Although stainless steel flatware was first placed under voluntary export control in 1959, the Canadian flatware industry has continued to experience difficulty as a result of the volume of imports. Accordingly the Japanese government has taken the exceptional step of reducing significantly the export quota for 1961 below that for 1960. The figures appear in annex D.

In addition to rubber footwear several other items are placed under quota to Canada this year for the first time. These are transistor radios, radio and television receiving tubes, vinyl raincoats and polyester staple buttons. The arrangements for these products are set out in annexes E to H to the ambassador's letter.

The various measures described in this letter are being undertaken by the government of Japan in conformity with its established policy or promoting the orderly growth of Japanese exports to the Canadian market. May I say that I share the belief expressed by the ambassador that this policy of self restraint should pave the way for further expansion of two way trade on an orderly basis, to the mutual benefit of both countries.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): The statement which has been made by the Minister of Finance is an important one, since it has to do with quotas in connection with trade between Canada and Japan. It is, of course, impossible for me without having a copy of the statement, which contains a number of features affecting the textile industry and other industries in this country, to comment on it objectively. I should prefer to wait until I see the text; then if there are statements to be made they can be made at the opportune time.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Our group is immensely pleased with the announcement which has been made. Over many years we have advocated planning between nations in respect to the exchange of commodities as opposed to raising tariff barriers. I am happy to note that this is a voluntary arrangement agreed to by the government of Japan. I hope the government intends to enlarge its activities in this field and enter into further understandings of this kind with other nations of the world in order that we may have an orderly economic life in our own nation without the upsets which are inevitably caused by ruthless competition in the world's trading field.

I noted particularly the expression of opinion by the minister at the conclusion of his observations to the effect that he was looking for an expansion of our trade with Japan. We hope his prediction in this respect will be realized. We need Japan as an active trading partner, and we believe there is room in Japan for the export industry of Canada. We hope that at no time will the government revert to the old policy of using tariff barriers. We are happy with the new attitude which is being taken.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the letter and appendices referred to by the minister be printed as an appendix to Hansard today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: for text of documents referred to above, see appendix.]

HOUSING

ANNOUNCEMENT OF FIRST OFFERING TO SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Hon. members may recall that on April 17 I announced that the government had directed Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to initiate the development of an active secondary market for National Housing Act residential first mortgages. This was to be accomplished by the sale of a part of the large and diversified portfolio the corporation has acquired as a result of extensive lending operations since 1957. In answer to several inquiries I agreed to make a further statement when the modus operandi had been worked out.

The corporation's first offering of National Housing Act insured mortgages will now be made on or about June 1. The initial offering, in an amount of approximately $15 million, will be made to members of the investment dealers' association of Canada, N.H.A. approved lenders and their N.H.A. approved correspondents. These organizations may then offer the mortgages for sale to pension funds, trusts, estates, holding companies and the public, or they may wish to hold the mortgages and offer debentures or other forms of security to small investors. Prospective purchasers should therefore get in touch with one of the organizations I have just mentioned, and not with the corporation itself.

The mortgages to be offered for sale in about two weeks time have been assembled in packages valued at about $500,000 each. Some packages consist of mortgages in specific centres; others have been prepared on a country wide basis. Each contains fully advanced 6¾ per cent N.H.A. first mortgages.

On or about June 1, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will invite sealed tenders from prospective purchasers and bids may be for one or more of the $500,000 mortgage packages up to the maximum of $15 million. Tender documents will be mailed by the corporation from its head office in Ottawa. I might add that options for up to 60 days will be considered. Tenders will close at 11 a.m. E.D.T. on June 19, 1961.

The corporation will not insist upon retaining the servicing. The purchasers of the mortgages may choose their own servicing arrangement. I should point out, however, that under provinsions of the National Housing Act an insured mortgage may be sold and the mortgage insurance continued only if it is administered to maturity by the corporation or by an approved lender.

No further sales will be made for a period of 60 days from the date of the original option.

Subsequent government marketing policy will be determined in light of the experience we gain from the first offering. I am confident, however, that development of an active secondary mortgage market will create not only a more regular but actually a larger flow of National Housing Act mortgage funds.

In concluding my statement may I reiterate that the sale of mortgages by C.M.H.C. does not in any way affect the interests of borrowers. These are established when the mortgage is made, and do not change when it is sold.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house welcome this announcement of the minister in regard to the establishment of a secondary mortgage. We believe, however, that this move is long overdue. It will be recalled that we recommended the establishment of such a market on many occasions over the past three year period. Anything that can be done to encourage a steadier flow of mortgage money into housing will surely be welcomed by all groups in this house. We have seen the difficulties and great hardships which have faced the house building industry and the public in general, at a time not later than the year 1960, resulting from this lack of a steady flow as well as from the necessity, at times, of the government turning on and off the tap.

In respect to this announcement, I wonder whether I may be allowed to refer to a statement made yesterday by the minister regarding this same subject. This statement was made in Montreal and—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member embarks upon that course, may I remind him that statements are made and permitted by this house for the purpose of enabling the government to give information first to parliament, and not for the purposes of initiating a debate. What the hon. member proposes to do or say should be strictly in accordance with that principle and practice.

Mr. Garland: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What I propose should perhaps be followed up on orders of the day. I do want to say that we endorse very strongly any move in the direction, of a secondary mortgage market and it is to be hoped that there will be the greatest opportunity afforded for the broadest possible participation by the Canadian people in this particular program.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, as indicated on another occasion, our group is heartily in accord with the plan of the government to establish what we hope will be a reliable secondary mortgage market in Canada. We feel this project will go a long way toward meeting the need for capital on the part of the house building industry.

I noted very carefully that the minister announced it was the government's intention to place—if I heard him correctly—only $15 million of the securities on the market. I believe this is a wise move indeed. I was afraid the government might have flooded the market with a much larger amount, because we do know the government holds $1⅓ billion worth of mortgage paper.

I can assure the minister that we welcome the move, and that we will be watching very carefully the method of its operation and particularly the effects on the market of any undue unloading on the part of the government.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement of the Minister of Public Works, are the chartered banks of Canada going to be permitted to submit bids on the blocks of mortgages referred to by the minister? If so, would this not be circumventing the intent of the Bank Act which limits the earnings of the banks?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): The answer to the question is yes, but the banks would not be circumventing the Bank Act. The hon. member does not appear to appreciate that the banks can invest in securities yielding a greater rate of return than 6 per cent. With respect to lending to the public, and this is the distinction, the limit is 6 per cent. If the banks want to lend money on mortgages as approved lenders the rate is limited to 6 per cent. Does that answer the question?

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. It is based on a press report in this morning's Montreal Gazette reading as follows:

> Public works minister Walker yesterday urged development of a secondary market for mortgages in Canada to reduce—

This is the pertinent part.

> —dependence on government funds for new housing financing.

How does the minister reconcile this statement with his statement only one month ago that the funds to be realized from the sale of C.M.H.C. held mortgages would be reinvested in housing, thereby avoiding financial loss to the federal treasury?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there is no contradiction between the two statements. As a matter of fact we are very anxious to reduce the participation of government in mortgages provided we can get sufficient funds from the approved lenders. In order to reduce our call on the consolidated revenue fund for money to make direct loans we are creating a secondary mortgage market, which will involve our selling part of the stock of mortgages we have assembled over the years. The hon. member will realize, of course, that when we get cash from the sale of these mortgages we will be in a position to put that cash back into the market again without digging deeper into the consolidated revenue fund for further amounts.

Mr. Garland: Will the minister say, then, that all of the moneys realized from the sale of these mortgages will be reinvested in housing?

Mr. Walker: That, Mr. Speaker, is a difficult matter. My hon. friend will appreciate that it is impossible to give an accurate answer to a question of that kind in view of the fact that there might be more sales than the demand for new funds. On the other hand, the sales may be, and in my opinion no doubt will be, insufficient to provide funds to meet the constant demand we have for mortgages. My friend will appreciate that with 20,000 mortgages arranged this year, 9,000 have still been arranged through C.M.H.C. We would like to change that ratio and have a greater amount of these mortgages made by the approved lenders.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

PROVISION FOR EXTENSION OF FISHING ZONE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-96, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act (twelve mile fishing zone).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: The Canadian government's position as presented to the first United Nations conference on the law of the sea in 1958, was to the effect that a state has a fishing zone contiguous to its territorial sea extending to a limit 12 nautical miles from the baseline from which the breadth of its territorial sea is measured in which it has the same rights in respect of fishing and the exploitation of the living resources of the sea as it has in its territorial sea.

The purpose of the bill is to extend the zone to a 12 mile area, which would then be the fishing zone, as distinct from the actual 3 mile zone. A further provision of the bill is that this would come into effect on July 1, 1963 in order to allow time for negotiations with other nations in respect of the question regarding fishing rights.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON OTTAWA MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the unfortunate absence from the house of the Minister of National Revenue, which we all regret. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would now answer the question which the Leader of the Opposition asked on Tuesday, concerning proposals emerging from the conference held in Ottawa on Friday of last week, and the following day, which would have the effect of avoiding the closure of three Cape Breton collieries.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman will agree that a statement like that cannot be made off the cuff. I join with him in expressing regret at the absence of the Minister of National Revenue, who is in hospital.

It was he who dealt particularly with this matter, and to whom the question was directed. However, at the earliest possible moment I will make a report to the house. Negotiations and discussions are continuing and, when there is something to report of a final nature arising out of the meeting the other day, not only in respect of the question asked but also in respect of the results of the negotiations, it will be brought to the attention of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO CAUSE OF DEATH OF FISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of reports that dead codfish and herring have been noted floating in Newfoundland's Fortune bay and in other waters off the western shore, which is puzzling even the most experienced and oldest fishermen of that island province, would the minister inform the house whether he is having this situation investigated in an attempt to discover what is causing the death of these fish and, particularly, whether radioactive wastes are a factor?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the situation and provide an answer to the question at a later date.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FREIGHT RATES—REPRESENTATIONS BY TRUCKING INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I wonder whether the Minister of Transport will inform the house whether provision will be made for trucking industry representatives to appear before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in order that they may have the opportunity of expressing their views regarding the Freight Rates Reduction Act, which is being studied by that committee.

Mr. Chevrier: That question was asked a week ago.

Mr. Speaker: I question whether the hon. gentleman should direct that question to the minister. As I understand it the committee itself makes the arrangements regarding evidence to be called before the committee. If the hon. member wishes to make private representations in this regard, he could do so.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is my information that representatives of the trucking industry have already requested permission to appear before that committee. Of course, as you have said, this is a decision to be made by that committee.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SEXUAL PSYCHOPATHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Would the minister say whether it is the intention of the government to introduce at this session amendments to the Criminal Code with a view to imposing stiffer regulations with respect to sex offences? If so, would the minister give some indication as to these amendments?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the speech from the throne, as I recall, it was announced that legislation would be introduced dealing with the problem of criminal sexual psychopaths. That legislation will be included in a bill to amend the Criminal Code which I expect to be in a position to introduce into the house very shortly.

INQUIRY AS TO SITTING OF HOUSE AFTER JUNE 30

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It is a matter of interest and concern to all members of the House of Commons. In view of the fact that the budget will not be introduced until early in June, and in view of the fact that there is a great deal of business in the way of estimates and legislation still to be considered, is the Prime Minister in a position, out of courtesy and thoughtfulness, to give the house any advice on whether, at the end of June, the house will continue sitting to deal with the business if it is not completed, or whether there will be a recess for some weeks and then a continuation of sittings to deal with the business?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): In reply to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I simply say that I expect the house will proceed with a degree of acceleration which will make it unnecessary to answer his question.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I have a supplementary question. If that degree of acceleration is to be achieved, does he not think there should be something more on the order paper than there is now or has been for the last two weeks?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the house leader dealt with that problem yesterday. It has not been lack of legislation that has held up progress, or lack of matters on the order paper. I would emphasize those facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a back bench filibuster.

[Mr. Balcer.]

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS—FURTHER LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether it is still his intention to proceed with second reading and other stages of Bill No. C-70?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that matter also will have to depend upon the progress made in dealing with the legislative program of the session.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): If I may, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is there a possibility that the government proposes to drop this bill altogether?

Mr. Fulton: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is an expert at fishing. I do not think there is anything I can add to what I have already said, which was perfectly clear and understandable to most hon. members.

Mr. Pickersgill: And inconclusive.

DRUGS

BARBITURATES—INQUIRY AS TO INTERVIEW WITH MONTREAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In a morning newspaper today a news item states that the attorney general of the province of Quebec has designated his deputy to accompany the Montreal committee headed by Mayor Jean Drapeau when it presents its goof ball report to the minister here. My question is, has the minister received a written request for a date when this delegation could meet with him and his officials to discuss ways and means to combat this most urgent problem of goof balls?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any communication in the office as yet, although there may be one there now. However, I should like to point out that some days ago I announced that we were bringing in legislation in respect of the goof ball problem.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—STATEMENT AS TO RETURN OF CANADIAN MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): May I answer a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for St. Ann.

The question had to do with Canadian missionaries. All the Canadian Catholic missionaries in Cuba who expressed the desire to return to Canada have already been repatriated. A number of Canadian missionaries have elected to remain in Cuba to carry on their work.

INTER-AMERICAN ECONOMIC CONFERENCE—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN DELEGATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister advise the house whether Canada is going to send a representative to the inter-American economic conference in Uruguay on July 15 of this year?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that was one of the questions discussed with the President, and I expressed the hope that if an invitation were given, as I expect it will be, Canada would be represented at that conference.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question arising out of the reply of the Prime Minister, and also based on the statement of the chairman of the council of the organization of American states which was made yesterday in Washington. Will the representative of Canada at the conference, which I believe is to be held on July 16 and not July 15, go as an observer or as an official representative of the country?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is a question for determination. We are going to be represented, but what the nature of the representation will be has not been determined and, of course, will have to be discussed and decided by my colleagues.

As the hon. gentleman knows, in so far as the organization of American states is concerned, there has been available for years not only in that organization but in its predecessor, the Pan-American union, a seat for Canada. It is interesting to listen to the enthusiastic support given by the hon. gentleman to full membership in this organization. It was not always so, but in any event we shall be represented at that meeting by an observer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the Prime Minister permit me to ask a further supplementary question? In view of what he said earlier in his interesting statement which dealt with his conversations with the President, and what he now says, is the Prime Minister in a position to say whether Canada will announce its decision as to joining the organization of American states before the meeting on July 16?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That will be a question to be determined in due course.

WATER RESOURCES

GREAT LAKES—STATEMENT ON PROPOSED DIVERSION FROM HUDSON BAY WATERSHED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Fort William asked this question:

> Is the government opposed to a water diversion from James bay and Hudson bay watershed to enable replenishment of fresh water to the great lakes?

The hon. gentleman realizes that the House of Commons standing committee on mines, forests and waters, in its second report to the house on June 28, 1960, referred to the Harricanaw river proposal as follows:

> The committee heard with interest from witnesses of the proposed Harricanaw river development project, but it feels that there has been insufficient basic engineering evidence presented to come to any conclusion on this matter.

I would say to the hon. gentleman that various proposals for diversions of water from the Hudson bay and James bay watershed have been considered in the past and are regarded as impracticable from an economic point of view on the basis of the engineering data available at this time.

BOW LAKE, ONT.—REPORTED POLLUTION BY RADIOACTIVE WASTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the hon. member for Peterborough asked me whether I had received a letter from a Mr. H. L. Hook concerning conditions at Bow lake, Ontario. As I indicated at that time, a letter came in on Monday of this week. I have just advised Mr. Hook that as the matter falls within provincial jurisdiction I have forwarded his letter to the Ontario department of health. The pollution question involved here is still before the mining court of Ontario, which now has all the evidence before it. If the hon. member will refer to page 5880 of Hansard for July 7 of last year, he will find that I explained there why this must be regarded as a provincial matter under existing circumstances.

THE CENSUS

STATEMENT ON POSSIBLE USE OF INFORMATION FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in my absence the hon. member for Port Arthur asked me the following question:

In view of press speculation and general criticism in many parts of the country, would the minister consider making a more specific and thorough statement on the matter of the information gained by census takers next month and its possible use for political purposes?

The answer is as follows. At every stage of their instructions the census enumerators are impressed with the confidential nature of their job. This action is in line with the first page of the enumeration manual, which contains the following instructions to the census takers:

You are not permitted to combine your census duties with any other work such as canvassing for personal gain or for political, church, or community organizations.

The law requires that all information collected for the census be kept confidential. You have taken an oath that you will not reveal any census information to anyone who is not a sworn census employee. To make sure you keep this oath, follow these rules:

(1) Do not repeat any information you receive as an enumerator to anyone except census officials;

(2) Do not leave completed census questionnaires where they can be seen by anyone except census officials;

(3) Do not let anyone except census officials go with you on your visits;

(4) Interview each respondent privately or with only members of his own family present. If necessary, explain that you are not supposed to get the information in the presence of anyone not employed in the census office.

Every census taker is required in section 6 of the Statistics Act to take and subscribe to the following oath:

I, ..., solemnly swear that I will faithfully and honestly fulfil my duties as (census enumerator) in conformity with the requirements of the Statistics Act and of all regulations thereunder, and that I will not, without due authority in that behalf, disclose or make known any matter or thing which comes to my knowledge by reason of my employment as such (census enumerator).

I can assure the house that the officials of my department have ben directed to ensure that these instructions and the safeguards provided to each individual Canadian by the Statistics Act are faithfully applied. Anyone found disclosing information for political or other purposes will be immediately prosecuted under section 34 of the Statistics Act. I am forwarding a copy of this statement to every census commissioner who has been appointed for the census next month.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROTEST AGAINST DESIGNATION "INDIAN" IN FEDERAL VOTERS' LISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): In the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration I might address a question to the parliamentary secretary, and ask whether a protest will be issued in the strongest possible terms against the inclusion of the word "Indian" alongside the names of native Indian people on federal voters' lists, in order that these people will not suffer any further defamation such as occurred recently in the preparation of voters' lists in Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member's question is not one of immediate urgency. I appreciate the fact that he wants to put forward his idea, but I think the question could more appropriately go on the order paper.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—FORMATION OF JOINT CANADA-U.S. COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville asked a question, the important part of which was:

Did the Prime Minister and the President of the United States have any opportunity to discuss the Richelieu waterway during their meeting in Ottawa yesterday?

The answer is in the negative.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORTED ESTABLISHMENT OF DUTY FREE SHOPS AT BORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, because of the regrettable absence of the Minister of National Revenue I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Has he seen the continuing press reports that a chain of shops selling duty free goods is to be established at several key border crossing points in Canada; and will the minister say, first, what licence or permit is required from the federal government to operate these shops and, second, whether the government intends to allow the establishment of this chain of duty free shops?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the articles to which the hon. member refers. I would suggest, however, that by its nature this question is one that ought to be placed on the order paper.

TRADE

REPORTED IMPORT FROM JAPAN OF CANADIAN FLAGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. According to this morning's Gazette

many Canadian textile manufacturers feel they are hard hit because printed Canadian flags are being imported from Japan at prices far below Canadian prices. In view of the statement made this morning by the Minister of Finance, would he care to comment on this particular situation?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article in question, but if the hon. member will examine the letter from the Japanese ambassador I think he will find his answer there. It would, of course, depend on the material out of which the flags were made as to the particular quota arrangement applicable thereto.

PUBLICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has yet received the report of the O'Leary commission, and whether it is still the expectation of the government that they will ask parliament to take any action on the subject matter of that commission.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has not yet received the report of the O'Leary commission. The second question therefore remains hypothetical until the report is received.

THE BUDGET

SUGGESTED REASON FOR DELAY IN PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance agree with the widely held view that he is delaying the presentation of the budget because of the four by-elections?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Not only would I not agree, but I would say that the suggestion is unworthy of any member of this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

USE OF CHEQUE FORMS PRINTED IN UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour and in his absence to his parliamentary secretary. I understand that representations have been made to the minister by the graphic arts industries association of Canada protesting the fact that a cheque issued by the unemployment insurance commission to an unemployed printer bore the imprint "Printed in the United States by Remington Rand". Is it the intention of the minister in view of this protest, to instruct the officials of his department that in future all their printing requirements should be purchased in Canada and be printed by Canadian labour on Canadian made paper with Canadian made ink?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): I will take this question as notice.

AIRPORTS

SAULT STE. MARIE, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO OPENING DATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he indicate how soon the Sault Ste. Marie airport might be open for business?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not exactly sure of the date, but I know the official opening ceremonies are tentatively set for early in September.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

402. Departmental administration, $3,395,700.

The Chairman: This item will be found at page 75 of the blue book, the details at page 520.

Mr. Small: At the time of adjournment last night, Mr. Chairman, I had touched on some of the subjects which I had discussed previously in connection with the C.N.R. I shall continue that discussion a little further. I intend to talk about the St. Lawrence seaway tolls after I get through speaking on these matters, if I have the time in which to do so. If not, I shall be obliged to take up the matter again at another opportunity and give others a chance to speak on the subject. However, I should like to finish my remarks if possible before the adjournment.

One matter that was mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East was that of public ownership. I would go along with him in what he said. He pointed out that it seemed that only public ownership might make a success of anything. However, there are some cases in which it just does not happen. I know we have made a success of public ownership in Ontario in connection with hydro and the development of power, and also in the city of Toronto in connection with our transportation. To date they have made an outstanding success in that regard. It is true that we have run into a little bit of difficulty in financing the subway. However, I am sure that public ownership, when it is handled in the right way, always results in outstanding success. Nevertheless I have found that when private enterprise cannot handle some matter or when it becomes a monopoly, the government generally takes it over.

In this case the government has taken over defunct railways of this country and given it to the Canadian National Railways to administer. So far the venture has not been an outstanding success. That is the reason for most of the comment that has taken place recently. People are not satisfied with the service that is given. I touched on that matter last night. The service has not been what it should be. Perhaps that is one of the reasons the undertaking has not been a success. There has been no attempt to make the service attractive. The convenience of the passengers or the people using the C.N.R. has been the last consideration.

I corroborate the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East with regard to reservations. You will be told that they are filled up and that you will have to wait. Then when you get on the train you find there is plenty of accommodation for you if they want to give it to you. I do not know where the fault lies. The board of directors is sufficiently large to take care of almost any incidental writing that needs to be taken care of. One would think this would be one of the things in which they would be vitally interested.

There is also the other matter that I mentioned with regard to stations. It occurs at both the union station in Toronto and the union station in Ottawa, which is one of the most deplorable of the stations. In fact it is not a union station any more either in Toronto or in Ottawa. These stations have just become glorified freight sheds. The convenience or service of the passengers is the last thing in which the railways are interested, in my opinion. Probably if they would smarten up they would find people willing to use their services. Probably they would like to use them. I do not mind paying for service, but I do not like paying for it when I do not get it.

As a matter of fact I can get home to Toronto from Ottawa more quickly by driving my car than I can by going by train. I might also say that not much time is saved in going by air, as far as I am concerned. These are things to cause one to ponder. I refer particularly to the timetable. I do not ever remember arriving in Ottawa on the scheduled time in the morning. You are always late. I wonder what they do with the time during which they fool around down at Perth, Smiths Falls and the various other places, which could have been used in order to get them to the Ottawa station at the time indicated on the timetable.

Mention is made of the piggy-back service and of what a wonderful success it has been. That service is not anything new. It was being used on the Pacific coast from Seattle down to San Francisco and Los Angeles. It relieved the truck driver from having to make a tiresome drive. It gave him some rest. It was also done at a more economic rate. It is not something that is new. The situation is probably the same as it was when, if my memory serves me correctly, Sir Henry Thornton was head of the C.N.R. and Sir Edward Beatty was chairman of the C.P.R. The same thing applies here, I suppose. There was the time they lowered the rate from Toronto to Hamilton; it went down from something like $2.30 to $1.60 or $1.70. I can remember Tommy Church describing Sir Henry Thornton, the then president. He said, "It is the same thing; when the C.P.R. lowers the rates Sir Henry Thornton, as president of the C.N.R., just lowers their rates and follows along".

The same thing applies to the piggy-back. They have adopted what has been found to be successful with others. There is also the matter of trucking. I talked on this trucking matter with railroad men as far back as 1924. They had railway right of ways for running the trains, and the highways were not as large or as numerous then as they are now. They were running into trouble because the trucks were not making good time and I wondered why they could not use the railway right of way for putting trucks and goods on the railways. Then any time they wanted they could run the trucks off the railway right of way and onto any side road and have a good service. They said they would not be permitted to do that.

This was about 40 years ago, and they are just waking up now and getting into the trucking business. In those days these people were handling freight by horses and wagons, and only recently has there been a transition into trucking. They are just now getting around to going into the trucking business. They could have gone into it long ago. Now they are confronted with the vested rights of the trucking business, which are causing a lot of concern and they will find out that perhaps it is not going to be very successful or profitable for them.

Now I come to the question of the president of the Canadian National Railways. In the last two or three years there has been a lot of comment and a great deal of criticism in connection with the president. When you examine the matter you find that the president of the Canadian National Railways came to be on the board of directors because he had a nomination from the Bank of Canada. He took over, and there is some reason why he was sent to the railway, because he had made such a name during the war years in connection with the Bank of Canada and also, I think, with the wartime prices and trade organization. No one is trying to take away from the things he accomplished there; they were possibly good, but this did not mean he would be an outstanding railway man.

When he was appointed to the C.N.R. he was thought of as a wonderful individual who was going to accomplish great things for the Canadian National Railways. Because of his knowledge of banking and other things it was thought great things were going to take place in the C.N.R., but they did not take place. We have evidence that since he has been in office more things have not been accomplished than have been accomplished; we have more proof that he has not accomplished anything. He has not made the economies it was thought he would make, and what he has done since being appointed to the board is to practically truncate the service; he has reduced it. He can probably be called the great truncator of the Canadian National Railways.

This raises the question of the employees who are concerned. The employees of the railway are vitally concerned because this truncation has taken place on the railway. This matter was touched upon by the hon. member for Acadia last night when he mentioned the morale of the employees who were hired by the railway. Their morale is low, and perhaps rightly so, because they are in a better position to judge these matters than we are. They have probably come to the conclusion, and perhaps rightly so, that while he is the president and also a director, he is not in fact the manager of Canadian National Railways, but rather than being manager and director he is really the receiver the government has put in to fold up the railway. I think this is the thought that has got into their minds.

I would say that so far he has done a pretty good job of being the receiver of the railway, and the employees of C.N.R. have begun to look at it in this way. That is why their morale is low. There is no reason for high morale among the employees, because the president has not the respect of his employees and they have no confidence in him. He is not a railroad man; he is a banker. Hon. members know the situation in regard to banks nowadays, and I should like to tell the committee the story about the man who went into a bank to get a loan. This man had good collateral and very good security, but times were something like they are now and banks would not loan money no matter what the security was. They were tight money days, as they are now. However, this man was a good customer of the bank and the banker did not want to offend him, so he talked about different subjects. Then he said, "Recently I had a serious illness. I had to lose an eye. I had to have an eye taken out and an artificial one put in, so I have a glass eye. I pride myself on the fact that this eye defies detection by anyone. No one can tell the difference between my glass eye and my good eye. I will bet you $10, if you want to take it up, that you cannot tell which is my glass eye". The man who wanted the loan said "I will take you up". The banker said, "Which is my glass eye?" The man said, "Your glass eye is the one that is on your left side". The banker said, "You are the first man who has ever been able to tell that by looking. How did you discover it?" "Well", the man said, "it was not too difficult on my part. I looked at your eyes and immediately said to myself that the glass eye was on the left side because it showed more warmth than your right eye".

That is the situation today with regard to the employees of the railway. They look upon this man as having no feeling for them, that he is just there in a receivership capacity, and that is probably what he is there for. They look upon him as being there to fold up the passenger services of this railway, when he was put forward as a man of such eminence. He has great eminence; I suppose he is one of the most powerful men of this country, because he is practically lord of this whole domain, as far as Canada is concerned, from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from the Arctic wastes to the United States border. He can go anywhere he likes. He is probably the second highest man in the country, perhaps even higher than the Governor General as far as salary is concerned. He issues his orders and no one can defy them. He is practically a law unto himself, something the same as the governor of the Bank of Canada. No one can question the right of this individual and his facilities for getting around the country at our expense, issuing great orders and doing great things. He even went to Ungava, Newfoundland, where he was investigating the narrow gauge up there to see if he could do something better for them where the woods are small. I suppose he figured on getting great prestige up there and obtaining their support.

He puts in all this effort, but there are very few people that I know of, even on the opposition side, who stand up for him. Even on the Conservative side we find hon. members who will not stand up for him, and he is even losing the admiration of such hon. members as the hon. member for Greenwood, who has been a great admirer of his, and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, who in the committee said he was a wonderful fellow and it is probably a tough type of job that he has; it is just like shovelling fog or smoke. But he shovels a lot of other stuff besides smoke and fog that has a little more substance in it and is better used for fertilizer than smoke or fog. The hon. member for York North is also a great admirer of his. Why he is remains a mystery to me. He will probably explain it one day. He is an individual who wants to sell everything we have that is profitable and tells us to hang on to the things that are not profitable.

I should like to take a poll of this committee today, or any time we could have a free poll, and ask hon. members what they think of this great individual who has this country so tied up as far as the transportation system is concerned. I think you would find he would lose out by a 20 to 2 vote. The thing that remains for us to do is to be a little more concerned about the people of Canada and the transportation system, and take the necessary steps to see this system improved. We should get a person who is a railroad man, who would have the confidence of the railway employees. Donald Gordon does not have the confidence of anybody on the railway, I would say, even up in the higher echelon. It would be a good thing for this country if we got rid of the people who are causing the trouble.

There is another matter I should like to discuss at the present time. I will just touch upon it for the time being. I refer to the matter of grade level crossings. For years this matter has been advocated and we have been very successful in increasing the amount of the fund from $1 million up to $5 million, but still too many accidents take place year after year on our doorsteps. It has been increased until now it is $15 million a year. Even when this matter is tackled under the most favourable conditions we find that because of the method of financing, neither the railways nor the municipalities are able to make rapid progress in reducing these grade crossing tragedies. We shall probably have to devise a means of removing this responsibility from the shoulders of the municipalities and of the railways. As we all know, the railways are running continually into deficits, and it is not very practical to ask them to attend to this matter of the removal of level crossings.

In Scarborough, which is in my own riding, there are 82 of these level crossings, possibly 90 of various descriptions. About 30 of them are on the fringe of being a menace to life. However, it happens occasionally that there is an accident off the beaten path, so these less used crossings cannot be entirely ignored. The local authority has taken care of one or two of these crossings in the past year, but they cannot go further; the provisions of the act as now applied do not allow them to deal with more than one or two a year. This work could be extended threefold throughout the Dominion of Canada if the present arrangements were reviewed and new steps were taken to deal with this menace which presents itself to road and rail traffic.

Last year the hon. member for High Park spoke on this subject and dealt with the formation of a Canada Council whose first president was Mr. Brooke Claxton. Later Mr. Ashe was president; I do not know who is president at the present time. The hon. member was concerned with all the accidents which happen on the highways of Canada generally. The figures he presented were astounding and appalling, so much so that the figures we have with regard to accidents at grade level crossings, high as they are, pale into insignificance compared with them.

The comparison does not lessen the gruesomeness of the tragedies which occur, but it does raise a larger question; because in the light of the total figures one cannot very well put on undue pressure for more to be done with regard to grade level crossings until the whole situation on Canadian highways and the rate of accidents generally have been taken into consideration. We have arrived at the point when statisticians are able to predict the number of road accidents and fatalities which will take place on certain days. These predictions almost always turn out to be correct, or very nearly so, and when a situation of that kind exists it is clear that something should be done to deal with it even if it means greatly increasing the preventive force.

Now I have dealt with that subject and I should like to turn to another matter. I see the hon. member for Laurier in his place, and I think he would probably be able to give me the information in which I am vitally interested. It concerns a subject which has been before the committee and the house on previous occasions. The hon. member for Laurier was, of course, minister of transport in the former administration at the time he was the hon. member for Stormont. Later he became chairman of the authority itself. He has spoken on this subject on many occasions in this house, and in the course of his remarks has made some statements which I am not able to fathom. I am not questioning that what he says is right, but I found it hard to understand when he said there had been complete agreement by all parties with regard to the St. Lawrence seaway development. On the surface that appears to be correct. The hon. member went on to say that there had been no objection to the terms, no objection to the tolls being charged.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the hon. member from what he is quoting?

Mr. Small: I am not quoting from anything at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member has been referring to me. He says that certain statements were made by me. I think he owes it to the committee to say when these statements were made.

Mr. Small: I think this statement was in fact made by the hon. member. He said that the parties were in agreement—

Mr. Chevrier: Will the hon. gentleman put the quotations on record in Hansard so that I will be able to deal with them if the occasion arises?

Mr. Small: The hon. member has got me stymied there, because I cannot refer to these quotations now. I have read them in Hansard. I did not make a note of them, but I do not think he will question the veracity of the statement I am making.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like the hon. member to give me the place where the statement was made. I shall then be able to determine for myself whether or not it is accurate.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Small: I shall probably be able to do that during the lunch hour, after the committee has adjourned. I shall look up Hansard and find the place where the statement was made. I know the hon. member made it.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee adjourned.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, there was a bit of hassle in the committee before the adjournment regarding a purported statement made by the hon. member for Laurier. During the luncheon adjournment I checked Hansard for a number of years, but have not been able to pinpoint this particular statement. I have conversed with the hon. member for Laurier and feel that there is no disagreement between us about the statement having been made.

There apparently was agreement among all members of the house regarding enactment of the St. Lawrence seaway project bill. I understand one hon. member took exception to this suggestion, but I am unaware of it being recorded in Hansard.

I am bewildered by the fact that there was not much debate, and great consideration given to the matter of charging tolls on this project. There was, of course, a considerable lapse of time between the original decision to go ahead with the project and agreement being reached between United States and Canada. At one time agreement was reached between these two nations but that agreement was never ratified. It was intended at that time that the project should be proceeded with to suply power essential to the defence of these nations. That was certainly agreed upon.

I should like to offer some explanation as to why there was no question about or opposition to the charging of tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway. I should also like to seek information regarding the lack of opposition to the imposition of tolls on the Welland canal. I will, however, submit my views in respect to this lack of opposition.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I suggest the hon. member should be allowed to continue.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member's time be extended?

Mr. Drysdale: I agree if it is a reasonable extension of time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Small: The then minister of transport informed the house, about the year 1947, that there was agreement between the two authorities to impose tolls. At that time there was apparently no opposition. The tolls were to be charged in an effort to recover the costs of the project on the basis of 50 year amortization. I have read the Wiley-Dondero act and am of the opinion that it was not necessary for this country to accept that term of amortization. However, the government of the day did go along with that suggestion. There was no mention whatever, at the time, of the imposition of tolls in respect of the Welland canal.

An agreement has been in existence with all governments, the Macdonald government, the Laurier government, the Mackenzie King government and even the Bennett government, regarding the imposition of tolls on the Welland canal, and every proposal to impose tolls was rejected.

Because the Welland canal was an integral part of the industrial economy of Ontario and Canada there was an agreement reached between the two countries that no tolls would be charged in respect of the passage of boats plying inland waters since 1903 and the agreement was never terminated. I take it all hon. members, during these periods, felt tolls should not be charged in respect of inland waters because of the great benefit provided to industries located on the great lakes in both countries and especially the steel industry of Hamilton, Buffalo, Windsor and Detroit.

However, in view of the additional cost, $29 million, to deepen the Welland canal, which was to be a part of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, it was decided to impose tolls to amortize this cost. The Welland canal was to be deepened four feet, at an estimated cost of $2½ million, but eventually cost $30 million. As a result, to amortize tolls are charged. It is my understanding that the inclusion of the Welland canal in the St. Lawrence seaway project was to be credited with $130 million of its entire cost. The deepening of the St. Mary, the St. Clair and Detroit rivers cost approximately $140 million. This was paid by the United States as part of the maintenance of the great lakes seaway system.

As far as I can remember, or have read in the records, no opposition was presented to the imposition of tolls on the Welland canal until objection was taken by Stuart Armour as a representative of the steel industry. The hon. member from Laurier was perfectly right when he said there was no opposition to it. The opposition comes only from Ontario and Quebec, which are the only two provinces straddling the great lakes and St. Lawrence seaway project. On the other side there are the states of New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin and Minnesota. They can take opposition to anything that is detrimental to them.

If no great opposition arose in connection with the Welland canal tolls the reason is that members of parliament affected never for a moment thought there would be the imposition of tolls on the Welland canal. All down through the years from Macdonald's time to Mackenzie King's time there had been an agreement that there would be no charge. It was an international agreement. This is the reason why this matter of tolls on the Welland canal should be reconsidered from the point of view of the provincial autonomy of Ontario, which is vitally affected.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Laurier can give us an explanation of how the St. Lawrence seaway development absorbed the Welland canal installation into the project. In my opinion it has no right being there because the United States itself absorbed the cost of the deepening of the St. Clair, the Detroit and the St. Mary rivers. There are no toll charges on those rivers or the Sault canal.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is he aware of the fact that in connection with the whole St. Lawrence seaway, including the Welland canal, tolls were imposed by order in council tabled in this house by the predecessor of the present Minister of Transport?

Mr. Small: I certainly am aware of that, but all the groundwork was done long before the present government took office. Those agreements were made between the two authorities, one from the United States and the other from Canada. There had been an agreement on this matter, but it was never an accepted fact that tolls would be imposed on the Welland canal because it was never intended to be that way. The question is, why was the cost not absorbed by the Canadian government itself as was done in the United States with respect to the three rivers I have mentioned? The imposition of tolls on the Welland canal was an improper charge. The cost for deepening is a maintenance expense.

I was baffled when I learned that members of the Liberal party from Welland and that section of Ontario did not take strong exception to the imposition of those tolls. I believe the reason is that it never entered their minds there would be any tolls on the Welland canal. Thank you.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I feel somewhat impelled to speak on this item at this time because of what I consider to be an unwarranted, unreasonable and unmerited attack made on the T.C.A. yesterday by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. When in the interests of Canada this government or previous governments establish a policy and make provision for the financing of crown corporations and when those crown corporations prove successful, I fail to understand why attacks should be made upon them, and thereby attacks on policy of the government that took the action required, and why it is then said, "Let's get rid of it".

Let me give a brief illustration because, as I said, I cannot understand that kind of attack. A previous government, because of necessity, established Polymer. A capital expenditure of $48,500,000 has returned over $100 million to the federal government. The government still owns a plant worth a maximum of $130 million, and now the cry is, "Let us hand this company over to the owners of free enterprise so that they can get their money out of it".

Mr. Drysdale: Who said that?

Mr. Winch: I would say two members from British Columbia.

Mr. Drysdale: Name them.

Mr. Winch: The hon. member for one.

Mr. Drysdale: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is misinterpreting and misrepresenting statements I made before the committee. The committee has not reported and I do not think the hon. member is in a position to discuss the matter at this particular time.

Mr. Winch: The investment of $9,500,000 in Eldorado has paid back $21 million and Canada still owns Eldorado.

Yesterday we heard, as I have said, an unwarranted, unreasonable and unmerited attack on the T.C.A. Without doubt, in an operation of the magnitude of T.C.A. all of us could find merited points of criticism. But, sir, I think such an attack on T.C.A. displays a deficient sense of responsibility. I acknowledge that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was right; we have had a pioneering service in Canada which was established by our bush pilots in the northern territories of our country. But I challenge anyone to say that our bush pilots or free enterprise could in the 1930's have built anything to equal the Trans-Canada Air Lines system and an international airways system. That pioneering was done in 1937 with the establishment of the T.C.A. On an original investment of $5 million T.C.A. was formed.

Mr. Drysdale: A very safe investment.

Mr. Winch: Its first route was only 122 miles, and that was in British Columbia, Vancouver to Seattle. From 1937 until today this great pioneering endeavour, established by the public of Canada through the government, has expanded from 122 miles to an air route service of 30,399 miles. It has a domestic service in Canada and a service to the United Kingdom, to continental Europe and to the Caribbean covering, if my memory is correct, some 60 communities. This public service operation in Canada, which in those 30 years has expanded from the original 122 miles of service, as I have already pointed out, is now recognized as the seventh largest air carrier in the world and as one absolutely unequalled in safety. Yet we had to listen yesterday to an indictment of this great enterprise operated on behalf of the Canadian people through the government of Canada. It was said that it should give way to free enterprise, and the hon. member named the enterprise, Canadian Pacific Air Lines.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member point out specifically to what portion of the hon. member's speech he is objecting? He has made a rather blanket indictment but I cannot find any support for it.

Mr. Winch: If the hon. member is interested in this matter I suggest that he speak or ask his questions after I have finished.

Mr. McGee: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has just referred to the question of speaking and I am wondering about the propriety of the hon. member speaking twice on the first item when many other hon. members, myself included, have been awaiting an opportunity to speak for the first time.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member can speak ten times if he wishes to.

Mr. McGee: I was about to appeal to the hon. member's sense of fair play, which I do not imagine the hon. member for Laurier would know much about, and ask the hon. member whether in his own mind he thinks he should speak a number of times before other hon. members have had the opportunity to speak once.

Mr. Winch: I can most certainly answer the point of view presented by the hon. member. Yes, I have already spoken once on the first item. There is no restriction on the number of times a member may speak on item No. 1. I think the hon. member knows that I am very fair and so are the chairmen who preside over our committees. There is a big preponderance of Conservatives—

Mr. McGee: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Winch: Suppose you let me finish before you interrupt. The chairmen of our committees are very careful in recognizing members from the Conservative, Liberal and C.C.F. groups. In the working out of the speakers' list it so happened that this was the proper time for a C.C.F. member to speak. Unfortunately the hon. member from our group who was to speak could not be here so before we adjourned for lunch I had a discussion with the chairman about the speakers' list and it was agreed that if the hon. member for Port Arthur was not here I would speak to maintain the ratio of C.C.F. speakers, and the hon. member for Port Arthur will have to take my position on the list.

Mr. Grafftey: It means you speak every third time.

Mr. Winch: That matter was given fair consideration before I rose to speak but these hon. members do not want to hear what I have to say.

Mr. McGee: On the point of order, I can appreciate that generally speaking it is important that the points of view of the different parties be considered in sequence, but we are on estimates now. Hon. members have matters of vital concern to their own constituencies which they wish to discuss and the fact remains that in the present circumstances Conservative members of the house are being penalized by being prevented from speaking by the hon. member who has spoken twice on this item so far.

Mr. Winch: I have not.

Mr. McGee: As a matter of fact, he has spoken four times while many hon. members as individual private members of the house have not yet had an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Winch: I know that you want to say something but may I say that I have the floor because I have been recognized by the chairman. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, do I have the floor or do I not?

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the hon. member whether he considers that because he is a C.C.F. member he is entitled to privileges that the rest of us are not?

Mr. Winch: Definitely not, and may I say that we are only exercising our rights having regard to the proportionate numbers in the different parties.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. Would the hon. member take his seat when I stand, please. It seems to me it is only reasonable and equitable that the Chair should call—it is the only answer we have been able to find—alternate members from both sides of the house. When the chairman sees a speaker from the opposition side of the house that speaker has the floor and so the hon. member for Vancouver East has the floor.

Mr. Winch: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. May I say it is very fortunate for me that I am speaking extemporaneously because if I had been using notes I might have been thrown off course.

Mr. McGee: You were always noted for a sense of fair play.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I think that remark should be withdrawn. I have explained that I am speaking because I have been recognized by the Chair and when the hon. member and his colleague beside him intimate that I do not have a sense of fair play because I am now speaking I submit that remark should be withdrawn and I ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. McGee: The hon. member has asked me to withdraw the words that he is noted for a sense of fair play. I do so with great pleasure.

Mr. Winch: I never knew before how dirty my hon. friend could be. In accord with your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I am going to continue my remarks with respect to the attack on T.C.A. I have pointed out that I feel it is wrong, unreasonable and unjust that this attack should have been made upon T.C.A. I have pointed out and I repeat that from 122 miles in 1937 T.C.A. routes have expanded until they now cover approximately 30,000 miles and T.C.A. has established an unparalleled record so far as safety is concerned and is now the seventh largest air carrier in the world.

The criticism made yesterday by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was on two grounds. First, he said that T.C.A. had a deficit of $2,607,000 last year. Admittedly it had a net deficit of $2,607,000 last year but those who now attack T.C.A. forget to mention that for the nine previous years it had surpluses. An attack is made on T.C.A. because it now requires an advance either from the C.N.R. or directly from parliament in the amount of $200 million in order to buy new equipment so that it may remain in the forefront and give leadership in air travel. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Drysdale: The method of doing it.

Mr. Winch: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Drysdale: The method of doing it.

Mr. Winch: If C.P.A. wishes to make such an expenditure it has to get the money from the C.P.R., its controlling body. T.C.A. gets its money either from the C.N.R. or directly from parliament. I gathered that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano thought that this was wrong but he forgets that we subsidize the C.P.R. and have always subsidized it since there was a C.P.R.

Mr. Drysdale: That is your version.

Mr. Winch: Over the years the C.P.R. has received billions of dollars as a gift in the form of lands which are part of the people's natural resources. During one war it received a grant from the government of $60 million and did not have to pay it back. Every year in the past few years the government has given the C.P.R. a direct subsidy by vote of parliament from which subsidy there is no return directly to the government of Canada. T.C.A. is a crown corporation and, whether directly or indirectly, it does not get subsidies. It gets capital grants which must be returned, and I think it should be noted that although T.C.A. started with $5 million in assets in 1937 it has assets today in the neighbourhood of $239 million.

Mr. Drysdale: Capital debt.

Mr. Winch: I said it has assets of $239 million.

Mr. Drysdale: Listed as capital debt.

Mr. Winch: And it has debt owing to the dominion—

Mr. Drysdale: With interest at 5 per cent.

Mr. Winch: —with interest.

Mr. Drysdale: At 5 per cent.

Mr. Winch: And the amount owing to Canada for debenture and by interest is $30 million less than its present asset value. All that my hon. friend who seems to be so intense about this matter has to do is to look at the Trans-Canada Air Lines last financial report.

Mr. Drysdale: I have looked at it.

Mr. Winch: If he does that, he will find that is the situation. I say without hesitation that the government which in 1937 in the interests of Canada established the T.C.A. did a good thing for Canada. T.C.A. has proven to be one of the great assets of Canada in developing national and international air lines. I say that although on small points—perhaps important ones but nevertheless small ones—we all can criticize, T.C.A. is an organization which has a record of which all of us can be mighty proud; and it ill behooves any member of parliament to make the kind of attack that was made yesterday on T.C.A.

Mr. Drysdale: What kind of attack was that? The hon. member never specified.

Mr. Winch: If the hon. member was not here when the hon. member for Coast-Capilano spoke, I would refer him to Hansard. I will not try to educate him. It would not be possible in any event.

Mr. Drysdale: I have read Hansard.

Mr. Grafftey: And we were here when the hon. member spoke.

Mr. Winch: If that hon. member could speak as well as he can interrupt, he would be a useful member of parliament.

Mr. Broome: As one who interrupts as much as does anyone, the hon. member ought to know.

Mr. Winch: Irrespective of party or party membership or representation in this house. I say that T.C.A. is an operation of which over the years this country, the previous government and this government can be proud. I say that we should give commendation to T.C.A. for their leadership and for their looking forward to maintain Canada's position in the air passenger and freight transport of the world. I say that the investment of Canada has paid off in marvellous dividends, in work and in production and that Canada's investment and assets in that corporation are greater than its debt in debentures and in interest by millions of dollars.

I want to say with the utmost sincerity through you, Mr. Chairman to the minister that I hope he has the pride in T.C.A. that we in this group have, having regard to its leadership, its pioneering and its forward-looking approach in the world of air transport. I sincerely hope that he will do everything possible to encourage and to assist this corporation and that he will not allow small, penurious free enterprise criticism to block his decision—as we hope it will be—not only to maintain but to extend the greatness and the efficiency of T.C.A., one of the prides of Canada.

Mr. Drysdale: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winch: Yes.

Mr. Drysdale: The hon. member has attacked the hon. member for Coast-Capilano who unfortunately is not in his seat at the present time. I wonder whether the hon. member could indicate specifically what objection he has to the hon. member's speech. All he did was to use the usual C.C.F. technique of broad-spread attack but not once has he specified what he objects to.

Mr. Winch: I thought I had made the matter clear. I object to the attack on T.C.A. on the ground that it was not a significant pioneer in its field, and to the criticism that it had a deficit of $2,600,000 a year with no comment on its surplus in the previous nine years.

Mr. Broome: What happened to it last year?

Mr. Winch: If my hon. friend had made a study of why it was necessary for heavy expenditures to be incurred last year, he would know the answer to his own question. He was on one of the planes that were bought by T.C.A. last year.

Mr. Broome: I just asked what happened to the surplus last year.

Mr. Winch: There was no surplus.

Mr. Broome: There was a surplus of $6 million, as the hon. member would know if he had studied the matter.

Mr. Winch: I can answer one at a time, Mr. Chairman, but I am afraid I cannot answer two at a time. I might also say I criticize that objection raised here yesterday by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano that something was wrong when there had to be an appropriation for expenditures of some $2 million advanced to T.C.A. for the new type of aircraft, and that this was not fair when the C.P.R. were prepared to do it without any advance at all. May I say to the hon. members that they will not be back the next time if they follow their present procedure and policy.

Mr. Broome: Will the hon. member bet on that?

Mr. Pascoe: I have a few remarks to make under this general item in the estimates of the Department of Transport, but first of all I should like to join with the other speakers in congratulating the Minister of Transport on the presentation of his first estimates and on the manner in which the department is being administered under his jurisdiction. When one looks at the eight pages of estimates in the blue book and sees that they cover marine services, railway and steamship services, air services including civil aviation, the meteorological branch, the St. Lawrence seaway authority, the air transport board and the board of transport commissioners, one gets some indication of the extent of the department's activities.

Comments on this item before us have ranged over nearly all the activities covered by the department. I will confine my remarks at this time to one subject that is of particular interest to many of my constituents, namely the lack of air service to my home city of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan. I have spoken on this matter previously. I know the minister is familiar with the situation so I will make only brief comments at this time. Further details regarding the city's airport facilities are contained in letters sent to his department from time to time.

Moose Jaw actually pioneered air service in Saskatchewan, starting from a municipal air field on a flat piece of prairie grassland in the early 1920's. I well remember the start from this airfield of the first flight of the old western Canada air mail service to Edmonton. This was in the middle of the winter in 1927 or 1928, I believe. I was a passenger on that inaugural flight. In order to indicate the great advances that have been made since that time, I might point out that the pilot was in an open cockpit in weather 30 degrees below zero.

Moose Jaw had the first air meet in the province in 1929 with planes coming in from many parts of Canada and the United States to put on an exhibition of stunt flying and parachute drops for a great crowd from all over southern Saskatchewan. Moose Jaw now has fine airport facilities in connection with the large R.C.A.F. station there. Up until May 6, 1959, the city had a scheduled commercial air service through Canadian Pacific Air Lines, and later through Pacific Western Airlines from Moose Jaw to Edmonton. Because of changes in the mail service, P.W.A. applied to the air transport board for permission to drop Moose Jaw from its flight schedule. I should like to quote one sentence from a letter received from Mayor O. B. Fysh of Moose Jaw as follows:

> We are a city of 33,000 people, very much air minded, but having no air connections at all at the present time.

When T.C.A. established what is called the milk run, which takes in most prairie cities between Winnipeg and Calgary, Moose Jaw was not included although several smaller cities are serviced. As a member of the sessional committee which inquires into the annual report of T.C.A. I have presented Moose Jaw's arguments for air service on more than one occasion.

I have a letter from Mr. Gordon McGregor, president of T.C.A., commenting on the views I expressed at last year's committee meeting. He expresses the hope that at some time a satisfactory solution might be worked out.

It would appear, Mr. Chairman, that the time for a satisfactory solution is near at hand. According to reports, T.C.A. would like some other air line to take over the western milk run. Such a change will of course necessitate a public hearing.

My reason for speaking at this time is to ask the minister to make it possible for Moose Jaw to present its case at this hearing, to show that there could be sufficient passenger and air express business there to warrant a daily air service. There are new businesses in the city which could make use of air deliveries. A newly established greenhouse industry is now operating on a large commercial scale and no doubt could make large air shipments of cut flowers daily.

I do not believe the date has been set for a hearing on any possible change of service. When a hearing is arranged I hope that all interested parties will be able to attend. I hope the minister can give some assurance that this will be the case.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to speak at any length, nor do I propose to join in the debate which has taken place between hon. members from the province of British Columbia. Thus far that is a fight they have preferred to restrict to themselves and I think any intervention at this time would be most unproductive and unwise.

However, Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss a matter that is of great interest to the county from which I come, and particularly to the city of Windsor. I do so at this time because it is the first opportunity I have had since the minister took over the administration of the Department of Transport of bringing to his attention a matter which we discussed last year during the presentation of a bill providing for the management and development of the harbour in the city of Windsor, and a companion bill for the same purpose for the city of Oshawa.

As the minister knows, there are under his jurisdiction, as I understand it, three types of harbour commissions. One type, I think, runs into pretty large figures. That is the type of harbour commission which now exists and operates in the city of Windsor, and which has operated for some time in the city of Hamilton, in the city of Toronto, in Belleville and now in Port Arthur and the city of Oshawa.

The harbour commission bill setting up a harbour commission in Windsor was introduced in this house by the former minister of transport, the Hon. George Marler. Last year the present administration—as I noted a moment ago—brought forward a bill providing for the management and development of the harbours in the cities of Windsor and Oshawa.

I should like the minister to take advantage at the earliest opportunity to come to Windsor. I hope he will come not just before an election, but long before, if there is to be a long interval, so that he can acquaint himself with the potential value that could flow from the development of the harbour in the city of Windsor.

The minister will be warmly welcomed and I hope I will have an opportunity, together with my two colleagues from the county of Essex, to make the minister's visit not only agreeable but informative and, having in mind my immediate purpose, highly educational.

The harbour commission in Windsor is in the early stages of existence and I want to make a plea today to the minister for a greater interest on the part of the Department of Transport, in particular, in its operations.

The city of Windsor is situated along some wonderful bodies of water; contiguous is lake St. Clair, the Detroit river, and nearby is lake Erie. We are right in the heartland of Canada's great waterway system and now, with the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, our community, like many others, looks for a development from the St. Lawrence project which will add to the economic richness of the area.

One of the means by which that can be effected is through efficient administration of local harbour commissions such as the one in the city of Windsor. We there have three commissioners. They are all public-spirited men, but I believe they need assistance. They must, of course, provide assistance themselves, but they also need assistance from that agency of government which is responsible for their creation and much of their direction.

I do not believe it is wise to take the position that we must wait until there is more water traffic and more use of the harbour facilities to put forward a plea for greater interest, financial and otherwise, on the part of the central government.

I remember last year when we discussed this matter the hon. member for Greenwood participated in the debate. He complained about the reliance, seemingly, that was being placed on the central government by local bodies such as the one on whose behalf I was then speaking. I fully appreciate that every community must play its part in the development of operations of this kind. There is undoubtedly a local interest, but there is also a national interest. When one thinks of the assistance given by federal governments to the ports of Toronto and Hamilton I think one is justified in asking for a greater interest on the part of the federal government.

At the present time some of these large ports, such as in the city of Toronto, have been able to develop so as to afford to send scouts into other cities for business. Some of these new commissions and some of the communities in which these new commissions operate are not in that happy revenue position. I think that at this time, when we are seeking to bring about the greatest possible economic development for our country, we should recognize that one way by which this can be done is by assisting local bodies.

If the federal government has the responsibility in law, as it has, for the nomination of harbour commissions and for the creation, indeed, under the law of a harbour commission, it seems to me it has a responsibility way beyond the mere act of creation and nomination of administrative personnel. I know that requests have been made of the minister—I do not know whether I can say that of the present minister, but with regard to his predecessor that is certain—and the government for financial assistance.

I know that the economics division of the Department of Transport, particularly that section which concerns itself with harbours administration, has looked into the economic potential of the harbour commission on whose behalf I speak. Their reports are available for the minister to study. The minister has, I believe, received requests by the harbour commission for assistance, financial and otherwise and I believe those requests deserve to be supported. That is why I am rising again on the occasion on which the minister presents his estimates for the first time to ask him to tell us at the appropriate moment in our discussion what the present policy of the government is in regard to harbour commissions of this type. I suggest to the minister that if we just wait for such time as more adequate and extensive use is made of these harbours we shall be postponing unnecessarily much business which I think could be available if we were to establish the necessary foundations. That requires some promotion work. That requires some advertising. That requires the building of certain facilities. A project of this sort should, I think, be assisted by the federal government. I suggest to the minister this is a matter about which he should be in a position to say something today.

Now is the time to do this, because right opposite Windsor there is a development taking place in the city of Detroit which I think should encourage us to take similar action on the Canadian side. The development which is going on in the development of harbour facilities both in Detroit and all along the great lakes in the United States is such that if we are to be able to capture as much of this business as is open to us as a result of the operation of the St. Lawrence seaway we should act with prudent haste. The minister will recognize, I hope, that the area from which I come does offer a very special opportunity for the development of the community and the county in which the city of Windsor is situated.

There is an added reason for urging the minister to give some attention to this situation. We are handicapped in our section of the country by an unfair freight rate structure which operates against us. It is possible, for instance, to ship a bushel of grain from Chicago to Montreal cheaper than it is to ship a bushel of grain from Windsor to Montreal. Our freight rates are, generally speaking 25 per cent higher than the rates which prevail in the Toronto area. The city of Toronto has become a great distributing centre. Many industries are locating there because it is such an important centre of distribution and we are unfairly affected in our competition because of this freight rate structure. The advantage of water transportation will reduce the effect of unfair and discriminatory freight rates which do exist, in the event that the royal commission does not provide a satisfactory answer. This is an additional reason for seeing to it that the local harbour commission is given the fullest co-operation, the fullest encouragement and the greatest possible financial assistance to undertake these operations at this time—not tomorrow, not in the long run, but today, so that we may be in the best position possible to take advantage of the business which undoubtedly is there if we go after it.

I know that the local commission, the local citizens, must take the initiative. But it is an initiative which must be supported by the federal Department of Transport; otherwise there would not have been the decision made in the first place to establish a commission in 1956. So I ask the minister to look into this situation. Perhaps at some appropriate moment he would make the kind of comment which would please me or at any rate make the kind of comment he thinks is warranted in the circumstances.

When he does that he might take into consideration a decision reached by a committee of this house—a committee to which reference was made by my friend the hon. member for Laurier. That committee unanimously urged the fullest examination by way of economic survey of the potential available in areas served by harbour commissions such as the one I have mentioned. I do not know what is the present position of this over-all survey but it would seem to me that such a survey, together with the examination which has been made by the economics division, would reveal that I am not exaggerating when I say that there is much business available for a harbour such as that of the city of Windsor, ideally located as it is on rich waters—waters now witnessing the transportation of goods which mark the buoyant economy we want to see Canada possess, particularly in view of the activity that is taking place right across the river.

Harbour facilities in Detroit will be taxed. It will not be possible in time, with the economic power of that city, to take full advantage of the facilities which are being provided there. There will have to be some alternative provided, and that place could easily and should be the harbour at Windsor. This is something which requires vision. I know, as I said a moment ago, that vision must exist on the part of the city of Windsor. That vision does exist today. I assure the hon. gentleman that there is a desire to promote harbour development, particularly at this time. But I do believe greater interest is necessary on the part of the federal government and I hope the Minister of Transport will have some very good news for the city of Windsor when he speaks later in connection with this matter.

Mr. McGee: A few minutes ago when I rose to speak on a question of privilege and complained about one member of this committee speaking, as the records will show, four times on the first item of the estimates, although other hon. members had not been called to speak even once, I was interrupted by the hon. member for Laurier who questioned the fair play on my part in challenging the right of the hon. member for Vancouver East to speak. I must say that coming from the hon. member for Laurier, a prominent member of the Liberal party, "fair play" is a peculiar word for him to use—

Mr. Chevrier: On a question of privilege. I ask Your Honour if the hon. member is speaking to the estimates or if he is speaking to a question of privilege or on a point of order. I undersand a decision has been taken to recognize hon. members from one side of the committee or the other alternately. If the hon. member is speaking on a point of order, I claim the right to reply to him.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question put by the hon. member for Laurier, I should like to state that I was discussing the rights and privileges of individual members of this committee. The record of his party in this regard is not too good. I notice they have applied closure in respect of the estimates of the department of highways in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask what that interjection has to do with the estimates now before this committee, or for that matter, with the point of order?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, I should like to state that the hon. member for Laurier knows very well—

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member is talking through his hat.

The Chairman: Order, order. I must say that I did not understand what the hon. member was referring to. If his question has reference to a point of order he should rise on a point of order, otherwise it has no relevancy to the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. McGee: Perhaps I should let the matter stand, as the record will show the statements made by members of the opposition, and the position taken by the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chairman, I rise this afternoon for the purpose of discussing, among other things, the activities of the Canadian National Railways in my constituency, and in particular, the application made by the officials of the Canadian National Railways to discontinue commuter train service in the eastern section of York-Scarborough. Last year officials of the Canadian National Railways appeared before a committee of this house and requested $100 million to construct a marshalling yard with by-pass routes through the north section of the Toronto area. The officials suggested, as one of the reasons for coming to this committee of parliament seeking $100 million, that the construction of this marshalling yard and by-pass route would solve the congestion problem which has occurred in the downtown and waterfront areas in the city of Toronto. They intended to clear that congestion by providing a feeder line similar to the spokes of a wheel, from the perimeter of Toronto to the centre of Toronto.

In answer to questions asked by myself and other hon. members of that committee, those officials suggested that with the establishment of this $100 million marshalling yard and by-pass route, the major impediment to the effective operation of commuter trains between the outskirts of Toronto and the downtown area would be removed. It was explained that the building of this by-pass was of vital concern to these areas.

After every possible alternative route had been considered, it was decided that the only practical route was through the quiet, sleepy village of Thornhill in the north section of my constituency. The inhabitants of that village had established themselves there in an attempt to avoid the hustle, bustle and accompanying disturbances of big city business and traffic. However, they found themselves, following this decision, faced with the prospect of having a two line, 60 train per day freight route through the middle of the village. I am sure hon. members will appreciate that the inhabitants of that village were not wildly enthusiastic about that prospect. Perhaps I should repeat that this route was decided upon after each and every alternative had been considered exhaustively but reluctantly rejected.

Those officials came to that parliamentary committee requesting $100 million for the construction of these proposed projects, holding out as an inducement, the continuation and extension of commuter service in that area. I do not know whether the responsibility can be laid at the feet of the president of the Canadian National Railways, but someone in the executive of that crown corporation should receive first prize for having the nerve of a canal horse, having come to this parliament offering the continuation of commuter service in exchange for $100 million and after two months making the decision to eliminate existing commuter services. I refer, of course, to the application which has been made in respect of Canadian National train No. 94. The reaction of the residents of Agincourt and Markham has been tremendous. A special meeting was held between the officials of the railroad and interested parties in that area. I attended that meeting as well. As a result of representations made at that time a tentative decision was reached, to discontinue the train service beyond the bounds of the Toronto limits and to retain the essential portion of the commuter service.

The metropolitan council of the city of Toronto has formed a committee with terms of reference to examine transportation problems generally in the city of Toronto, and to evaluate the necessity of commuter trains. It is my understanding this committee will also consider the cost and possibility of subsidizing these commuter services.

There has been some discussion during the consideration of this item regarding the degree of interest held by the officials of this railroad to passenger and commuter traffic. I have come to the conclusion that the railways officials would rather have their cars filled with cattle than human beings. I know of the existence of a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals but am not aware of a similar society in respect to human beings. I would suggest there should be such an organization in order to prevent some of the things which people are subjected to while travelling on the railways.

If it were my contention that the railway officials were intentionally trying to drive passengers away, I would suggest as an example, that hon. members consider the type and quality of food being served to passengers. In my opinion that represents one ingredient of this plot. The sandwiches now being dispensed by the express agent on these trains are priced at 35 cents. These sandwiches consist of two pieces of bread, ingeniously designed to turn into lumps of lead after being swallowed, covered with a microscopic film of what appears to be lard but what is probably uncoloured margarine, and a piece of the most tired rat cheese it has ever been my misfortune to attempt to consume. I use the words "attempt to consume" advisedly. I have been chewing on these sandwiches for some years now and I have never finished one yet.

I have discussed the situation with several of my colleagues and have arrived at the conclusion that the cost involved in producing these sandwiches for sale on trains would not exceed 5 cents unless there was some formula involved in the making of the bread so that it will turn into lead. As I say, these sandwiches cost 5 cents to produce and are sold for 35 cents. One can of course purchase the ham variety of sandwich which is about as pleasurable and delightful to eat as an old piece of shoe leather.

I should like the minister to investigate this situation and inform the committee why these express agents are allowed to perpetrate what can only be described as a fraud against the travelling public of Canada. If a contract exists between the railways and the express agents allowing them to sell this outrageous product at an even more outrageous price, could the minister tell us when the contract will come up for renewal so that some form of control can be applied, or something can be done to correct this particular situation.

As I started to say, it would seem at times that there is a plot within the railway system to discourage passenger traffic. My hon. friend from Danforth has expressed opinions and related experiences concerning the relationship of passengers to baggage. Anybody travelling between Ottawa and Toronto and stopping at Leaside or at other stations along the way, and at the station here, of course finds the trains made up in such a way that when they arrive at the station and it is time for the passengers to disembark the baggage and the baggage handling get first preference. At times one has to walk for the better part of half a mile, part of it through cinders, and perhaps in the rain, on wet concrete the rest of the way to reach the station platform. There you will find the baggage handlers in dry comfort unloading their portion of the train. This is the attitude toward passenger traffic. It seems to me no imagination has been used in the provision of passenger comfort. People are discouraged from travelling on trains. As soon as the number of passengers declines the railways go before the board of transport commissioners and apply to have the passenger service dropped entirely. It is a very easy way to avoid one's responsibilities.

Another question that came up when the officials of the C.N.R. were present at Agincourt to determine the feelings of the community was that of advertising. It is my understanding that the C.N.R. spends some $2 million in general advertising. Some of that advertising abroad probably has a residual benefit in encouraging people to visit Canada. It seems to me, if you are going to operate an efficient passenger service and an efficient commuter passenger service the first thing that an intelligent, reasonable man would do would be to approach the people in the area already concerned who are using the commuter trains and encourage them to extend their use of the trains; to do some advertising in the local newspapers and make some positive effort to encourage a greater use of the commuter trains.

They argue that the number of commuter cars do not justify the use of an engine. Obviously, if you want more passengers you are going to have to tell the potential customers about the service that is available, and make a great effort to convince those people that they should use the commuter trains. At no time have I seen in the local newspapers any advertisement of any description other than some general advertising proclaiming some great service such as "Travel with your family on trains". I could spend the next half hour describing some of the experiences I have had with my own family in travelling on trains, but perhaps that would not be quite to the point. The point is, Mr. Chairman, no real effort is made anywhere to examine the passenger structure in this country, to improve the service or to encourage people who would normally use the passenger service to use it to a greater extent.

I would hope that the C.N.R. would continue to operate the commuter trains which they have said would remain in the service. I would hope they would do everything they can to accommodate the timetables and schedules on the trains to the convenience of the passengers, and to encourage more passengers to use the trains. I would hope they would spend some of the $2 million in placing advertisements either in the local newspapers or in some other media to encourage people in the area to make full use of the commuter trains.

The congestion of traffic in Toronto, as in other major cities, is a difficult problem. We have a major throughway program and an expressway program under way at the present time. We are embarking on an extended subway program, but still the most efficient, effective and fastest method of transportation from the perimeter to the centre of Toronto is over the existing rights of way. I would suggest further that some attempt be made to design a cheaper commuter car. Normally, those trains will not be travelling at the great speeds at which the passenger trains would be travelling. It seems to me, therefore, there should be some saving in the weight and in the solidity of the structure which would not be specifically exposed to any of the hazards of a trans-continental train which travels at speeds up to 80 and 90 miles an hour.

These are some of the suggestions that I would hope the minister would keep in mind in his consultations with the Canadian National Railways. I would hope that, with the co-operation of the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific and metro Toronto, we can look forward to the day in that city when an efficient, effective pattern of commuter service will be serving the people.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: After the friendly exchange between the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) and the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) I thought I should rise myself on that matter of canalization.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville seemed to think that the most important aspect in the matter of the Richelieu seaway project was that it should pay its way. Anyway, as the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville said, this matter also seemed vital to the minister because he stated that the project was not economically sound.

Now, I wonder what is meant exactly by an economically sound project? Does it mean only the immediate revenue from the passage of ships through the locks or elsewhere, or is the economic development which such canalization may entail taken into account?

The matter I want to deal with has been under consideration for years. It is the Ottawa seaway project.

We were discussing that even before the St. Lawrence seaway development, but I can quite understand why this Ottawa river scheme was set aside as a secondary project, if it is compared to the other.

However, I think deepening those waterways, both the Ottawa and the Richelieu, would tend to develop and decentralize some industries which, today, as everyone agrees, are too centralized in one community or an other. Furthermore, is it not a fact that the economic development of one or two areas would be well worth the expense required of the government to bring prosperity outside Canada's larger centres.

I think at the present time, there would be something to be gained in deepening both rivers at the same time. In my constituency, there are pulp and paper companies exporting rather large quantities across the border, where the New York market is considered most important. If the Ottawa and Richelieu rivers were deepened, it would reduce the distance by some 1,200 miles for those products.

If we consider that waterway transport is much less expensive than railway transport, this would allow our pulp and paper companies to compete with the European continent companies which have a kind of wood somewhat like the one in the province of Quebec, however, these companies can manufacture and sell their paper cheaper, for while transportation costs from Europe to the United States are expensive enough, European paper mills still have an advantage on ours.

However, if we had the advantages of both these seaways, we could see pulp and paper mills develop along the Ottawa river, for we are not short of power—we have it—and we could find the necessary labour, but what we lack are means of transportation.

As a matter of fact, on the Quebec side, we only have the Canadian Pacific, and if we want to use the Canadian National, we have to cross over to Ontario. Furthermore, transportation rates are increasing all the time. It could hardly be otherwise, since the administration costs of railways have increased and, on account of that, they have to find revenues from all quarters in order to have both ends meet.

That is a real difficulty, but we must not, on account of the expenses of our railways, allow our industries to suffer to the extent of losing certain foreign markets which we are entitled to have.

That is why I think the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville was right when he said that the department should undertake at once a serious study of all those projects, because such a study requires researches in all fields, which means lots of work and time. If we lose time before undertaking such a study, where shall we stand?

Besides, on the matter of economic soundness, I should like to refer to a quotation made yesterday by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, which supports precisely my argument. It is part of a thesis submitted to the University of Syracuse by a Mr. Tefft who states the following:

> Finally, I do not think that the ultimate decision as to whether or not the waterway should be deepened and, if so, to what depth, should be overly influenced by cost-benefit ratios. I do not deny the usefulness of ratios, but a dollar and cent sign cannot possibly be hung on the defence value of an improved waterway.
> Then too, I am struck with the highly problematical nature of benefit estimates. They cannot accurately take into account the future, if for no other reason than that they do not know what it will be. This is particularly true in a region that appears to be about to undergo the unusually rapid change that seems to be in store for the Champlain basin.

[Mr. Caron.]

We also hope that the Department of Transport will favourably consider the deepening of the Ottawa river, for we can forecast in our area an industrial development that will employ all the available working force, and this would help our people a great deal.

Even though we know that we will not cover the cost of the project in one, 10 or even 20 years, we should not forget that the industrial development that would take place would yield taxes to the government; it would produce transport income which, in turn, yields taxes to the government.

It seems to us that, even if the project should not prove to be a profitable one as far as revenues from the waterway itself are concerned, there would be a certain degree of profit because of the indirect revenues that the government would derive from the industrial development of the area.

I therefore ask the minister to seek information from the experts of his department, to ascertain the possibilities of the development of these waterways.

The deepening of the Ottawa river would go hand in hand with the deepening of the Richelieu river. I think those projects would complement each other.

If they could be implemented, I am sure that, as a consequence, two important areas in the country would experience the expansion they are entitled to and we would have only congratulations and thanks to extend to the government.

(Text):

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a few words about Canadian Pacific Air Lines and Trans-Canada Air Lines. The hon. member for Vancouver East gave T.C.A. quite a boost. He went into rhapsodies about it. In the part of the country from which I come we would be walking or riding horseback if we did not have C.P.A. A railroad runs in there but the train only operates a couple of times a week or maybe once a week or maybe not at all. There is a sleeper on the train but you have to put a blanket across the window to keep the wind out.

C.P.A. really serves the north country. When we go home we land at Fort St. John. If we were waiting for T.C.A. we would still be in Edmonton. T.C.A. does not allow C.P.A. to pick up passengers who are going toward Toronto. T.C.A. insists on taking all such passengers from Whitehorse, the Yukon, Fort St. John, Prince George and that region.

C.P.A. renders a real service to the north and it is the north in which I am interested.

Canadian Pacific Air Lines and Trans-Canada Air Lines are two really good air lines. I was down in Kentucky on the 6th of May.

An hon. Member: What were you doing?

Mr. Henderson: I was at a church meeting. There is no comparison between C.P.A. and T.C.A. on the one hand and Eastern Air Lines on which I travelled. The employees are not interested in the passengers. I thought the girl on the plane had had a battle with her husband, if she had one, because she was so sour. But the personnel at the airports are excellent. I have never had better service from anybody.

When I came back from the race track to Louisville I told the fellow I wanted to get back to Ottawa. This was Saturday night at eight o'clock. He said, "Come on over and meet the boss". The boss turned out to be the head man at the Louisville airport. He said, "Where do you want to go"? I said, "Ottawa". He said, "I will get you there. I will have you in New York tonight." I said. "I do not want to go to New York". He said, "We will fly you to Columbus and then to Cleveland and then to Toronto". I was here next morning at eleven o'clock. That is service.

Mr. Pickersgill: In time for church.

Mr. Henderson: I think T.C.A. is giving C.P.A. a rough deal. I know Mr. McConachie, the president of C.P.A., personally. He lived at Fort St. John for four years. He was a bush pilot. If some Eskimo or Indian child or one of our own children was sick, he would fly them out no matter what the weather was like. He was a real credit to the north. I should like to see him get a break so that C.P.A. can have other routes across Canada.

T.C.A. gets all the breaks. They can fly to London. The British government will let Mr. McConachie's air line land in London but T.C.A. will not allow it. I am not too well versed in these matters. C.P.A. has to go to Amsterdam. Why can they not have the right to land at London, England? I understand the British authorities have given them permission to land there. The Minister of Transport can tell us all about it. On the west coast C.P.A. is losing passengers to another line running down to Seattle. Everybody goes that way and C.P.A. cannot have that route.

It was only a short time ago that T.C.A. were trying to make a deal with an air line from Japan. I think that C.P.A. should get a break in this deal. They are Canadians. It is true that the hon. member for Vancouver East attempted to "blow up" T.C.A. However, these people are also Canadians and they pay taxes. Speaking of paying taxes, all we do is to pay taxes to Mr. McGregor's outfit. May I say that I am not against T.C.A. However, I should like to see these other people get a break. If you are going across the ocean now via B.O.A.C., what do you find? You find that they are flying with the cheap propeller driven planes. T.C.A. do not use them. They do not have this kind. They are much higher than that. However, B.O.A.C. have them. I do not think C.P.A. are getting the break which they should get.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to take up the time of the committee unduly but there are one or two reasons why I desire to intervene at this stage. The first is to deal with some questions that were addressed to myself during the course of this discussion and also to say something in connection with what transpired yesterday when the hon. member for Coast-Capilano entered the discussion in connection with something I had said concerning T.C.A. and the air policy of the government. I did not take as seriously as did the hon. member for Vancouver East the statements made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. I thought that they were fair criticism. While I do not agree with him in many of the things he said, I rise to make a statement in connection with the matter. I have risen, Mr. Chairman, not to defend T.C.A. I think that is the responsibility of the minister. I think the minister is responsible to parliament for Trans-Canada Air Lines in the same manner as he is responsible for the Canadian National Railways. If he follows the practice which has been followed in the past and which most ministers of transport have followed, he will give the picture as it is related to him by the responsible officers of both those crown corporations. There is, of course, the committee in which members can examine the officers that come there from time to time.

I am rising chiefly to point out that under the former administration we were determined to prevent from arising a situation such as that which arose under the Borden government with railways when too many trans-continental lines were built and none of them could pay. I do not think there can be any challenge to that statement. As the committee knows, Mr. Borden had to bail out Mackenzie and Mann for $10 million which was a great deal of money in those days. In this whole picture of trans-continental air lines policy, the government should make sure not to distribute the trans-continental air lines in such a manner that neither company can make money and that the treasury will have to foot the bill. That is what the MacPherson commission is doing at the present time with the railways. I hope it will not happen with the air lines. Perhaps the hon. member for Greenwood will remember that $10 million. As the hon. member said, all I am suggesting is that we should apply common sense to this policy. I refer to the policy of the government. If we do that, then I think we will arrive at a proper conclusion.

I want to make some reference to the speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I am sorry that he is not in his seat.

Mr. Drysdale: Keep it going; I will be right back.

Mr. Chevrier: It was, I must say at once, a remarkable speech and I wish to commend that hon. member not only for the knowledge which he possesses of the freight rate question but for the objective manner in which he spoke on this subject. It has been a long time since I heard a speech on freight rates of that calibre in this chamber. I am not saying that I agree with what he said. However, I am saying that he rose to deal objectively with the subject of freight rates. For instance, he pointed to a matter that has caused a great deal of concern to the former administration. It has to do with the one and one third rule and the agreed charges. I refer to the one and one third rule which was recommended by the Turgeon royal commission on transportation. The agreed charges which amended the Transport Act, according to the province of Alberta, annulled the benefits of the one and one third rule. About the time at which I left the government there was a great deal of opposition to the effect of the amendment of the Transport Act on the one and one third rule. That was why it was necessary to call in the Turgeon commission again and to have it make a report such as the one it made.

The hon. member said another thing with which I am fully in agreement. I note that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is now in his seat. I am sorry he was not here earlier but I do not think he could have found any fault with what I said concerning his contribution. The other thing on which I agree fully with him is this. He said, "This is not a political question". There could be no greater truism than that. Freight rates are not and should not be a political question. I am sorry the hon. member was not here when I sat on the other side of the house in the place occupied by the present Minister of Transport and in a position to observe the kind of attitude the opposition took in this chamber. I made it quite clear that freight rates were effected by the board of transport commissioners and not by the cabinet or the government and that the board of transport commissioners was established for that purpose. But do you think the opposition listened to me? They did not listen to me in the slightest degree. From those who were interested to those who sit on our right now came the attack and the charge that we were the ones who were responsible for allowing these horizontal rates to increase unjustly from one end of the country to the other.

There was only once—and by once I mean during one period of time—in the long history from confederation down to the present time when the government was responsible for the establishment of freight rates and that was when the cabinet itself dealt with them. The cabinet used to deal with freight rates—just imagine that situation—across Canada. That power was taken away—and rightly so—from the cabinet and was put into the hands of the board of transport commissioners. Of course, if I have made the statements which I made earlier, I have done so as a result of the statements made by the Prime Minister during the campaigns of 1957 and 1958 when he went from one end of the country to the other and said, on freight rates, "Did we act? Of course we acted. Here is what we did". That is nothing but an invitation to political attacks.

The freight rate question is a highly complex and complicated matter which should be left to a technical board such as the board of transport commissioners.

I pass on to another matter which was raised by the hon. member for Danforth in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway tolls. I suppose that if I wanted to take the proper attitude I would say to the hon. member that the Minister of Transport is in his seat and the questions which the hon. member directed to me should be directed to the minister because he is now responsible for the administration of that body and I am not.

However, I will not take that attitude. The hon. member said, "Why was there no opposition to the question of tolls? No mention was made of tolls on the Welland canal". Perhaps I should say to the hon. member that under the 1932 treaty there was no question of tolls, and the situation was the same under the 1941 agreement, both of which, as the hon. member rightly said, were not ratified by the congress of the United States.

Then, because of the many delays occurring in the United States and Canada, there arose a great desire on the part of both countries to find a solution to this problem and to bring about the project. The solution was found by means of a joint application on the part of Canada and the United States to the international joint commission whereby, if that application were successful, legislation would be introduced by Canada for the construction of the seaway.

That legislation was introduced in 1951 by the act known as 15-16 George VI, an act to establish the St. Lawrence seaway authority. So there may be no doubt in the mind of my hon. friend, who seems to think there was no authority for these tolls, I would point out that the authority is set out in the act of parliament just as clearly as it could be.

In the first place let me say that earlier Canada had decided to deepen the St. Lawrence waterway up to Montreal at a cost of about $100 million, payable by the taxpayers of Canada. Canada had also decided to deepen the new Welland canal at a cost of about $132 million, payable by the taxpayers of Canada, on both of which there were no tolls. On the other hand the United States had agreed to carry out the deepening of the connecting channels, which would cost about $100 million.

This act was introduced in 1951 and section 10 clearly sets out what were the purposes and powers of the authority. They were, first, to build a deep-sea waterway between the port of Montreal and lake Erie, which included the Welland canal; and next, to construct, maintain and operate all such works as were necessary for that purpose.

If we look at section 17 we find these words:

> Where the works have been constructed and are maintained and operated by the authority to provide, in conjunction with works undertaken by an appropriate authority in the United States, the deep waterway mentioned in section ten,—

That is the section I have referred to:

> —tolls may be established pursuant to sections fifteen and sixteen or by agreement between Canada and the United States—

We were defeated in 1957, after this legislation was passed, of course, but before—and long before—the agreement referred to herein had been made between Canada and the United States. I am not suggesting for a moment that the government should have repudiated this section, but I am stating that it was after 1957 that the international tolls-making committee was established; it was after 1957 that the former minister of transport, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, placed on the table the order in council which established the agreement and the tolls on both the St. Lawrence and Welland canals.

