.E.C.D., which provides a liaison between certain countries, notably the United States and Canada, and the common market.

This visit of the President of the United States has come at a very important time in the administration of the new President. It has come at a very important time in the history of the world. This statement of the Prime Minister, couched in general terms, gives Canadians an opportunity of once again expressing their gratitude to the President for his visit and of once again affirming the friendship which this country has for the United States, recognizing as we do that an understanding between our two countries is essential in our own interests as well as in the interests of other countries which desire to see peace maintained at this time.

I should like to say that the words of the Prime Minister in this regard are echoed not only by those who sit on the treasury benches but by those of us who sit in the opposition and, I am sure, by the Canadian people generally. We are happy over this visit of the young President of the United States. We are happy because he affirmed the friendship of his country for us, and because he gave us an opportunity of letting him know that in matters of great moment at this critical time in human affairs, Canada understands not only its own responsibilities but those of the United States and other free countries which are anxious to pursue policies designed to maintain peace among the nations in this turbulent period of world affairs.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the visit to Canada of President Kennedy and his charming wife has been welcomed by all Canadians. The warmth of the reception given to the President and Mrs. Kennedy indicates the very friendly relationship between our country and the United States.

President Kennedy, when he spoke in this chamber, did so in a very forthright manner and left no room for misunderstanding about the attitude of the United States to important international events. I had expected the President of the United States to give us when he spoke here, as he did, in clear and concise terms the position of the United States on many vexing world problems. But I am not at all certain that when the President made it so clear to us what he wished Canada to do with regard to certain important and controversial problems, it was of assistance to Canadians in coming to a conclusion. I say this because the conclusions that we come to on these important questions must, most clearly, be our decisions made on the basis of what we believe to be in the interests of freedom, the improvement of living standards of the people of the world, and of peace.

The President made it clear that from his point of view he wished to see NATO strengthened, not only in the role of conventional weapons but also as far as nuclear armaments are concerned, and that he was prepared to sit down and consider the working out of some arrangement, I take it to broaden the control of nuclear weapons in the hands of NATO forces and forces attached to NATO.

While there may be some difference of opinion among the C.C.F. people and others who are interested in the New party on the question of NATO, there has been no difference at all in our attitude toward handing to NATO and all its members nuclear weapons to be placed in the hands of NATO troops. We oppose this particular policy, and should this be the policy adopted by the NATO organization we shall certainly oppose it when it is undertaken. NATO continues to be strictly a military organization, and over the years we have emphasized that article II was the part of the NATO treaty that we wished to see expanded and developed.

The President made reference to O.E.C.D., as did the Prime Minister this morning. We think this organization is important. We think Canada should play a most active part, and we hope that O.E.C.D. will see the economic development of the north Atlantic area, and from O.E.C.D. can go some of the economic help that will improve living standards in large areas of the world.

The President had another important proposition to put before us. That was his view with regard to the organization of American states. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have said that the government is giving careful consideration to whether or not Canada should decide to join the organization of American states.

I said in this house on a previous occasion that in my view the time had come for Canada to join the organization of American states. However, I am prepared, with the Prime Minister, to give further consideration to this most important question; because while I do see some advantage in being a member of the organization of American states in a time when we are able to deal in a cool and collected manner with the economic problems of the hemisphere, it does seem to me there may be a temptation on the part of some to develop the organization of American states to maintain the status quo in certain South American countries. Or even worse still, some may hope that it can be developed into a military organization, which we think would be a very serious mistake. We are considering this question as is the government, and we think the government is correct in giving the Canadian nation ample time to consider the pros and cons before making any decision to join this organization.

There was one important statement made by the Prime Minister this morning which I was sorry to hear. It was that there was no truth in the newspaper reports that our Secretary of State for External Affairs had offered to mediate between Cuba and the United States. I think such an offer from Canada would have been wise. We can now see that the United States would have quickly rejected it. None the less it does seem to me that in the interests of peace and in the interests of the economic development of the hemisphere there must be some mediation in the conflict between Cuba and the United States. If we are to keep communism out of the western hemisphere, as we all wish to do, we must not be found on the side of dictators, on the side of vested interests and opposed to the improvement of health, education and living standards of the people of Latin America.