My hon. friend says, "The agreements were made between the two authorities, one from the United States and the other from Canada. The question is: why was the cost not absorbed by the government itself, as was done in the United States with respect to the three rivers I have mentioned?"

I am afraid that question will have to be directed to the present Minister of Transport because that was done during the regime of the present government. But in so far as the former government was concerned, I must say that it would not have been possible to obtain the consent of the government of the United States unless those tolls had been imposed.

The reason we accepted the imposition of tolls was because we felt it was only fair that the users should pay for the canal, and not the taxpayers of Canada. The people of British Columbia and the Atlantic provinces would have opposed the seaway, and rightly so, if they had been expected to pay for it out of their taxes.

I remember that when this matter was discussed in the House of Commons there was unanimity. Hon. members from the Atlantic provinces said, "We fear this may be of some hurt to us, but we have come to the conclusion that this is a good thing for Canada. We have come to the conclusion that anything that helps one part will help the whole, and we will therefore support it on that basis".

I think, too, there was the other reason which I have just mentioned, namely that if we had not made this a toll seaway it would not have been possible to obtain unanimity from all parts of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I now wish to consider another question.

Yesterday, we had a debate on the deepening of the Richelieu river. The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) who took part in the debate asked me certain questions, particularly why the member for Laurier, either as minister of transport or as president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority had not considered the possibility of deepening the Richelieu river. He also asked me why the member for Laurier, at the time he was either minister of transport or the chairman of the seaway authority, had paid absolutely no attention to the the Richelieu waterway.

Mr. Chairman, the answer is quite simple. In fact, if the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville had referred to the reports, or if he only had studied the act, he would not have asked that question. On the other hand, had he read the book he mentioned last night, he would also have found out that the answer to his question is given there in two parts.

As for my responsibility as minister of transport, I never had the opportunity of studying the possibility of deepening the Richelieu, for a reason that is found in a preliminary report prepared by the boundary waters commission.

That commission in fact had been called upon, in 1937, to make a survey concerning the possible dredging of the Richelieu, and had submitted a rather lengthy report dealing with all aspects of the matter, that is: the five routes, specifications concerning the seaway, whether the channel should be 14 or 27 feet deep, its cost, the volume of traffic, etc. The commission arrived at the following conclusion which I read from the preliminary report:

> The commission recommends that this report be considered as a preliminary report and that the commission be authorized to maintain its jurisdiction over that question until the St. Lawrence seaway project is completed, and that the commission be given the opportunity to study the impact of its operation on the Richelieu seaway project.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that as long as the St. Lawrence seaway was not completed, it surely was not proper for the government, in view of the decision of the boundary waters commission, to consider looking into that project.

In addition, the hon. member has asked me how it was that at the time I was chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, I did not request our engineers and my officials to study the matter. The answer is quite simple. It is found in section 10 of the St. Lawrence seaway authority act. That section is as follows:

> The authority is incorporated—

Why?

> (a) acquiring lands for and constructing, maintaining and operating all such works as may be necessary to provide and maintain, either wholly on Canada or in conjunction with works undertaken by an appropriate authority in the United States, a deep waterway between the port of Montreal and lake Erie—

Such, Mr. Chairman, were the powers vested in the authority, namely the power of constructing a canal between the port of Montreal and lake Erie, and there was no intention of the power to consider the possibilities of the Richelieu waterway project. If we had considered anything else besides the St. Lawrence seaway, we would have abused our powers, which would have been illegal.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Laurier permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Certainly.

Mr. Balcer: Can the hon. member tell me who piloted the bill in the house and who led the debate on it?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: Naturally, it is the member for Laurier who introduced the bill in the house and who led the debate on it, but as the minister himself stated yesterday evening, the member for Laurier had his own responsibilities and could not go beyond the powers he had under the act. As a minister of the crown, does the Minister of Transport have the right to go beyond the powers vested in him by the act? No.

In conclusion, I will say that I would not have been surprised had I been asked that question by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), because he has not had the same training as the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville. At least, the latter is a lawyer and he should know about the requirements of the law. Apparently, that is not the case.

So, you have two alternatives—he is not aware of the law or he is being unfair; you cannot have it both ways. The law is there, and it outlines the powers of the president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I prefer a learned agronomist to an ignorant lawyer like the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Johnson: On a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville has raised a point of order.

Mr. Johnson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Laurier is making all kinds of statements—if the hon. member would kindly resume his seat, I would continue. He is making all kinds of statements, but he did not refer to the exact text; I said, and I repeat it here:

> Why has he not seen to it then that the authorities of the St. Lawrence seaway consider the problem of the Richelieu waterway, while it was time, that everything was organized to make a full study of it, and especially economic studies?

He was a minister at that time, and he had the right to insert such a provision in the act, but not to restrict the powers of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. Let him set the facts straight, then. Let him put the question as it should be and he will be able to provide an answer. He has no right to accuse me of being unfair and ignorant.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I shall answer the question of the hon. member who is asking me why I did not have the matter of deepening the Richelieu looked into in my capacity as chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. It is because the authority was not empowered to do so; under the boundary waters commission's report, this project was not to be considered before completion of the St. Lawrence seaway. Now, the seaway was completed late in 1958 or early in 1959, and since that time, a Conservative government has been in power. It is up to the present government to study the project.

I do not hesitate, therefore, to tell the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, who is a lawyer, that either he does not understand the law and the responsibilities provided under it, or that he is being unfair. It is either one or the other.

Mr. Johnson: I have passed real law examinations, not mere prestige ones.

Mr. Chevrier: Moreover, Mr. Chairman, he asked several times who claims that this project is not feasible?

Well, if he takes that stand, I am convinced that the voters of his riding are going to wonder if he is really in favour of the Richelieu waterway or not. After all, when one wonders if a project is feasible, it shows that one doubts whether the project is even practicable. That is obvious. Another thing is that we, on this side of the house, have only asked for an engineering board to study the economic aspect of the project. That is all we have asked for.

Why is it that in the United States a similar agency is already operating? Why is it that the U.S. Corps of Engineers has already undertaken its investigations and, I am told—but I may be wrong here—that this same corps has made certain studies in Canada?

If I am correctly informed and the person from whom I got this information is a responsible engineer, why is it that Canada is not putting aside a few thousand dollars, let us say $30,000, $40,000 or $50,000 in order that the project may be investigated?

It is not by assigning this task to officials of the transport department that we will get satisfactory findings. Not because these officials are not qualified engineers, but because they are overloaded with work in the department.

This matter is of the utmost importance for the people in the area and it is therefore essential that it be studied as would, I hope, the deepening of the Ottawa river. To establish whether a project will be profitable, one must study it, a technical committee must be instituted. One can—

Some hon. Members: You could have done it.

Mr. Chevrier: You can hear them say, Mr. Chairman: You could have done it.

I have just given the reasons why we did not do so, the act was the obstacle.

Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that this will stop the member for Chambly-Rouville or the member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm who is now behind me from uttering the same stupidities. Not at all. In spite of the law, they will continue to repeat in this house and outside that we should have done it when we were in power. It just shows the stuff they are made of.

Some hon. Members: Quite true.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, we could not do it under the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act. Moreover, we could not do it because of the decision of the boundary waters commission. It is obvious that those people lack good faith; otherwise, why do they not set up the engineering commission so that the question may be looked into and we may know whether the project is economically feasible, to what depth the river should be dredged and what traffic volume would be required?

Then, do not, by your speeches and cheap politics, impede the development of a project which means so much to the province of Quebec.

(Text):

Mr. Small: The hon. member made reference to Mackenzie and Mann, but I should suggest to him that it was not the Borden government which started the railway. That was something which originated under the Laurier government. I am not suggesting he did not bail the railway out in respect of the $10 million, but it is something he inherited.

Mr. Chevrier: The Canadian Great Northern Railway was not begun during the regime of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. Macdonnell: Oh, yes it was.

Mr. Pickersgill: But not as a government enterprise.

Mr. Macdonnell: There were guarantees and more guarantees provided. I do not want the impression left unchallenged that the Borden government plunged into a whole new railways system. It was the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific that loaded us up with additional railway construction. I did not attempt to blame this on one government. I said it had been done by both sides. However, hon. members opposite have tried to suggest that the Borden government was responsible for all this; they are either misrepresenting the situation or do not know what they are talking about.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand the hon. member for Greenwood has some knowledge of this question regarding the $10 million.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not deny that.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would tell us exactly what the position was, because that happened before I entered the House of Commons and, if I am wrong in the statement I made earlier, I should like him to correct me.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am trying to correct the suggestion that nothing was done before 1911 by the government to stimulate the railway building that occurred at that time. That is a wrong suggestion.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege; I did not suggest that at all. I wrote down what I said and I shall repeat it. There can be no doubt about what I said. It was only a very short sentence. I said we were determined, in the former administration, to prevent a situation arising in air lines such as arose under the Borden government, with the railways, when too many transcontinental lines were built and none of them could pay. Then I went on to say that Mr. Borden had to bail out Mackenzie and Mann for $10 million, which was a great deal of money in those days and I added that perhaps the hon. member for Greenwood could tell us something about this.

An hon. Member: He is telling you now.

Mr. Macdonnell: Surely what the hon. member said was that the Borden government was responsible for the creation of an utterly exaggerated railway situation, and that there had to be a bailing out. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said the Liberal government had nothing to do with the Mackenzie-Mann construction. I do know something about that. I am quite confident that a check of what has been said will show that one of the two hon. members I have named said that the Liberal government had nothing to do with that previous construction, prior to 1911.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I can clear up what I did say.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know that the hon. member does not want to misrepresent what I said.

Mr. Drysdale: Be fair.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. member for Greenwood is anxious to hear what I did say. I said the Laurier government had nothing to do with establishing the Canadian Northern Railway as a government enterprise. Everyone knows they established the national transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific as a government enterprise, but the Canadian Northern Railway was an entirely private enterprise.

An hon. Member: Established under a Liberal regime.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was a private enterprise until 1911, although I believe it received provincial guarantees before that.

Mr. Macdonnell: There were many guarantees before that, and the Grand Trunk Pacific came along at the same time.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was long before the beginning of the Canadian Northern.

Mr. Macdonnell: No, not long before, along with it.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was 1903.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, 1903-04 is quite right, but the Canadian northern line, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, were being guaranteed by both provincial governments and the federal government and were built before 1911.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, but not before 1903.

Mr. Macdonnell: I will get the exact dates, but I think I can speak with knowledge of that. They were begun before 1911, but the last guarantee came in 1914, just before the beginning of the first world war. The impression that the hon. member for Danforth sought to controvert, as I do now, was the impression left by the hon. member for Laurier that Mr. Borden, as he was then, had a situation to deal with which was created by himself.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not say that at all.

Mr. Macdonnell: All I am saying now is, that is a wrong impression and I should like to correct it.

Mr. Pallett: The Liberals always leave a mess when they go out of office.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a question to the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I refuse to answer any question from the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville who was most impolite to me last night.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Belzile: Mr. Chairman, after that short period of stormy discussion, I am sure the house will be happy to bear with me during a few minutes in a more serene atmosphere. I do not wish to hold up unduly the debate on this first item. But let me discuss for a few minutes a matter of extreme importance which concerns me very much. That is the municipal airport of the city of Matane.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, the great difficulties and the many problems the Minister of Transport must face because of the exceptional and tremendous progress made in the last few years in the field of air transport and airports facilities.

In my region there are three airports: those of Matane, Mont Joli and Rimouski.

It is not my function to persent here requests concerning the Mont Joli and Rimouski airports, nor does it behoove me to criticize or minimize their requests.

I have here, Mr. Chairman, two good size files which represent quite a considerable amount of work. Since I have become member for Matapedia-Matane there has been a huge correspondance between the Department of Transport and the municipal council of Matane, the chamber of commerce of Matane and other citizens interested in the problem.

I would not want to go too far back and to recall every single step I took for the improvement of the municipal airport in my county seat.

May I be permitted, however, to mention that from the day I was elected in 1958, I have relentlessly attacked that problem. Unfortunately the results I have obtained so far amount to nil.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Belzile: At times, however, we had hopes. I would like to say for the record that on September 15, 1958, I received a letter from an official of the Department of Transport. It went as follows:

> The department is preparing the plans for additional facilities at the Matane airport. The necessary funds have been provided for in the department's supplementary estimates and we are doing everything we can to award the contract as soon as possible.

On March 20, 1959, I received a letter from the then minister of transport. Allow me to read a paragraph of that letter:

> As you are aware, an item of $100,000 had been included originally in my department's estimates for the next fiscal year, in the hope that those funds would enable us to finish the plans and at least undertake the works. Unfortunately, we had to cut down our estimates so that the total amount would not exceed that of the current year and, consequently, we had to leave out a certain number of items, including the one concerning the Matane airport. I realize that the city of Matane—

Mr. Chairman, needless to add that the letter was as unpopular with those immediately concerned—and I have no intention of dissociating myself from that group—as with the people of Matane and the surrounding area.

Since that date, I nevertheless energetically pursued my efforts in favour of the improvement and development of the Matane airport. However, on March 13, 1961, the Quebecair company, which served the Matane airport, the north shore and cities like Quebec and Montreal, notified us that it would abandon the service at Matane airport.

I should add that another company remains, with headquarters at Matane, Matane Air Services which is now using our airport for its north shore route. The company operates DC-3 aircraft and also smaller ones—I forget their name—which can carry up to 12 passengers.

If my information is correct, legislation on air security does not, at this time, allow DC-3 aircraft to be used at the Matane municipal airport, and it is because they have a special permit that Matane Air Services may do so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I mentioned earlier today, it is useless to go backwards. Up to now, our efforts have been in vain. But we still have the merit of having tried, at least I hope so. Nevertheless, one fact remains: what is done is done and to us all that matters is the present and future.

Quebec Air Lines have abandoned their Matane service and there are now only the Matane Air Services left, with headquarters at the airport. The latter gives adequate service for emergency transportation, that is transportation required by north shore towns. At this time, all concerned have plenty of good will. When I say all concerned, I mean the municipal council of Matane, the chamber of commerce there, the people of Matane and the surrounding area, that is the valley which brings business to the airport of Matane.

At this stage of my remarks, may I say to those who doubt that the traffic at the airport of Matane is considerable, that just a few weeks ago, in a single day, Matane Air Services transported 240 people from Matane to Shelter Bay, to Port Cartier and other small airports along the north shore.

I received this very day a letter from the town council of Matane, to which was attached a copy of a resolution passed by the council. It reads as follows:

Excerpt from the minutes of the proceedings of the municipal council of the city of Matane;

Sitting held on Monday, May 1st, 1961 in the town hall of Matane, at 8 o'clock p.m.;

Members presents: His Honour the Mayor, Mr. F. Adrien Gauthier; aldermen Antoine Lavoie, Rene Pelletier, Benoit McMullen, Raymond Meunier, Fernand Dugas, Victor Fournier and J. B. Dionne, secretary-treasurer;

The following resolution was unanimously passed;

Moved by Benoit McMullen, seconded by Fernand Dugas:

Whereas correspondence has been exchanged between the city of Matane and the Department of Transport with regard to the extension and improvement of the municipal airport;

Whereas this request has been turned down by the treasury board as too costly;

Whereas a DC-3 air service is required for adequate operations between the two shores and particularly for the work now under way in the Manicouagan district, where approximately 10,000 men are employed;

Whereas the majority of those employed are from this area and need air service to travel in and out of the area;

Whereas to ensure the efficiency of such a service, particularly at peak periods in the fall and winter, it is essential to use several DC-3s between Matane and the seven stations serviced along the north shore;

Be it unanimously resolved that the city council urges the Hon. Leon Balcer, Minister of Transport, to extend the main runway by 1,000 feet on city owned property, as a substitute for the previous projects which have been found too costly.

In passing such a resolution, I think the Matane city council showed exceptional practical sense, as it gives the authorities a last chance to realize that the city of Matane is entitled to some assistance in the improvement of its airport.

We are asking for a 1,000 foot extension to the runway, and lighting facilities at the airport to permit night landings.

Mr. Chairman, I now close my remarks on behalf of the Matane airport. I feel sure that the present minister, who is very conscious of his responsibility as Minister of Transport, will devote his full attention and consideration to this project which is important both to my constituents and to the hon. member for Matane.

Before resuming my seat, I wish to say a word or two on another timely subject which is of interest to the C.N.R.

The Matapedia valley has a community by the name of Amqui, which is the seat of Matapedia county. The C.N.R. station at Amqui serves the neighbouring communities of St. Léon le Grand, St. Zénon, Ste. Irenée, St. Tharcisius, St. Vianney. For many years, we have had a 24 hour operator service there. While I was visiting Amqui recently, the station master told me he had received a letter from the C.N.R. dispatcher saying that the night shift would be abolished as of May 22 next.

I believe such an attitude of the C.N.R. would certainly be prejudicial to the passenger traffic of the Matapedia valley and especially to the communities I mentioned a moment ago, because during that shift, three passenger trains stop at Amqui to take or leave passengers. There is the Maritime Express, between Montreal and Halifax; the Ocean Limited between the same points and the Maritime Express on its way back from Halifax to Montreal.

I made the necessary representations to the Minister of Transport and I repeat them here and ask him to use his influence on Canadian National Railway authorities in an effort to have them decide to maintain the operator service at Amqui as it is now and as it has existed for many years.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport complained the other day in another debate that I took part in debates on what were described as trivial matters and had nothing to say about the important declaration he made recently on shipping. So as to relieve the minister of his disappointment in the matter, I intend to say something about his announcement and I wish to say how much I welcomed these words uttered by the minister the other day, as found on page 4783 of Hansard. With respect to his statement he said:

We intend to help the fishermen who are working in very small boats. We are going to look after them, too.

That is a promise that will be welcomed by all the fishermen on the Atlantic coast. It was, of course, what was asked for by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador the other day in committee of supply on the estimates of one of the minister's colleagues, and we were rather disappointed when it was found that fishermen in small boats were not included in the declaration the minister made the other day with respect to aid for fishermen in the larger boats.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a few things I should like to say in the short time I have before five o'clock. As I was saying, the fishermen who operate very small boats and who, as is well known, constitute the majority of fishermen on the east coast of Canada were naturally a little disappointed, I think, that the assistance by the government as set out in the statement made by the minister was related to the larger boats. Therefore I was immensely pleased when the minister made that statement, and I should like to repeat these two lines found at the bottom of the first column on page 4783 of Hansard for May 13.

We intend to help the fishermen who are working in very small boats. We are going to look after them, too.

Before we proceed to deal with this matter on the minister's famous $1 item, I think it would be very desirable if he would give us a precise account of how aid for small boats is going to be provided because this will be a matter of the greatest possible interest to the fishermen. It has been my feeling for a long time and the feeling of those of us who represent fishing ridings—I am sure I echo the views of some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house—that the limit of assistance on boats should not be restricted as at present to vessels more than 45 feet long. That was very welcome and important but since it was established the government has brought about the reformation of the farm loan board so that it now acts as an agricultural bank. There is no similar institution for fishermen and if the government has some plan for financial assistance either in the form of loans or in the form of subsidies, which would be even more welcome, of course, I think this will be very welcome news indeed.

When the minister replies on the first item I hope he will give us all the details as to how the plan is going to work so far as small fishing boats are concerned because there was no reference to this at all in the statement he made the other day. We should like to know whether the assistance is going to be on the same basis as for the larger boats or whether it is to be on some other basis.

Mr. Balcer: Before the hon. member takes his seat, would he tell us what he means by a small boat?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking the minister. He was the one who used the words. Surely the minister does not expect me to define his terms.

Mr. Chevrier: His own law.

Mr. Pickersgill: Here are his words and I welcome the chance to repeat them:

We intend to help the fishermen who are working in very small boats. We are going to look after them, too.

Mr. Balcer: A boat 65 feet long is certainly not a big ship.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not what we who represent the fishermen understand to be a small boat.

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, in order for the house to give consideration to public and private bills it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house as the case may be.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PRIVILEGE OF SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-27, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act (Solicitor General's eligibility).

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to introduce the subject matter contained in this bill may I preface my formal remarks by saying that there is no thought whatsoever, nor do I think there should be, of connecting the principle of the bill with any individual who may hold the office at the moment, may have held it in the past or may hold it in the future. The bill deals in a purely objective way with the position itself. The salary of the solicitor general is the same as that of every cabinet minister except the Prime Minister, namely, $15,000 a year plus $2,000 per annum motor car allowance.

There is also protection in Section 14 in the Senate and House of Commons Act to the extent that the solicitor general and other members of the cabinet shall not be disqualified from sitting in the house by reason of accepting this particular salary from the crown. I think upon examination we shall find that the position of the post of solicitor general is different from that of each of his colleagues in the cabinet. I would say again that when I use any personal pronoun here, it is not meant in a specific sense but only in relation to any individual who might hold the office and the office itself. It is not meant in any personal way. However, the solicitor general is in a different position from that of the other members of the cabinet. I think his post is considered to be somewhat inferior to other cabinet posts.

In this regard I point out the fact that there are a number of references to the post of solicitor general in various statutes of Canada, and that each of them makes a distinction in so far as this post is concerned with respect to the question of motor car allowance. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, I raised this matter on a previous occasion as a question of privilege which, regardless of the opinions expressed at that time by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), I think is still valid. However, this is not the time at which to go into that matter. With respect to the motor car allowance of $2,000, in the Appropriation Act No. 5 of 1931, which is chapter 61 of the statutes of that year, vote 352 reads as follows:

To provide for payment annually from the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of $2,000 to each minister of the crown charged with the administration of a department, the Solicitor General, and the Leader of the Opposition,—

Then it goes on to deal with other matters. However, I point out that there is a distinct reference to the solicitor general's office as being somewhat apart and different from that of other ministers. The Salaries Act likewise, which establish as the amount of salary for members of the cabinet, also draws a distinction between the post of solicitor general and each of the other cabinet posts and, in fact, it sets apart the salary of the solicitor general in a separate section from that relating to the other cabinet ministers.

Even when it comes to the method of appointing the person to the office of solicitor general, we find that a distinction is made and that the solicitor general is not appointed, as the other acts say, by virtue of the great seal of Canada. This is notably appointment by the crown. The solicitor general is appointed by his other colleagues in the cabinet or by the governor in council. There again a distinction is drawn.

Even when we came to consider the estimates of the Department of Justice with which the solicitor general is associated, we have found on at least one occasion that it was not necessary or feasible to have the presence of the solicitor general in the committee when the estimates were being considered; and on one occasion when this matter was raised in 1959, the Minister of Justice indicated that he was the officer or the minister responsible for the Department of Justice and would accordingly deal will all aspects of that particular department.

Last session I made an inquiry of the Prime Minister with respect to the duties, functions and responsibilities of the solicitor general. The answer is contained in Hansard of February 10, 1960, at page 919 and continuing over onto page 920. Perhaps it would be in order for me to quote a part of the answer given by the Prime Minister. He stated in part as follows:

The only order in council under which the solicitor general at present exercises any statutory functions is order in council P.C. 1959-1113 of August 27, 1959, under which he acts as minister of justice in the absence of the Minister of Justice. However, as one of the legal members of the cabinet he advises the Governor General on the exercise of the prerogative of mercy in all cases except capital cases, and in all capital cases he reports to cabinet.

Then the Prime Minister goes on to make mention of the fact that this is a post which does not have heavy departmental responsibilities and that from time to time the solicitor general may have given to him other assignments. For my part I think the post of solicitor general, with its present attachment of responsibilities which I consider to be extremely light, is nothing more than a high or overpaid position of parliamentary secretary. I think the duties, functions and responsibilities of the solicitor general, as they are at the present time, do not warrant that position either being of cabinet rank or commanding a cabinet salary.

The purpose of the bill may be by some considered to be a bit facetious but it seeks to remove the present protection in section 14 of the Senate and House of ommons Act in so far as the eligibility of the solicitor general is concerned to sit in the house as a member. If the bill passes, two alternatives would be open in so far as the post of solicitor general is concerned. One would be that the position of solicitor general could be held by a member of parliament and that no emolument would be attached to it other than the indemnity of a member. The other alternative would be that the post of solicitor general could be held by someone who is not a member of parliament but is an officer within the department.

I might say that a further clause of the bill provides that it is to come into effect on March 31, 1961. At the time of preparation of the bill it was hoped that it might receive the speedy attention of the house and might perhaps be considered before that date. This date, however, can easily be changed. While the reference is to March 31, 1962, in the bill itself, it is not a hard and fast integral part of the bill.

We know that the Department of Justice is a very extensive one and that it embraces a number of extremely important and complex fields. In fact, this situation was recognized by parliament during the last session when parliament authorized the creation of two associate deputy minister posts within the department.

I should like to make a brief reference to some of the extremely important matters which come under the Department of Justice. One is the administration of the Parole Act, which is extremely important in so far as rehabilitative measures are concerned for people who run afoul of the law. There is also the penitentiaries branch, which is another extremely important section of the Department of Justice and deals with the administration of justice and the meting out of penalties. It is also not dissociated from the administration of the Parole Act.

There is also the question of the administration of justice in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, which cover a very large area and where very complex matters arise. There is the subject matter of the Criminal Code and all the various fields with which the code deals.

There is the function of providing legal advice to the crown. There is the all-important operation of the combines investigation branch and the restrictive trade practices commission, their hearings and possible court cases which arise therefrom. Then there is the administration of the Bankruptcy Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, salaries of judges, and so on.

I think that if we are to retain the post of solicitor general we should recognize the fact that it is a post worthy of more than the sort of scanty responsibility which is attached to it at the present time. I think we should place the solicitor general in a position comparable with other members of the cabinet by establishing some definite departmental responsibility for the post in order that the rank and salary attached to the position will bear some equitable relationship to its responsibilities.

I should think, for argument's sake—and this is not said in any way to detract from the abilities of the present Minister of Justice —that the operations of the combines investigation branch and restrictive trade practices commission, each connected with the other, could very well be two of the functions of the Department of Justice for which the solicitor general could have some ministerial responsibility.

We could say this about the administration of the Parole Act or the penitentiaries branch, for argument's sake, or any of the other matters over which the Department of Justice has jurisdiction which could also be lumped together and the department in some way or other divided in so far as the responsibility of a cabinet member for those functions is concerned.

If the government would consider dividing the Department of Justice in this way in terms of ministerial responsibility, it would place the office of solicitor general in a much more decent light than I think it is in at the moment. As I have said, at the moment it has some sort of scanty or light responsibilities attached to it which result in it being nothing more than a highly paid position of parliamentary secretary. I think this particular post warrants much greater attention than it receives at the moment.

The initial purpose of the bill is to allow either one of two alternatives; that is, we either have a solicitor general to whom no salary is attached and who at the same time is eligible to sit in the House of Commons as a member, or we have the position of solicitor general as one which is official within the department but which does not allow the person holding that position to sit in the House of Commons as a member.

If the government will consider attaching more responsibility to the post of solicitor general, giving it greater recognition than it has in the past, and if it will cease looking upon this post as a position in which to put somebody who comes from a particular part of the country which should have representation in the cabinet, then I think there would be much greater respect for the post not only in the house, not only in the government but in the whole country.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, the first words the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) uttered when he began his presentation of this bill were that it was not his intention to discuss the individual who might now be occupying the position or those who have occupied it in the past; that somehow we should just forget what has happened in connection with this post and the very distinguished men who have occupied it from time to time in our history.

I suggest to the hon. member that it is a little unrealistic to discuss a cabinet post and say that we cannot discuss anybody who has occupied that position or say anything about the stature of those individuals. To my mind the two are intertwined and it would be folly to attempt to discuss this subject without mentioning some of the people who have occupied this post.

The first person, of course, who comes to mind when one considers the post of solicitor general is the late Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who has been judged by history to date and will be judged in the future as one of the outstanding parliamentarians in the history of Canada; a man described by Grattan O'Leary—

Mr. Pickersgill: Who is he?

Mr. McGee: —as being "an arrow's flight above them all"; a man described in various current publications, particularly compared with another late right hon. gentleman, as—if I can recall the words correctly—"looking down like a hawk on this little chicken clucking and scratching in the barnyard".

The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen brought to this post undisputed talent and while occupying it he undertook Herculean tasks. I do not think any other word can describe the undertakings which were assigned to and accomplished by him while he held this post.

In discussing Mr. Meighen's career it seems to me that the very arguments put forward by the hon. member for Skeena, in terms of the lack of departmental responsibility and other particular, defined matters to occupy the solicitor general's time, are defeated because Mr. Meighen was free to attack these serious and important problems and give his full time and effort to them, and they were better accomplished for that reason.

It does seem to me, also—knowing about as much of what goes on in the cabinet as the hon. member for Skeena—that there are a great many other tasks to which the solicitor general is assigned by various cabinet members. I refer to the special problems which we know arise from time to time, which do not come within the specific purview of any one minister, which the hon. member for Skeena pushed aside in a very cavalier fashion. It seemed to me that the hon. member could smell something bad when he referred to this nasty business of area representation. I think the hon. member might find he would have some argument with the people of Newfoundland at the present time.

Mr. Howard: You are distorting my words.

Mr. McGee: Perhaps I was just looking at your nose as you said it. This post is also important, it seems to me, as a training ground. The present Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) whose estimates we were considering until five o'clock occupied that position with great distinction and is now doing a most outstanding job as Minister of Transport.

When the hon. member for Skeena was discussing the question of the tremendously important function performed by the solicitor general in presenting to cabinet the background and other related material in cases where application is made to the cabinet in the question of the commutation of death sentences, he passed over the question very lightly. The hon. member for Skeena and I part company here, because I think it of tremendous importance particularly in the last four years when we have had, I think, 38 out of 44 death sentences commuted. If that pattern of commutation and the number of commutations can be attributed in any way to the abilities and talents of the former solicitor general, then if we are discussing how much work one has to do to earn a salary I would say he would be, if anything, underpaid.

I notice also that in the bill the hon. member has abridges the cabinet. He has apparently disbanded the Department of Forestry. He has not included the Associate Minister of National Defence. He has cast aside the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and come up with somebody called "the minister of resources and development". As a matter of fact for a C.C.F.'er approaching the situation I suppose these are modest changes indeed, but it seems to me he might have been consistent enough in his argument and proposal to include the present members of the cabinet, particularly a department like forestry which I honestly thought was of serious concern to the hon. member. There is no minister of forestry mentioned in this line-up.

Mr. Howard: Is the hon. member not aware that at the last session of parliament we passed a special measure relating to the ministry of forestry and that provision for this post is contained therein and not in the Senate and House of Commons Act?

Mr. McGee: In any event, the fact of the matter is that in the list I have here those ministers are not mentioned. It seems to me the hon. member has not too clear an idea of what is going on in the cabinet nor an appreciation of the importance of the functions which are performed by the solicitor general.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has sponsored a number of bills this session and when they were good ones we were ready to give him credit. I know that in the case of the bill to amend the Penitentiary Act we said that there was some good thinking contained in it and I, personally commended him on it at that time.

Today, in this bill to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act in connection with the solicitor general's eligibility, we have a frivolous bill which, in my opinion, is time wasting. It would have the effect of depriving the solicitor general of the privileges he enjoys by virtue of section 14 of the Senate and House of Commons Act wherein permission is given to members of the Queen's privy council to act as privy councillors and to receive the remuneration from that post, and also to be members and sit in the House of Commons. The hon. member's proposal would have the effect to making it impossible for a member of parliament to sit in the house and also to be solicitor general. You could have one or the other. That is a general interpretation of this proposal.

I took a moment to look at some of the background of this historic position of solicitor general. I find that for many years this position has existed in Canada as it has in most other commonwealth countries. In 1917, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, as has been said, was appointed solicitor general and a member of the cabinet. He had previously been solicitor general and a member of the ministry. I presume it was felt at that time that the job had become sufficiently onerous for him to become a full-fledged member of the cabinet. That has been the position since that time. There have been many distinguished solicitors general and they have performed worth while duties. We must bear in mind, of course the heavy legislative work that many of them have carried from the time of Arthur Meighen onwards.

Mr. Winch: Could the hon. member explain to the house what is the basis of the right to be a privy councillor? He has mentioned Arthur Meighen and others.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I shall try to relate that to my remarks by saying that for many years in the early days the position of solicitor general was such that he was only a member of the ministry. He would be a member of the House of Commons and also a member of the ministry. He would have particular ministerial responsibilities. In 1915, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, as I recall, was solicitor general, a member of parliament and a member of the ministry but in 1917 it was felt important that the holder of this ministry should be included among those with full cabinet responsibilities. I am not able to say whether the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was a member of the privy council before 1917 but I am only making the point that in 1917 he became a full member of the cabinet and a member of the privy council, whereas before he had only been—

Mr. Winch: You have completely missed my point. Was he made a member of the privy council because he was solicitor general?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The hon. member would have to ask Sir Robert Borden that, because I do not know whether he wanted the benefit of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen's experience in the cabinet, or the position of solicitor general or a combination of both.

I think the hon. member for Skeena made a most telling argument against his own bill when he quoted the Prime Minister speaking on February 10, 1960 in last year's Hansard as reported at page 919 on the occasion when the right hon. gentleman answered the question put to him by the hon. member who has been interested in this subject for some time. The Prime Minister said:

> In addition, as is customary in the case of a legal member of the cabinet not having heavy departmental responsibilities he is assigned responsibilities from time to time for which he would not have time if he were engaged in the management of a department.

The hon. member then presented a long story about the heavy responsibilities that come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, and the complex legal nature of many of its activities. That, precisely, is one of the best arguments for the need for a solicitor general. I only suggest that there are these increasing responsibilities of a legal nature, and that we have a distinguished person presently in the position of solicitor general, as we have had in the past.

I remember in 1954 the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent was speaking in respect of the Salaries Act, when he outlined, probably in answer to some questions, the principle that each cabinet minister should receive the same salary. He made a very good case as to why he felt there should not be different designations of salaries. I was impressed with his statement at that time and suggest the reasons put forward then are valid now.

In dismissing this bill, I suggest it is frivolous and ridiculous, and has been brought forward in an attempt to seek publicity.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it, and I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Winch: On division.

Motion (Mr. Howard) negatived on division.

REPRESENTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-29, to amend the Representation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to have this opportunity to introduce Bill No. C-29, an act to amend the Representation Act. The purpose of the bill is very simple, namely to change the name of the electoral district of Humboldt-Melfort to that of Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale.

The present name of the constituency, Humboldt-Melfort, was established under the Redistribution Act of 1952. Prior to that time there were two federal constituencies in existence, namely Humboldt and Melfort. Since that change, within the federal constituency of Humboldt-Melfort, the town of Tisdale and district has been added. The name of Tisdale also appears as one of the provincial constituencies in Saskatchewan. The people of Tisdale and district feel that, although no injustice was done to them through omitting the name of Tisdale, in all fairness it should be added to the names Humboldt-Melfort so that it would then be Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale.

Representations in this regard were first made to me in 1959 when I was home during the parliamentary recess. The Tisdale district chamber of commerce invited me to attend a meeting, having been in touch with me by letter. A letter was directed to Mr. Castonguay, the electoral officer for Canada, which I should like to read into the record at this point. That letter is as follows:

> Re: Humboldt-Melfort constituency
> The matter of the name of our constituency was discussed at our recent chamber of commerce meeting.
> As you know, this constituency includes the three major towns of Melfort, Humboldt and Tisdale. We feel that the size of Tisdale is such that it should be included in the name of the constituency.
> We would be pleased to hear your comments in this regard.

This letter is signed by Mr. W. R. Hodgins, the secretary of the chamber of commerce, and is dated October 5, 1959.

I have not read the reply to that letter but apparently Mr. Castonguay advised the chamber of commerce that it was not within his jurisdiction to suggest or effect a change in name, but that on occasion private members introduced public bills in the House of Commons which were approved.

I received a telegram from the district chamber of commerce on May 18, 1961 which reads as follows:

> Tisdale and district chamber request the name of Tisdale be added to the name of Humboldt-Melfort federal constituency—Tisdale and district chamber of commerce. W. R. Hodgins.

I should like to point out that this bill was introduced by me for the first time in 1960, but did not come before the house for approval before now. During this time no objection has been registered by any town, organization or individuals in the constituency, nor has any political party expressed any objection to the name of Tisdale being added to that of Humboldt-Melfort.

During the last few years the town of Tisdale and district has increased considerably in population and has also assumed a very prominent position as a distributing point for the Carrot river valley. This district is also known as a very productive farm district, evidence of which can readily be seen in the district.

Tisdale is known as the centre of the rapeseed industry in the west. Need I say more, Mr. Speaker? This fact alone has put Tisdale and district on the map as being the pioneer area in this very important grain industry in the west. Had it not been for the Tisdale rapeseed producers, and their early pioneering adventures in this field, Canada would not have been known in the world as the land where some of the best rapeseed is produced.

As a result of this worth-while undertaking by Tisdale inhabitants, the prairie farmers in the west have been able to diversify their grain production, thus taking thousands of acres out of wheat production, and have produced rapeseed, for which there is a tremendous export market available at the present time.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the time to speak on rapeseed, but it is very important and relevant to the growth and importance of Tisdale.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Rapp: I would appreciate very much if consideration could be given to this bill so that the name of Tisdale can be added to the federal constituency. The people of Tisdale will then realize that they have not been disregarded in this respect.

That is all I have to say at the present time as the mover of Bill No. C-29, which was seconded by the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu). Thank you.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, as a native of Norfolk county, from which the Tisdale came who went to Saskatchewan and gave that town its name, I should like to give the heartiest possible support to this bill. It is true that the Tisdales were Tories, and I think they still are—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I see the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton) is nodding his head because he has knowledge of these things.

I think the Tisdales are still Tories, although some of the individuals they had something to do with bringing into the world, have seen the light. There have been Tisdales representing Norfolk county on the wrong side of the house in the past, and there have been some who have unsuccessfully tried to represent that constituency in the twentieth century.

The name Tisdale goes back to the beginning of upper Canada, whence came so many of the pioneers of Saskatchewan who were joined later by pioneers such as the present hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort, who was wise enough and fortunate enough to come to Canada in 1929 when there was a Liberal government in power that would let him in. In view of all these circumstances and also because of the great affection I have had for the hon. member since he first came to the house it gives me great personal satisfaction to support this bill.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on other occasions I have supported the hon. gentleman who sponsors this bill. I supported him in his campaign to improve rapeseed. As he knows, no one has given him greater support in that regard than I have. I regret that both he and I have had some difficulty in impressing on the government the desirability of doing something about rapeseed; but the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has now made a rather serious charge. He says he supports this bill because of his own honoured connection with the name Tisdale, but he says the Tisdales are Tories. Since the hon. gentleman who sponsors this bill is not a Tory by nature I should like him to give some assurance that there is some hope of converting—

Mr. Rapp: On a question of privilege, I appreciate very much what my hon. friend from Essex East has said except the last sentence, with which I disagree, because I am a Progressive Conservative and I am proud to be one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has raised a question of privilege. If I have offended him in any way I of course want to withdraw my offensive words, but he has not made his case any stronger by the admission he just made. I did not charge him with being a member of the Progressive Conservative party, although I had thought that members of that party had long since abandoned the Progressive Conservative name. At one time they were known as Liberal Conservatives and Liberal Progressives. I thought they had abandoned the name "Progressive Conservative"; in fact, I thought they had abandoned the name "Conservative"; that they were no longer known as the Conservative party; that they were now called by the name of their leader. However, perhaps I misunderstand the situation.

I know that during the last election when I visited the riding of Prince Albert and saw the committee rooms of the candidate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I inquire of the hon. member whether he is speaking to the question of privilege or to the bill?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, I thought I was talking about the bill but I may have perhaps strayed a little bit in saying that when I visited the committee rooms in Prince Albert I did not see any political designation other than the name of the candidate.

However, I want to say to the hon. gentlemen I sincerely hope that if his bill receives second reading, which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wants it to receive, he will repair the damage to the great name of Tisdale which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has talked about.

In any event I wonder whether the sponsor of the bill can answer this question? Is it important that the bill receive second reading and be passed now or can we wait until 1963 when the government proposes to call the next federal election?

Mr. Rapp: It is important that it pass now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort speaks now he will close the debate. I see the hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my support to this bill. Since I am a native of the Carrot river valley and first became conscious of the wonders of northern Saskatchewan in the town of Tisdale I should like to have seen the bill add the name "Carrot River". I bow to the wishes of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort, particularly because of the commendable work he is doing in pressing for a change in the rates for rapeseed on the railway.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I did not realize the previous speaker was going to be so brief. I have been sort of delegated to say a word or two about this bill in place of one of our members who is unfortunately detained at a committee meeting. I fully appreciate the desire of the hon. gentleman who sponsors this bill to include as many localities in the name of his constituency as possible. It has been brought to my attention that Tisdale is not the only thriving community in the area. The people in the town of Wadena would like to have the name of their town included in the name of the bill.

I understand that the majority of the people there are not of the same political complexion as the hon. member who represents the constituency, but I have been asked to bring this to the attention of the house. I hold in my hand a copy of the map showing the constituency of Humboldt-Melfort as it is now known. According to the explanatory note, the purpose of the bill is to change the name of the electoral district of "Humboldt-Melfort" to that of "Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale". In view of the fact I have been informed that the people of Wadena would like to have the name of their town attached to the new name proposed for this constituency, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, when we get into committee, whether he has any objection to adding "Wadena" to his bill, in view of the representations that have apparently been made to some members of this group by persons living in the town of Wadena, which I understand is also a very progressive little town. If this were done they think it would more completely describe the constituency than the present bill which proposes to add only the word "Tisdale" to the name of the constituency.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay West, I wish to say that I have just as much respect for Wadena as I have for any other town in my constituency. The people are just as thrifty as are the people of any other section of my constituency.

As I stated in my opening remarks, when I introduced the bill in 1960, it was advertised around the community and in the local press and no letter came to my desk requesting that the name of Wadena be added, nor was any complaint or any objection voiced in my constituency. It is now over a year since it has been known that the bill was before the house to change the name of the constituency by adding the word "Tisdale". Had I been asked I would have been prepared to bring the matter to the attention of the house. What I am doing now is bringing before the house the request of the Tisdale district chamber of commerce.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the sponsor of the bill has said about the various component parts of his constituency, how each of them naturally plays an extremely important role in the economy of the constituency and how much respect and admiration the hon. member has gained by getting in touch with the various people concerned with respect to altering the name of the constituency so that it would reflect—

Mr. Rapp: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member said that I had been in touch with these people. It was the other way around. The chamber of commerce of Tisdale got in touch with me and made representations to have the name added.

Mr. Howard: I did not mean that the hon. member precipitated it but rather that he had been in touch with these people. That was what I had in mind. Something has been said about another extremely important community in the riding, namely, Wadena, which is no less important than any of the others. From what the hon. member said in closing the debate I gather it is a community for which he has the highest regard and respect and which also would have liked to see its name included in the name of the constituency. I think we should afford Wadena the opportunity of also having its name included in the name of the constituency and I therefore move:

That clause 1 be amended by adding in line ten after the word "Tisdale" the following "-Wadena".

It would then read: "Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale-Wadena".

An hon. Member: Cheap.

Mr. Howard: That is a nasty remark for somebody to make.

Mr. McIlraith: Very nasty and uncalled for.

Mr. Howard: Typically Conservative though.

The Chairman: Order.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: Yeas, 3; nays, 44.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? Now, by leave?

Mr. Pickersgill: Now, by leave.

An hon. Member: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will give hon. members a few seconds to reflect and put the question again. Is there unanimous consent to third reading now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rapp moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

SUGGESTED REVISION OF MEDIATION AND CONCILIATION PROCESSES

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-30, an act to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.—Mr. Howard.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, before the order is proceeded with I wonder whether it might not be considered to be six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Howard: Then I should like to raise a point of order.

An hon. Member: The order has been called.

Mr. Howard: If hon. members are not inclined to follow the course suggested by me, I can understand why they feel that way. My point of order is that some time ago a statement of policy was made by a representative of the government with respect to public bills sponsored by private members. It was pointed out that this period of time was considered to be purely within the hands of private members and in order that they might prosecute properly the various proposals made by them it was felt that no interference should be placed in the way of members being given the fullest opportunity to present their different ideas as embodied in bills sponsored by them.

Today we have seen this course followed in an admirable way, I should say, in two instances, one of them involving a bill introduced by me which was defeated. I am not upset about that. In my view more public bills sponsored by private members should come to a vote in the house regardless of whether they are accepted or defeated. That is immaterial to the basic point of having a vote.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Howard: The same commendable course was followed with respect to the bill we have just passed, and I think the house should come to a decision on these bills.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is for tomorrow? I think the house leader also indicated that he would tell us what legislation would be taken next week as well as the order of business for the whole of the week.

Mr. Churchill: The estimates of the Department of Transport will be taken tomorrow. If they are completed we will go on with the estimates of the Department of Justice. I said last night that we would take legislation on Monday and Tuesday and this will be the order. We will take first No. 1 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-94, an act to amend the Canadian National Railways Act. That will be followed by a bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act, notice of which has appeared in Votes and Proceedings and which will appear on the order paper for first reading tomorrow. The third item will be No. 4 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-77, dealing with agricultural development. The fourth item will be a resolution which will appear on the order paper tomorrow dealing with amendments to the Judges Act. The fifth item will be a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act, notice of which has also appeared in Votes and Proceedings.

On Tuesday it is proposed to commence with item No. 5 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-92, an act to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the estimates will be for next week?

Mr. Churchill: It is difficult to forecast the estimates for next week. It will depend on the progress made tomorrow but the intention at the moment is to carry on with transport and then justice.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

LETTER FROM JAPANESE AMBASSADOR RESPECTING VOLUNTARY CONTROLS, WITH ANNEXES

EMBASSY OF JAPAN

Room 701, Metcalfe Building,
88 Metcalfe Street,
Ottawa, Ontario.
May 15, 1961.

The Honourable Donald M. Fleming,
Minister of Finance, Confederation Building,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,

I wish to refer to the annual consultations which have just been concluded between the Canadian government and this embassy about voluntary controls to be applied by Japan on the export of certain products to Canada in respect of the year 1961. As you know, the items we discussed were certain textile products, rubber footwear, plywood, stainless steel table flatware, transistor radios, polyester staple buttons, vinyl raincoats, and receiving tubes for radio and television.

I am now pleased to inform you that as a result of the consultations my government has decided to apply in respect of the calendar year 1961 voluntary export controls as set forth in the annexes to this letter.

Quotas will be allocated to Japanese exporters or producers so that shipments will be spread fairly evenly over the year, the quotas for textile goods, flatware and plywood being allocated on a quarterly basis, with due allowance for the fact that the demand in Canada for some of the quota items is seasonal in nature. However, it should be noted that in respect of a few items there are no actual quota allocations, exports being controlled by a different system.

I wish to take this opportunity to reiterate that, as I mentioned in my letter dated April 29, 1960, these measures are taken by the Japanese government on its own accord in order to conform with its established policy of gradual increase of Japanese exports on an orderly basis with a view to avoiding undue injury to the domestic industry of importing countries. It is the view of the Japanese government that export volumes of the controlled items should normally increase from year to year having regard to market conditions in Canada. Taking into consideration the adverse conditions in the Canadian textile industry and the general economic situation in Canada, the export quotas for almost all of the textile products have been set for 1961 at the same levels as those for 1960. With the improvement of the situation in the Canadian market my government will naturally anticipate gradual increases in these export quotas in future years.

The quota figure indicated in the annex for stainless steel table flatware represents a large scale reduction of the previous year's export quota and therefore in terms of the concept of orderly growth constitutes an exceptional decision by my government for the year 1961. This decision has been taken in consideration of the difficult business conditions of the Canadian flatware industry as described by Canadian government authorities during the consultations. This exceptional reduction should not be regarded as a precedent in relation to future years or other products.

Furthermore, I should like to remind you again of what I stated in my letter dated April 29, 1960, to the effect that the Japanese government attaches the utmost importance to avoiding a situation where third countries are able to expand their sales to Canada of the products placed under Japanese export control by virtue of the fact that Japan has undertaken to limit her shipments. Should it transpire that such diversion of trade is taking place, I would hope your government would be willing to enter into consultation with my government at any time my government believes that developments warrant it in order to protect Japan's legitimate interests.

In communicating this information to you, I assume that in respect of the products listed in the annexes, for which firm quantities are specified, Canada will not, during the year 1961, invoke the provisions of article XIX of the GATT or those of the exchange of letters annexed to the agreement of commerce of 1954 between Canada and Japan.

I take this opportunity to renew my firm belief that by applying these self-restraining measures we help to pave the way for further expansion of two way trade on an orderly basis, to the mutual benefit of both countries.

Yours sincerely,
Toru Hagiwara
Ambassador

ANNEX A

18	Nylon	Fabrics	2,600,000 sq. yds.

Explanatory Notes

1. All of the above quotas apply to total exports in the 12 month period ending December 31, 1961.

2. Where there is provision for a 10 per cent swing between or among subquotas no subquota will be increased by more than 10 per cent of the result of any transfer. For example, in the case of cotton blouses and sport shirts, the maximum application of the swing provision would result in shipments of (a) blouses, 203,500 dozen; sport shirts, 186,500 dozen; or (b) blouses, 164,500 dozen; sport shirts, 225,500 dozen.

3. In connection with the 10 per cent swing provision, and also more generally, the Japanese government will use its best endeavour to urge Japanese producers and exporters so that there will be no undue concentration on any item within the quota categories.

4. The following is a table of criteria used by the government of Japan to distinguish the quota categories of made-up textiles which are a mixture of various fibre components. The basic principle for the criteria is chief value, converted into percentage of fibre content by weight, so that the percentages vary extensively.

Defined as	Fibre Composition	Percentage of Fibre Content (By Weight)
Cotton	Cotton and silk	88 per cent and over cotton
	Cotton and wool	67 per cent and over cotton
	Cotton and rayon filament	40 per cent and over cotton
	Cotton and spun rayon	30 per cent and over cotton
	Cotton and synthetic fibre	51 per cent and over cotton
Spun Rayon	Spun rayon and wool	91 per cent and over spun rayon
	Spun rayon and silk	91 per cent and over spun rayon
	Spun rayon and jute, flax	71 per cent and over spun rayon
	Spun rayon and synthetic fibre	71 per cent and over spun rayon
	Spun rayon and cotton	71 per cent and over spun rayon
	Spun rayon and rayon filament	Regardless of percentage fibre content
Rayon filament	Rayon filament and cotton	61 per cent and over rayon filament
	Rayon filament and synthetic fibre	51 per cent and over rayon filament
Synthetic fibre	Synthetic fibre and rayon filament	50 per cent and over synthetic fibre
	Synthetic fibre, jute, flax	50 per cent and over synthetic fibre
	Synthetic fibre and cotton	50 per cent and over synthetic fibre
	Synthetic fibre and spun rayon	30 per cent and over synthetic fibre

Other Secondary Textile Products on Which Voluntary Controls Are Maintained

1. Woollen sweaters, pullovers and cardigans
2. Woollen knitted gloves and mittens
3. Paper caps, paper hats and hat bodies
4. Silk and silk rayon mixed scarves and mufflers
5. Rayon gloves and mittens, excluding ladies' dress gloves, sewn
6. Bed sheets other than cotton
7. Pillow cases other than cotton
8. Woollen coats and slacks
e.g. Suits, trousers, skirts, dresses, coats, etc.

Note: In respect of these items it is the intention of the Japanese government to establish export quotas for the year 1961 which will provide for moderate and orderly increases on the basis of actual shipments during 1959 and 1960.

ANNEX B

Rubber Footwear

The quotas for the 12 month period ending December 31, 1961, are as follows:

Waterproof footwear 1,900,000 pairs
Canvas footwear ... 2,560,000 pairs

The above figure for canvas footwear includes the quantity of certain types of rubber-soled footwear with textile uppers already shipped since January 1, 1961, which were previously free of export quota control but now fall within the definition of the canvas footwear given below, which special quantity in no way constitutes the basis for a quota for 1962.

Note: 1. Waterproof footwear means waterproof vulcanized rubber footwear including footwear either of rubber sole or rubber-like sole with cloth upper, lined or unlined, and also one-piece moulded plastic footwear, lined or unlined.

2. Canvas footwear means shoes with rubber soles or rubber-like soles, and with outer uppers of fabrics made of natural or man-made fibres or outer uppers simulating such materials, excluding slippers and sandals.

ANNEX C

Plywood

The quota for the six month period ending June 30, 1961, is 22,500,000 square feet. The quota for the last six months of 1961 shall be determined after another consultation to be held between our two governments in due course.

ANNEX D

Stainless Steel Table Flatware

The quota for the 12 month period ending December 31, 1961, is 642,000 dozen pieces, of which 42,000 dozen pieces is a quota for 1961 only to provide for shipments of flatware for the premium trade in respect of which firm orders have been placed and irrevocable letters of credit transmitted.

Note: Stainless steel table flatware means stainless steel table knives, forks and spoons, of which the length is under 26 cm and of which the handles are made of metal.

ANNEX E

Transistor Radios

The quota for the 12 month period ending December 31, 1961, for radios with 3 or more transistors is 395,000 sets.

ANNEX F

Receiving Tubes for Radio and Television

The quota for the 12 month period ending December 31, 1961, is 2,500,000 units, and it will for the time being apply to all Japanese exports to Canada of radio and television receiving tubes. However, it is understood that the Canadian government will during the next few months give the Japanese government a list of tube types in respect of which Canada relies upon imports, rather than upon Canadian production. The types of tubes on this list will be freed of quota control.

ANNEX G

Vinyl Raincoats

The quota for the 12 month period ending December 31, 1961, is 520,000 units.

ANNEX H

Polyester Staple Buttons

The quota for the 12 month period ending December 31, 1961, is 1,000,000 gross. The quota applies to buttons with a diameter of 1½ inches or less.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, May 20, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON CONFERENCES IN OSLO AND GENEVA

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thought the house might be interested if I made a short report on the two conferences which I have been attending, the first in Oslo, which as hon. members know was a meeting of the foreign ministers of NATO countries, and the second in Geneva, which was dealing with the question of Laos.

First of all I shall deal with the NATO meeting, which was held under very favourable conditions. Oslo is a lovely city, almost as nice as Vancouver, particularly at this time of year.

Probably the senior statesman of NATO is the Hon. Halvard Lange, the foreign minister of Norway. This meeting was held in his home country, and that made the atmosphere very friendly and statesmanlike. Norway, of course, is a wonderful friend of Canada, and that is true of all the Scandinavian countries, of which there are two others in the NATO organization, Denmark and Iceland. With these Nordic countries Canada has most friendly associations.

At this conference the chairman was the new secretary general of NATO, Dr. Stikker of the Netherlands. It was very difficult for him, of course, having taken over such a short time ago, but he contributed a great deal to the success of that meeting.

Certainly one of the most important discussions consisted of a review of the international situation. This was commenced by Dean Rusk, the new secretary of state of the United States. He made a very full and helpful statement concerning the situation in the world as seen by his great country.

There were various centres of interest discussed, such as Germany, and particularly Berlin, and it was generally agreed that this is the most vital area in the world today in so far as east-west tensions are concerned. Other questions which were discussed concerned the situations in Cuba, Laos and the Congo, as well as disarmament, colonialism and the United Nations, and the difficult economic positions of Greece and Turkey. These two countries, on the eastern flank of the alliance, do not have many of the advantages of the other members. Their economic condition is not nearly as good, they have special problems. They need special help.

There was also some slight discussion regarding defence questions, although the main discussions on that subject will take place at the December meeting when the Ministers of National Defence and Finance will be present as well as the foreign ministers.

Canada, of course, has been very firm in her attitude on Berlin, and more than once our Prime Minister has made it clear that we stand behind the people of West Berlin in their determination to retain their freedom. In respect of disarmament, Canada's position is very well known, and I think appreciated, by our NATO colleagues. It seems very likely that the United States and the Soviet union will commence discussions early next month aimed at working out an agreed negotiating forum. I would think that all the nations which participated in the 10-nation disarmament talks would be included in the negotiating group and, of course, our own country was one of those. Probably there will be others, we hope in the capacity of a neutral chairman and perhaps vice chairman and secretary. There is a reasonable chance that as a result of those discussions which are to take place between the United States and the Soviet union, disarmament talks proper can be resumed about August 1. It would be unwise to give any guarantees about that date, but I am very hopeful that this will be the result.

On the question of the Congo, we pointed out that Canada considers that peace-keeping activities such as our participation in the United Nations Congo operation are of great value to the other members of NATO even though they do not happen to be participating directly in that very important work. There has been some tendency to question Canada as a NATO country being a member of the United Nations committee on the Congo, and perhaps a few eyebrows have been raised about our taking a part in Laos. But we pointed out that this is a role which Canada is particularly well fitted to fill, and that those peace-keeping activities are extremely important in the over-all objective of maintaining peace which is the objective, of course, not only of the United Nations but also of the NATO alliance itself. I believe the Canadian point of view is approved by the other members of NATO.

We were attacked in the United Nations from time to time regarding our actions in respect of the Congo because we happened to be a NATO country, and it would be a little bit thick if we were also to be attacked by our NATO allies on the ground that we were participating in this United Nations action. I think this question has been pretty thoroughly cleared up.

On the attitude of NATO to the United Nations, I believe there is now unanimous appreciation among all NATO countries that they must play their full part in the United Nations; that it is not good enough to sit off in a NATO alliance and not be very keen about helping out in the United Nations. Canada has never seen much sense in a hands-off attitude of that kind, and there has certainly been a distinct move in the direction of our views on this question by the other members of the alliance.

The question of colonialism is a very important one. Our position on this issue is perfectly clear because of two stands taken by our own Prime Minister. First there was the stand he took at the United Nations in his inspiring speech there last September when he pointed out that the Soviet union had a great deal of nerve to be trying to criticize the western nations on the question of colonialism while at the same time there was not the slightest move on their part to give any kind of independence to the countries which at one time were free and which are now part of the Soviet union.

The other stand was the one taken at the commonwealth prime ministers' conference. That made it clear beyond per-adventure where Canada stood with regard to nations achieving their independence, and our position on this point is very clear. Mind you, the colonial question is exceedingly difficult for some of the NATO countries, but at the same time I should point out that two of the NATO countries have taken the lead in giving independence to dependent countries, first the United Kingdom and then the republic of France. They deserve great credit for what they have done in the way of settling the question of colonialism. There is quite a long way to go yet, and I think all members of NATO realize that this problem must be faced and that the countries being held as dependencies must get their independence.

Hon. members will realize that there was very good consultation at this meeting, and I think there has also been a distinct improvement in the consultations taking place in the permanent council of NATO. Canada is very well satisfied now with the degree of and opportunity for consultation. We brought up again the question of a heads of government meeting. Once a little further progress has been made in the long term planning for the alliance, I am hopeful that the heads of government will be brought together to approve or alter the recommendations made. I think it is very important that the heads of government should meet at the earliest time that makes sense; that is, when the necessary preliminary work has been completed.

The conference on Laos was, of course, a very different kind of conference. It did not have any head, and I have never attended a conference quite of this type. There have not been many held. There was a good deal of difficulty in commencing. In the first place, word from the international supervisory commission that a cease fire was in effect was not received until the morning of the day the conference was to open. After some deliberation, the report that a cease fire was in effect was accepted as satisfactory.

Then there was another problem as to what would be done about seating the Laotian delegates. There were three sets of delegates, one from the royal Laotian government, one from the government of Souvanna Phouma, and one from the Pathet Lao. This was really a very complicated question, and almost to the minute set for the opening there was uncertainty whether or not the conference would go on.

We thought it would not be proceeding, but just to be sure and to show that at least we were not stalling the beginning of the conference, the Canadian delegation streamed up to the headquarters of the European branch of the United Nations. Nobody else was in front of the main entrance except about 150 newspapermen and photographers, who were not quite sure either whether or not the conference was beginning.

When we talked to the senior man at the United Nations he told us that he had received a message a few minutes earlier from the British, the United Kingdom being one of the two co-chairmen, the other being the Soviet union. This was the message:

> We have agreed on the simple formula that there will be no meeting this afternoon at 3 p.m. (May 12) and cannot say anything about the future.

There was, therefore, no meeting that afternoon. We had a good look at the conference room and found we were to be seated next to the Chinese. We learned other details as well about the proceedings. This question of the Laotian representation was not settled until four days later. You can imagine the consultations that took place in the intervening period.

Finally this formula was agreed upon:

The co-chairmen have agreed to seat the representations from Laos proposed by the individual governments participating in the conference.

The United States proposed the royal Laotian government and, although I do not remember exactly, I believe the Soviet union proposed the government of Prince Souvanna Phouma and I think the Chinese proposed the Pathet Lao. I am not just sure which country did that. In any event, everybody was proposed but the royal Laotian government representatives have not turned up as yet. They refused to sit on the ground that they are the official government, and they would not proceed under the circumstances.

The conference opened on Tuesday last and we heard a statement from Prince Sihanouk the head of state of Cambodia which, as you know, is a neighbour of Laos; Canada, by the way, is a member of the truce commission in that country also. I thought he made a very fine opening speech. The essence of it was that in this conference the delegations should look forward and not backward; that there was not much point in threshing old straw, and we should try to see what could be done in the future to settle the problems.

I spoke on behalf of Canada on the following day. If it is the wish of the house I would be glad to table a copy of that speech or have it printed as an appendix to Hansard, and then hon. members could see the attitude the Canadian government took. I cannot do this in so far as the NATO conference is concerned because the proceedings there are secret. In so far as the conference on Laos is concerned, it is possible to hand copies of the statement to the press.

I believe that Canada's position with regard to Laos should be, at all times, to consider problems in the light of her membership on the truce commission. This commission is going to be given great responsibilities for the working out of the Laotian problems. I think we are well advised to keep that in mind, and to talk and negotiate from the standpoint of being a member of that truce commission. This, I think, strengthens our hand a great deal in trying to get our views accepted.

The conference has two main jobs to do, in my judgment. One is to support the international truce commission which is actually in the field. As you know, Mr. Speaker, there are Canadians in Laos at the present time. This conference must see that they get what they require in order to carry out their job; it must meet their requirements from week to week. The other job is to work out a long term settlement. I think that will have to be done on the basis of the Geneva agreements of 1954. We base our position on those agreements, but there will have to be some modification in them.

On Thursday I intervened again to point out the need to provide that commission with airplanes and helicopters. The situation was that as early as May 1 the chairman of the commission, in his first report to the co-chairmen of the Geneva conference, the United Kingdom and the Soviet union, asked for money, airplanes and helicopters. He also reported that he would be economical; that the commission would not waste money. In their reply the co-chairmen made arrangements to provide a little money and they approved of the idea of being economical—the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) approves of that also—but they did not say one word about the airplanes and helicopters.

Therefore on Thursday afternoon I drew this to the attention of the conference and said I could not see any reason why the co-chairmen should not wire at once to the commission and ask for details of their requirements. Mr. Gromyko, the head of the Soviet delegation, did not want to move that quickly. Mind you, we had him in a corner because of the letters that had been exchanged. He simply could not get away from the terms of those letters. However, the final decision was that the British and the Russians would think it over during the night, and a special meeting of the conference was called for yesterday morning at which the conference was to hear their decision. They decided that a wire would go out, and this is the message they sent:

Please inform us whether the commission has any technical requirements to facilitate the exercise of its functions in relation to the cease fire.

That was not exactly what I had asked for the day before. I had asked for recommendations from the commission with regard to the number of inspection teams there should be, and for some other details. However, I thought it best to accept this offer rather than have another long argument about it.

I spoke again yesterday morning, and everybody agreed that this wire should go out. Mind you, these people on the commission have not yet got their airplanes and helicopters, but at least the wire has gone out requesting them to ask in detail for what they require. Mr. Gromyko came over to me after the meeting had adjourned and said, "You know, if you had accepted that letter without making some remarks about it, I would have been very suspicious; would have thought that letter went too far".

That is the way we stand at the moment. I am very hopeful that the commission will be given the tools to do this very difficult job. I think there is a reasonable prospect for the success of this conference in spite of all the difficulties there have been. I expect to be going back in a matter of three weeks or so.

There is great value in these contacts we make with other countries at these conferences. We have had friendly discussions with the delegation from Cambodia; they are very pleased with the work of the Canadians on the truce commission in their country. The same thing happened with regard to South Viet Nam; that nation is also very pleased with the work our Canadian commissioners have been doing in their country. We have also had very friendly discussions with Thailand, with the delegation from the royal Laotian government, and with the delegation of Prince Souvanna Phouma.

I am convinced that one of Canada's most important roles in world affairs at the present time is to follow the policy of gaining the confidence of all the newer nations. They cannot be bludgeoned into doing what we think should be done, but I think if we are friendly with them and talk with them on a man to man basis quite a bit can be done in the way of getting their support for the policies in which we believe. This has been the experience at the United Nations; most of the new countries support the plans put forward by the western countries there.

I am hoping that out of this Laotian conference will come not only a settlement which will enable this little country to be neutral and enable the Laotian people to develop their country with help from outside, given without any strings, but that in addition the conference will make more friends for Canada and will help us to play an even greater part in world affairs.

I am sorry to have taken so much time, Mr. Speaker, and I will be very glad to appear before the external affairs committee at any time that can be arranged in order that members may cross-examine me with regard to these two conferences.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member for Essex East begins, may I ask the consent of the house to the suggestion made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the speech which he proposes to table be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I should also like to include the second statement I made with regard to giving the commission the equipment it requires.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that these documents be printed as an appendix to the official report?

[Mr. Green.]

[Editor's note: For text of documents referred to above, see appendix.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak for all hon. members of the house when I say we are glad to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs back in his seat. We realize that he has made a statement this morning under considerable difficulty, because I understand he arrived home at 2.30 a.m. On that account one would not expect the minister to display the same lucidity of expression which normally attends his statements in this house.

The minister has reported on two conferences, the NATO meeting and the conference dealing with the situation in Laos. The minister has not given us any great detail about the NATO conference. He has expressed the view that Canada is now satisfied with the arrangements for consultation. As this is a very important matter, we will look forward to the opportunity in the external affairs committee of getting further details from the minister, particularly in relation to the position allegedly being taken by one of the major participants in the North Atlantic treaty organization. The attitude of General de Gaulle in this regard will of course be of very great interest to us.

The minister may be assured that we in this party take a strong view along with him and support the government in any steps taken to strengthen the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We should have welcomed from the minister some indication as to what steps are being taken in that particular. Again in that regard we shall be afforded an opportunity when we confront the minister in the external affairs committee.

While he was away the minister will, no doubt, have noted that very important developments have taken place in Canada. Undoubtedly he has followed from afar the nature and character of the visit of the President of the United States to Canada. It will be of interest to the minister to know that there was some consternation in Canada and in this house as the result of a statement reported to have been made by him concerning Canada's offer to adjudicate the difficulties between United States and one country in the Caribbean. This report prompted an interrogation in this house of the Prime Minister by the Leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister gave the assurance that Canada, notwithstanding that report, had made no such offer to adjudicate in the difficulties which might be regarded as prevailing between Cuba on the one hand and the United States on the other. Perhaps the minister, when he appears before the external affairs committee, can tell us about this as well.

With regard to Laos, we have noted what the minister has said. We sincerely hope his optimism is warranted. We agree fully with him that every support must be given to the international supervisory truce commission of which Canada is a member. That commission, working as it does in a difficult terrain and under difficult circumstances, must be afforded every means of security and given every opportunity to carry out an efficient operation.

The minister said nothing about the relationship of the situation in Laos to the companion problem in South Viet Nam which is now engaging the attention of certain countries, particularly the United States.

The hon. gentleman has returned from these two conferences. We have welcomed the general statement he has made. Perhaps we would not expect him to make anything more than a general statement at this time in view of the circumstances of travel and the like. It is possibly regrettable that these statements cannot be more substantial in quality. This is perhaps inherent in the very nature of international negotiations. It would, I am sure, have been of great interest to the Canadian people if they could have been told with more particularity the consequences of the two meetings which the minister attended, first in terms of what is being done to strengthen NATO during a critical stage in its development; and second, that the 14 power conference was going to take strong measures to guarantee that no undue advantage was taken of this little nation in old Indo-China and that there would not be any development which would vitally affect the integrity of Viet Nam and its 22 million people.

The minister may be assured that once he has been afforded the opportunity for rest, and the kind of contemplation that comes with rest, he will find the opposition in its treatment of him generous but possibly even more searching than its spokesman is at the moment.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): My comments will be brief, for two reasons. First, I do not think this is a proper time at which to comment at length and, second, one would need to study such a statement as has been made by the minister for external affairs before being able to comment on it lucidly and at length.

The hon. member for Essex East showed some concern for the minister's weariness. Let me say to the hon. member that I think his concern is unnecessary. I marched behind the minister on the cobblestones of France for a good many months, and we used to wish he would tire out sooner. We were distinctly under the impression he was tireless. I am sure we all welcome him home and am glad to see him looking in such good health. I tell him this; that every one of us, when we met in the restaurant, sent for the papers and these were perused immediately. We looked them up to see what he had said today, and then we looked them up again tomorrow to see if what he said yesterday had been correctly reported. We followed all the reports with interest because we were concerned with the serious business he was undertaking on behalf of this country.

I was particularly interested in the report of the NATO meeting in Oslo, and I was glad to note the minister's reference to the friendly relations we have with the northern peoples. They are a stable and strongly democratic race. We are proud to be closely associated with them on friendly terms. I was interested to hear about the discussions on disarmament and the economic problems facing certain members of the NATO organization. I was particularly pleased to hear the minister say today he was hopeful that discussions would commence within the next month or so between the United States and the Soviet union on the subject of disarmament. I am sure we are all looking forward to the commencement of those discussions.

With reference to the minister's remarks on the situation in the Congo and the situation in Laos, it was a pleasure to hear of Canada's continued peace-promoting activities in these very important fields. I was interested to hear the minister mention the necessity for closer co-operation between NATO and the United Nations. I understood him to say, at least by inference, that possibly there should be more co-operation between the two organizations. We in this group look forward to the time when NATO will be merged into the United Nations and all our defence activities will be within the framework of the United Nations through an international police force.

We noted in the papers some reference to the minister's concern with respect to the attitude of Portugal toward colonialism. I do not know whether the reports were accurate or not. We must not forget that Portugal, although a member of NATO, is at present in defiance of a United Nations resolution. We trust this close association with NATO will have an effect in connection with these issues which are arising at the present time.

With regard to Laos, I was very pleased to hear the minister say that Canada should negotiate as a member of the commission, and in that spirit. We agree with that position entirely. Canada's record in this capacity in former occasions is good, and I am sure it will be maintained in the future.

In conclusion let me say that the minister's attitude, his approach and his general stability and character represent, I think, very much the spirit and the purpose of all Canadians in their approach to the difficult international situation we face.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE

EXTENSION OF MORATORIUM RESPECTING B.C. FISHING INDUSTRY

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-97, to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide an extension of one more year to the moratorium, which was provided first in 1959, to those engaged in the fishing industry on the coast of British Columbia, with respect to possible consequences of their actions by virtue of the Combines Investigation Act.

Motion agreed to and the bill read the first time.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a very short question of the Minister of Justice in regard to the legislation on the order paper. I would ask the minister whether he can assure the house that, if it is necessary to extend the bill for another year, the bill at that time will not be called an act to amend an act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member's question will be taken care of by a conclusion of the proceedings which have so far made it necessary to extend this provision.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-98, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to bring forward some minor adjustments and minor tightening up by amendments of a diversified nature.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether this has anything to do with the amendments regarding the commonwealth shipping agreement that he referred to earlier?

Mr. Balcer: No, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ORDER OF BUSINESS UNDER PUBLIC BILLS AND ORDERS

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in connection with today's order paper, and the order of business under the heading of public bills and orders.

Item No. 1 shown there is second reading of Bill No. C-30, an act to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. That bill was called for second reading last evening during private member's hour, and I believe it should have gone to the bottom of the order paper. In support of this contention I should like to quote Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation No. 380, which reads as follows:

> 380. When the bill comes up for a second reading in its proper course, one of the clerks at the table will read the order aloud, and the member in charge of the measure will then move its second reading.

I should also like to read from Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation No. 385, which reads as follows:

> 385. If, when the order of the day is read at the table, no motion be made for the second reading or other stage of a bill, or for its postponement, it becomes a dropped order,—

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) had the opportunity of moving second reading of the bill at that time, but he chose instead to raise a point of order which was entirely unrelated to the bill. I believe that he therefore made the decision to proceed with another course rather than moving second reading of his bill. For that reason I believe it should have dropped to the bottom of the order paper.

The hon. member suggested, on the point of order which he raised, that the rights of private members were involved. I suggest they are very substantially involved, because the placing of this bill at the head of the order paper prevents other hon. members' bills from coming on; and, as the session might well end, this may mean the difference between one hon. member's bill coming on for discussion and not coming on for discussion.

For that very important reason I believe that Your Honour should make a decision in this regard.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I also intended to raise this matter, and should like to add a few points which were not raised by the hon. member who has just spoken.

Last evening, just before six o'clock, Bill No. C-30 was read at the table by the clerk assistant, and is so recorded in Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons for yesterday at page 565, and also in Hansard for yesterday at page 5083. The sponsor of the bill chose not to proceed with it. It was read, and when he was not allowed to call it six o'clock, he then dealt with a point of order, which I assume it was his right to do.

I should like to present some further references. First, standing order 19 (1) of the House of Commons reads as follows:

19. (1) Questions put by members and notices of motions, not taken up when called may (upon the request of the government) be allowed to stand and retain their precedence; otherwise they will disappear from the order paper.

In this particular instance the motion was called and read, but not taken up. I should also like to refer to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 87 (1) which in part reads as follows:

87. (1) When an order of the day has been read, it must thereupon be proceeded with, appointed for a future day, or discharged.

The hon. member chose not to proceed with it, and it was not appointed for a future day. Therefore, I feel it must be considered to have been discharged.

I should also like to read subsection (4) of that same citation, 87, which reads in part as follows:

87. (4) It is one of the fundamental principles of parliamentary procedure that when nothing is done respecting an order of business it is struck out and cannot make further progress until the procedure regulating its passage has been regulated by the house.

Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to admit that the hon. member for Skeena found himself in a difficult position, with five minutes to go until the end of the hour for private members' bills. But I submit that this situation has arisen in the past with regard to private members' bills and will arise again in the future. The hon. member was in that position by reason of the proceedings in the house during the private members' hour. Nevertheless there was still considerable time before six o'clock for the hon. member to have moved second reading, as an examination of Hansard will show.

I believe he was placed in a position where he either had to proceed with the order, after it had been read, or to allow it to be dropped. The hon. member raised a point of order in an effort to avoid having to speak on the bill, or to propose it, and I should like to quote his own words as they appear in Hansard of April 19, 1961 at page 5083. He is reported there, after the order was called, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, before the order is proceeded with I wonder whether it might be considered to be six o'clock?

The order had definitely been called and the hon. member, in the difficult position he found himself, tried to talk it out until six o'clock. I feel, nevertheless that the order was called and he chose not to proceed with it when he had the opportunity, and it should not appear as No. 1 under public bills on today's order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Skeena wish to add anything to the advice I have received on this matter?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I do not care now, or at any other time, to become involved in the misrepresentations which have been given to my actions by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. I should simply like to point out that there are two incorrect things involved in the raising of this point of order. The first is that this is not the time to deal with it, as Your Honour has ruled on a number of previous occasions; points of order should be raised when that particular stage of procedure is reached which is involved, which I suggest would possibly be next Tuesday, when this matter will come up again.

Second, apart from the first point I have made, I suggest that Votes and Proceedings correctly sets out what happened. The order was read by the clerk at the table and I proposed, before the motion was put by the chair—which it was not—that it might be called six o'clock. There was some objection, and I then rose on a point of order. I proceeded on that matter, but before I had the opportunity to complete my remarks it was called six o'clock. I suggest, therefore, that the order is now in its proper place on the order paper. I am quite prepared, when the order comes up again, to continue speaking on that point of order. The motion was not put by the Chair, and the stage when it should have been put had not been reached.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether this point arises now that the order paper has been settled, or whether it arises when the alleged error in the order paper becomes relevant by reason of the house having reached that point in the order paper, but I would think the latter would be the appropriate time. In any event, I shall take what has been said under consideration and be prepared to determine the issue when it arises. I express my appreciation of the assistance which I have received from hon. members in calling this matter to the attention of the Chair. The question appears to be whether, the order having been called from the table and not placed before the house by the Chair, and a point of order having intervened until the hour of sitting expired, the matter was really before the house. If it was, I assume the rules cited would take effect. If not, then perhaps the order is in its right place.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DECENTRALIZATION OF INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the Minister of Defence Production at Atholville, New Brunswick yesterday and reported in this morning's Gazette, to the effect that "probably two bombs and our defence industry would be lost", may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government has any actual plans to decentralize defence industries in Canada and locate them in areas of high unemployment?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is a question for the orders of the day. I will take the question as notice, and if the minister made the statement alleged to have been made by him, I will give an answer at the beginning of the week.

UNITED NATIONS

ANGOLA—ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister say whether at the NATO meeting there was any discussion of the genocidal measures being perpetuated in Angola by Portugal. Can the minister give any information to the house as to what progress is being made in setting up the United Nations five nation commission to inquire into this situation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this subject, of course, came up in the discussion of the whole question of colonialism. I think the members of that United Nations committee have been named, but I cannot remember which countries are involved.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Argue: The minister might have something to add to the statement he has made about the actual situation in Angola and Canada's attitude toward it.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, Canada supported the motion which was adopted by the United Nations just a few weeks ago. It is our belief that that step was a proper one to take. I have not up to the minute reports on what is happening in Angola. We have no representation in that part of Africa; therefore our reports of necessity are indirect.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I should like to reply, Mr. Speaker, to another question the hon. member for Assiniboia asked me a few days ago concerning Angola, namely whether Canada had been approached to act on this committee. My understanding is that the president of the general assembly invited five nations to participate in this committee, and that he is awaiting replies from the governments concerned as to their acceptance. An announcement as to the membership of the committee, if not already made, will be made in a day or so. Canada was not approached to act on that committee.

RED CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION OF RECOGNITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Yesterday in reporting to the house the Prime Minister said that the President of the United States and he had discussed the question of Chinese representation at the United Nations. I wonder if the Prime Minister could inform the house whether or not he and the President discussed the broader question of the recognition of China.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The question of recognition is a matter that is under continual study and discussion.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REPORTED ASSURANCE OF FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. Did he recently give an assurance to a delegation from Cape Breton that if Dosco would keep the coal mines open the government would pay the bill?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, up until now we have been paying subventions on the coal sold in that area by the mines, and my statement related to those subventions.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister comment on a statement which appears in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald to the effect that labour minister Starr said:

> The big problem is to convince the company to keep the mines open. We will pay the bill.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the keeping of the mines open is, of course, a decision of management. We would like to see the mines kept open if possible. We have paid subvention bills and are prepared to continue to pay them if they keep those mines open.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a further supplementary question. Does the minister mean that the government is prepared to pay the cost of keeping the mines open?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question the propriety of the course the hon. member is following in cross-examining, in effect, on an alleged statement in a newspaper. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

THE BUDGET

REQUEST FOR PRESENTATION OF SECOND BABY BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the current political exigencies which are obviously interfering with the normal course of the matter, would the minister consider the presentation of another so-called baby budget this month in advance of the regular budget?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in commenting on this matter I am glad to welcome the hon. member back to the chamber. He evidently is not aware of the fact that in his absence the hon. member for Essex East has appropriated this matter as one of his personal preserves, and he in turn took it away from the Leader of the Opposition, who had it before that. All I can say about these hon. gentlemen and their itchiness over this issue is "honi soit qui mal y pense".

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask a supplementary question. Are we to take it that the policy of the minister is an adamant one, namely "Vote now and pay later"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the policy the minister follows and advocates is "Vote Conservative and save your country."

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question based upon the reply of the minister. Would it be correct to say that the minister does not propose to bring in his budget until after the by-elections because he does not want to interfere—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is repeating a question he asked the other day, apparently for the purpose of—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Speaker: —argument, and I suggest—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question was not the question I put before.

Mr. Speaker: In any event, I heard the question sufficiently to know that it was not properly introduced at this time.

CANADA COUNCIL

INQUIRY AS TO FILLING OF VACANCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Beech (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to tell the house whether any steps have been taken to fill the vacancies on the Canada Council?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): When the hon. gentleman advised me that he was going to ask this question, after I came into the house, I sent out for the press release which was issued the day before yesterday. There were six vacancies on the Canada Council, five of which have been filled. Those named are: Lady Dunn, St. Andrews, New Brunswick; Mrs. Ginette P. Trepanier, Quebec; Monsignor Basil Kushnir, D.D., Winnipeg; Rabbi David Monson, Toronto; Douglas Black Weldon, M.C., London, Ontario. We are awaiting word from an outstanding industrialist in the province of Quebec, one who has been greatly interested in the arts, as to whether he will accept appointment to fill the other vacancy.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OTTAWA—EXPROPRIATION OF PRIVATE PROPERTIES FOR EMBASSY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister inform the house whether the government has received representations from the ambassador of any government with respect to his country's desire to obtain a site for the building of a chancellery that will require the expropriation of private properties on Sussex drive or adjacent thereto?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no such information has come to my attention. From time to time informal discussions are held about things of this kind, but I have not heard of any suggestions that property should be expropriated.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLENISHMENT OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Now that the net amount in the unemployment insurance fund has reached a very dangerous level, according to the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission, when is it the intention of the government to bring in measures to replenish the fund?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Just as soon as they are prepared they will be introduced in the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): After May 29.

USE OF CHEQUE FORMS PRINTED IN UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, May 19, the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean asked a question and the reply is as follows. For some years there has been an active program of mechanization, particularly in the prairie region, of the unemployment insurance commission. The object has been to reduce the time required for processing of claims and to eliminate duplication. In the prairie region at the present time benefit warrants are printed and tabulated by mechanical process. These machines are manufactured and installed only by Remington Rand of the United States. The particular punch cards required for these machines are also provided by Remington Rand and therefore bear the notation that they are manufactured and printed for Remington Rand in the United States. This is the explanation why these warrants are printed in the United States.

SPORTS

REQUEST FOR PROCLAMATION OF LITTLE LEAGUE BASEBALL WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. McLennan (New Westminster): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the splendid work many of our citizens are doing in sponsoring little league baseball, which assists in combating juvenile delinquency and helps to mould the boys of today into the solid citizens of tomorrow, would the Prime Minister give consideration to proclaiming a national little league baseball week?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the observation as to the worth-while nature of the activities of those associated with little league baseball I am in full accord. Indeed, whenever I have the opportunity of going home to Prince Albert I am an inveterate attender of these games. The question of whether a national week should be set aside is one respecting which there are a number of important considerations. Quite a large number of organizations have asked from time to time to have days or weeks designated in this way. While I am not too hopeful as to the outcome, I will have the matter looked into.

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SPORTS COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is giving consideration to the establishment of a Canada sports council in connection with the sporting activities of our nation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne indicated that certain legislation regarding sports would be brought before the house. There has been no change in the viewpoint of the government in this regard, and when the legislation is introduced the hon. member will have an answer to his question. I do not want to be abrupt with the hon. member but this is a matter that will naturally come up for the fullest consideration when the legislation is before the house.

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING APPROACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Since the Department of Transport's estimates are now before the house, would the minister table immediately a copy of the agreement entered into between the city of Montreal and the national harbours board with regard to the Champlain bridge approaches, the Point St. Charles dump and the causeway leading to St. Helen island?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this agreement was signed yesterday and was announced in this morning's papers. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to tabling this document as soon as possible.

Mr. Loiselle: A supplementary question. By "as soon as possible", does the minister mean today or in a few days?

Mr. Balcer: I understand this agreement has just been signed in Montreal, and as soon as it reaches me, I shall be pleased to table it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FREE VOTE BY MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to allow a free vote—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is offending the privileges of the house under which hon. members are free to vote as they see fit. To suggest that any member would be subject to direction would, I think, be out of order.

OPPORTUNITY TO PREPARE FOR DISCUSSION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the house leader. Is he aware that last night he proposed for consideration on Monday legislation that was placed on the order paper only this morning, and does he believe that the best way to facilitate the business of the house and its proper scrutiny of legislation is by not giving members of parliament sufficient time to prepare themselves for these debates?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seems to be mounting an argument about the conduct of the business of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The business for Monday announced last night included matters that were not even on the order paper last night. Some have appeared on the order paper today; others will not be on the order paper until Monday. Therefore I think it is proper for me to ask a question concerning the business of the house, and to inquire through the house leader whether the government thinks this is the proper way to provide members of parliament with an opportunity to scrutinize, study and consider this legislation when there is only one day to consider it, that day being Sunday.

Mr. Speaker: I objected to the question, and I still think it is not proper, because it is really a leading question for the purpose of argument and to express an opinion as to the conduct of the business of the house. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question about the propriety within our rules of the course followed, or a factual question about the business of the house, he is quite within his rights; but I do not think it is appropriate at this time to debate the course that is being followed, which is the import of the question.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue the point of privilege, and bring this matter to the attention of the house. I think I am within my rights under the rules to do so. The question of what the business will be for Monday, as announced by the house leader last night, is quite clear. One of the things that will be discussed on Monday is an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act. I am prepared to discuss that act on Monday. There are some of us who would like to give this subject consideration before it is introduced in the house.

What will take place on Monday is this. There will be a meeting of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines from 9.30 until 11 o'clock, to consider the Freight Rates Reduction Act. At 11 o'clock I presume it will be the responsibility of the Minister of Transport to be in the house. I am sure that in the one and a half hours available it will not be possible to dispose of the Freight Rates Reduction Act. It seems to me, therefore, that because of the manner in which the business has been arranged by the house leader, and the business that is going to take place elsewhere on Monday, it will not be possible to give this important legislation—I take it that it is important, at least until I have seen it—the consideration it deserves. If the Freight Rates Reduction Act is under consideration in the committee while the house is sitting, then the minister and those of us who would like to be in the committee cannot be in both places at the same time.

The question which I put to the minister, therefore, is this. Does he think that situation is conducive to the orderly consideration of business here?

Mr. Speaker: Order; that was the question to which I objected. The hon. member is in a position to ask the house leader if, in view of the difficulties he has pointed out, a change could be made in the order of business, but not to ask that question.

Mr. Chevrier: In view of the difficulties which I have brought to the attention of the minister, does he not think it would be far more conducive to the orderly conduct of business if we were to take up the consideration of veterans legislation on Monday?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): This interjection by the hon. member for Laurier, and his accusation that something is improperly on the order paper, you have already exposed, Mr. Speaker. May I underline the matter. Everything that was announced as business for Monday has followed the procedure laid down by the rules, and proper notice has been given. The order paper right now contains every item that has been set for Monday with the sole exception of the resolution dealing with the Judges Act, which appears on Votes and Proceedings giving the proper 48 hours' notice.

The hon. member for Laurier is trying to insinuate or is insinuating that something is being incorrectly done. This insinuation is quite improper on his part. The question that he raises as to whether or not a committee can handle some business it has outlined for Monday is not a responsibility that rests on my shoulders. The committee is responsible for its own order of business.

Then his final suggestion about dealing with war veterans allowance legislation is, of course, quite out of order. This item will be brought forward at the appropriate time. Hon. members on the other side of the house and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate apparently did not want that subject debated at any great length. He said it was of no importance, and that is reported in Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The statement the minister has made is totally false, and he knows it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has, I think, gone further than he would intend to go by saying that the minister knowingly made a false statement to the house. I would ask him to modify that statement, because it is not in accordance with our practice.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will say, sir, that the other day—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Withdraw.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not intend to have my course dictated by the Minister of Finance. I only recognize one Speaker in the house, notwithstanding the efforts made by the Minister of Finance, to usurp that position.

I say, sir, an effort was made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs the other evening to misrepresent a statement I had made about another bill, namely the bill concerning the directors of the Canadian National Railways, as though it referred to the war veterans allowance bill. I corrected the statement at that time, and if the minister read Hansard he knew that what he was saying was wrong. I presume that he did not bother to read Hansard, and I withdraw any suggestion that he made this statement deliberately.

Mr. Churchill: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I have read Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we should not debate what happened the other day. The hon. member has withdrawn the accusation that there was any deliberate misstatement. This is not the appropriate time to revive a debate.

Mr. Chevrier: There was a statement made by the house leader which was totally inaccurate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question before the house was a discussion of the business of the house. There was a suggestion by the hon. member for Laurier that the business of the house might be rearranged. I take it that has not been accepted. It is not appropriate to debate the settlement of questions concerning the business of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to debate it, but I did want to raise a question of privilege because it has been said here that proper notice has been given for this legislation, and that is not correct.

Mr. Speaker: This would be a point of order, and if the hon. member wishes to raise a point of order I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. Chevrier: I raise a point of order, sir. In so far as the Judges Act is concerned proper notice has not been given because, according to the minister's statement last night, we are to discuss the Judges Act on Monday. The Judges Act is not yet on the order paper, and it is not on Votes and Proceedings. It cannot, therefore, be put on the order paper until Monday; hence it cannot be discussed on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: If that is the case, then of course the matter cannot be dealt with on Monday.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Let me clear up this point at once. What was said was that the resolution preceding the Judges Act would be proceeded with on Monday. The resolution is on Votes and Proceedings of yesterday, and therefore can be proceeded with on Monday. I am sorry that the hon. member did not read Votes and Proceedings thoroughly before he raised this ill-considered point.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister surely knows that when the resolution comes up on Monday, all we can do is have it advanced from one category to another on the order paper. It cannot be debated earlier than Tuesday under our rules.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—STATEMENT ON STARTS AND COMPLETIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Nipissing on May 17, may I say that completions of houses in centres of 5,000 population and over, keeping in mind that completions follow six months after starts, in the period January 1, 1960, to the end of April, 1960, numbered 29,100 dwelling units and in the period from January 1, 1961, to April 30, 1961, 21,727 dwelling units. Completions in other areas are available only for the first quarter, that is to the end of March. For 1960 the figure was 7,024 dwelling units and for 1961 it is 6,244 dwelling units.

A second question was asked by the hon. member for Trinity as to the number of unsold completed houses. At the end of April, 1961, the number of unoccupied houses and duplexes was 4,442. Last year at the same time the number was 3,768.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—THREATENED STRIKE ACTION BY CARPENTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fort William posed a question to me on May 18 with respect to the situation as to carpenters at Moosonee, and the provincial conciliation board report. I wish to advise him that the officials of my department are checking the implications of this report with the Ontario department of labour and with the officials of Defence Construction Limited. When they have reported to me I will be only too glad to supply further information to the hon. member.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

CITIZENSHIP DAY—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT SPONSORSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to put a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I should like to ask whether the department is still sponsoring the observance of citizenship day, and if so whether the department was satisfied with the response to their effort yesterday.

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer to the first question is yes, and both the minister and I attended functions of that sort.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

402. Departmental administration, $3,395,700.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have been looking at yesterday's Hansard with regard to a matter in which my hon. friend from Laurier—I am wondering, sir, whether I have the floor or whether somebody else has it.

I was saying, sir, that I had been looking at Hansard for yesterday with respect to a matter about which there was some difference between the hon. member for Laurier and myself on the one hand and the hon. member for Greenwood on the other. It is really only a historical point which should not take up much time of the committee. The question is with respect to the time at which a decision was made to turn the Canadian Northern Railway into a transcontinental railway, the initiative in that regard, and the decision with regard to the building of the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, which was of course actively sponsored by the Laurier government from 1903 onward.

The best information I was able to get hastily about it—and I did not spend a great deal of time in research—was that while the Canadian Northern Railway was started in 1898 or 1899 in Manitoba, and while some time early in the century the Canadian Northern Railway also acquired some existing eastern lines and began to build some more, the project for connecting the eastern and western parts of the system and for building the Canadian Northern to the Pacific was and remained a purely private venture, a matter of private enterprise if one can call it that. We know that all the railways, including the C.P.R., were assisted by various grants of one kind or another, but they were not in any sense public enterprises in that they were directly sponsored by the government.

The Canadian Northern continued all through this period to be a private railway being built entirely privately. Whether the Laurier government gave them encouragement to go ahead, or whether they did not encourage them, I think, is a matter that will be debated for a long time to come and we certainly will not settle it in the committee this morning.

However, with regard to this project as a transcontinental project, the Canadian Northern was very much the third one and came quite a long time after the National Transcontinental was inaugurated as a transcontinental system. Indeed, an effort was made at one time by the Laurier government to get the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Railway to come to some kind of agreement so there would only be one line built in addition to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Looking back now we can all be wise with hindsight and can see that it would have been a lot better if that had happened, because a great deal of the Canadian Northern had to be torn up after it was built. As a matter of fact I think some of the section between Edmonton and Edson was torn up before a train ever ran over it because the steel was needed for war purposes in the first world war.

I have read the remarks of my hon. friend from Laurier very carefully and I do not think he insinuated—I am sure he did not mean to insinuate—that the Borden government was responsible for this situation at all. What he said was that they found that a situation had grown up in Canada where there were three transcontinental railways and there was not really enough business for them. There never has been enough business for them, because in fact one of them was interrupted and never did become a transcontinental system.

That is all the hon. member for Laurier was seeking to say, and I do not think he was seeking to impute any blame to anybody. Certainly in any remarks I made I was not seeking to impute any blame. The only reason for bringing this matter to the attention of the committee is to emphasize the important point made by my hon. friend from Laurier, about which I think every Canadian should be really concerned at the present time; that is, that we should not let the same kind of situation grow up with the air lines.

That is what we are concerned about. We see even today that Mr. MacPherson in his report is having to suggest that very considerable sums of money be paid out of the treasury to keep the railways going during a period of transition because the users are not able to pay for the service that it is still considered necessary to have in the national interest.

This will no doubt be true with air lines as it is with railways. In some areas we may want air lines which will not pay for themselves, but it may be sufficiently in the national interest to have them. However, I say we should ask ourselves very carefully whether we wish to allow a situation to arise where we have two competing national air lines, neither of which can pay for itself, and where the taxpayer is going to have to foot the bill as he has done over the years for the railways. That is the point we are trying to make on this side of the house, and that was the point my hon. friend from Laurier and the late C. D. Howe were so greatly concerned about when we were in office.

We are suggesting that the government should be equally concerned about this important national interest and about the protection of the national treasury. That is the real point. I just wanted to try to clear up the misunderstanding and indicate that these things were not introduced for any purpose other than as an analogy to try to underline and emphasize how important it is.

There is no doubt whatever—Trans-Canada Air Lines have shown this over the years—that one transcontinental air line can pay, and pay very well, to the treasury; but since the introduction of the competing service we have seen what has happened. My hon. friend from Laurier warned us about it before it started. He has drawn it to our attention ever since, and we have seen what has happened. I do not take any position as between Trans-Canada Air Lines and the C.P.A. I think they are both excellent organizations. They are both very well operated in every way. I would say they are the two best air lines on the whole continent as far as their operations are concerned, as far as their safety is concerned, and as far as all those things that go to make a good air line are concerned. I do not wish to make any comparisons between them at all. However, I do say it is our primary job in committee of supply to protect the treasury of Canada, and we should not allow a situation to arise with respect to air lines which, far from protecting the treasury of Canada, is going to make it impossible for either air line to pay and is going to force the taxpayers to subsidize the services or have some of the services scrapped. That is the point.

I hope my hon. friend from Laurier will agree that I am stating the position accurately. He knows so much more about this matter than I do, and I hope he will agree that I am accurately stating the position he took yesterday.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is not exactly what was said.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member wishes to make a point at this time I shall be very happy to sit down and let him make it.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say on this matter. I have no desire to enter into a controversy. As a matter of fact I accept almost every word the hon. member has said about the back history of the railways. There are one or two points with which I might deal, but I do not think it is necessary for me to take up much time of the committee. I wish to explain why I suddenly found myself on my feet yesterday, almost without knowing it. I am reading now from page 5067 of Hansard in the midst of a speech by the hon. member for Laurier. He said:

> I am rising chiefly to point out that under the former administration we were determined to prevent from arising a situation such as that which arose under the Borden government with railways when too many transcontinental lines were built and none of them could pay.

Maybe I took it too seriously, but I felt this was leaving the impression that the orgy of railway building which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has described was undertaken under the Borden regime. Borden came into power in 1911. The orgy of railway building in this country was, I think it can be said, in the first decade of the century. It is perfectly true that if we are talking about the setting up of the national railways, that did not come until after the first war. I do not dispute that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was accurate in his statement. My only concern is with the name of a man for whom I have great respect, and I should not like the implication to remain that he alone was responsible for an error of judgment in proceeding too enthusiastically in the building of railways in the first decade of the century.

Mr. Chevrier: If I might be allowed to interrupt the speech just started by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I should like to say to the hon. member for Greenwood that a careful reading of what was said points not to the fact that the situation about which he complains arose under the Borden government, but that the problem arose under that government, and I should hate to see the same kind of problem arise with reference to air lines. That is all I had in mind in my statement.

Mr. Small: I raised the same point yesterday. I do not know whether the hon. member for Greenwood was in the house when I did so. I too listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier and I was left with the same impression as the hon. member for Greenwood. I knew the hon. member for Laurier was not right in saying that this difficulty was an emanation of the Borden government. It was a carryover from the Laurier regime, though in the circumstances I do not criticize that administration for what was done.

Mr. Macdonnell: I must add one word here, because I do not like to see the reputations of people who played a great part in the building of these railways discredited without good cause. May I say that I think Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann had ambitions greater than mere money making. They could have sold out and made a lot of money, but they had ambitions above that and I should like to pay my tribute to them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I lived in Manitoba from 1911 to 1914. I know there are many parts of Manitoba which would not have been opened up but for the work done by Sir William Mackenzie, Sir Donald Mann and Mr. D. B. Hanna, who really built the railroad. I must take slight exception to one of the statements made by the hon. member for Greenwood when he said that the orgy of railway building—and I myself would not have used that word—took place in the first decade of this century. The building continued until 1914 or 1915 and I think perhaps if the Borden government could have prevented the Canadian Northern Railway from going on to build a third line through northern Ontario some of those difficulties could have been overcome. However, that part of their line was built after the Borden government came into office and not before.

I do not believe anybody foresaw those things, but having that precedent we can foresee what might happen in the air line field and we shall be culpable in the eyes of posterity if we allow the same situation to arise with respect to air lines. That is my whole point.

Having made that point I wish to return to what I was saying with regard to an interjection made by the Minister of Transport—and perhaps if the debate going on alongside the Minister of Transport could cease the hon. gentleman would be able to hear what I am saying—

An hon. Member: I do not think he is missing much.

Mr. Balcer: I shall not miss a word, I promise you.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I shall not pursue that point. I was drawing attention, and because this is of such vast importance to my constituency and to people in every fishing riding on the Atlantic coast I drew attention three times, and I am going to repeat the words used by the minister about small boats—

Mr. Woolliams: Before the hon. member goes on I wonder if he would answer a question about transportation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member not regard boats as transportation?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, but I was wondering whether the hon. member believes we should have a monopoly of air service in Canada now and in the future.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can answer that question very easily. We have never had a monopoly. An intelligent decision was made by the Mackenzie King government at the end of the war, in the year 1944, which was carried on—

Mr. Pallett: I thought the war was still on in 1944.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member's colleague from Bow River asked a question to which I am sure he desires an answer. Perhaps if he could help me restrain some of his hon. friends I could give that answer. In 1944, when transcontinental air lines were in their infancy, when indeed there were no transcontinental air lines except T.C.A.—incidentally, the reason there were no others was that no one else felt it was worth while to have them—a decision was made that there should be only one instrument for international and transcontinental services for a considerable time to come, until we could see how this whole situation was going to develop. That was done precisely because Mr. C. D. Howe had had a long experience in connection with the railways and the problems which had been created by having services which were greater than the country could support. He had the wisdom not to want to have that kind of situation develop in the air.

I say without hesitation that if in order to have an air line which will be paid for by the users and not by the taxpayers we can only afford to have one in Canada, I am in favour of having only one.

Mr. Woolliams: A monopoly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, a monopoly; precisely. If you have two lines that are going to be bankrupt and subsidized by the treasury, or one line that can make money, I am in favour of one line that can make money. That is simple. If, on the other hand, you could have two lines that could both make money, I think that is preferable. I think any sensible person with the kind of economic views I hold would take that view.

Mr. McCleave: The worst of it is, nobody with the kind of economic views held by the hon. member could possibly be sensible.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was a typical contribution from the learned member for Halifax. The point I am making is that what I am anxious to avoid is a subsidy on air travel, to any unnecessary extent, paid by the taxpayers of Canada. We know that with a sprawling country such as our own, with vast areas to open up and keep in contact with, some kind of subsidy will be necessary in some areas. In the national interest there have always been subsidies, and we shall have them for a long time to come. We should not try to maximize subsidization, we should try to minimize it; that is my position. It is a very simple, thrifty position. It is perhaps a little old fashioned, but I really believe that we should try to save the taxpayers' money. If that is a terrible confession to make in this house, I make it none the less, and am not ashamed to do so.

Mr. Balcer: You have no monopoly on that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now, sir, there was not a monopoly on air services in Canada. The government decided that in other areas there would be opportunities given for free enterprise, and that these areas would be delineated through the medium of the air transport board, for which my friend the hon. member for Laurier was responsible during all its formative period. It did a splendid job in encouraging young men, who came out of the air force, to get into the air line business—relatively small companies—and gave them reasonable assurance that in the areas in which they became involved they would have the traffic, so there would be a reasonable chance for them to make these operations pay.

This policy represented a great contribution to that splendid decade of development we had in this country from 1946 to 1956, and it was most unfortunate, in my opinion, that the policy was abandoned by the former minister of transport. I hope the present minister will go back to it.

In so far as some of these services were concerned, I agree completely with what one hon. member on the other side of this house said earlier; this cutthroat competition which was allowed in this area has already driven quite a number of these air lines to the wall.

I did not intend to speak about this subject of air lines at all, because it is really not my field but that of my friend the hon. member for Laurier. All I know about it are the A B C's, which I learned from him. I was drawn into this subject as a result of one or two questions which were asked and I should like now to come back to the question of ships in connection with which, notwithstanding the fact that I lost mine, I still have a more immediate interest and concern.

Mr. Woolliams: Did you not receive any compensation for the loss of this ship?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was insured by me under private enterprise, and I was fortunate enough to collect the insurance.

Mr. Balcer: Was it a small boat or a big boat?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was 110 feet long, and I leave it to the minister to decide whether it was small or big. The minister is not, even by indirection, going to get me to give any definition of what a small boat is, because that is exactly what I am trying to get him to do. The minister has said that the government intends to help the fishermen who are working in very small boats, and that it is going to look after them as well. The minister interjected yesterday during my remarks when I quoted him for the third time, and said, as found at page 5075 of Hansard for that date:

> A boat 65 feet long is certainly not a big ship.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that is not the point involved. I do not know why he mentioned a boat 65 feet in length, because his policy includes boats from 45 feet in length. I suggest that a boat of even 45 feet, while it may not be a big ship, is not a small boat in the sense in which fishermen understand it; it is a large vessel. Small boats are a good deal smaller than that. The boats being used by the majority of fishermen are a good deal smaller than that.

The government's policy in this respect is to provide assistance for the operators of what we consider large fishing boats. While the government has done a great deal—this is a very serious criticism I have of the government, and I say at once that this criticism might be applied also to its predecessors—it has not done enough. Of course the public expected this government to correct all the errors of the previous government, not merely to excuse themselves because we had made them.

Mr. Balcer: But you made so many.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest the minister has a great opportunity now to do something which we did not do. I suggest the difference between a man who fishes using a small boat and a man who fishes using these larger vessels is the difference between a family farm and a commercial farming operation. This government is doing something for the commercial fishing operation, but when the minister made his statement in this regard the other day he did not indicate any policy of providing assistance to what we might call the family fisherman, to adapt a phrase.

I should like to know whether this policy means that the government in fact is planning to assist owners of boats shorter than 45 feet and, if it is not, perhaps the minister could clear that up at once.

Mr. Balcer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: If you will answer mine, you may.

Mr. Balcer: Is he against the policy to provide an encouragement to the hon. member's fellow citizens of Newfoundland to own boats larger than 45 feet? I realize that many fishermen in Canada operating off our coasts use very small boats, but also that they face tremendous difficulties because they do so. We want to encourage people to build larger boats, and feel that bringing this legislation forward will encourage those individuals using the very small boats to use what we call a small boat but a little larger, that is to say boats between 45 and 65 feet in length.

Mr. Pickersgill: What the minister is asking me is whether I object to having soup and dessert because I have asked for meat. Of course I am in favour of soup and dessert, but I am asking whether the minister is also going to provide the meat.

Mr. Spencer: You are asking for gravy.

Mr. Pickersgill: An hon. member has said something about gravy. I am referring to the government's policy and that may be his characterization of it, but it is not mine. I am very much in favour of the policy of assistance for fishing boats the minister has announced, which my hon. friend from Gloucester asked for the evening before it was announced. The policy announced by the minister provides something not quite as good as that asked for by the hon. member for Gloucester, but it is very nearly the same.

An hon. Member: It is one o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, may I just finish my sentence? I am very much in favour of this assistance, but I am even more in favour of something being done to help the inshore fishermen who, even with government assistance, could never raise the additional capital necessary to build these larger vessels; and I refer to the family fishermen.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): The hon. member's time expired at 12.50, but inasmuch as he was interrupted he may have the floor at 2.30, if that is the wish of the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: I feel that would be unfair, and that the floor should be given to someone else.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief comments at this time on the estimates of the Minister of Transport but before doing so I should like to join with the members who have preceded me in offering my congratulations to the minister on the leadership he has given to this department since assuming this office. He has indicated beyond any shadow of doubt that he is a minister who will look after the transportation problems that face this country and do so in a manner that will fully justify the promise he has shown through the years as a member of this house.

I wish to tell the minister just how happy the people in my part of the country are over the announcement he made on May 12 regarding assistance to the shipbuilding industry. This is a tremendous step in the right direction and will be of great benefit to the shipbuilding industry, to fisheries and to the people of this country who are seeking employment in those fields.

I might tell the minister I feel that further consideration should be given to the question of the assistance available in the construction of long-liners. Assistance is now available to long-liners between 45 feet and 65 feet in length. It may be that we should extend this assistance to a little larger type of wooden craft since, as the fishing industry has advanced, there has been a demand for a longer type of boat.

I might also make some mention of the recent cross fire between the minister and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate regarding small boats. I do not think we need to extend the length of those vessels to the length of the luxury liner that the hon. member recently lost. I know he might be anxious to look to the government for assistance in constructing a 110 foot vessel but—

Mr. Pickersgill: They are covered; I was asking for the small ones.

Mr. Coates: —we would not want to go quite that far. At the same time the hon. member did refer to small vessels. I think the minister's explanation was that this assistance will allow those fishermen who today are not able to acquire craft of 45 feet in length to have the benefit of the subsidy, and it might very well put them in a position where they can acquire them. This is a forward step in that direction and one on which the minister should be congratulated.

If one looks over the budgets of the various provincial governments today one finds almost without exception that each shows a surplus. Unfortunately, this is not so with respect to the federal government because of the tremendous assistance provided to the provinces and to every aspect of our economy. If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is interested in assisting the fishermen who are mainly involved in inshore fishing in smaller type vessels, maybe he can speak to his good friend the premier of Newfoundland who receives probably 65 per cent of his total budget from the federal government. It might be possible for him to take some small part of this and make it available to that type of fisherman.

I should also like to associate my remarks with those of the hon. member for Pictou. This very energetic member gives his constituency the type of representation it deserves. I refer also to the hon. member for Queens. Both of these hon. gentlemen have brought to the minister's attention the need for a replacement of the Charles A. Dunning ferry on the service between Pictou county and Prince Edward Island. There is no doubt that the people in Prince Edward Island deserve the very best service that the Canadian government can provide. The vessel to which I have referred is now outmoded, and the demand for ferry service in that area is such that consideration should certainly be given to the provision of a new vessel to take care of this very necessary service.

May I now turn to a matter of very urgent concern to my constituents in the disaster stricken town of Springhill. This has to do with the spur line between Springhill Junction and the town of Springhill. I should like to thank the minister for the very sympathetic consideration he has given to my requests on this particular subject, and also for the very sympathetic way in which the C.N.R. has looked at this matter to date. It is a most complicated matter since the line is owned at present by a private company. The board of transport commissioners has indicated in a decision that they will allow the company to abandon the line, and since that time I have met with Mr. Gordon and the minister. I have discussed the matter with the premier of Nova Scotia who has also been in touch with the president of the C.N.R. and the minister. I am very hopeful that it will be possible to find some way for the C.N.R. to assume the operation of this spur line.

The request made by the citizens of the area is that only three and a half miles of the line be assumed by the C.N.R. This would mean that the town would have a railway line available to it when it was necessary to bring in materials. I might point out in this regard that a battery factory has recently been established there which almost of necessity needs the line to transport sulphuric acid from the junction.

The new coal mine established in Springhill, which is presently undertaking new developments in the area that will mean additional employment if they prove successful, could also benefit materially from the continued operation of the spur line. When a decision is reached on this matter I certainly hope it will be a favourable one assuring that Springhill will have the transportation facilities available to it that are necessary to attract new industry to the area.

I wish to turn to another problem of direct concern to my constituents, the re-establishment of a ferry service between Parrsboro and the Annapolis valley. There had been a ferry service in operation for 90 years until 1940 when the ferry which plied between Parrsboro and Kingsport was removed on the assumption that it could be utilized better in the war effort in another area of Canada. My constituents did not object at that time for it was their belief that they should do everything within their power to assist the war effort. However, at the end of the war they quickly realized that what had been taken from them was not to be returned. This was most unfortunate and it became even more so as the years went by for the beautiful town of Parrsboro found itself cut off from the main transportation route upon the establishment of the trans-Canada highway in another area of my constituency. Since that time the people there have made many efforts to have the ferry service re-established.

I might say it is to the credit of the government that very serious consideration was given to the establishment of a scheduled service between Cumberland and the Annapolis valley. However, this meant the construction of deep-water piers. Estimates of the cost of construction varied between $6 million and $10 million, and in the light of the circumstances involved the Minister of Public Works found that he was unable to provide this amount. As a result, only recently those interested in this service have been making efforts to have consideration given to the re-establishment of a tidal ferry service. If this were done a study could be made of the traffic available and it could then be determined whether it would be feasible to make an expenditure of the size needed to build deep-water piers.

I should like to bring to the minister's attention the fact that the Nova Scotia government has two ferries at the present time which will be available for other uses this fall when the bridge over the Bras d'Or lakes is completed. These two ferries are the John Cabot, which could handle between 20 and 22 motor cars, and the Percy C. Black named after a former member for Cumberland. He was an outstanding member of the House of Commons and the Nova Scotia legislature for many years and made a tremendous contribution to the history of Canada. If these two vessels could be altered they could be utilized in this service.

I am informed by the provincial government that the necessary alterations would cost about $100,000. This is a fairly large expenditure, one that it would be difficult for the provincial government to undertake by itself although that government did indicate that if the federal government would construct the piers they would be willing to undertake the alterations of these two vessels. Since the federal government is in my belief obligated to replace this ferry service and has indicated that it will not agree to an expenditure of the size necessary for the construction of deep-water piers, it is my view that it should be willing to enter into an agreement with the provincial government in order to assist it in the alterations necessary to make these two ferries satisfactory for this service.

I might point out to the minister that in the 90 years during which the ferry service was available to my constituents and the people of the Annapolis valley the federal government made available a subsidy of between $4,000 and $5,000 per year to assist in the operation of the service. Since the federal government has been fortunate enough to save this sum for some 20-odd years, it seems only right that ways and means might be considered of making at least a portion of this amount available to the provincial government to carry out the alterations necessary to prepare these ferries for this service. I understand that the facilities at Kingsport would have to be extended.

I might point out that the Minister of Public Works has recently seen the completion of a very fine new wharf at Parrsboro, and repairs are presently under way on the breakwater in that area. This means that with a slight expenditure we would probably be able to have facilities available in the Parrsboro area which would be satisfactory for the loading and unloading of motor vehicles. I would appreciate the minister giving very serious consideration to this proposed ferry service because it will mean a great deal to the economy of Parrsboro, Parrsboro Shore and the area of Five Islands in the constituency of my good friend the hon. member for Colchester-Hants.

I might point out also that the federal government has recently made available to the province of Nova Scotia a contribution of 50 per cent of the cost of the construction of a new highway along the Parrsboro Shore. It would only seem logical to me, since we have now spent approximately $300,000 of our own money to prepare these tourist roads, that we should make every possible effort to attract the tourists to this area. Certainly, the re-establishment of this ferry service would be the best possible way of doing that. In my opinion, this would be of tremendous assistance to the agriculture industry in both the Annapolis valley and Cumberland. It eliminates at least 115 miles from the route between Annapolis valley and the New Brunswick border. There is no doubt but that any possible means of getting our goods closer to the market is something that deserves serious consideration.

I believe those are the two main items I wish to bring to the minister's attention. I should like to again offer him my thanks for the assistance he has made available to both the shipping and fishing industries of my province.

Mr. Eudes: Would you allow me, Mr. Chairman, to tender, as did the previous speaker, my congratulations and wishes to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) on his appointment to the post of minister of the important department he now administers.

I wish him as much success as had his predecessors having particularly in mind the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), promoter of the St. Lawrence seaway, which is the envy of every other country since its necessity, its economic soundness and opportunities are being realized.

The hon. member for Laurier has so put his stamp on that department that whenever the estimates of the Department of Transport are discussed, we can rightly wonder whether hon. members on the government benches do not still consider him as the minister in charge.

The policy announced to the house in connection with ship operating and shipbuilding on Friday, May 12 last, and I quote the very words of the minister:

> —is intended to make it possible for Canadian ship operators to obtain new vessels from Canadian shipyards at reasonable and competitive prices instead of being forced to have them built abroad because of the lower construction costs that prevail in other countries.

This is a commendable policy and is to the credit of the government. However, the way it was introduced and the method of its implementation leave some doubt as to its legality.

On the same date, the minister advised the house that:

> Parliament will be asked to provide, by way of departmental estimates, funds—

For the purposes set forth in his statement. I wonder whether this procedure is in accordance with the spirit of the constitution.

In the same statement, the minister advised the house that:

> The methods of determining approved costs for this purpose and other particulars relating to administration of this plan will be prescribed by regulations to be approved by the governor in council.

But how could the governor in council make regulations unless they can apply to an act duly approved by parliament?

As an example, I refer you to chapter 294 of the Revised Statutes of Canada under which the government first received authorization from parliament before granting subsides to wheat producers. Because of that authorization, which took the form of an act, the governor in council could then make the appropriate regulations.

To those remarks, which are made in a spirit of co-operation, I add the wish that the proposed policy of the minister will bring back to our shipyards the prosperity of former years and provide to hundreds of voters in my constituency an opportunity to resume the jobs they lost when the yards closed down.

Mr. Chairman, with your permission, I would now like to add a few brief remarks relating to certain matters which were brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport May 18 last, by my colleague from Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets). Like the Maisonneuve-Rosemont riding, the Hochelaga constituency, that I represent in this house, borders, in all its width, to the southeast, on the St. Lawrence river. It is crossed throughout from west to east by the C.N.R. railway tracks, and its western boundary is located a few blocks from Jacques Cartier bridge.

You will realize, from those preliminary remarks, that the welfare of the people in the Hochelaga riding can be affected to a great extent by the policy implemented by the Department of Transport.

I shall deal first of all with the railway lines operated by the C.N.R. Those lines extend from Moreau street, former location of the station of that same name, and cross Hochelaga riding from the southwest to the northeast.

They were built in 1913 by the Canadian Northern Quebec Railways Company. At that time, this section of Montreal island was part of the town of Maisonneuve which was annexed to the city of Montreal toward the end of the second decade of this century. At that time, those tracks ran through vacant lots, crossed by a few streets with only a few houses on them.

At the time, the population of the area affected by those railway tracks did not exceed a few thousand, but is now over 200,000.

Since this trackage was taken over by the C.N.R., the topography of that section of Montreal has completely changed by reason of the growth in population and consequent development.

Many new streets were opened up. Countless residential, business and public buildings, as well as churches and schools, have been built.

Those lines were built for two specific purposes: a daily transport service, both ways, by three passenger trains, one of which ran up to Chicoutimi, and freight transport, a small amount of which was intended for the few factories established along the lines. The other freight cars were directed to other lines, farther west, to be exchanged or handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railways.

It is undeniable that the presence of those railway tracks explains the lag in the development of this part of Montreal, as compared to other parts of the island.

Railway trackage within cities has never been considered as an attraction. Freight trains are unsightly, they are noisy; they hold up both pedestrian and automobile traffic. All this, together with the direct hazard they are for citizens who use the streets intersected by those railway lines have been, since 1913, so many unattractive features which, as we are now regretfully compelled to realize, have hindered the progress of this eastern part of the city of Montreal.

It happens that the purpose for which those railway tracks were built no longer exists today.

Moreau station disappeared 15 years ago. Passenger trains using that station as a terminal at the time have been rerouted and now operate out of Central station.

Except in a very few cases, freight trains use the elevated tracks situated more to the north on the island of Montreal.

It means that these tracks between Moreau and Viau streets are only there now to serve some 20 manufacturers which could as easily use another means for shipping and receiving goods.

They are also used by tank-cars from oil refineries in Montreal east. These could and should use another existing route by merely making a few changes.

When you consider the lay-out of those tracks, you can see that between Moreau and Viau streets they cross more than 25 streets, which means as many level crossings.

Now, the area comprised between those 25 streets is one of the most thickly populated on Montreal island.

Whether they go to church, to school or want to take the nearest bus, those people have to cross the railroad tracks.

One can imagine the dangers and the delays resulting from those level crossings which for a few years now have even been gateless.

About traffic hold-ups I have a very definite case for the minister's attention.

I live on Prefontaine street, a few hundred feet north of those railroad tracks. I can assure him that the traffic is held up daily on account of the freight cars running on those tracks, some times for half an hour —and this in spite of many representations made to the Canadian National authorities and to the predecessor of the present minister and in open and repeated violation of section 314 of the Railway Act which limits such periods of obstruction to five minutes.

My colleague, the member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, and myself supported by the association of Montreal east businessmen, are again asking the Minister of Transport to ask the Canadian National to reconsider their decision and to give up using those railroad tracks which have become practically unnecessary and unprofitable compared to the loss and lessening of welfare inflicted upon a population of over 200,000 persons. This population must suffer all the inconvenience resulting from the existence and operation of those tracks, because some reluctance is being experienced when it comes to withdrawing the privilege of a siding granted to a score of industries that use it only occasionally.

In short, it is a conflict between public interest and that of certain individuals or corporations. I hope that the minister will use his influence and authority to see to it that public interest prevails.

Mr. Chairman, I should like now to take up another matter which has to do with the item before us, the need for a new bridge east of Jacques Cartier bridge.

At the present time, Montreal and the south shore of the St. Lawrence are linked by three bridges: Jacques Cartier bridge, Victoria bridge which is the property of the C.N.R., and Mercier bridge which is under provincial jurisdiction.

A fourth one, Champlain bridge, is under construction.

To sum it up, even if Montreal east has a much larger population than Montreal west—although the count is difficult—it has only one bridge, the Jacques Cartier bridge to which have been added the two lanes reserved to street cars at the time the bridge was built. Those two lanes have alleviated the problem created by the unbelievably rapid and continuing growth of recent years in the number of motor vehicles using that bridge.

But they are by no means the solution the public which is also the taxpayer are entitled to expect from the government about such an urgent and important problem.

Indeed, on both shores of the St. Lawrence river, below the Jacques Cartier bridge, we have seen an industrial, commercial and residential development which upsets all forecasts of only 30 years ago planned to promote connecting roads between them.

The new plants built or under construction on the north shore, and especially on the south shore, in the Varennes, Vercheres and Contrecoeur areas, require growing communication with the metropolis, particularly with areas directly opposite, on the north shore.

As those communications operate both ways, one can easily imagine the waste of time and, therefore, the higher costs of production and transportation resulting from trips thus made necessary, along streets permanently jammed, to reach Jacques Cartier bridge.

I could enlarge on the subject to show, for instance, how the new bridge would significantly help solve the traffic problem in Montreal, and promote the general development of trade and industry, particularly the tourist industry which represents an important item in Canadian economy.

For the minister's benefit, I will recall the debate we had in this house on March 9, 1959, on a resolution introduced by the hon. member for Laurier, and I will merely ask him to consider this suggestion to build a bridge over the St. Lawrence river, downstream from Jacques Cartier bridge, a project which would have the immediate effect of providing work for the thousands of unemployed in the Montreal area.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words in support of an excellent suggestion made by my colleague from Maisonneuve-Rosemont following an editorial published in La Presse. He had suggested that the public be again given free access to the Montreal harbour and that the shores of the St. Lawrence, the finest gift we have received from Providence, be restored with some of the attractions they have been deprived of by industry, business and progress.

The St. Lawrence belongs to no one in particular, even where it flows near plants and wharves. It belongs to the public, even if the public have let the government build up those shores for the general prosperity of the country.

The fact remains that the public, namely each and every one of us, should have free access to the river, and the government should transform its banks in such a way that private individuals could, without interfering with the practical use of the river for the necessities of progress, admire from the shores of the St. Lawrence the magnificent view of Montreal, watch the arrival and departure of ships and follow the movements of navigation and the various activities in this, Canada's most important harbour, which, especially since the opening of the seaway, has become one of the most interesting harbours in the world.

With regard to Montreal harbour, which in the past few years has been accommodating almost all freighters calling in Canada, the minister will perhaps allow me, Mr. Chairman, to stress the conditions of the sheds at the disposal of passengers and their friends who accompany them when they leave or welcome them when they arrive.

The cleanliness of these sheds—and that is the least that can be said—leaves much to be desired. No comfort or conveniences are offered people who use them and sometimes have to wait for many long hours. There are neither shops, nor restaurants, nor newspaper stands, for instance.

Why not consider building a ship terminal in Montreal worthy of the metropolis and its harbour?

I associate myself with my colleague, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) in asking the hon. gentleman to consider the questions to which I have just drawn his attention, because I am sure that he will be able to strike the right and necessary balance between the public and individual interests.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, like previous speakers, I want to congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) on his appointment to the post he now occupies. His great qualities as a statesman and his knowledge of the matter justify the hope that he will be able to carry out his responsibilities to everybody's satisfaction.

I would have liked to join the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes) in expressing appreciation and admiration for the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), for the work he did when he held that post, but because of the many gaps for which the latter was responsible I just wish the present minister good health, and much courage and perseverance in his efforts to fill those gaps.

That being said, I want to deal with matters of more immediate interest to the people in my riding and explain to the minister the needs of my constituency.

The minister and probably all the hon. members are quite familiar with the fine city of St. Hyacinthe. I know he will easily understand the needs I explained to him, because, on many occasions, and more particularly during the elections of 1957 and 1958, he, like the hon. member for Laurier, visited the constituency which I have the honour of representing in this house.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport knows that the city of St. Hyacinthe is, if I may say, divided in two parts by the railway tracks of the Canadian National. Indeed, we usually refer to the section southeast of the Canadian National tracks as lower town, whereas the section north of the track is called Bourg Joli.

In the late 20's and early 30's, there was remarkable prosperity in the city of St. Hyacinthe. As a matter of fact, the building of two or three large plants north of the tracks brought to that section of the town which we agreed to call Bourg Joli many homes which are today among the finest in the city.

Indeed, people who live north of the Canadian National Railway tracks belong to two large parishes. To the west of Bourdages street, we have a group of people in the two different plants. That working community is the result of action taken by some of my fellow citizens who joined, or synchronized their efforts to make low priced homes available to the working population.

The Sacre Cœur parish, which lies to the east of St. Ann street, is steadily growing and has now become one of the finest parishes of the St. Hyacinthe diocese.

Bourg Joli now has an estimated population of 7,000 to 8,000.

Before 1940, three streets led to that community. Around 1940, the municipal administration of the time had Bourdages street and Laframboise boulevard closed up and a tunnel built under the C.N.R. tracks, thus leaving only one street to reach Bourg Joli. I do not wish to criticize the administration of the time because I feel those steps had to be taken to meet the needs then prevailing, but with the present expansion of St. Hyacinthe, in that part of Bourg Joli, I feel that this single roadway is inadequate and I would ask the Minister of Transport, who knows St. Hyacinthe very well, to give serious consideration to the possibility of building a second tunnel leading into Bourg Joli.

The presence of about a dozen manufacturers on the north side of the C.N.R. tracks occasionally causes traffic jams, especially at peak hours, that is at midday and at six o'clock at night. Such traffic jams delay not only the factory workers but the general public as well.

I must also point out, for the minister's information, that St. Charles hospital, where services are second to none, is also located north of the C.N.R. railroad tracks. You can readily imagine, Mr. Chairman, all the difficulties and dangers that could result if, at a time when a seriously ill or dying person had to be taken to the hospital, there happened to be a traffic jam in the present tunnel. You no doubt realize all the disappointments, delays and damages that could result from such a situation.

So, Mr. Chairman, to help the minister reach an early conclusion, I should like to place on record a letter I have received from the clerk of the city of St. Hyacinthe together with a resolution passed by the town council. Here is what the clerk of the city of St. Hyacinthe had to say, and I quote:

On behalf of the municipal council, I am sending you herewith a certified copy of a resolution passed by the council at its meeting of November 4, in which you are urged to make representations to the federal government for the carrying out of various public works.

Please accept the thanks of the city council for your kind attention to this resolution,

Yours sincerely,

J. P. Brault.

The resolution attached to this letter read in part as follows:

That this council make representations to the federal government through Mr. Theogene Ricard, representative of the district of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot in the House of Commons, in order that early consideration be given to undertaking or causing to be undertaken public works or other works in the city of St. Hyacinthe and the adjoining area in the course of next winter;

Section 2 of the same resolution lists the various works recommended, such as a tunnel under the C.N.R. railroad tracks at the eastern entrance of St. Hyacinthe, which is to be started soon, and construction of a federal building to accommodate the various federal services in the city of St. Hyacinthe, which I understand is to be started in the near future.

I therefore ask the Minister of Transport to give special consideration to the representations of the city council of St. Hyacinthe, which I endorse, in order that a start be made on those works as soon as possible.

Mr. Chairman, before closing my remarks, I should like to say a word or two on the Richelieu waterway. In the last two days, we have heard a number of speeches on the subject. I have followed with close attention the speeches made by my colleagues and particularly those of the member for Laurier, the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville and the member for Chambly-Rouville (Messrs. Chevrier, Dupuis and Johnson).

I am personally interested in the matter, just as are my constituents, because two of the finest parishes in the constituency I have the honour to represent in this house, namely the towns of St. Charles and St.-Denis-sur-Richelieu, are located on the shores of the majestic Richelieu.

I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that despite the arguments put forward by my colleagues, no one has been able to show me that the Richelieu scheme, if it were carried out, would be an economic venture. Therefore, on the basis of the interests of my constituents, I cannot but endorse the position taken by the present Minister of Transport in wanting to look at every angle of this scheme before taking any decision. I share the minister's opinion and I feel sure a study of the matter would be worth while, because I do not believe we should do the dirty work for the people outside who might want to share in the profits.

Mr. Chairman, in closing, I wish to repeat that I have full confidence in the present minister's ability. My constituents and myself have confidence in his management of the whole question of transportation in Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I should not like the Minister of Transport to think that I am stepping completely over the traces this afternoon when I fail to be as complimentary to the administration as perhaps some of my confreres have been who spoke earlier today. There are a few items in connection with the transportation industry about which I am rather unhappy. There are a few more items which I feel are changing today a little faster than perhaps government concepts have changed to meet them.

To begin with, as a member from Edmonton, Alberta, where exists an air service of a type operated by many big air lines, and several smaller ones, an area that we in fact like to call the crossroads of the world, I find it just a little disappointing to realize that the first result of the opening of the new air service at the new international airport should be a worsening, shall I say of the air service between Edmonton and Calgary.

The new international airport is located at Nisku, about 20 miles out of the city of Edmonton. Operations are being carried out from a temporary terminal there, although it is an improvement over the terminal building at the old airport. The new terminal which the department is now building, when completed, will be magnificent, and I should like to say at the outset we are very pleased to have this fine addition to our airport. We are also very pleased that the noise of the jets will not be directly in the city of Edmonton and, therefore, will not be such a nuisance, as it is perhaps in Dorval. However, we do have a great many air lines operating out of Edmonton which use aircraft of a type other than jets.

There are five or six flights each day, each way, between the cities of Edmonton and Calgary, utilizing Viscount aircraft, and I should like to suggest that the airport which exists now in the middle of downtown Edmonton is perfectly capable of handling those flights. While the facilities which exist there are not the best, they are sufficient to handle that job, and it would be of great convenience to businessmen to have these planes land at the old airport, which is just a few minutes' journey from the main business section of Edmonton and the downtown hotels. The flight between Calgary and Edmonton by Viscount takes 45 minutes, but since the flights have originated and ended at the new international airport at Nisku, another 30 minutes must be added to the time of the trip between these two cities. It is disappointing to have, as the first result of the opening of that new airport, the worsening of that flight from Calgary to Edmonton by the addition of half an hour in the length of time required. There is of course a small added expense because of limousine service required between the downtown area and the new airport.

I should also like to assure the minister that those of us who travel frequently from Edmonton to eastern Canada are certainly appreciative of the new fast jet service which is provided, which has cut down travelling time by two or three hours. I should not like to give anyone the impression that we have only lost, in efficiency of service, as a result of this new international airport.

The old airport in downtown Edmonton is still capable of handling Viscount flights, and I suggest there is no valid reason, so far as I am aware, in view of the fact that other air lines are presently carrying out operations from that airport, why Trans-Canada Air Lines should not continue their Calgary-Edmonton operations from that airport rather than from the new airport at Nisku. Pacific Western Air Lines still operates from that airport for their northern flights, as does Canadian Pacific Air Lines for a portion of their runs. In addition, numerous other private and chartered air lines still operate from this old airport.

I have been told by T.C.A. that they do not think they want to go to the expense of having two separate ground crews, one at the new airport and one at the old. I merely suggest that certainly the most efficient method of handling this is for a pool ground crew to handle all air lines operating into Edmonton. It seems this idea should work most easily because we have several air lines in the same position. As it is now, both T.C.A. and C.P.A. are in the position where they should be running a split service, but only Canadian Pacific does it. This should keep the cost of ground service at the airport within reason, and should enable us to maintain at least that very high standard of service that we had enjoyed for so long in Edmonton. I think that part of the difficulty has to do—and here is where I am perhaps going to disagree a little with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—with the fact that the accent for a long time has been on the necessity of making sure that our air industry is given all the help it could get so that it could grow with the growing times and meet the growing needs of the country. However, I do believe there comes a time when you must put the brakes on and remember that the only reason why you are building an efficient air industry is that it might provide better service to the public. I believe we have reached the point across Canada where it is no longer necessary that there be a monopoly.

I will agree that at the outset it might have been necessary to have a monopoly for T.C.A. long enough to get itself established, to learn the business, to acquire the personnel, the airplanes and the facilities to handle the business, and that competition could have been ruinous at an earlier stage. However, there comes a time when sufficient business has been generated, and that by keeping just that level of business any efficient operator should be able to continue to make a profit and to serve the public in the manner in which we should like to see it served. I believe we are beyond that stage now in Canada. We have generated a lot of business. It does seem to me that Trans-Canada Air Lines in its plans of operations continues to build in the belief that it will be forever a monopoly; that it is not planning to meet competition if it ever comes along, but planning to make sure that there shall be no reason why anyone should ever want to permit competition.

I do not believe that competition in itself is good, Mr. Chairman, but I believe that competition is good in the results that sometimes flow from a reasonable amount of it. A monopoly is bad because it does not have anything with which to compare itself. It soon slows down because it loses the incentive that is presented by the original hump. I suggest that in its earlier days T.C.A. was more dedicated, harder working and had more determined people working for it when it had to struggle just to get its feet under it. I suggest that the same thing applies not just to T.C.A. but to any other monopoly in the world. Once the incentive is gone, once you have got over the hump, so to speak, once you feel a certain amount of success and can see no competition, it is only human to slow down a little bit and I suggest that this has happened in Canada.

There is no reason that I can see why the increase in air traffic on domestic routes and on the trans-Canada routes should not be open to competition. From speaking to Canadian Pacific Air Lines personnel I understand they would be content if they would be allowed to compete for the increase. To me, Mr. Chairman, this seems to answer the objections of my friends, such as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who are in favour of a monopoly. They have that amount of business which must have justified the monopoly at the start and they can keep it, but if they want to continue to grow, then they must continue to grow in the face of competition that will keep them on their toes, and I suggest that the people of Canada will be better off because of it. We cannot help but gain. I do not think it threatens the existence or the life of T.C.A., since they will be guaranteed that amount of business that has built them up and has kept them going. If private enterprise wants to come in and fight with them for a share of the increase I think we shall get better service out of it; that T.C.A. will sharpen up its service and that C.P.A. will do likewise, and we shall all be a lot better off. I do not think any of those companies will lose money.

I am a little distressed by the thought that C.P.A. cannot land in the United Kingdom on their polar flights from Edmonton. The flight from Vancouver stops at Edmonton on the flight to Europe but it cannot land in England; it has to land in Amsterdam. Trans-Canada Air Lines have a distinct advantage, and I suggest an unfair one, in that they can pretty well pick and choose where they want to go. They are not subject to the same restrictions as to where they will and will not fly. By its special arrangement and special relationship with the government it merely announces its intention to take on a new route and it starts to fly that route. Since we have given some recognition to the principle of competition by private enterprise, and since we have allowed C.P.A. to compete to a certain extent, I do think in all fairness and common sense the amount of competition which C.P.A. should be able to give should be that amount which would give them substantial feeders into their overseas route so that they will derive some real benefit and shall be able to take away from foreign companies that business which they have the capability to handle.

It is not only just the overseas routes that I am concerned about or even the trans-Canada routes. Edmonton is a city with its eyes to the north. We like to think of ourselves, and have been known for years, as the gateway to the north. We are the suppliers of the north certainly, and the northwest, and all the transportation companies in that part of the country have their headquarters in, or operate through, Edmonton to a certain extent.

In the research committee we recently studied Eldorado, which is a crown corporation having a couple of subsidiaries known as Northern Transportation Company, a water carrier, and Eldorado Aviation, an air carrier. This study was in connection with an application by Pacific Western Airlines to take over the air business of Eldorado Aviation. Pacific Western Airlines operates out of Edmonton on the eastern side of the Rockies mostly, but also has a prairie run, and some out on the coast. It is the main Mackenzie river route carrier.

In the north, as in the rest of Canada, we have the air transport board which decides who shall be allowed to run air carriers, how much competition may be allowed, and so forth. It sets the rates and regulates the business very closely in order that we may have a healthy air industry. I suggest again that a study of our northern transportation problems will show the same serious defects which I say I found in the trans-Canada run.

The air transport board has been and still is, I know, a very dedicated body. They take their duties very seriously. They work very hard at trying to understand the problems of the north and seeing to it that the air industry is kept healthy and strong so that it may be of the most benefit to this country. However, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that dedication to duty itself may be to some extent a little blinding. I suggest they have forgotten the original objective of a healthy air industry that is of service to the country. I think that a close examination of the problems existing in the air industry in the north will show that they have concentrated so much on building a healthy air industry that the prime purpose of service to the north has been somewhat neglected. The concept of competition in the first instance was that in a certain area only so many carriers could operate because there was only so much business. This sort of area monopoly may be necessary to a certain extent and it certainly accomplishes part of what it sets out to do.

But, Mr. Chairman, the needs of transportation in the north have been changing. Types of airplanes and methods of carrying things have been changing so rapidly that I suggest our regional method of coping with these transport problems is now out of date. We are using larger airplanes which, when properly used and kept busy, can reduce the cost of carriage to a very small amount so that we can see the very serious transportation problem in our northern regions being reduced to a considerable extent if we can get full utilization out of these big, modern planes.

Unfortunately we do not have planes following the business. There is no such thing as a ready amount of transportation business so that people can just walk in, buy the airplane they want and start servicing the business. They must, so to speak, dig up uses for the plane. They must start to find a new need for it and find the extra cargo which is going to justify the additional investment of providing a big plane and that will keep it flying to that extent of its usable time that will bring costs down. Only then are we really doing something about the transportation problem.

Here is where the area concept of the air transport board constitutes an obstacle. In order to take full advantage of cargo carrying capacity, the large plane needs more flexibility. It has to be able to fly not just in one little area. Instead of merely flying back and forth between Norman Wells and Edmonton, for instance, it may be found that there is in Yellowknife a product which can economically be carried directly to Montreal from Yellowknife, another product from Montreal to Edmonton and something else from Edmonton to Yellowknife so that the plane is flying a triangle service and is always loaded, which is the way to make money. That is the way they should be operating instead of flying into the north full and coming back empty as aircraft have been operating into the north for years. The area concept will not allow an aircraft operator at the present time to do what I have outlined and I suggested that these matters need to be looked at.

I do not suggest that the problem is a simple one to solve. These areas were set up after much deliberation and I know they are being looked at closely quite frequently by the air transport board. However, I am suggesting that there has always been too much interest in the air industry and not enough interest in service. I should like to give an example to illustrate why I say there is not enough emphasis on service.

In western Canada we have a very active oil industry. I am sure all members have noted with considerable interest the way in which Canadian oil exploration companies and some American ones have responded to the government's urging and the opportunities that there are in the north to drill for oil and to do exploration work all the way up the Mackenzie valley and, in fact, into the Arctic islands. A week or two ago I talked with some shippers interested in the oil industry. I asked if it was possible to get an oil rig into the north country and out again by barge in the same short shipping season, that is, take it in by barge when the river opens, drill a well and bring it out again by barge before freeze-up. One gentleman told me that no oil rig had ever been taken in and brought out in the same year.

An oil drilling rig is a very expensive piece of equipment. The costs of operating it run into thousands of dollars a day taking into account its value, depreciation, regular expenses and so on. To this day there is no airplane in Canada tested by the Department of Transport that is capable of carrying a complete oil rig to a site and out again. I know of one man, and there are others who would like to have the chance, who found that he could fly in a DC-3 equipped with skis or floats to a lake near a well site and unload a small tractor to bulldoze a strip large enough to take a DC-4 or a C-119 with a complete oil rig and all its supplies. This operation was carried out only once in Canada to my knowledge.

The operator of the aircraft told me, and I have some verification from oil companies, that on that one well drilling operation alone he was able to save a quarter of a million dollars for the drilling company. The operation was a quarter of a million dollars cheaper by air because the rig was taken in and brought out within a few months and did not have to be tied up for a whole year. This man was only allowed to do this once and no more. He could not fit into the necessary categories or classes of air service. In other words, the present air carriers whose licences are broad enough and who have a monopoly in that area have not tried to acquire the plane to be able to give this service and the one who did try was found to be breaking the law because he was infringing on their rights and he had to stop.

I had occasion to speak to the air transport board about a man who wanted to get permission to use a C-119 or flying box car with specially powerful engines because of its unique loading property in that the tail opens up. A new light drilling rig has been developed in the United States and it would be possible to put such a drilling rig in this aircraft and fly it to these locations. This man wanted to try it, and here is what actually happened.

On making application to the air transport board for a licence to carry out the service, he was told he would have to make up his mind which sort of licence he wanted to apply for. He was not quite sure what class his service would fall under and the air transport board told him to make up his mind which service he wanted, apply for it and they would then tell him whether he was right or wrong. In view of the need of service in that part of the country, I suggest that surely the air transport board should have put its facilities at the disposal of this man and said to him, "Here is the advice we can give you. This is what will be needed. This is the class we would like to see you operate under, apply under this class." This was not done. They refused to do that. They just said, "You apply and we will tell you whether you qualify".

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he suggesting that the regulations of the air transport board are not flexible enough to promote the advancement of different types of air traffic into the north?

Mr. Nugent: That is just about the sum and substance of my argument.

Not only that, but the board also said to him, "You are a little premature with your application because we do not think you have an aircraft and until you have an aircraft what is the use of applying"? He said, "I am going to use a C-119". They said, "It has not been cleared by the Department of Transport for civilian use in this country and we do not want you to apply for a licence until your aircraft has been cleared for such use".

Thereupon he applied to the engineering division, I believe it is, of the Department of Transport and asked if they would give him a clearance on that airplane. The Department of Transport's reply was that since the testing and qualifying of one of these planes was a very long and costly process they had no wish to go to the trouble of trying to do this until they were sure the man was really going to operate and therefore he should apply to the air transport board and get his licence first. So, we have the Department of Transport saying, you cannot get this plane certified until you get your air transport board licence and the air transport board saying we will not take an application until you get your plane certified. To this day, we do not have the plane certified and we do not have a licence. The oil industry in the west, therefore, does not have the airlift which it needs in order to efficiently carry out exploration. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I have many letters in my files from oil exploration companies showing their interest in this project.

I could point out another possible way in which a more flexible air policy in the north would perhaps save us a little money. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that what is needed to open up the north country is not only much more imagination on the part of the government but more imagination on the part of the many transport carriers so that costs can be reduced. In this way, the north will be opened up much faster. I have had an experienced transportation man tell me that he could see no reason why groceries should ever go into the north in any other way but by airplane. When you consider the difference in cost between water transportation and air transportation, especially when the DC-4 type of plane is used, you find that that difference is more than taken care of by the turnover in the stock and the interest on your money. If you are supplying your merchandise by barge in the north you have to keep more than a year's supply on hand. If you are supplying by aircraft, then you only need about one twelfth of the capital you would otherwise need because you can restock your shelves every month or every two weeks if you so desire. It is this turnover of capital that makes the tremendous difference.

The amazing fact is that the only corporation in the north of which I am aware that has made any searching analysis of costs to ascertain the advantage of air transportation over water or vice versa is a crown corporation, namely Eldorado Aviation. Eldorado has built up its own fleet of air carriers. From what I have seen of it, I believe it is a most efficient organization. The company officials told me that before they would divert any of their freight from water to air, they had to be shown that this was going to save the company money. They could see the advantage in terms of convenience, but convenience also has a dollar sign attached to it. It is only worth so much. The savings on investment and convenience were factors to be considered. The officials said, if it is cheaper to carry by air then we will allow you to carry by air. This is what Eldorado says to its subsidiary company, Eldorado Aviation. As we have seen, Eldorado Aviation has built up to a DC-3 and a DC-4, and they are hauling freight at such a rate the people in Uranium City are very envious.

I was there in January and the storekeepers are quite annoyed at Eldorado Refining because that company is able to sell in their company store much below the costs of the other merchants. The merchants of that town think it unfair that Eldorado should have the advantage of this type of air service, while they have to pay the expensive rates on P.W.A. Of course, I am not suggesting that Eldorado rates are cheaper merely because that organization is more efficient. It is true that P.W.A. runs a different kind of service. They cannot put different planes into operation to suit the requirements, and there is not that degree of co-operation. All I am doing is pointing out an example to the committee of the fact that, given a little more flexibility and a little more imagination, along with the development of larger planes for specific purposes, it is possible to provide much better service at lower cost for the people of the north country. This is what is needed in the north.

If I may come back to my starting point, I would say that I find too much attention has been paid to the welfare of the air industry. We had to pay a lot of attention to the welfare of that industry in order to get it going because the air industry could provide the kind of service we wanted. However, I suggest that we have, in part, lost sight of that original objective, providing good service. Now, more than ever, we need to provide service in the north. We need more flexibility and we need to take a new look at how we are going to allow our air services to operate in the north. I think, perhaps, the same could be said of the water services too.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Before the hon. member resumes his seat, would he permit another question? He referred in his remarks to the government having enough imagination and to the people handling air transport in the north not having enough imagination. I wonder if the hon. member meant that the air transport board did not have enough imagination?

Mr. Nugent: I would suggest that the air transport board is very dedicated to doing a job. I would say their initial problem was to make sure we got a healthy air industry going in the north to supply this air transport. I believe the board lost track of the reason for our desire for a healthy air industry. They now approach the problem first in the light of how it is going to affect the air industry whereas they should really look at the north and say, what does the north need. They would find that in this roundabout way they would accomplish more for the air industry than by this method of relegating all other considerations to the background in favour of this approach of helping a particular air carrier establish in this area.

Mr. Pugh: I should like to direct my remarks to two main points. The first point I want to consider is the bridge subsidy with regard to freight rates in Ontario. In 1957 the fruit and vegetable industry in my area, particularly the mountain area of British Columbia, had four main problems. This government has acted to assist in solving three of these problems by means of legislation and other means. The one remaining point that needs attention is the freight rates in so far as they affect our shipments out of the mountain area to the rest of British Columbia and the prairie provinces.

Actually what we are up against is a fairly high freight rate brought about by the fact that fruits and vegetables are not carried at the cheapest rate. The point I wish to make relates to the competition from Ontario and Quebec producers of fruits, vegetables and canned goods. The bridge subsidy, at its inception, may well have been the answer in helping Ontario and Quebec producers compete on the prairie provinces against goods from the United States. The result has been, however, heavy competition with the producers of British Columbia. In my opinion whoever looks after the bridge subsidy and freight rates should take into consideration the fact that if the bridge subsidy is necessary then there should be aid given to the British Columbia fruit and vegetable growers situated in the mountain areas in order that they may ship to these markets.

Incidentally, I may say that as far as fruit is concerned one way in which we have overcome this freight differential is by producing a quality product. But you cannot go on getting better and better fruit all the time.

The second point I wish to make follows along the lines of the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona who has just taken his seat. I only wish to touch one phase of his remarks, and that is in regard to C.P.A.

I think the hon. member stated the question well. He is not too worried about the flights outside of our country, but he is certainly worried about the transcontinental route. At the present time C.P.A. flies one service east and one west per day. They have one transcontinental flight per day and they have been operating this for two years.

I would ask the minister to have a long look at any application which is now made by C.P.A. to increase the frequency of their transcontinental runs, because I think that quite apart from all the things that have been mentioned today there is good reason for this increase.

I do not want to delve too much into history, but the history of Canada is bound up with the C.P.R. The C.P.R. originally linked Canada together; it was an important factor in that regard. As the C.P.R. has grown it has developed the greatest travel system in the world. If you examine it you will find they operate steamships, railways, hotels and trucking services. They have also been a great factor in land development in western Canada.

They have gone into air transport extensively over the years. They have a reputation which is pretty hard to beat as an intercontinental air line. That reputation is based on service. Service is one thing they have given to Canada in all facets of their passenger travel services and the transport of goods.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. gentleman speaking of T.C.A.?

Mr. Pugh: Has the hon. gentleman asked a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Pugh: What is the question?

Mr. Pickersgill: I said, "Is the hon. gentleman speaking of T.C.A.?"

Mr. Pugh: No, I am speaking of C.P.A. I have no bone to pick with T.C.A., I may say, and if the hon. gentleman had been here and had listened to the last speaker in regard to C.P.A., I have stated that I am merely endorsing his remarks; that I am in complete accord with them.

To go on with my point, Mr. Chairman, C.P.R.'s growth and the position it has taken in Canada—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pugh: My hon. friend laughs at the C.P.R. perhaps, but during the last war no one laughed at the rail services they provided for Canada. During the last war no one laughed at the steamship services they provided throughout the world for carrying troops of all nations. This company has a tradition, and a Canadian tradition.

I feel, as did the last speaker, that monopoly should only be allowed to go only so far; that there is a place for private enterprise in our transcontinental air service. I feel, and I feel it strongly—and I say this apart from all the points mentioned by the last speaker—that there is a necessity for increased air transport in this world. We are not static in any way. The trend is to air travel and air transport of all sorts and descriptions.

I should like to lend my aid, if it is necessary, to the furthering of any application by C.P.A. As the world goes along we may yet see another conflict. At that time transport will be a most important item, and transport by air will be an absolute necessity.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if I could interrupt this lobby on behalf of C.P.R. there are one or two things I should like to discuss—

Mr. Broome: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. member really means that. We are really speaking in regard to problems in our own areas. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary is talking about things which he understands and the hon. member should give him credit for stating the case as he sees it.

This is not a lobby; it is simply trying to bring common sense into this matter.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know whether my hon. friend rose to discuss a point of order or a question of privilege, but I see neither, Mr. Chairman. I have nothing to withdraw from what I said. I made the statement for two reasons. First because I felt the committee was rather quiet and should be awakened and because I thought there was no better way in which to awaken it than by saying I should like to talk about something other than the lobby on behalf of C.P.R. I hope the committee will not take that remark in any derogatory sense; it was not meant in that sense at all.

I also rose because I was informed, not by any official source, of course, because I could not obtain this information officially, that there were only 19 other speakers on the list, so rather than sit here listening I thought perhaps I could take 10 or 15 minutes to discuss these points which I have before me.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Apparently, Mr. Chairman, that is not relished too much, but be that as it may. One of these statements has to do with a question I put to the Prime Minister recently and I should like to direct the attention of the minister to it. It arises out of an editorial that appeared in the Financial Post entitled "Stacked against the customer".

This editorial goes on to say that following the Warsaw convention it has now been determined, through a lawsuit in the United States, that the carrier's liability in an international flight is limited to $8,300. I am sure there are few people who fly on international flights who are aware of this fact. The editorial says:

> It was brought to public notice by a recent U.S. case. William Kapell, a famed American musician aged 31 and at the peak of his high earning power, was killed when a Honolulu to San Francisco plane crashed. His widow sued for $1,150,000 but got only the Warsaw maximum.

Damages higher than $8,300 may be obtained, under the treaty, only if "wilful misconduct" can be proved.

I need not tell any hon. member who is a lawyer that in order to prove wilful misconduct in an airplane crash, when little or nothing is left, or with even the few material remnants that are left, it becomes almost impossible to establish such a claim.

In the circumstances there was an attempt to double the liability in 1955 when a protocol was signed at the Hague. I am informed that 30 countries must ratify the Hague protocol before it becomes effective, and up until now only 19, not including Canada, have done so.

I would ask the minister, his officers, and also the Secretary of State for External Affairs to give this matter more than ordinary consideration. It is true that the protocol was signed in 1955 when we were still in office, and regarding what was done during the two years 1955 to 1957 I have only a general idea because of what I was told; I was not a member of the government in those days. However, that is not the point.

I am sure the minister will immediately agree, as will every hon. member of this committee, that it is important to, if not double the liability, then increase it substantially. It would seem to me this is a matter to which Canada should be giving serious consideration. There may be reasons for withholding consent but at least I would ask the minister to give the matter careful consideration.

Mr. Nugent: Would the hon. member permit a question? Could he indicate what he thinks would be the best figure. I realize he has suggested doubling it. Is that the figure he would suggest?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I think it should be much higher.

Mr. Nugent: Can the hon. member suggest a figure?

Mr. Chevrier: No. I think the first thing to do is to approve the protocol signed at the Hague, then either through the Canadian delegation to I.C.A.O. or on some other international level give consideration to the whole problem, and since I.C.A.O. sits almost continually at our headquarters building in Montreal where we are represented it seems to me there is the place where consideration might be given to a matter of this kind. This is a technical matter. It is a matter upon which I do not attempt to give any advice. I think the advice must come from the experts, but until we have some more definite information I think we should aim at the protocol. There is perhaps something more definite and if it were to come from the delegation I am sure the minister and the government would want to give it every consideration.

There is another question and that is the situation of the pilots on the St. Lawrence. I will take a moment to deal with that. While I refer to the pilots in the main along the whole route, more particularly in the international section, as the minister knows there are some seven groups of pilots under his jurisdiction, four groups totalling about 200 whose territories cover purely Canadian waters, the Quebec district from Quebec to tidewater; the Montreal district from Montreal to Quebec; the Montreal harbour, and the Cornwall district from Cornwall to Montreal.

There are on the other hand three other groups totalling about 92 men whose territory covers international waters. There are three international pilotage districts, district No. 1, from Cornwall to Kingston; district No. 2, the Welland canal and waters connecting lakes Erie and Huron and district No. 3, waters connecting lakes Huron and Superior. As the minister knows, his predecessor brought a bill to the House of Commons two years ago, which was not withdrawn from the house but which remained on the order paper until an agreement could be reached with the United States concerning pilotage matters in the international section. It took some time before agreement was reached, but finally there was an agreement and the minister brought the agreement before the house and it was approved. The point I raise now is this: how are the terms of this agreement working out? I know there have been some difficulties. I know that in the international section the Canadian pilots have claimed that once a United States pilot got through the international section he should not take a ship down as far as Montreal. On the other hand, United States pilots have argued they can go right through.

I am not affirming any position at the moment because I know what was in the mind of the minister at the time. I think I remember what the minister said in the house. I believe the present minister should tell the committee what is happening and bring us up to date as to the working of this arrangement made between Canada and the United States in these three international districts. It is on May 1 that the so-called pilotage section, part IV of the act to amend the Canada Shipping Act came into force. That is the measure which took about two years to negotiate between our two countries. Part IV, the pilotage section, applies I believe to international waters. There is also the question of fees that arises and I am not going to deal with that but I think perhaps the minister could give the committee a report on the operation and working of that section of the Canada Shipping Act concerning pilots in the international section.

I deal now with another matter having to do with Trans-Canada Air Lines. The minister will remember that following a change-over from the former aircraft used by T.C.A. to the new jet liners 104 pilots were put out of work or at least 104 were affected by the changeover. It was indicated at the time that most of these would find employment either in Canada or in Aer Lingus or at the service of K.L.M. The last time I spoke in this chamber on this subject it appeared that the number of pilots who had found employment was in the neighbourhood of 45. I hope the position is better today than it was at that time and I trust the minister will want to bring us up to date. I hope it will be possible to say as was announced at the time, that every one of these pilots has found employment with some other air line at comparable salaries.

There is a question which I asked about the Vanguard jet-prop aircraft in the house when I inquired of the minister whether three men were going to be required in the cockpit as compared with three in a similar aircraft in the United States. I find that part of my statement was in error and I tell the hon. member for Vancouver South that he was correct in the statement he made at the time.

Mr. Nugent: Very accurate. Very careful.

Mr. Chevrier: No, the hon. member is not always too careful. He is not, because he made a number of statements on the question of the C.N.R. directors concerning which I have no right to talk now which I found were not accurate but that is not the point. I have no hesitation in admitting I was in error, but here is the point. What I should have said was that the federal aviation agency in Washington had ruled that all airplanes weighing more than 80,000 pounds must carry a three man crew on the flight deck. The Vanguard weighs 140,000 pounds. In Canada the officers of the Department of Transport have accepted the complexity of flying an aircraft rather than weight as its deciding factor but there was some difficulty arising out of the decision in Canada as compared with the ruling in the United States which may cause some problems for T.C.A. planes. The whole question is, of course, one of air safety, one of the safety of air navigation, and I presume the Department of Transport has given consideration to that but if there is going to be difficulty between the two countries I am sure it will be necessary for the officials to reconsider their position. I think perhaps the minister might want to say a word in connection with that matter.

Finally, I should like to say a word about another matter to which I think the Minister of Transport should direct his attention. It concerns the Canadian institute of communications.

I note in the estimates, in one of the items, a matter which deals with membership in international organizations wherein the department makes a small contribution for membership in those associations. I should like to invite the minister and his departmental officials to give consideration to the membership, by a grant in aid of the Canadian institute of communications.

One might well ask what this institute is, and I should perhaps say it is an international body set up by federal charter, incorporated on December 18, 1959, to promote communications research and education in Canada. At present it has a provisory board of directors, resident in the cities of Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. The board of directors are in part as follows: the chairman, Mr. Walter B. Herbert, director, Canada foundation, Ottawa; vice-chairman, Mr. R. J. McCleave, M.P., dean of the school of journalism, Halifax; treasurer, Mr. Paul Gormley, director of public relations, Canadian highway safety council, Ottawa; and the hon. secretary is Rev. John W. Mole, O.M.I., University of Ottawa. The object of this institute of communications has to do with research and educational work in Canada.

Incidentally, I assured the senior hon. member for Halifax that I did not intend to refer to this matter this afternoon, and I immediately apologize to him for doing so. The only reason I do in his absence is because there were so many speakers on the other side of the house and so few on this side, because we have made our contribution in the debate, I felt perhaps this was an opportune time to do so. I intended to do so in any event in respect of item 404, but I will save the time of the committee by doing so now.

I was about to say that the Canadian institute of communications was formed in response to the initiative of UNESCO which set up the international association for mass communication research at Paris. The IAMCR wishes to work through national councils in each country. The object of such a national council in Canada, therefore, would be to help the movement of communications research and education in this country to derive benefit from, and contribute to, the world-wide effort in this domain.

It is proposed to set up a permanent body later on composed of 40 persons, which would be divided as follows: 8 for the Atlantic provinces, 8 for Quebec, 8 for Ontario, 12 for the prairie provinces and 4 for British Columbia.

That is all I wish to say about this institute of communications, which appears to me to have not only an excellent objective to perform, but can be of tremendous assistance in this field of research and communications education. I should like to simply ask the minister, in conclusion, to give consideration to a grant in aid of this institute, because there are in his department, as he will see, many groups and associations of this kind, all of which I am sure are meritorious, but this one, too, deserves consideration, and the amount which would be required to assist it in the excellent work which it is performing, is small in comparison with what is provided in other fields.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Broome: Would the hon. member not agree with the Department of Transport, that the complexity of an airplane is a much better and more accurate yardstick by which to judge the number of personnel required than the one he has suggested? Second, did I interpret him correctly when he said we would be forced to adopt United States regulations if we were to fly into United States ports?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has a habit of misinterpreting and misunderstanding me when I speak. I am sure that it is not done voluntarily to the slightest degree. I did not make the statement contained in his second question. I did say, however, that it might well lead to serious complications between the two countries if, for instance, the Canadian Air Line Pilots' Association, and some similar body in the United States, might both feel it would be difficult for T.C.A. to fly its planes to United States soil because of regulations which were different than those which were established by Canada, and we would then be in serious trouble. That is the type of trouble I am sure should be avoided now.

As to the first question the hon. gentleman asked, I need hardly tell him that I usually have the greatest confidence in the officials of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Broome: And in the minister?

Mr. Chevrier: And in the minister as well, if that will please him. I have a great deal of respect and admiration for the present minister, as I have had for every minister of transport since I held the portfolio myself. I brought this matter to his attention so that he could give it the consideration which I think it deserves.

Mr. Hanbidge: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I may be allowed to ask the hon. member a question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. Chevrier: Certainly.

Mr. Hanbidge: The hon. member has mentioned the Warsaw protocol, and I should like to know whether the case he cited referred to an action for negligence against the air line company rather than an action for damages against the insurance company.

Mr. Chevrier: I think it is the latter.

Mr. Hanbidge: You mean an action against the insurance company?

Mr. Chevrier: My recollection is that the damages for $8,300, were paid by the insurance company. I do not see reference to this in the editorial, but I am of the impression that the insurance company, under a subrogation clause contained in the contract, instituted proceedings against the air lines.

Mr. Hanbidge: It would not be of much use to take out an insurance policy for $100,000, would it?

Mr. Balcer: That is a different thing involving a contract between two persons.

Mr. Chevrier: I think there is another point involved which arises, because it depends on where the individual is going. This is a case affecting an international flight, wherein the Warsaw convention, and not protocol, was brought in as a defence in United States courts, and was successful in that not more than $8,300 should be paid the plaintiff.

Mr. Keays: At the outset of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I should like, on behalf of my constituents, to commend the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and to tell him how proud we are of his appointment to the post of Minister of Transport. He deserves our heartiest congratulations for the efficient manner in which he heads his department.

(Text):

The policies of certain branches of the Department of Transport deeply affect my constituents who are, and I think justly so, very interested in any action taken by the government in so far as it affects their transportation problems, especially those of the sea.

This island gem sits in the centre of the gulf of St. Lawrence, and has faced transportation problems for many years.

Some 50 years ago the first mode of transportation from the island to the mainland was the launching of a cask in which was placed a letter addressed to the postmaster general of Canada informing him of the immediate need for steamship connections between the mainland and the islands. This letter also requested that if they could not send the answer by boat to send it back in the same cask. If I am forced to speak about those problems today it is because of an article appearing in La Presse of Montreal some three days ago, which is entitled:

Quebec approaches Ottawa—Answer being sought to the problem of the Magdalen islands.

(Text):

The minister of transport and communications of the province of Quebec was telling the Quebec legislature that he was coming to Ottawa to solve the water transportation problems of the people of my constituency. I had never intended to tell this house about the problem and what this government has done toward a partial solution of this water transportation difficulty. During the fiscal year 1960-61 the federal government contributed to Clarke Steamship, which operated a passenger-freight service between Montreal, Quebec, Gaspe and the Magdalen islands, a subsidy in the amount of $259,077. The provincial government contributed $64,700 as a subsidy to this transportation company. In the same year the federal government paid to the Magdalen Islands Transportation Company, operating from Pictou to the island as well as Charlottetown to the island, a subsidy in the amount of $174,000 and in the same year to C.T.M.A., operating from the Magdalen islands an amount of $6,667 for service between Cheticamp and Halifax. Clarke Steamship withdrew their services from Montreal to Quebec to the islands because of the decision of the Canadian maritime commission that no more subsidy should be paid owing to the fact that there were alternative, better or cheaper, means of transportation. The Magdalen Island Transportation Company also withdrew their boat plying between Pictou and the island because of its age, and the C.T.M.A. existing service in that area has plied between Cheticamp and Halifax for many years. The people of those islands have been requesting better transportation to and from the islands from various governments. As the committee will readily realize, there are only two possibilities, transportation either by air or by sea. The people requested more frequent trips between the islands and different ports in the maritime provinces, and also a better boat to carry cars to and from the island.

Over a number of years many petitions were sent to different governments and this year this government acceded to the request by inviting different transportation companies to tender on the service between Pictou and the islands, Charlottetown and the islands, Souris and the islands. Clarke Steamships were the lowest tenderers and received permission to do this work and also a subsidy of $298,000.

This has been a great improvement in so far as transportation to the island is concerned, Mr. Chairman, because it permits the transportation of passengers and freight as well as making it possible to bring fresh meat to the island owing to the existence of refrigeration on the ship North Gaspe. Instead of having two trips per week they now have three, and during the months of July, August and possibly September, four trips from the mainland to the islands. Let me assure you, Mr. Chairman, this is appreciated by the people of the islands and it gives them an opportunity to get out during the fine season of the year or to have their relatives visit them during the same season.

However, there are other problems which arise when you wish to have more frequent trips. One of these problems has been the elimination of the stop at Grande Entrée on the east end of the island. I do hope that eventually this problem will be solved and that the government's wish to improve greatly the service will be realized and that, if requested, a study will be made of the possibility of operating a roll-on roll-off boat service to the Magdalen islands. When this happens I hope that many of the water transportation problems will be solved.

Apart from the subsidy of $298,000 granted to the Clarke Steamship Company, there is also another service which has been subsidized, namely the one operating between the Magdalen islands and Halifax passing through Cheticamp, Nova Scotia. The C.T.M.A. have received a subsidy of $30,000 to operate this service. They have also received a subsidy of $30,000 to operate a service between Isle Madame, Guysborough and Canso, Nova Scotia. At the moment this is strictly a freight service, but I am sure that with the new policy enunciated by the Minister of Transport recently concerning subsidies toward the construction of ships that the people who operate this service will take advantage of these grants to build other ships to give bigger and better service to those islands so far off the shores of the mainland.

There has also been another subsidy granted, and that was for a service in the gulf. The federal contribution to this service is roughly $42,500. Another subsidy is also being promised to another service between Montreal, Gaspe and the gulf. Naturally this subsidy is conditional upon the province paying an equal or larger amount.

The geographical position of the Magdalen islands forces the people there to bring in much of their merchandise from maritime ports. However, in turn the maritime provinces take fish products from our islands. You will realize, therefore, that the federal government has made a very large contribution toward the solution of the water transportation problems in my constituency.

The only other problem that seems to be of any concern is the transportation of passengers from the cities of Montreal and Quebec to the islands. I believe this can be accomplished much better by improving the air service to the islands. Unfortunately the provincial government thought it right to cancel the subsidy previously granted to a local air transportation firm operating out of Gaspe, namely, Trans-Gaspesian Air Lines, and as a result of this action the air line will eventually be forced out of business. The people of the Magdalen islands are eager to maintain their relations with the people of the province of Quebec generally and are able to travel by this air line between the mainland of Quebec and the islands. If the government of the province of Quebec is deeply concerned about the passenger transportation problem and if the minister of transport and communications of the province of Quebec is going to come to Ottawa for additional subsidies to carry merchandise to the islands, I suggest to the Minister of Transport that possibly he should go to Quebec and ask his counterpart in the provincial legislature to contribute something toward the transportation of people to the islands.