The Prime Minister went on to make some reference to China. He referred to the need to reconsider the admission of China to the United Nations. The Canadian government has said there can be no recognition of China. I think that Canada is, in an economic sense, recognizing China. It would seem to me that to undertake trade relations of a very extensive kind with China is in fact a type of recognition.

No less a person than Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent was reported in the press as having said that in light of the trade relations being developed between Canada and China he thought it only sensible that representatives of our country should be stationed in China and representatives of China should be stationed in Canada. We think this is a sensible attitude, and that it is only a matter of time before we do grant this type of formal diplomatic recognition to China, from which we think would flow improved and increased trade with China.

The President went on to emphasize—and in this we wholeheartedly agree—the need for those nations in the western world which have high standards of living to give a part of their production to improve the economic standards of people in less fortunate countries. The Prime Minister says that Canada has a good record in this regard. I will not dispute that but I will say that Canada's record should be much better than it is; that a record of $70 million or $75 million of economic assistance during the current fiscal year is not enough; that the figure of 1 per cent of the gross national product mentioned by the President of the United States is something for which we could well strive. I am convinced that by providing economic assistance we could do more than in any other field toward maintaining peace and improving economic relations amongst the peoples of the world.

We are glad, Mr. Speaker, that the President of the United States and Mrs. Kennedy have made this visit to Ottawa.

JAPAN—STATEMENT ON VOLUNTARY CONTROLS ON EXPORTS TO CANADA

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of a letter, dated May 15, which I have received from the ambassador of Japan informing me of the voluntary restraints the Japanese government has decided to apply on the export of certain products to Canada for the year 1961. These decisions have been taken by the Japanese government following extensive consultations with the government of Canada. I assume the house will wish to have this letter printed as an appendix to Hansard. The comparable information concerning the Japanese voluntary controls for 1960 is found as an appendix to Hansard of May 5, 1960.

Perhaps I might make a few comments on the arrangements which have been made for 1961. It will be recalled that in 1959 and 1960 the Japanese government extended its voluntary controls to cover a wider range of textile products. Controls were maintained in 1960 on cotton fabrics, most cotton made-up goods, various garments of spun rayon and other synthetic fabrics and bedspreads and elastics of all fibres. All these products will, of course, remain under control this year. It has also been decided to add several new items to the list of products under quota control, namely dish towels, ladies' fabric dress gloves, nylon fabric and certain types of ribbons. Several quota categories which covered groups of miscellaneous products have been divided into smaller categories in order to avoid the risk of undue concentration on particular products. For several particularly sensitive textile products the quotas for 1961 are somewhat lower than for 1960, while for certain other products provision has been made for a moderate increase. The details of the arrangements for textiles are to be found in annex A to the ambassador's letter.

In mid-1960 Japan introduced for the first time a system of voluntary restraints on rubber footwear and rubber-soled canvas footwear. The levels of shipment in 1960 were not established on the basis of consultation between the two governments. For 1961, however, the Japanese government has consulted us about the nature and levels of the quotas to be applied on these products. The details will be found in annex B to the ambassador's letter.

There will now be two categories, waterproof footwear and canvas footwear. The category known as canvas footwear will now include shoes with rubber soles and fabric uppers of any kind. In particular it will include rubber-soled shoes with corduroy or velveteen uppers, which have been shipped to Canada in considerable quantity over the past six months. In order to make allowance for some of the shipments of these shoes which took place before the revised definition was adopted, a special quota of 360,000 pairs has been established for this year only. This is in addition to the basic quota on this product of 2,200,000 pairs.

As the house is aware, exports of plywood from Japan to Canada have been subject to voluntary export control for several years. Owing to the difficulty of predicting market demand for this product for the full year, the quota outlined in annex C relates only to the first six months of 1961. Further consultations will take place in relation to the quota for the second half of this year.