While the article in question is not in a sense derogatory so far as the federal government is concerned, I note that there is an impression that the federal government has not done anything with regard to the transportation problems I have mentioned. Let me point out, Mr. Chairman, that during the year 1960-61 the federal government contributed by way of subsidies directly affecting the islands an amount of $439,744 while the provincial contribution was $104,700. During the year 1961-62 to date the federal government has contributed $420,500 but now no grant is given by the provincial government. I believe the provincial government should also contribute to the bettering of the transportation services between the islands and the mainland.

It may also be interesting to note that to date the federal government has contributed to the province of Quebec a total of $821,123 in subsidies. I will admit that the province is always looking for more but I believe the federal government has made a very worthwhile contribution.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is the total figure he gave of $821,123 on a yearly basis?

Mr. Keays: It is on a yearly basis. Before resuming my seat I should like to commend the officers of the Canadian maritime comission who have the tremendous task of deciding exactly what amount of subsidy shall be recommended for any petitioner. All hon. members will know that the subsidies are based on the difference between revenue and the operation, depreciation and administration costs of the ship in question. I think that this year the federal government has done a remarkable job in that the Minister of Transport has saved the federal treasury an amount of approximately $60,000 while at the same time providing these people with better transportation facilities. Examples such as this are common with this government and I hope they will continue to be.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, since the time this afternoon is obviously going to be used up anyway, there seems to be a good deal of reason for having some of it used by the opposition. I have some things I wish to say and I will dispense with congratulations to the minister. I might make a suggestion to the minister through you, Mr. Chairman. Possibly he might ask all his colleagues to have their congratulations simply printed in Hansard without being delivered in the house because I am sure we could save at least a day in the session this year.

Mr. McGrath: You should do likewise with your congratulations of yourself.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member says that any congratulations I make of myself might be omitted. They will be. I noticed the interest that the hon. member for St. John's East showed in the subsidies that the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine pointed out were being paid annually to the various services in the province of Quebec. I am sure what was going through the hon. member's mind was what went through my mind at that moment, namely, what an extraordinary long time it has taken the treasury board to complete consideration of the proposal for an east coast ferry that was before treasury board in August of 1959 during the course of the provincial election in Newfoundland.

At that time, as the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for St. John's West will no doubt both recall, the then leader of the Conservative party in Newfoundland made a public statement to which I wish to refer. I am not sure whether he is still leader of the Conservative party. He is not in the legislature and I do not think they have bothered to choose a leader since. In any event, when Mr. Hollett was the leader he made the public statement—

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member permit me to interject to keep the record straight?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not so sure I would not rather have the interjection without the extra phrase because I do not think it will keep the record straight.

Mr. McGrath: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I referred at length to the east coast ferry in my remarks yesterday, I believe, during this debate. My main reason for interjecting at this point is to deal with the hon. member's reference to the previous leader of the Conservative party in Newfoundland. He was in fact the house leader and we have a house leader of the party right now in Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, I was quite correct that there is no leader of the Conservative party in Newfoundland at all. That is what I suspected.

Mr. McGrath: On the contrary.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is too confusing for me, sir, and no doubt that is why it is so confusing for the electors of Newfoundland. Whether they have a leader or whether they have not a leader seems to make very little difference. This, I realize, has nothing to do with the minister's estimates. What has to do with the minister's estimates is that this very estimable gentleman, Mr. Hollett, who was in the last legislature but is not in this one, gave a solemn assurance to the people of Newfoundland that, at the very moment, the treasury board was giving consideration—that was two years ago—to a proposal for an east coast ferry. So far as we know, the east coast ferry is a lot farther from the treasury board now than it was then. I am just wondering if there is any real project for an east coast ferry or if the government intends to wait until after the final decision has been made about the dissolution of this parliament to give us another promise for another election.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member should ask his colleague how long it took to get the Carson on the go.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know how long it took to get the Carson on the go. I know some of the reasons why it took so long to get the Carson on the go. As the hon. gentleman knows full well, there is nothing on the drawing boards or anywhere else in respect of this east coast ferry. There is still argument as to whether or not one will be built at all. I have no doubt that every time the question gets anywhere near the Minister of Finance he turns thumbs down on it. I have no doubt, sir, that as has happened with so many other projects, the only time we will hear anything that appears to be definite about this project will be about the time of dissolution of this parliament. Even then, it will be pretty "iffy", as most of these promises are.

However, the point about which I rose to speak was something quite different. I merely referred to this because, like the hon. member for St. John's East, I was rather struck by the disparity between the wonderful treatment given to the Magdalen islands, according to the member.

Mr. Keays: We have not got a good air service.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know the hon. gentleman wants still more. At the present time, the government seems more concerned about improving the service between the Magdalen islands and Prince Edward Island than it is about giving that air service to the Magdalen islands the hon. member asks for. Perhaps if the hon. member would resign his seat and cause a by-election, he could get that air service for the Magdalen islands. Perhaps he would not think that too great a sacrifice to make. He could emulate his colleague the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, who is reputedly getting an airport for his constituency, although nobody knows where that airport will be built. I suspect nothing more will be heard about it after May 29.

Mr. Drysdale: To whom is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Pickersgill: I was referring to that gentleman to whom the Prime Minister always referred as "my friend Charlie, who is so badly needed in this house".

Mr. Drysdale: The hon. member has been talking so much about resigning that I thought perhaps he was thinking of resigning.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I rose to speak about, sir, was the service given in Newfoundland by Canadian National Telegraphs. Under the terms of union, the telegraph and telephone services, which were operated by the department of posts, telephones and telegraphs of Newfoundland, were taken over as a federal service by the federal government. The telephone services, apart from those telephone services that were provided by the Avalon Telephone Company and one or two other companies, were taken over by Canadian National Telegraphs. I know there has been some criticism of Canadian National Telegraphs and I have, at times, criticized them myself, even when I was in office. However, I do want to say here that I think this organization has made a tremendous effort—on the whole a successful effort—to improve service in Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Since we came into office.

Mr. Pickersgill: Ever since 1949. I have noticed no difference whatever, for the better or worse, since the hon. gentlemen came into office. I assume that hon. gentlemen opposite treat the Canadian National Telegraphs in the same way as their predecessors did, that is there is no political interference. I assume that, and I hope my assumption is correct.

Mr. McGrath: You should know it is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know it is correct because obviously the hon. member for St. John's West, the Solicitor General, was trying to imply it was not correct and there was some political interference. He was implying this government had done something about it that had not been done by the previous government.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am interjecting to say that I think the hon. member has no cause to complain against Canadian National Telegraphs. They are doing a good job in his district.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are doing a good job all over Newfoundland, and that is exactly what I was saying. There seems to be no quarrel between the hon. gentleman and me, except possibly in semantics and, perhaps, that is an obstacle to communications. As the hon. gentleman knows, there are much more serious obstacles to communications in Newfoundland than semantics. There are tremendous practical difficulties in the building up of communications in Newfoundland.

When I say that I am not complaining about Canadian National Telegraphs but on the contrary I am commending them for the tremendous improvements that have been made since 1949, both in telegraph and telephone service I am rising to make a suggestion to the minister. I know that we on this side are accused by the government of making no practical suggestions. I have a highly practical suggestion to make to the government, and it is this. As a part of next winter's winter works program, the government should undertake a real blitz in Newfoundland to expand telegraph and telephone service, especially telephone service. The only reason they are not expanded faster is that Canadian National Telegraphs have a certain budget each year; that is the only reason.

Now, eight or nine years after confederation, when everybody knows that because of Korea and other things, there was a tremendous shortage of electronic and telephone equipment and it was very hard to get. This is not the case today. There is no lack of any of the things that are necessary to modernize the telephone and telegraph services except money. There is labour there. There is timber in Newfoundland, and there are the plants on the mainland which make the wire and the instruments. Everything that is needed is available in this country, and the lack is enough money. I believe the Canadian National Telegraphs, like the Canadian National Railways system, is supposed to be run as a business enterprise. I approve of that. They should be run as business enterprises, and if possible they should pay. However, the Canadian National Telegraphs cannot be expected to bear the burden of any additional costs which would be incurred by putting on a real push.

What I am going to suggest to the government is this. The government, as a winter works program, could pay half the labour cost of all the additional work that the Canadian National Telegraphs could do in order to modernize in all parts of Newfoundland, just as if the Canadian National Telegraphs were a municipality. In that way they could keep down their costs. The government could also provide an additional budget for next year as part of this program to stimulate employment, and they could get on with this job a great deal faster than has been possible with the limited budget up until now.

If this were done, two things could very well be undertaken in the wintertime as well or better than at any other time. One would be to get out the poles. It would be far better to do that in the wintertime, but you cannot get out the poles unless you know for sure they are going to be used next year to open up the lines. Also the stretching of the lines could be done just as well in the winter as any other time.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, does the hon. member seriously mean that?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I do seriously mean that, and this is a subject about which I am reasonably well informed.

Mr. Balcer: The hon. member is endorsing our winter works program.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, but I am suggesting a winter works program that would really work.

Mr. Balcer: It would be on the same principle as our program.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am suggesting—

Mr. Balcer: I think the hon. member is right; it was a great success.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I really cannot object very much to the minister interrupting me occasionally because I myself have been known to interrupt once or twice in the house. But of course I did not say anything of the kind.

An hon. Member: You never do.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have said, and I say again, that the winter works program is inadequate, but I have never condemned the winter works program in itself; I have merely said it is inadequate. I am trying to suggest to the minister one way in which he should give his colleagues, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Finance—he is the real obstacle, as we all know—a real push and make the winter works program much more adequate than it now is.

The difficulty we have in Newfoundland—and it is greater than in any other province, as hon. members from Newfoundland know—is that there are very few organized municipalities. In Newfoundland there are not the means of providing work in the areas where it is most needed. I refer to the outports of Newfoundland. There are not, in most cases, the means of having these shared programs with the municipalities.

However, there is in the C.N.T. an organization which urgently needs to be modernized; they urgently need this modernization speeded up. They are well capable of directing this activity; they have very competent officers. This would give them no difficulty. I wager that if they were told now, not next fall, that their budget was going to be doubled—it is no use telling them next October—they would get ready and obtain the men and contractors to do this job.

They could have the men organized to get the poles out and get the whole thing planned so that this job could be done on a much larger scale than has been the case in the past. It would cut down the drain on the unemployment insurance fund and relief; it would give useful work to a great many men during the fall, winter and spring, and it would provide a service which pays when it is provided in most parts of Newfoundland. It is not as though this service were losing money. Most of the C.N.T. service in Newfoundland is a paying proposition. I will admit that there are a few lines into a few remote places which do not pay, but most of them do.

Therefore this would not be wasting money, as we have to waste it now on relief and get no return for it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Solicitor General does not agree.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not care very much whether or not the Solicitor General agrees. I am dealing with facts, facts that are very well known to those of us with experience of the outports of Newfoundland.

Mr. Charlton: Do you not have snow and frost there in the wintertime?

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course there is snow and frost there, but as the hon. gentlemen must know—it has been true in the history of Canada for 300 years—men have gone out into the woods in the wintertime to cut timber. There is nothing new about that; and that is one of the biggest parts of this proposal for speed up and expansion of the C.N.T. capital program.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate must have misunderstood me. I was referring to building lines in the wintertime. I suggest that the hon. member's province has some snow and frost and it may be difficult.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): One always has snow and frost in the winter.

Mr. Pickersgill: One does not always have snow and frost in the winter, notwithstanding what my colleague, the hon. member for Essex East, has said. Three winters ago, when we had a premature election foisted upon the people of this country, there was no frost and snow in Newfoundland until after the end of March. Hon. gentlemen know that well and thank heaven there was not, because it would have made it impossible for them to have carried out their campaign. There are often open winters of that kind in Newfoundland.

However, the fact that the ground is frozen is not at all an obstacle to the building of a line. It is very frequently much more difficult in the springtime, when the roads are soft and when the bogs are wet, to do these things than it is in the wintertime.

The fact of the matter is, as I have just been reminded by my colleague from Laurier, that a radar line was built in Newfoundland in the wintertime not so very long ago. A great deal of construction goes on now all over this country in the wintertime.

I say that if the government, through this winter works program, would make a contribution to the labour costs, and if they would increase or, say, double the budget of the C.N.T. and really get on with this job, it would be a contribution to the economy of Newfoundland and would reduce the number of unemployed next winter. Also, it would be a largely self-liquidating project.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. McGrath: Why did not my hon. friend's party undertake this program when they were in office from 1949 to 1957?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have already answered that question, but I will be delighted to answer it again for the benefit of the hon. gentleman, who apparently was not following very carefully.

In that period there were two very good reasons why this was not done. Up until about two years before the former government went out of office there was a shortage of electronic equipment and other equipment of that sort. I know this very well because I was pressing the C.N.T. all through this time to modernize, and they could not do it because they could not get the equipment.

But this has not been true since about 1955 or 1956. However, as everybody knows, in the years 1955 and 1956 there was no serious problem of unemployment, even in the winters of 1955-6 and 1956-7.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, that is why there was no—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the statistics have been put on the record often enough that if the hon. gentlemen could learn, they would have learned that fact long ago. This is precisely why the people of this country are so fed up with Her Majesty's present advisers. We did not have winter works programs, because they were not needed. I hope I have answered the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. MacEwan: Would the hon. member say whether he has any old lumber on his own property in Newfoundland that he would offer for use as telephone poles?

Mr. Pickersgill: I regret to have to say that although I own a house in Newfoundland, I do not own the land on which the house is situated; it is merely leased. So there would be no way, that I can see, in which I could possibly profit by this program except as a Canadian citizen.

Mr. McLennan: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will allow me, I should just like to say one word of congratulation to the minister on the fine work he has done in introducing the shipbuilding program. This will be very beneficial to the west coast of Canada. I am sure the minister is doing an exceptionally good job in the position he is now occupying. That is perhaps worrying the opposition a little bit, but I am sure the minister will be there a long time and as time goes on his stature will increase. I wish him all the luck in the world in his new position.

In British Columbia we have quite a sizeable river, the Fraser, which I think is as important to the province of British Columbia and the west coast of Canada as the St. Lawrence is to the east coast. Undoubtedly, in the last number of years, many years as a matter of fact, I do not think it has ever been recognized as being of the importance that it has, and has never had the same consideration as has been given to the ports of eastern Canada. However, I think this government, from what they have told me, have recognized its importance and are going to see it gets a square deal. It is undoubtedly the largest fresh water all year round port in North America and possibly one of the best fresh water and year round ports in the entire world.

In the last calendar year the port of Westminster—actually it is called New Westminster—which is the home port of the Fraser river, has had close to 600 deep-sea ships and with a little bit of development it could triple its importance; and now with the great work that the Minister of Agriculture is doing in selling wheat to the Orient, with a little further development the Fraser river could become the Liverpool of North America.

There are some 70 miles of deep-sea shipping facilities on both sides of the river. That would make approximately 140 miles of potential docks and in the municipalities of the delta, Richmond, Surrey, New Westminster, Coquitlam, Langley and possibly Maple Ridge, there are thousands of acres bordering the river which are ideally suited for industrial plants. I am sure the municipalities there are willing to co-operate with the government in the development of the river and the development of this land. True, we have the port of Vancouver but it has got fairly well filled up and the only place on the lower mainland to go for a real port is the Fraser river which requires development.

Since coming to this house I have been advocating to the department the establishment of a Fraser river harbour commission or a Fraser river authority with jurisdiction over the deep or navigable part of the river. I would urge the minister—I know he is well aware of this because I have spoken to his officials on several occasions—to establish this commission with representation as wide as possible from the municipalities which are interested in the establishment of the ports on the Fraser river. In any of these areas if there is an industry established or any development done it helps that portion of the area as well as all the lower part of the mainland of British Columbia.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which has already been referred to on several occasions, namely the menace which the present river bridge creates to river navigation where it crosses the Fraser at New Westminster. This bridge is a swing span which narrows down the channel for deep-sea ships. I realize it is an old bridge and possibly not worth while spending a great deal of money on but I would suggest that consideration be given to building a new bridge possibly in a different location because the one that is there now is in the wrong location. If not, and the old bridge is suitable for years to come, I would suggest the minister give consideration to taking out the swing span and putting in a lift span so as to improve the navigable part of that river.

I should also like to bring to the minister's attention the proposed Brookswood airport site which is in southern Surrey, two miles from the international boundary. I understand this is the most fog-free part of the whole Fraser valley, or of the west coast as far as that is concerned, and would make an ideal site for a light plane base or a supplementary airport to Vancouver airport. I think it would be good business on the part of the government to purchase this land before it is built on or developed because it is the only place of any size that is available in the whole area and it will be much cheaper to buy now than some day in the future when the area has been developed and this part of the country has been built up. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Drysdale: It is with a great deal of satisfaction I follow my hon. friend from New Westminster. We in British Columbia stick strongly together, and it is a pleasure to be following him at this time. With the permission of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I should like to extend my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Transport and, if I may, to congratulate him on his patience in enduring the many suggestions he has received in the past several days. I think the diversity of the suggestions, their depth and number, indicates the size and importance of the Department of Transport.

I should like to draw his attention to one or two matters which I think are of prime importance. First, I want to say that I think one of the most significant and important speeches made recently was the one given by the Prime Minister at the convocation at Dalhousie on May 19 during the course of which he made the suggestion that an international space agency be set up—an agency which would be representative of scientists, lawyers and educational institutions, one which would have the objective of safeguarding free and equal access by all nations for space exploration.

The Prime Minister made what I consider to be another sound suggestion, and that is the establishment of an international space year, in his words, so that a full study may be made of the demilitarization and utilization of outer space.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How does this come under these estimates, interesting as the subject matter is?

Mr. Drysdale: I thank the hon. member for Essex East for his remark and I shall now show him the connection. I wish to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier. At page 4759 of Hansard he indicated he thought the transport department should be divided into two parts and in his suggestion he thought there should be a minister of air and, of course, a minister of railways and canals. A similar suggestion was made by Mr. Grant McConachie, president of the Canadian Pacific Airlines several months ago. I think the hon. member for Laurier took the attitude he did primarily on the basis of a breakdown of the work load. As a former minister of transport he realizes the extensiveness of the department and the burden on the minister. But I should like to approach this from a different aspect. I agree that there should be a breakdown in the department but I should like to see the establishment of a minister of aeronautics and space. The minister of that department would have the responsibility for all matters dealing with civil aviation, telecommunications and meteorology, as well as the workings of the national research council in respect of space development. I understand too it is hoped that Canada will send a satellite into space using a United States rocket for propulsion and I think this type of work would come under the direction of a minister of such a department.

Perhaps hon. members are wondering why I suggest this at this particular time. I do so because I feel Canada is in a unique position. The city of Montreal is the centre for the international civil aviation organization and the international air transport association, both of which are vitally concerned with travel in space. The McGill institute of air and space law is also located in the city of Montreal. Coincidental with this, we have two or three large prestige buildings being constructed in Montreal at the present time, and I would suggest that one of these, such as Place Ville Marie, would be the location for the organization such as the Prime Minister has suggested. I do not believe this organization could be situated in a better place than Montreal. Canada is a nation of rationality and neutrality and, considering that along with the fact that these two world-wide organizations, I.C.A.O. and I.A.T.A. are already established in Montreal, which indicates the importance of that city, with its proximity to New York and the United Nations, I feel that this is sufficient justification for this important step. I feel that the Canadian government should take the steps necessary to establish such a ministry.

I suggest Canada has already taken the leadership in establishing these organizations in Montreal, and should again take the leadership by organizing an international space year, and thereby assist in establishing Canada's leadership among the nations of the world. The international geophysical year produced excellent scientific co-operation among the scientists of the world, and I suggest that similar co-operation will follow the organization of an international space year. I suggest that this should be brought about as soon as possible, and that Canada should take the lead in this field.

I should now like to turn to matters of perhaps purely local concern. In British Columbia there exists what is known as the Vancouver international airport, although it is located on Sea island, just outside the city of Vancouver, entirely within the municipality of Richmond. On June 21 of this year we are having another referendum to decide whether the city of Vancouver is going to sell the airport, or whether it is going to proceed on its own with the construction of a $15 million air terminal. I have looked with a certain amount of jealousy and a profound amount of admiration at the excellent facilities at Dorval, and feel that it is imperative at this time that similar facilities be provided at the Vancouver international airport.

We have a rather interesting situation there in that the city of Vancouver owns approximately 475 acres of that airport, while the Department of Transport owns some 2,450 acres. The city acquired the airport some 30 years ago and to date has made capital expenditures amounting to $1,675,000, while the Department of Transport has spent $12,490,000. I emphasize these tremendous amounts of capital expenditures because there has been misleading information given to the voters in the city of Vancouver to the effect that the Vancouver international airport is a gold mine and should be retained by the city. The city of Vancouver has the advantage of the federal government making the majority of the capital expenditures, taking care of the major part of the maintenance and, through leases from the Department of Transport, the city is able to charge landing fees and sell aviation fuel, which amounted to a revenue of some $400,000 in 1959, which was clear profit, not required to be handed over to the federal government. In 1959 it was estimated that if operating costs paid by the city and the Department of Transport were combined, the net loss in that year would have been some $850,000.

A referendum was held in 1954, in which 59.4 per cent of the voters voted to sell the airport. Approval of 60 per cent of the voters is required to effect such a sale. In December of 1960, another referendum was held in which 57.7 per cent of the voters were in favour of the sale. At present the majority of the city of Vancouver council members are in favour of selling the airport, as are the members of the board of trade and other organizations. I raise this matter at this time because another referendum is to be held on June 21, 1961. The city of Vancouver, which owns 475 acres of the property, has been unable to effect the sale to this date.

There is a proposal to establish a $13 million to $18 million jet terminal, and I am interested in this matter because it concerns the whole of the lower mainland of British Columbia as well as the city of Vancouver. I hope the citizens voting on this referendum will realize the obligations which the city must accept if the airport is not sold, and will realize the benefits which will accrue to the people of the lower mainland with the establishment of this jet terminal.

In respect of Sea island, I should like to direct the minister's attention to the fact that it is serviced from Lulu island in the mouth of the Fraser river. Present access to Sea island and the international Vancouver airport, as well as the Royal Canadian Air Force base, is by means of the Oak street bridge to Lulu island, and over the Moray channel bridge to Sea island. Some 3,000 residents live on Lulu island at the present time yet the only access to Sea island and Lulu island is by one bridge, the Moray bridge. The Eburne bridge was the responsibility of the provincial government but, due to the deterioration of this particular bridge, the provincial government decided to close it on March 13, 1961, as a result of which the Moray channel bridge, which is a two lane swinging span bridge now operated by the bridge attendants from the Eburne bridge, provides the only access to Sea island. This bridge must be opened at varying times to allow the passage of tugs and barges on the river. I made a visit one Saturday afternoon during the last Easter recess and was fortunate, or unfortunate, depending on how one looks at the situation, in approaching the Moray channel bridge at a time when it was opened to allow tugs and barges to pass. Apparently the tugs and barges have the right of way and, although the bridge was only open for some 15 minute at that time, I counted 50 cars on my side of the bridge and 60 on the other east side waiting to go across.

I suggest this situation is of great concern because the bridge on occasion has been blocked for maintenance and repairs as long as five or six hours, as a result of which Sea island was completely isolated. This is of great concern first of all from the point of view of national defence and, second, because of the great inconvenience caused travellers going to the Vancouver international airport.

Recently a firm of consultants, John Graham Ltd., made a traffic analysis on behalf of the municipality of Richmond. I should like to list certain figures contained in this report in connection with the Vancouver international airport. The number of passengers carried in 1958 totalled 850,000; in 1960, 1,050,000. The estimates for 1965 are, 1,600,000; 1970, 2,300,000; 1975, 3,100,000; and 1980, 4,100,000.

On page 38 of the John Graham Limited report it is recorded that the volume in 1960 peak hours exceeded the practical capacity of this bridge. According to the various ministers concerned, the bridge was constructed to provide access to the federal government properties on Sea island. I would suggest that this bridge is not performing its function.

On the same page of the report there is a recommendation that a four-lane bridge should be constructed between Sea island and Vancouver. I submit that the Minister of Transport should give very serious consideration to this suggestion and I think he should also investigate my alternative suggestion of a tunnel under the Fraser river, going directly from Granville street to Sea island. I feel that it could be and should be the responsibility of the federal government to provide this necessary and much needed access to the facilities at the Vancouver international airport. In the event that the federal government becomes the owner of the international airport on June 21 the minister should give even more serious consideration at that time to the suggestion of having at least a bridge or a tunnel connecting Vancouver and Sea island. We have a precedent at the present time. The provincial government has constructed the Oak street bridge which goes on to Lulu island from Vancouver and the Deas island tunnel which goes under the Fraser river into the Delta area. I think the minister should give this matter very serious consideration because the Vancouver area is the gateway to the east and to the Orient. It is an expanding and developing area. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, government departments inherit the promises and often the problems of their predecessors. This department is no exception. Sometimes a candidate in his ignorance increases those responsibilities on the part of himself and his party and when he comes to Ottawa he gets a rude awakening. I had this.

The C.N.R. has failed to close a gap in northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan in its railway line. When one looks at the map he sees it is so obvious it is an uneconomic and shortsighted way to run a railway that I took it upon myself to promise the people of my constituency that as soon as I got to Ottawa I would look into this thing and no doubt with the proper amount of pressure something could be done about it. Well, I think I have exhausted my resources in this matter. I put all the pressure possible on the department concerned. I was sent to Montreal with a mandate to interview the top brass of the C.N.R. On arrival in Montreal I got what I believe is the usual treatment a backbencher gets from the ivory tower. I would say if you can believe it that the attitude was one which no servant of the crown should offer to a sitting member, particularly if that member comes in a spirit of co-operation, looking for information rather than offering unsolicited advice on how to run a railway.

Before I was able to outline the problem from my viewpoint and ask the necessary questions it was suggested that I return to Alberta, mind my own business and forget about the whole thing. Now, this is not why I was elected. I was elected because I am rather an aggressive person and my constituents really believed that when I got down here I would do a certain amount of rational fighting. If it has to be in-fighting I can do that, too. But I took a very calm and fact-finding approach to the problem and I found out that the top brass of the C.N.R. are not imaginative. Therefore, I put it up to the department to give serious consideration to placing as top brass and top management at the head of the C.N.R. people who will at least listen to the problem when it is presented from the district concerned.

Enough of this; I want to tell the committee what the problem is. The C.N.R. has a line north of the Saskatchewan river running easterly toward Saskatchewan, and a further railway north of the Saskatchewan river for half the province. It ends at the town called Heinsberg, about 20 miles from the Saskatchewan boundary. Between there and the Saskatchewan boundary is open parkland with no engineering difficulties. The C.N.R. railway coming up from the east ends at about the same distance from the Alberta boundary in the same type of territory. In order to take freight from Heinsberg to Winnipeg it is necessary to go through Edmonton, an extra distance of 328 miles. The same would be true for any freight going from Frenchman Butte in Saskatchewan to Edmonton. You have to go a considerable distance into Saskatchewan and double back on the main line. I am not a railroader or I would have liked to take up the challenge to run the C.N.R. myself. I was asked if I would like to do that. I declined because I am not a railroading man; I am just a backbencher.

I do not know very much about railroads, but I know you cannot haul freight 328 extra miles and be efficient or make money for the people of Canada who are paying the bills. I was told that if I could show them on paper how they could make money by building this 40 miles of railway they would build a line. Well, I cannot prove that railroads will make money today but I do think that we can cut down our deficit. I do think that by cutting out the extra haul of 328 miles you could save the taxpayers of Canada a considerable amount of money which is now going into subsidies. I am disappointed that we pay this type of top brass $75,000 because I believe that a railroad man on a considerably reduced salary could put the C.N.R. back on its feet.

One of the most important things in running any organization is morale. Today the C.N.R. is completely demoralized. I have ridden on this line some dozen times back and forth to Ottawa and from the section foreman upwards there is great discontent in the rank and file. They are concerned about the security of their jobs being threatened and they do not like working for people who have lost faith in their own railway.

I say to the minister and members of the committee through you, Mr. Chairman, we should give serious consideration next week when the bill comes up which specifically deals with the brass to putting a new chief at the head of this railway. That is what I suggest we need. When we won the battle of Alamein it was largely owing to the personal leadership of General Montgomery. When Britain won the battle of Trafalgar it was because of Nelson. I think the time is long overdue to put a man at the top of the C.N.R. who loves his railway, a man in whom the rank and file of the railway would have complete confidence and to whom they would give natural loyalty.

(Translation):

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to note that the minister has returned to his seat, because I should like to deal with problems concerning the Department of Transport.

First of all, there is the problem of the Champlain bridge approaches on the north shore. Early in February, the new Montreal administration set up a committee to consider the northern approaches of Champlain bridge; the access roads to the Point St. Charles dump; a grant in lieu of a tax for Montreal harbour; the right of way for vehicles using Jacques Cartier bridge to reach St. Helen island; a proposed causeway leading to that island, as well as other problems of lesser importance.

This committee was formed of Mr. Guy Beaudet, manager of Montreal harbour and of Messrs. Lucien Saulnier, chairman of the executive committee, Lucien L'Allier, director of the public works division, Jean Lacoste, director of the traffic division, and Claude Robillard, director of the town planning division.

I have always insisted on better northern approaches to Champlain bridge which is now under construction, but which should have been open to traffic early in September 1962, according to the former minister of transport.

This project, as members know, was started under a Liberal government. As things are going now—and as I said even last year—I am still of the opinion that it is a Liberal government which is going to inaugurate it. Nevertheless, I want to mention right now the approaches which, to my way of thinking, are simply awful.

At present, on the north side and according to plans, all approaches converge to the entrance of Atwater tunnel. I have said it last year and I repeat it now, Atwater tunnel has been built to replace the bridge over the Lachine canal. This tunnel is already too narrow for rush hour traffic. I do not see how it could absorb all that Champlain bridge traffic on three lanes in both directions.

I said, last year, that this was disastrous. If the department persists in refusing to build additional approaches elsewhere than through the tunnel, I should think such an attitude would be shameful.

I said before and I stated earlier today and I repeat it now—it is absolutely impossible to see how three-lane traffic to and from Champlain bridge which is now being built, can be handled by a tunnel which is already too small to absorb the rush hour traffic.

This morning, I asked the Minister of Transport a question with regard to an agreement signed yesterday between the city of Montreal and the national harbours board. I would have liked to see that document in order to know whether it deals with the matter of approaches.

A press item says:

> Approaches to the Champlain bridge will, in the beginning, be at ground level.

What is the meaning of "in the beginning" and "ground level"? Does it mean that part of it will be at ground level for a few months and that, later on, some elevated lanes will be built in replacement?

All we know, is that an agreement was signed but we are not informed of its terms.

Again in the same article:

> The approaches in the city of Montreal are in two sections providing access and exit to and from the bridge into existent streets mainly through Atwater tunnel.

That is what I was saying. Once again, I think it is unbelievable that people should want to throttle Atwater tunnel and bottleneck our neighbouring streets with the traffic to and from Champlain bridge. I never understood, and still fail to understand, why we should have to go down on our knees and make endless calls in order to obtain anything whenever additional federal work is to be undertaken in Montreal.

Mr. Chairman, I remember very well that when the approaches on the south shore of Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges were built, a remarkable job was done. As a matter of fact, approaches from and to the south of those two bridges are good. And it should be pointed out that it did not cost the municipalities concerned anything except in the way of land which belonged to them.

On the other hand, in respect of approaches on the north shore, in Montreal, the federal government's attitude is entirely different. Moreover, just to prove my statement, the approaches to and from Victoria bridge on the north shore are simply atrocious. Indeed, every evening, during the rush hour, i.e. from 4.30 to 6.30, Bridge street, which leads to Victoria bridge and Wellington tunnel from the east side are blocked. The Montreal authorities are planning to build the elevated highway at the intersection of Wellington and Bridge streets. This is a $2 million project, and I am not aware that the federal government has agreed to co-operate in any way. To build the elevated highway, the Montreal authorities will have to expropriate a whole side of Bridge street, which is a residential area, and here again, no subsidy is expected from the federal government.

Mr. Chairman, for three years now and again today, I have been deploring the approaches at the north end of Champlain bridge. As I stated a moment ago, and as I repeat now, it is a disgrace, and in view of the federal government's inaction, I call it a scandal. Can you imagine that people could decide to build a bridge costing millions of dollars, and make no provision for decent approaches?

It is like a painter who, having finished a painting, would store it in his attic for lack of a frame. We know that the frame often enhances the painting.

Again, sir, I hope that in the agreement signed with the Montreal authorities, provision has been made for approaches other than through Atwater tunnel.

On the other hand, I must recognize that this agreement includes a particular project which is very satisfactory to my constituents.

I refer to the agreement between the city of Montreal and the national harbours board for the construction of an access road to the Point St. Charles dump. This dump, which is located on the river shore in my constituency, has been a source of constant difficulties, and for 20 years every public representative has been asking that the dump be closed or that an access road be built so that trucks would not have to go through residential streets, as they do now.

I was somewhat surprised, however, that according to the latest information I received, an access road passing beneath Champlain bridge was to be built under this agreement with the federal government.

However, here is what I find in this morning's issue of Le Devoir:

> The executive committee also accepted an agreement whereby an access road to the Point St. Charles dump will be built under Victoria bridge.

Has a new solution been reached? That is all for the better. I am all the happier because the article further states, and I quote:

The chairman of the committee, Mr. Lucien Saulnier, stated that thanks to this agreement, garbage trucks will have disappeared from Marguerite Bourgeois street within a month.

Now, the people who live on Marguerite Bourgeois, a residential street, have always rightly complained about the fact that trucks carrying garbage or snow, use that thoroughfare to reach the dump.

In another field, namely the construction of the east-west super-highway, there is a problem to which the city of Montreal may not be giving proper consideration.

Indeed, the municipal authorities seem to feel that the only solution is to build a subway. Well, I do not share that opinion even though I sit on the city council. We have too many surface problems to settle and we could do that much more cheaply than by building a subway.

One of the most important projects is the construction of the east-west super-highway which will pass near the river, on federal property. It seems to me that the city of Montreal and the federal government should come to an agreement for the early execution of that project.

Such a super-highway would eliminate at least part of the traffic which must go through the city, whether eastbound or westbound. It would relieve traffic on Sherbrooke, Notre Dame, Dorchester, St. James and even St. Paul and the vehicles which now go through the harbour district could use the super-highway to go east or west, thus relieving the traffic on the streets I have just mentioned.

The more so since the Montreal transportation commission could inaugurate an express bus service on that expressway, similar to the service now established on St. Denis and St. Lawrence streets, to accommodate the east-west traffic and vice versa.

I hope that we will shortly see progress in that regard. In addition, I hope that the east-west expressway will be built as soon as possible.

Turning to another matter, Mr. Chairman, I would like again to call the minister's attention to a suggestion made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) yesterday, when he said that a lookout should be built in the vicinity of the harbour of Montreal in order that the people of Montreal may visit the place. As a matter of fact, I am sure that many Montrealers hear about the harbour but have never visited it and are not aware of what goes on there. We are aware of its facilities and we realize its importance. It is one of the largest ports in Canada, and it must maintain its importance. Montrealers must be able to get on-the-spot information on the port. To that effect, I should like to put forward again the following suggestion made by my colleague:

Even a lookout, like those that were erected at the time of the St. Lawrence seaway development, could be set up, so that, from a height of 50 feet, people could see all the activities of Montreal.

Even if certain suggestions are made by the opposition, I hope the Minister of Transport will kindly consider them, because we often heard in the past ministers asking for suggestions to solve various problems.

I think that for the last three days the minister has been getting suggestions, both from his colleagues on the government side and from members of the opposition, and I would be glad if some of the suggestions made by members of the opposition were accepted or at least that they be given favourable consideration.

In closing, I should like to point out another suggestion made about certain problems in Montreal, and which concern the federal government. It is about the setting up of a committee or commission including members of the Montreal administration and other persons appointed by the federal government.

I said a moment ago that Mr. Beaudet and some members of the Montreal administration were members of a commission. After three or four months' sittings, recommendations were made, which, although not perfect, have none the less facilitated the settlement of three or four problems in Montreal.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, before resuming my seat, to remind the minister that I insist on the proper development of the southern and northern approaches to Champlain bridge. I do not know the terms of the agreement, but the minister promised me this morning that he would table it in the house as soon as he received it. The tunnel can take care only of the normal traffic. It is already too small and it is no use building a six-lane roadway if the tunnel is not improved.

I am closing with this. I know you want to call it six o'clock. I am just as anxious to go home as my colleagues. Nevertheless, I am convinced that, unless the bridge approaches are improved so as to take care of the traffic during rush hours, it will be most unfortunate. Last year I suggested the building of elevated roadways, but, whether they be elevated or underground, as long as they move the traffic to Dorchester street, I will be satisfied.

Therefore I hope the minister will give consideration to some of my suggestions and use them.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the item carry?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I certainly have no objection to item 1 being carried but I intended to answer a few of the various inquiries that have been made of me by hon. members. If the committee is agreeable, however, we might pass this item and then I could be given an opportunity of making my statement after the item has been passed. I would be agreeable to this procedure.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point which the minister has raised, I may say that from the experience I have had the estimates have taken quite a long time. The minister has had quite a long siege. I, personally, and I am sure others who are here, would be quite willing to accede to the minister's request, but it should be on this condition, that the minister will reply when we get to the next item after item 1 is passed. Then, we will be given the right to ask questions, although we will not want to make speeches. On that assumption, I think we would be willing to allow the item to pass.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the item pass?

Mr. Peters: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The tail wagging the dog again.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire what the legislation and the estimates will be for next week.

Mr. Churchill: For Monday and Tuesday the program will be as outlined. I am not certain we will reach all the items that I called for Monday. Rather than taking the estimates of the Department of Transport next Wednesday we will start with those of the Department of Justice, followed by those of the Department of Fisheries, on which we have already spent some time.

On Monday evening, after I have had an opportunity to consult with some of my colleagues, I may be able to name two more departments for the balance of the week.

At four minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

COMMISSION OF INQUIRY, INDIAN AFFAIRS, MACKENZIE DISTRICT

Question No. 230—Mr. Howard:

1. Has the commission of inquiry, appointed on June 25, 1959, to inquire generally into all matters arising out of the unfulfilled provisions of treaties 8 and 11 as they applied to Indians of the Mackenzie district, held any meetings; and, if so, upon what dates and in which places were these meetings held?

2. Has the said commission made any report and recommendations; and if so, what are the details of the said report, and the action taken with respect to the recommendations?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. Yes. Meetings were held from July 5 to July 17, 1959, at the following settlements:

Question

Aklavik, Fort McPherson, Arctic Red River, Fort Good Hope, Fort Franklin, Fort Norman, Fort Wrigley, Fort Simpson, Fort Liard, Fort Providence, Hay River, Fort Resolution, Fort Rae, Snowdrift, Fort Smith.

2. Yes. The commission recommended against the establishment of reserves in the proportions provided for in the treaties and suggested that the government open negotiations with the various Indian bands with a view to ascertaining whether in lieu of their land rights under the treaties they would be interested in monetary compensation, a combination of both, or some other form of compensation.

In connection with this general recommendation the commission made certain recommendations concerning the value of lands, mineral rights, fishing and hunting rights, establishment of Indians in settlements, welfare services, etc., all of which have been under study by an interdepartmental committee.

APPENDIX

STATEMENTS BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER TO INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON LAOS

Mr. Green (Canada): Mr. Chairman, I should like to state briefly Canada's views on what we hope the conference will achieve.

Before doing so, may I associate myself with others around this table who have paid tribute to the statesmanlike contribution to our conference which was made by his Royal Highness Prince Sihanouk. And may I also thank the co-chairmen for having brought us together.

Canada is represented here because of her membership on the international commission for Laos.

In 1954, we accepted the invitation to serve together with India and Poland on the three international supervisory commissions for Indo-China, in the belief that these commissions would help to establish conditions of stability and security in Southeast Asia. We had no illusions about the magnitude or complexity of the task.

The fact that this conference is meeting now is a sharp reminder that the establishment of stability and security in the area is not simple or easy. This conference presents an opportunity, possibly the last opportunity, to make a just and enduring settlement in Laos. It is most likely to succeed if we base ourselves on the Geneva agreements of 1954. We should also keep in mind three underlying requirements:

First, conditions must be established in Laos which will enable the Laotian leaders to assume effective responsibility for the government of their own people.

Second, we must strive for a settlement which all the nations represented at the conference are genuinely prepared to apply and to support.

Third, it must be a settlement which assures that Laos has a truly neutral and independent status.

Taken together, it is obvious that if these three requirements for a lasting peace are to be fulfilled, not only must Laos be free from domination from outside but it must not be handed over to the control of any one of the parties to the present conflict.

In the Canadian view, the international commission's terms of reference should be such as to enable the commission to play its part in ensuring the genuine neutrality and independence reflected in these principles.

Over a period of 1954 to 1958, Canadians came to know something of Laos and its people. We learned that Laotians are friendly, hospitable and peaceful, desiring only to live their own lives and without aggressive designs on their neighbours. They have a way of life which possesses both charm and intrinsic value. We wish to see them maintain that way of life.

In practical terms, Canada's interest centers on successful functioning of the international commission, and here, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I agree with Mr. Rusk about the vital importance of the strict observance of the cease fire by all the parties in Laos. And in addition, I agree that it is essential to have regular and up-to-date information at this conference about what is going on.

I have asked the Canadian member of the international commission to co-operate with the chairmen of the commission in arranging for such regular and frequent reports from the commission to the co-chairmen of this conference.

That commission has now returned to Laos and it is a responsibility of this conference to define the terms under which the commission is to function in the future and to provide the conditions and give it the means to enable it to function effectively both now and in the future.

These conditions, most of which are immediately applicable, we believe, should include the following:

First, the full co-operation of all parties; second, prompt access to all areas and military installations at the discretion of the commission; third, independent and adequate means of land and air transport and the facilities for their maintenance. Helicopters, in our opinion, are of special importance. Fourth, an independent system of communications. Fifth, guarantees for the physical security of its personnel. Sixth, full information as to the quantity, types and disposition of all war material and armed forces, at the time of the cease fire and after. Seventh, effective methods of supervising and controlling the entry of military personnel and war material into Laos. Eighth, and a clear definition of the responsibilities of the commission with respect to all threats to the security of the Laotian state.

These are some of the more important conditions which should be met to enable the commission to do its job effectively. I would remind you that the co-chairmen have informed the commission in writing that the determination of the functions of the commission, after the first stage of its work, falls within the competence of this conference. That will be found in letters written to the countries which are members of this commission.

Under any terms of reference, a commission can function only with the co-operation of the local authorities. There must also be a basic understanding on the part of the local people about what the commission is expected to do and why it is there.

The purpose of the Geneva powers in 1954 was to establish the conditions which would enable Laos to exist as a sovereign, independent, unified and neutral state. In its relations with other countries, the Laotian government declared that it would not pursue aggressive policies or permit its territory to be used for this purpose and undertook to settle its international disputes by peaceful means. With the object of maintaining neutral status, it accepted certain limitations on its sovereign right to enter into alliances with other countries for military purposes.

We are all agreed that this neutral status, which conforms with the wishes and needs of the Laotian people, is still the objective. Such status would involve no foreign military formations on Laotian soil and a policy of non-alignment in relations with other states. To reinforce this status, already recorded in the agreements of 1954, this conference may consider some further agreement or declaration necessary.

For example, the suggestion made yesterday by the foreign secretary of the United Kingdom that the government of Laos should make a declaration of neutrality and non-alignment with a corresponding pledge on the part of all other governments represented here to respect the neutrality of Laos, seems to me to be a constructive step which merits careful and sympathetic consideration.

Consideration will have to be given to the type of force required to maintain law and order within the country; to the type and quantity of equipment this force should have; to the sources from which this equipment should come; and to the related question of advice and training.

In 1954, the Laotian government declared its intention to integrate all citizens into the national community without discrimination. The rights and freedoms provided in the constitution, including the right to participate freely in elections by secret ballot, were assured to all. While the primary responsibility for the solution of political issues must rest with the Laotians themselves, there may be matters on which the countries represented here can be of assistance in this task.

For several years, Laos has been receiving assistance towards the development of its economy and the improvement of the living standards of its people. Indeed, I might say that another reason for our interest in Laos is that Canada has been happy to join with other countries in the Mekong river valley project, where Canadians carried out the aerial survey. It seems clear that aid from outside must continue if Laos is to build up the social and economic institutions needed to maintain a unified state in the modern world. There is a problem of reconciling the neutral status of Laos with economic and technical aid from outside powers. The resolution of the problem may well involve the use of some form of international body.

Finally, Canada expects this conference to produce a settlement which will enable an independent, unified and neutral Laos to live in peace with its neighbours and to resolve its internal difficulties. We believe whole-hearted support of the international supervisory commission is essential to the attainment of these objectives.

Thank you very much.

If I may I should like to make a further suggestion with regard to the work of the commission. I shall be very brief.

2. The conference is now seized of the question of reporting, and this is a subject of discussion between the co-chairmen. There is no doubt as to the obligation of the commission to report to this conference, and they have already rendered three reports. However, the problem of receiving prompt and adequate reports from the commission is inseparable from the means which should be at the disposal of the commission to do its job.

3. My purpose now is to deal with the practical measures which this conference should adopt at once to enable the commission to ensure the strict and impartial observance of the cease fire by all parties, for one purpose; so that the conference could have confidence in the commission as a supervisory body.

4. The most urgent problem the conference should tackle is to provide the commission with such equipment in the way of transport, communications and the like as it requires to do the job. In its very first report to the co-chairmen on May 1 the commission said that with an advance of $200,000 from the government of India—and I go on to quote from this letter—"and with the help of the Indian army, the commission should be able to set up an effective machinery, provided that the co-chairmen were willing to supply the commission with an adequate number of airplanes and helicopters together with facilities for their maintenance". This is the end of the quotation from that letter. The co-chairmen in their reply authorized the commission to draw a $200,000 credit from the Indian government, but so far as we know, no action has been taken by them, that is by the co-chairmen, with regard to the requirement for transport. They dealt with the other two points raised, but not with the question of the transport asked for by the commission.

5. I wish to propose that the co-chairmen should without further delay send a message to the chairman of the international commission referring to the commission's letter of May 1 which I have mentioned, and asking them to spell out as a matter of urgency the specific requirements in men and equipment, including an estimate of the number of teams that will be needed to enable them to discharge their duties in relation to the cease fire. Upon receipt of the commission's recommendations the co-chairmen, we believe, should take the necessary steps to provide the commission with the equipment needed, and the governments concerned should take the necessary steps to supply the men. We believe this is a very practical suggestion; we believe this need should be faced, and we hope that it will receive the approval of all the delegations.

Monday, May 22, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

DECLARATION OF LOYALTY ON CELEBRATION OF BIRTHDAY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this being the date on which the birthday of Her Gracious Majesty Queen Elizabeth II is celebrated, we in this house will show our devotion by carrying on with business as usual. However, with a view to giving tangible evidence of our affection and devotion to Her Majesty, the Acting Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Laurier, and myself suggest that with your leave the members stand and sing the first verse of "God Save the Queen".

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang

God Save the Queen

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LIMITS OF LIABILITY UNDER SECTION 21

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act to provide that the two hundred million dollar limit of liability specified in section 21B of the act, now applicable to both contracts of insurance entered into by the corporation under section 21 and instruments guaranteed by the corporation under section 21A, be made applicable solely to contracts of insurance entered into under section 21; and further to provide a separate limit, in the amount of two hundred million dollars, on the liability of importers under outstanding instruments guaranteed by the corporation under section 21A.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING FOR APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act, to provide one additional puisne judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada and to provide salaries for such additional judge of the exchequer court, for two additional puisne judges of the Superior Court of Quebec, for one additional judge of the Court of Appeal for British Columbia, for two additional Ontario county court judges and for one additional Alberta district court judge.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DISCONTINUED RAILWAY SERVICES

Motion No. 128—Mr. Meunier (for Mr. Deschatelets):

For a copy of the complete list of all railway services, discontinued in Canada by the Canadian National Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, since July 1, 1957.

(Translation):

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the mover of this motion, and he told me that he would be satisfied if he could obtain a list of the passenger trains which have been dropped. In that case, I have no objection to the adoption of the motion.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Would the minister mind repeating his statement; the interpretation system is not working.

Mr. Balcer: I have had a chat with the mover of this motion and he has agreed to limit it to the list of passenger services. With this understanding there is no objection to the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the alteration to which the hon. member has agreed, and which has been explained by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION, NEW DRUGS—DOCUMENTS USED

Motion No. 129—Mr. Howard:

For a list of the names of documents to which the public has access, with bibliographic references, which were used or perused by the combines investigation branch in its inquiry regarding the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): We can accept the motion of the hon. member for Skeena for a list of the names of documents to which the public has access, with bibliographic references, which were used or perused by the combines investigation branch in its inquiry regarding the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs. In so doing it should be made clear that the list of documents will be those to which the public and the director alike have access, but the disclosure of this list is not to be taken as any indication that they do or do not form a part of the statement of material filed with the restrictive trade practices commission by the director. The appropriate list is being prepared and will be made available as soon as it is ready.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member prepared to—

Mr. Howard: I did not hear any qualifications with respect to the motion, Mr. Speaker, merely an explanation that is was not to be taken that this list implies that any of the material is in the statement; that is all.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the explanation given by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice?

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND DEFENCE PRODUCTION CONTRACTS WITH CANADIAN MARCONI

Motion No. 130—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all current contracts between the Departments of National Defence and of Defence Production and the Canadian Marconi Company.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I wish this motion to stand for the time being.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

ELEVATED HIGHWAY ON C.N.R. PROPERTY, MONTREAL

Motion No. 131—Mr. Meunier (for Mr. Lessard):

For a copy of the memorandum from the authorities of the city of Montreal, and all correspondence dealing with the project of building an east-west elevated highway on the Canadian National Railways property along the St. Lawrence river in Montreal.

Motion agreed to.

CLOSING OF COAL MINES, N.S.

Motion No. 132—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of all communications exchanged since July 1, 1960, between the Dominion Steel and Coal Company, or any of its subsidiaries on the one hand, and any member of the government or the dominion coal board on the other, regarding the possible closing of any of the coal mines in Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO LETTER FROM B.C. PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is it a fact that in a letter to the Minister of Finance on January 13, 1961, four days before the Columbia river treaty was signed in Washington on January 17, the premier of British Columbia warned the government that British Columbia could not agree to the financing aspects of the treaty and therefore would not be a party to the treaty?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a letter was received from the premier of British Coumbia on the 17th, I think it was. I am speaking from recollection, having in mind the date of the treaty. If I recall correctly the treaty was signed in Washington on a Tuesday, and this letter arrived either that day or the day before. It could hardly be correctly construed, I think, in the manner in which the hon. member has construed it, in the light of the negotiations which had taken place up to that time between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister table the letter from the premier, a part of which is quoted in the Vancouver Province of May 17, 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will certainly be pleased to table the letter or any others for which there is consent of both governments.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Would the minister inform the house if the receipt of this letter did not cause the government some concern at that time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The letter arrived just at about the time of the signing of the treaty, and the signing of the treaty had been preceded by extended negotiations on a tripartite basis. British Columbia had been a party to the discussions which had proceeded between the governments of the United States and Canada. They were fully in accord with everything that was taking place in that regard. The letter which has been referred to was not interpreted as changing the situation in that respect, because the government of Canada was simply proceeding in the way that had been agreed upon by all three governments in the course of the discussions. There was no occasion at that time for any disagreement or alteration of what had been accepted by all parties as a firm understanding among them.

Mr. Chevrier: Did the minister not state, as affirmed by the premier of British Columbia, that the letter was received before the treaty was signed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The letter was received in Ottawa before the treaty was signed in Washington by, I think, a matter of a few hours.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—INVITATION TO PRIME MINISTER TO VISIT CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. There is a press report this morning that the prime minister of Nigeria has accepted an invitation to visit the United States from July 25 to August 3. I wonder whether Canada has sent a similar invitation to the prime minister, or whether such an invitation will be sent?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the prime minister of Nigeria, as the head of one of the outstanding commonwealth countries, will, as he realized even before this hour, be a welcome visitor to Canada at all times.

Mr. Argue: In the light of the Prime Minister's statement, can we take it that such an invitation will be extended?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact, an invitation was extended when the Minister of Finance represented this country in Nigeria last October at the time of the independence celebrations, and the hon. gentleman's suggestion is just a little late. The prime minister of Nigeria said at that time that whenever it was possible to come he would certainly do so.

RED CHINA—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE RESPECTING RECOGNITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. It is based upon a question asked of the Acting Prime Minister by the Leader of the Opposition, and will be found at page 4945 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he has any comment to make upon a statement reported to have been made by the Minister of Agriculture in Vancouver yesterday to the effect that perhaps Canada should have recognized the de facto government of red China right from the start; that the Chinese are dedicated people, and that in his grain trade dealing with them recently he had found them most anxious to increase their trade with Canada but would do nothing that would hurt Canadian producers.

The Acting Prime Minister replied that he had not seen the report and that perhaps comment might wait until the return to the house of the Minister of Agriculture. Now that the minister has returned from his peregrinations on Vancouver island—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Where is the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Martin (Essex East):—I would ask him if this statement on red China represents a new declaration of policy on the part of the government, and whether he proposes to enunciate this new policy in the parliament of Canada.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I was on Vancouver island last week. While there I visited the agricultural exhibition, the city of Victoria and certain farming areas. In the course of my other wanderings I went to the side shows where they show various freaks and so on, and I saw a great big booth there where they were showing pictures of the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Crestohl: On a point of order, the minister should withdraw that remark. It was unparliamentary in every sense of the word.

Mr. Speaker: I thought it was certainly not in accordance with our practice to make comments of that kind as an answer to the question, but I do not think it would be unparliamentary.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was just commenting on the extraneous remarks made by the hon. member for Essex East. When I was in Vancouver I was asked a question about recognition of red China. I pointed out that this involved a matter of government policy, and that I had no comment to make. However, I reminded the reporter that this question had been discussed in the House of Commons in 1949, and if any person cares to refer to page 1928 of Hansard for November 17, 1949 he will find these observations by the then minister for external affairs—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would agree that this has nothing to do with the question. The Minister of Agriculture has been asked to comment on a statement which he is reported to have made outside this house. He can either say he was misquoted, or that he was correctly reported—

Mr. Grafftey: The answer you want to hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, would you protect me against the member for Brome-Missisquoi?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure how much protection the hon. member needs, but I should be glad to ask for the co-operation of the house while he puts his point of order. I think there is something in the point made by the hon. member for Essex East, and the answer is assuming the character of a debate rather than a statement of fact. If I may use a word employed by the hon. member for Essex East, there was a certain amount of peregrination both in the question and in the answer. If the minister could answer briefly, perhaps he would do so.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I was just pointing out in answer to the question exactly what I said at this news conference. I pointed out that my memory went back to a debate in this house in 1949, and to what the minister of external affairs of that day had said and what Mr. St. Laurent had said I referred to the views they had expressed as reported on page 1928 of Hansard—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. gentleman now clearly indicate their false character.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has just said that he spoke to a reporter referring to page so and so of Hansard. He will not expect this house to accept that as a correct statement.

Mr. Speaker: It seemed to me the minister was endeavouring to answer, and I think he should be given the opportunity.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Naturally I did not have the exact page in my memory, but my memory was accurate. I should like to quote these words, spoken by the secretary of state for external affairs of that day:

> As far as trade with China is concerned, there is no argument on that score. Nothing can be more important to Canada than building up trade with the Far East, including China; but one essential element in the development of trade with the areas over which the writ of the communist government now runs is to establish some kind of contact with that government. So naturally the promotion of trade is part of the problem of our relationship with the communist government in China, and the two cannot be separated.

I think that explains fully what I said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister this question. Did he say in Vancouver, as reported, that Canada should have recognized the de facto government of China right from the start?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Crestohl: Answer that question.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not think I can make it much clearer except by going on to read what Mr. St. Laurent said.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question—

An hon. Member: Here it comes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would members please observe the rules so the hon. member for Trinity can pose his supplementary question.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): The minister was reported to have said that on reflection he thought Canada should have recognized the government of red China at the outset. My question is this. Does the minister feel that the conduct of the red Chinese government over the years has justified the opinion he has expressed that, in retrospect, they should have been recognized at the outset?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member, in asking the minister to express an opinion on that question which relates to an important matter of government policy, is not really within the practice of the house. Statements on a decision of that kind are not usually made in answer to questions on the orders of the day.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—ACTION BY CABINET RESPECTING MINE CLOSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Prime Minister if he can say whether or not a cabinet committee has been established to deal with the threatened closure of three coal mines in Cape Breton, and whether the government has made an offer to Dosco to defray the cost of keeping the mines open?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As to the first part of the question, may I say that the hon. gentleman, with his wide experience as clerk of the privy council and also as minister, must realize that the establishment of cabinet committees is not usually brought to the attention of the House of Commons.

As to the second question, the answer was given the other day by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of Saturday a statement appears under the heading "Coal; Cabinet Committee of Five Set Up"? The article states that a five member committee of the federal cabinet has been set up—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question was, is the Prime Minister aware of a report in the newspaper, and then he proceeds to read the report. This is not in accordance with our practice, to read from a press report and ask whether or not the statement is correct. This is a practice that has not been accepted in the house. If there is a supplementary question arising out of the report, other than whether it is correct, perhaps the hon. member would put it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am drawing Your Honour's attention to the fact that I did not ask whether the report was correct. I am asking the Prime Minister whether he is aware of the fact that there is a report. The question I was going to put to the Prime Minister was, is it the practice of the present government to make announcements in respect of cabinet committees to the press but not to parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I simply answer the hon. gentleman in this way, that speculative articles are not usually given consideration on the orders of the day.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the Prime Minister said, in reply to the question by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East, like all other members of the house, is obliged to accept answers given by the ministry, or no answer as the case may be.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not dealing with that; I am simply raising a point of order. The Prime Minister said it is not usual for the house to be informed of the existence of cabinet committees. This is a point the Prime Minister has made before. I am suggesting that it is contrary to our practice for the government to take the position that parliament cannot be informed about the existence of cabinet committees.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's point of order is really, in effect, a discussion or a challenge of an answer given. There is no point of order that arises unless a member is entitled to indicate what kind of answer he should receive, and that is what the hon. member is doing. It is well established that members may ask questions for information. They cannot insist on an answer or insist on any particular kind of answer. A supplementary question is for the purpose of elucidating an answer, and that is as far as the practice permits. I trust the hon. member will be content with that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I, on a point of order, submit—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I raise this as a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no question of privilege arising out of a Speaker's ruling. I have given my ruling and the hon. member is in duty bound to accept it. I have heard his argument.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is raising a question of privilege that does not arise out of my ruling, I will hear him; otherwise, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not speaking on a question of privilege arising out of Your Honour's ruling. I am simply raising a question of privilege in respect of the Prime Minister's statement which affects the privileges of all members in this house. When he says that this house is not entitled to know whether or not there are committees of the cabinet—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is endeavouring to arrive in another way at a prescription of the kind of answer the Prime Minister will give to his question. If the hon. member disagrees with the statement that is made, he will have opportunities in due course to debate the issue. However, no question of the privileges of the house arises by reason of the view expressed by the Prime Minister with respect to the information about cabinet committees.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask Your Honour a question arising out of this matter?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chevrier: The question is this. Is it proper for a member of the treasury benches to give an answer such as that which the Prime Minister has given, although a statement similar to the one made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is to be found in the Halifax Herald? That is the point upon which I am asking Your Honour's advice.

Mr. Speaker: As I said, I am not judging the statement. My only responsibility is to see that the practice of the house is observed, and that practice is that the ministry may give such answers as they see fit to the oral question put to them at this point in our proceedings.

[Later:]

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance and ask him whether the government has offered any financial assistance to Dosco to keep the coal mines open, apart from subventions on the sale of coal.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The government, as the house was informed at the time, offered to pay subventions in what had up to that time been a non-subvention area, and this timely assistance on the part of the federal government enabled operations at three important mines to be carried on during the past winter and up to the present time. The house has been fully informed at all times of the financial arrangements which have been made in this regard with a view to continuing the operation of these mines and continuing the employment of these worthy coal miners of Cape Breton.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question. Do I understand from the minister that no other financial assistance apart from subventions has been offered?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is well aware of what has been reported to the house. This form of federal assistance appeared first of all in the form of subventions payable in the subvention area. That area was extended farther to the west over the past several years so that more Nova Scotia coal could come into Quebec and the western parts of Ontario. Last year this form of assistance was extended into what had been known up to that time as a non-subvention area.

Mr. Pickersgill: More evasion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not evasion at all. It is reminding the house in simple, factual terms of something which it has known all along but which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has forgotten, or wishes to forget and is now misrepresenting.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the minister whether he is now repudiating what was said to the press by his colleague the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, what my colleague the Minister of Labour said to the press was the subject of comment on his part in this house several days ago in reply to a question. He made his position perfectly clear to every intelligent and adult member of this house, but not to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO NATIONAL FARM POLICY RESEARCH COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. My question is prompted and spurred by the interest of numerous people in the maintenance and development of the economic family farm. In view of the decision at a meeting held in Winnipeg on April 24 and 25 of leaders from all branches of agricultural production and marketing to proceed to establish a national farm policy research council, will the minister inform the house whether his department was represented at this meeting and what assistance, advice or guidance his department intends to offer in the establishment of this urgently required research council?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, at the time the government of Canada was examining into the question of a national agricultural program which was eventually announced in the house on August 30, 1958, by the Prime Minister, one of the gaps we discovered was some form of objective research into marketing and sociology. We set up an interdepartmental committee which recommended that some form of objective research group should be set up outside of the government and outside of the farm organizations.

At that time I approached several of the farm organizations in the west pointing out the need for this research group, and a group was set up among the farm organizations in the west which recommended that there should be a prairie agricultural economics research group. In the meantime the government of Manitoba, through its minister recommended, at the agriculture ministers' conference last October that there should be a research institute for all of Canada, and his government took the lead in calling a meeting of all governments and farm organizations for some time early this spring, which resulted in the meeting at the end of April that was mentioned by the hon. member.

At that meeting the government of Canada was represented by myself, with 11 officials from various departments, and a two day discussion took place. All the governments of Canada were represented, and all the farm organizations. A committee was instructed to prepare a plan by July 15 of this year which would be presented to the 11 governments and various farm organizations, and also to Agri-business. This report is due by July 15 of this year, at which time I would imagine the farm organizations will consult their organizations in full meeting and the agriculture ministers will deal with it either at the July meeting in Prince Edward Island or the November meeting here in Ottawa.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPORTED PROHIBITION AGAINST FRATERNIZATION WITH NATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. My question is based upon a publication of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources entitled "This is the Arctic", and a statement which appears therein as follows:

> Taking out the Eskimo girls individually, however, is looked on with extreme disfavour, and is the easiest way to get a fast, no expense paid trip south.

This publication is being distributed in Ottawa and other places. I wonder whether the minister could explain the significance of that phrase which appears in this departmental publication, in view of what he said the other day?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has asked this particular question, because I feel there is sufficient continuing interest in the subject to make it necessary to provide more background about the matter than has been provided in answer to questions put in this house.

The particular publication to which the hon. member refers was designed as a popular treatment of the subject of human relationships north of the 60th parallel. During the past few years there has been tremendous development taking place in the northern part of Canada; the actual impetus began with the construction of the distant early warning line.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I should not like to interrupt the minister, or object to what he is saying, but I understood him to say in his preliminary remarks that because of the continuing interest in this subject it could be more propitiously dealt with by a statement rather than by an answer to a question, and I am wondering now whether the minister is not making a statement which would be more appropriately made during motions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wishes to withdraw his question it can be disposed of very simply.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, you know very well that I have some reluctance about withdrawing questions.

[Later:]

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In the light of press reports to the effect that Canadian Eskimos are living under certain disabilities, would the minister table in this house a list of the disabilities under which they are reputed to be living in comparison with the standards of other Canadians?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in view of the questions asked by the hon. member for Cartier and the hon. member for Skeena, perhaps I could receive the permission of the house to revert to motions and make a statement which might cover the inquiries of both these hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. minister have leave to revert to motions for the purpose of making a rather extended statement regarding this subject?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, at the time of the construction of the distant early warning line there was a rule against unnecessary contact with Eskimos. Many thousands of construction workers were rushed into the Arctic to complete the line in two years. In many areas of the north this was the first contact by the Eskimos with large numbers of people from south of the 60th parallel. Eskimos have low immunity to disease, and there was concern over the possibility of epidemics being brought in by construction workers from the outside, and also over the possibility of improper relations—I stress that word "improper"—that would have an adverse effect on the Eskimo people.

In March, 1955 the deputy minister of northern affairs and national resources wrote to the Western Electric Company, which was responsible for the construction of the D.E.W. line, regarding measures to protect the health and welfare of the Eskimos, and particularly with reference to reduction in the possibility of the spread of disease. When the agreement with the United States in respect of the D.E.W. line was concluded in May, 1955, a clause was inserted designed to provide similar protection.

Conditions in the Arctic have changed remarkably in the past six years. As an indication of the government's current attitude, in 1959 a letter was sent to all government departments that have employees in the north, dealing with the question of relations with the indigenous population. There was no attempt whatever to curtail fraternization; indeed, the reverse is the case. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has a number of employees, both male and female, who are Eskimos married to white persons or white persons married to Eskimos. I might add that D.E.W. line clauses have no application to the mid-Canada line, or the Canadian Marconi Company.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all appreciate and commend the original intention in this particular clause contained in the D.E.W. line contract, which was primarily designed for the benefit of the Eskimo population itself. The subsequent letter of 1959, to which the minister referred, in which it announced there should be no attempt to curtail fraternization or association, is also commendable. However, it appears on the surface that the Canadian Marconi Company has continued to place that no fraternization clause in the remainder of its contracts, which is quite contrary to the announced intention and attitude of this government, and quite contrary to that section of the bill of rights which claims that we have always had the right of freedom and association. It would seem to me that some steps should be taken to draw this to the attention of the Canadian Marconi Company so that in future discrimination such as now exists will not prevail.

Mr. Crestohl: Just to clarify the question I put to the minister which provoked his statement, I should like to draw to his attention the fact that I asked whether he would be good enough to list for the house those disabilities under which Eskimos live in comparison with the living rights of other Canadians.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the hon. member that there are no disabilities as between the Eskimo population and the general population of Canada. There may have been some in existence in 1955, but I think our position has been clarified, without any possibility of misunderstanding by the circular letter which was distributed in 1959.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—FURTHER INQUIRY RESPECTING STARTS AND COMPLETIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works arising from the minister's statement to this house of Saturday, which confirmed that house completions for the year to date are down each month as compared to last year, and that despite this reduction there were more unsold houses at the end of April—

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am willing to answer any questions, but the hon. member is making a speech.

Mr. Speaker: I could not hear the hon. member's question, and would ask him to repeat it.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, surely a good builder must prepare a good foundation. I said that my question arose from the minister's statement which confirmed that house completions this year to date are down each month as compared to last year, and that despite this reduction in the production of homes there were more unsold houses than a year earlier. Will the minister urge his colleagues to pursue fiscal policies which will make possible an early reduction of the—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. member to lay the background to his question, but it appears that he is simply urging something and presenting an argument rather than asking for information. The practice of allowing questions on orders of the day is designed to assist members in getting urgent information rather than to present argumentative statements, which it seems to me the hon. member for Nipissing was doing. He was putting his case as an argument rather than in search of information.

Mr. Garland: Perhaps I can rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister confirm the fact that the abnormally high National Housing Act interest rate is being deliberately maintained until the government has had an opportunity of unloading Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation mortgages, permitting reinvestment at the same rate to protect the treasury at the expense of current borrowers?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, is it necessary to give an answer to a purely nonsensical question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Another example of government arrogance.

Mr. Hellyer: You have certainly saved us from that kind of an answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are going backward, like Alice in Wonderland.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, surely the minister, with his experience, must have learned how to disagree without being disagreeable.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not asking a question, as I understand it.

TRADE

GRAIN—RATE OF STERLING EXCHANGE IN SALE TO CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I should like to ask him whether he will now answer the question I asked him on May 10, 1961, which he took as notice, and which I repeated to the acting minister on May 17.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have studied the question asked me by the hon. member on May 10, and again to the acting minister on May 17, and in view of all the facts I feel I have nothing further to add to what I said on May 2.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rephrase my question and draw this subject again to the attention of the minister. Will the minister apprise the house as to what rate of exchange he used in computing the dollar value of the contract; and I refer, of course, to the contract for wheat sales to communist China?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, that is the question I understood the hon. member directed to me on May 10, and to the Acting Prime Minister on May 17.

GRAIN

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF STORAGE FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of the great interest in and need for the greatest possible use of the port of Churchill. Has the minister received representation from the Hudson bay route association suggesting that for the greater use of the port of Churchill, provision might be made for storage facilities for grain in Newfoundland for reshipment the year around?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): The answer to that question is yes.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the minister would make some comment on that and say whether steps are being taken to provide such storage facilities.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, so far this has not entered into the field of government policy. It is true that there have been numerous discussions with various business groups dealing with the question of storage facilities on the south shore of Newfoundland. Up to now no government decision has been made. We have been trying to get from them certain information which they have promised to provide us.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DECENTRALIZATION OF INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a question of the Minister of Defence Production which, in his absence on Saturday, I asked the Prime Minister. My question is this. In view of the statement reported in the press as having been made by the minister at Atholville, New Brunswick, on his recent visit there, that probably two bombs would destroy our defence industry, may I ask him whether the government or his department has any actual plans to decentralize defence industries in Canada and locate them in areas of high unemployment?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Laurier very well realizes, the government has no defence industry of its own. We depend on industry for our defence contracts. As the hon. member also well realizes, for economic reasons industry is concentrated in two large cities; otherwise the statement I made is according to the facts.

Concerning the question, are we doing anything to disperse defence industries, I stated and I repeat that all provinces have the right to have defence contracts within their boundaries.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING NUMBER OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-94, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Number.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister going to make a general statement in connection with this matter?

Mr. Balcer: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, if that is the case, then I think I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that from his side of the house during the discussion of this bill there have been a series of attacks upon the officers of the Canadian National Railways. If I understand the position of the minister it is that he is responsible in parliament for the administration of the Canadian National Railways, and I would have thought the minister would have risen in his place to make some defence of both the president and the officers of the Canadian National Railways. I must say that has been done by another member on the government side of the house but I would have thought, in view of the charges that were directed against these men, that the minister would have risen in his place and made at least some comment in answer to those charges. I ask him whether he would not comment on those charges now.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, no such attacks, as my hon. friend calls them, have been made on this bill. At the present time we are discussing an increase in the number of directors; we are not discussing personalities, and at the moment I have nothing to add.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, of course we are not discussing personalities, but we are discussing the administration as effected by the directors of the Canadian National Railways. There has been more than one demand for the resignation of one of those directors.

Mr. Churchill: Made in the discussion of this bill?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Balcer: Not in the discussion of this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: In connection with the very matter under discussion. I am asking whether the minister will not make some comment on those charges?

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. I ask the minister whether Mr. Donald Gordon is in fact a director of the Canadian National Railways at the present time?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the term of Mr. Donald Gordon as chairman and director of the C.N.R. expired on September 30 but, with regard to directors whose terms expired last September 30, section 6 subsection 4 of the Canadian National Railways Act provides that a director whose term of office has expired remains a director until his successor is appointed. Therefore Mr. Donald Gordon remains a director and is a director at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: What the minister has just said raises a very important point. I do not think this committee should be asked to proceed any further with this bill until the minister tells us what the government's intention is with respect to Mr. Donald Gordon. We are asked to increase the number of directors from seven to 12. Surely we are entitled to be told whether it is intended to continue Mr. Gordon's appointment as a director, or whether this is part of a device to get rid of him. I think, in view of the attacks that were made on Mr. Gordon by all but one of the Tory members who spoke in this house on this bill, the minister should clear up this point right away.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, may I just very briefly reiterate our party's support of this bill, although we have certain doubts whether it is going to be really successful; so much will depend upon the people who are appointed. We have left it to our colleagues of the Liberal party to raise the normal doubts about appointments made by the government. I should like to comment on what has been said. It seems to me that the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate are confusing the contributions we have had on the estimates of the Department of Transport with the debate on this particular bill. I have heard a number of government supporters call for the resignation of Mr. Gordon, but it seems to me this was on the transport estimates.

I might take this opportunity to disavow what I was credited with in this debate the other night by the hon. member for Acadia, when he said that I had decided to call for Mr. Gordon's resignation because it was the smart and popular thing to do. I have to give credit for being the first to call for his resignation to the hon. member for Danforth who, a full year before I thought Mr. Gordon should go, was in the lists expressing his opinion in this matter. I am very pleased that a number of government supporters have also come to the view that the C.N.R. situation is such that it is time for a change in management. However, it seems to me that matter really has no relevance to this bill.

I should like to point out to the hon. member for Laurier that the minister has told us that the change being made by the bill is as the result of a recommendation last year by the committee on government railways, shipping and air lines. I suggest to the hon. member that if he really wants to raise the issue of Mr. Gordon and his position with the government, the place to raise it is in the committee when it meets this year. Maybe he will come to the support of those of us who hope that from that committee we will have a recommendation on the very point about which he is talking. We will hope that the government will act as quickly or even more quickly in regard to that recommendation than it did with regard to the recommendation of last year. I hope I have not been too obscure in my reference to the kind of recommendation that I would hope will come from the committee this year.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Port Arthur has not been obscure, but he is a little bit off colour in so far as the method of procedure is concerned. It seems to me that the time to ask for information concerning a bill is when the bill is before the house. That does not preclude members from asking for information and dealing with the same subject matter when it comes before the committee on railways and shipping. However, when a bill is before the house which seeks to increase the number of directors of a crown corporation, whether it is Canadian National Railways or any other crown corporation, I think the house is entitled to know what the position is with reference to the other directors.

I am asking the minister now whether there are any other directors on sufferance in the same way that the information he has given indicates that the chairman and president is. He has stated that the order in council appointing Mr. Gordon expired on September 30, and that because of the section in the Canadian National Railways Act to which he referred Mr. Gordon is still in office although his term has expired. I should like to know the names of the other directors who are on sufferance, when their terms expired and what the intention of the government is respecting these other directors.

Before I sit down I should like to make one other point in connection with the matters under discussion now. There are seven directors of Canadian National Railways, and it is proposed by this clause to increase the number to 12. The hon. member for Port Arthur states that last year the committee made a recommendation to that effect. Whether or not there was a recommendation by the committee, the responsibility is that of the government. Whether or not the recommendation was unanimous, the responsibility is still that of the government. I take the position that it was not unanimous. I am not going to get into that argument again, but I think the minister owes it to the house to give us the names of those other directors who are on sufferance and to tell us why they have not been reappointed.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the situation is a very simple one. I think the remarks made by the member for Port Arthur make sense. There will be a committee which will be considering the affairs of the railway and, as I say, I think what he said makes sense and is fair. The suggestion that we have got to engage in a review of the status and capacity of the other directors and raise questions with regard to their status does not make sense to me and in my opinion is utterly irrelevant in considering this bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that one of the matters raised in discussion of the bill this morning cannot be passed over by the minister, by failing to reply. I do not agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that the House of Commons is not the place to discuss who shall be the directors of Canadian National Railways, and particularly what is to be done with the president of the railways.

Mr. Macdonnell: Of course it is, but at the proper time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the light of the attacks that have been made on the president by the member for Port Arthur, by a member who sits behind the ministry and by others, I believe it is not within the minister's prerogative to ignore this question. When a government servant is attacked in an way it is a tradition of our parliamentary system for the responsible minister either to concur in that attack, in which event the consequences are clear, or in the alternative to defend the person concerned.

Mr. Jones: The attack is out of order in this debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Whether or not the attack is out of order, it has been made.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not out of order.

Mr. Jones: Certainly it is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Apart altogether from that, the observation of the hon. member who has just said that the attack is out of order is senseless. An attack has been made, and the minister cannot remain in his seat and not take a position one way or the other. That doctrine was laid down in the house by Sir Robert Borden and again in 1937 by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett with regard to an attack that had been made upon the head of the mounted police, Sir James MacBrien. The reply of the then minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe, which I do not have before me, stands out so vividly in my memory as to lead me to suggest to the minister that he will want to give careful consideration to the matter before refusing to speak.

The Canadian National Railways is an important part of the government's concern, so important that the president of the railway receives a salary twice that of the Prime Minister. This is an important operation conducted in the interests of the people of the country. The head of that railway has been attacked. He has been termed arrogant; he has been termed inefficient. Other characterizations have been made respecting him, and it is inconceivable that the Minister of Transport should allow these attacks to be made on a man who holds this important position. The minister might possibly be justified in refusing to say whether or not the government proposes to extend his term. Obviously that is a matter of government policy, although in view of the uncertainty I should think the minister would want to remove any doubt in that regard. But in so far as the attack made on the president of the Canadian National Railways is concerned, the minister cannot remain in his seat and fail to make a reply.

The hon. member for Port Arthur, exercising what he believes to be his best judgment—there may be some question in the context as to that—has made serious charges, a series of charges, against the president of Canadian National Railways. This attack has been concurred in by other members sitting behind the ministry, as well as members in other parts of this house. Are these charges valid? If they are valid, then of course the dismissal of the president should take place. If they are not valid, their invalidity should be exposed. There is no one who has a greater responsibility in that exposition than the Minister of Transport who, pleasantly, amiably, sits in his seat and refuses to defend a man whose defence can only be conducted properly by the responsible minister.

This is not a new practice for this government. We have had other discussions in which officials serving in public office have not been defended in this house when attacks have been made upon them by certain members of this house. The attacks made on the governor of the Bank of Canada should have prompted the Minister of Finance on several occasions to rise spontaneously either in defence or in repudiation of the governor of the Bank of Canada. In the latter instance, of course, there would have been a clear course for the government to follow. If the governor of the Bank of Canada has been attacked, he should be defended. If the president of the Canadian National Railways—

Mr. Walker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and at the risk of being spewed with insults by the hon. member for Essex East I would say he is not in order in talking about the Bank of Canada under these circumstances.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree with the hon. member, but we have finished with that now.

The Chairman: Order. I have been listening to the debate as it has been conducted so far with the question of relevancy in mind. I wanted to allow the hon. member to continue in order to determine what direction the debate would take, if one theory or the other would prevail. I think the trend of the debate has just indicated that some ruling should be made on the question of relevancy.

When I was in the chair during the debate on second reading I expressed my view that the principle of the bill did not involve personalities, but only the number of directors. I should like to remind the committee of standing order 59, paragraph 2, which says:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I cannot see that the possible reappointment of the present directors would have anything to do with this legislation. Furthermore, may I indicate to the committee my feeling that there are other opportunities on which these matters could be more properly discussed, namely before the standing committee which has been set up and during the consideration of the estimates of the Minister of Transport. It is my view that this discussion of the appointment of the president and the administration of the president is not relevant to this bill. I think I made this clear. During the debate on second reading I heard only one hon. member raise this question in respect of Mr. Gordon, and at that time I indicated that I thought it was not relevant. This discussion lasted a few minutes, and very few members afterwards discussed this matter.

I would ask the committee, therefore, not to go too far in this direction, because it is obvious that we would not be discussing the bill at all if we did so.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to a statement made by the hon. member for Danforth, which is recorded at page 4902 of Hansard. He said:

> When I first read the bill I thought that here was an operation like that which Tommy Church tried to carry out in order to get rid of the president at that time. I thought that this would be a good opportunity to dispose of the president of Canadian National Railways—

Then at page 4905 of Hansard the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm had this to say:

(Translation):

> As far as I am concerned, I approve the bill, hoping that enlarging the board of directors will help shelving Mr. Gordon and give new hope to the railway employees.

(Text):

The hon. member for Port Arthur was allowed to make attacks on Mr. Gordon and the hon. member for Vancouver South also cast reflections on the administration, as well as some other hon. members. It does seem to me, sir, that if hon. members supporting the government are allowed to engage in this kind of debate, the opposition should not be limited when it seeks to elicit from the minister his views of the views that have been expressed.

Further to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would say, as I said the other day, that it is not proper to ask the committee to buy 12 pigs in a poke. Surely it is an extraordinary limitation of the debate that we should be asked to make up our minds to spend this extra money before we know upon what kind of people it is going to be spent and whether or not one of those people is going to be the president. I do not believe that ever before in the history of Canada has a president of Canadian National Railways or of any other crown corporation been kept on sufferance for months in the undignified way in which this government has behaved with respect to Mr. Gordon. Before I vote for any more money to be spent, I want to know whether or not Mr. Gordon is going to continue to be a director after this bill passes.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Do you think he should?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member is discussing the opinion I have expressed. I might point out to him that the debate on second reading is not required to be as directly relevant as it is in committee. I would say that the house has expressed an opinion on the principe of the bill during the debate on second reading, and we are now discussing the bill in committee. The provisions of the standing order which is applicable are very clear. The debate must be strictly relevant, so that means the rule on relevancy is more strictly applied than during the debate on second reading. I think it should be clear to the hon. member that now that we are in committee of the whole we should not revert to all the topics discussed during the debate on second reading.

Mr. Jones: On the point of order the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate raises in connection with some remarks made by the hon. member for Danforth, as reported at page 4902 of Hansard, I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that on the very same page there is recorded a ruling that these remarks were out of order. Your Honour said:

> I must warn the hon. member that I think he is discussing a matter which is not within the scope of the present debate. I do not see how he can relate the choice of directors or the services of the president of Canadian National Railways to the bill which has only one effect, to increase from seven to 12 the number of directors.

Your Honour therefore made a ruling at that time to the effect that this discussion was out of order and that would confirm Your Honour in your present decision that this discussion is still out of order in the much more limited debate in committee.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say it is true, as the hon. member for Saskatoon has said that, you did make a ruling. However, notwithstanding your ruling two other members went on afterward to do exactly what Your Honour had directed should not be done. As reported at page 4955 of Hansard of May 17 the hon. member for Westmorland had this to say:

> I believe this legislation indicates to the citizens of this country that the government at this time is very dissatisfied with the present management of the Canadian National Railways. I believe that the appointment of Mr. Gordon by the former government was a mistake. Perhaps the criticism of Mr. Gordon represents the reason that the hon. member for Laurier, when he spoke on Monday, included the following statement in his speech, at page 4843 of Hansard:
> "We on this side of the house will oppose this legislation."

Then even after that statement the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm went on to do the same thing, as my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has indicated. If those hon. members were allowed to make statements in contravention of the rules, surely we are at least entitled to ask the minister for information.

Then there is this other point to which I should like Your Honour to give consideration. It has to do with the standing order you have mentioned, which states that speeches must be strictly relevant to the item before the committee. In this case the item now before the committee is that the board of directors of the national company shall consist of 12 directors. I think Your Honour would not want to say we are estopped—in fact, I am sure of it—from asking questions having to do with those directors who are now in office and who were either appointed by the previous administration or by this administration, or whose terms of office were renewed by this administration. Surely Your Honour would not want to say we are estopped from asking questions concerning those directors; and that is what all of us have done.

Then dealing more particularly with the point made by the hon. member for Greenwood, may I say this. Because that matter can be discussed at another point or in another place surely is not a reason why it cannot be discussed here, especially if it has been discussed earlier on the resolution and indeed on second reading of the bill.

The Chairman: I may say that the references which the hon. member for Laurier read from the debate on second reading were generally accidental, because I had expressed my view. The hon. member realizes very well that one cannot prevent from being introduced into a debate a few sentences which are not relevant. However, I also said that debate was concluded. If the debate is to be strictly relevant in committee I think we have to take the bill as we find it, and it deals only with the question of an increase in the number of directors.

The hon. member said that he should be able to discuss this matter here in the chamber. He will be able to discuss it when the estimates of the Department of Transport are again before the committee of supply. I am sure that hon. members will not be precluded in any way from discussing this matter when this opportunity occurs, or before the standing committee. Because of this fact I feel that I am not taking away any right of the opposition to discuss this matter if I say it is not relevant to discuss it in this debate. In making such a decision I feel that I would not be unfair to hon. members who want to deal with this matter; and I feel that it would be only normal and reasonable for hon. members to accept the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before you make your ruling final, Mr. Chairman, as I was speaking at the time and as it was my observation that provoked Your Honour's intervention, may I say something on the point of order?

I am sure Your Honour would agree that the ruling you may possibly make in the light of what you have just said would be so far reaching as to warrant further consideration by Your Honour. Whether or not there are other opportunities to discuss this matter has nothing to do with the point at issue. The question is whether the matter now being dealt with is one that can be discussed under our rules under this bill. If Your Honour takes the position that I am not to continue any further discussion involving a request of the government or of the ministry that it should defend a servant of the crown, then I say that such a judgment will be a very far-reaching decision for Your Honour to take. Your Honour shakes his head in disagreement. However, I suggest that would be a decision so far-reaching that the greatest consideration would have to be given as to its consequences.

Your Honour takes the position that under the rules of the House of Commons we can discuss only the relevant portion of the matter before us. On that ground alone may I say this. Surely we are discussing how many directors there shall be. We are entitled to ask, as the hon. member for Laurier just pointed out, how long it is proposed that the term of one of the existing directors shall be continued or whether it shall continue beyond a certain date. Surely we are entitled to pursue this kind of argument. We are entitled to insist that the minister reply. If the minister says he cannot reply we are surely entitled to give our understanding as to why he refuses to give a definite response in that regard.

The question I have raised is of another character altogether. As Sir Robert Borden has said, it is incumbent on the government to rise at once when an attack has been made upon an officer of the crown. That attack has been made in the course of this debate. Apart altogether from the matter under discussion, it is certainly open to the minister to take the first opportunity to make a defence to an attack made on an officer of the crown. Surely the Chair is not going to take the position that such is not the situation.

On the point of order my submission is twofold. I submit that, on the ground of relevancy, this discussion comes within the context of adjudication which Your Honour seems to have in mind, because the president of the Canadian National Railways is a director. We do not know how long he shall continue to be a director. We are entitled to know how long he shall continue to be a director. If the government says that it does not propose to reply, we are entitled to know why. Then we are entitled to ask this question: Is it because the government concurs in the attacks made on the president by the hon. member for Port Arthur and other giants of this House of Commons

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then we are entitled to insist on a reply on the other ground which I think Your Honour must respect, and that is that where an attack is made on an officer of the crown the government must reply—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and I would say—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I just finish my submission?

The Chairman: I think the hon. member has made his point of order clear. Are there other hon. members who wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Your Honour has said that you think I have made my point clear. Your Honour, of course, has not the right to foreclose on any member or to prevent him from speaking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: Order. I will not entertain any discussion on that point, because it is clear that the chairman may obtain whatever assistance he desires on a point of order. However, at any time the Chair feels that the point has been sufficiently discussed, it may close the debate.

Mr. Howard: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I have only one or two comments to make, and it may be with a bit of temerity that I enter into the field of discussion among giants in this regard. However, in addition to what the hon. member for Essex East has said, I would say this.

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, have you not already made your ruling, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: I have given the floor to the hon. member for Skeena on that point.

Mr. Walker: It is on the point of order that you are allowing this discussion?

The Chairman: Yes, it is on the point of order.

Mr. Howard: I had assumed that I was rising to deal with the original point of order rather than the subsequent one which the Minister of Public Works attempted to raise. If he wishes to raise another later on we can, no doubt, engage in a discussion of that, too.

With respect I do not think it would be correct of you to insist that we should not have the opportunity of dealing with a specific subject matter at this time because later on we shall be dealing with the estimates of the Department of Transport. The inference there, I think, is that if the estimates of the Department of Transport had been completed we would be allowed to deal here with the other matter which has been raised.

That, however, is not the point to which I wish to refer now. The point to consider is, I think, that we are being asked in this legislation to dispense with the services of the present seven members of the board of directors and to appoint 12. It is not a question of appointing five additional directors. It is a question of dispensing with the services of the present seven, because this bill provides that subsection 2 of section 6 of the Canadian National Railways Act will be repealed if and when the measure now before us comes into effect, at which time there will be a new statute providing for the appointment of 12 members. Some of the original seven members may or may not be reappointed. In the circumstances I think we should be entitled to explore the possibility of the appointment of any or all of these 12 people, one of them being Mr. Gordon to whom reference has been made.

I think, too, we should keep this discussion as broad as we can for the benefit of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, who on two separate occasions over a period of two years in the railway committee has advocated, day and night, an increase in the number of directors on the board beyond the number of seven. I think the opportunity should be given to the hon. member to explain whether he has changed his mind or whether the views of his colleagues on the front bench have overridden his original ideas.

The Chairman: Does the minister wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. Balcer: No, I am not rising on the point of order.

The Chairman: I think I have made myself clear. I must say nothing which has been added to the discussion has convinced me that I should change my mind. I would only say this to the hon. member for Skeena in clarification. When I said there would be further opportunity to discuss this matter when the estimates of the department are before the committee of supply, or in the special committee set up to examine the operations of the C.N.R., I did so only to indicate that if I had a doubt as to the relevancy of this question, that would resolve it; because I should not be depriving members who wished to discuss this subject of their opportunity to do so. It is only in that sense that I referred to this possibility.

In my view the debate on second reading was a little wider than it should have been, but that is understandable because on second reading when the question of principle is under consideration the debate naturally tends to be wider in scope than the debate when a measure is before the committee of the whole. Now that we are in committee of the whole it seems to me we must consider the bill itself, which says only that the board of directors shall consist of 12 members, each of whom shall be a Canadian citizen.

Frankly I do not see how at this point of our proceedings it could be relevant to discuss personalities. It certainly could not help any hon. member come to a conclusion with regard to the proposed increase in the number of directors, because this is not a bill which refers to any individual in particular. The only thing that is relevant at this point of our proceedings is whether there is any advantage in increasing the number of directors from seven to 12 whoever they may be. I therefore decide that any reference to personalities or to the reappointment of the president or to the administration of the present president is not relevant, and I would ask hon. members to co-operate with the Chair in applying this ruling.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister about to speak? If not, I was going to ask if I could move an amendment to clause 1 which would read as follows—

One of whom in the first instance shall be the present president of the Canadian National Railways.

I so move in amendment to clause 1.

The Chairman: Would the hon. member prepare the amendment for the use of the Chair, because he knows it has to be in writing. Would the hon. member for bonavista-Twillingate now indicate if in his opinion this is an amendment which could properly be inserted at this point, and if it would not be in contradiction with another clause of the bill which provides that the directors shall be appointed by the governor general in council?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would point out to Your Honour that the present clause now contains the words "each of whom shall be a Canadian citizen". That is a qualification. If parliament can lay down that qualification, then it can surely lay down another qualification, for example "one of whom shall in the first instance be the present president of the C.N.R.". That would not limit future appointments.

My purpose in moving this amendment will be clear to Your Honour. It is to make it competent for us, without any doubt, to discuss whether this would be a desirable amendment to the present bill. It seems to me that the amendment is on all fours with the other phrase now in the bill, "each of whom shall be a Canadian citizen". If that phrase is in order then the amendment is in order, and since this amendment has nothing to do with remuneration it would not impose any additional charge on the crown.

Mr. Aiken: Without putting the question, would you give us the exact wording of the amendment, Mr. Chairman, because there have been no copies provided to us. I wonder if you would have it read?

The Chairman: Yes. Mr. Pickersgill moves:

That clause 1 be amended by adding the following words after the word "citizens" in line 9— "and one of whom in the first instance shall be the present president of the Canadian National Railways."

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment is absolutely out of order in view of your ruling a moment ago that this bill should not be the subject of debate in respect of personalities. We are only discussing an amendment to a section of the act by which we will increase the number of directors. The proposed wording is that the board of directors of the national company shall consist of 12 directors, each of whom shall be a Canadian citizen, and I submit that in accepting an amendment which states who shall be a director we would be allowing any hon. member to submit an amendment stating that the present directors shall be members of the board of directors, thereby destroying the whole principle of the bill.

The principle of this bill is to increase the number of directors, not to discuss personalities or to appoint particular individuals. This bill does not appoint Mr. So and So as a director of the Canadian National Railways; it simply increases the number of directors on the board of directors to 12, who will be appointed by order in council, as has always been the case in the past. By accepting this amendment we would be attacking the principle of the bill, and on that ground I submit that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I gather from what the Minister of Transport has said that the acceptance of this amendment would encourage a reference in the bill to individuals, opening the door to further references in the bill to the present seven directors as part of the total 12 so that parliament could then decide who should be on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, and he opposes it on this ground.

I should like to ask what is wrong with that principle. Is parliament not the supreme authority in this regard, or does the cabinet wish to maintain its control in making political appointments, the same policy followed by the Liberals in the past? While in essence I am absolutely opposed to the amendment, I suggest this is not the subject matter which is before us now. I suggest it is perfectly in order for parliament to decide who shall be on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, which is a crown corporation. I submit that parliament is competent to decide who shall be the individuals appointed to the board of directors. I suggest that if parliament did this there would be less political hanky-panky and less political influence in the operation of that railway than in the past, such as in the appointment of Donald Gordon, who the Liberal party is now attempting to have reappointed.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about this matter. In deciding whether the amendment is in order we must consider its results. It is my understanding, although I do not have the act before me, that directors are to be appointed by order in council. If we should vote on this amendment today one of two results would follow. If the amendment were carried the present president of the Canadian National Railways would be reappointed—the opposition appears to desire this—and the complete purpose of the act would be demolished. If the amendment were negatived the question of the appointment of the present president would have then been settled. I think this is completely out of order, because it would be in conflict with the other sections of the act. One section of that act requires that appointments be made by order in council, but by this amendment we would be appointing one of the directors by name. That seems to be the purpose of hon. members of the opposition in moving this amendment.

The Chairman: Order. I feel this matter can be disposed of at this point. I should first like to make two or three comments.

As has been pointed out, this amendment is contrary to certain sections of the act as it is now and as it would be if the amendment were adopted. The present act requires that the board of directors shall consist of seven directors, each of whom shall be a Canadian citizen, and that each director shall be appointed by the governor in council for a term not exceeding three years. I suggest this amendment would therefore be in opposition to that last requirement.

Second, I fail to see how an amendment which would force the present president to remain a director indefinitely, could be in order, and that is what this amendment does.

I mention these two points to indicate that the form of the amendment is doubtful. However, I feel the amendment can be disposed of on the much safer ground that it goes beyond the scope of the bill. The purpose of this bill is to increase the number or directors from seven to 12, but not to appoint them. Appointment of these directors is left untouched by this bill, and I therefore rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, prior to the amendment being moved you made a ruling in connection with the discussion on clause 1, and I respectfully appeal your ruling in that regard.

The Chairman: It seems to me that your objection should have been taken when the ruling was made.

Mr. Chevrier: The amendment was moved by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate after your ruling.

The Chairman: The hon. member should have appealed at that point.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not have the opportunity of doing so at the time, and Your Honour ruled that on clause 1 a consideration of matters outside that of the number of directors should not be allowed. If that is the ruling which Your Honour now reaffirms, I submit with deference that it is in error because, as the Minister of Transport has stated, it would then be a question of discussing personalities and—

The Chairman: Order. I do not see how the hon. member can now appeal a ruling which was made several minutes ago. I suggest that the proper time to have made an appeal was when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate moved his amendment, and I now rule that the hon. member is too late.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word or two on the point of order?

The Chairman: Order. It is not necessary for the hon. member to do so now, because it seems very clear that it is too late. If the hon. member wishes now to appeal my decision that he is too late, I suggest that is the only proper course for him to follow.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the discussion which has taken place during the last ten minutes, and I am now strongly of the opinion that the minister should take this opportunity—particularly when the Prime Minister is present, because of his responsibility as leader of the house—to rise and either defend or join in the repudiation that has been made of the president of the Canadian National Railways.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Harkness: The chairman has ruled you out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since when did you become the chairman?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Harkness: The chairman is on his feet.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you for telling me that.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am very pleased to know that.

The Chairman: Order. I ask the hon. member for Essex East to co-operate with the chairman in applying the ruling which has been made.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the ruling which you have now made, I now appeal, as I have the right to do under the rules of the house.

The Chairman: Order. A ruling has been made, and I am asking the hon. member for Essex East to refrain from discussing a matter which I have indicated is not relevant.

Mr. Benidickson: You have made a new ruling.

The Chairman: I am asking the hon. member for Essex East to co-operate with the Chair, and if that is what the hon. member for Laurier opposes, that is another matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Your Honour has asked me to co-operate with you, and the implication of that is that I was not co-operative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like Your Honour to know that is a statement to which I take the strongest exception. The Chair must exercise the greatest measure of impartiality in everything it does.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: I do not think the hon. member for Essex East can draw this conclusion from what the Chair said. But he is now embarking on a criticism of the Chair, which is clearly out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What I said was that the Chair must exercise the greatest impartiality possible, and when Your Honour asks me to co-operate the suggestion clearly is that that co-operation has not been forthcoming from me, and that I fully repudiate. What I am doing now—

Mr. Macdonnell: No, not always.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There may be occasions when through inadvertence that has not been so, but I was dealing with a particular situation. I do ask the minister to rise and defend a public servant, and Your Honour is now taking the position that that is a violation of the ruling you have already made. I strongly suggest that that is not the ruling Your Honour made. At no time did Your Honour state that a member could not rise and ask the minister simply to defend a civil servant. That is the only thing I am asking. I am not now asking—

Mr. Diefenbaker: A civil servant?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Or a servant of the crown. I thank the Prime Minister for that inconsequential correction. If Your Honour is taking the position that I have not the right to put this question to the minister, then it is a new ruling, because it certainly was not embodied in the original adjudication which Your Honour made a few moments ago. I ask the minister to reply, as he should.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The Chairman: I submit that it is clearly within the ruling I made a few moments ago, and that the same ruling applies in this instance.

Mr. Chevrier: I revert to what was done originally. Your ruling was made, and an amendment was moved to clause 1. It was ruled out of order by Your Honour. There was no opportunity to appeal your ruling on clause 1. I ask now that your ruling be appealed in accordance with the rules of the house.

Mr. Aiken: I thought it was quite clear, Mr. Chairman, that after you made your ruling the hon. member accepted it and then went on to say "In that case I move an amendment". I think that is exactly what happened.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Aiken: The ruling was accepted at that time.

The Chairman: I have made it clear that an appeal from the ruling I made before the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate moved his amendment cannot be entertained now. I think the question has been disposed of.

Mr. Chevrier: Is Your Honour holding that at this time an appeal cannot be made on the ruling you gave concerning clause 1?

The Chairman: I made myself clear. I said it was too late now to appeal from the ruling which I made before the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate moved his amendment to clause 1. That is the only decision of the Chair. It seems to me it is clear.

Mr. Benidickson: A black Victoria day.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, this is obviously a bit of front on the part of the Liberal party; it is a little sham battle. The Liberal party does not want to get involved in this sort of thing. They want to play the political game both ways, intimating they want to support Donald Gordon, yet they do not really want to vote for or against this bill, which is typical of the entire Liberal party and its attitude to this sort of thing. If they had been insistent and on their toes certainly one of them would have risen to his feet at the appropriate time and appealed your ruling, Mr. Chairman. This is traditional with them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you.

Mr. Howard: I do not know to whom the thanks of the hon. member were directed. To deal with the specific subject matter before us, namely the number of directors to be appointed to the C.N.R. board, I think it would be in order to express opinions as to the type of individuals who should be appointed as directors of the railway; that is, the general work area from which they should come. Specifically, I think one of the major reasons for inefficiency in the operation of the railroad at the moment is that the present president himself is not a railroader and has only a foggy notion as to how railways operate. I am not suggesting that I have much of a notion as to how they operate, either, but this is the considered opinion of hundreds of workmen on the railroad, and also of people in managerial positions. Their opinion is that the present administration of the railway, the present board of directors headed by the president, is not one which has too much knowledge of railroading itself. When the appointment of the 12 members to the board of directors takes place the very fullest consideration should be given to appointing individuals who are in fact railroaders, who have come up through the ranks and know something about the operation of a railroad. If this were done; if the board of directors were to consist of the largest possible number of people who were in fact railroaders, the operation of the railway itself would be far more efficient and there would be a chance of the railroad operating in the manner in which a railroad should and not, as it does in many instances at the present time, to the advantage of a competing railroad, notably the Canadian Pacific.

Will you call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the substance of my earlier remarks had to do with the composition of the board of directors after this legislation is passed. In my view the membership of the board must be such as to have the largest possible number of people from the railroad industry rather than from the professions of law, accounting and so on. I think that is one of the reasons there are difficulties in the operation of the C.N.R. at the moment. As I said, certainly it is one of the reasons for discontent among not only the hourly paid railway employees but also a certain proportion of the salaried staff. They claim that the president of the railroad is not a railroader himself and consequently does not have the full and deep appreciation of the problems involved that a railroader would have.

I also think that the 12 directors should be the type of men who would want to see the Canadian National Railways system operate efficiently and in such a way that preference is not given to the C.P.R. I think there is such an attitude at the moment on the part of the board of directors which should be overcome and will be overcome if care is exercised in the selection of the 12 people who are to be directors.

If it is permissible I should like to make a brief reference to the joint ownership of Northern Alberta Railway company by the C.N.R. and C.P.R. In the loading and spotting of cars preference is given to Canadian Pacific rolling stock on the profitable runs while the less profitable runs, in terms of both distance and commodities carried, are given to the Canadian National. Undoubtedly this is done with the consent or knowledge of the board of directors of the C.N.R. The loading and spotting of cars are carried out in such a way that the Canadian National financial structure suffers while the Canadian Pacific financial structure benefits.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question? The statement he has just made strikes me as so extraordinary that I wish he would give us some evidence with respect to the basis for his statement so that the rest of us may assess it properly. On the face of it his statement seems impossible to believe, and if he has any evidence to support it I should like to hear it.

Mr. Howard: I will be glad to go into the matter further. I have here a reissue from Edmonton, dated March 7, 1961, of a circular dated December 1, 1960. There is a reference to file DT-914. The circular is addressed to all agents and there is the heading, "Ordering and spotting empty equipment". Perhaps I might read the part that is relevant to what we are discussing. First there is a reference to certain types of cars that are available, and then the circular goes on to say:

> Cars of Canadian Pacific ownership must be loaded to competitive stations such as Vancouver, lakehead, Calgary, et cetera. Specify C.P. cars on your daily yard report.

This is one indication that Canadian Pacific cars must be loaded to competitive stations.

The Chairman: Order. I do not want the hon. member to go too far in this direction, because I do not see how he can relate what he is saying now to the increase in the number of directors.

Mr. Howard: That is why I simply made the general statement initially that this procedure obviously reflects the attitude of the directors, and it was only in answer to a question that I quoted part of the circular. I will be glad to make it available to the hon. member for Greenwood in order that he may read it at his leisure. The gist of the matter, and I think this is borne out by this circular issued by the Northern Alberta Railway, is that at the present time the C.N.R. board of directors undoubtedly takes the attitude that in a number of instances preference will be given to the Canadian Pacific while on less profitable runs preference will be given to the C.N.R. On the long, lucrative hauls Canadian Pacific cars are specified while on the short, non-lucrative hauls Canadian National cars are specified.

This, of course, is not an isolated instance. I think almost anyone having anything to do with either the C.N.R. or the C.P.R. will be able to cite additional circumstances which show substantially the same thing, that at the present time the Canadian National is not operated at peak efficiency. It does not engage in activities in which it should engage, and to a great extent I think this is the fault of the directors of the railroad.

The Chairman: Order. I do not see how the hon. member can relate his remarks to the number of directors. I have indicated before that the present administration of the C.N.R. and the acts of the present directors are not relevant to the debate.

Mr. Howard: Certainly I do not want to run afoul of your rulings in any way, Mr. Chairman, but I thought I was on the correct course so far as the rules are concerned, or maybe I should say on the right track, because in my initial remarks I mentioned that the clause under consideration seeks to provide 12 directors for the C.N.R. I also pointed out that in the selection of these directors consideration should be given to choosing people who know the railroad business in order that the railway will be able to operate at the highest possible peak of efficiency. I submit it is not operating in that manner now primarily because of the background of the president of the railroad, who is also on the board of directors, and that of other officials as well.

I thought I was on the right track, Mr. Chairman. I mentioned that I had been allowed to make these remarks without anyone calling me to order—I am not casting any reflection upon yourself—and I assumed I could proceed along this line. I was saying this is the way the board of directors should be made up, and this is the type of representation there should be on the board of directors once this legislation is passed, in order to ensure that the things which I mentioned a while ago in connection with the Northern Alberta Railway do not occur again. We should ensure also that Canadian National Railways operates to the peak of efficiency and does not operate primarily to the advantage of the Canadian Pacific, as it has in some instances.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that in order to follow your ruling and your suggestion I should not make any additional remarks along that line, because I will obviously be called to order and I certainly do not want to run afoul of the rules of the house.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How many times have you said that?

Mr. Howard: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You are only talking and wasting time, and you have been out of order.

Mr. Howard: This, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I suggest that the hon. member has been out of order for the last 15 minutes. He has been repeating over and over again his remarks about something that happened out in Edmonton.

Mr. Howard: If I could speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that the Solicitor General has been derelict in his duty in not raising this point if he felt that I was out of order. Second, Mr. Chairman, what a statement for a cabinet minister—junior "B" at that—to make, to accuse people of wasting time in this house merely because they seek to get to the core of a particular problem. The Solicitor General might want to protect the government in this field—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: —but I think it is an uncalled for and unstatesmanlike remark.

The Chairman: I think the point of order raised by the minister was well taken. As I indicated before, I thought the hon. member was taking a rather long detour to come back to the point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I just noticed that when the hon. member was replying to the Solicitor General, Mr. Chairman, you interrupted him. Now, I do not believe the Chair has the right—

Some hon. Members: Oh, come on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not believe the Chair has the right to interrupt an hon. member when he is making a reply which is admittedly not out of order, because he was dealing with the very point at issue. I say with some conviction and confidence that that kind of intervention by the Chair is not warranted.

The Chairman: If the hon. member believes there is any blame attaching to the Chair, he knows how he should proceed. I believe it is up to the Chair to intervene when some hon. member is making comments which are not relevant to the point of order which was raised. The hon. member for Essex East has had enough experience in the house to know what the rules are and what the rights of the Chair are.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have enough experience to know when the Chair is wrong.

The Chairman: The hon. member may not say that to the Chair except by a substantive motion. He knows that, and I will not entertain any more of these remarks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would have the Chair know that it has never been the practice to deny an hon. member the right to say to the Chair that he holds a contrary view.

The Chairman: A contrary view; that is correct, but not a criticism of the Chair.

Mr. Aiken: It is a bad morning.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is bad, all right; it is a black day.

Mr. Howard: What I was in the course of saying when I was interrupted by the Solicitor General was that his accusation of wasting time is certainly quite a reflection on the position that hon. gentleman holds in the cabinet.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: To me?

The Chairman: Yes, I was asking the hon. member to come back to a discussion of the bill. This point of order has been disposed of.

Mr. Howard: I have no further comments. I am not allowed any further comments, not even to ask the Solicitor General to withdraw that unfair accusation? If such is the case, Mr. Chairman, I have no other recourse but to take my seat.

An hon. Member: You may as well have been there, anyway.

Mr. Howard: What obscene applause.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Chairman. There are a number of questions which have been put to the minister and which I think should be answered in accordance with the practice when we are discussing clause 1. I have asked the minister who are the directors of the Canadian National Railways who are now on sufferance. There are seven directors presently among these 12 who are to be confirmed by this bill. I ask the minister who are the directors whose terms of office have not been renewed.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, at the present time there are four directors whose terms of office expired on September 30, 1960. However, section 6, subsection 4 of the Canadian National act provides that these directors shall remain as directors until their successors are appointed or they are reappointed. There are two directors whose terms of office expire on September 30, 1961, and there is a seventh whose term of office expires on September 30, 1962. Of the four directors whose terms expired on September 30, 1960, one has since died.

Mr. Chevrier: What are their names, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Balcer: The names are Mr. Donald Gordon, who was appointed as director and chairman on September 30, 1957; Mr. H. W. G. Gagnon, who was appointed September 30, 1957; Mr. J. A. Northey, who was appointed on the same date; Mr. Herbert Marsh, who was appointed September 30, 1958; Mr. Gerald Stewart, who was appointed September 30, 1958, and Mr. J. R. Griffith, who was appointed September 30, 1959.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister what are the duties of the directors of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Balcer: They have the duties assigned to them by the Railway Act.

Mr. Chevrier: By the Railway Act or by the Canadian National Railways Act?

Mr. Balcer: The Canadian National Railways Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister tell me where those duties can be found in the Canadian National Railways Act?

Mr. Balcer: I have not got the act in front of me, but I shall endeavour to find out.

Mr. Benidickson: While the minister is checking the Canadian National Railways Act I should like to say a few words about clause 1, which proposes to increase the number of directors of Canadian National Railways from seven to 12. It is quite true that on May 15 and 16, during the discussion of the resolution related to this matter, I was absent from the house. I felt that some of the C.N.R. problems and some of the other major problems related to this country can only be decided if the shareholders of the C.N.R. and of this country on May 29 reach a favourable decision and indicate that they are not satisfied either with the C.N.R. or with some other matters related to our country.

Since returning to this chamber I have been asked about the statements I made when the committee on railways, air lines and shipping met last year, and how I reconciled the views I expressed on March 28 and 29, 1960 with those expressed by spokesmen of our party in the debate last week. I have no difficulty whatsoever in this respect, Mr. Chairman, when I refer to clause 1 of the bill before the committee.

When I advanced, as the hon. member for Vancouver South quoted me as saying, the suggestion that we might very well in the interests of the Canadian National Railways enlarge the board of directors, as reported at page 154 of the proceedings of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, it will be found that I based my views on the belief that we could enlarge our board of directors for the purpose of having a larger crowd of boosters for the C.N.R. I was away last week, but when I read the debates that took place here I note that, as I would have expected, we do not find in the Conservative party boosters for the C.N.R. On the contrary, we find among their ranks those who always have something of ill will to say about the Canadian National Railways. In addition, as can be found at page 154 of the proceedings of the committee, in the remarks I made last year I stated:

> There are many businessmen of great promise in private life who would consider a directorate in the C.N.R. a matter of compliment, honour and responsibility.

I also said that in the main the type of persons that I would seek to put on an enlarged board of the Canadian National Railways would be those associated with the provision of freight in large quantities for the Canadian National Railways. I advanced some examples with respect to the directorate of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

When I made those remarks in the committee last year, Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I had not looked carefully enough at the appointments that had been made by this present government since June, 1957 when they took office in Canada and up to the time of my remarks in the committee on March 28, 1960. I assumed that they were honour bound to place on the directorate of the Canadian National Railways those who would advance the interests of the Canadian National Railways first and foremost. I did not assume that they would appoint to the directorate of the C.N.R., which is not merely a multi-million dollar incorporation but a multi-billion dollar corporation, any persons other than those who were the best possible available in this country to advance the interests of the Canadian National Railways and ensure its success.

Since those remarks were made by me in the committee I confess that I have examined with more care the appointments that have been made by this government to the board of Canadian National Railways, and as a result I have some diffidence about saying by my vote "Me too", that I approve an enlargement of the board through appointments of that type in the period that is ahead of us, the short period of time that might be available to this government before they lose office in which to make those appointments to the board of the Canadian National Railways.

I speak after some consideration and examination of the appointments that have been made to this board since 1957. For years and years since the Bennett government was in office, which government had no friendship for the Canadian National Railways, I assert, without any possible difficulty with respect to refutation that the Canadian National was given a directorate of citizens of this country, under the former Liberal administration, who would be beyond question likely to provide what I asked for in the committee last year, namely men who had connections with business people across this land and who were likely to provide freight, patronage, good will and prestige to the Canadian National Railways.

Since the advent of this government I assert that the Canadian National Railways has become a patronage vehicle. Indeed as the hon. member for Laurier asserted, it is related to unemployment because this might even be regarded as an unemployment measure. Defeated candidates of the Conservative party have been appointed to its board of directors. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate suggested that perhaps those who have some insecurity in the present situation might even be prospective candidates for this board in future. I observe the hon. member for Greenwood looking at me a bit askance.

An hon. Member: Can you blame him?

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the hon. member going to give us some facts to support this astounding statement?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, I am going to give some facts to the hon. member for Greenwood. As I always do, I accorded him the courtesy of looking up his remarks, which are always greatly valued here in this chamber. I found that in my absence which I have admitted, the hon. member for Greenwood contributed to the debate at the resolution stage and made reference to one appointment and one appointment only. In referring to appointments to the C.N.R. board of directors made by the present administration he referred to the late Mr. E. W. Bickle, a businessman of great note and renown. As found at page 4851 of Hansard, the hon. member for Greenwood in referring to the calibre of directors that would be expected for this multi-billion dollar public enterprise stated as follows:

In my opinion the appointments that have been made are excellent. Mr. E. W. Bickle died regretted by everybody. I think he was a great asset to the railway.

I suggest to the hon. member that I have no quarrel there. Although I never met the late Mr. E. W. Bickle, I know something about his business connections. Even though he was national treasurer of the Conservative party, I do not hold the fact of appointment to the C.N.R. against him. He was an eminent businessman with widespread business connections which I think would be an asset to the Canadian National Railways. Then the hon. member for Greenwood—and I think this is where he is blind—went on to say this:

We have no reason to think that we will not get other men of the same calibre.

I just want the hon. member for Greenwood to look at the appointments that have already been made by the present Conservative government. There was a member of the board of directors representing the Atlantic provinces who had some connection with business in a way which I think would likely provide what I call freight to the Canadian National Railways. I am not going to mention his name, but he was replaced by a defeated Atlantic area Conservative candidate. I do not hold this against him, but I do not know very much about this gentleman because I cannot find his name in the Canadian "Who's Who". His predecessor figured in that publication and was connected with many businesses; he was a man who could be expected to bring business to the C.N.R.

I find that in the provinces of western Canada which I know best a retired director of the C.N.R.—a man not referred to by the hon. member for Greenwood—who was the president of one of the largest grain shippers in western Canada was replaced by this government. As I say, this was not referred to by the hon. member for Greenwood when he mentioned a distinguished Canadian, Mr. E. W. Bickle. This replacement to represent western Canada was a man who, according to "Who's Who", prior to his appointment was connected with an investment trust, a business which provides no freight. However, he is said in "Who's Who" to be the treasurer of the Conservative party in his province.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which province is it?

Mr. Benidickson: It is the province of Saskatchewan. If one looks at the business connections of this affluent man one cannot find in "Who's Who" anything which could provide any traffic for the Canadian National Railways.

When I made the statements I did in the committee last year it is clear I was suggesting an enlargement of the board to provide men of good will to the Canadian National Railways. I indicated I had even suggested this to my former chief, the present hon. member for Laurier. But my hon. friend from Laurier, as well as the former minister of transport, now Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Hees, had the opinion that I was wrong. I was expecting that appointments of this kind would not be of a nature which would provide a patronage vehicle—an unemployment measure in favour of defeated Progressive Conservative candidates—but that they would be made along the lines I suggested to the committee on railways, air lines and shipping not only last year but on earlier occasions.

I say that the C.N.R. has not been created to provide a prestige berth for treasurers and collectors for the Conservative party and defeated candidates. It was not established for the purpose of giving office and high prestige to tribute collectors. What we need is men of good will with good connections in business and industry. If I felt that this was implicit in the bill before us then I assure the government I would be prepared to support it in accordance with the observations I have previously made, but the record stands against them. I do not trust this government to make appointments, judging from the nature of the appointments they have made so far on a basis of about four to one.

On that basis I cannot support this proposal. What we have here is not a proposition to enlarge the board for the purpose of creating good will, an expansion of freight traffic and an improvement in the other business of the railway. I suggest the only kind of freight which will be provided by enlarging the board of this company is political freight, and they are running deadhead in the appointments which have been made so far, with perhaps one exception which the hon. member for Greenwood carefully selected, ignoring the others.

In the past western Canada had on this board of directors a man, now replaced, representing Canada's largest industry who was concerned with the carriage of grain by the railways of this country. I have indicated that in spite of this we have seen the appointment of an investment man who, regardless of his merit and personal qualifications, including those possessed by a collector for the Conservative party, is not, I suggest, representative of western Canada.

I notice that last week there was some discussion about the executive committee of the C.N.R. I had some experience of this in the past but I must say I did not realize, if it was always the case, that the executive committee is appointed by the president of the railway. I can tell all my colleagues in this house that if that is so I do not approve of it. I think the executive committee of the board of directors should be appointed by the vote of the board of directors, as is the case with the C.P.R.

I do want to say that this government has not replaced a farmer from western Canada by a farmer. In the former executive committee of the Canadian National Railways, as I remember it, there was among this small group a representative of labour. He happened to be a personal friend of mine—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benidickson: He was no political friend of mine; I know nothing about his politics. I am thinking of my boyhood on the prairies at the age of 12 and of my knowing at that time a certain member of the railway running trades working out of the C.N.R. Dauphin terminal. He was a man who rose to become a distingushed labour director of the C.N.R. Mr. Daly. I only met him once after I had matured, but he was a representative of the labour force on that executive committee and for a long time he was a resident of the city of Dauphin, as I was. However, as I say, in later years he was a member of the executive committee and I think he held that office for more than ten years. The former minister of transport, my colleague the hon. member for Laurier, knows more about that than I do.

What I wish to say is this. Where is the representative of labour now on the C.N.R. executive committee? In our committee last year a question was raised which I feel should receive some amplification. That was the propriety, if it happened, of a former member of this house taking a position on the directorate of either of these big railways.

At page 153 of the proceedings of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping I made reference to an individual who I think certainly was the father of Trans-Canada Air Lines, and who has provided great qualities of leadership to Canadian National Railways. I refer, of course, to the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe. One of the greatest tributes that can be paid to the Canadian National Railways, with reference to the late Mr. Howe, is found in the calibre of man he suggested, when he was the minister, should be appointed to the board of directors of Canadian National Railways. I am sure the influence of his suggestions prevailed on his successor, as minister of transport, in so far as the calibre of man required was concerned.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

I find nothing in the appointments that were made by Mr. Howe or his successor that would indicate that the Canadian National Railways have become the tool of a political organization or party, and I feel it is unfair to make such a suggestion in respect of that person who was champion of the Canadian National Railways for such a long period of time.

Perhaps the statement was made because of the lack of facts, however, as indicated at page 153 of the proceedings of the railways, air lines and shipping committee. The present member for Port Arthur, a man described as a learned reader and perhaps a giant in that field, as reported on page 153 of the committee:

> I have gone through the C.P.R. annual report, and I find in reading that report that Mr. Crump is not the only one who speaks to the shareholders. As a matter of fact, I have seen records where Mr. C. D. Howe has spoken to the shareholders, and a certain number of the directors make comments. This is the sort of thing I thought might be possible with the C.N.R.

Then I said at that point, as reported on the same page:

> Is Mr. Howe a director of the C.P.R.?

Mr. Chairman, I rose at that point because I knew that Mr. Howe, having been so long the champion of efficiency and advance for the Canadian National Railways was not likely to very popular with the C.P.R. directorship. The hon. member for Port Arthur then is reported as having said "yes", followed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, as follows:

> Have you lost track of what he is doing now? Mr. Benidickson: Yes, in this respect, even if he was my near ex-neighbour in a northern Ontario riding.

I have checked the annual reports of the Canadian Pacific Railway—

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member if he heard the apology I made both in the committee and in the house relative to this statement, and the explanation I gave; that I had confused the report of the Bank of Montreal and the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway? I cannot see the relevancy of his remark if he heard that apolcgy and explanation.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I confess that I had not heard that explanation, or seen it. If I had, I should not have raised this subject. My colleague the hon. member for Essex East assures me that such an apology and explanation was made by the hon. member for Port Arthur, and I accept that immediately as being so. I assure that hon. member that I would not have raised this argument had I been aware of the circumstances.

Today we have this blossoming forth of vice presidents, executives and officers of the C.N.R. in a fashion that was not contemplated by the committee last year. If we were to rely upon the rosy prospects as presented to us by the Minister of Finance last year, we should not have expected the unemployment situation that presently exists. The hon. member for Laurier was perfectly relevant in saying there is tremendous resentment across this country today because of the fact that we are now enlarging the board of directors. The existing board of directors, as now constituted, have approved the enlargement of management, in respect of vice presidents, to a much greater number than is available to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Now is not the time to provide employment to defeated candidates and treasurers and others of the Conservative party. On the contrary, this parliament must insist that the management of these railways be checked very carefully because of the tremendous obligations, in respect of maintenance and employment, with which we are involved, as well as because of the effects this has on our national economy. I think the employees of the Canadian National Railways would be the first to admit that the time they are going to be hurt, in so far as lay-offs are concerned, will be this time when the C.N.R. is in poor shape so far as its balance sheet is concerned, and in so far as its income and outgo are concerned. That is the time when job slaughtering occurs.

I suggest the government should give management confidence, but at the moment even the president is not aware of his position. I do not advocate that he be reappointed, but I do suggest that what is lacking, as in every other sphere of operation in connection with government, is leadership and decisiveness. This is a multi-billion dollar corporation, but the government stands idle in its policy so that even the C.N.R. president does not know whether he is going to last until next week.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, we have witnessed this afternoon a perfect example of a political somersault. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has our sympathy in this regard, because he was in a very tough spot. There can be no doubt that he has been a great advocate of increasing the number of directors of the Canadian National Railways. He was not here last week when we discussed this bill, but he now comes into the committee with his dream of the last few days, which I doubt very much if anyone will bite on. When the hon. member appeared in the sessional committee last year he knew that every person he has named this afternoon had been a director of the C.N.R. for at least two years; but all of a sudden, in the last few days, he has found out that fact.

In 1959, almost a year before that committee's hearings, the hon. member made a very forceful and excellent argument in favour of increasing the membership of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. He made another forceful speech in this house on June 15, 1959, at which time he presented exactly the same viewpoint he has presented this afternoon. I should like to ask him now, Mr. Chairman, through you, to inform us at which time he was expressing his true opinion; is it today, or was it when he appeared in the sessional committee?

This afternoon he suggests that the government intends to use the board of directors of the C.N.R. as a political tool. I should like to inform him that this government has appointed some very excellent public servants to that board of directors, and will continue to do so. As I have said earlier, the government intends that directors on the board of the Canadian National Railways shall be first Canadians; second, good businessmen; and finally, individuals who have at heart the good of this country as well as the welfare of the Canadian National Railways, on which board they have been appointed.

Mr. Benidickson: Let us carefully analyse the appointments made by the new government since it assumed office. Will the minister deny that Mr. Bickle was national treasurer of the Conservative party? Will he deny that the second director happened to be a defeated Conservative candidate? Will he deny that the third director happened to be the treasurer of the Conservative party in a province? Will he deny that the labour representative was a reappointment which could not be abused but he had been appointed by the previous government?

Mr. Balcer: To show precisely that we are not playing politics in those appointments, may I say we did not hesitate to reappoint Hon. Wilfrid Gagnon, who had exactly the same position as far as the Liberal party is concerned as Mr. Bickle had in the Conservative party.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have been somewhat interested in the remarks made this afternoon regarding increasing the number of directors of the C.N.R. from seven to 12. As some hon. members may know, Alberta has not been favoured with a representative on the board. Alberta is one of those provinces which have been very greatly concerned over railroading and railroading problems over the years. I heartily support the proposed legislation to increase the number of directors of the C.N.R. mainly because when that is done all provinces will perhaps be truly represented on the board of directors, and the members of the board will then be able to bring to the attention of the management of the C.N.R. problems concerning their various provinces.

In the 1960 railway committee the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River stated the reasons why he thought the number on the board of directors should be increased. I agree with him in so far as the reasons are concerned. One of the reasons was that a large group could keep in touch with potential suppliers of business. This is certainly true. The hon. member went on to point out that the Canadian Pacific Railway had something like 25 directors on its board. There is quite a marked difference between seven and 25.

If the whole reason for increasing the number from seven to 12 was patronage, I do not know why the government would stop at 12. Why not make it 25 and give that many more jobs? I do not think that is the reason. The reason is to bring about a higher degree of efficiency in management with the least cost, and to give representation to all parts of Canada.

In the 1960 committee reports at page 154, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River went on to say that governments in the past as well as now have been missing the boat. Those were the words he used, and he suggested the number should be increased.

Mr. Benidickson: Not by appointment of political friends.

Mr. More: Don't be so self-righteous.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): We will deal with political friends in a minute. The hon. member went on to say:

> I think the directorate in the C.N.R. is too small in number, that it puts too much responsibility on management, and is not developing freight in the way that the rival company is.

This is the very point. The men appointed to the board of directors should be those with a particular knowledge of railroading and how it affects various parts of Canada, so they might aid the C.N.R. in developing business and freight, and who are in touch with potential suppliers of business.

We had a great deal of discussion in the committee this morning with regard to this subject and I do not intend to belabour it, other than to say I was interested in the point of view of the official Liberal party and in the fact that in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate he suggested the present chairman of the board of directors should be reappointed. The hon. member went to great lengths to move his amendment, which was seconded by the hon. member for Laurier. This is a point that should be emphasized. In the 1960 committee the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River suggested he had no knowledge of the manner in which the board of directors was appointed.

Mr. Benidickson: I confess I did not have an examination made of who they were since 1957.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am sorry; I did not hear the hon. member's remarks. But he thought the size of the board of directors should be increased. Now we see a turnabout on his part. He mentioned political connections. He mentioned that he was out telling the shareholders of the C.N.R. just how the C.N.R. and the country were being run. I suggest this is one time that the Labour-Liberal ticket on which he runs should have been changed, because the Liberal party have kind of pulled the rug from under his feet. He has returned to the house to find the members of the Liberal party going against his wishes in suggesting that the present chairman be reappointed. Consequently he finds himself in a rather difficult position.

Mr. Benidickson: No; I am not on the record on that.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): But the rest of the party is. We find the hon. member in a very difficult position. He is trying to regain face and protect himself. He is now trying to explain why he is going to vote against this particular measure, because he says he has no confidence in the government appointing men who have great knowledge and are potential suppliers of business to the C.N.R. He thinks the government cannot appoint men who will work in the best interests of the C.N.R.

No one on this side of the house has condemned the operations of the C.N.R. to any great extent. I have spoken against the present chairman of the board of directors to some extent, but at no time did I say I did not have confidence in the railroad or in its management. I think the C.N.R. will always have a part to play in western Canada, and it certainly should have representation on the board of directors. All provinces in Canada, and particularly the western provinces, should have representation on the board.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Chevrier: I want to deal very briefly with one or two of the remarks made by the minister. In his reply to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River he indicated that the hon. member had made a political somersault. Of course if the minister had taken the trouble to read carefully what was said in the committee and compare it with what the hon. member said here this afternoon he would find that there was no political somersault. Even if there were one, it would not compare with the inaction of the government in allowing four out of seven members of an important board such as that of the Canadian National Railways to remain without knowing whether they are to be reappointed. After all, as has been said in this house, here is a crown corporation doing a billion dollars worth of business a year. Has anyone ever heard of a corporation of that importance and magnitude where four out of seven directors are still without knowledge as to whether their term of office is to be extended?

I think this shows not only inaction and indecision on the part of the government, but bad administration. After all, if you want a corporation to operate properly the directors who run the business ought to know what their standing is in so far as the board is concerned. These four certainly did not know where they stood.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River made a very telling argument against the government in so far as political appointments are concerned. He indicated that the government had appointed the national treasurer of the Conservative party, a defeated candidate of the Conservative party and a party treasurer in the province of Saskatchewan and to that I can add the fact that the present government appointed as auditor of Canadian National Railways the defeated Conservative candidate in a Montreal constituency. These are four important positions one of which commands a large salary, particularly that of auditor of Canadian National Railways, and these appointments seem to have been of a purely political nature.

The hon. member also indicated that the appointment of Mr. Wilfrid Gagnon to the board of directors was renewed some time ago, and in answer to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I think the minister left the impression that Mr. Gagnon had been a treasurer of the Liberal party. He was not a treasurer of the Liberal party at any time when I was a member of the government. He certainly had nothing to do with funds or with the position of treasurer of the Liberal party either in the province of Quebec or elsewhere. On the contrary, he was appointed by the late Mr. Howe because of his business connections, because of the fact—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, will any member of the house point out to me where Wilfrid Gagnon was a treasurer of the Liberal party? If any member can do so, let him rise and prove it because I do not believe that to be the case.

Mr. Balcer: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Can he prove to the committee that one of the present directors is a treasurer of the Conservative party?

Mr. Benidickson: "Who's Who" says that the man from Saskatchewan is.

Mr. Chevrier: I can affirm to the house that Mr. de Lalanne was a defeated candidate of the Conservative party in a Montreal constituency. I can affirm to the minister that another appointee, and I do not want to mention his name, was also a candidate of the Conservative party in the Atlantic provinces. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has established the veracity of the statements he made with reference to two other members of the board of directors as treasurers of the Conservative party. Therefore there are four of them who are fairly closely allied to the Conservative party.

I want to come back to Mr. Wilfrid Gagnon who is a highly respected citizen of the province of Quebec and a businessman of high calibre who in past years rendered tremendous war service in the department of munitions and supply under Mr. Howe when I was there as Mr. Howe's parliamentary assistant, a man who even until this day has been able to bring a great deal of business to Canadian National Railways. I presume that is the reason why the minister and the government renewed his appointment.

Mr. Balcer: May I ask one question? Does the fact that Mr. Wilfrid Gagnon, whom I know personally, is an extremely qualified businessman and a great Canadian not prove precisely that one can be very active in political life and at the same time be a great Canadian businessman and render great service to any board to which one is appointed?

Mr. Chevrier: There is a difference—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: If hon. members will allow me to continue, there is a difference between the statement made by the minister and saying that a person is a treasurer of a political party. It has not been proven, nor is it a fact, that Mr. Gagnon has ever been a treasurer of the Liberal party. I should like to put a question to the minister before I sit down. Will the minister tell the committee whether he is of the same view as his predecessor, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, that the board of directors of Canadian National Railways is doing a good job? As found on page 153 of the proceedings of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping last year, the minister's predecessor was asked this question by the hon. member for Port Arthur:

I would like to ask the minister if he is satisfied with the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

The answer of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce was "Yes". I should like to put the same question to the minister, first with reference to the directors of Canadian National Railways and then with reference to the president of Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Balcer: All I can say is that all these people, of course, are doing a good job, but the purpose of the bill is to give them a chance to do a better job.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister answer this question? Is he satisfied with the services of Mr. Donald Gordon as president and chairman of the board of Canadian National Railways?

The Chairman: Order. I have indicated my view on this question.

Mr. Chevrier: You have indicated your view, Mr. Chairman, but you have allowed a discussion this afternoon that has gone far beyond that point. I say to you that my question is a perfectly fair one having regard to the discussion that has taken place. After all, what we are doing is increasing the board of directors from seven to 12 and surely an hon. member has a right to find out from the minister whether he is satisfied with the seven directors at present on the board. Surely that is not an infringement of the rules of the house. I ask the minister that question.

Mr. Balcer: I must say that personally I have always had extremely good relations with Mr. Gordon. He has co-operated during the time I have been the minister and personally I am satisfied with his work.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment very briefly on Bill No. C-94, the purpose of which is, of course, to increase the number of members of the board of directors from seven to 12. I believe that the bill is the most unnecessary and untimely piece of legislation to be introduced by the government since it has taken office. I have waited patiently for the minister to advance sound reasons for the increase in the number of directors and certainly in my view no compelling reasons have been advanced up to this stage.

That the bill is untimely there is no doubt. What possible justification can there be for increasing the number of directors when wholesale lay-offs of C.N.R. personnel are taking place across the country? Tomorrow morning in my own city of North Bay there will be a substantial lay-off of C.P.R. personnel. Surely this is a reflection of the lack of policy of the government with respect to lay-offs on the Canadian National Railways during periods of high unemployment. When the Canadian National is allowed to dismiss people at will, naturally other railways follow suit in similar circumstances.

What justification can there be for increasing the number of directors when the government will not even indicate its support for the present directors? Surely the government should indicate its support for the present directors or replace them. Surely this display of indecision has a demoralizing effect on the effective management of Canadian National Railways. Surely we are entitled to know the government's attitude before granting this further authority to increase the number of directors. While this indecision continues, while these wholesale lay-offs of C.N.R. personnel continue, failing any assurance that top-flight business executives and top-flight railroaders who know the problems of railroading will be appointed, I can certainly not support the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to make a few remarks about the matter under discussion.

Since this morning, we have been hearing the hon. members of the opposition, in pious or offended terms, criticize this government for what they maintain are appointments made on the basis of political patronage.

Mr. Chairman, a mere glance at the careers of those who have been appointed to the board of directors of the Canadian National, by this government, will show that their record and qualifications fully justify the confidence that the government put in them to manage or decide upon the C.N.R. business.

Furthermore, there is nothing wrong in the members of a government, when it comes to making an appointment favourably, considering those among their friends who deserve a reward for certain services, and especially for their marked contribution to the affairs of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I find it is rather strange that hon. members opposite should rise in protest against what they call political patronage. Can they really take the floor, one after the other, to say seriously that the leaders of the Liberal party of years past, and especially those of the previous governments have never considered, when an appointment had to be made, in the C.N.R. or elsewhere, the services of their friends?

Can the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), who was on very intimate terms with the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, tell us seriously that his famous master never considered the political viewpoint when making appointments? Can those gentlemen tell us that Mr. St. Laurent has always ignored political considerations, when it was a case of appointing someone to a certain position? Can those hon. members opposite tell us with a straight face that they have never tried to reward the political services of some of their friends through appointments? Do the hon. members opposite really have the gall to tell the house they have never considered the services of their supporters in their 22 years of administration? Can they really say they have ignored those services, and have really chosen at random, or in other parties, the men they wanted to appoint to any office? I do not believe it, Mr. Chairman.

I do not believe our friends opposite, and particularly the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who I see is smiling, could say that political considerations were always very far from the mind of the Hon. Mackenzie King. In fact, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is one of the biographers of Mr. King, recognizes in his book the political acumen of his former master. Does he not recognize himself that his former master was always deeply concerned with the future of the Liberal party and looked after that future whenever opportunity arose?

I really believe, Mr. Chairman, that the present discussion is not serious, and I shall go as far as to say that it is in rather poor taste for the members opposite to accuse the present government of a mistake, if indeed it is one, that they themselves made repeatedly during the 22 years they were in office, namely from 1935 to 1957.

I also fail to understand why our friends opposite persist in saying that the present government is showing indecision and lack of leadership by asking the house to increase the membership of the C.N.R. board of directors. On the contrary, I feel this is a measure showing determination and a progressive spirit, because the present government realizing the importance of railways in our country and admitting that the C.N.R. constitute a fiscal burden for the treasury, that demands the attention of the best minds in the country, acknowledges the fact that, in view of the importance of the C.N.R. services, an increased number of directors should be entrusted with the care of looking into its operations. Therefore, the government feels it is essential to help the C.N.R. administration by increasing the membership of its board of directors.

I cannot find any evidence of lack of leadership or any trace of indecision in this legislation. Quite the contrary, I feel that it indicates real decision, and if there is any indecision and confusion, it is in the minds of my hon. friends opposite who are trying to play politics with this question, which in my opinion should be foreign to politics.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great attention to the remarks of the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) who just resumed his seat, and I find weaknesses in his comments on two counts.

First, he admitted that political considerations intervened in appointments. As a matter of fact, one can infer from this avowal that political appointments have been made in the past or that some will be made in the future as far as the C.N.R. is concerned.

The second weak link in his argument, is that he shifts—

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I wish to point out that I never said that political consideration would intervene with future appointments to the Canadian National Railways. I simply said and I repeat that when a man possesses the required qualifications and is considered qualified to serve his country, there is surely nothing wrong in appointing such a man to a position when he has, in certain circumstances, shown himself to be in sympathy with the cause of those who have a say in such appointments.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, there is no difference between what I said and what the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) has just stated. Consequently, there is no point of order.

Mr. Sevigny: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I must again rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Laurier—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The Chairman: I understand that the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) claims that the Associate Minister of National Defence cannot rise on a point of order to correct a statement which he himself attributes to the minister unless he allows him to take the floor. In other words, the Associate Minister of National Defence will have to wait until the hon. member for Laurier has concluded his remarks before making any correction he deems appropriate.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I accept your ruling and I shall wait until the hon. member for Laurier has resumed his seat to make whatever correction I find necessary.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the Associate Minister of National Defence for giving me the floor.

As I was saying, the first weakness of his statement was that he himself acknowledged that the present government has made and will make in the future political appointment.

Second, his comments were completely irrelevant.

We are considering a bill to increase the number of C.N.R. directors from seven to 12.

It is therefore not a question of political appointments throughout the country, which was what the Associate Minister of National Defence was talking about. He said: "Did the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) and his former chief, the late Mr. Mackenzie King, never make any political appointments?" Some political appointments may have occurred, but those made by Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. St. Laurent were not to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

This government which came into power hardly four years ago, has already made four political appointments to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, which has only seven members. Moreover, it appointed Mr. de Lalanne, defeated Conservative candidate, to the post of auditor general of the Canadian National Railways.

I have here the reports of the Canadian National Railways, and would like the Associate Minister of National Defence, or the Minister of Transport to tell us where, with perhaps one exception, there have been political appointments, in the true sense of the word, to the board of directors of the Canadian National when we were in power.

We tried not to let party politics interfere with the administration of the Canadian National Railways. I said so the other night, and I repeat today, that if we want to destroy the management of the Canadian National, let us introduce politics into it. I would not say that this government means to do that, but the appointment of four out of the seven present directors were political or nearly political appointments. Thus, it becomes very difficult later on not to introduce, in some form or another, the question of partisan politics with regard to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

If we want the C.N.R. to be run efficiently by its board of directors, by its executive, the appointments should not be made on a political basis.

And in reply to my hon. friend the Associate Minister of National Defence, I would point out that there have already been four appoinments that smell strongly of politics.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief in my reply to the hon. member for Laurier.

I have followed his remarks closely, and I should like to deal with the points he made.

First, I deny stating that the present government intends to make appointments to the board of directors of the C.N.R. on a purely political basis. I simply said that the government is trying to recognize ability wherever it exists, and I added something which I think is quite natural, that the government recognizes the ability of its supporters, just as former governments have always done. At no time have I stated that the appointments to the C.N.R. would be based solely on political services present or past.

Second, I would point out to the hon. member for Laurier that political considerations have not always existed, as he perhaps would have the house believe in previous appointments of this government. The best proof is that in 1957 the Hon. Wilfrid Gagnon was reappointed to the board of directors of the C.N.R.

The Hon. Wilfrid Gagnon is a personal friend of mine, a man of great distinction whose stamp on the affairs of Quebec and Canada has been impressive. But there is no denying—and that is perfectly within his rights—that he has definite leanings towards the Liberal party and that he is an eager supporter of that party—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is no sin in that.

Mr. Sevigny: —which did not prevent the Conservative government from renewing his appointment some three years ago when the opportunity arose.

[The Chairman.]

We recognize the merits of the Hon. Wilfrid Gagnon, but we would appreciate it if the hon. members opposite, and particularly the hon. member for Laurier, would also recognize the unequalled qualifications of a man such as Mr. Jim de Lalanne who may have Conservative affiliations but who is after all, one of the most outstanding accountants in the province of Quebec and a man whose proficiency in business and personal distinction are recognized by all those who know him.

It may be true also that the late Mr. Bickle was a Conservative. But my hon. friends opposite are not going to deny that his business, industrial and economic ability was acknowledged not only in Canada but also beyond our borders.

Those appointments were made on the basis of the undeniable ability of men like Mr. Bickle, Mr. de Lalanne and Mr. Gagnon. Therefore, it is my honest opinion that it is out of place at this time to try to get a political flash in the pan out of this question of appointments which have been made or will be made at the Canadian National.

I for one can give my hon. friends opposite my assurance that these appointments will be made on the basis, before anything else, of qualifications, ability and skills of those who will be chosen.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the Associate Minister of National Defence has invited me to participate in this debate, Mr. Chairman, I feel that I should not disappoint him. I might say that with one proposition he made I would have no quarrel nor, I am sure, would my friend the hon. member for Laurier; and my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River expressly stated that he had no quarrel with him. In the case of Mr. E. W. Bickle, though he was very prominently associated with hon. gentlemen opposite, we recognize his competence to be on this board. My friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River stated that expressly. It seems to me the fact that a man is a Conservative, a Liberal or even a C.C.F.'er should not rule him out from public service if he has competence to do the job. The first question to be decided is whether he has competence to do the job.

Mr. Macdonnell: It is so nice to hear the voice of common sense.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going right on with the rest of my common sense and perhaps the hon. member for Greenwood will not like it so much. When all the appointments that have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite on their own initiative are all associated with their party, I think one is inclinde to wonder whether it is competence to do the job or party service that has been put first.

Mr. Balcer: May I ask one question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Balcer: I wonder whether the hon. member could name one Conservative that the Liberal government ever appointed to the board of directors of the C.N.R.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not have the history of the C.N.R. board before me but I would recall to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; I can name one, and he is a very prominent one. You will find him—

Mr. More: It takes you a little while to dig him out.

Mr. Chevrier: No; it will not take me very long to dig him out.

Mr. Sevigny: It must have been a long time ago.

Mr. Balcer: In 1896?

Mr. Chevrier: No. It is relatively recently. He was a director from the Toronto area. He is Mr. J. A. Northey.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that I have not the knowledge of the board of directors of the C.N.R. possessed by the hon. member for Laurier and I do not pretend to have it. But since the Solicitor General raised that point, may I say this. I can think of two very prominent Conservatives who were placed in high positions by Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. C. D. Howe. I refer to Mr. Henry Borden and Mr. Justice McTague.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Look at the judges we appointed to the supreme court.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, as my hon. friend from Essex East has reminded us, just look at the gentlemen appointed to the supreme court by Mr. St. Laurent. Over the years all these appointments were made on the basis of competence first. That is not the only point. Certainly, I do not say that to be a politician is a dishonest thing. On the contrary. But I say that when it happens that every one of the new appointments by the present government is a political appointment, one wonders which consideration came first.

Mr. Macdonnell: Before the hon. member works up to a full head of steam, am I not right in thinking that Mr. Gagnon was reappointed? He is a well known Liberal.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. gentleman for keeping me on the rails, because he has helped me very much. There were three or four reappointments made, the Minister of Transport told us, in September, 1957, between the two elections.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the point.

An hon. Member: Mr. Gordon was reappointed, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, Mr. Gordon was one of them. He was reappointed by the hon. member for Broadview when he was minister of transport. Mr. Gordon was reappointed by the present government and they can take whatever satisfaction they like out of that. It is a fact he was reappointed in September, 1957. But why, between September, 1960 and May 22, 1961, has this government been unable to make up its mind whether it intends to reappoint these people whose terms expired at that time? Here is a government asking us to let them appoint 12 directors while they cannot even make up their minds about three or four they have had the right to appoint since September. Here we have these uncertain, leaderless, hesitant ladies and gentlemen occupying the treasury benches who cannot even decide whether to reappoint Mr. Gordon or not. They say that we must not ask them any questions about this; that all we should debate is the question of the number of directors, not who those directors will be.

That is not good enough, but it is typical of the attitude being taken by the government. They say: give us a blank cheque and we shall run the country in any way we like. That was the view taken by the Bennett government and it is apparently the view now held by ladies and gentlemen opposite. But it is not the way parliament should be run and surely we should not be expected to give approval to this measure and enable the government to dither for another year saying eeny, meeny, miny, mo about 12 people when they are unable to conclude their eeny, meeny, miny, mo about three or four. It is ridiculous for the minister to ask us to give him power to appoint more directors when he is unable to make up his own mind, or is not allowed to make up his own mind, whether to invite the present president of the C.N.R. to continue in office.

I say that a decision should have been reached long ago. If they do not want Mr. Gordon they should get rid of him, and if they do want him they should give him enough prestige to do the job properly instead of leaving him suspended between heaven and earth. The hesitation displayed by members of the government with regard to this whole business will not be lessened by raising the number of directors from seven to 12. Hopeless behaviour of this kind is inexcusable in connection with an organization, which, as my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River has reminded us is a multi-billion dollar corporation costing the Canadian taxpayer millions of dollars a year, though this was not the case a few years ago when we had a different administration. It is inexcusable that the man in charge of this corporation should not know whether he is still the head of that organization or whether he is on some kind of probation after many years of service. I say we should not persist with this bill until this government tells us who is to be the head of this company. Is it to be Mr. Grosart or Mr. John Fisher—

Mr. Balcer, Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman laughs, but it would not surprise me at all because this government says every problem can be cured by more information and more publicity. The Prime Minister has been saying that for months. The people do not know our record, he says. If we could only tell the people our record everything would be all right. Well, everything is not all right. Before you can get things right you have to act. Results are not obtained by appointing press officers and publicity people—Mr. Fisher to assist Mr. Grosart, Mr. Grosart to assist the government, and someone else to assist in some other capacity, all in the field of information. Yet when you want to get real, solid information such as the name of the man who is going to head the C.N.R., there is silence, either because the government cannot make up their minds or because they fear to tell the public what they are going to do. I suppose, as with everything else, Mr. Gordon and the rest of us will have to wait until after the by-elections before they know what the appointments are going to be. In any case, I doubt if they are going to like the results of those by-elections or whether those results will help them to make up their minds.

I rose not really to say all this but to speak on another subject. I was diverted by the diversion—the very entertaining diversion—of the Associate Minister of National Defence, who came to the aid of the Minister of Transport and gave us the assurance—an assurance which, I take it, he was authorized to give—as to the character of the appointments that would be made. The Minister of Transport had asked us to trust him. The associate minister said: I will give you my assurance—we intend to appoint the most competent people. That was a typical and interesting declaration by the hon. gentleman. However, I want to turn my attention to a statement made by the distinguished member for Acadia who suggested that the real purpose of this legislation was to ensure that every province would be represented on the board. It seems to me that, since the hon. member for Acadia was not backward in advancing the claims of his province, the minister, when he comes to reply should tell us whether Newfoundland would have a director among these 12.

An hon. member: Joey.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, there would be some decision, if that were done, instead of the present indecision. I am not in favour of increasing the directorate but if we are going to have this measure rammed down our throats Newfoundland should be represented.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member does not know the answer to that question he is like a number of other Tory members of this house. There are some of us who know why Newfoundland should be represented—because it is a part of Canada. I should like to know whether Prince Edward Island is going to be represented. I should like to know whether Nova Scotia will be represented and whether Cape Breton Island which has not got much out of this government is going to be represented. At present there are two directors from Saskatchewan, none from Alberta, none from British Columbia. Is Manitoba to be represented? Is Alberta? Is British Columbia? I think we are entitled to be told what the pattern is to be. If it is intended that the 200 sheep shall be used to put this bill through, regardless of the fact that it will not do the country any good, it will not be doing the C.N.R. any good either.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to rise on a question of privilege arising out of a matter which has come up for discussion in this committee before, and which has arisen again at this moment. The committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines is at this moment dealing with the proposed amendment to the Freight Rates Reduction Act. It seems to me that the Minister of Transport, who attended the meeting of that committee this morning, but who is prevented from being here this afternoon because of this present legislation, as well as several of us on this side of the house, including the hon. member for Essex East, would also like to be there.

We made it clear to the committee this morning that it would be impossible for us to be in attendance this afternoon because of the legislation to be considered by the committee of the whole this afternoon. I made it clear that the first priority, in so far as I was concerned, was with the House of Commons rather than the committee, although I feel it is of extreme importance for several of us to be in attendance at that committee. Because of the fact the standing committee is meeting now, which I did not expect or anticipate, it seems to me that this committee should take cognizance of this matter, Mr. Chairman, and you might deem it advisable, in your wisdom, to send notice to that committee suggesting it meet tomorrow.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, may I just address myself to the minister by saying that he was present at the committee this morning and heard the objections that were registered there regarding that committee sitting at a time when we would be engaged in matters having to do with the Department of Transport, which are of concern to the minister directly, as well as to other hon. members, particularly on this side. I suggest to the Minister of Transport that it is a travesty on parliamentary efficiency for us to be placed in this position. He heard our pleas this morning. He will remember what the Prime Minister said regarding our first responsibility being in this house. Therefore will the minister now take steps to prevent this two-ring circus in respect of matters that engage his attention?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East is always very flowery, and has an inevitable tendency to exaggerate everything. He is very entertaining, but I suggest he should stay closer to the facts.

This morning when the committee decided to sit at two o'clock, it was decided by a vote. I proceeded to that committee meeting at five minutes to two this afernoon and found representatives of the trucking industry, who had been sitting through the meeting all morning, ready and waiting to read a brief to that committee. I remained there for half an hour while this very important brief was being read. I do not know what took place following that, as I had to leave to come to this chamber. However, I would remind my friend, the hon. member for Essex East, that the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, like other committees of this house, is the master of its own rules. The minister has nothing to do with the rules of that committee, and the decision taken this morning was not a decision of the government nor of the minister, but a decision entirely of that committee. As far as I am concerned, I have no intervention to make regarding decisions made by that committee.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to say just a word in this regard? When the motion was made, of which the minister speaks, I recorded my opposition to it.

Mr. Balcer: Oh, yes.

Mr. Chevrier: As the minister knows, and as I have been informed by the whip, a quorum was not reached until 2.20 p.m. As a result, there was only an interval of ten minutes left before the house bell rang at 2.30. Moreover, as every hon. member on both sides of the house knows, who sat on the committee this morning, several points of interest were opened up which were to be continued at that committee meeting this afternoon. It has not been possible for me to take part in that discussion, nor will it be as long as that committee sits while this house is considering particularly important matters.

Mr. Balcer: The hon. member for Laurier could have attended at two o'clock until 2.30 and expressed, at that time, what he is now expressing.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I just—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: May I say that—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, may I be allowed to say that I did not attend at two o'clock because I accepted the invitation of Mr. Speaker to a luncheon to listen to Right Hon. Earl Attlee, the former prime minister of the United Kingdom, which did not conclude until 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Hon. members will appreciate that this committee is only entitled to consider the bill which is presently before it, and cannot make any decisions regarding the problem which the hon. member for Laurier has raised. As long as the committee of the whole is considering this bill, it must confine its discussions to that subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest there is an alternative course which this committee could take, and that would be to rise and report progress. The minister could move that the committee rise and report progress, and then consider some business which does not require the presence of the Minister of Transport or the hon. member for Laurier—some of the other government business, of which we are told there is so much on the order paper. I suggest the minister could easily relieve parliament of this embarrassment by moving that the committee do rise and immediately report progress, with leave to sit again when the other committee has concluded its sitting.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the course suggested by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is precisely the one I had intended to follow.

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: Your apology is unnecessary. I merely wished to indicate that I intended to follow the course you have suggested. It is true that a member of the cabinet has no authority or control over the actions which a committee of the house takes, at least in theory, though it is not always followed in practice. I suggest that is as it should be. While we may only concern ourselves with the bill before us now, regardless of whether the committee should continue this course at the same time a standing committee of the house is dealing with questions relating to the activities of the Department of Transport, this appears to be the practice of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard: It will be recalled that last session, when the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act were being considered, this same course was taken in order to push those amendments through the committee by doing so while the committee of the whole was considering the estimates of the Department of Justice.

I suggest the only proper thing to do at this stage, to give recognition to the fact that there is an extremely important subject matter being dealt with by a committee of this house, is for this committee to rise and report progress requesting leave to sit again, and to proceed with another item of business with which the Minister of Transport is not concerned. I accordingly move:

That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, is this motion debatable?

The Chairman: This motion is not debatable. Is the committee ready for the question?

Motion negatived; Yeas, 14; nays, 31.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Howard: Perhaps this is one way in which members on the other side desire to get the thing through, namely to hold out the fact that something is happening elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Tyranny of the majority.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I think both remarks are extremely unfair. The committee has just taken a decision. We all know that no member should reflect on the vote of another member.

Mr. Howard: I am not reflecting on anybody.

Mr. Balcer: The remark is absolutely untrue.

Mr. Howard: I assume the minister is rising on a point of order with regard to my initial remarks. I was not sure because there was an interjection from an hon. gentleman on the other side and from an hon. gentleman on this side. The minister's point of order apparently had something to do with my initial remarks about the activities of the committee. I cast no reflection upon any members of this committee or on how they voted. I was making some remarks about the course of comments that emanated from the other side of the house when I started to speak. That is what I was talking about. If they do not get their way one way they will try to get it another. The minister may toss around points of order and refer to unfairness and the like, with equal generosity, but they do not apply to me in this particular instance.

Mr. Winch: Only 31 out of 204.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: I was interested in the sort of public confession of political sin engaged in by the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order, I do not see anything in this bill which deals with the conduct of any member of this house.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member should be allowed a certain amount of latitude to comment on the remarks that have been made on this subject. The way I take it is that some hon. members oppose the bill on the ground that the government would be unable to make good appointments. This is how the point happened to be raised. I think the hon. member should be allowed to comment briefly on this point.

Mr. Howard: What I was attempting to do, Mr. Chairman, was to deal with matters that have already been raised. Incidentally, I think it is quite apparent from the remarks of the Associate Minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that each of the two old line parties agree with political appointments. The associate minister flavoured it a little bit by saying that you look first at the qualifications, the qualities and abilities of the individual, and if those are acceptable, then there is nothing wrong with his being a member of the same party which is in office. We all know what really happens is that the political connection is looked at first, and then if the person is able and considered worthy and qualified he is appointed. If he is not considered able and qualified they go to someone else in the same political party. This is the way in which political appointments are made but it is covered up by reference to abilities and qualifications.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what happens in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Essex East makes a remark. This is what came through the translation system in so far as the hon. member for Laurier is concerned. "There are ways to do this". Well, certainly he should know that there are ways to make political appointments so that it looks as if it is the agreeable thing to do. The dragging out of agreements and references to one or two isolated instances of appointment of people of a different political faith to positions in no way changes the initial political appointments made.

I have raised this matter in the house, and other hon. members have also referred to it. I have mentioned the number of appointments that this government has made purely and simply on a political basis. The chief justice of the court of appeal of the province of British Columbia, Mr. Justice DesBrisay, was the man who handled all the money for the Conservative party in the 1957 federal election in British Columbia. Mr. Field, appointed to the industrial development bank by this government, was the individual who handled the funds for the party in British Columbia in 1958. The board of broadcast governors and the census commissioners are another prime example.

Mr. Macdonnell: Nonsense.

Mr. Howard: This has been read into the record time and time again.

The Chairman: Order. I would advise the hon. member not to go too far. I appreciate the fact that he can give some examples, but I think he should stick as closely as possible to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Howard: I am glad that you appreciate the fact that I can give some examples. I wish members on the other side would also appreciate that I can give them some as well.

Mr. Lambert: Talk about Saskatchewan.

Mr. Howard: Here is one of my noisy friends opposite who persists in growling and grumbling from his seat. He knows that his remarks invite comments from me, and he knows full well in replying to them I will be out of order. He does it deliberately. He should be ready to take his medicine. If he does not wish to do that, then he should get up and speak and make similar comments in disagreement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. member agree that it is the first good contribution he made today?

Mr. Howard: No, I would not even agree with that. I find that the hon. gentleman, like so many of his friends on that side of the house, makes excellent comments when he rises to leave the chamber.

I submit there has been a sufficient degree of public confession that political appointments are made on the basis of party affiliations and considerations to indicate what is going on. This confession was made by the Associate Minister of National Defence and by members of the previous government, such as the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. This should be proof positive that the Conservative and Liberal parties should not be given the authority to make appointments to boards, commissions and so forth if they are going to carry on in this particular fashion, and there is every indication that the Canadian National Railways board of directors of 12—

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. member a question? He has just used the phrase "carry on in this particular fashion". This is an attempt to suggest that our public service is full of unworthy appointments. I believe that is not true, and if he thinks it is so let him say so. I believe the Liberal party as well as ourselves on the whole appointed good people. We have not carried on this country all these years because a lot of bad people were appointed and I protest against this attempt which is being made to smear the public service.

Mr. Howard: My friend can protest all he likes, and I have the greatest admiration for his protestations, his feelings and his kindness and also his gentle manner on all occasions, but I would point out to him through you, Mr. Chairman, that in this instance he is protesting about the wrong thing. I did not for one moment imply that the appointments were wrong. The tenor of my remarks was that the appointments, both during the Liberal party regime and this party's regime, or the vast majority of them, were made on a political basis. Attempts are being made to gloss this over and to show that they were not, and this is what I disagree with. If you are going to have political appointments, for heaven's sake have the decency and the honesty to come out and say so. This in no way implies—

Mr. Pallett: Will the hon. member permit a question.

Mr. Howard: I have not finished dealing with the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood. I can appreciate that the hon. member for Peel has a question but if he will just contain himself until I answer the hon. member for Greenwood—

Mr. Pallett: When the hon. member is answering would he also say how many Liberals and Conservatives have been appointed to boards in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Howard: Will my hon. friend let me deal with one question at a time, and then I will get around to his question.

Mr. Thrasher: Tear down.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there is another snide remark typical of the remarks that are being made purely and simply to raise a big furore about nothing when hon. members opposite are hurting because the truth is coming out and is being directed toward them.

An hon. Member: You are the one who is getting hurt.

Mr. Howard: That is another typical comment designed purely and simply to raise a big fuss about nothing and to prevent me from answering the question raised by the hon. member for Greenwood. If I may come back to that, the tenor of my remarks was that we are not casting aspersions against the individuals who have been appointed. I would not deign to do so in any instance but if I did I would be prepared to substantiate my statements as in the case of Mr. Gordon. I do not think he is a competent individual to run the railroad but that has nothing to do with the manner in which he was appointed. I say that when hon. members on the treasury benches and members of the Liberal party get up and protest that they have made no political appointments and that in making appointments they considered the qualifications of the individual first, then I say that is purely and simply poppycock on the part of members of the cabinet and members of the Liberal party too.

This has been admitted on a number of occasions. The Associate Minister of National Defence made this admission. The hon. member for Laurier said that there are ways of leaving the impression that appointments are not political when in fact they are. That is all I was getting at. I do not know whether that answers the question of the hon. member for Greenwood or whether it will salve the angered feelings he expressed in asking the question but that is the answer I give.

There is every possibility that the appointments of the 12 directors will be made on precisely the same basis in that political considerations will be paramount in the mind of the minister, the governor in council or whoever makes these appointments. I do not complain particularly about this in this instance. What I complain about is the fact of political life which allows this to occur and at the same time to be passed off as something else. I complain about the government making appointments on a political basis and then saying that they were not really made on that basis.

Political life in Canada both provincially and federally is full of this sort of thing. A while ago a member asked about Saskatchewan. I do not know about appointments in that province in detail but I do not doubt for a moment that they are made on a political basis. I just do not know. I know that certainly is so in the province of British Columbia. There is a case in point of two defeated cabinet ministers who were fired one day and hired the next day at higher salaries. The progressive development of control by the government over appointments and governmental activities over the years has resulted in a greater and greater concentration of power in the hands of the government and its ministers. It is from there that political appointments flow. The power of parliament has been greatly restricted and concentrated in the hands of ministers. During the 22 years that the Liberals were in office a continuing concentration took place and it is continuing to take place today under the present government.

When we talk about whom these 12 directors might be the ministerial objection is that we cannot talk about that because the act already says that the governor in council shall appoint them and that is the way it is supposed to be. The governor in council did not suddenly arrive at this position today, nor is authority contained in the bill for the government to make these appointments. It has been in the act for many years and it is to this that I object. What flows from this authority is not proper. The desire of the ministry to continue and promote this authority is merely an outgrowth of our whole parliamentary structure which I think leaves much to be desired.

I note that you reluctantly remained in your seat, Mr. Chairman, while I completed my remarks on that point. I can appreciate that perhaps they were somewhat out of order but I think it was fair to allow me to go that far in commenting on matters that have been raised by previous speakers. Quite frankly, the Liberal party is making a great hullabaloo about the increase in the number of directors and is saying that it allows for political appointments but in my view it would not make one whit of difference if the Liberals were in office. They would do precisely the same thing. They would appoint people on a political basis just as the government is undoubtedly going to do. I consider this to be merely a sham battle—

Mr. Hellyer: Would a C.C.F. government be different?

Mr. Howard: I hear the hon. member for Trinity interjecting a comment again from his seat. I might add that by doing so he is using that portion of his body where most of his brains are anyway.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Howard: I say this is merely a sham battle on the part of the Liberal party. I say they are simply putting up a smokescreen when in reality they believe in the same principle and would do precisely the same thing if they were in office. It makes me a little sick to listen to a discussion of this kind when we know very well that they really do not believe what they are saying.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, while I was listening to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), I asked myself the very question he was putting to the hon. member for Toronto-Trinity (Mr. Hellyer): what he would do if he had the responsibility of government?

However, my reason for taking the floor is that I remembered this statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made during the Conservative convention in Ottawa:

> The next elections will be a fight between private enterprise and socialism.

I got to asking myself whether this were not precisely the reason for the introduction of this bill.

With this increase in the number of directors, whether we or the government appoint people of doubtful ability, it is absolutely sure that the C.N.R. deficits will increase and that the administration of the company will only get worse. Perhaps, then, the government will use that as an excuse for handing over the company to private industry under the pretense that they want to fight socialism.

That, in my opinion, is where the danger lies, for this change will enable the government to do whatever they want and appoint whoever they want.

Whether the government appoints Conservatives, Liberals or C.C.F'ers to that board of directors, I could not care less, but if the nominees have not the necessary ability, then it is quite possible that things will take a turn for the worse within the C.N.R. and that those great defenders of democracy will take that as an excuse to say later on: We must get rid of that railroad, in the interest of Canada, and hand it back to private industry.

That is why I am under some apprehension regarding this bill.

(Text):

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in the debate. I sat here containing myself while the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was speaking because I did not wish to go too far in any remarks I might make. During the course of his remarks he made a personal attack in a rather indirect way on the competency of a gentleman from Saskatchewan appointed to the board of directors of the C.N.R. since the government took office. He referred to "Who's Who" and a couple of items found therein with regard to this gentleman. He did not see fit to refer to his very distinguished war record. He did not see fit to refer to the fact that he has been an outstanding businessman in western Canada for many years, that his interests are wide and diversified, that he is a university graduate, a graduate of the Royal Military College in Kingston. He did not refer to many other things, all of which go to make up a very competent man.

Mr. Winch: On railway matters?

Mr. More: The hon. member simply referred to his activities on behalf of the Conservative party. This has been his participation, and I do not believe he has to apologize for it now. I do not see how this participation could in any way affect his competency or the appointment that he received. I want to say this from personal knowledge. Since his appointment, this gentleman has devoted almost the whole of his time to the interests of the railway. He has been helpful in bringing about a better understanding and better morale among the employees of that area. I think the reference to him was entirely out of place and uncalled for.

It seems to me that a gentleman who sat with the government for so many years which had the appointment of this board in its hands, which had on its shoulders the responsibility for the Canadian National, and who only this week finds out that the business manager of Canadian National was appointed from the board of directors by the president of the corporation has not looked after the affairs of the country or participated as fully as his responsibilities required him to participate. When he sees fit to get up in this house and throw stones as he did today by making allegations of incompetence as he did, then I think he is entirely out of order.

With that reference, I wish to return to the matter of political appointments. I am not going to back away from the stand that where you find competence, where you find a man friendly to your party, you should not hesitate to appoint him. I got a big kick out of the performance that has been put on here this afternoon which has had the effect of holding up the bill. I feel the sincerity of the attack is very doubtful. The indignant manner in which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River told the committee how he would have acted in the committee if he had had knowledge of the appointment that had been made, merely indicated to me that he has been a pretty good pupil of the hon. member for Essex East. The sincerity of purpose of the hon. member for Essex East does not always keep pace with the righteous indignation he exhibits when he rises to speak.

I do not believe the hon. member down in the corner has much about which to complain. I cannot conceive of a government which is responsible for appointments and finds a competent man who is friendly to that government, and can be depended upon, that would not appoint that man. Certainly, I believe such an appointment would be fitting recognition. I have no hesitation in admitting this should be a consideration in every appointment when a government has to depend on these people to carry out their duties in a manner that will redound to the credit of the government.

I do not believe the C.C.F. will ever achieve power because they are dead ducks now that the New party is on the horizon. However, let us assume they formed a government. I do not believe they would act any differently from any other government. All I can go by in my analysis of this situation is the action of the government in Saskatchewan, the only place where the C.C.F. party has the conduct of public business. You cannot count on your fingers the ex-candidates and cabinet ministers who head boards in that province because in nearly every case in which there has been an appointment of that nature, someone in this category has been appointed. Let me say at once that I am not reflecting on the competency of these men. I know many of them well, and I think they have done an excellent job. I think the government would have been utterly foolish if they had not seen fit to appoint these men, having in mind their competence. The hon. member who just spoke on behalf of that party before I rose seems to be in disagreement with his colleague from Port Arthur on this point. Not very long ago the member for Port Arthur said, why not openly admit that there should be patronage involved in these appointments because it is only proper that a minister should have confidence in these men.

I shall be brief. I am going to support this bill. I feel that railway problems have become so great and the work load has increased to such an extent, that the executive should be increased in number in order that the problems may receive proper attention. I think the present board of directors is doing the job to the best of their ability, but I think they need help. I feel this bill is a proper bill to come before the committee at this time and it is my intention to support it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure that I will incur the displeasure of the hon. member for Regina City if I deign to participate in this debate because of the remarks which he made at the outset of what he had to say. Regrettably, of course, those who support the government seem to believe it is their privilege, and only their privilege, to discuss measures in this house. When members of the opposition seek to expose weaknesses in legislation, they are attacked on the ground that what they have said does not represent their convictions; that they are insincere. The only sincere people in parliament, of course, are the members of the ministry and the members of the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am glad to find that there is confirmation for this view through the applause that has been enthusiastically led by that most objective member, the whip of the Conservative party. It shows the high standard of objectivity of hon. gentlemen opposite. I have a lot of respect for the hon. member for Regina City, and I can only say it is because he has not fully appreciated the policy of the government as represented by this bill that he has failed to understand why the Liberal opposition has been taking the strong position it has been taking with regard to this measure. It is because we feel that a matter of the importance of Canadian National Railways, involving as it does the expenditure of many hundreds of millions of dollars in respect of property valued at well over a billion dollars, is of such a character that the management should be regarded as most efficient; that it should be a management that has the confidence of the administration.

Of course, I am regrettably restricted in any comments in this regard because of a ruling made this morning, a ruling that has not been observed this afternoon when all kinds of matters have been introduced. We dare not ask the government why it refuses to indicate clearly its intention with regard to the permanency and the reappointment of the president of Canadian National Railways. I have had to say very strongly what I felt about that matter this morning and the record is there for those interested and concerned to note. If there is going to be observance of the rules of relevancy in debate, it must persist from the time the debate begins until it concludes, and there must be no singling out of preferences for those who participate in the debate, whether they be on one side or on the other.

Now, Mr. Chairman,—

The Chairman: Order; before the hon. member for Essex East continues, may I say that I noted his careful avoidance of any reproach to the Chair in connection with the things he had in mind. I might mention to him that the extraneous matters which were introduced into the debate were introduced by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I felt I should give him the opportunity to explain his position because he was not present during the debate on second reading. The points made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River invited other remarks, and it was at that point that extraneous matters were introduced. This does not mean, I believe, that there has been a favouring of one side more than the other.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As I was saying before this intervention took place, we had sought to establish from the ministry what its intentions were with regard to the management of the railway. The minister, manfully I thought, at long last did something which I suggest he should have done much earlier in the debate. He said that, as far as he was personally concerned, he had no quarrel with the president of the railway and that he had nothing but the highest regard for his competence. The question, of course, is not so much what the minister thinks, although that is important, but what the government thinks; and the country has the right to know, when we are called upon to provide for additional directors of the railway, what disposition is going to be made of that particular phase of the situation. The people of the country have the right to know that and to be assured that their affairs, directly or indirectly—and it is indirectly in this case through the railway—are being administered by men of competence and integrity.

There has been no attack on the integrity of any person connected with the administration of the railway but strong criticism has been made of the competence of the management. The people of this country and this parliament have the right to know what the view of the government is. We know what the view of the minister is. He has told us his view, and I wish he had done so earlier in the debate. Had he done so, we would not have had this protracted discussion. But what is important to know is what the position of the government is. Is that the view of the Prime Minister? Is that the view of the Minister of Finance?

As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate stated, this indecision is not good for the railroad. It does not make for the fulfilment of the standards of good administration and good government to have this hesitancy and this uncertainty prevail. Having already reaffirmed earlier today what I believe to be a strong point, namely that where an attack is made upon an official of the crown there is an obligation upon the part of the minister and the government to defend that official or repudiate him, what I rose to say is this. The minister has not yet answered the basic question with regard to the immediate purpose of this bill.

I do not altogether fail to appreciate the fact that the minister has been wise and is wise—surprisingly wise, in my judgment—in the way in which he handles himself in this chamber. He has learned the art of prudent reply and paucity of reply. It is up to the opposition, of course, to seek to elicit information even from a minister who finds that it is more prudent to say as little as possible.

Mr. Stinson: He sets a good example.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. My hon. friend from York Centre says that he sets a good example. It is the role of a good negotiator on the government side to speak little. It is the role of an effective opposition spokesman to take every occasion possible to expose the weaknesses in the flanks of the government. That is what we are doing.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what parliament is for.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says, that is what parliament is for; and in the prosecution of that assignment the task of the opposition is to try to get a reluctant and somewhat arrogant ministry—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not say "minister"; I said "a somewhat arrogant ministry". The task of the opposition is to try to get a reluctant and somewhat arrogant ministry to give the kind of replies that will provide the necessary assurance to the Canadian people. Why are we being asked to supply additional directors? No reason or no explanation whatever has been given.

Mr. Creaghan: The committee recommended it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says that the committee recommended it. If that is the case, we could easily have had from the minister a repetition of the reasons the committee gave. We have not even had that.

Mr. Balcer: I did do that. I read it from the committee report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have not had one word of explanation. All the minister said is that they feel that it is in the interests of this company that there should be more directors. But we have had no evidence, no information or no justification for that request. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether or not political considerations attend government appointments. I would hope that most governments, when they come to appoint someone to hold a position of trust, are motivated primarily by the national interest. I believe that is generally the case and I would hope it applies to this government.

Mr. Winch: Are they always Conservatives?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "Are they always Conservatives?" The minister said that one of the directors to be reappointed happens to be man who fortunately has the wisdom to recognize the errors of the Conservative part, and that is a very valuable argument on the minister's side.

Mr. Pickersgill: But he did not say that he would reappoint him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate points out, he did not say that he would reappoint him; although as was said, because of this argument it will be difficult for the minister not to reappoint this man. But what reason is given? If the government wants to be able to absolve itself from the charge of political partisanship to an extreme degree, can the government fail to give us the reasons for these required additional new directors? What has happened in the administration or in the financial record of the Canadian National Railways to warrant these additional appointments of directors? In the absence of a satisfactory explanation, the government cannot expect to escape the charge that the only reason it is making these additional appointments, is that it wants to make political appointments. I am not saying that is the reason. I am saying that the government—

Mr. Winch: Why not come out and say that it is the reason?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not know whether it is the reason. I am trying to find out. I am not saying it is the reason. What I am saying is that, in the absence of a satisfactory explanation, that can be the only deduction that a reasonable person can make. However, I am trying to give the minister an opportunity of telling us why he is coming forward with this bill and why we need these additional directors. The minister should tell us whether or not the board of directors themselves have recommended this action. Was this a recommendation of the president of the Canadian National Railways? Did the board itself feel that it could not possibly discharge its responsibilities unless more colleagues were provided? Is that the situation? If that is the fact, let the minister say so. Then let us examine whether or not there is any validity for the request. The mere fact that the board asks for greater assistance is not an argument that must be accepted without question. Let us find out what are the reasons.

If the government cannot give the reasons, it lays itself open to the charge that the only reason is that it wants to give a reward to people who have served the government in a political manner. That reason in itself is certainly no justification for incurring further expenditure of public money. There can be no justification at all for that kind of appointment unless there is a need. I now ask the minister to tell us precisely why these additional directors are required as provided for in this bill. I ask the minister to tell us what the government's position is in regard to the reappointment of certain directors, including the president of the Canadian National Railways.

On this simple matter today we have had to extract, by force of debate, even these concessions from the government. We could have passed this bill in half an hour if the minister had simply indicated why he wanted these additional directors or if he could have told us what the government's intention was with regard to their further reappointment instead of sitting quietly, creating suspicion as to the reasons behind this very simple measure. I ask the minister now, in the dying hours of today, on this the queen's birthday, to rise in his place in order to banish—

Mr. Lambert: You have said all this before.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was that very intelligent remark of the hon. member for Edmonton West who is always making these very happy interjections?

Mr. Lambert: That is all right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to hear what it was.

Mr. Winch: If it came from him it was not intelligent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would not say that. I think the hon. gentleman is very intelligent but he is reluctant—let us put it that way—and shy. His shyness results in his speech giving the impression of odd grunts here and there which are not always decipherable.

But let the minister tell us why he wants these directors. Let him give us the reason. The minister is a reasonable man and if he gives us a reasonable answer we shall give him reasonable support.

Mr. Brunsden: In the furore of this debate it seems to me one point has been overlooked, and that seems to be the creation of a new quorum. We have at the moment a quorum of four whereas the bill provides for a quorum of seven.

An hon. Member: Is that on clause 1?

Mr. Brunsden: If I were the owner of a $100,000 business, let alone a multi-million dollar business, and could not control it myself, I would much rather have seven men combining their wisdom, and reaching conclusions, than I would have four. I think this is an important point in connection with the future of the C.N.R.

My hon. friend from Acadia mentioned that we in Alberta feel a little slighted because of our lack of representation on the board. Another reason for the extension of the number of directors, as I see it, is that some of the slack may be taken up. We may be able to get more general representation, and if we do we should get a country-wide pooling of knowledge which would be most helpful to the company.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate indicated to the committee that there should be regional directors appointed, or at least he took it for granted that such would be the case notwithstanding the protest of the hon. member for Vancouver South who on an earlier occasion tried to create the impression that nothing of that sort would take place. I think the minister owes it to the committee to give some indication as to whether or not directors will be appointed from the various regions of Canada. As I have looked at the annual reports of the C.N.R. tabled over the years I have found that the seven directors were appointed to represent various geographical or regional areas of this country. Is it the intention that these additional directors will be appointed one from each province or is it the intention to appoint two from some provinces?

Then again, in answer to the question whether or not he was satisfied with the services of the head of the C.N.R., the minister replied that personally he had always had extremely good relations with Mr. Gordon who had extended co-operation during the time he had been minister. The hon. gentleman added that he was satisfied with his work. So far, so good; but does that statement apply to the rest of his colleagues? As far as the Minister of Trade and Commerce is concerned he did tell us what his opinion was during the sittings of the committee on railways last year, but what of the other colleagues of the minister—

Mr. Churchill: It has nothing to do with the bill at all.

Mr. Chevrier: The leader of the house has just come into the chamber and has made that clever interjection. If he had been here this afternoon he would have realized that the discussion under this clause roamed far and wide.

Mr. Churchill: Then it should not have done.

Mr. Chevrier: If he says that this has nothing to do with the bill, he should have been here earlier. He would have realized that it had.

Mr. Churchill: Well, I will rise on a point of order. The hon. member is discussing a bill which has to do with an increase in the number of directors of the C.N.R. He is asking what is the opinion of the colleagues of the Minister of Transport regarding an individual. That has nothing to do with the bill and I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: Why, then, did the minister answer the question as far as he is concerned? Having put on record the view of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, surely the committee is entitled to know whether the government is satisfied with the services of the four directors whose terms have expired and have not been renewed. This is the question which I should like to direct to the minister.

Mr. Balcer: Several times at the beginning of the session a similar question was asked by the hon. member for Laurier. I said at the time that we had legislation on the order paper to increase the number of directors and that instead of making appointments piecemeal these appointments would be made all together when this legislation is passed. As far as the choosing of new directors is concerned, this is a matter of government policy and decisions will be announced in the house when they are taken.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid the minister has not followed the question I put to him. I did not ask him to give me the names of those who would be appointed. That, I agree, would be out of order. But the minister said that when this bill was before the house he would make the position known.

Mr. Balcer: When the bill was passed.

Mr. Chevrier: The bill is now before the house. He has said that personally he is satisfied with the services of the president of the company. I have stated that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that he was satisfied with the services of that gentleman. I am asking, now, whether the government is satisfied with the services of the four directors whose terms of office have expired.

Mr. Balcer: These gentlemen have been named for three years. Their term of office has expired. According to the statute they remain in office until their successors are appointed or until their reappointment. Decisions as to the appointment of their successors or as to their reappointment are for the governor in council to take and when they have been taken the hon. gentleman will learn who are the directors of the C.N.R. I think this is the way in which this should be done. It is the way in which it has always been done and I do not think I should go any further than that.

Mr. Chevrier: There is the additional point which has just been mentioned by the hon. member for Essex East and which I discussed earlier—

Mr. Thrasher: He apparently does not know your name.

Mr. Chevrier: If I don't know, why don't you enter the debate? You have been sitting there all the afternoon.

Mr. Thrasher: I should be very happy to do so if the hon. gentleman would make the floor available to somebody else instead of occupying it all the afternoon.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member and his associates have been trying to curtail this debate. As an example of that I draw attention to the fact that there has been a sessional committee sitting while the house is sitting. Then there was an interjection from the Solicitor General saying we were wasting the time of this committee—

An hon. Member: So you are.

Mr. Chevrier: —which he had no right to make according to the rules of the house.

Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister a question in respect of the regional directors of the Canadian National Railways, namely, what is the intention of the government in so far as the appointment of regional directors is concerned?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, that has nothing to do with this bill. There is no question regarding regional directors included in this bill; it is strictly a proposal to increase the directorship of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, is the minister going to adopt any attitude in respect of the attacks which were made by his own supporters, and others, against certain of the directors of this crown corporation, and particularly in respect of one director, the president of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to add to what I have already said.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I suggest we have witnessed, during the last few minutes, the most extraordinary contempt of parliament which I have observed in this chamber for a very long time. We all recall those sermons which we used to listen to from the hon. member for Lake Centre, and later the hon. member for Prince Albert, now the Prime Minister of Canada, regarding government by order in council, yet the Minister of Transport has just told us that orders in council will be passed, following the passage of this legislation, and that parliament has no right to know anything about what the government intends to do. He has told us that they are the masters and that we are the servants of parliament. I suggest this is a shocking attitude to take toward parliament.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Pallett: Was there any indication to parliament, when the seaway authority was constituted, that the then minister of transport, the present hon. member for Laurier, would be the chairman of that authority?

Mr. Pickersgill: There was a good deal of speculation about it, but I should remind the hon. gentleman that the seaway authority was created as a new institution, and that the Canadian National Railways has been in existence for a great many years. The president of the Canadian National Railways does not know, and has not known since September 30, 1960, whether he is to be continued in that office.

An hon. Member: Too bad.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest it is a contempt of parliament to ask us to give the government the power to appoint more directors, at a time when it will not tell us anything about what is being done in regard to the directorships, which it has had the right and duty to appoint since last September, during a period of time when it has no right to allow these vacancies to remain unfilled.

An hon. Member: They are not vacant.

Mr. Pickersgill: The provision in the act covering this situation, as everyone knows, was intended to meet a vacancy over a week end, or something of that sort, but not in respect of a vacancy of eight months, a period when there existed only three properly appointed members, four vacancies being held by individuals who are on suspended sentence, not knowing whether they are to be reappointed or not. If that is the way this government feels the C.N.R. should be run, we should not be surprised, because that is the way it runs everything else.

Mr. Winch: It is waiting until the capital punishment bill is passed; to hang or not to hang.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. member for Vancouver East has assessed the situation accurately; the government cannot really make up its mind whether to hang Mr. Gordon or to give him a life sentence, and is waiting until the capital punishment bill is passed. However, I suggest this is not the way to treat parliament, but is the most arrogant example of the doctrine of government by order in council that it has ever been my experience to witness on the part of any minister in this house. It is being done by a minister of the cabinet of the present Prime Minister, who went up and down this country denouncing government by order in council, although there never was any order in council passed which was not properly authorized by parliament, and I think the hon. gentleman realizes that. It is very interesting, however—perhaps I would be out of order to pursue that thought—

An hon. Member: You are out of order now.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am certainly not out of order now in saying that I am opposed to passing this clause and in giving my reasons. If we are not allowed even to give our reasons for opposition in this house, what then can we do in debate? I am opposed to the passing of this clause because I do not think five more directors are needed in view of the fact that the government cannot even make up its mind what to do in respect of the vacancies that exist now, and which have existed since last September. As some hon. members of this house know, there were directors who expressed their indignation about that situation, notably—perhaps this is another matter about which I should not say anything.

However, I repeat my opposition to the idea of asking us to vote the taxpayers' money blindly, in the creation of five more jobs, when the government cannot even make up its mind to fill the vacancies which now exist. At the same time they are informing us that we have no right to know how the existing vacancies will be filled until after we have created the extra positions. Surely if they want to give proof that the new positions would be filled by competent individuals, they could do so by making appointments to these vacant positions. If the government feels that Mr. Gordon, Mr. Gagnon and one other member, because one individual died while awaiting reappointment, are not competent, surely they should find other individuals to appoint and prove to us that they can make good appointments. If the government did that, perhaps we would be better disposed to give it the right to appoint five others. How could any reasonable person have the slightest confidence in the capacity of the government to appoint five other competent individuals, when it cannot make up its mind in respect of the four reappointments it has the right to make now?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is beyond belief, Mr. Chairman, that this government should indicate that it will not tell us anything about what is to be done, and will not use the powers it now possesses to reappoint members of the board of directors, until it is given further power to appoint, through orders in council, five additional members, following which we in parliament will not be able to do anything about the situation. If ever the doctrine has been enunciated that parliament is the servant and the cabinet the master, it has been enunciated by the Minister of Transport this afternoon.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall I put the question in respect of clause 1?

Mr. Winch: Two of your own members are out of their seats.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in respect of clause 1, is the minister going to give us any information as to whether there will be regional representation in the appointment of the directors.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, this point was covered during the time we were discussing the principle of the bill. All I have to say now is, we are going to appoint Canadians who will do a good job for the Canadian National Railways. We will choose the best men in Canada for the job and, in doing so, will try to make sure that these people represent all Canadians in all areas of Canada. There will not be any citizens who will feel left out, because among the directors will exist fine Canadians possessing broad enough ideas to look after the whole of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, would the minister inform the committee whether there will be an appointment from British Columbia?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, we intend to make the appointments in a broad fashion, so that the whole of Canada will be represented.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, could the minister inform us whether there will be anyone appointed from Newfoundland, or Nova Scotia, or Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Brunsden: How about Alberta?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman, I should like an answer from the minister. I have directed a specific question to him and intend to oppose the passage of this clause until I receive an answer.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, we must have 12 Canadians on this board of directors who will represent Canada, and we will attempt, as far as it is possible, to have representation from each province. It may very well be that two will be from one province, while another province may not be the residence of a member. This situation will prevail for a limited period of time, and then will be changed. The procedure to be followed will be similar to that in respect of many other boards and commissions.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, does the minister intend to give consideration to the necessity that representatives must not only represent the people, in the running of the Canadian National Railways, but must obviously be qualified individuals regarding the operation of a railway? The suggestion is made—and it has been made during this debate—that it is advantageous to have the board constituted on a representation basis. It would be more advantageous to have the board composed of individuals representing people who are qualified to run a railway. This would alleviate the apparent distress among the workers and the supervisory staffs of the railway. As it is now, no one seems to know how to run the railway operations from a technical point of view. I would think that some consideration should be given to this charge and to the problems raised in connection with the morale of the workers themselves. It seems to me that this is very important. I am quite sure this is one of the reasons why the government has refused to renew some of the appointments to the present board. If my suggestion were adopted it would probably be a step toward solving some of the problems now inherent in the board of directors in so far as the operation of the railway is concerned.

I should like to know if the minister has given any consideration to the factors I have mentioned. Has he considered the appointment of people with technical knowledge who have come up through the railway ranks and who know how to operate a railway?

Mr. Balcer: I can assure my hon. friend that his suggestion is a sound one and it will certainly be considered at the time the appointments are made.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. Chevrier: Next sitting of the house.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Hellyer: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister wish to proceed with the third reading?

Mr. Balcer: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: I said "next sitting of the house".

Mr. Speaker: It is for the house to decide. I take it it is within the rules to proceed with third reading if the house wishes.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: Now; agreed?

Mr. Chevrier: On division.

Mr. Balcer moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-98, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think the bill we have before us at the present time is an important one even if it contains more detail and minor amendments. It might not have the importance of the previous bill, according to my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate, but I still recommend it to the house.

The Canada Shipping Act is a very lengthy document which deals with virtually all aspects involving technical regulation and administration of matters relating to shipping. Since it deals with these matters in considerable detail, it is not surprising that, from time to time, some of its clauses become out of date and require amendment or amplification. This can happen because of technical changes in the marine field, because of changes in international law and agreements, and because of changes in the laws of other countries. It can happen also because of changes in the status of various areas affected.

A statute such as this has to be brought up to date from time to time and the amendments contained in the present bill are amendments which we have been collecting for a period of four or five years for this purpose, rather than seeking to introduce amendments of this sort at virtually every session.

Because the changes are technical in nature and are numerous, I do not intend to describe every one of them in this speech. Since I propose to refer the bill to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, there will be ample opportunity at that time to go into each clause in detail. Any general review on my part at this time might overlook points or clauses which some hon. members may consider important, but I will at least attempt to mention a few of the more important changes in broad terms.

The present bill contains revised definitions of home-trade voyage, inland waters and minor waters. There is at present an anomaly in the definition of home-trade voyage in that a Canadian vessel can, in theory, make an extended voyage as a home-trade ship around the whole North American continent with the exception of a comparatively short portion betweeen the north end of the Bering strait and cape Spencer in Alaska. If, however, the Canadian ship goes from Prince Rupert through the Bering strait to a Canadian port in the Canadian western Arctic, she is considered a foreign-going ship. The amendment provides for the classification of a voyage through this area as a home-trade voyage, which is consistent with our definition elsewhere; and it also brings the wording of this section up to date in view of the fact that Alaska and Hawaii are now states in the United States of America. The addition of Newfoundland, including Labrador, as an additional province of Canada, will also now be covered under the clause.

The definition of inland waters will be changed by the bill to include the port of Havre St. Pierre, about 50 miles east of the present limits in this definition. This will be of assistance to our lake ships making voyages to the gulf of St. Lawrence, and to our coastal traffic on the St. Lawrence. To avoid any misunderstanding, however, I should add that this is not related to the proposal which I announced recently to limit our domestic coasting trade in the great lakes area to vessels of Canadian registry. The necessary amendment for that purpose is not included in the present bill since we have not yet concluded our diplomatic consultations. However, while it is not exactly relevant to this bill, I might tell the house that I will have a correction to make in the announcement I made the other day as far as the limit downriver is concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: Instead of Les Escoumains.

Mr. Balcer: Instead of Les Escoumains it will be inland waters and the limit will be as mentioned here. I should like to add that the Canada Shipping Act will not be changed at the present time to cover any of the matters dealt with in the announcement I made the other day. The necessary amendment for that purpose is not included in the present bill since we have not yet concluded our diplomatic consultations on this matter.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question? The minister has said this is not related to the other matter, the coasting trade, with respect to which he will bring in amendments to the commonwealth merchant shipping agreement later. Does he mean that the new easterly limit will be cap des Rosiers to the west point of Anticosti instead of Les Escoumains?

Mr. Balcer: That is right. This will be in the note that we will send to the other countries of the commonwealth who have signed the commonwealth shipping agreement.

The definition of minor waters in Canada has been amended to include lake Winnipeg to assist ship operators on that lake who, up to the present, have been required to have the same degree of certification as ships on the great lakes where conditions are quite different. The amendment will place lake Winnipeg in the same class as other bodies of water in the Canadian west such as lake Manitoba, lake Athabaska and Great Slave lake.

We also propose to correct an anomaly existing with regard to the position of bodies corporate from the Republic of Ireland in the matter of ship registry. At present an Irish citizen may qualify to be the owner of a British ship but a company incorporated under Irish law does not have this privilege. This arises because of the effect on Canadian law of certain changes made in both United Kingdom and Irish law over recent years.

In recognition of the substantial growth of pleasure boating in Canada, we propose to adjust the tonnage floor with regard to registration of pleasure yachts. At present any pleasure craft over 15 tons must be registered while any craft under 15 tons need only be licensed under the simpler small craft procedure, although it may be registered if the owner desires. We propose to raise the 15 tons to 20 tons so that the simpler procedure of licensing may in future be followed by those owners of pleasure craft between 15 and 20 tons.

There are quite extensive changes and adjustments made with regard to the requirement for engineering personnel on ships. I will not attempt to describe these in detail but will only mention one or two examples. We are providing for the first time for a special certificate for the chief engineers of motor-driven fishing vessels who up to the present have been required to hold a third-class engineering certificate. The examination for the new proposed certificate will be based primarily on practical knowledge. We believe this will be of considerable help to the fishing industry.

On the other hand, we are providing that on large home-trade, inland and minor waters ships a first class engineer be carried while previously the maximum requirement was for a second class engineer. We believe this is a necessary step in the direction of safety due to the larger, more powerful and more complicated types of machinery being used. The rights of engineers who obtained certificates of competency for this purpose prior to the passage of this new legislation will, nevertheless, be recognized.

Also, in view of strong representations received from our coastal tug boat operators, we propose that tugs of not more than 150 tons gross tonnage, where full control may be exercised from the bridge, may be exempt from the carriage of certificated engineers when making voyages of the inland or home-trade type. All of these and the other proposed amendments of this type have been very carefully examined by our steamship inspection service to satisfy ourselves that we are in no way affecting the necessary degree of safety in operations.

We also recognize that there may be special cases where it is unnecessary to require a deck officer of a ferry vessel to have a broad marine certificate and that the prime requisite need be only expert knowledge of the ferry run itself, and we are providing that special certificates may be issued for this purpose.

There is also a clause which provides for adjustment in regard to exemptions from compulsory pilotage dues in one pilotage district only, namely, between Cornwall and Montreal. To place this district on the same basis as other pilotage districts farther down the river, introduction of compulsory pilotage dues has been desirable. However, in order to accord fair and equal treatment to United States vessels in this connection, it is necessary to introduce an amendment to permit exemption of United States vessels along with the present exemptions accorded to Canadian and British vessels. The highly co-operative attitude of the United States in working out joint pilotage arrangements on the great lakes justifies a modification of this sort. This has been discussed fully with and explained to the pilots.

In the field of small pleasure craft, which is becoming increasingly active, we have decided that as a result of experience we should extend our authority to maintain necessary safety measures somewhat. At present we have the authority to require specified safety equipment to be carried in powered vessels but, as a result of lengthy study and discussion, we have decided that the time has come when we should seek authority also to establish regulations regarding safety equipment, that is, lifejackets, et cetera, which should be carried in unpropelled vessels at present outside the scope of the act. Similarly, as a result of experience we propose to provide for the compulsory marking of small pleasure vessels with some sort of plating which will show the safe limitation of engine horsepower and gross load capacity for that particular type of boat. This has been tried out on a voluntary basis over the last couple of years and has been very successful.

We have a clause which will strengthen our machinery with regard to marine search and rescue by granting additional powers to marine search and rescue co-ordinators when engaged in marine search and rescue activities.

We also have certain clauses changing the present provisions about limitation of liability. The changes will give effect to provisions of the international convention relating to the limitation of liability of owners of sea-going ships, signed at Brussels on October 10, 1957. Here again, the full explanation would be complicated, but one principal effect will be to adjust upwards substantially the old limitations of liability which have not been changed for many years. Owners' liability where there are both property and personal claims is being raised from $72.97 per ton to 3,100 gold francs $206, and in respect of property claims only from $38.92 to 1,000 gold francs or $65.

The definition of "ship" is slightly broadened as is the coverage of the clauses generally. Recognition also is given to the paramount position of national law in overriding these limitations where applicable.

As I indicated at the beginning of these remarks, a full description of all the clauses in the bill would probably take another hour or two. I trust, however, that for the purposes of this debate and in view of my intention to refer the bill to the standing committee, members of the house will find this present explanation satisfactory.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make a long speech on the bill at this time. I think it is understandable that from time to time it is necessary to amend an act of such proportions as the Canada Shipping Act in order to meet various changes and modern demands and practice. The present bill is one that contains 41 clauses, some of which are of a minor nature while others will need detailed study. I believe, therefore, this is the type of bill that could be more properly handled in a committee than in the house and I was very pleased to hear the minister say it will be sent to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I believe this procedure would give members an opportunity to get a very clear explanation of the different provisions in the bill.

I am particularly interested in some of the provisions such as those relating to fishing boats. I notice that the bill, when referring to fishing boats, refers to the fact that certain boats must have engineers with certificates if the boats have a power beyond a certain nominal horsepower. For the purposes of clarification, I should like to have horsepower stated in terms other than nominal because I think they would be more easily understood by the fishermen who will be guided by the terms of this bill.

I note, too, that the minister made reference to the fact there are some clauses in the bill dealing with pilotage. I would think that pilotage is becoming more important all the time, particularly in view of the announcement by the minister of a new shipping policy and because of the St. Lawrence seaway. Pilotage is important to me because I think we have some places in Newfoundland where pilotage could be better implemented than it is at the moment. I am referring to the port of Corner Brook on the west coast of Newfoundland, and on some other occasion I shall have an opportunity of referring to that matter more fully than a discussion of this measure will permit.

I feel that the provisions dealing with the safety of pleasure craft are of great importance and should be well discussed in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. There is nothing more I want to say in connection with this bill, Mr. Speaker. As I said at the outset of these remarks, I feel this is the type of measure that can be more properly discussed in a committee and when that time comes we will be prepared to take up the different items in the committee.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): The Canada Shipping Act is a truly important piece of legislation. In my opinion, it is a basic part of our legislation dealing with one of our most important industries. In past years, there has been a decreasing amount of shipping done by our own Canadian ships. Our Canadian fleet has decreased year by year. This has been due to many factors, and I am sure all hon. members hope that the amendments now being brought forward in this particular bill will help to promote and facilitate shipping in our Canadian waters.

The bill, as was explained by the minister, covers a great number of amendments, some of which are of an important nature while others are of minor significance. I hope that it will be possible, when the bill is returned to the committee of the whole, for Canadian shipping to be discussed fully with a view to extending all possible facilities to this extremely important Canadian industry.

I do not have to mention to the house that our country is largely a trading country and it is at times disconcerting to see ships other than Canadian ships travelling along our rivers and lakes, and all our products being moved in bottoms other than Canadian bottoms. I feel that this whole shipping problem might well be discussed during the study of this particular bill. I cannot at this moment say what the effects of the proposed changes will be. Once we are in committee, it will be easier to study each of the clauses in detail.

There are included in the bill, as my hon. friend said a while ago, provisions relating to fishing vessels as well as the registry of ships, the definition of "ships" and "inland waters", all of which are of tremendous importance in determining just how beneficial to Canadian ship owners these amendments might be.

There is one amendment in particular to which I should like to refer directly and that has to do with pleasure craft. I am happy to see that the government has taken some steps to regulate the movement of pleasure craft. I am quite sure all hon. members realize that this particular activity is becoming an important industry in our country and that our rivers and lakes are filled with craft of all types. There seems to be a growing tendency to increase the horsepower of motors, while at the same time to decrease the sturdiness and weight of the hull in order to get greater speed. Although like everyone else I like to have great speed, I believe it would be wise to make sure that it is not overdone and that we do not incur dangers which could easily be avoided by regulation. There are, as hon. members know, a considerable number of accidents each year with these craft with huge motors and hardly any hull. It may be that, with the help of the regulations, we can avoid these lamentable accidents and, at the same time, not destroy the pleasure that can be derived from these craft. I hope it will be my pleasure, during the time the bill comes before the committee, to ask all the questions that arise in connection with each one of the clauses of this bill. I hope that eventually the effect of the bill, once it passes, will be to help Canadian ships in our own waters.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak very briefly on this bill at this time. It is a very important measure. It is not a spectacular type of bill or one likely to arouse the same, shall I say, debate as that which we experienced on the previous measure. It has to do more with things than with human beings in one respect, or the operating of things rather than the action of human beings which was under discussion when we were dealing with the directors of the C.N.R.

On second reading of a bill we are supposed to discuss the principle of it. However, I find it extremely difficult indeed to decide what is the principle of a bill like this one. It is a bill of 41 sections. They are technical in some respects; they are interesting to me in other respects. But how you, Mr. Speaker, would decide whether or not I was departing from the principle of the bill, is more than I can understand or foresee. However, I trust that you, in your wisdom, will bring me back to the right course if I should go off on the wrong compass lead. I suppose one can only say that the principle of this bill is to provide for greater safety at sea in the operation of ships of all kinds and for more efficient administration of the shipping industry as applied to the Canada Shipping Act and its regulations.

We have not had this interesting measure in our hands for very long. In view of our many other duties under these circumstances, I am quite sure most of the members have not had the opportunity to study the sections of the bill. On briefly glancing over the measure I was particularly interested in the sections that applied to pleasure craft, as was one of the other hon. members who spoke. I think some amendments are necessary with respect to the control of pleasure craft. They are increasing in numbers in our inland and minor waters and there is need for a greater degree of control for the safety of the public.

I was also interested in the section which deals with tugs and small vessels used in the fishing industry. There again, what a different situation we face today from that which existed a few years ago. As far as tugs are concerned in the minor inland waters of British Columbia, years ago you would find them powered by steam and much larger in size than they are at the present time. Now they are on the whole powered by diesel engines. Their hulls and their structure are smaller in size than that required for vessels powered by steam and at the same time they have much greater power. These changing conditions with respect to hull types and power—and I am speaking particularly of tugs—certainly necessitates some change in the regulations and in the act.

The same thing applies to the fishing industry in which I presume conditions have been changing. However, I have not the same direct knowledge of that aspect of the matter. Most of my fishing is done from a launch casting a fly and that sort of thing. I know that some of my friends to my left wish to speak. I know that one of my colleagues from Newfoundland is bursting to get to his feet and say something about fishing, while at the same time hoping that I will not stop too soon. I am sure he is very well informed. The members from the maritime provinces will also have a contribution to make to this debate.

However, Mr. Speaker, this bill in total represents amendments required to the shipping act because of the change in circumstances, not because of the omissions of governments in the past or because of failure of officials to make recommendations to governments for certain amendments. This bill reflects the changing conditions of water transport, whether it relates to passenger service, cargo service, boats engaged in fishing, tugs hauling forest products or forest equipment and supplies or pleasure craft. This bill reflects the changing circumstances under which we live. We will experience more of these amendments as the days go by with respect to other legislation.

However, I am glad to know that the bill is going to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I am sure that the committee will give it very careful study. At that time the committee will have the opportunity to seek information from the officials of the department. If the committee wishes it, it will have the opportunity to examine representatives of the shipping industry. They may have some information they wish to give to the committee and they may wish to express their opinions with respect to certain amendments to this legislation. I think it would be a good idea at this time to bring in representatives of the unions that are concerned with the shipping industry and some of the men that work on the boats in various sections of the shipping industry. I am quite sure that they would have some opinions to express with respect to this legislation, particularly as it applies to safety at sea, quarters for crew, space and things of that sort.

I note that it is now about 15 seconds before six o'clock so I think it is quite appropriate that I cease my remarks at this time in order to enable the hon. member from Newfoundland, who has a very extended speech to make on this matter, to recommence the debate at eight o'clock.

An hon. Member: You mean at 7.30.

Mr. Granger: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): There are several comments I should like to make with respect to the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act which is before the house, because, in fact, we are a maritime nation. Our traditions are largely maritime traditions and our long coastline, east, west and north, together with our great inland waterways make shipping of vital importance to all of us. Our fortunes depend in the final analysis on seaborne trade, and it has been thus ever since Canada began to be a nation.

The first settlers arrived by ship and depended upon ships for their supplies. The inland waterways became highways for exploration and arteries of trade. Today, although rail and air transportation are an essential means of moving people and goods it is ocean borne commerce which remains, nevertheless, the final arbiter of Canada's wealth.

Laws and regulations to govern the movement of ships have existed for many years and, like all laws, must be amended from time to time to keep abreast of events. The Canada Shipping Act is no exception. It is an important piece of legislation and it must be reshaped from time to time to match the requirements of the day. The amendments in the bill before the house require careful study because of their importance. Hon. members who spoke before me have maintained that an analysis of the amendments might be better undertaken during the committee stage. This seems a sensible course to me, and when we do go into committee the clarification of certain points can be requested.

I feel, however, that I must make some reference now to the proposed amendments in so far as they affect fishing vessels. I notice in the bill a proposition that small fishing boats having internal combustion engines of more than ten nominal horsepower must carry a certificated engineer. I hope to be enlightened as to what the term "ten nominal horsepower" means and whether this proposed regulation will apply to small fishing craft. I shall not make further comment now, except to note that the minister mentioned in his opening statement that practical experience would be taken into account in awarding certification. At any rate, he seemed to use words to that effect and I was glad to hear him make that statement. I have no desire to make comparisons between the relative merits of technical training and practical experience, but I do consider it eminently desirable that practical experience be recognized. I should like to add that if every fishing boat which had an engine of 10-horsepower or more was required to have a professionally trained engineer most of our inshore fishing fleet would rot on the beaches. However, I do not think this is the interpretation meant to be placed on the amendment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder if I could help the hon. member. I believe ten nominal horsepower is equal to about 500 horsepower; there is a great difference.

Mr. Granger: I am glad to hear that, because obviously it would make all the difference in the world to the operation of the inshore fishing fleet.

Safety, of course, must be a prime consideration and no doubt the amendments proposed in this respect are in keeping with the requirements of the time.

I might also add that the shipping act today has a very wide application. Those who go down to the sea in ships for reasons of trade and commerce and those who buy, or sell, or use the freight they carry all have an interest in this present bill, but the ever growing number of those who go down to the sea in ships on week ends for pleasure have an interest, too, and the captain of the ocean liner and the outboard skipper have a common interest in what is contained in the Canada Shipping Act.

[Mr. Granger.]

In my own riding, ships and boats are of paramount importance. The skiffs that fish off the coast of northern Newfoundland and Labrador, the fishing schooners and the coastal vessels which carry supplies and collect fish are all of vital importance to the people who live along this long coast line. Naturally, amendments to the Canada Shipping Act are of serious interest to them.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, contained in this bill, are of considerable importance to the long coastline of the great lakes. It is generally conceded that the shipping act is the charter of traffic by water and, the lakehead being the world's largest grain shipping port, the requirements of the act are very important to that area.

Each hon. member of this house is, no doubt, in possession of briefs and submissions made on behalf of the St. Lawrence river pilots' association, and other organizations, urging the government to consider that, with the greatly increased traffic due to the establishment of the seaway, greater safety precautions are necessary.

It appears that the question of compulsory pilotage has already been settled by agreement with the United States. Nevertheless, a thorough investigation should be made of the points contained in representations made by responsible organizations.

This concern is also shared by the Canadian board of marine underwriters. I refer, of course, to the added hazard to shipping following the opening of the seaway. There have already been some accidents, although not extremely serious. Nevertheless, a thorough investigation should be made of the present regulations.

I welcome the amendments contained in this bill. In a brief prepared by the counsel of the united Montreal pilots, the Montreal harbour pilots, and the St. Lawrence-Kingston-Ottawa pilots' association, there appears a rather good description of a pilot, the understanding of which appears essential to the evaluation of the importance of pilotage and, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to read it. This description appears at page 153 of the proceedings of the standing committee on transport and communications of the other place, and reads as follows:

> A pilot is a seaman who is specialized in the deep knowledge of a small part of water as compared to the ocean or as opposed to the ocean. That seaman must know all the currents and counter-currents, the influences of the tide and of the wind, the rocks, the bars, the changes in the channel. It is also necessary that this seaman or navigator knows that eight days ago or one day ago that a buoy, which is the signal or indication of a danger, has been displaced as a result of an accident, and that it does not show exactly the place where the ship may pass. You will easily understand, Mr. minister, that a captain however able and skilled he may be, if he comes from Great Britain or France, cannot have the knowledge of those diverse variations in the channel in the course of the past days or weeks. That is the role of the pilot.

The experts claim that the hazard to vessels using the seaway west from Montreal will be increased by a considerable percentage, as the traffic becomes heavier on the great lakes, especially to smaller vessels, or larger ships, because of the greater congestion, which in turn will mean that these vessels will be obliged to operate in confined waters for greater periods of time than heretofore.

The point made by Captain John Andrews, president of the great lakes pilotage association of Canada in its presentation to the standing committee on transport and communications of the other place, was that in the calendar year 1958, some 742 commercial vessels carried an aggregate of almost 3½ million tons of cargo. These vessels carried for the most part, great quantities of iron ore, coal, grain and other important commodities indispensable to the economy of Canada and the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to ask him whether the matter he is discussing is covered by this bill. I have looked through Bill No. C-98 but am unable to find any reference to pilots or pilotage, or the report to which the hon. member has referred. Perhaps the hon. member could indicate where the matter is referred to in the bill.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, with deference to Your Honour, I submit that I am referring to the amendments which refer to pilotage, and I should like to suggest that the minister, during his presentation this afternoon, made direct reference to pilotage on the great lakes, hence I propose to deal with this subject very briefly.

Mr. Speaker: I have not made any ruling, but perhaps the hon. member could help me now by indicating the reference to pilotage in the bill. The hon. member will realize the difficulty I am in, because this bill amends a number of specific sections of the Canada Shipping Act and does not bring the whole shipping act under discussion. The only points relevant for discussion are those proposed to be dealt with in the amendments.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, I understood I was privileged to mention those things to which the minister has referred.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could assist both yourself and the hon. member. This afternoon the minister made it quite clear that he intended to exempt from pilotage fees that new district, namely, that area extending from Cornwall to Kingston. In view of that indication surely the hon. member is entitled to refer to the area in which he resides.

Mr. Balcer: The area is from Cornwall to Montreal, as covered by clause 15.

Mr. Speaker: There was reference to compulsory pilot fees in that area from Cornwall to Montreal. However, the hon. member appears to be discussing pilotage problems generally on the great lakes, and perhaps he could confine himself to the specific ideas mentioned in the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, there is a proposed amendment to the pilotage section of the act, and I feel the hon. member should be entitled to deal with pilotage in general.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member indicate the clause of the bill in which this proposed amendment is contained.

Mr. Chevrier: It is part 6 of the act, and I am trying now to locate the clause of the bill.

Mr. Balcer: It is clause 15 of the bill.

Mr. Pallett: Clause 15 covers the proposed amendment in respect of pilotage.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Fort William will proceed, keeping in mind the limited scope of clause 15, and will then be in order.

Mr. Badanai: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wished merely to touch upon the question of pilotage because it is one to which the amendments contained in the bill appear to have reference.

In continuation of what I was saying—leaving out that subject to which you objected, sir—the crux of the question at the moment is, according to Canadian or United States law, vessels coming into the great lakes waters from outside do not require on board a pilot especially skilled in great lakes pilotage, and the organizations to which I referred are strongly objecting to the absence, in our laws, of a regulation requiring that experienced pilots in great lakes navigation are on board, and feel that this is a serious deficiency.

The great lakes pilots' association of Canada has the following to say, and I quote:

The paradox appears to be that on the one hand, we require a skilled pilot to navigate our ships. Yet, on the other hand, we do not impose such requirements on a pilot of a ship coming from the outside and even though he may be totally unfamiliar with our lake waters.

It can be argued that under the name of safety it might be easy to obtain approval of such a measure. Unfortunately, the matter presents some complications of a serious nature such as the danger of imposing an overhead expenditure by forcing the engagement of lake pilots on all foreign vessels all the way from Montreal to the lakehead. This additional cost could be sufficient to wreck the advantage of freight rate differentials and thereby defeat the very purpose for which the seaway was built.

I think that compromise may be effected in such a way that it would not be necessary to employ lake pilots for all the way but only at points where pilots are considered necessary. I assume the minister has that compromise in mind. There is also, of course, recourse to the regulations that captains or mates may qualify through an examination to prove knowledge of the lakes and their navigation rules.

There is also the matter of harbours which should not be overlooked. I understand that in order to enter any harbour in any country of the world it is compulsory for a ship to have a qualified pilot on board. When Canadian ships visit British and European ports they are required to take on pilots. Since the seaway was opened an increasing number of British foreign ships have come to our ports in the great lakes.

I can say that Thunder bay near Passage island and most of the way from Passage island to the harbours of Port Athur and Fort William, a distance of 40 miles, are dangerous and require skilled navigation.

There are, of course, changes contemplated in the bill which are timely and if I may I should like to point out some observations made by the shipping federation of Canada in a brief entitled "St. Lawrence River Pilots". I quote:

1. Efficient pilotage, having as its primary objective the rendering of navigational assistance as may be required by vessels of all types and subject to the direction and requirements of each vessel's command.

2. Recognition that pilotage is essentially a voluntarily acceptable service at the discretion of ships' command.

3. Revival of a sense of responsibility and pride in the pilotage service.

4. Recognition that pilots are not labour or subject to collective bargaining regulations; re-establishment of the prestige which should be associated with this position.

5. The institution of a proper and effective authority for the discipline of pilots of no lesser standard of professional conduct than that normally expected of ships' officers.

6. Negotiations between pilots and shipping interests to establish mutually satisfactory annual remuneration, subject to final approval by the pilotage authority.

[Mr. Badanai.]

7. Direct agreement between pilotage authority and shipping interests only, in establishing tariffs required to provide sufficient revenues to implement No. 6.

8. An efficient and effective system of selecting and training pilots.

In the opinion of the federation these objectives are the serious concern of the entire Canadian economy as well as the shipping industry. It is because of this conviction that the federation has again asked the hon. minister of transport to establish some form of inquiry into the pilotage situation in the hope and belief that such an inquiry will lead quickly to necessary corrective measures.

The bill contains references to tonnage. In fact, there is a considerable amount of misunderstanding with regard to tonnage. I should like, with your permission, sir, to have a document explaining the meaning of tonnage printed in Hansard at this place in order to save the time of reading it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fort William proposes that a paper which he has in his hand explaining the technicalities of tonnage be printed in Hansard, I take it, as part of his address.

Mr. Balcer: Would the hon. member be kind enough to identify this document and tell us where he got the information it contains?

Mr. Badanai: It is from the Canadian shipbuilding and ship repairing association. I think it should be printed in Hansard because the general public does not know about it.

Mr. Balcer: I have no objection.

Mr. Speaker: It requires unanimous consent. Does the house agree that the hon. member shall have leave to incorporate the document in his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The document above referred to follows:]

What is Tonnage

How often when speaking about a ship does someone ask "What tonnage is she"—and how seldom is the reply really completely understood!

"Tonnage" does not always imply "weight"—it sometimes means "capacity".

There are four principal ways of describing the tonnage of any ship and brief descriptions of these methods follow:

Displacement is the tonnage used to describe all warships—it represents the total weight in tons of all the ship and its contents—it is called "displacement" because it is based upon the Archimedean principle that a floating body displaces an amount of water which is the same weight as the body itself.

Deadweight is the tonnage commonly used to describe the size of cargo ships—it represents the total carrying capacity of the ship in tons, including cargo, fuel, fresh water, stores, etc.

Gross registered tonnage is the tonnage usually used to describe passenger vessels—it represents the total internal cubic capacity of the ship, including accommodation spaces, each 100 cubic feet of which is "one ton" (ton of capacity).

This method of measurement goes back to the days when the size of a ship was judged by the number of barrels or "tuns" of wine it could carry—"tunnage" has now become "tonnage".

Gross tonnage is used as a basis for many marine rules and regulations and for assessing drydock dues, etc. It is also used for assessing St. Lawrence Seaway ship tolls (in addition to the ship toll, there is a toll on actual cargo carried).

Net registered tonnage is the gross tonnage minus certain deductible spaces which do not produce revenue, principally spaces occupied by crew, propelling machinery and fuel.

It is intended to be an indication of the earning capacity of a ship and as such is often used as a basis for canal tolls, harbour dues, dockage fees, etc.

An indication of the wide variety of "tonnages" which can apply to any ship is readily understood from the following figures, each of which relates to a typical 10,000 ton deadweight cargo vessel:

Displacement tonnage	14,000
Deadweight tonnage	10,000
Gross tonnage	7,000
Net tonnage	4,800

Newsletter No. 4 April, 1961

Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association

Ottawa, Canada

Mr. Badanai: I shall conclude by saying that the advent of the St. Lawrence seaway points to a traffic rush in 1961 through a 1,250 mile lane from Montreal to the lakehead, which is becoming a highway of commerce. While it would be too costly and perhaps impractical to keep the St. Lawrence seaway open all year, it would help if additional icebreakers were to be used at strategic points on the St. Lawrence—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt, but the hon. member is departing from this bill. It has nothing to do with icebreakers, and other members may wish to speak to the point. Is the hon. member finished?

Mr. Badanai: I want to conclude my few remarks with this suggestion. I think it would be a wonderful thing if we could devise some ways and means of keeping the St. Lawrence open longer.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, there are just a few brief remarks that I should like to make. First I should like to say that the Canada Shipping Act is a complicated piece of legislation. It contains several hundred sections and many schedules comprising agreements made between Canada and other countries, which have been appended to the act. It is a document which is of extreme importance to all Canadians, particularly those who live on our coasts and around our inland waters. It is complicated because it is divided into many parts. There are parts dealing with the recording of vessels, with the certification of officers, with seamen, with repatriation of distressed seamen, with sick mariners, with pilotage, with the safety of life at sea, with wrecks and salvage, with public harbours, port wardens, limitation of liabilities, the coasting trade, delivery of goods, legal proceedings and, as I said, the international load line and the safety of life at sea.

It is unfortunate that various ministers, including those of the previous administration as well as those of the present administration, have seen fit to introduce substantial amendments to this act from time to time. These are amendments that have to be made, of course, but I say it is unfortunate in this sense. While I occupied the position now held by the minister I believe I brought in three amending bills and my successor, the Hon. Mr. Marler brought in one, if not more. The predecessor of the minister brought in several, one in particular having to do with pilotage, and now the minister brings in a very long series of amendments to the act.

It seems to me there is another method of dealing with a matter of this importance. The Canada Shipping Act admittedly is outdated and that is why all these amendments have had to be brought in by the former administration and by the present one. I think consideration might well be given to this suggestion for the future. Would it not be much better to appoint a commission to look into the act and recommend to the government amendments which might be made from time to time? I realize this would not answer the purpose fully because, as the minister said, on account of international agreements that are made, on account of technical changes in our country, it becomes necessary to make amendments. I repeat, however, that it is unfortunate that because of all these amendments there is not on the statutes and in the department an act that will give a true and accurate picture of the situation concerning shipping in Canada.

I have with me an office copy of the Canada Shipping Act. It contains at least seven or eight amendments that have been added to the original act. In order to find out what the law is on one particular section, one not only has to look at the original act but to go through all these amendments to which I have referred. I am sure the minister will realize at once that I am not pointing a finger at him. I am simply emphasizing the point that this is a matter which might well be given consideration in the future.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer having to do with a speech made on television on Saturday night by the minister's colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion). I presume the speech normally would have been delivered by the Minister of Transport but because he was busy in the house all day Saturday he asked his colleague to deliver it. The speech dealt almost entirely with the new policy of the government on shipping and I bring it before the house because the part to which I now wish to refer has to do with the coasting trade.

The minister said earlier that while this act has nothing to do with coastal trade, nevertheless the definition contained in the act of inland waters of Canada would also be used with reference to coastal trade in connection with the announcement he made earlier concerning the amendment to the commonwealth merchant shipping agreement. Section 2, subsection 41, of the act limits the coasting trade to an area extending from a point opposite Anticosti island to the head of the great lakes or, to be more accurate, a line extending from cap des Rosiers to west point, Anticosti island and thence to the north shore of the river St. Lawrence along the meridian of longitude 63 degrees west to the head of the lakes. From that point upstream cabotage or coasting trade will be permitted. From that point downstream British and commonwealth vessels will be able to operate in the coastal trade of Canada.

That raises a point in connection with the speech I mentioned and also another point with which I should like to deal first. In his speech on television the Secretary of State affirmed quite categorically that this new proposal would protect inland navigation. The point that came to my mind when I listened to the speech and read it was this, and perhaps the minister can help in this respect. What will be the effect of the new policy on British ships owned by Canadians or, to put it the other way, on Canadian owners of ships flying the British flag? As the minister knows, there are approximately 25 of these ships.

Mr. Balcer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think these remarks of my hon. friend are relevant to the bill before the house at the present time. I quite agree with him that the inland waters have to be restricted from now on but actually that is not what we are discussing today. What the hon. member is raising is a matter that will be dealt with under the regulations I announced recently. Those regulations have to be passed by the cabinet and will come into force at that time. I do not think it is proper to discuss this matter now.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I would not have discussed it if the minister had not indicated at the outset that the definition of inland waters of Canada will be the same as that which will apply in the new regulations. If perchance I am precluded from discussing it under subsection 41, I am certainly entitled to discuss it under subsection 38 because many of these ships will be plying not only on the Atlantic ocean but also on home-trade voyages. So it would seem to me that under a combination of these two heads the matter is relevant. I do not want to insist on the point but I should like to ask the minister a question if he will allow me. There are some 25 ships owned by Canadians and flying the British flag. What will be the effect of this policy on those ships? Will they come back and operate in the coasting trade or will it be found cheaper to operate them under the British flag? As the minister knows, the policy he has announced has to do with construction and has nothing to do with operation, and that really is the point—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I may interrupt the hon. member for Laurier, I would say that if there is a clause of this amending bill relating to a matter which permits the question he wishes to ask, then I suggest he ask it in committee when the appropriate clause is reached. It seems to me that in discussing the policy announced the other day with respect to coastal trading, I believe it is, the hon. member is discussing something which is not, in itself, the subject matter of any clause of this bill. There may be a clause of this bill defining inland waters, for example, which, if it changed the area of inland waters, would have an indirect effect on the larger policy to which he wishes to refer.

However, it does not seem to me that would open up this whole field for discussion. I suggest he keep that matter for the appropriate occasion.

Mr. Chevrier: Your Honour knows I would be the last to disagree with a ruling of the Chair. However, I wonder if Your Honour would not look a little more carefully at subsections 38 and 41 referred to in clause 1? It seems to me that, since we are discussing home-trade voyages and inland water voyages, that, coupled with the statement which the minister made to the effect that the definition of inland waters would be the same as that concerning the coasting trade which he will bring down later on, I was quite within my rights and quite in order in discussing the coasting trade under subsection 41 because it deals with that. As a matter of fact, it is an amendment to that part of the act having to do with the coasting trade. However, if Your Honour sees it otherwise, I will not pursue the matter.

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, I feel that these minor amendments to the definitions do not really open up matters of policy to which he has referred.

Mr. Chevrier: Then if I may continue with another matter which falls squarely within the terms of this bill, I should like to refer to the speech made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion) on Saturday night, in which he made this rather amazing statement:

(Translation):

In addition, Canada will now exercise its control over security conditions and the qualifications and salary of seamen within our inland waters. This will be advantageous to our own labour force.

(Text):

The question which arises in connection with that statement is that all of those things mentioned in the paragraph which I have put on the record are covered now in the Canada Shipping Act. The matters of salary, wages, working conditions, and the like, having to do with seamen are covered in part III of the Canada Shipping Act which deals exclusively with seamen and their welfare. There is a part which deals with distressed seamen and sick mariners. I fail to see how the statement made by the colleague of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) is not entirely covered by the part of the Canada Shipping Act to which I have referred, and has nothing whatever to do with the policy announced earlier by the minister. I hope the minister will be able to clear up this point for me when he concludes the debate.

I am pleased to note that this measure will be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines so that it can get from the officers of his department and those of us who sit on the committee, careful consideration and study.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister if he would deal with the last part of my remarks?

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report of the speech delivered by my colleague nor have I read extracts from that speech. If I understand the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), a reference was made to certain advantages that this new policy of the government will have in so far as the regulation of matters like salaries and certificates is concerned. The hon. member for Laurier says that these matters are covered by the Canada Shipping Act as it exists at the moment. I do not want to quarrel with my hon. friend. There is no doubt about it, the Canada Shipping Act has very definite rules about these matters.

However, I would simply say to my hon. friend that he should direct his questions to the Secretary of State who made that statement. I am not the originator of the statement. I did not hear the speech, and I would not like to comment on that statement at the moment.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

AGRICULTURE

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS RESPECTING MARGINAL LANDS, RURAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES, ETC.

The house resumed from Saturday, May 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle) for the second reading of Bill No. C-77, to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: May I inform the house that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the various speeches made by members on this A.R.D.A. bill have added considerably, I believe, to the general knowledge of the purposes and principles of this legislation across the country. I do not know how many members spoke on this measure, but I do know from a reading of the press across Canada that there has been a considerable interest in each of the localities whose member put forward their point of view in connection with this bill.

I was particularly pleased when the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) mentioned the contribution of the late Dr. Blair from Lanark because if someone had not mentioned his contribution I had intended to do so. In my last remarks to the house, I mentioned that one of my purposes in delaying the passage of the bill until the month of May was to give me an opportunity to discuss, formally and informally with the provinces and farm organizations, the various points of view with regard to the proposed legislation and the various types of activity that could be carried out under its terms.

I am now able to report to the house that I have had formal consultations with eight of the provincial governments and several farm organizations, including the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. The sum total of these discussions, in broad outline, is that the organizations believe, in the main, the terms of the bill are broad enough to cover the various ideas they have in mind. Some of the organizations did discuss slight amendments, but after discussion agreed that the terms of the bill were broad enough to cover the purposes that they had included in their representations.

I also discussed with the provinces several steps that could be taken in each of their areas to raise farm income and give increased opportunity to the farmers in their respective provinces. We discussed with the provinces several types of programs that might apply not only within their provinces but across several provinces. I think it is well to report that in most cases the various departments affected in each of the provinces have in many cases gone ahead with their plans even before the bill has become statutory law. They recognize the importance of this legislation to that segment of the farm population which has been overlooked in the legislation affecting agriculture in the years gone by.

I also discussed with the provinces several facts and I have consulted with several of the academic leaders of our country, the deans of agriculture of several of our leading agricultural colleges, and have outlined to them the purposes of the bill and asked if they would submit ideas to me. Some of them have been very good in sending in lists of ideas and, together with the ideas, a statement concerning the principle that should be followed in the implementation of the bill.

Before I go into the principle of the bill I think I should take a few minutes in which to answer some of the statements made in the house in condemnation of the bill. The particular remarks to which I refer were made by the leader of the C.C.F. party. His comments were made on the second reading of the bill when he spoke a week ago Saturday. He said that the bill does not state what the act will do. He also said it does not say what the financial contributions will be. This is true, Mr. Speaker, because no one in the provinces or in the farm organizations or at the federal level knows yet what the bill will bring forth and the extent to which we are going to use this bill. The thing that has impressed me is the tremendous variety of ideas that have been put forward by the provincial ministers and by farm organizations of the things that they think are worth while and would benefit not only particular areas but the whole country.

Another point made by the hon. member for Assiniboia was that he was not so confident that the government would push this legislation forward. In a derogatory way he referred to previous legislation passed by this government and said there was a great fanfare and that nothing was done. I should like to remind the house that this particular bill is part of a national agricultural policy which was announced in the house on August 30, 1958. The hon. member for Assiniboia said that this bill was a deathbed repentance of the government, or words to that effect, and that we were duplicating the example of the P.F.R.A. legislation in 1935, bringing it in at the last minute. I should like to remind the members of the house that this particular bill was announced as one of the points of the national agricultural program on August 30, 1958; that the government has systematically each year brought in legislation under that program, and that this is just one part of that total program. This type of criticism in the face of the general acceptance of this legislation across the whole country and in the face of the enthusiastic reaction to this bill by leaders in farm thought who for generations have tried to get governments to accept something along this line I think disposes very quickly of the argument of the hon. member for Assiniboia.

A great deal of to-do was raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia about the pamphlet which was published by the department as part of the explanatory program to farm organizations and to the various provincial ministers. I think what has been overlooked in the description of this pamphlet as being an insult to parliament is this. If you look at the wording of item No. 4 in the orders of the day, you will find it reads in this way:

> Resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Agriculture for the second reading of Bill C-77, an act to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

I think the whole argument collapses on the simple ground that this pamphlet about which there has been so much discussion uses the word "act" as it is used in the order paper and therefore is absolutely correct parliamentary usage. If hon. members look at the pamphlet, as I know they all have done, they will note that it states:

> On December 15, 1960, the Minister of Agriculture introduced to the House of Commons a resolution concerned with improving the economic position of our farmers. The resolution introduces the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act (A.R.D.A. for short). This legislation will enable the government to enter into agreements—

The future tense is used throughout. The point that I have made is that by every definition, legal and common sense, this pamphlet is correct. It was a very essential part in the education of the public with regard to what this bill could do for Canada because, without the full and enthusiastic support not only of governments but of farm organizations, as well as of business people and professional people in this country, there would be no purpose in going ahead with this bill. Essentially, it is based on the premise that there will be co-operation between all these groups.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as to the remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia, he said this act should be entitled an act to replace the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. He then went on to take to his bosom the Liberal party and said that they had done so much for conservation. As he made that speech we in the house all thought that he was assuming that the present leader of the Liberal party was not going to remain their leader forever; and that he was assuming that if he lost out with the New party candidature he would be in a position to move right into the soon to be vacated leadership of the Liberal party.

Mr. Fisher: Shame.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Therefore, in conclusion, having regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia, I should just like to compare what he said on the resolution stage with what he said on second reading. I remember the thunder rolling through this house on the resolution stage when he said this bill was no good; that it was a sideshow with which to amuse the public; that what this government should do is face up to the fundamental facts facing agriculture and that the fundamental facts facing agriculture were the sale of wheat. As reported at page 1414 of Hansard he said this:

> The minister said he was going to raise his sights with respect to getting markets for Canadian wheat. When he did so he got his sights up to a mark 20 million bushels lower than the accomplishment of the former minister of trade and commerce. This inability of the Minister of Agriculture to dispose of the surplus agricultural commodities in the world today condemns the government's over-all agricultural policy.

That was on January 25, 1961. The hon. member condemned this bill because it did not do anything to sell agricultural products and said that the government's agricultural policy had failed completely because we had not sold wheat. Later he came back to the house. He had been visiting out west. I do not know what kind of terror ran up his spine, but when he heard the comments of the farmers and when he read the editorials in the western press—Liberal, Social Credit and C.C.F.—and when he heard the remarks of the farm leaders, he raced back to Ottawa in order to try to cast doubt on the fact that we had sold a quantity of grain. He therefore, had to make up a new speech for second reading. What he said this time was that the bill was no good because it was going to abolish P.F.R.A.

This bill in its third set of principles is simply applying to all Canada the principles of P.F.R.A. How long have the members from British Columbia asked in this house for some form of physical rehabilitation to the river valleys, land that has to be drained, land that has to be dammed up to give water to land which could become fertile where producers are in mortal competition with those who are using water for irrigation to the south of the line and with whom the British Columbia farmer has been unable to compete fairly? How long have we heard the people of the maritimes asking for something broader than the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act? Anyone who drives through the Atlantic areas of this country and sees area after area which could be brought up to new levels of prosperity, thereby adding to farm income and community life by a simple application of the a.b.c.'s of the use of water will realize how necessary this new bill is.

I might mention in passing that we do have the Canada Water Conservation Act. This act was passed in 1953, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was careful to point out the other day in the house. What he did not point out was how many areas, how many provinces, have used this legislation which was passed in 1953. If one compares the amount of use of the Canada Water Conservation Act of 1953, making a comparison between the years 1953-1957 and 1957-1961 he will soon recognize that this was almost empty legislation as far as the Liberals were concerned. The first government to make real use of this legislation was the present administration. The tragedy is that the only province which has used it to date is the province of Ontario. Now we have legislation based on different principles, including the principles of the Canada Water Conservation Act, which will apply to all parts of Canada and at long last the unity of this country has moved a step forward in the conservation field because we are making one law for all Canadians and not one law for just part of Canada.

I hope in the days ahead to have fruitful discussions with the provincial ministers of every province in this country to lay down, I hope in this year 1961, a minimum of at least one tentative agreement in each province for at least one pilot area and, I hope, several in each province. The preliminary discussions I have had with the four western ministers indicate they have a list of projects they would like to put forward. Some of them have already been mentioned but others will be new to the members of the house.

I should like to mention in passing that the idea, the philosophy of this new act, is to build up income and not to push farmers off the land. An example of the type of thinking you have in the House of Commons sometimes—but you do not find the difficulty outside—follows from the suggestion which many wildlife people have been making for a generation, namely, that there should be more migratory birds on the North American continent. This suggestion made by the wildlife people for as long as I can remember has always been turned down because of the fact that this wildlife was subsidized by farmers who had land around the various water holes which the ducks and geese use on their flights north and south. Here you have a clash. The wildlife people, advocating something that 20 million families in Canada desperately want, that is, more wildlife in the form of wild fowl or animals, are stymied by the fact that this increase in wildlife will be at the expense of the farmer whose income has not been growing in the same way that the income of other sections of the economy has been increasing.

As part of this general type of thinking, when I was in the United States I was made aware that the government there was planning an extensive move to take over much of the so-called wet lands in the United States to build up the wildlife population there. Their experts have made it clear to the government officials that the only way to do this properly was to spend most of the money in Canada. I made it clear on behalf of Canadian farmers that we would have to resist this move in Canada unless the bulk of this money went into the hands of the people who were providing the necessary ingredients for building up a wildlife population, namely the farmer. This argument was agreed to informally by the members of the United States government.

One of the items we discussed during the recent negotiations between the resource ministers of the two countries, the secretary for agriculture and myself was this question of how we could reconcile the needs of these two large segments of the population of our two countries and give an increase to the total wealth of this continent. Without going into all the details it was decided that we should set up a joint committee to examine the legal difficulties which lie in the way of having a joint operation between our two countries. It was decided that we should bring into this discussion the point of view of the farmers and the resource people to see if it would not be possible to take advantage of the large sums of money which are available from the supporters of wildlife, because it is those engaged in agriculture who are going to provide the food and shelter for these birds.

When I mention in this house that in North America approximately 70 per cent of the wild ducks are bred in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta some hon. members may be surprised. These birds fly south along flyways to the gulf of Mexico and certain parts of the coasts of California and Florida. There is a real opportunity here to increase the income of farmers in the so-called pothole area of western Canada. In terms of square miles, 220,000 square miles of western Canada is so-called pothole country. If you take just the area of the potholes it is 2½ million acres.

The great majority of farmers have looked on potholes as a nuisance and as a limiting factor in farming their land. If we can make these potholes an asset by having the sportsmen of this continent who want more ducks pay for these potholes and the grass around them and the grain planted to feed the ducks, what was once a liability to the farmers of western Canada could become an asset. These birds, as every biologist can confirm, are discriminatory feeders. If you plant a field of barley, wheat will not be touched by them. If you plant six-row barley, they will not eat that; they will just eat the two-row barley. Some birds like geese prefer corn to barley or wheat. Every biologist has known that for years.

No matter how silly some members of the opposition and some people across Canada think this idea is, the fact is that if you can add tens of millions of dollars a year to the income of farmers who have potholes—I do not care what these people think about this type of program—as long as you are increasing farm income you are achieving the results this bill was designed to achieve. I might mention, too, that I have discussed this matter with ministers of agriculture and resource ministers and they do not find it a silly idea. As a matter of fact, other provinces in addition to the prairie provinces have been taking an interest in this and wondering what can be done. There are three or four hundred thousand acres in the eastern provinces, I believe, which are amenable to this type of arrangement.

But that relates to just one of the hundreds of ideas in this bill to increase farm income and farm production. I shall not go into all the details of industrial development which is the part under rural development which intrigues most people.

It gave me great pleasure recently to go to Smith's Falls, in the county of Lanark, to preside at the opening of a new chocolate plant. That plant will cost some $7 million when completed, and will employ 200 or 300 people. It will utilize the milk of 1,000 good dairy cows. This is a perfect example of the increase in farm income opportunities in that area, and the increase in the community income opportunities as a result of decentralization of an industry. This not only facilitates the income of the country but gives tangible help to the people in the rural areas. It is not an accident that, in many areas of the United Kingdom and the United States, where government legislation has provided this advantage to areas designated depressed, there has been an increase in the number of decentralized industries in these areas with resultant benefit, not only to the immediate areas, but to the whole country.

As my time is short, I should like now to give, to those who are serious students of conservation, some of the principles which will be followed in setting up this legislation. I am going to take the opportunity of outlining them in point form.

1. While the program is focused mainly on farm people, it cannot be exclusively agricultural. Rural economies are no longer separate from town or urban economies, and the program must be one of area development embracing local centres of population as well as the farms surrounding them.

2. The program should be regarded and accepted as long run rather than short run since many of the problems to be encountered are structural rather than either cyclical or transitory.

3. The program should have two levels—a regional or local level; that is a local level within that region under the all-embracing framework of the national joint provincial-federal committee. Planning and action must be primarily local; the kind of action taken will depend on local resources and conditions.

While success depends upon local leadership, a national program directorate is essential for research, assistance in selecting personnel, and financing co-ordination of plans of various local programs, and to record and make available the experience of local programs to other local areas. The leadership must be primarily under the control of the provincial-federal directorate.

4. The co-operation of provincial governments, universities, farm organizations, and other bodies, is essential, but it is important that the national program directorate take the lead in co-ordinating any activities of these bodies. It would be undesirable to have several unco-ordinated programs proceeding simultaneously and in isolation, under provincial, university or other leadership. The national directorate should maintain the position of leadership in all activities which are not local.

5. The program may at times be closely related to other federal programs such as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act and the farm credit corporation, as well as, of course, to provincial extension and educational programs.

6. It must be recognized at the outset that the problems of marginal areas and of programs developed to relieve these problems will be social as much as economic, political or technological. This in itself makes it essential to regard the program as a long run one, and to recognize the difficulties which it will encounter.

Those six principles outline the relative stages of control and direction which must be included in an attempt to extend this act successfully.

(1) The action on this program will consist initially of the identification of marginal regions and of local development areas. This involves several important steps. (a) First, the selection of criteria by which we identify these regional redevelopment areas. I might add, in passing, that the best criterion we have is the income level of the areas.

(b) The second criterion is the regional redevelopment areas which will normally not coincide with local development areas, as the regions can be identified only on the basis of municipal statistics, whereas the local development areas will probably be smaller and based primarily upon local trade areas such as watersheds and perhaps municipal units. (c) The third criterion is that local areas have an optimum size—if too small, the resource base is likely to be inadequate; if too large, the problems of local leadership and organization would be excessive. That means in plain English that in some cases you will have several communities in the regional area, but within these several communities you will probably have several local development areas.

(2) The second action on the program will be the selection of a limited number of local development areas, attempting to choose those which could provide an example to later programs in somewhat similar areas.

(3) The third step in the action program would be the appointing of a field man from the national directorate who must attempt to stimulate interest by leaders in the local development area and to act only as their adviser, not leader. The transfer of initiative and leadership from a non-local to a local basis is difficult but very important, and must be achieved at a very early stage. Of course, a local development committee probably would consist of representatives of various farm organizations and boards of trade, churches, and so on.

(4) The fourth step would involve the duties of the local development committee. The duties I have listed are: (a) to delineate the local development area; (b) to discuss the goals for the area development program; (c) to organize a survey of resources in the area.

To digress for a moment, we have worked out the various types of criteria that should be followed in working out these surveys of resources.

To go on, (d), to request research in respect of possible methods of improving incomes. This information would be mostly for the guidance of the central group.

(5) The fifth step would be for each local development area to appoint an advisory committee consisting of research workers in the provincial universities, provincial government and perhaps other research institutions. This committee would discuss research projects with the local development committee, and help to appraise the results and implications of such projects for the local committee. It is very important that the extension people of the provincial governments be members of this advisory committee in order to have their support, because extension has been traditionally under the provincial government.

(6) The sixth step would be action by the local development committee which might take many forms, some of which will involve assistance at the national level, while others may be purely local. (a) I do not think I need to go into all of these, but we certainly should include action by the local development committee and special assistance by the provincial extension officers, directed toward those farmers who are expanding and intensifying their efforts. These men should be trained in farm management and work only with those farmers and farming areas which have a chance for success. (b) They should also set up their publicity and advice on the production of new forms of products from the land in the areas. (c) The third step which ought to be included is the development of local recreational areas and social services. (d) The fourth step would involve special educational facilities for off farm employment to stimulate interest in the farming areas. This report outlines several other courses to be followed by the committee.

I should like to conclude the outline of these principles regarding action under the program by saying that much of the preliminary work will be in the form of research. As I said, the bill will cover this in the clause which provides the power for the federal government to go into research programs either alone or in co-operation with the government of any province or any agency thereof on any type of program that is possible.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

I should like to emphasize the fact that the importance of research has been well demonstrated in those areas which have gone ahead, such as the city of Brandon in its particular program, the study of the eastern 10 counties of Ontario, the study of the clay belt area in northern Ontario, and the particular work which has been done in the province of Nova Scotia. All these programs with which the provincial governments have proceeded on their own have pointed out ways which will save many hours of effort over programs which are started without any preliminary research. Those who are experts in the field say that the usual technique is to work toward a land use map as a starting place for a program in the area.

I should like to discuss with the house a couple of points which have not been mentioned in debate, which will require the best thinking of provincial, county and federal government officials in working out the program. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I had expected that this matter would be raised in the house by various hon. members because, as I have gone up and down the country discussing this program with government officials and farm organizations, over and over again I heard this recurring theme: This program is a good one but what will be the effect on the assessment and the taxes in our municipality, our county or whatever form of local organization it is. The people who come from the Fraser river valley of British Columbia have a most striking example of this, probably the most striking of any outside of the Niagara area in Ontario. There you have the value of farm lands increasing at a tremendous rate without any relationship to the value of agricultural production of those farm lands because the value of the land is based on the expectation of an eventual urban development. This has forced the owners of those lands either to sell them for industrial or residential use or to put them into a type of production which is very intensive in order to pay the taxes which are assessed against this property by reason of the high assessment.

Even in New Brunswick we find that in our efforts to look into the possibility of expanding the cattle industry down there, the high assessment on the land based on the expectation of future value is such that the cattle industry cannot afford to go in there. Therefore, it seems logical that one of the first steps to be taken at the provincial level, which has control of property and civil rights, is to give serious consideration, once they have discovered by land use maps their best agricultural land—and this information is available in most provinces that have mapped in that way—to setting up a system of zoning land and then saying that land which is classified as grade A agricultural land by statute can never be used for anything else but agricultural land. Then the second zone would probably be land which can only be taken away from agriculture by an order in council of the provincial government. Grade C land and land of lesser grades could be used as one saw fit to use it. If this zoning is followed by a basis of assessment, not on the expected development value of that land for purposes other than agriculture but as potential agricultural production on that land, then you could work out a fair assessment and a fair tax basis to give you the possibility of protecting that farm land in the future.

The second feature of this question of taxes and assessment is that some counties would willingly support an intensive A.R.D.A. program in their counties but they would likely want to know the answer to this question: "If you take too much land out of this county for some purpose such as a community pasture or a county forest farm, then what assessment do you leave us to carry on our services?" Therefore when we are discussing these matters with the provincial government we shall have to keep in mind the legitimate needs of the county or of the local forms of government which I think we all admit are the basic organizations in a strong democracy.

I raise these points because they have not been discussed in the debate so far and I should like to give assurance to those people across the country who have talked to me about this problem that it is definitely in our minds.

Another point I should like to raise briefly is the question of financing. In the conversations with the various provincial ministers we have discussed projects which would be financed 50-50. We have discussed projects which would be financed on the basis of the Canada Water Conservation Act, 37½ per cent-37½ per cent-25 per cent, the 25 per cent to be paid by the local municipality. We have discussed certain types of projects where the provincial government might put up the capital and the federal government the operating costs, or the reverse, the provincial government to put up the capital costs and we assume the operating costs. We have discussed those projects which naturally we both lean toward and which are completely self-liquidating. If the money were advanced they could be paid for quite easily by those who are going to benefit from the legislation. We have discussed those projects which are partly self-liquidating, and this includes many of the projects. Other projects include certain types of operations where no money at all is required by the federal or provincial governments but where local initiative goes out and provides the money. We have had several examples of that in the province of Manitoba in the last two years.

In conclusion, I should like to point out—

Mr. Chevrier: This is the second time.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —once again, as I did at the resolution stage, that in Canada we are faced—and this is true of other countries of the world—with a situation where the rising pace of technology in agriculture is giving farmers the ability to produce food and fibre faster than populations are rising. If we look at our needs in the next 15 to 40 years and allow generously for export possibilities to help the nations which are underdeveloped and the nations which are developing agricultural industries, even with all these things considered, necessity compels us to state the essential conclusion that with this rapid pace of technology we have overcapacity in the western world for certain and are rapidly coming to that position in the rest of the world.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister but I must inform him that his time has expired unless by leave of the house—

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has concluded twice already. I have no objection if he wishes to conclude the third time.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to continue for two minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Conclude briefly.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): With this in mind, Mr. Speaker, a whole series of actions must be taken, not only in Canada but in other countries to adjust agriculture to this new situation. This is the reverse of the principle on which most of us have been raised and taught and I think honestly it must be faced.

The second principle is that in our countries a large proportion of the land now in agriculture does not produce sufficient income to give farmers on that land a good living; they produce just enough to bring about a surplus which holds back the farmer who has a better chance on better land.

The last thing I wish to mention is that the key to the success of this whole A.R.D.A. program is based on one word—"education". By education I mean not only education of the farmers but education of the people in the cities as well. Education means vocational training. It means an attitude of mind that has to be developed if this program is going to be successful. I think each one of us, and

I know each one is going to support this legislation, can be proud of the fact that we are members of the house at the time when this legislation is being put on the statute books.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, now that we have the bill I think certain observations of a general character should be made, particularly in the light of the speech by the minister to which we have just listened. The bill bears examination, especially in the light of the claims made by the minister.

One would think from what the minister has said tonight and what he has been saying throughout the country since this measure first came forward that the government was embarking on a program that would in effect have immediate application. The first clause in the preamble to the bill reads as follows:

> Whereas agriculture in Canada is undergoing technological changes that necessitate adjustments on the part of many Canadians engaged in this basic industry in order to maintain or raise their standard of living;

The bill at this moment does not do anything whatsoever to raise the standard of living of the farmers of Canada. Yet the minister has not indicated the long term character of the bill. He has given the impression wherever he has gone, including Smith's Falls, the last place on his tour throughout the nation, that the government has brought forward an agricultural program of which this is an important phase, something that is going to meet the problems of the farmers. I have carefully read the reports of the speeches of the minister as contained in the local and national press and nowhere will there be found any reference to the long term character of the bill.

What the government is doing, through the minister, in this matter, and let there be no mistake about it, is to bring forward another legislative enactment that will enable the propagandists of the government, of whom the minister is perhaps the most efficient next to the Prime Minister, to say, "Here is what we have done. We have brought forward a productivity bill. We brought forward a bill to provide for vocational grants to disabled people. We brought forward a bill to assist small business." And so on and so on.

Mr. Churchill: Give us the whole list.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The fact is that all of these measures have only a long term value. In fact, all that some of them do is to put in another form something that has been on the statute books for a long time. This is part of the government's build-up at this stage. It is nothing more than that. I do not deny that when the next government headed by the Leader of the Opposition takes over, it will be in a position to enter into agreements with the provinces for the purpose of carrying out certain intents of the bill, particularly as contained in clauses 4 and 5.

Mr. Ricard: Twenty years from now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But the minister must not be allowed to get away with the suggestion that what we have here tonight is the fulfilment of an important phase in the government's agricultural program. He mentioned that this was referred to in the general declaration of policy on agriculture by the Prime Minister in 1958. I have read that general declaration of the Prime Minister just as the minister has. I do not know it by heart as the minister does, because he has repeated it so often that he believes everything in it.

The fact is, however, that there is no reference in that statement to the particular character of this bill. All that is set forth is a general characterization that the government contemplates some measure to provide for the rehabilitation of agriculture, but to identify that generalization with this bill is to stretch the meaning of the Queen's English.

The minister has put out a pamphlet and he referred to the criticisms that were levelled at it by some hon. members. One would gather from reading the pamphlet that the bill had already been passed. One would gather that it was already the law of the land. One would gather that the bill provided directly for measures that would improve the income position of farmers at the present time.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know it is nonsense. That is what I am trying to tell the minister. All his claims for this bill are extravagant claims that cannot be supported either by the letter of the bill or by the declaration of intent of the government in announcing it. That is the fact. It requires repetition in order to indicate to the people of Canada that it is the fact. All we have got here is a bill that empowers the government to do certain things if certain other conditions are present. Nowhere will you find the minister acknowledging a real foundation for this measure. He says that this is a new concept determined by the present government and announced by the Prime Minister in 1958. He makes no reference whatsoever to the preliminary work done in this regard by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. He says nothing about the model bill put forward by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture with regard to land use. No, this is an idea thought up only by the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister, those two agricultural stalwarts from the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Jorgenson: Tell us what the Canadian Federation of Agriculture says about the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will tell the hon. member what the federation says about the bill. I will tell him what the federation has said about the committee on land use in the other place.

Mr. Fulton: One at a time.

Mr. Jorgenson: Answer the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know that hon. gentlemen do not like to be exposed.

Mr. Fulton: We love it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They do not like to have their legislation put in proper context.

Mr. Fulton: How about answering the question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The fact is that the former government under Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Gardiner—

Mr. Cardiff: Never did anything.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —recognizing the importance of this kind of measure, proposed the study which has been carried on now for over four years in the other place, as the result of action taken by the former government. It was not this government that thought of this kind of measure. All one has to do is to recall the speech made in this house by the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, when he indicated that the time had arrived for careful consideration of the question of land use in Canada and that the responsibility for making a careful study of this matter might well be assigned to the other place.

For a period of well over three years and a half witnesses came from all over Canada and made representations concerning what they thought might be done about economic land use to this committee under the chairmanship of a former member of this house, Senator Power. The committee listened to representations from government officials, and after all this evidence was accumulated, suddenly the Minister of Agriculture came forward with a new vision. He abandoned his vision of the north because he was given a new portfolio. He came forward with a new vision, this time a vision about the future of agriculture. It was a vision based upon the work of the former government. If the minister had wanted—

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to be fair in this little pamphlet of his which bears his imprimatur, he might well have referred to the speech of the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent; he might well have referred to the federation of agriculture study and representations made by that body to that committee. The federation, when it made its second representation to the committee, praised the step taken by the former government.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not one reference was made by the minister to these matters. I see the expert on agriculture from Cornwall is anxious to be recognized, and of course I recognize him.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Would the hon. member tell the committee of his vast experience in farming and agriculture so that we can judge for ourselves the authority with which he speaks on this subject?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the hon. member is not aware of this as I speak, then I can do no more.

The Minister of Agriculture has, at public expense, distributed thousands of these pamphlets. I have been told that over three million of these pamphlets have been prepared, some of them no doubt for the by-elections. Nowhere in this pamphlet is there to be found any reference to the work of the other place. No reference is made to the work of the farmers' organizations, notably the federation of agriculture. No reference is made to the model bill which the federation placed in his hands. No, this program is the result of a brainwave of the Minister of Agriculture alone.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In the interests of accuracy and since the hon. member says this pamphlet does not even mention the other place, although he says he has read it carefully, I would refer him to pages 3 and 4 which are almost entirely concerned with the resolution passed by the Senate. The hon. member also said he had been informed that three million of these pamphlets were distributed. Where did he get his statistics, from the Martin bureau of statistics?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has not in any way answered my charge. He does not give any acknowledgement to the work of the committee of the other place.

Mr. Nesbitt: It is right there.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says this plan arose out of a statement made by the Prime Minister in announcing his charter for the farmers of Canada in 1957. The minister, no matter what contrivance he resorts to, stands convicted by the very pamphlet which he says represents not only the offer of this government but pays proper tribute to the work of the previous administration and the national farm organizations. The Minister of Agriculture has spent quite a bit of his time outside the house in the last few weeks enunciating this program. I think that from now on he should be on his guard because everything he has said is being carefully read by the members of this house. From now on, we will ascertain whether or not the Minister of Agriculture is really interested in the rehabilitation of agriculture or in the rehabilitation of his party which is continually losing public esteem and support in this country.

When the minister presented the resolution which preceded this bill, he said that what he wanted to do was to see the bill placed in the hands of provincial governments and certain national farm organizations for the purpose of eliciting their views. This was a commendable decision of the minister. We certainly have not had from the minister tonight any report of the nature of his conferences with the provincial ministers of agriculture or the governments of the provinces. We have had from the minister tonight only a vague reference to conferences with the provinces and with certain ministers of agriculture. We have not been told which ministers of agriculture. We have not been told if all the provinces and their departments of agriculture have been consulted. We have been told there was a conference in which the provinces indicated their willingness to co-operate.

What provincial governments, presented with legislation in these general terms, would take any other position than to say they would co-operate with this government in the prosecution and in the realization of the kind of measures envisaged in this particular enactment? What province would deny that it was prepared to give consideration to entering into an agreement with the federal government for the purpose of undertaking projects for more efficient use and economic development of marginal or submarginal agricultural lands? There is no obligation imposed on the province by that kind of language. Of course, the provinces are in favour of that. Just as everyone is against sin, so are the provinces in favour of trying to do something for agriculture.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

But the minister has not given us any indication of the kind of specific agreement into which any particular province is prepared to enter. This bill came before this house in this form on March 23. When was the bill given to the provinces? When did this conference with the ministers of agriculture take place? Was it a general conference? Were there conferences with the two national farm organizations, and when did these conferences take place? The minister has not given us any indication whatever of the extent to which the provinces were willing to co-operate. He has not given us any indication as to how much money any particular province was prepared to commit itself to, in connection with this measure or in connection with any particular phase of this measure. All he has told us in this most general way is that, as a result of these conferences, so carelessly and so vaguely referred to, he has received an assurance from the provinces that there would be co-operation. We were told 2½ years ago this kind of co-operation would be given by the provinces with regard to the government's crop insurance legislation. All we have now as a result of that legislation is that one province has fully committed itself to an agreement and another has partially committed itself.

The minister cannot hope this parliament will take seriously his statement that the provinces have entered into any kind of commitment with regard to any particular phase of this bill. All that they have done, on the basis of the minister's own words, is to promise to co-operate, whatever that means. The minister does not indicate that the value of this bill is to be determined not in the light of what may happen today but what may happen some time in the unforeseeable future. The minister has not given us any indication when the first agreement under any one of these clauses, 3, 4 or 5, will begin. Will there be an agreement of any kind this year with respect to any of the provisions of these various clauses? Will there be an agreement next year? When will there be an agreement? Will there be an agreement in the next quarter century?

The minister has not given the committee any kind of assurance whatever. There is no obligation imposed on the government. If one examines clause 3 one finds there that the minister may, with the approval of the governor in council enter into a certain kind of agreement with any province providing for a joint arrangement. Then in clause 4 again the minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, enter into an agreement with any province providing for an undertaking jointly with the government of the province or any agency thereof for the purpose of certain things such as agreements for soil improvement and water conservation projects.

Then there is provision that the minister may cause to be prepared and undertaken directly or in co-operation with the government of any province or any agency thereof programs of research and investigation, as if that is something that is unique and something new. That is being done now. Surely the minister knows that in his department there is a research division. The minister surely knows now that in that research division, research on land use and on other phases of agricultural interest are now being pursued. This legislation is not required to cause that to be done. Therefore this particular clause is nothing more than window dressing that flows from the mouth of the minister all intended for one purpose, namely to fail to disclose to the farmers of this country that this government, having promised so much to the farmers of Canada, has not been able to implement those promises.

Mr. Crouse: What about the wheat sold?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend who is interested in fish asks me about the wheat sold. That has nothing to do with this bill. I am talking about this bill. My hon. friend should know that there is a difference between wheat sold and something that is intended for the very long future. Surely I am not being unfair to the minister when I characterize the legislation as I do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The only obligation imposed on the government in this bill is to be found in subclause 3 of clause 3 where it is provided as follows:

> 3. The minister shall, in carrying out any project or research program for the development of income and employment opportunities in rural agricultural areas, make use wherever possible, of the services and facilities of other departments of the government of Canada or of any agencies thereof.

We find that provision, as if that was the kind of thing that should be put into this bill. If the government enter into any kind of research project, surely they must inevitably use the services and the facilities of other departments of the government of Canada. There is no legal requirement which forces a government to put that kind of thing in legislation. That also is window dressing. It means nothing. That kind of thing is what the government would have to do in any event. This is put in there simply so that the minister can go and talk eloquently with ardour about A.R.D.A.

An hon. Member: Who thought that one up?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I therefore do not think that anyone can say that this bill does what the minister in the generality of his language suggested it does. If the minister wishes to convince this house, the farmers and the people of Canada that this is a program designed for their immediate or short-term amelioration let the minister say so. Let him give evidence of it. Let him produce evidence that there is at least some commitment by the provinces for sharing with the federal government in the cost of the projects that are envisaged. We have not even had from the minister any indication, except again in very general terms, of the nature of the cost-sharing plans. He told us that some of these plans would be on a 50-50 basis and that some would be on the basis of the extension of credit by either one of two senior governments or by both. But that again is so general as not to convey any real meaning whatsoever. Let the minister tell us that there is one province in connection with which there is a definite commitment for the federal government to expend X percentage of dollars and for the province to expend X percentage of dollars. Let him give us one example of that kind. Then he will be justified in the glowing references he makes to this new phase of the government's agricultural program.

This bill is like so many other projects of this government, Mr. Chairman. It reminds one of the Clark report that is still being studied by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. That is something for the long term. It reminds one of the legislation to which I made reference a moment ago, namely the legislation providing for grants for vocational rehabilitation. The bill introduced this session by the responsible minister in connection with that matter, as he was forced to admit, did not do anything whatsoever except to put in the form of an act something which was now being done and which had been done by governments for over a decade as the result of government policy formulated 12 years ago.

Mr. Charlton: For how long was the Saskatchewan river dam promised?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend asks how long the Saskatchewan river dam was promised. I am talking about an enactment; I am saying that when a government comes into parliament and causes parliament to pass a measure, that measure should stand on its own feet and no minister of the crown, in introducing such a measure, should seek to give the impression that the bill does something which, on its very face value it does not do. That is the gist of my criticism of this measure.

I say that the principle behind this bill is sound. I say that the principle behind this bill is good. There must be provision for agricultural rehabilitation, for further policies in the matter of land use, for policies designed to deal with the serious and critical situation that attends the farmers of Canada on marginal land. No one in this chamber quarrels with that objective. That was why the former government caused the committee in the other place to go into this whole matter, namely so that we could have the basis for some legislation in that regard. To the Minister of Agriculture I say this. By the pamphlet which he has distributed; by the speeches which he made to farm groups, particularly the speech he made the other day in Esquimalt-Saanich and the speech he made the other day in Smith's Falls, he has not added to his prestige nor to the prestige of his government.

Mr. Fulton: He has added to the consternation of the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I beg the minister's pardon.

Mr. Fulton: I said he has added to the consternation and disorganization of the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think my hon. friend is right.

Mr. Fulton: Shall I repeat it again?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think my hon. friend is right; he has added to the consternation of the Liberal party.

Mr. Fulton: And its disorganization.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Liberal party has never brought into this house legislation which on its face was so far removed from the declarations of intention of the proposers or of the government. I doubt that you will find on our statutes any bill of this character, a bill that provides the government with powers which it may or may not exercise some time in the long future. I doubt that there is to be found on the statute book of our country any bill of this character. When the former government had a policy to bring forward, it brought in a specific enactment providing for something to be done forthwith, not something to be done in the long future. In this bill there is no guarantee that anything whatsoever will be done this year, next year or at any time. No obligation is imposed on this government to do anything. The only real purpose of the government in bringing forward this bill at this time in this form is to add to the façade of political deception that it is creating throughout this country by trying to give the impression that it has accomplished something when in fact it has failed in the discharge of its promises made to the Canadian people in two general elections. That is the real situation. The minister could rise now and tell me, tell the committee, if the hon. member for Essex East is wrong. He could say, "Here is what we have done; we have an agreement with the province of X to do thus and thus at a certain time." I challenge the minister now to give us one bit of evidence that he has a specific agreement with any province pursuant to any clause of this bill.

Mr. Pallett: Before the legislation is passed?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member will recall that with regard to assistance to farmers, acreage assistance, the commitment was made by the government to the provinces before parliament had even met and the Prime Minister justified that on the ground that the farmers of Canada were entitled to a commitment from the government and the government was prepared to stand or fall by that commitment. If hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to vote against us, he said, they could do so. Let the minister take that course. If he does so we shall at least be convinced that this bill, good in its principle, good in its concept, really means something in immediate terms.

Mr. Argue: I am sure we have listened with a great deal of interest to the eloquent speech delivered by the hon. member for Essex East. We are all sorry he was away from the house for some little time because of illness but we are pleased to see tonight that his health is excellent and that the rest he had for a few days has enabled him to make a very eloquent speech upon a subject into which he has perhaps not done as much research as, I know, he would like to have done.

The Minister of Agriculture delivered a long speech tonight. I see he is out of his place now and I hope that does not mean another protracted absence.

Mr. Pallett: Just as the hon. member was out of his seat.

Mr. Argue: I have not been in my seat all day, that is perfectly true, but I have not been away for a full week, at least not until this point of the session. However, we know the Minister of Agriculture has been given a difficult job. His job is to improve the fortunes of the Liberal party in rural Canada.

Some hon. Members: Liberal party?

Mr. Argue: Well, I don't know. If he keeps on, maybe he will be doing just that. His job is to improve the fortunes of the Conservative party in rural Canada and he has decided that in order to do that he must be out and about the country for a very large part of the time. I understand that the minister in closing the debate—I was not here at that time, though I heard about his closing remarks—made a long reference to some of the things I have said on this subject and on other subjects. I am highly pleased he should have taken the trouble to deal with some of the statements I have made. I hope he will order a large number of copies of Hansard for today and send them out across western Canada. I particularly invite him to send them to my own constituency since he has spent so much time dealing with remarks which have been made from this corner of the house.

The hon. member for Essex East endeavoured to demonstrate that while there is nothing in this legislation, members of the Liberal party really had had a policy of their own with respect to conservation. Their policy, as the hon. member so well pointed out, was to appoint a committee of the other place some four years ago to undertake what seems to be a permanent study of land use in this country. The present approach may not be the best approach in the world but I think it is far better to have an act, even an inadequate act, placed before the House of Commons than to have a long, almost endless study going on in the other place. I think the hon. member for Essex East might have improved his argument a great deal if he had pointed out some of the things which the minister of agriculture in the former administration had done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act rather than referring only to the program of study which was undertaken in the other place.

I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether any agreements whatsoever are pending with the provinces. I should like to hear from the minister whether he expects any agreement at all to be signed this year and, if so, how many agreements and in what form he expects them to be signed. This whole bill, with the exception of the research features, is dependent upon provincial agreement and co-operation. I see nothing in this bill—and let the minister correct me if I am wrong—which permits the federal government to undertake projects with the farmers to bring about certain desired improvements in income or certain desired changes in land use.

As I say, every clause of this bill is dependent upon provincial agreement. In other words, the federal government is taking no direct responsibility on its own. Its responsibility will be exercised only by agreement with the provinces. I think there is a place for agreement with the provinces. There is probably a place for agreement with the provinces in every clause of the bill. But I submit there is also room for direct agreements with the farmers concerned in order that the federal government in co-operation with farmers may do something to increase farm income. I see no such provision here. I do not know why the bill has been prepared in this way. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act provided that the federal government could undertake direct projects. Section 9 of that act reads as follows:

> The minister may, subject to section 4—

That has to do with recommendations of advisory committees.

> —undertake the development, construction, promotion, operation and maintenance of any project or scheme under or by virtue of this act or enter into any agreement with any province, municipality or person with respect thereto.

In other words, under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act the federal government is given power to deal directly with farmers and this the federal government has done in thousands of instances. It has provided direct assistance to farmers in connection with dugouts, stock watering dams and other projects. However, under this so-called A.R.D.A. program no direct benefit goes to the farmers, as I read it. First of all, there has to be a master agreement with the provinces relating to those projects. I suggest that if it is claiming all the initiative it is now, in this field the federal government should show the same kind of initiative as is set forth in section 9 of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act so that the federal government in consultation and agreement with the provinces might go out and do a job of raising farm income.

No one can be fully sure of what can be accomplished under this measure. Certainly within the provisions of the measure there is room and possibility for broad beneficial results. No one can tell from reading this measure whether it is going to be a part of the vision, part of a political propaganda splurge, or whether it will mean something very positive and worth while in the way of government policy.

Farmers have been disappointed in the past. This government introduced a measure in 1948, referred to as Bill No. 237, which proposed legislation under which farmers were assured that the government guaranteed floor prices for nine main agricultural commodities. They have found out since that these floor prices are very largely fictitious, and that it is very difficult, by means of the deficiency payment formula, to obtain any real benefit from that measure. I hope that the measure which we are now discussing will, as it is formulated, be of much greater benefit to the producers than the measure contained in Bill No. 237, in regard to which there has been so much disappointment.

The minister has referred to projects which will be financed on a 50-50 basis. I should like to ask the minister whether he can name one project in regard to which he expects to sign an agreement with any province, financed on a 50-50 basis? He has also referred to a 37½-37½-25 division. I should like to ask the minister whether he can inform this committee of any project that will be financed in that way?

The minister has also referred to certain projects regarding the seeding of land to barley, as I understood him, for wildlife, such as ducks. I should be very interested to learn from the minister how this project will work out in practice. I know that tens of thousands of farmers in western Canada have lost many fields of grain, particularly barley, year after year, because of ducks. The ducks land in vast numbers in a field of barley and destroy that field of barley in a matter of hours. I should like to know whether there is any provision in this bill, as it is now drafted, to compensate farmers for the destruction of their fields of barley by ducks, or is this a special provision in respect of special land seeded to barley to provide feed for wildlife?

Mr. Chairman, as I have said, the value of this measure can be determined only by the action taken by both federal and provincial governments, and I should think the members of this committee would be interested in learning whether, under this legislation, the government expects to have any project in operation during the present calendar year and, if so, which project will it be.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr.Chairman, I have listened to the two hon. members who have just spoken in regard to this measure, the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Assiniboia. I was particularly interested in the comment made by the hon. member for Essex East, which he repeated several times, to the effect that the minister had made no reference to the contribution of the special committee of the Senate on land use in Canada. Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. member, but I found his remark rather strange, in view of the fact that the pamphlet, to which he referred, makes reference at page 3 to the Senate committee recommendations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. member read what the pamphlet says there?

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member has requested me to read what the pamphlet says, and I shall be very pleased to do so. This pamphlet is entitled "Senate Committee Recommendations", and it says that the Senate committee on land use in Canada has studied the question of marginal and submarginal lands during 1960.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the hon. gentleman not realize the committee was set up 3½ years before that?

Mr. Nesbitt: That may very well be the case, however, it says that committee studied that particular problem during 1960. That committee may have studied the problem for several years, but I would suggest the hon. member knows the political makeup of the Senate.

In any event, I do not understand how the hon. member is able to suggest the minister has deprecated the work done by that committee of the other place.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The pamphlet says it studied the problem in 1960, and I suggest that the committee was set up three years before that, during which time it studied the problem.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member suggests that perhaps the work accomplished during 1957-58-59 should also have been mentioned. That may be so, but there is certainly reference made specifically to the work done in 1960. Whether the work done in the other years should have been mentioned is perhaps a matter of opinion. I do not think it matters very much, because the work of that committee, in regard to this study, has been specifically commended and referred to by the minister. All matters such as this, of course, may be matters of opinion.

The hon. member for Assiniboia made certain remarks in respect of this subject, and I thought he was fairer than the member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am afraid I must leave with that remark.

Mr. Nesbitt: Before the hon. member for Essex East leaves, I should like to say that it is an old adage of the law—and he is a member of that profession—when one's case is not very strong one should present it loudly, with vehemence and eloquence. The hon. member for Essex East certainly did that.

Mr. Chevrier: He does that with every case, and with logic as well.

An hon. Member: Good or bad.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am quite sure the hon. member for Essex East may do that in every case, good or bad, but it is not always accurate.

However, the hon. member for Assiniboia suggested that the federal government could not, by itself directly, do anything for the farmers. I suggest that is the normal type of comment which results from the thinking of that group of which he is a member. He had reference, as I understood it, to the decentralization of control. I think it is quite clear that the terms of the bill indicate recognition of the fact that the best way to work out the problem is by co-operating with local authorities who know best those lines of approach which are most suited to their particular areas. I do not think the mighty know-it-alls of Ottawa are in a position to do that. I realize the C.C.F. party, in the past, has felt that all good things and all knowledge flow from Ottawa. I have found, through consultation with members of the party to which I belong, that it is generally our opinion that matters such as those involved here are best decided and appraised by the local people who are directly concerned and possess greater local knowledge. Of course, it is the policy of the federal government to assist and participate in these matters.

I should like to make a suggestion to the minister in respect of A.R.D.A. I do so in answer to the suggestions made by the previous speakers that the minister has not mentioned specific projects to any extent having relation to the establishment of farmers' markets. Farmers' markets have been considered as poor relations. To a large degree they have been ignored by large farm organizations and perhaps by branches of government because they do not fit into the modern concept of big business and the like.

The farmers' market is a ready-made established form of small farm help. It needs only more backing, understanding and promotion from agricultural and provincial and municipal authorities. A number of hon. members may be uninformed on farm markets because in large urban areas they are not in evidence at the present time. They are much in evidence in smaller semi-urban and rural areas. My submission, Mr. Chairman, is that they could be promoted in the larger areas to the benefit of small farmers.

Each vendor in the farmers' market represents a small independent business. In other words, each farmers' market is a collection of small independent farmer businessmen. For the benefit of members who perhaps have not those farm markets in their area I would mention that it is normally the custom to hold one of those markets once a week, ordinarily on Saturdays, or sometimes two or three times a week, depending on the area concerned.

The primary users of farmers' markets are first of all market gardeners and also fruit growers with limited capital and acreage who for reasons of age are perhaps not able to expand in today's stepped up economy or perhaps, as I have said, they do not have the capital to do so. Another group who use farmers' markets are small farmers selling everything from maple syrup to cabbage to supplement their incomes. A third group are the wives of mixed family farmers who sell poultry products and home baking for the obvious purpose again of supplementing the family income. The two other groups that customarily use farmers' markets are farmer butchers and hucksters. I know a number of people say that hucksters have no place in farmers' markets. They buy produce of the farms and go and sell it themselves on the market. But after all, hucksters have to make a living, too.

The first three groups are, I think, perhaps the most important, namely the market gardeners and the small farmers who are selling produce to supplement their income and the wives of mixed farmers who sell poultry and home baking.

What function does the farmers' market perform in a community? Well, first of all it provides fresh produce directly from the producer to the consumer, and in these days this is something very beneficial because many vegetables which the large grocery chains and other organizations sell to the public are picked, sent to a large centre and sorted and redistributed. By the time the public gets them they are not always in the best of condition. This, of course, is particularly applicable to vegetables such as asparagus and sweet corn. Thus, the first function that the market can perform is to see that the people in the area are provided with fresh produce direct from the producer to the consumer.

The second thing is that the community itself derives value from the market. Of course, there is a little extra business from the farmers who come in on Saturday or Wednesday market days. A very important thing it does is to promote good urban-rural relations. This, Mr. Chairman, is a most important function of the farmers' market.

In the city in which I live, namely Woodstock, there has been a large and active farm market ever since I can remember. It is an event that most people in the city look forward to every Saturday. They look forward with keen interest to coming down to the market and exchanging ideas and having a talk with their friends from the country who bring in the various kinds of produce. I know everyone looks forward to it. This, of course, leads to a mutual understanding of rural-urban problems. This is something which cannot be measured in dollars and cents. It has great intangible values. It is a one-day attraction, but it is also a tourist attraction. I know of people who occasionally visit our town from large areas who get quite a kick out of going down to the market and seeing first hand the farm produce brought in. Tourists from other countries also go down town to see the market. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be a very good idea if everything were done to retain and if possible expand this multitude of small enterprises in farmers' markets.

I should like just briefly to give the committee some figures to show how farm income can be supplemented by the use of the farm market. Might I say that these figures were given to me by Mrs. Alec Cureton who lives in the county in my area and who keeps a very exact cost accounting of her week's operations. The first item of expense that she mentions is something that I want to refer to again in a moment. The rent for the stall comes to $2.50 each Saturday. The cost of bags comes to 34 cents and boxes, 60 cents. The cost of bringing the truck in amounts to $1. Therefore, her total cost is $4.44. These are her actual revenue figures for one week: 49 dozen eggs, $23.85. I might say that this revenue was for the week ended May 6. The cost of producing the eggs—in other words, the feed—came to $17.20; the balance before other costs would be $6.65. For four bags of potatoes she received $11.30. The cost of producing those potatoes was $8 and the profit, $3.30. For 63 boxes of flowers, pansies, she received $20.60. For three bird houses made from scrap lumber she received $2.25. The gross income was $32.80. The net cost was $4.44, leaving a balance of $28.36. This is not a great deal of money when one considers the work involved, but I have talked frequently to this particular vendor and many others in the local market and they are very glad indeed to be able to have this supplementary income which greatly assists them in being able to carry on.

How can farm markets be improved and expanded? First of all, there should be strong support and backing from the Department of Agriculture by means of promotion and the like. Second, the Minister of Agriculture mentioned earlier this evening education of local authorities by means of literature and the press on the value of farm markets for A.R.D.A. Third, and of most importance perhaps in practical terms, co-operation with provincial and municipal authorities in improving and expanding farm markets as a part of A.R.D.A. and—here is the important thing—as a public service.

Originally, farmers' markets were intended as a service to the district farmers and indeed to the citizens of the towns and cities. They were not intended as a money-making scheme as some people and indeed some municipal councils think. I mention this because I know that in some areas there has been a tendency for municipal councils to raise the rents for farmers coming in on Saturdays or on Wednesdays as the case may be. I would point out that the intention of those markets was not to be money making but to provide a service. Since we all know that in the last 15 years costs have risen gradually, to raise the rents for farmers who come in on Saturdays when the price of their produce has not increased greatly would work a great hardship. It is in this way that the federal government could contribute to the expansion and promotion of farm markets through provincial and municipal authorities.

This is a project that I think could be greatly expanded to everybody's benefit. It provides the small family farmer and his wife with additional income which is very badly needed to purchase those little extra things they might not otherwise be able to get. At the same time, as I have already mentioned, it promotes good urban-rural relations and provides the public with good, fresh produce which they perhaps cannot otherwise get in some of the large cities.

I know that a number of places such as Hamilton, London, Kitchener and others have very fine markets indeed. They provide a great service to these communities. These are medium to large size cities, and I know that in smaller cities such as Woodstock from which I come such markets are also very popular. I think this idea could be expanded into the larger urban municipalities to the great advantage of both the rural and urban population.

Mr. Argue: Before clause 1 carries, Mr. Chairman, can the minister tell us whether or not any projects are likely to be undertaken under agreements to be signed during the present year? Will he also tell us whether I am right in thinking that it is impossible under these agreements for the government to deal directly with farmers in respect of rehabilitation projects?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In answer to the first question, it is my opinion from talking to the ministers of most of the provinces that we will have at least one pilot agreement with every province by the end of the calendar year. In the case of the western provinces it is very easy because we have several projects we have discussed in respect of which it is not difficult to work on the basis of the precedents of the past in order to build up agreements for the future. As the hon. member knows, the obvious one is the need for expansion of the community pasture idea.

The same situation applies in the maritime provinces where all the ministers are very keen to proceed with several projects that they have to offer. I should like to emphasize one point, namely, that each of us agreed that it is wise to do our research ahead of time rather than to go ahead and blunder into mistakes. Therefore I think the first thing you will see is a series of research agreements outlining certain areas and problems.

With regard to the second question having to do with making arrangements directly with the farmers, the legislation specifies that agreements may be made with a province or any agency thereof. As the federal government we have the feeling that when we are dealing with matters affecting property and civil rights the provinces should either be partners with us or should name some group with which we can be partners. Under the legislation the province will have to designate the agency. I would suggest that in certain provinces it might be a conservation district while in others it might be a municipality. If a group of people organize themselves into a particular district for a specific purpose, there is nothing to stop the province from authorizing them as the agency, and that is the reason for drafting the legislation in this way.

I should like to refer to a point that goes beyond clause 1. Clause 7 of the bill makes it mandatory for the minister to bring each agreement before the house under an estimate before it becomes final. In this way we have protected the rights of parliament.

I cannot help noting in passing the tendency of the leader of the C.C.F. to come back again and again to a theme which I think is a dangerous one for the C.C.F. and the New party, namely, that this matter should be centralized in the hands of the federal government. This centralizing tendency goes against the main trend of Canadian public thinking which is that government is better closer to the people. I for one would hesitate to support any suggestion that we should ride roughshod over the wishes of the provinces in this regard. The hon. member for Essex East exposed himself completely, of course, when he referred—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Be careful.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —in his rather enthusiastic remarks to my ability in getting word across the country of how the bill would help people, by pointing out that he was a centralizer—

Mr. Fulton: Good old Grit tactics.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —that he would like to have the responsibility of running this whole show because he would lay down the law as to how things were to be done.

Mr. Fulton: Grit tactics.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): He forgot himself there. He went on to point out that when the Liberals were in power they brought in no long term legislation. They brought in ad hoc legislation dealing with some matter of the moment but which did not look to the future. Actually he condemned the former Liberal government rather harshly because they did bring in legislation with a long range effect. One of the best examples was the Canada Water Conservation Act, and as far as the Liberals are concerned the only criticism I offer of that act is that they never used it. He criticizes us for having brought in legislation that all provincial ministers have agreed is broad enough to cover almost any type of project that they can envisage. I think this legislation is not only sound in principle but is broad enough in its framework to take in all points of view.

The hon. member for Essex East asked me to give one example of an agreement made with a province. This points up clearly that he has shown himself to be completely contemptuous of parliament. He knows very well that if I had signed an agreement and brought it into the house I would have been accused of ignoring the rights of parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not at all.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): He argues that by putting out a pamphlet describing the general principles of something that is going through the house we are not fully respectful of parliament. Then he goes on to say that he wants me to bring in an example of an agreement signed and sealed which would in effect really be an insult to parliament because under the legislation I have no right to bring in any agreement until the bill is passed and until an individual vote covering each agreement has been approved by members of the house who are responsible for voting supply to the crown.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think the statement just made by the minister is a very important one and demonstrates that very little will be accomplished under the legislation during the present year. The minister says that he expects that before the end of the year there will be agreements with each of the provinces and that pilot projects may be under way in some provinces. Then he went on to say that there is one thing that the government has learned, that research should come first. If we have a project, if the research has to come first, I think it follows that it may be a long, long time before any great use is in fact made of the legislation.

The minister said earlier that the federal government may pay 50 per cent on certain projects and 37½ per cent on others. I ask the minister whether he has any projects in mind on which the government may pay more than 50 per cent.

The minister says that we in this group have a tendency to centralize and that under the bill everything is going to be done through the provinces. I suggest that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is a good act in that it permits the government, if it feels it is necessary to do so, to deal directly with the producers, the farmers. I think it is a very definite oversight, a definite lack in this bill, that the federal government cannot deal directly with the farmers, at least in particular instances. If that power were in this bill it would not mean the government could not or should not co-operate with the provinces. The government would have the power to deal directly with the farmers and to bring some of the benefits directly to the farmers without the need for this over-all provincial agreement.

Does the minister feel it is erroneous to have the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act permit the federal government to pay the farmers directly for the construction of stock watering dams or dugouts? Does the minister feel that this kind of provision should require a provincial act and presumably, therefore, payments from the provincial treasury? I ask the minister if he thinks it is centralizing when this government has in the past—and I hope they do it during the present crop year—paid producers a dollar an acre up to a maximum of 200 acres as some kind of trivial payment for a very large promise that has not been kept? Does the minister think it is centralization when the federal government writes cheques and makes those cheques available to the producers without any master agreement or consultation with the provinces?

Such clauses as we have in this bill do require provincial agreement and can be used, in every single instance, by both the federal and provincial governments as a means of blocking real progress and the real value of legislation such as this. I suggest the minister should have the bill amended so that the government would have the power to deal directly with the farmers in certain instances. I suggest this is an oversight and it makes the bill far less valuable when provincial agreement is required in every single case. I think the lack of this feature in this bill makes it absolutely essential that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be maintained. There is a great danger that the provision to permit direct dealing under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act may be lost.

I again underline, Mr. Chairman, our extreme disappointment that this bill does not provide for some direct payments by the federal government to the farmers on particular conservation projects but rather gives every single province the right to veto, in any particular it wishes, the kind of benefits that can flow from this legislation.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am glad the hon. member has brought the issue out so clearly because it gives me a chance to explain very simply, and in blunt terms, what the hon. member should have learned here in the last 15 years. If he goes back and reads the words of the man of whom he spoke so highly here a week ago Saturday, Right Hon. Mr. Gardiner and his great contributions to P.F.R.A., he will find that Mr. Gardiner made a very clear statement on this particular subject on May 22, 1947, just exactly 14 years ago today.

Now, the minister of agriculture at that time had been asked to extend the principles of P.F.R.A. into other provinces. This is his statement, as reported on page 3317 of Hansard of that day:

> I am now authorized to make the following statement of present policy.
> The present Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act will be continued as applicable to the established P.F.R.A. area in the three prairie provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.
> This act was passed in 1935 and amended in 1937, 1939 and 1941. It provides that works may be undertaken to rehabilitate certain areas in the prairie provinces even though the constitutional position is that such works are the responsibility of the province or municipality. There were, however, a number of special circumstances which justified P.F.R.A. Included in these is the fact that the dominion government administered the lands and resources of the area during its period of settlement and the further fact that there was reason to believe at that time that a very large area was subject to drought so severe and of such long duration as to make permanent residence difficult if not impossible without conservation and distribution of water.

He then goes on to describe the details, with which I shall not deal. However, he continues further along:

> It has been suggested that because of the benefits already apparent in the area to which P.F.R.A. has been applied, the principles of the act should be extended by legislation to all other parts of Canada.
> In view of the constitutional relationship between the dominion and the provinces the government has decided that such legislation should not be recommended. It is held that the same obligation does not exist in other parts of the prairie provinces or in the remainder of Canada as in the drought area of the prairie provinces.

It is considered, however, that there are certain works outside the drought area which if undertaken would be of assistance to all Canada through making possible increased development of farm lands which if left to provincial or municipal responsibility might greatly retard Canada's development.

Then, he goes on to describe what those increased activities could be, with a special program of marshland development in the maritimes and farm lands in British Columbia, and so on. The essential point which he makes, which is constitutionally sound, is that this matter of conservation is in the hands of the provincial governments. It was only due to the special circumstance that the land of the prairie provinces was so long under the federal government which had followed policies which allowed the land to be denuded that made it necessary for the Conservative government in 1935 to introduce this very fine legislation, and thus get around the constitutional position. These resources had only been turned back to the provincial governments in 1931.

I should like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that under this measure we can give assistance to farmers if a province designates that group of farmers as an agency of that province.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if I may ask the minister a question?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think this is the correct constitutional position to take.

Mr. Argue: Is it possible under this measure, as it is now, to provide that for any special project the minister might wish to think of, the government could pay the farmers 100 per cent of the cost?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is possible, yes.

Mr. Argue: Does the minister have any such projects in mind?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There has been no proposal put before me by any group of farmers as yet, but I say it is possible under the terms of this bill.

Mr. Argue: We have had constitutional interpretations in this house by the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner in years gone by, and I do not think some of us have been greatly impressed by his constitutional interpretation. It is a rather strange thing, therefore, to find the present Minister of Agriculture going back 14 years to quote Jimmy Gardiner as an authority on the constitution. I do not profess to be an authority on the constitution, but it seems rather strange to me that the constitution should apply in a certain way in three provinces and apply in a different way in the other provinces.

The minister says the constitution is applied in this way in the prairies because of drought conditions and because the land was in the hands of the federal government for such a long period of time. I think that is just nonsense. I think that the courts of this country would apply the constitution in precisely the same manner to every particular part and every province of the country. I think the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is constitutional. The constitutionality of the act has never been challenged. I would suggest to the minister that no provincial government or no agency in this country is going to challenge the right of the federal government, which I think it has, to enter into agreements with the citizens of this country and under such agreements to make certain payments from the federal treasury. This, of course, is just an excuse; and the excuse the minister is using is directed, I am certain in my own mind, at getting substantial contributions from the provinces for the particular projects that are outlined in this legislation.

I suggest that the people on the prairies whom the minister represents and whom I represent do not ask for special treatment. We do not want the constitution to be applied in one way in the prairies and in another way in some other parts of Canada. If there are particular aspects of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act that apply to the prairie provinces, I suggest that the good benefits should be applied to all of Canada instead of there being a situation, as the Minister of Agriculture is now saying, in which we have one rule for the prairies under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and another rule for the rest of Canada under A.R.D.A.; and under A.R.D.A. we will pay a smaller percentage than the federal government paid under P.F.R.A. I think it is time that all parts of Canada were treated equally and that any particular benefits that may accrue to the prairie provinces are made applicable to all parts of Canada. I resent being placed in the category of some special area that gets some special kind of hand-out and then the minister having the effrontery to tell us that the constitution applies in a certain way on the prairies and in a certain other way in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can he enlighten me and tell me whether the letters A.R.D.A. really mean Alvin's rehabilitation development act?

Mr. Argue: I do not know. Probably Alvin would say yes. I suppose it would depend on how it works out in a year or so whether he would want to agree at that time with the hon. member for Essex East.

I should like to see this act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act applied in the same way with the same general benefits through all parts of the country. It is true that the prairies have a risk because of drought or dry weather, which perhaps does not prevail in other parts of this country. However, I suggest that there are many areas of Canada today that are just as high a risk, as far as the growing of crops is concerned, as is a large part of the prairie region where, through good cultural practices or modern scientific practices we have been able to grow a tremendous amount of grain even when we have received a very low rainfall. One of the persons closely connected with the crop insurance plan in Saskatchewan has said that he feels that drought is no longer the most serious crop hazard in the prairie provinces; that because of good cultural practices we are able to grow much better crops on the basis of a low rainfall than we have grown in times past; and that a widespread epidemic of rust could create a much lower general yield across the prairies than even a year of low rainfall.

I conclude by saying that I resent the statement of the minister that we should have an act applying in a certain way in the prairies and in another way outside the prairie region. I think it is time that this government considered all ten provinces as part of this nation and treated them all on an equal basis. There are particular benefits in the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and those benefits should be extended to the rest of the nation.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Agreements for alternative land use projects authorized.

(Translation):

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Chairman, section 2 of the bill before the house deals with joint agreements or programs between the federal and provincial governments. Those joint programs are suggested by the central government to make more efficient those laws which, after all, have a bearing on the whole of the country.

This federal bill, like many others, provides for the sharing of expenses with the provinces.

Since our friends of the Conservative party have spoken against those programs under the pretense of autonomy, which is well known to its author, and since the principle of this bill does not seem to respect provincial autonomy, as understood by the Quebec members who sit on the government side, I ask that the vote be taken on this section.

(Text):

Clause agreed to: Yeas 48; nays, nil.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ten thirty.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said 10.30, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: On clause 3?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; clause 2.

The Chairman: Clause 2 carried.

Mr. Argue: It was carried by vote.

The Chairman: We are on clause 3 and I am asked to call it 10.30.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is for tomorrow and for the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will start with No. 5 on today's order paper which is Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code. If that business is completed we will continue with Bill No. C-77, having to do with agricultural development. Then there are three other legislative items which are available if time permits. They are No. 6 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-97 to amend the Combines Investigation Act, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice concerning the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act and the resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to the Export Credits Insurance Act.

For Wednesday, I am assuming we complete the debate on the amendments to the Criminal Code; if we are close to finishing that on Tuesday night but have not completed it we might consider it advisable to do that on Wednesday. After that is finished we would begin with the estimates of the Department of Justice on Wednesday and then, by consultation and arrangement, the house might go on with the estimates of the Department of Health and Welfare on Thursday and revert on Friday and Saturday to the estimates of the Secretary of State and of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

It being three minutes after 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 23, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

STANDING ORDERS

Eleventh report of standing committee on standing orders—Miss Aitken.

TRADE

TEXTILES—STATEMENT ON LONDON MEETINGS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): As hon. members are aware, informal meetings were held in London last week among representatives of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States to consider various problems arising from international trade in textiles. Officials from the crown colony of Hong Kong were also present. It will be recalled that these meetings followed an announcement by President Kennedy of the United States that a conference of the principal textile importing and exporting countries would be called for the purpose of seeking an international understanding in this field which would provide a basis for expanding trade without undue disruption of established industries. The London discussions were the first of a series of consultations in preparation for a broader international conference.

I have now received a report from the Canadian representatives at these meetings, and can report to the house that encouraging progress was made. It was recognized that the problems which have arisen in the field of textiles could best be dealt with on the basis of a comprehensive international understanding. The countries represented at the London meetings pledged their co-operation in seeking such an international solution. Further consultations will now go forward in order to obtain the views of other principal textile importers and exporters and also to seek the co-operation of the GATT and the O.E.C.D.

Hon. members will appreciate that in a matter of this importance and complexity there exist many diverse interests and views. Accordingly, it was agreed that, consistent with maximum efforts for an early solution, great care should be taken to prepare the ground before convening a formal international conference. It is expected that after this round of consultations has been completed arrangements will be made for a ministerial meeting in the latter part of June.

I should like to assure the house that Canada will be represented at any such meetings, and that in line with our traditional position in these matters the Canadian government will give full and energetic support to this initiative. Our object is to reach an international understanding which will be fair to importing and exporting countries alike, and which will permit trade to expand without disruptive effects on our established industries.

A comprehensive international settlement will, of course, take time to accomplish. Meanwhile we shall continue to seek understandings on particular problems and with individual countries as we have in the case of Japan and Hong Kong. Needless to say, these international efforts are without prejudice to our rights under existing trade agreements to take measures where necessary to avoid injury to particular Canadian industries.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the house will have listened with interest to the statement which the Minister of Finance has just made, and I think also the house will have welcomed the statement in connection with the international conference to deal with this difficult, complex and varied question of textiles. It arises out of conditions which are not only national but international in scope and affect the United States, the United Kingdom and other countries all of which have a keen interest in the industry, and this makes the matter one of tremendous importance for Canada. Our country has a large number of textile industries, mostly in the central part of Canada but also in the other provinces, and everything that can be done to assist them will be welcomed on this side of the house.

I must say, however, that press comments on some of the statements that have been made by the Minister of Finance with respect to quotas and other matters have not been too favourable. That is why a conference of this nature is of the utmost importance. We on this side of the house will watch carefully and with keen interest what develops in this field from time to time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this group welcomes the interesting announcement made by the Minister of Finance. We are glad to know that Canada is co-operating in an effort to promote comprehensive understanding of this trade problem on an international basis. In our opinion consultation is the proper and logical course to follow. Our trade will benefit and therefore our people as well will benefit on the basis of an agreement reached as the result of international understanding on a most complicated and difficult problem.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—ACTION BY CABINET RESPECTING MINE CLOSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Would the minister, in his capacity as chairman of the coal committee, tell the house whether he has arranged a meeting with Mr. Fairley of Dosco to discuss keeping the coal mines open? If so, when will the meeting be held?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I cannot give any details, Mr. Speaker. All I know is that the cabinet is working on the problem and I hope that a statement will be made tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to report to the house on the workings of the committee as he has done to the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, according to its issue of Monday, May 22, 1961?

Mr. Comtois: I have not seen that report, and certainly it is not an official report so far as I am concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the newspaper report which I hold in my hand—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member would not be in order to read the report. The answer has been given that the minister has not seen it.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Based on what is contained in this report, to the effect that the minister indicated to the Chronicle-Herald that there was a committee which had two functions in mind and which was working on the problem of such interest to these coal miners, my supplementary question is this. What is the function of the committee, and what is the progress of the work?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is the same question that was asked yesterday regarding the operation of the so-called cabinet committee. As the hon. gentleman knows, information concerning the operations of committees within the cabinet has not customarily through the years been made available to the house. The hon. member is employing another method of seeking to obtain an answer to a question which one other hon. gentleman opposite yesterday endeavoured to have answered.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is not the same question as was posed yesterday. The question which was posed yesterday arose out of a newspaper article of Saturday. This one arose yesterday, and contains a report allegedly made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on the workings of the cabinet committee. If it was proper for the minister to give this information about the functions and work of the committee to the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, surely a question dealing with the matter is in order when raised in this house.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me we are traversing the same ground we covered yesterday. I take it that the Prime Minister has given the answer of the administration on inquiries about cabinet subcommittees, that it is not customary to give such information and it is not proposed to give the information. To my mind that does not raise a point of order. As I said yesterday, the administration are free to answer questions in whatever way appears to them to be appropriate. That does not raise a debate on whether or not an answer is satisfactory.

Mr. Chevrier: Then, Mr. Speaker, I have a straight question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: —which I should like to direct to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Did the minister or the government make an approach to Mr. Fairley of Dosco to discuss keeping open the mines?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Speaker.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

CLOSING OF FACILITIES ON HOLIDAYS DURING TOURIST SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Is the minister aware that the birthplace of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at St. Lin, Quebec, which is an historic monument, was closed yesterday? Does the minister not think an arrangement should be made to keep historic monuments open on holidays during the tourist season?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time the matter has been brought to my attention. I shall be happy to investigate the situation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—SPEECH BY MINISTER RESPECTING NUCLEAR ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Was the minister correctly reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of Saturday last—

An hon. Member: Not likely.

Mr. Hellyer: —to the effect that Canada will oppose moves to extend nuclear arms to NATO before the completion of the disarmament negotiations this summer?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take a look at the Winnipeg Free Press—

An hon. Member: No, don't.

Mr. Harkness: —to see whether or not the report is correct. I may say, however, I made a speech in Winnipeg to the Royal Canadian Air Force Association, and I shall be very pleased to send a copy to the hon. member so that he may see exactly what I said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What did the minister say?

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister say whether it is the intention of the Canadian government to oppose moves to extend nuclear arms to NATO in advance of the disarmament talks this summer?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking a broad question of policy. If the minister wishes to deal with it on orders of the day he is free to do so, but I point out that decisions of that kind are not normally given in answer to oral questions at this time.

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple question. The minister saw fit to make a statement in this regard in Winnipeg. I think the minister should give the house the benefit of the same policy decision.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have to express his dissatisfaction at the appropriate time.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of National Defence is prepared to reply to this question I think he should be allowed to do so.

Mr. Speaker: I have not prevented the minister from replying.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the speech I made in Winnipeg speaks for itself. I shall be very glad to let hon. members opposite study it, and I think they would benefit from doing so. I am not prepared to make comments on alleged reports in the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether I might put the same question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister say whether it is the policy of the Canadian government to oppose the giving of nuclear arms to NATO until the conclusion of the disarmament talks this summer?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, even though the hon. gentleman was a minister for only two months he must realize now that declarations of government policy are not made on the orders of the day.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I fail to see how any supplementary question could arise.

Mr. Hellyer: These statements were made in Winnipeg to the Free Press.

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister suspended expenditures on the CF-104 aircraft and the Honest John missile pending the outcome of this summer's disarmament negotiations?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a supplementary question. From the minister's reply can we take it that the government expects the talks this summer to fail?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I think I should point out that statements along this line carrying insinuations which have no foundation in fact are not proper when posed as supposed questions on the orders of the day.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister made a statement in Winnipeg, but he will not let the house in on the secret.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the minister's point of order is well taken but the supplementary question, of course, has to be asked before it can be dealt with.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Before doing so, however, may I say to him how pleased we are to see him looking so well on this his 56th birthday. Can the Minister of Finance say whether we may have tabled before the by-elections next Monday, the report of the Bladen commission which was set up for the purpose of examining into the conditions of the automobile industry?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his kind references to the personal significance this day has for me. As to the Bladen report, may I say that the hon. member finds great difficulty in detaching in his thinking any subject from the all absorbing interest he has in what happens next Monday in some constituencies.

Mr. Pickersgill: So does the government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are certain processes of government and other matters that must go on while by-elections are proceeding. I wish I could clarify some foggy issues in his mind, but I do not suppose I shall be able to do so. However, I wish I could try. One of them would be to dismiss from his mind this lurking suspicion he has that everything revolves around what happens next Monday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would you not agree, Mr. Speaker, that on the hon. gentleman's birthday he ought to be allowed to be characteristically and traditionally irrelevant?

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON VESSELS SOLD TO CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. There are current reports to the effect that seven vessels of the Canadian National Steamships line which were sold to Cuban interests are still idle and rotting away in Halifax. Can the minister give the house a report on the situation and say whether or not these ships were paid for and whether they are still strike bound?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member given notice of his question?

Mr. Badanai: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is a question that has been answered by my predecessor a number of times. The situation is always the same. The ships were sold. The payments have been made. Whatever happens to them is none of our concern.

Mr. Chevrier: It is none of your business, in your opinion. That is quite clear. Your predecessor felt that way also.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO RESTRICTIONS ON COMMONWEALTH SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport arising from the government's new policy with respect to shipping. Could the minister tell the house whether the east limit regarding the commonwealth shipping agreement will start at Les Escoumains or further east?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I asked a similar question yesterday during the debate on the bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act. Now, the acting speaker who was in the chair at that time did not allow the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) to answer my question on the grounds that it was not relevant to the discussion. Consequently, I do not see why the minister should be permitted to answer the question put to him this morning by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin), since the chairman of the committees stated yesterday that my question to the Minister of Transport was out of order.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we were discussing a bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act, and I feel that the chairman of the committees was perfectly right in stating that the question put by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) was out of order; but we are not considering any particular bill at this time, and I fail to see how the question asked by the hon. member for Charlevoix could be out of order.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would repeat his question. I am not sure that I understand exactly what the point of order is.

(Translation):

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, here is my question. I wish to ask the Minister of Transport whether he could indicate to the house whether the eastern limit to the restriction regarding the commonwealth shipping agreement will start at Les Escoumains or farther to the east.

May I add that I did not have occasion yesterday to put this question to the minister, and I feel I should have the privilege, on the orders of the day, to ask him this question in the interest of the house.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be allowed to intervene. In the first place I do not think there is any more urgency to this question today than there was yesterday. Yesterday when there was a discussion of the Canada Shipping Act I was prevented from asking a question which was along the same lines as this one, dealing with the limits of the coastal trade for this country. The ruling was that I was out of order. It seems to me that this is exactly the same kind of question; therefore the minister, particularly when he himself says the policy will not be announced until the regulations are enacted toward the end of the session, should not be in a position to give one hon. member information which has been refused to another hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: The question that arises today, of course, is whether the oral question is appropriate to be asked, in accordance with our practice, at this time. The question yesterday, I take it, was whether what was being asked by the hon. member for Laurier was relevant to the bill under discussion.

It seems to me that the inquiry is not one of urgency or of the type that should take the time of the house on the orders of the day and might better be put on the order paper, because it asks a question as to a continuing state of affairs, that is, a defined boundary—if I understand the question correctly—which will have some effect on the coastal shipping trade.

If I am in error about that and there is some immediate significance, perhaps the hon. member for Charlevoix will tell me.

(Translation):

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport had announced to the house that a restriction would be placed at Les Escoumains, and several hon. members have asked the minister whether the limit could be extended farther to the east.

I think it is in order to ask the minister, on the orders of the day, whether this policy could be corrected in the interest not only of the house but of all those who will be building boats or ships, and whether this will apply when the new formula for aid to shipping is announced by the government.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member answer this question to help me. Is the extension which he is suggesting an extension of the boundary as defined in the Canada Shipping Act which was before the house yesterday?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: If it is not, I think the question might be permitted.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman has asked a question about something that is purely hypothetical. The minister told us a day or two ago in the house that he was going to engage in discussions with commonwealth countries regarding some change to be made in the existing law with respect to coastal trade. These changes have not been made, and the minister has told us the discussions have not even taken place. Surely, a question about some hypothetical matter, which may arise some time in the future, should be ruled out of order, as has happened over and over again.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I should not like my hon. friend to leave the impression on the record that what was brought to the attention of the house the other day, as far as this new shipping policy was concerned, was strictly hypothetical. That was a firm declaration of policy of the government. The only thing remaining to be done, as I said in my statement, is the completion of the drafting of the regulations according to that policy outlined in my statement. I made it very clear that the government definitely intended to contact the other governments of the commonwealth to declare our definite intention to partially withdraw from the commonwealth shipping agreement along the lines of article 25. At that time I stated that Les Escoumains would be the most eastern limit of this restriction

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is now—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member resume his seat? The minister is discussing a point of order. If he goes beyond that I shall—

Mr. Chevrier: No, sir, he is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I understand it, he is indicating what the situation is with respect to the question asked, and indicating that—

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order, sir.

An hon. Member: Wait until Mr. Speaker sits down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. member cannot interpose another point of order on a point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is making a reply to a question which Your Honour ruled was—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the easiest way of—

Mr. Harkness: You are not running this house.

Mr. Chevrier: Neither are you.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the minister is getting very near to replying to the question, but I think—

Mr. Chevrier: He is replying.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already ruled that I felt the question should be proceeded with. I did so as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate presented another view. It seems to me that this question is not hypothetical, but is very similar to other questions which are asked in an attempt to press for the establishment of policy. I think the simple course to follow is to allow the minister to complete the answer to the question.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question put by the hon. member for Charlevoix, I wish to correct something I said in that statement made on Friday. Instead of Les Escoumains being the eastern-most limit of this restriction it will be a line from cap des Rosiers, to West Point on Anticosti island, from there to the north shore along the 63rd parallel longitude west.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Charlevoix stated that the question he posed had nothing to do with the discussion which took place yesterday. That hon. member was not in the house during that discussion and therefore could not know what the discussion was.

Mr. Balcer: That does not matter.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member could have read Hansard.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I say to you now that the question which the hon. member posed has everything to do with the bill which was under discussion yesterday; because the minister, in explanation of the bill, gave a definition first in respect of inland waters, and then in respect of home waters. In so far as the inland waters are concerned, he declared what the easterly limit was. Therefore there should not have been, I submit with respect, any urgency in putting that question. The hon. member for Charlevoix is now obtaining from the minister information which I was prevented from obtaining during the discussion of the bill, and that is why I suggest my point is well taken. It is unfair that one member of this house be refused information which another member can obtain during orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is free to ask a supplementary question if he feels the information is incomplete. I have ruled that it is relevant to ask the question at this particular time. I did so on the basis of the information which I had, and that is all I could go on. The question has now been answered, and should the hon. member feel there is further information which he was refused, he is entitled to ask a supplementary question.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGES IN TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance on his birthday whether the government has completed its discussions with the provincial governments with respect to the proposed federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements for the period beginning March 31, 1962, and when the government expects to be in a position to introduce legislation in this regard.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, following the last stage of the plenary conference there were two meetings of the continuing committee of officials. Those meetings were held at intervals; the second was quite lengthy, lasting the better part of a week here in Ottawa. A number of technical aspects of various problems were thoroughly reviewed, and there may be occasion for further exchanges.

As to the legislation, it has been the declared wish of the government throughout this period to introduce such legislation at the present session.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Does the minister expect to be in a position to introduce this legislation before presentation of the budget?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the two matters have any relation to each other. The order in which business is introduced in the house must be governed by proper consideration and arrangement of the business to facilitate its transaction by hon. members.

COMBINES

QUEBEC—STUDY OF PROCEEDINGS OF SALVAS INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether the combines investigation branch has any investigators studying the proceedings before the Salvas judicial inquiry in Quebec with a view to determining whether collusion could have taken place, which would give our own combines investigation branch cause for action?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no, so far as I know. This is a political inquiry, and we certainly should not like to take any official cognizance until at least such time as an official report is made. We do not wish to mix in politics in the province of Quebec.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C. MORTGAGES—INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSAL AT DISCOUNT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What assurance can the minister give this house that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation held mortgages will not be unloaded at a discount comparable to the financial featherbedding given to lending institutions in respect of the conversion loans?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member's question should be allowed because of the interposition of an argumentative statement in respect of featherbedding in other circumstances.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a very untrue statement as well.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question regarding the sale of the mortgages, that will be in order. If the hon. member is seeking information in respect of the subject he is entitled to do so.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to follow the precedent established by the Prime Minister this morning.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works regarding the same subject. Can the minister tell us whether there will be any reserve bid in respect to the $15 million worth of mortgages to be offered in the next few days?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have outlined to this house the regulations in this regard, and suggest that they speak for themselves.

TRADE

CHINA—CONVEYANCE OF GRAIN IN CANADIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. On May 8, 1961 I directed the following question to the minister, as reported at page 4503 of Hansard for that day:

> Arising out of the wheat deal with red China, can the minister indicate to the house whether any of the 276 million bushels of wheat and barley will be carried to China in Canadian ships?

The minister's parliamentary secretary took the question as notice. I wonder whether the minister is now in a position to answer that question.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): The cost of ocean freight is borne by the buyer and thereby the option of securing ships is left to the buyer. We have no information here as to the ships involved and their country of origin.

Mr. Badanai: A supplementary question. Can the minister say whether any of those shipments will be made from the lakeheads?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I mentioned in the house, I believe on May 2, that approximately 300,000 tons will be coming out of the eastern ports. Subject to correction, I believe that the bulk of this will be coming directly from the lakehead.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clement O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the request received from the lobster fishermen of district No. 5 in Nova Scotia for an extension of their fishing season to June 30 to partly compensate for the inconveniences, delays and losses incurred during April, will the minister indicate whether his department is giving consideration to meeting this request?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, my department and I are very much aware of the frustrating conditions that the lobster fishermen in the maritime provinces are operating under at the present time, since they are still being hampered by ice. However, no decision has yet been taken with regard to any possibility of extending the season in district 5, as there are a number of factors to be considered as time goes on; but the whole situation is under very careful scrutiny.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FISHERIES—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I may also put a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the government under contemplation any legislation for the fisheries comparable with the act for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): If the hon. member carefully reads the bill I think he will find that there are sections in it which apply to individuals who are employed part time in the fisheries.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister a supplementary question for clarification. There is no legislation under contemplation that would be applied specifically to the fisheries?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Not during this session at least, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLENISHMENT OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the government announce before Monday next how and when it proposes to replenish the unemployment insurance fund?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I do not know why the hon. member wants this announcement before Monday next. Government policy is announced when it is ready.

[Mr. O'Leary.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that in the four areas where by-elections are to take place there are many thousands unemployed, does the minister not think—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member does not appear to me to be asking a question. It seems to me he was making a speech about what the government should do before Monday next.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I put my question?

Mr. Starr: Four Liberals will be unemployed after Monday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of those by-elections, does the minister not think that the people in those areas are entitled to know what is the government policy in regard to this fund, which has reached such a parlous state?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is the Liberal party that has reached the perilous state.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister does not wish to answer?

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder).

He said: Mr. Speaker, only on rare occasions is this house required to consider and amend or change laws or institutions that form part of the very foundation of our society. Such a task is to be undertaken today in the form of consideration of the advisability of amending the criminal law affecting the most heinous of crimes, murder. The bill now presented to the house represents the most progressive and far-reaching move in this field in Canada since we did away with public hanging. It may be remembered as a matter of interest that the last known case of such a hanging was the execution of the assassin of a former member of this house.

Before presenting an outline of the bill being introduced by the government, it may be helpful if I review briefly some of the history of the developments in the law on capital punishment in England, the United States and Canada, and give a general outline of the position taken by this government in its approach to the current problem in this country.

In the matter of capital punishment the criminal law of England, which of course we inherited, has come a long way from its one-time harshness. It has been mentioned many times that 72,000 persons were executed for crime during the 38 years of the reign of Henry VIII. Tresham Lever, in his book, "The Life and Times of Sir Robert Peel", says that when Peel became home secretary there were more than 200 offences legally punishable with death.

> A pickpocket, apprehended in the act, could, under the criminal law of England, suffer death for his crime; ... to cut down a tree, steal a fish ... exposed one to the same punishment. Needless to say, the extreme penalty was seldom, if ever, exacted in cases of this sort, and the law was brought into contempt by juries refusing to convict on the plainest evidence of guilt.

The efforts of reformers such as Sir Samuel Romilly and Sir James Mackintosh to mitigate this formal severity were not very successful. Romilly did succeed in bringing about the repeal of two statutes of Elizabeth, one making it a capital offence to pick a person's pocket and the other making it a capital offence for a soldier or sailor to beg without a permit from his commanding officer or a local magistrate.

Professor Reckless in his book "Criminal Behaviour" points out that by 1839 a thousand bankers had softened enough to sign a petition presented to the House of Commons asking that the death penalty be eliminated as the punishment for forgery, but others have suggested that this was prompted less by any feeling of humanity than by the fact that juries were refusing to convict.

In 1866 a royal commission considered the abolition of capital punishment and recommended that there be two degrees of murder. This was not implemented by legislation, but in 1868 public executions were abolished by statute. It had been found that their effect was exactly the opposite of what was intended. Instead of being occasions of awful solemnity, they had become scenes of public debauchery.

Although bills were considered in the British House of Commons on matters relating to capital punishment in 1872, they were not passed. In 1931 a special committee was set up:

> To consider the question of capital punishment in cases tried by civil courts in times of peace, and to report whether another penalty and if so of what nature should be substituted for the sentence of death in such cases where the sentence of death is now prescribed by law.

This committee proposed legislation to abolish the death penalty during an experimental period and also that, pending legislative action, there should be commutation in all cases. This committee's report was not acted on. In 1948 a member of the British House of Commons, Mr. Silverman, introduced an abolitionist bill. Clause 1 of the bill sought to suspend the death penalty for a period of five years. The bill was passed by the House of Commons but was overwhelmingly defeated by the House of Lords. The House of Commons then proposed a substitute for clause 1 to restrict the death penalty to five enumerated kinds of murder, the sentence in other cases to be imprisonment for life. This also was voted down by the House of Lords.

During the debate on the Silverman bill all sentences of death were commuted. As a result, in the weeks between April 16 and June 10, 1948, according to the royal commission on capital punishment known as the Gowers commission, "14 capital sentences were commuted and it is understood that in some ten of these cases reprieve probably would not have been granted in ordinary circumstances", report, pages 326-7. At the conclusion of the debate, the law on capital punishment remained in the position in which it stood prior to the bill, and the moratorium on hanging was lifted.

In 1949 the royal commission on capital punishment headed by Sir Ernest Gowers was set up having as its terms of reference:

> —to consider and report whether liability under the criminal law in Great Britain to suffer capital punishment for murder should be limited or modified and, if so, to what extent and by what means, for how long and under what conditions persons who would otherwise have been liable to suffer capital punishment should be detained, and what changes in the existing law and the prison system would be required; and to inquire into and take account of the position in those countries whose experience and practice may throw light on these questions.

Its report was presented to parliament in the month of September of 1953, and it constitutes the most complete analysis of the question in modern times. The commission concluded that murder should not be redefined nor divided into degrees. It recommended against the proposal "that the judge should be empowered to substitute a lesser sentence for the sentence of death when a person is convicted of murder". The commissioners came to the conclusion, as reported in paragraph 551 of their report:

> ... that they would entrust to the jury, besides their primary and established functions of deciding whether an accused person charged with murder is guilty or innocent, the additional function of deciding, if he is guilty, whether a lesser punishment should be inflicted in lieu of the penalty of death.

In 1957 after further consideration the parliament of Great Britain passed an act entitled "The Homicide Act, 1957". This act adopted the approach of dividing murder into two classes, those which carry the death penalty and those for which the penalty is life imprisonment. The division, however, is based rather on the method or weapon by which the killing is accomplished, or in certain cases upon the person or class of person killed rather than on the nature and circumstances of the crime itself.

This has produced some arbitrary and rather unsatisfactory results. Thus, if a person kills another by shooting he is liable to the death penalty, whereas if he strangles or clubs him to death he may avoid that penalty although the latter crime may be more callous, brutal or premeditated than the former. We have sought to avoid this kind of result in making our division, as to the basis for which I shall have more to say later.

In the United States of America the application of the death penalty is, again according to the summary contained in the Gowers commission report, paragraphs 515 and 517, "limited by two methods, employed either separately or more often in combination. The first is the establishment of two or more degrees of murder; the second is a discretion to mitigate the sentence, usually conferred on the jury but vested in the court when the accused pleads guilty. Degrees of murder have not been established in approximately ten states...the definition of murder in the first degree is always derived from the definition in the Pennsylvania statute of 1794 which includes murders perpetrated by means of poison, or by lying in wait, or by any other kind of wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing and committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery or burglary. The second degree usually includes all other murders".

In Canada attempts to alter the death penalty for murder began at least as far back as 1914, when Mr. Robert Bickerdike introduced bills to abolish capital punishment in several sessions of the House of Commons beginning in that year. Although they were debated at length, none of them resulted in legislation. In 1924 Mr. William Irvine introduced a similar bill which also failed of passage. In 1937 a bill was introduced by Mr. Blair to provide that the sentence of death be executed in a lethal chamber rather than by hanging. This bill was referred to a special committee which reported unfavourably on the proposal. In 1947 and again in 1950 the Canadian institute of public opinion made two inquiries with almost identical results, 68 per cent in favour of retaining capital punishment against 23 per cent in favour of life imprisonment.

In 1950 and again in 1952 Mr. Ross Thatcher introduced a bill to abolish capital punishment. On the latter occasion he withdrew it on the undertaking from the then minister of justice that at the next session parliament would be asked to set up a committee to go into the matter fully.

The most authoritative recent exposition in Canada has been the report of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries which was set up pursuant to the undertaking referred to. This committee, which studied these matters for two years, in 1954 and 1955, recommended the retention of capital punishment, and in this respect the bill before the house meets the recommendation of the committee. The committee also recommended that there be no degrees of murder. In this respect the bill does not follow the recommendation of the joint committee.

The deep and continuing concern of hon. members with this subject is shown by the debates that took place both last year and this year on certain private members' bills. Although these debates took place on one bill only, a bill for the abolition of capital punishment for murder, the fact is that last year at least three bills were introduced all differing in their proposals. While these bills approached the subject from different directions, they did have in common an assumption of dissatisfaction with the present position and a desire to bring the law in this connection in closer conformity with present day concepts of crime and punishment.

I believe we owe much to the members who sponsored those bills, the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee), the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), quite apart from the question whether or not we agreed with their specific proposals. I believe the ensuing debate on this bill will be all the better for the thinking and formulation of ideas about this subject which those bills stimulated.

Although none of those bills was adopted, an analysis of the debates which took place, as well as discussions with those who did not participate, show quite clearly that the majority of members in the house favour retention of capital punishment. It became equally obvious, however, that even among those opposed to abolition there are serious misgivings as to the present law and practice governing the death penalty. It therefore seems proper and desirable to bring about some modification of that law and practice.

There is another thing which, in my submission, a review of these debates, as well as a study of all that has been said and written elsewhere, makes quite clear. It is that while the authorities are of some assistance and the debates have been of help, nevertheless this is an area where views are held with such depth of feeling that they are never going to be changed by mere weight of argument or statistics. Indeed, on the question of the deterrent effect especially, statistics cannot give a satisfactory answer; there are no statistics of murders not committed. But as in the case of all such problems, there has to be some finality, responsibility has to be taken and a decision has to be made, and this the government has done.

We have accordingly approached the question on broad grounds. We have first been mindful of the fact that the criminal law must endeavour to translate into an enforceable code the highest concepts of the moral and legal standards by which society desires to be governed, while at the same time, since it must command respect if it is to achieve this purpose, it must broadly reflect the actual state of public opinion.

Second, we have taken account of the fact that the country, as reflected by opinion in this house, favours retention of capital punishment. Third, we have also recognized that even among those who favour retention there is a general feeling that the law should be modified. Finally, we have taken account of the feelings against the rather artificial division of murder into degrees based on the means by which it is committed or the class of person who is killed.

Thus while we have avoided the rather arbitrary and rigid classifications found in the British homicide act, we have put more emphasis on the element of deliberation as the requisite for capital murder than has been the case generally in the United States. We have also provided for an automatic review by the court of appeal, and for an appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada. In short, we have applied our own thinking to the mass of authority and opinion available, and have produced a bill which represents our views of the kind of law by which Canadians would wish to be and should be governed. On this broad basis we take full responsibility for presenting this bill to the house.

Before coming to an outline of the bill itself I should say one other word about the decision to retain capital punishment. This decision does not rest on any one or narrow ground. With regard to the argument in favour of deterrent effect, the Gowers commission on capital punishment in the United Kingdom, which has been described as "the richest source of information, factual as well as impressionistic" on this subject, expressed the view "that there is some evidence, though no convincing statistical evidence, that the penalty of death is likely to have a stronger effect as a deterrent to normal human beings than any other form of punishment". That statement may be found in paragraph 68 of the report of that commission.

Whatever strength or validity be ascribed to this view—and there is surely much to be said for it—is available therefore in support of this bill which retains capital punishment for a planned and deliberate murder or a murder committed in the course of a crime which generally speaking involves wilfulness or premeditation taken in the broad sense of those words.

But the general base on which it rests in so far as concerns the retention of capital punishment for deliberate murder, is this: That society requires for its preservation and protection that certain laws be observed. The whole basis of society, in the sense of any ordered form of life, would dissolve and chaos would reign if we did not have laws embodying that code of conduct by which, collectively, we say we desire to live. And because we live in an imperfect world, these laws require sanctions. Now, there are laws or rules of conduct of greater or lesser importance; therefore there are and must be sanctions of greater or lesser degree. But whatever be the sanction it is not a matter of retribution or revenge: It is an integral and essential element necessary to ensure the moral as well as the material vigour of the system of laws of which it is a part. If there is no sanction, the law ceases to have any effect.

Society's concern for its basic rules is expressed in its commands and corresponding sanctions that together constitute our criminal law. The degree of society's concern with respect to individual rules is reflected in the method of expression adopted.

In this sense, therefore, the sanction for the law against murder may properly reflect the importance which society attaches to the maintenance of that law. In our view, Canadians properly attach so high a value to the sanctity of human life that the law which translates this feeling into effective form should provide the maximum sanction for its deliberate breach, and no other penalty would be considered adequate.

This, Mr. Speaker, is perhaps only another way of saying that this bill reflects the view that Canadians are not prepared to accept the abolition, as distinguished from the restriction, of the death penalty. But it also reflects the feeling that it is not appropriate that the death penalty should be applicable automatically to every case of murder.

In carrying out the delicate but important task of bringing the law into line with our convictions in this field, we have concentrated our attention on producing a system which represents a rational and logical application of those principles of law upon which I have touched. We have accordingly started on the basis that there are two broad types of killing. The first is where the death does not result from any act of deliberation on the part of the person causing it but can be said to be impulsive or non-deliberate, in the sense of being in no way within the prior contemplation of that person. It is our view that the death penalty ought not to be the consequence in these cases, and accordingly although the crime may be murder, it is classed as non-capital and a sentence of life imprisonment only is provided.

The other type of killing is the case where death is caused deliberately or as the result of a planned act of the person causing it. All these cases are classed as capital murder and for these cases, but for these cases only, the sentence of death will follow automatically on conviction.

This type of case should, in our view, include two categories. The first is the case where the death results as a deliberate and planned end in itself. A killing was intended; the death penalty is automatically invoked. The second is the category in which, although a killing itself may not have been consciously and initially planned, yet the course of action embarked upon or planned had within it such an element of criminality and violence, as well as of deliberation or stealth, that the killing must properly be regarded as deliberate by the person who did it or who counselled or procured the doing of the act which caused it. This type of killing then, is also made to fall within the category of capital murder.

A very important and forward move is embodied in and results from this approach, with respect to the position of the accomplice. One of the very difficult and almost insoluble dilemmas with which juries and indeed the courts themselves have been confronted under the present law is that where two or more persons embark upon a joint criminal venture in the course of which one of them kills, the other or others, even though having had no direct or indirect participation in the precise act which caused the death, yet in law are guilty of murder and if convicted are automatically sentenced to death.

In our view no person, unless he actually causes a death or counsels or procures the act which causes it, should be liable to forfeit his own life. Accordingly this bill is so framed that the accomplice who did not actually cause the death, or counsel or procure the very act which caused the death, may still be found guilty of murder, but only of non-capital murder.

The house will appreciate that these results are accomplished without any disturbance of the existing law or jurisprudence which define homicide and murder and which define liability in the case of the accomplice or the aider and abettor. The fact that it was homicide, that the homicide was culpable and that it was a culpable homicide constituting murder will all have to be established under the same provisions as are now applicable.

In other words, the killing will have to be shown to constitute murder. Only then, by this bill, the important and essential question is made to arise; is it capital murder or non-capital murder? By this bill the answer to that question is made to depend on the answer to another question; was the killing planned and deliberate or was it done in the course of committing another crime of a nature which the law holds to be such that it imports into the killing the element of deliberation? If the answer to that question is yes, then the murder is capital and the penalty is death; if the answer is no, the murder is non-capital and the penalty is life imprisonment.

It will also be appreciated that these questions are questions for the jury. But before the issue can arise at all the crown will have to decide whether it considers that the elements of capital murder are there; that is, whether the killing was planned and deliberate, and whether the crown can prove this. For the bill provides that if the accused is to be tried for capital murder he must be so charged in the indictment, and only if he is so charged can he be convicted of capital murder. If he is so charged, the jury may still decide that capital murder has not been proven and convict him of non-capital murder. They cannot convict of capital murder on a charge of non-capital murder.

So the onus is first on the crown to decide whether to charge capital or non-capital murder, and to prove the charge. On a charge of capital murder, then, it will be open to the jury to decide that the charge is proven and to convict accordingly, or to decide that it is non-capital murder and convict of that; or to decide, as they can now, that murder itself is not proved and in such case to convict of manslaughter or to acquit.

Juries, and indeed the whole administration of this branch of the criminal law will, I believe, be immeasurably assisted by this new approach. For whereas up to now juries have had to reach their verdict under the awful burden of knowledge that if they found the killing to be murder at all, then no matter what the extenuating circumstances might be the sentence of death was automatic; from now on they will know that the law itself takes formal account of the thousand and one different combinations of circumstances that may lead to or from the background of any such event which brings an accused before them on a charge of murder. It will only be if they his peers consider, after hearing all the evidence, that his crime of murder was planned and deliberate that they will convict him accordingly. If they do not so consider, or if they find that he did not commit the murder in the course of committing another crime which makes the killing in effect a planned and deliberate one, they may still convict him of murder if murder is proven, in the sure knowledge that he will not then be liable to the penalty which society itself feels should only be exacted for the most calculated and deliberate defiance of society's basic law.

Everyone who thinks about and discusses these matters is aware that juries have found it difficult almost to the point of impossibility to bring in a verdict of guilty where they know that, having regard to human feelings, human motives and human emotions, the death penalty would be unjust. In the result, the verdict is sometimes manslaughter although the facts are patently at variance with the verdict; or if a verdict of murder is brought in it is followed by such deep remorse or revulsion as to constitute a danger to the very jury system itself.

There are one or two other features of the bill which deserve special mention as matters of principle. The first is the automatic review by the court of appeal in the case where the death penalty has been imposed. This is another recognition of the desire of society to see an accused surrounded with every proper protection and to ensure that never can it be said that anyone met his death at the hands of the law for lack of funds. It is also a recognition of the fact that although to err is human, when a man is on trial for his life whatever precautions can be taken to avoid, or to correct, possible judicial or other error must be taken.

Next, we have provided as a new feature that wherever a verdict of guilty of capital murder has been rendered, the jury shall be asked if it has any recommendation to make. This is in recognition of the fact that there is an infinite variety of circumstances forming the background of motivation for human conduct, and many degrees of personal responsibility for and ability to control and answer for individual acts. It may well be, therefore, that although an accused was guilty of a deliberate killing, and did not come technically within one of the defences of provocation or insanity, the jury will still feel that the background of the case, or the circumstances of the accused's personality or mentality, were such that a recommendation should be made.

The provision will have another important result. At present judges and juries take differing views of the right of a jury to make any recommendation after verdict, the code being silent on the point. There have been some judges who have discouraged juries from making a recommendation, and jurymen have been known to say afterwards that if they had known they might make a recommendation they would certainly have done so. In the light of the seriousness that must inevitably attach to such a recommendation it seems to be essential that there should be a uniform practice regarding it, and we have provided one accordingly.

It is obvious from the form of question we have devised to be put to the jury at this stage, that there will be an important connection between the views of the jury in this regard and the system of executive review of cases where the death penalty has been imposed, upon which the exercise of mercy is based. The bill makes no change in that system, which we intend should be preserved.

I should like to emphasize only two things about that system, which I think have been misunderstood. The first is that it does not constitute any sort of review or reversal of the jury's verdict or the judge's sentence. The trial is over, and jury and judge have rendered their verdict and pronounced sentence as provided by law. But now that same law says to the cabinet, you now have the duty of examining all aspects of the case, including those that may not have been before the court, to see whether for any reason clemency should be shown, or whether the sentence in this case should be carried out.

The other feature is this. Although the making or withholding of a recommendation is and will continue to be of very real import, the discretion of the executive as to the advice it tenders to His Excellency is unfettered. It is not a question of determining again the guilt or innocence of the condemned man according to law; it is a system in which the law imposes upon the cabinet at the ultimate stage the duty of determining whether in this individual case the law should take its course. It is a solemn and an extremely difficult task, but it is a feature of our system which gives assurance of the preservation of an essential feature of any system of justice: that it shall be tempered with mercy.

We submit this bill, then, Mr. Speaker, in the belief that the protection of society demands that one who deliberately commits murder should be liable to the death penalty, and that this reflects the views and demands of Canadian society. It reflects also our belief that the law should not provide the death penalty for every murder, but only for those which have about them the element of deliberation; and we believe that this also reflects the proper judgment and demand of our society.

Finally, we present it in the conviction that in its merciful and progressive provision of an age limit below which no one shall be executed, and of an automatic review by an appeal tribunal to remove so far as possible the element of human or judicial error, together with its other progressive features, it represents a proper reconciliation between the necessity for the protection of the lives of decent and law-abiding citizens on the one hand, and the desire of a Christian and civilized society to see justice tempered with mercy and forbearance on the other. On this basis we submit it for the approval of the house.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members listened with great interest to the statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton).

Right at the beginning of his remarks, the minister reminded us that only on rare occasions is the house required to consider such a significant bill as it affects the very life of the citizen. It was, indeed, from that point of view that last Saturday I asked, or rather tried to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) whether hon. members opposite would take an entirely personal attitude in the discussion of this bill, discounting all political considerations as party members, as we were invited to do last year, when a similar bill was discussed.

As far as I am concerned, the remarks I shall make are of a strictly personal order and I trust that hon. members opposite will do the same, so that our fellow citizens will know our remarks and the vote we will cast as the expression of our own personal opinion.

Mr. Speaker, since 1957 there have been, I think, in Canada about ten executions following a death sentence pronounced by our courts, whereas in 39 other cases, where the indicted person had been condemned to death, the royal mercy was exercised to commute the sentence. Such a situation was obviously unusual. And last year, when I expressed my views on a bill which is somehow connected with the subject, I said that we had now in Canada a partial abolition of capital punishment because of a massive commutation of sentences, for I think that, after initiating such course in numerous cases, the cabinet can hardly refuse the commutation of his sentence to any individual in a case where a crime had been committed under similar circumstances. It is therefore high time for the government to adopt a definite position and assume its responsibilities by submitting a bill to regularize a situation which the government iself created.

Bill C-92 provides in the definition of murder various degrees of guilt and punishment. We shall have an opportunity of fully discussing the bill in committee. It may be that several members will, at that time, suggest significant amendments, because I must admit for my part that the terms of various sections of the bill do not seem quite clear to me, and, to my mind, some improvements might very well be suggested. However, as we are now on second reading, I shall at this time discuss the principle of the bill submitted by the government and the Minister of Justice.

But before doing so, I think it would be interesting to recall some recommendations contained in the report of the joint committee of the Senate and this house on capital punishment, which was submitted on June 27, 1956. And after having read some of those recommendations, we will see that the government took it upon itself to submit to us today various amendments which are the complete opposite of the committee's suggestions.

Section 95 on page 23 of the report deals with the recommendations of the committee.

One of those is the retention of capital punishment as mandatory penalty for murder.

Briefly here is what the committee had to say on that point. I am now quoting section 63 on page 16:

While the committee considered that capital punishment should be subjected to periodic review by parliament, it recommends that the death penalty should be retained as the mandatory punishment for the crime of murder.

We now come to the second recommendation. The definition of murder remains unchanged. Section 69, on page 17 of the report, reads as follows:

In practice, the committee considered that any redefinition of the crime of murder should conform closely to the present practice in commuting sentences of capital punishment. Having concluded that it is not practicable to achieve a satisfactory redefinition of murder, the committee also decided that differences between murders can only be recognized by granting commutation in suitable circumstances. Since differentiation in the crime of murder depends to a considerable extent upon the assessment of moral culpability of a crime, the committee is of the opinion that the ends of justice are best served by the continuation of the present practice of mitigating the rigour of the law in appropriate cases by the exercise of executive clemency.

Several witnesses suggested that consideration might be given to the creation of degrees of murder which would take into account the difference in moral culpability between different types of homicides. All witnesses representing law-enforcement authorities opposed the establishment of degrees of murder. The committee shares the conclusions of the United Kingdom royal commission on this question. The committee is of the opinion that the present distinction between murder and manslaughter is quite clear and straightforward. It considers that any attempt to break murder down into degrees may lead to the creation of technical and confusing distinctions without, at the same time, creating any precise delineation between murders of differing degrees of moral culpability.

I should also like to refer to another section of these recommendations; it deals with the abolition of hanging and its replacement by electrocution or, as an alternative, by the gas chamber.

I refer to section 91 of that report, on page 21. Here is what the committee had to say:

The committee considered that one of the principal objections to hanging was that so much depended upon the personal competence of the hangman, leaving a greater margin for error than in the case of execution by electrocution or the gas chamber. It may be that a hanging, conducted efficiently and with proper facilities, may be accomplished more quickly and with less anguish to the condemned person than the other two methods of execution. The committee noted that, for this reason, the United Kingdom royal commission concluded that hanging should be retained. The evidence of medical witnesses and others, however, indicated that hangings in Canada were not conducted with the same degree of precision as in the United Kingdom and that there was no way of knowing, in some cases, how death was caused and whether loss of consciousness had been instantaneous. Examples of bungled hangings were brought to the committee's attention. Moreover, the committee sensed from the evidence given by experienced officials and others, that hanging was regarded generally as being an obsolete, if not a barbaric, method of execution. The committee has concluded, after weighing these considerations, that hanging is not the most satisfactory method of execution which might be employed and, accordingly, recommends its abolition.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly think this committee which sat for two sessions—I think it was in 1955 and 1956—and considered the recommendations and views of various experts on the matter, I even think the executioner was heard, submitted a worth-while report, based on a very thorough study of the technical aspects.

I therefore wonder why the various aspects of this bill run counter to the report of that committee. I wonder why the government has not seen fit to follow much more closely the recommendations in that report.

However, the government has taken the initiative and responsibility of this bill and now asks us to approve new definitions of the crime of murder. Thus this bill attempts to draw a distinction on the basis of premeditation, which will make the crime capital murder, whereas in cases where premeditation cannot be established, it will be non-capital murder.

After listening a moment ago to the Minister of Justice, I believe that we are now putting a heavy burden on the shoulders of the provincial attorneys general by leaving them with the responsibility of determining what a charge they will be called upon to lay against an accused.

As the minister pointed out, an indictment of non-capital murder is laid against an individual, and during the hearing of the case it becomes obvious that a capital murder is involved, it will then be impossible to convict that accused of a capital murder.

The case would be different if a charge of capital murder were laid and the evidence pointed to circumstances indicating that there had been no premeditation. Then if my assumption is right a verdict of non capital murder would be rendered.

I am under the impression that we are imposing quite a responsibility on the jury. I think that all those who have some court experience will agree—and experience points in that direction—that juries feel repugnance against the death penalty and are loath to make a decision which could send a man to his death. That is why in many instances in recent years, juries have rendered verdicts inconsistent with the evidence, simply because they felt reluctant to making such a decision—and this is a human reaction for men with no court experience—and did not want to assume responsibility for a decision which would have involved loss of life for one of their fellow men.

I would have hoped that this bill instead of giving the jury more responsibility would have reduced it. Last year in our debate on that matter, I expressed the opinion that in cases where human life is at stake, we should refer to a bench of three judges instead of a jury.

I definitely think that even though the principle of the bill is justified, the implementation of that piece of legislation by juries across the land will not do justice to it and that as a rule verdicts of non-capital murder will be returned.

Now, this distinction between a capital and a non-capital murder, based on premeditation, is a legal concept.

We are here in a very restricted field. I believe that the minister would admit, if he were to review the 39 cases in which the government saw fit to exercise the royal mercy, that in most of those cases, it was capital murder, where there was evidence of premeditation.

This bill is based on a distinction which is actually a legal concept. I wonder whether in practice, this bill will answer the purpose that the government had in mind in drafting it. Therefore, I ask the minister whether in his opinion—I shall take his word for it—in most of those 39 cases where royal mercy was exercised, there was an element of premeditation and whether those cases met the definition of capital murder contained in Bill C-92?

I feel the government intended to reserve capital punishment for the most odious and serious murders and to see that a life sentence be given in the other cases. Besides, that was the opinion I expressed last year.

I wonder if the terms of this bill lead us directly to the enactment of the underlying principle of this bill?

Up to now, the differentiation of responsibility in murder cases was quite clear and unequivocal about murder, as defined under section 202, and manslaughter. After reading and re-reading the terms of this bill, I feel that if we adopt this measure in its context, as it is submitted today, the bill might become a picnic for learned and clever lawyers. I think that, should the bill be adopted in its present form and context, it would mean, for all practical purposes, almost complete abolition of capital punishment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me to deal very briefly with a question I asked about two weeks ago to the Minister of Justice, which was indirectly related to this bill.

The legislators' intention is and must be first of all to prevent crime, to make it more difficult to commit. The minister is aware that we asked him last year, and again this year, whether the government intended to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code in order to establish an exceedingly strict control over the possession and use of firearms.

It is that use of firearms which today leads us directly to discussing the definition of murder, and I recognize that I am very sorry that the government never thought it worth while to submit in the current session, a bill which would make the ownership of firearms extremely difficult.

Today, people who have very bad police records may go about armed in our streets, and the minister knows, while experience proves, that penalties provided in those cases are extremely slight. I would hope that the government will soon submit legislation with regard to the possession of firearms, and I even expected that such a bill would have preceded the legislation we are now discussing, which deals with an amendment to clause 202 of the Criminal Code.

Incidentally, I want to congratulate the authorities of the province of Quebec, who, in nine cases out of ten this year, refused to renew firearms permits. I sincerely hope that the attorneys general of the other provinces will do the same and that, during the next session of parliament, some stricter legislation with regard to owning firearms will be submitted to us by the federal Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker, earlier I read a recommendation by the joint committee with regard to the method of execution, and I do not quite understand why the government did not today choose to carry out that recommendation which declared hanging an obsolete and barbarous method of execution.

The minister himself reminded us at the beginning of his remarks, that such questions are not submitted to parliament every day. I think it would have been wise to accept that recommendation. I submit that before we pass to the discussion of the articles of the bill in the committee of the whole, I think there is still time for the government to revise its attitude in this respect. Indeed, if I do not deceive myself, I do not think the minister mentioned the mode of execution nor did he tell us why the government is not ready to carry out such a serious recommendation which is the result of intensive study by experts who gave their help to the members of the joint committee.

And now, Mr. Speaker, let me say just a few words with regard to the absence of any provisions in the case of women. I do not know whether it is out of natural weakness—indeed I do not exactly know how to explain that attitude—but I would like to see women exempt from capital punishment and provision in the statutes for life imprisonment in the case of any woman having committed capital murder.

Women have been very rarely executed in Canada. As a matter of fact, for the past ten years or so, there has been no such execution, as far as I know. Indeed, experience has shown that murders committed by women were accompanied by very special circumstances, and even if the committee placed women on equal footing with men, with regard to capital punishment, I wonder whether, in the case of women, an exemption would not be in harmony with the view of society today. At any event, I do not believe that a woman is ever executed, except in quite unforeseen circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, I should also like the minister to explain the meaning of life imprisonment. When an individual has been sentenced to life imprisonment, will the rehabilitation board—

Mr. Fulton: —the parole board—

Mr. Deschatelets: —will the parole board be empowered to review these cases? I should be grateful to the minister for saying a few words on this point later.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to make a few comments on clause 13 of this bill, but, before doing so, may I be permitted to read the clause in question:

> Where a jury finds an accused guilty of an offence punishable by death, the judge who presides at the trial shall, before discharging the jury, put to them the following question:
> You have found the accused guilty and the law requires that I now pronounce sentence of death against him (or "the law provides that he may be sentenced to death", as the case may be). Do you wish to make any recommendation as to whether or not he should be granted clemency. You are not required to make any recommendation, but if you do make a recommendation either in favour of clemency or against it, your recommendation will be included in the report that I am required to make of this case to the Minister of Justice and will be given due consideration.

I do not think that such a recommendation is practical. I said a moment ago that juries would naturally feel reluctant to convict a man of an offence punishable by death.

Well, when the jury has taken its responsibility and decided that it is, in its opinion, a capital murder, and when it has returned a verdict to that effect, I wonder why a judge should have to ask the jury whether or not it should recommend mercy towards the accused. I fail to see the use of such a recommendation and I think that it rather contradicts the definition of a capital murder.

One must be realistic in such matters. If the jury is given the clear evidence of a premeditated murder, in circumstances indicated in the bill now before us, why then ask that jury to recommend mercy?

Why not let another judicial body decide whether mercy could be exercised in such and such a case, depending upon the circumstances of the case?

I do hope that the minister will elaborate a little on this subject because I think that a responsibility is being placed upon the jury which it will not be able to refuse. A jury may return a verdict of guilty compelling the judge to pass death on the accused. This jury will not be ready to say: I am against recommending the accused to the mercy of the court. There is nothing logical nor practical in this situation; at least, I fail to see its practical meaning.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with such a bill, time only will tell whether it meets the intent of the government.

I should say that on the whole, this bill is legally justifiable, but in practice and I say that its enforcement will go far beyond the intent of the government.

The minister did not tell us whether the government had consulted the Canadian bar association before introducing this bill. In view of the importance it will have and the questions it should raise in the mind of every hon. member who will rise in this debate, I wonder whether it would not be wise, when the bill reaches a certain stage of the procedure, possibly after its consideration in committee, to put off its passing until another session in order to give the public time to reach a decision and to provide for bodies such as the Canadian Bar Association an opportunity to make their views known.

May I ask you to call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

(Text):

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has introduced today a most important bill. All bills, of course, are important, but this one is of particular importance because it concerns statutory provisions relating to the life or death or imprisonment for life of those charged with the most heinous, vicious crime of homicide.

Today, sir, in considering this legislation we are deciding whether the penalty for this crime shall be life imprisonment or death. I know we all appreciate very much the introduction to this bill by the minister, and the pains he took to give us an historical background of the penal laws of the United Kingdom, the United States of America and Canada as they related to the crime of homicide and the penalty for it. I think we owe a debt of gratitude to the minister for having given us this historical background and for following it up with an explanation of the basis upon which the government arrived at certain conclusions in introducing Bill No. C-92 which is now before us.

I, sir, cannot completely agree with all the conclusions that have been reached by the minister as he expressed them this morning. Nor can I agree to any extent with the opinions expressed by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. I noticed that both the Minister of Justice and the previous speaker made some reference to the findings and recommendations of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons which met for some two years. Any reference which I make to this joint committee will be to the record of information contained in the committee report and the transcript of evidence, some 1,665 pages, found in the two volumes I have on my desk at the moment.

May I say first of all, Mr. Speaker, that my own position is very well known. I have been interested in this question of capital punishment for some 25 years, and have reached certain conclusions. My decisions are not based on any emotionalism whatever. My decisions have been arrived at as a result of the fullest possible study I could make of everything on this subject in this country and throughout the world; a reading of the reports of royal commissions, parliamentary committees that have looked into the matter, and so on. Having concluded this study, I stand here this afternoon as I have on previous occasions, believing that the right thing to do is to abolish capital punishment. In saying that, sir, I do want to give credit to the Minister of Justice for having introduced Bill No. C-92, which is without doubt one of the first, and therefore one of the most progressive, approaches made toward this subject for many years.

In his interesting introduction to the bill this morning the minister, in my estimation, glossed over the information available throughout the world and the information available to the Senate and House of Commons joint committee as to whether capital punishment should be retained or abolished. I recognized what the Minister of Justice was doing, but I should like to carry on and perhaps exercise my right to oppose the conclusion to which he came.

This morning the minister told us we could not accept the position that capital punishment was not a deterrent because we had no way of knowing how many homicides had not been committed because there is capital punishment. This is an extraordinary approach, in my opinion. I believe what we have to go by is the record throughout the world, so far as it can be examined and understood, relating to whether or not capital punishment is a deterrent to homicide.

As a result of 25 years of study, but in particular as a result of the evidence that was submitted to the joint committee which met for a period of over two years, it is my definite opinion that capital punishment is not a deterrent to homicide. I would suggest to the hon. member a study of the evidence placed before that joint committee, which had the advantage of presentations and advice from experts around the world who are interested in this matter and to which was submitted evidence, which I maintain is conclusive, that a study of the states or the countries which have or which have not capital punishment does not give in any way whatsoever an indication, in the ratio of homicides, that the retention of capital punishment is a deterrent to homicide.

It is not my intention to go into detail. However, I would draw to the attention of hon. members of this house that there are some countries which retain capital punishment and which have a very high ratio of homicides per 100,000 of population, and that there are others which retain capital punishment and which have a very low ratio of homicides. From the figures given to us in that committee we find that in El Salvador the ratio of homicides is 44.3 per 100,000 population, while in the United Kingdom in the same year the ratio was 0.5.

We have those countries which abolished the death penalty, some of them almost 100 years ago. We find that some countries which abolished the death penalty have a high ratio of homicides, and we find that others which abolished the death penalty have a very low ratio of homicides. The one with the highest ratio we were given was Colombia with 15.9 homicides per 100,000 of population, as compared with the Netherlands with 0.4 and Norway with 0.5, a figure almost identical with that for the United Kingdom.

I could, of course mention other countries and their ratios. However, the point I want to make is this, and the evidence is there for any who wants to read it. Whether a country is abolitionist or non-abolitionist, whether you have the death penalty or do not have it, the record of the world is that this fact does not have a relation to the rate of homicide of any comparative nature so that it can be differentiated as between the two policies.

I think perhaps one of the greatest comparative studies that can be made of this matter as a deterrent to homicide is with respect to those states in the United States which previously had capital punishment and then went to the abolition of capital punishment. Some stayed in that position, but some went back to capital punishment. I submit that from a study of that situation where they had it, got rid of it and went back to it; or had it, abolished it and did not go back to it, the ratio of differentiation between having it and not having it shows that the death penalty is not a deterrent to homicide.

I have often received letters and in previous sessions have often heard members speak in this house to this effect, saying that we must retain capital punishment or the death sentence because it is a protection for the police forces. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, only one factual study in the world has ever been made on this matter. I spoke about it, I believe either at the last session or the one previous. I refer to the study made in the United States by one of the top penologists of the world, using all his upper graduates. They made an investigation of every city of over 10,000 in the United States over a period of years. What was the answer? The answer was—and it was sent to our joint committee—that they could not find any comparable differentiation whether or not capital punishment was the law of the state, or that it made any difference with regard to the number of policemen who were killed. The ratio was almost identical, going up or down.

If any evidence could be produced in any manner whatsoever which would show that capital punishment is a deterrent to homicide or is a protection of our police forces, that would be good and solid ground for the retention by Canada of the death penalty for homicide. However, I submit that the record in all aspects in the United States, in varying states, and throughout the world does not demonstrate the correctness of either of those two arguments.

If therefore my contention and my analysis are correct, then why should we retain in any way whatsoever the death penalty? It can only be from prejudice, revenge, or the Mosaic law which demands an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth and a life for a life. Certainly in Canada in this modern age, in a Christian country, any argument based on prejudice, revenge or the Mosaic law is not something which we should consider in deciding whether to retain or abolish the death penalty.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I have been interested in this subject for some 25 years. I venture to say that I have received more letters of commendation and condemnation than perhaps most other members. Those who oppose the abolition of the death penalty have one great argument, namely that because of the suffering of the relatives and friends of the victim, there should be suffering by the relatives and friends of the one who committed that homicide. You would be amazed, Mr. Speaker, if you knew how many letters I have received to that effect over this period of years.

Of course we all recognize the agonizing moments and the suffering of the relatives and friends of the victim of a homicide, and we sympathize with them. They are completely innocent; but they are made the victims because of the aberration, the impulse or the viciousness of somebody who committed murder. However, Mr. Speaker, they are innocent victims. I fail to understand why other innocent people, the relatives and friends of the one who committed the murder, should also suffer. I fail to understand why it is a reasonable answer that they too must suffer. Surely we have a more Christian, more idealistic, more scientific approach than that.

I have read Bill No. C-92, which is now before us, very carefully. I have noticed the emphasis placed by the minister on the differentiation between premeditated murder, which will carry the death penalty, and homicide committed as a result of emotion or impulse, which will be non-capital murder. The reason I mention this is because of the interest of the Prime Minister in this matter, as is shown by his presence here at this moment.

I admit that my interest is strictly academic, upon which I am going to speak only briefly. However, when I listened to the Minister of Justice speak about premeditated murder I could not help thinking, is it not also premeditated murder to sentence a man to death and carry out that sentence? I suppose the differentiation is that one is the murder of an individual and the other is death by order of society.

Of course I understand this differentiation, but basically is it justifiable? Is it justifiable to say that society can murder but an individual cannot? As I have said, it is just a question of academic interest, but I raise this matter also because the Prime Minister is here and has shown his interest in these matters by initiating the bill of rights. In the bill of rights there is the principle that no one in Canada shall suffer agonizing torture. I wonder whether hon. members realize the agonizing torture endured by a man who has been sentenced to death and who knows he is going to be executed. I have met and spoken to men in the death cell, and there certainly is agonizing torture on their part. They know their days are coming to an end. However, as I pointed out, these are questions of only academic concern, but I say they are of academic interest. That is all I am going to say about that aspect of the matter.

I do wish to now raise something which was not mentioned by the Minister of Justice or the previous speaker, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. I refer to the fact that death is irrevocable. Why do we in Canada and in this government take the position that we are absolutely infallible, that we cannot make mistakes? I know the record is that we do not know whether or not we have ever made a mistake, but that is because nobody has had an interest in finding out whether a man was innocent after he was dead. I was most interested about two weeks ago in watching the rebroadcast of a half hour television program that was made in the United Kingdom. In that program a former home secretary, the head of the judiciary in that country, and two members of parliament stated they were afraid they had to admit that innocent people may have been hung in the United Kingdom. Death is irrevocable.

We have noted a similar situation in the United States, where it has been proven that a mistake has been made, and it has not just been a suspicion of a mistake. How many hon. members have read the reports of the final court of appeal, the court of last resort, whereby it has been conclusively proven on at least one occasion and I think on two that a man sentenced to death for homicide and whose sentence had been commuted to life imprisonment was not guilty at all, and he was released.

Apart from the court of last resort I was interested in reading only two weeks ago a report emanating from the United States concerning a man who had been found guilty of murder. It was said that he was guilty and there was no question about it. He was sentenced to death. The death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment and he had been in prison for ten years. Then a man admitted that he had committed the murder and the man who was in prison was innocent. An investigation by the authorities conclusively proved that the man who confessed was not a nut. The investigation proved that he had committed the homicide for which another man had been found guilty and sentenced to death. This man had the death sentence commuted to life imprisonment, and after being in prison for ten years was released. But death is irrevocable. Are we, sir, infallible? I think this is a point which should be very seriously considered.

There is another point which I find of interest. I want to mention it because I must admit that I have not yet been able to make up my mind about it. There is a section in this act which the Minister of Justice very clearly explained, and I understand his explanation. The section deals with a jury which has convicted a person charged with capital murder, and provides that the judge must ask the jury whether they have anything to say; that is, whether they have any recommendation to make as far as mercy is concerned. I want it to be clearly understood that this is one aspect of this bill upon which at the moment I have not been able to make up my mind.

The crown lays the charge in the case of capital murder. The jury has to decide the case. The jury decides it. That is a terrible thing to have to do, but they must do it under our understanding of justice. The jury must decide whether the man or woman charged with capital murder is guilty, and capital murder carries the penalty of death. Then the judge must say to the jury, "Have you anything to say with regard to clemency, mercy or extenuating circumstances?" There we have a request of the jury which has already had to do something which a person does not like doing; that is, they have had to find a person guilty and see him sentenced to death. Then the jury is asked, "Shall the man die or shall he live?", because the judge says to them, "what you have to say will be conveyed to the Minister of Justice and through him to the Solicitor General", and then I presume to the cabinet which will decide whether or not there shall be exercised the Queen's prerogative of mercy.

I presume that because of the changes incorporated in this bill which we are now concidering, if for capital murder there were no recommendation for mercy it would be the majority thinking that the person should die. But if there is a recommendation from the jury with regard to that capital homicide, I should think, from experience of these past four years with this government, that there would be the commutation to life imprisonment through the exercise by the cabinet of the prerogative of mercy of the Queen.

Therefore basically I think the jury is actually being asked—they have found a person guilty of capital murder for which the sentence is death—to say what the penalty should be. I say, sir, that I find it rather difficult to reach a conclusion as to whether that should be done. On balance I think perhaps it should be done, because of what I have just said; that if there is not that statement by the jury then in all probability the death penalty will be carried out. This is something upon which I should very much like to hear comments from the minister and other hon. members of the house.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to deal with a subject which is upsetting to me. I have, of course, always wanted to see the death penalty abolished. However, if it is to be maintained, I should then ask what the method of execution is to be. This subject has been dealt with at some length by previous speakers and I should now like to make some further comments in this regard as well. Apparently the government, in its wisdom, has seen fit to retain the death penalty under certain circumstances. Should this house agree with that retention, surely in the interests of society it should be carried out in the most humane way possible. It is obvious from what has been said by the minister and previous speakers, as well as from the omission of any reference to the subject of the bill itself, that hanging is to be the method followed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member will permit me to interrupt him. I do not see in the bill, nor have I heard anything said during the introduction of this bill, with reference to the method of administering capital punishment. Perhaps the minister could indicate whether there is any reference included in the bill in this regard.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I felt I was entitled to speak on this subject in view of the slight reference made to it by the minister in his introduction, and because 15 minutes was devoted to the subject by the previous speaker, during which time there was no objection made by Your Honour or any other member of this house.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I have been allowed latitude in this regard, and I feel that the hon. member for Vancouver East should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may continue in this regard with the permission of the house, but it seems to me that the question of the abolition of capital punishment in certain types of murder is quite a different subject than the method of carrying out such a sentence. I am unable to find any reference in the bill itself to this subject, and I feel that by allowing the hon. member to continue I would be allowing two debates in one.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to answer the inquiry which Your Honour has directed to me. I should say there is no portion of this bill that mentions the method of execution, nor anything in it which changes the present law in that regard.

Mr. Speaker: While it is true that the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont has been allowed latitude in this regard, that, of course, does not make it in order for another member to discuss a subject which is out of order, unless that hon. member has leave of the house to do so. I feel the debate would be greatly lengthened if it were extended to deal with other principles than those contained in the bill. Perhaps any hon. member who has objection to the hon. member for Vancouver East continuing along this line would so indicate.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should express my own view in this regard. I suggest it would be a mistake to permit the discussion to range into a debate on the method of execution because, as Your Honour has pointed out, that is not involved in this bill. I see no objection, if it is feasible so to limit the discussion, to hon. members expressing their regret or otherwise that the bill does not contain a change in the method of execution. I do not know whether the discussion can be limited in that way, but I feel it might be a little unreasonable to attempt to limit hon. members by not allowing them even to mention the fact that there is no change. I suggest, however, that their remarks should be confined to expressions of their own regret or otherwise which, it seems to me, would be in order. I do repeat, however, that I feel it would be a mistake to allow a full debate on the subject of the method of execution itself.

Mr. Speaker: The course suggested appears to me to be sound. The hon. member for Vancouver East has drawn attention to the omission from the bill regarding the method of execution, but to debate that issue, in my mind, would be proceeding with an unnecessary debate, and it is my duty to see that the hon. members of this house follow the question before them until a decision is made.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, as you know I will follow Your Honour's ruling at all times as closely as humanly possible. You will understand, however, in view of the fact that there were many quotations and references to the report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons in respect of capital punishment by the minister and by previous speakers, during which time no question was raised nor objection made, that I therefore felt I was entitled to refer to the subject in a similar way.

I must say I am disappointed that the Minister of Justice, after reading the evidence and recommendations contained in the report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, did not see fit to change the method of carrying out capital punishment. It has been my impression that hanging and electrocution are not the best methods of carrying out this punishment, because both methods disfigure and desecrate the body and are unnecessarily inhuman. On the other hand it is my understanding, having read the evidence of that committee, that the lethal chamber neither disfigures, desecrates nor is inhuman.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go further with this subject, because I always like to stay within your good graces in the event that I become badly out of order on occasion. I have been very interested in this subject for a quarter of a century, and I am sure my views are known by all hon. members of this house in view of the statements I have made on a number of occasions during the past eight years. I do not intend at this time to reiterate them, but would only say at this stage that it is my hope that what I have said will indicate my continuing opposition to capital punishment.

I feel that capital punishment is unchristian, inhuman and cannot be justified on any basis of statistics or law, and is strictly a method of revenge and retribution. I regret that Bill No. C-92 has not accepted the challenge of the modern trend of penology by abolishing capital punishment.

I should be less than fair if, for that reason, I did not say that I appreciate the extent to which the bill does recognize the problem and represents the government's analysis of the situation in an attempt to encompass the feeling of society in a manner which will be acceptable as a step forward. I suggest this is the first major step forward that has been taken in this country toward a stage of decency when the laws of society will be applied to protect society without the necessity of taking human life.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I unequivocably support the measures and principles contained in this bill. It may well be that under different circumstances I should have felt inclined to go along with the suggestions and views of the last speaker, and give my support to a bill advocating the complete abolishment of capital punishment. However, sir, it is my opinion that this is a subject in respect of which the government should not proceed any further or faster than public opinion will tolerate. There are certain subjects in respect of which the government should precede, by action, public opinion, and other subjects in respect of which the government might well be wise to lag behind. However, the issue here unfortunately involves too much emotionalism and too much controversy.

As an illustration, the hon. member for Vancouver East intimated that in his speech he would refrain from dealing with emotional aspects. While he struggled manfully to do so, he did not quite succeed. That, unfortunately, is the difficulty which is involved in a matter of this kind, controversial, weighty, going deep into the fundamental aspects of human nature. In dealing with it I think it not proper that a government should bring in a measure which is in advance of public opinion, and it is my firm belief that the distance to which this amendment brings us will be well in line with public thinking at this particular time.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, the first speaker for the official opposition. I was as completely in the dark at the conclusion of his speech as I was at the beginning as to what view he or his party took. Speaking in a parliamentary sense I would say he twisted, turned and wiggled, and nowhere did he indicate whether he or his party favoured this measure. This is a clear-cut issue set out in definite language, and I hope that before this debate is concluded we shall have the opportunity to hear other hon. members give some indication as to their views on it; whereas the hon. member drew so many red herrings across the path that I thought the minister might well send for his colleague the Minister of Fisheries.

I want to deal briefly with this matter from my own personal point of view because I know other hon. members want to speak on it. It has been my experience to appear as counsel in a good many of these cases. I suppose it is utterly impossible for any person completely to divorce his experience and the precedents of the past from his judgment of the present. Because of this I take the view that this bill will do a great deal of good because it will serve to eliminate the many variables which too often in the past I am afraid have caused miscarriages of justice. After all, in this question of murder, and punishment the prosecution of murder trials and the sentences which are imposed, it is not merely as is popularly supposed just a matter of guilty or not guilty.

Far more than that is involved. What are the facts surrounding the commission of the offence in respect of which the accused person is charged? Are there facts involving a degree of provocation which might justify a charge of murder being reduced to manslaughter? Are there elements of self-defence which might warrant a complete acquittal? If not a complete acquittal, was the measure of force used by the accused person far greater than that which should have been used, and consequently was it an offence of manslaughter? Could the offence be reduced from murder to manslaughter because of the intoxication of the accused which under certain circumstances, where he is unable to appreciate the nature and quality of the act, might well result in a direction by a judge to a jury so to reduce the charge? What about the variables in the defence of insanity?

All these things involve so many intangibles, so many variables, that I am afraid in many instances in the past cases have been tried and people have been executed under a set of circumstances where with a different judge, a different jury and different counsel that result would not have been consummated. I have seen this happen. I know well that when a brief is handed to counsel by an accused person these are the factors into which he makes diligent inquiries.

With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to support this measure because of the fact that it does serve to withdraw to a large extent into the category of non-capital cases many cases in which this element of chance is present; the present set-up should not be tolerated in our system of criminal jurisprudence, certainly not in that branch of it where the result may well be a conviction for murder with a sentence of death subsequently carried out. The choice by the accused person of those who act for him as counsel, the degree of experience of counsel, the type of judge who presides over the case, all are important, Mr. Speaker. Justice is not like a giant computing machine into which are fed all the facts and out of which will come precise and accurate answers. It may well be that as we move forward we may come to something more approximating perfection because we acquire a better knowledge of the judicial process and improve on them but it will be many generations before we may anticipate even coming close to that degree of perfection.

We regard this business of criminal jurisprudence so carefully that we have placed in the hands of accused people certain privileges, such as the fact that the accused is innocent until he is proven guilty and the crown must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. We have said to the crown that you may not produce a confession by which you seek to obtain a conviction of guilt unless you first see that the production of that confession has been hedged around with all the safeguards the law has worked out over the years.

These things are tremendously important, Mr. Speaker, and consequently when I see the distance this bill is going to advance the administration of criminal justice with regard to those offences in respect of which the sentence of death may be pronounced, I am glad to support it and I hope other hon. members will do so as well, because that is in fact the result of clause 1. It is not as my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont said, to make degrees of murder. It simply says that when you introduce into a charge of murder the elements of premeditation and planning, then you are charging the accused with a crime in respect of which he may be convicted of capital murder and in respect of which the punishment of death may be pronounced. This also is the effect of the second part of clause 1. All that the second part of clause 1 does—and I do not want to get into details here, of course—is simply to attach to the various acts referred to therein the irrebuttable presumption that there are present the same elements of premeditation and planning.

By clause 1, Mr. Speaker, we are then successful in withdrawing a great number of situations where there may be not that uniformity of justice which we must have if we are to be proud of the civilization of our country and of our jurisprudence. It has shocked me in the past to observe the distinction which is brought about. Any counsel who has appeared on a criminal charge of this nature, is aware of this fact, any man who has been on a jury will know beyond any doubt that on any jury there is likely to be one man of sufficient strength of character and sufficient certainty of opinion that he may well sway the jury to a decision which under other circumstances would not be reached. I believe this matter was dealt with by the hon. member for Parkdale when he spoke last year. He dealt with this I would judge out of his knowledge as one who has had experience himself and who is aware of the situation which may be brought about. In any event this view alone induces me to give the strongest support to this measure.

I am not going to take much more time. I know that others wish to speak, and we will have another opportunity to speak in the committee stage. Before I take my seat, however, I wish to refer to some of the other areas covered by the bill. I particularly appreciate the clauses which provide that there shall be an automatic appeal. Heretofore an appeal has only been possible in the event of an argument on a point of law. When an appeal is dealt with by the provincial appellate division, one judge must dissent before the case can be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada. A process is now being arranged whereby, irrespective of questions of law, there is an automatic appeal right from the trial court to the provincial appellate tribunal and thence to the Supreme Court of Canada. Consequently there will be three opportunities for trained and experienced members of the judiciary to examine into the facts in respect of which the charge is laid, to formulate an opinion and to give to the accused the benefit of their experience and knowledge.

The other point to which I wish to refer is clause 13, which has already been mentioned by the minister and the other two speakers. I also approve of this clause. It gives statutory recognition to what heretofore has only been a custom under which a jury, compelled by the law and by the facts involved to find the accused guilty, has yet felt that the circumstances justified it in making a recommendation for mercy. The very fact that the House of Commons and ultimately parliament, I hope, has recognized this principle will mean that it will be accepted in the minds of members of the cabinet that such a recommendation should be given some consideration.

I had the experience many years ago of defending a young boy who was 19 years old when he was tried. He had lived a sheltered and happy life with his mother. He had never been away from home. He lived on a farm, and whenever there was any of the usual slaughtering of animals to be done he so disliked the thought of blood being shed that he would absent himself from the farm on such occasions. On one occasion when he was 18 he left the farm and in a period of four days committed five grave breaches of the Criminal Code, including murder, under circumstances for which there could be no possible defence. The only defence I attempted to introduce was that of insanity. It was established that he had the mentality of a boy 10 or 11, but he could not be brought within the four corners of the narrow, legal definition of insanity which would have meant that there could have been a finding of not guilty.

He was found guilty, and I recall the sentence well. The case was heard in a frontier town in a theatre filled with people. When it was time for sentence to be passed the boy was sobbing. He was held up by policemen on either side as the judge pronounced the sentence of death. I remember speaking to him as he went away and assuring him that I would petition for commutation. The jury intimated to me afterward that they would have liked to bring in a recommendation for mercy. They felt they could not do other than find him guilty on the strength of the charge made by the learned trial judge, but they certainly believed that there were circumstances with respect to the boy's background and mental condition which indicated to them that his life should not be taken. But because that was not done the sentence was carried out, and it was one case where I felt that the death penalty never should have been carried out.

It is in circumstances of that kind that clause 13 may well come into effect. I hope what I have said will to some extent resolve the doubts of the hon. member for Vancouver East, and that the important and forward looking clauses of the bill will receive the commendation of the house.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, a year ago last February the hon. member for York-Scarborough introduced Bill No. C-6, an act to amend the Criminal Code to abolish capital punishment. This bill, unlike most private bills, received a great deal of publicity throughout the country, with the result that the debate was allowed to be resumed on a subsequent date.

Notwithstanding the arguments advanced by several speakers during that debate for the retention of the death penalty, the minister's excellent address today, which merits commendation for its clarity, and what has been said by those who have since taken part in this debate, my view on the question has not changed. This divergence of opinion is the very essence of our democracy. I respect those whose views differ from mine on this matter as well as on other subjects, regardless of party politics.

I was one of those who participated in the debate last year and expressed myself in favour of abolition except in cases of treason in time of war. The widespread interest shown by the people has no doubt influenced the government to bring in the amendments to the Criminal Code now before us. This bill, of course, is not the one we discussed last year but a modification of the present code in recognition of the need for a change to a more realistic concept in dealing with people charged with murder.

Those who still favour the retention of the death penalty for crimes involving murder believe that death is the only effective deterrent against murder. I wish to read an extract from the report of the royal commission on capital punishment which was established in Great Britain in 1949 and, incidentally, was referred to by the minister in his opening remarks. The extract reads as follows:

> Capital punishment has obviously failed as a deterrent when a murder is committed. We can number its failures. But we cannot number its successes. No one can ever know how many people have refrained from murder because of the fear of being hanged. For that we have to rely on indirect and inconclusive evidence. We have been told that the first thing a murderer says when he is arrested is often, "Shall I be hanged", or "I did it and I am ready to swing for it", or something of that kind. What is the inference to be drawn from this? Clearly not that the death penalty is an effective deterrent, for he has not been deterred; nor that he consciously considered the risk of the death penalty and accepted it; still less that the death penalty was not so effective a deterrent as some other punishment might have been. The true inference seems to us to be that there is a strong association between murder and the death penalty in the popular imagination.

Mr. Speaker, this illuminating conclusion was arrived at after not days, not months but years of dispassionate study by the foremost criminologists and legal minds of England. I agree with the minister when he said this is an area of sentiment and passion in which people rely not on statistics but rather on reaction when confronted with arguments for or against what shall be just retribution. While I respect the views of those who hold the opinion that the death sentence is a restraining force against murder, the experience of many nations, and of some states to the south, is such that it does not bear out this contention.

For example, Luxembourg has had no death penalty since 1822; Belgium since 1863; Portugal since 1867; The Netherlands since 1870; Italy since 1890. The death penalty was restored in the latter country during the fascist regime, but it was again abolished in 1948. Norway has had no death penalty since 1905; Sweden since 1921; Denmark since 1930; Switzerland since 1942. There are a dozen states south of the border that have no death penalty, and this is not a complete list by any means.

I should like now to quote from the report of a British select committee appointed by the government of that country to study and report on the subject. This study was made in 1930, and I should like to quote from the report:

> Our prolonged examination of the situation in foreign countries has increasingly confirmed us in the assurance that capital punishment may be abolished in this country without endangering life or property or impairing the security of society.

The Ottawa Citizen, in an editorial dealing with these proposed amendments, had this to say:

> The most that can be said of the federal government's move to restrict use of the death penalty in murder cases is that it is a step in the right direction. Because the government is not prepared to recommend outright abolition of the death penalty the proposed Criminal Code amendments raise the prospect that a strain will be placed on certain links in the system of justice.
> The government bill introduced in the House of Commons by justice minister Fulton divides murder cases into "capital" and "non-capital" categories. The death penalty would be imposed in cases of calculated murder committed during a crime of violence. The measure provides a mandatory life imprisonment sentence for those convicted of non-capital murders. To be convicted of capital murder the suspect must be specifically charged with that offence.

Britain, sir, provides statistics of the trends of crimes in that country. While larceny, housebreaking and similar crimes have been on the increase, Britain's murder rate has remained almost stationary for the past 50 years, notwithstanding the increase in population. One third of all murder suspects commit suicide before they are brought to trial. The great majority of those convicted of murder are between 15 and 34 years of age. These are among the facts brought out in the past month during an analysis of murder which is being used by both sides in the British controversy over capital punishment.

Other interesting findings were that the overwhelming majority of murder victims are either related to or well known by their murderers, and the largest group of killings takes place within the family with murders of wives by husbands and children by fathers leading all others. Few murders are coldly plotted and premeditated. Of those charged with murder, 36 per cent are sufficiently abnormal mentally to plead either insanity or diminished responsibility. Sexual crimes, played up as one of the 10 most predominant causes of murder, accounted for only two dozen murders out of the 471 committed in Britain during the last three years.

The study to which I have referred concludes with this statement, and I quote:

> A woman or child is less likely to be killed by a stranger following a sexual assault or even where there is no sexual offence than at the hands of a blood or other close relative.

This conclusion should clearly indicate that the general ideas held by people on murder need to be brought up to date. Indeed, in all fairness, the government should have appointed a committee of competent criminologists to make a parallel study of murders and crimes in Canada before introducing this legislation. It is true that a parliamentary committee composed of the Senate and commons, did sit through three sessions of parliament. However from all accounts, the report of their findings did not include an analysis similar to the one which was made in Britain.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton)—I give him full credit—is to be complimented for the very comprehensive presentation he made in the introduction of this bill. However, I do not share his conclusions entirely, although he did advance one step toward eventual abolition. I have said that the study of crime and murder in Britain revealed that comparatively few murders are coldly plotted. I would assume the same situation would apply to murders committed in Canada. In effect, this legislation with which we are now dealing would indicate that a premeditated murder would automatically mean the imposition of the death sentence on the murderer, assuming that he was sober when he committed the killing. If it could be proven that he was drunk when he committed the murder, then he would not be sentenced to the gallows but to life imprisonment.

The danger as I see it is this: A potential murderer, knowing the consequences of murder committed while sober, would probably decide to get drunk, commit the murder and get off with a prison sentence. This appears to show up a loophole for some murderers to escape the death sentence. One aspect of this legislation which needs clarification is the case of a convicted murderer sentenced to life imprisonment. Will this really mean imprisonment for life or will he be eligible for parole after a number of years? According to the bill, the fate of this person would be decided by the cabinet. The parole board will lose its job and the Minister of Justice will set himself up as the arbiter in deciding how many years will be chopped off the life sentence.

This is one of the worst features of this legislation. The fact that anyone could be kept in prison, at the pleasure—if you please—of any government, would too greatly resemble the power of a dictatorship. Those of us who believe in abolition would substitute life imprisonment for murder without the benefit of parole at any time. In other words, the real deterrent would constitute confinement behind bars until natural death released the prisoner.

The danger of executing an innocent person is also an important factor which should be evaluated because here we are dealing with a risk of no mean proportions.

Let us consider the case of a man by the name of Evans who was hanged in London for the murder of his wife and child in 1949. Five years later a fellow by the name of Christie living in an apartment in the same house was arrested and convicted of having murdered several women, including Mrs. Evans for whose murder her husband was hanged five years previously. This case was the subject of an analysis by judges and members of the bar who appeared in a C.B.C. television program known as "Background" on Sunday, April 23. It is the case which was referred to by my friend the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch).

The present bill is clearly compromise legislation which may satisfy some people. It is quite obvious that the voice of those on the side of abolition has not been loud enough to convince the government to go all the way by bringing about the end of the death penalty in one stroke. However, the time will come when Canada will join those enlightened nations whose penal code no longer contains provision for the killing of the guilty by hanging them by the neck until they are dead. We can easily anticipate that the passing of this bill will not end the discussion on the subject.

The Globe and Mail of May 17, devoted a lengthy editorial to the subject concluding with these words:

> The new amendments will reduce the number of cases in which the government is required to exact the extreme penalty or to interfere with the law; but they do not answer the moral question: Should society kill any man, whatever his crime? This is a question which can only be answered with the vote of a house that has been liberated from party discipline to follow the dictates of conscience.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that the debate on capital punishment last year revealed the tremendous interest which the whole country shared on the subject. It was a practical demonstration of the people's feeling on the matter which was divided for the most part and for this reason, if not for others which could be cited as valid, it seems to me that there should be a free vote on this matter. I urge the government—and I am looking straight at the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) at this moment—to allow a free vote of the members on this measure. A sincere expression of opinion in the House of Commons can be produced only by allowing members to vote individually as their consciences may dictate regardless of party affiliations. A free vote of parliament will indicate the degree of public feeling for or against capital punishment as no other sampling of public opinion could possibly achieve.

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak very briefly on this bill. In so doing I wish first of all to congratulate the minister not only on the introduction of the legislation itself but on the very comprehensive and able analysis he presented to the house earlier today. I have one or two observations to make. Having spoken in the debate a year ago may I say at the outset that I am happy to support the bill. I have one or two reservations, and I would hope the minister will make some explanation in summary.

Perhaps I might open my remarks by first of all replying, to the extent one can do that, to the suggestion that this bill in any way represents a compromise, as it has been described. It is perhaps true that there has been an attempt to reconcile certain views hitherto expressed on various aspects of capital punishment, but certainly there is no compromise in the principle in this legislation before us.

We might recall that a year ago in the debate at no time did any member suggest that we should take a life through capital punishment in return for a life which had been taken by a murder. It is not suggested that this should be done as a matter of revenge or retribution, but only if it represented in any form a deterrent in order to prevent some person at some later date from committing a similar crime. I think that those of us who argued the necessity of the retention of capital punishment did so on the simple ground that it did to some degree represent a deterrent. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, as did the minister, that any serious study of this factor—whether it be the United States review or the joint committee of the house and Senate—has exhibited very clearly in their conclusions that capital punishment is a deterrent. To what degree, of course, this house and in fact the public of Canada may never know.

It is not my intention to go over all the past events on this or any other bill dealing with capital punishment. I think obviously the principle point that we must establish in our mind is first of all whether a deterrent is exacted by employing the maximum penalty; then how best can we employ it so that, first of all, we do not take a life when there is any question as to the motivation or premeditation in the murder committed. In other words we must judge it in the circumstances surrounding it. We must also be absolutely certain that we provide every safeguard so that we do not take the life of an innocent person.

The bill deals with these two factors very adequately in my opinion. It provides three very excellent safeguards, namely prohibition of the guilty plea, the requirement that a trial judge asks if mercy is recommended and of course, the right of automatic appeal. This provision therefore is adequately taken care of in this bill.

But what about the other facet, namely that of determining whether or not a murder was premeditated or whether or not it was something that developed out of a crime of passion as it is legally described. Here again the minister and his officials have defined the bill in its two categories of capital and non-capital. The application is therefore fairly simple. Hence I suggest that it satisfies to this extent the rather extreme views that have been offered in the house, on the one hand arguing that it is improper and wrong to take the life of someone who conceivably out of anger or perhaps because of insanity took the life of a human being, and yet it provides for society protection from a person who, in his full knowledge and in the possession of all his senses goes out and with premeditation takes the life of a fellow human being. So for this reason I say this is a good bill.

But what of the reservations I have suggested? First of all, I would ask the minister in his summary to tell us whether he considers this aspect in his categorizing of murder. Is it to be suggested that perhaps we are encouraging those who might enter upon or become involved in an armed robbery, with the use of weapons and thus encouraging them to carry out the final act of committing a murder? I realize that this is a difficult question and that an accurate assessment of the matter cannot be made. Is this likely to lead, as has been suggested today, to the possibility of people committing murder because of the knowledge that, in the final analysis they will not, of course, lose their lives if convicted of a capital punishment offence?

The second question I put to the minister is this. Having regard to the safeguard that the jury has a right to recommend mercy—in fact, it is now a mandatory provision—is this likely to put us in a position where all juries are going to be obliged for the most part in effect to recommend mercy and that we are therefore limiting the usefulness of capital punishment as a deterrent?

The third question I put to the minister deals with the whole problem of life imprisonment and its relationship to parole. I would ask the minister to state in his summary his own view regarding whether the terms under which life imprisonment can now be exacted adequately deal with those people who are involved in sex slayings. I would also ask the minister whether or not we have created a situation in which the individual, whether he is convicted of a capital or a non-capital offence, is provided every opportunity to go out and again commit a similar crime. I think it is perhaps important that we look at the history of these people and our experience in this regard.

I do not intend to repeat it in any detail, but my one concern is this. It may be argued that in some instances it would be perfectly safe to release a non-capital murderer fairly shortly after conviction, provided he has no chronic mental instability or impairment. On the other hand there will be others whose mental imbalance is insufficient to constitute what has been described as legal insanity, which fact may not be brought out in the trial or in the proceedings on appeal. These people may or may not respond to treatment.

I would ask the minister whether he considers that in the final analysis the cabinet should make the ultimate decision as to whether these people, if convicted of a capital offence, should be released. I think it is important to make a very careful assessment of the methods by which we impose or enforce life imprisonment so that we do not send out into society those people who are able and in fact are almost encouraged to commit murder for a second time.

Mr. Speaker, I have covered all the points I intended to introduce. As I said at the outset, I support the principle of the bill. I think it satisfies the essential needs. Capital punishment does represent a deterrent and it is still there to remind any individual, who with willful knowledge intends to commit a murder, that if he pulls that trigger or pushes that knife into someone's stomach he may in turn lose his own life. It therefore remains as a deterrent to any person who is likely to commit such a crime in the future.

May I close, Mr. Speaker, by once again congratulating the minister for what I consider to be a very important and very useful piece of legislation.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, last year, when we considered a bill providing for the abolition of capital punishment, I declared myself very categorically in favour of the maintenance and, in some cases, of the increase of the reasons for hangings or executions.

I am not surprised that, from time to time throughout history, bills based on sentimentality are being introduced, in order to reduce the punishment meted out to those who have committed a crime against society.

Who are those who are against capital punishment? First of all, you have good, honest and serious people who want to abolish capital punishment to obey their conscience, their sentimentality or because they believe it is in the interest of society. Those people are as well intentioned as those who were preaching prohibition in 1917, who believed that it was the way to abolish alcoholism in the world; the result was exactly the contrary of what they were seeking.

Today, people who are just as well-meaning as the people in those days want to eliminate capital punishment, on the grounds that it is not humane and that civilization is going forward at such a pace that we must have great compassion for the person who is to be tried, found guilty and probably executed.

On the other hand, there are people in the underworld who are fully in favour of abolishing capital punishment, because they fear it; they are afraid of the future, and it would be a good thing for them if capital punishment were abolished.

There is also the communist world, that wants capital punishment to be abolished in all its forms, even in cases of treason; because they feel the need to protect themselves in the event of a war between the communist world and the democratic world.

The idea of abolishing capital punishment is nothing new. As far back as the fifteenth and sixteenth century, there were people who favoured it. In France, there was Voltaire and Jean Jacques Rousseau. In Italy, there was Vico and Beccaria, and in Germany, there was Savigny, Karl Marx and Kelsen. In Great Britain, Hume and Benthan called for the suppression of this penalty, while in the United States, Franklin and Paine did the same.

All were great men, great philosophers who had studied the matter and felt compelled to promote a new idea in the world, for a developing society.

The idea was practically abandoned for many years, but in recent times it has been gaining ground in various circles. Some countries have accepted the abolition of capital punishment, while others have opposed it. In Canada, it has not yet been done, and I hope this country will not go so far as to accept this idea.

I realize that the piece of legislation now before us is not a bill for the abolition of capital punishment. However, we know it is one more step which will inevitably lead to a reality if we go on indulging in this false sentimentality.

What are the arguments of the very people who call for the abolition or reduction of capital punishment? For some of them, it is a matter of conscience, along the same lines as faith in God and acceptance of that part of the Bible which says:

Thou shalt not kill.

They do not want us to feel any resentment against those who may hit us, because Christ said:

But whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.

All those principles of tolerance are the basis of their beliefs and that is one of the reasons why they absolutely want the abolition or at least the mitigation of the death penalty.

Others, on the contrary, argue that capital punishment is inhuman and must be abolished since it is a survival of ancient times, when the one that had meted death also had to face death.

What about the murderer then? Did he entertain any of those soft feelings toward his victim? Did he have any feeling for the family bereaved of their protector, when the breadwinner fell under the blow dealt by the murderer?

Some people would argue that the death penalty should be done away with on the ground that it is only a matter of vengeance.

It has nothing to do with revenge; in fact, if it did, I would support its abolition.

In my opinion, it serves as an instrument of retribution necessary in a society in order to remove the numerous causes which may lead to murder.

Some people say that capital punishment is not a deterrent to homicide. May I be permitted to refer to the report tabled on June 27, 1956. It was submitted by the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on capital punishment.

I will quote only a few excerpts. On page 10, one can read the following:

The committee was deeply impressed by the support given the death penalty by those who are responsible for the administration of the law. It includes all the attorneys general of all the provinces except Saskatchewan. The experience of responsible persons who share that opinion showed that it was an effective deterrent to murder.

Now, to page 11.

Moreover, it was contended that professional criminals were more likely to resort to violence. To this class of criminal, capital punishment was a more effective deterrent than mere imprisonment to which they were already hardened and which they tended to regard as an occupational hazard.

Now to page 14.

In considering the arguments for and against abolition, the committee was conscious of the view of the provincial attorney general and other officials responsible for law enforcement from whom it received evidence that capital punishment is an important and necessary deterrent to murder. As indicated in paragraph 50, the committee did not consider that this opinion is displaced by other evidence based upon statistical comparisons, and the committee has concluded that capital punishment does exercise a deterrent effect, which would not result from imprisonment or other forms of punishment.

I now quote paragraph 56, page 15:

The committee while recognizing the substantial support given by many persons to the abolition of capital punishment, considered there is a still wider group who support and accept capital punishment. This support reflects the public's revulsion against murder, the "crime of crimes". Equally, the committee considered that the public abhorrence of murder reflects a traditional attitude built up by the reservation of capital punishment for this particular crime. The abolition of a penalty traditionally accepted as a just and effective deterrent could only be recommended if the evidence clearly established that the ordinary citizen's view of its efficacy was demonstrably wrong.

On the other hand, many consider the maintenance of capital punishment as a deterrent to murder. This is so true that whenever this question becomes an issue, people want capital punishment to be retained in the case of crimes of treason.

Therefore, if people can thus be deterred from such crimes, why can they not be deterred from any crime?

Page 15 of the report reads partly as follows:

The committee was of the opinion that capital punishment does protect the police to a greater extent than imprisonment alone would do by deterring criminals from using firearms or violence to facilitate the commission of crimes, or escapes from arrest or attempted apprehension.

And, on page 17, one can read the following:

In practice, the committee considered that any redefinition of the crime of murder—

This is closely connected with the present bill.

—should conform closely to the present practice in commuting sentences of capital punishment. Having concluded that it is not practicable to achieve a satisfactory redefinition of murder, the committee also decided that differences between murders can only be recognized by granting commutation in suitable circumstances.

Several witnesses suggested that consideration might be given to the creation of degrees of murder which would take into account the difference in moral culpability between different types of homicides. All witnesses representing law-enforcement authorities opposed the establishment of degrees of murder. The committee shares the conclusions of the United Kingdom royal commission on this question. The committee is of the opinion that the present distinction between murder and manslaughter is quite clear and straightforward.

I will now read a few of the committee's recommendations:

(1) Retention of capital punishment as mandatory penalty for murder.

(2) Retention of capital punishment for treason and piracy.

(3) No change in definition of murder.

(6) Abolition of capital punishment for offenders under 18—

That is the only case where the committee felt capital punishment should be abolished, that is the case of offenders under 18 who can still reform and who may have been brought up since childhood in a neighbourhood where they were exposed to evil influences.

On the other hand, in the case of a man who has achieved more maturity, it is recognized practically everywhere that a criminal always comes back to the scene of his crime or always commits the same kind of crime over and over again. Consequently, there is only one way of correcting those criminals, namely to find the only solution which will at least check this desire within the criminals to kill their fellow human beings. I feel that capital punishment may often cause within young criminals, a reaction which will stop them, because of their families, from committing a murder.

History tells us that in the latter part of the war a great number of men in the army of Napoleon I committed suicide. Then, looking for a means of checking those suicides and knowing that those who committed that crime did so for the sake of family pride, Napoleon ordered that all those committing suicide be hanged. And it is said that from that moment on the number of suicides decreased considerably within Napoleon's army.

Thus we can say that hanging is considered as a dishonour and it is precisely for that reason that hanging must be kept as part of our traditions, as a deterrent for those who might still be prone to kill.

It has been said and it is still claimed that most murders are committed following fits of madness. It is true and whoever has read Alexis Carrel's book "L'homme cet inconnu" will agree with me that most individuals, if not all, have several fits of madness in their lives. In fact, whenever a man gets mad to the extent of losing control over himself, then he may do some foolish thing. But can such an act be an excuse for the crime of killing somebody? I do not believe so.

Besides, it is a known fact that our courts of justice have always been prudent in that field. Whenever a judge and jury are called upon to judge a case, they are absolutely prudent and make sure that there is confirmation of evidence and whenever they are faced with circumstantial evidence, they always make sure that all circumstances are brought forward so that there be no doubt whatsoever concerning the guilt of the accused.

Some people claim that in the past—I do not know personally—there have been cases where persons would have been found guilty when in fact they were innocent. One might say that was an accident. Even if it is possible for one such accident to happen in one hundred years would it be wise to abolish that deterrent which keeps people from making use of brutal force to eliminate an enemy or from acting like today's gangsters who enter a bank with drawn weapons, intending to kill if they do not get the money they are after.

You just have to recall the action of that young criminal who shot down a police officer, in a Montreal caisse populaire because the latter tried to arrest him. Could we find some way to cure those criminals apart from holding out to them the prospect of hanging? I do not think so.

However, I believe the main evil we should fight these days is the lack of religious education among our children. In fact too many people still claim that there is no room for religious education in our schools, that it should be eliminated from the curriculum. In our schools, we reach all our children whereas, at Sunday school—or the perseverance lectures as it is called in some places—there are a certain number of pupils taking those courses because their parents are strict enough to keep an eye on them and to send them to the school, but most children do not attend. I am of the opinion that the only way to foster a mental habit is to promote religious education for our children and to teach them principles they will never forget.

Those who want religious education to vanish from our schools do an ill-turn to society because they deprive a child of an opportunity to learn principles which might keep him on the right track during his whole life.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caron: Yes.

Mr. Martineau: Could he tell us who are those persons who want to do away with religious teaching in our schools?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had read the publication entitled Orange Sentinel, distributed to us every month, he would have seen that there are many people who advocate the discontinuance of any religious teaching in our schools. As a matter of fact, I do know that an Anglican bishop in Toronto and Anglican ministers, who had put themselves on record as being in favour of religious teaching in the schools, received letters of protest and threat for having dared to ask for the retention of religious education in our schools.

Such teaching is most necessary, and too often it is not realized what ideas can be taught the children through it. That is what is sought to be abolished by those who favour the abolition of religious education. It is a matter of giving youth good training at a time when they are being educated. If we see to it soon enough, perhaps this matter of capital punishment will not have to be dealt with. I am convinced that we should be much more stern than we are now for hold-ups.

I could not tell whether it can be blamed on law administration or on the weakness of the bench, but recently in Montreal a criminal who had robbed a considerable amount of money was sentenced to only seven years in prison. Such leniency means that this criminal, on being released, will take possession of the stolen money which he must have hidden, and since society has been so lenient in his case, he will be ready to resume his former life.

Moreover, several people are opposed to capital punishment because their conscience objects to such punishment.

It is said that killing is forbidden in the Bible. In fact, it is stated in the Bible: Thou shalt not kill. This is a general commandment to the effect that an individual has no right to kill. But, on the other hand, this is what we find in chapter 9, verse 6, of Genesis:

> Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.

Now, it is quite obvious that "by man shall his blood be shed". And "by man" means society, he who within society is responsible for maintaining order.

And in Leviticus, chapter 24, verse 17, we find the following:

> And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death, and he that killeth a beast shall make it good; beast for beast.

I understand that those words have been referred to earlier as being a commandment of the law of retaliation. But they are based on the fundamental principle that we must not kill, he who kills must be punished by society and the only fitting punishment is death. And we find here:

> Voluntary murder.
> And if he smite him with an instrument of iron, so that he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death. And if he smite him with throwing a stone, wherewith he may die, he is a murderer; the murderer shall surely be put to death. Or if he smite him with a hand weapon of wood, wherewith he may die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death—
> But if he thrust him of hatred, or hurl at him by laying of wait, that he die; or in enmity smite him with his hand, that he die: he that smote him shall surely be put to death; for he is a murderer.

And this is what we find in the Deuteronomy, chapter XIX, verses 18 and 19:

> And the judges shall make diligent inquisition—

This shows that even in the Bible this matter was not to be dealt with without due consideration; evidence was needed, and convincing evidence.

> And the judges shall make diligent inquisition: and, behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testify falsely against his brother, then shall ye do unto him, as he has thought to have done unto his brother: so shall thou put the evil way from among you.

And further on, in the Proverbs, I find the following:

> Foolishness is bound in the heart of a child; but the rod of correction shall drive it far from him.

The Bible mentions several times that he who kills should be killed by society.

The individual, of course, has no right to take the law into his own hands, but society must protect the victim of a murder. It must protect the eventual victim of a murderer.

For all these reasons and for many others that time does not allow me to give, I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. Paul: Would you allow me a question?

Mr. Caron: Certainly.

Mr. Paul: If I understood your statement, you mentioned that Napoleon had inflicted capital punishment to put an end to a wave of suicides. Is that true?

Mr. Caron: I have read this fact somewhere but I have not checked its accuracy. I know that words and deeds are often wrongly attributed to great men, but the fact that it was ever mentioned is enough to make one wonder if that was not a way to deter his men from committing a crime.

Mr. Paul: How did they go about hanging a suicide?

Mr. Caron: It is simply that a sentence to death by hanging was shameful, whereas suicide was considered an honour.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly in support of this bill and also to speak directly on two principles of the bill and not on capital punishment in general. The first principle I should like to discuss is the suggestion that this is a compromise bill between two extreme points of view. I feel that this is not a compromise bill because in effect, as I see it, it carries out the will and the beliefs of the vast majority of people in this country. I do not believe there is one large body of people who are absolutely for capital punishment, nor a large body who are absolutely against it. I believe this bill expresses the direct belief of the vast majority of people; therefore it cannot be described as a compromise but as a bill which carries out the general intent and beliefs of the people of this country.

I believe the majority of people would like to see capital punishment abolished except in certain cold-blooded, planned and deliberate murders. I believe that those who would not like to see complete abolition are of that belief because, first, of the danger of organized crime developing or moving into this country; and, second, because of that residue of restraint, indefinable though it may be, which would cause a person who might be about to commit a murder to have second thoughts as to the possibility of his losing his own life.

Further, I believe that the adoption of this bill, for all practical purposes and with very few exceptions, would have the effect of abolishing capital punishment. Furthermore, I believe that it will reduce almost to zero the number of cases which may come before cabinet for consideration.

I should like to turn to another aspect of the bill. I wish to show that while there is still an element of capital punishment involved in the bill there are at least seven elements of protection which are given to a person who has been convicted of murder before his actual execution. I should like to list the seven elements of protection now given. First, a person must have committed a murder which is within the new definition contained in the bill, that is, the type of murder which is calculated and deliberate and accompanied by force or stealth. Therefore the first element is that he must have committed the type of murder that we now describe as capital murder.

The second element of protection is that he must have been charged with capital murder. This involves a decision by the law enforcement officers in the first instance in considering the facts and coming to the conclusion that the facts warrant a charge of capital murder being laid against the person involved rather than non-capital murder. Third, the convicted person must have had a full and complete trial. There cannot now be a plea of guilty to capital murder. Fourth, a jury must have decided unanimously that the person charged was guilty of capital murder. In this connection the jurors must have directed their minds to whether or not the person was guilty of non-capital murder because, even where capital murder has been charged, there is the alternative of finding the accused person guilty of non-capital murder. Therefore the jurors, having considered the facts and after applying their minds to the matter, must have voluntarily decided that the person is guilty of capital murder.

Fifth, even after having convicted an accused person of capital murder the jury is now asked directly whether they wish to make any recommendation as to mercy. Here again the jury, having directed their minds toward whether the accused person is guilty or not guilty of capital murder, must further direct their minds toward the question of whether or not they wish to recommend mercy. In other words, they must now consider punishment as well as guilt.

The sixth element which is now involved is that there must have been an appeal to a provincial court of appeal. Even if the person charged does not himself voluntarily wish to appeal, under the bill the facts must be reviewed by a provincial court of appeal composed, in most cases of capital crimes, of five or more judges of such court. Under these provisions, therefore, the sentence and the facts must be reviewed by the provincial court of appeal. The final element of protection afforded to an accused person is that the royal prerogative of mercy must have been refused.

With these seven elements I believe that the enforcement of capital punishment involving execution of convicted persons will be reduced to the point where it will result in actual abolition. There is still that residue of people who, having passed through the seven steps of protection, can still be found to have committed a murder for which they should lose their lives. It is for that small element that I believe most of the people of Canada desire to see capital punishment retained. For that reason I feel very strongly that the bill is not a compromise but carries out to the letter what the people of Canada desire at this time in our history so far as the question of capital punishment is concerned.

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, on February 18, 1960, at the time when the bill on capital punishment of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) was being discussed by the house, I set out in some detail, as found on page 1208 of Hansard, the reasons why I was opposed to capital punishment. I do not propose to cover those details again. However, I am still opposed to capital punishment and I base myself on three fundamental reasons or principles.

The first is that capital punishment emphasizes the punitive aspect of justice, and by the word "punitive" I mean punishment, of course. Punishment, as we all know, can be broken down into at least four elements, punishment to deter an act from being committed, punishment to make a person suffer who has committed an act, a sort of form of vengeance or retribution, punishment in order to reform the criminal, to make him see the proper way to follow, and punishment in order to maintain the laws of the civilized state or, in other words, to protect society.

The second principle I mentioned was that it is human to err in judgment because none of us, of course is infallible. The third general principle I mentioned was that there is an ethical basis to this whole thing. It seems to me that the state cannot take what it cannot give. The state cannot give life and therefore it should not take life.

While the bill does not go as far as I should like to see it go, nevertheless it seems to me that it does bring in certain important changes. For example, during the past two decades there has been a great change with regard to the treatment, care and study of criminals and matters in relation thereto. A great deal of psychiatric research has been made and is under way. In this connection, and since it has not been mentioned so far, I should like to refer to two chief points in relation to psychiatric and medical research.

The first is that up to the present the language used in the Criminal Code is almost impossible of psychiatric definition. Thus the word "insanity" means one thing to the legal mind of the lawyer who is in court and has a completely different connotation to the medical profession or the psychiatric mind. The word "psychopath", for example, and all that word implies is new in relation to the outdated words, if I may call them that, in the Criminal Code as we have it at present. I suggest that the words "mentally deficient", for example, would be a much more scientific general term to use in this connection.

Second, it seems to me that too often the decision whether or not a criminal is guilty hinges on psychiatric evidence given by the so-called experts who are called in. It also seems to me that it is both unfair and unreasonable to put a psychologist or psychiatrist into the witness box and, whether he has prepared the case thoroughly or whether he has not, to expect this psychiatrist to give clear and unbiased replies to the questions which are put when he knows that, depending on the evidence he may give in the witness box, he may personally convict the accused. If he says that the accused is not insane according to the present definition in the Criminal Code, which according to the psychiatrist's definition is outmoded then he personally, in effect, convicts the accused. No respected, responsible professional man wants to put himself in that position. I say, therefore it is time we updated the Criminal Code and brought into the Criminal Code new words dealing with this general category of mental deficients.

If on the other hand he says the criminal under review is insane when he knows perfectly well that the accused has committed some act of violence then the accused is likely to go free. The only point I am making is that I approve of the updating of the Criminal Code certainly with regard to the general class or kind, if I may use that term, of mental deficient.

I do not propose to detain the house any longer. I just wish to say that I feel this amendment to the Criminal Code is an attempt to end the confusion in the public mind which has existed for many years. I think it is an attempt to resolve a very difficult problem. I believe the minister is to be heartily commended and congratulated upon the restrained and careful words he used in his opening statement. I want to say that, in my opinion, these amendments indicate an attempt to temper justice with mercy and forbearance and, for that reason, I propose to support these amendments as a step in the right direction.

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): I believe this bill, Mr. Speaker, No. C-92, an act to amend the Criminal Code in respect to capital punishment, and the debates that led up to it have shown parliament at its best. In his fine speech during the presentation of Bill No. C-92, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) gave due credit to the private members who introduced various bills on the subject of capital punishment. I believe that the debates we had in this house last year were good for parliament and good for the country as a whole.

I know that hon. members received, as I did, many letters from the constituents and from people outside our constituencies indicating that the debates crystallized their own thinking as they did our thinking. I received one letter from a lawyer in Prince George, British Columbia. He had this to say, and I thought it was pertinent:

> As a practising lawyer, I believe most sincerely that capital punishment degrades and tarnishes the whole administration of justice. It places on judges, jurors and counsel alike, an unbearable strain. It engenders sympathy for the very last man for whom sympathy should be felt—the accused man himself.

I am an abolitionist, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to capital punishment. I do not believe the taking of life by the courts is a deterrent to murder. I do not believe it is morally right that a man or a group of men should be given the power to take life. I believe hanging is a barbarous facet of our civilized society. I believe that capital punishment should be abolished. I do, however, give wholehearted support to this Bill No. C-92. I support it, first of all, because I think it is a forward step.

In last year's debate, I suggested that every step toward abolition of capital punishment is a forward step. I certainly believe that this bill is a step toward abolition. Last year the Anglican Church of Canada declared itself in favour of the abolition of capital punishment and decided to ask the government—I quote the words that were sent to the government—"to initiate proceedings leading to abolition of capital punishment in Canada." I think this bill, Mr. Speaker, is doing just that, initiating proceedings that will lead to the abolition of capital punishment.

I am not going to repeat the arguments that we who would like to see capital punishment abolished put forward in this house during these debates. I do believe that a murderer, whether capital or non-capital, should be taken out of circulation, out of society. I look forward to hearing from the minister an explanation of precisely what the life sentence penalty will now mean. There are some people who say, why should the taxpayers support murderers for many long years. It has been said, and truly said, that you cannot reduce anything as sacred as life to dollars and cents.

Another reason, Mr. Speaker, why I am supporting this bill is that I do not believe at this time if a vote were taken in the House of Commons or in the country as a whole, the result would be favourable to abolition. I believe this measure is a good compromise and a step toward the abolition of capital punishment.

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this bill gives me an opportunity to say a few words with regard to my feelings about this matter. I know that some of my colleagues will not agree with my thinking on this matter, particularly the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton), who has spoken, and also the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai).

Many arguments pro and con have been forwarded to me by interested persons concerning abolition or retention of the death penalty in Canada. I have not changed my position on this subject since I spoke on the previous bill introduced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee). I feel that the death penalty should be retained and that we should not have two kinds of murder defined in the Criminal Code with the death penalty applicable to one.

The bill introduced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough was debated but never given third reading. I am sure the reason for this procedure was that it would have been defeated. It was a private bill, so there would have been a free vote; therefore, there is no doubt why it was never put to a vote.

Since I am not a member of the legal profession, Mr. Speaker, I am taking a layman's view of this particular bill. My findings are the result of many representations I have received in letters or personal interviews with persons who have sought me out or whom I have sought out. Since this bill is a government measure the possibility of a free vote so far as government supporters are concerned has been removed. This assures the passage of the measure. I think that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) should allow government members to make up their own minds and allow them to vote as their consciences dictate. There are bound to be many on the government side who have their own views on this matter, but they are bound to vote with their party.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member because of any difference with his approach to capital punishment which, of course, he is quite entitled to have. However, I bring to his attention and to yours, sir, the propriety of suggesting that in votes in this house members are bound other than by their consciences.

Mr. Speaker: That is so. Earlier in the day I noticed that one of the hon. members was suggesting something to the contrary. However, I think it would be a reflection on the house to suggest that any hon. member was not free to vote exactly as he saw fit and that it would not be a proper suggestion to make.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In answer to what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has said, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that what the hon. member was clearly seeking to do was to establish—

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member is side stepping as usual.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sorry that I have a disability that forces this action in the circumstances. I can only say that what the hon. gentleman was seeking to do was quite obvious, namely to urge upon the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wishes to address himself to the point I should be interested to have his view on the subject. It is an important matter. From time to time hon. members suggest that other hon. members are under some compulsion and are not free to vote as they see fit.

That is the question. Whatever may be the reason for which it is raised is irrelevant. If I am wrong in the view I take, I should like the hon. member for Essex East to indicate what he considers to be the proper view.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In order to understand what the hon. gentleman was seeking to do, I think one must realize that he not only used the particular phrase complained of but that he asked that the government release members from the obligation of accepting the direction of the party whip. That is not an unusual request to make and that is what he is seeking to do. He was not seeking to suggest that hon. members do not vote according to conscience. He was, however, asking the government to release their members from any obligation to follow the direction of the party whip. That is not an unusual request to be made by one member under circumstances such as these. I do not think that the language used by the hon. member generally is open to any other interpretation.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, to add to the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), may I point out that when we discussed a similar bill last year, the Prime Minister himself (Mr. Diefenbaker) indicated that members on the government side were completely free to vote according to their conscience on the bill under discussion at that time, and that there was to be no question of toeing the party line.

Now, I raised this point last Saturday and you, Mr. Speaker, prevented me from getting a reply. At that time, I did not insist, but I want to say that when I mentioned a free vote, I did not mean to suggest that we do not vote freely; however, there is a distinction to be drawn between a party vote and an ordinary vote. We are always free to vote as we please, but in the case of a bill of this nature, I think the hon. member is quite justified in his remark, because the Prime Minister himself established a precedent last year when he said that government supporters would have an opportunity to vote in complete freedom on a similar bill.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I shall give some further consideration to this extremely important matter. From time to time I have heard hon. members refer to what are perhaps the facts, if not the theory, of parliamentary decisions. However, as far as I am aware, except where the government chooses to indicate that it does not regard the motion as one of confidence, it has not been in accordance with the practice of parliament for any member to suggest that any other member is under any restraint or compulsion with respect to his voting. There is nothing in the rules about parties or whips and there is nothing properly said in the House of Commons about parties or whips. However, perhaps theory and practice have diverged.

I have expressed my view. I should like to think about the matter in case the point arises again. However, as at present advised, I think it is improper for any member to ask that another member be freed from compulsion. I think it is improper to assume that any member is not free to vote as he sees fit.

Mr. Mitchell: Very well, Mr. Speaker, maybe I could put the matter in another way and say that it might be interesting to observe what members may absent themselves when the vote is taken if they vote as I have suggested.

This bill also suggests the possibility of relieving the cabinet of the very embarrassing and ticklish situations with which it finds itself confronted when dealing with applications for commutation of death penalties. Many sentences of death have been altered to life imprisonment in the last few years by the cabinet with the usual criticism from both sides of the argument. This bill to a certain extent relieves this situation and will therefore relieve the cabinet of many embarrassing decisions in such cases.

However, the death penalty is a definite deterrent and should be retained and not altered. We have fines for speeding and parking, et cetera. These fines are deterrents and always will be deterrents. Therefore, why not have a deterrent as far as murder is concerned?

On my week-end visits to Sudbury I have made it a point to contact various groups and to get their reaction to this bill. I have listened to well informed arguments on both sides and have weighed the submissions in my fact finding discussions. One thing bothers me. Suppose the death penalty were abolished and life imprisonment were substituted and suppose a condemned man is sentenced to penitentiary for murder. Suppose that during his incarceration he murders a guard at this institution. I presume he is no worse off inasmuch as he has already been committed for life and one or two more murders would not increase his sentence. Having now committed this second murder, should he be retried and sentenced to death because he was a good boy when he committed the first murder?

In this bill I would suggest some amendments could be made and that, of course, further study could be given to it. I suggest this bill could be deferred for some time in order to have the jurists and bar associations give this matter very serious study and come back to the minister with their reactions and suggestions for amendments. One amendment I would suggest would be to change the method of execution. Not many of us have had the experience of attending a hanging; but from reactions we have heard, it is inhuman in many cases. My suggestion would be a study of gas or electrocution as a form of execution rather than the present form of hanging.

I have come to the conclusion—not without having made a study of this subject, and having regard to the suffering caused to innocent people by criminals who commit murder—that the death penalty is a definite deterrent and should be retained without any alteration or alternate penalty of sentence, of course, taking into consideration the age of the convicted, whether he be a minor or not.

One of my constituents sums up the matter in this way. He had an old uncle who always said this: "Hanging may not discourage murderers, but it sure stops the one that gets hung". I am inclined to believe him.

Mr. Paul Martineau (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the legislation at present before the house is in my opinion a logical, common sense approach to the whole question of capital punishment. It is so on several grounds, of which I should like to list a few.

First of all there is the question of deterrence. There is no doubt whatsoever in my mind that capital punishment provides a greater deterrent to the crime of murder than any other form of punishment which can be imposed in a civilized society.

Second, the bill provides a series of safeguards which constitute new law as far as the Criminal Code is concerned, which reduce to the absolute minimum, compatible with human fallibility, the risk or chance of a judicial error or a miscarriage of justice.

Third, this bill preserves a very important principle, that of individual responsibility, establishing as it does the essential distinction which exists between a murder that is planned, deliberate and committed with the spirit of gain or vengeance and a murder that just, as it were, happens on the spur of the moment.

Fourth, this bill recognizes that even in our twentieth century murder still exists and is an awesome crime, and that foul, deliberate murder must be punished by the most vigorous means at the disposal of society.

I should like now to go into some of the details of the points I have just advanced. First of all there is the question of deterrence. If I understood the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) correctly, he stated that capital punishment could only be justified if in effect it constituted a strong deterrent to the commission of the crime of murder. But the hon. member said that in fact it did not constitute such a deterrent, and second, if it did, it could not be proven and in such a case—although he did not say so in so many words, I think this is what he concluded—the murderer should be given the benefit of the doubt and should not face capital punishment or execution.

I believe it is true to a certain degree that statistics are not conclusive on the point as to whether or not more or fewer murders are committed when capital punishment is maintained in a country. However, comparisons are very risky in matters of this kind.

The hon. member for Vancouver East compared the rate of murder in countries where capital punishment is imposed with those countries where it has been abolished. The hon. member concluded that there was no difference and no conclusion could be drawn. However, certain statistics were placed before the royal commission on capital punishment which sat in the United Kingdom during the course of the 1952-53 session of parliament.

I believe it is worth while placing some of these figures on the record. The figures presented to the royal commission showed that in Sweden and Norway, for instance, many more murders per one million population were committed during the years when capital punishment in those countries was either in abeyance or had been abolished by legislative enactment.

The following are some of these figures. The mean rate of murders per one million population for the years 1900 to 1909 are 2.54, 2.73 and 2.60 for England and Wales. The figures are 5.4, 4.9 and 5.0 for Norway; and 7.1, 5.1 and 5.0 for Sweden. If infant murders are included, the comparable figures become, for England 4.1, 3.1 and 3.3; and for Sweden, 12.8, 9.0 and 8.2. If England and Wales had shown the same murder rates as Norway there would have been 2,800 more murders in those 30 years. If they had shown the same rates as Sweden there would have been 3,500 more murders.

In the opinion of the royal commission on capital punishment there is, therefore, some evidence showing that the death penalty is likely to have a stronger deterrent effect on normal human beings than imprisonment.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister would allow me to interrupt, as it is my duty to do, it being five o'clock, so that the house may proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

THIRD READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. S-12, respecting Co-operative Life Insurance Company—Mr. Pascoe (for Mr. Ormiston).

THREE RIVERS—ST. LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. Remi Paul (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-15, respecting the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence river near the city of Trois Rivieres.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to obtain authority to build a bridge over the St. Lawrence river between two points; one on the north shore above Trois Rivieres, Quebec, and the other on the south shore below Nicolet, Quebec. As the bill concerns a district which is 100 per cent French in origin, I intend to give my explanation in French which, before this house, has an equal standing with the English language, the learning of which I am enjoying very much.

(Translation):

This piece of legislation in its present phraseology was passed in 1956. In that year, the Corporation du Pont de Trois Rivieres appeared before the house to solicit the right it is again requesting today, and under statute 4-5 Elizabeth II, chapter 71, La Corporation du Pont de Trois Rivieres was granted the privileges and rights it is now seeking from this house. What is the purpose of this bill?

The fact is that under section 11 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the governor in council cannot authorize the construction of a bridge on the St. Lawrence river, and I quote:

> No approval shall be given under this part of the site or plans of any bridge over the river St. Lawrence.

That is the only privilege, the only authorization sought by the Corporation du Pont de Trois-Rivieres.

As to the purposes and legal status of the corporation, they come under provincial civil law; in 1956, the Quebec legislature passed an act granting legal existence to La Corporation du Pont de Trois Rivieres and defining the objects of this public body as well as its rights and privileges. This provincial act passed by the Quebec legislature appears as a schedule to Bill S-15.

The bridge, which will link Three Rivers to the south shore, is an important economic need in the area. We all know that Three Rivers is Canada's second oldest town. It was founded by Laviolette in 1634, and we all know it was famous as a fur trading centre in the early days of the colony, and that two of its sons who had travelled extensively in Canada's northern territories even went to London, after the English conquest to obtain British capital that was needed to set up the Hudson's Bay Company, which later developed the wealth of Canada's northern areas.

Three Rivers started the iron and steel industry in the province of Quebec. Anyone familiar with the chronicle of the province will know that Three Rivers was the cradle of that industry. Indeed everyone has heard about the old iron or steel mills, which, when they were built in the early days of the colony, were to be the starting of a now very prosperous industry in our province and throughout the country.

Then Three Rivers became an important railway centre and it is widely known that today the city is mentioned as a world centre for the paper industry.

Three Rivers is the very core of an industrial area surrounded by larger cities like Shawinigan, Cap-de-la-Madeleine, Grand' Mère, La Tuque and Louiseville.

On the other shore, we have a farming community, Nicolet. The building of a bridge between Three Rivers and Nicolet will also promote an interesting market for all larger communities on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, like Drummondville, Victoriaville, Sorel, Richmond and Granby.

That is why the Three Rivers bridge corporation has no doubt that hon. members will grant the authorization requested in this bill.

This bill is the result of a publicity campaign launched in the common interest for the industrial, economical and agricultural development of central Quebec. I would be remiss if I did not mention the active publicity campaign launched to that effect by the Three Rivers Le Nouvelliste, the various radio stations, the chambers of commerce of Three Rivers and Cap-de-la-Madeleine, and the whole area, as well as the support given the Three Rivers bridge corporation by all townships and municipalities, which surround that important economic centre.

Therefore I have no doubt that the corporation will be authorized to build that bridge across the St. Lawrence river. It will be 5,000 feet long and will cost approximately $30 million.

The present system linking both shores of the St. Lawrence river consists of a ferry service which, in 1960, carried over 1,300,000 passengers and more than 560,000 motor vehicles of all kinds. These figures emphasize the absolute necessity of that bridge.

The only privilege we are asking this house today is the authority to span the river; indeed, before the construction is authorized, the corporation will be required to lay its plans before the governor in council and permission will surely not be granted if the plans and specifications of that bridge are not in accordance with the regulations and the various federal acts which might govern such matters.

For those reasons, I hope the House of Commons will give this bill its whole hearted support so that the center of the province of Quebec will keep moving forward on the road to progress and prosperity.

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should have been very pleased to second the bill introduced by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul). However, on behalf of the opposition and on my own behalf, I wish to say that I approve this bill. This is not the first time that we have heard of the construction of a bridge in Three Rivers. Back in 1950, there was a discussion about whether a bridge or a tunnel should be built. In 1953, a group of able and earnest businessmen set up an organization to investigate the possibility of carrying out that project.

Many people have come out in support of the project for the construction of a bridge at Three Rivers. Among others, the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) mentioned that project on several occasions when he was in the opposition. So did Mr. Maurice Boisvert, the former member of parliament who, in 1956, introduced a bill similar to the one we are now considering today. I, myself, spoke in favour of the project in 1959.

Indeed, in 1956, a bill called "An act respecting the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence river near the city of Three Rivers" was passed here. A similar bill was passed by the provincial legislature on February 2, 1956. Both, the federal and the provincial governments have therefore given their approval to the project since that year. The only thing that remained to be done was to go ahead with the plan.

Various organizations were set up, including the Three Rivers bridge committee which had spearheaded the movement, for three years. The chamber of commerce of Three Rivers, the chambers of commerce of neighbouring municipalities and other organizations supported the movement. The radio stations, the newspaper Le Nouvelliste, all those who were interested, brought pressure to bear with the government of the province of Quebec, then headed by hon. Maurice Duplessis, to bring about its approval of the project. We know the unfortunate conclusion of those steps: Mr. Duplessis never gave his personal authorization, even though he had always declared himself in favour of the project.

Later, under the administration of Mr. Sauve, there was also a sympathetic approach to this project. Before the fall of the Union Nationale regime, under the Barrette administration, the proposal was favourably considered. As a matter of fact, Mr. Barrette said: "This is a project which should be implemented as soon as possible." Unfortunately the times and circumstances were unfavourable and the project was not carried out.

Fortunately we have today a provincial government placed under the leadership of a highly qualified man, Mr. Jean Lesage, who indicated he is in favour of the construction of the Three Rivers bridge. If we judge from the promises Mr. Lesage has already kept, we can say that this project will be carried out without delay.

As a matter of fact soundings are being made in the St. Lawrence at present to determine the best location for the foundation of the structure. Furthermore, a bill is before the provincial legislature and will be shortly considered by the members.

Mr. Speaker, it is no longer a matter of demonstrating the necessity of building a bridge between the shores of the St. Lawrence river at Three Rivers; it has been done already. Since we all agreed on the principle, it is now merely a matter of passing to the second stage, or to start work on the project in the nearest possible future. When this work is completed, it will be the conclusion of a campaign initiated many years ago. Needless to say, credit for this achievement should go to the whole population which has already given its moral and financial support, because people are anxious to be able to cross the river both ways without having to wait two and three hours or even all night when the ferry service is suspended. The present Minister of Transport personally realized the necessity of a bridge there, for he once spent a whole night on the wharf of Ste. Angele before he could get back home after an evening of politicking on this side of the river.

So far, the Three Rivers bridge corporation, which remains the organization responsible for this undertaking, has appropriated up to $46,400 for plans and specifications, $28,900 of which represent the personal contribution of the people concerned.

This is a highly commendable gesture on the part of the two communities on both sides of the river, and one worth mentioning.

Other organizations which have also contributed to this achievement are the chambers of commerce, the radio stations which for many months now have often broadcast the slogan: "We need the bridge and we shall have it".

Indeed we shall, thanks to the authorizations given by the federal and provincial governments, but thanks also to the goodwill and sincerity of men who see in the building of this bridge a means of giving fresh impetus to industry and tourism in the area concerned and a means of checking unemployment.

So the Liberal party heartily supports this bill and hopes its provisions will soon be carried out.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill. I am appreciative of the remarks made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat in regard to the support that this bridge is receiving from the people in the area of Three Rivers itself. As hon. members know, this bill was first introduced in the Senate in June, 1956, by Senator Dessureault and received the support of the government of Canada at that time. The responsibility put on the people in that area was that the bridge had to be built within a period of three years. It is gratifying to know that that responsibility has been accepted and, because of the spirit of co-operation among the citizens of that area, there is some hope that the bridge will be built in the very near future. The bridge will be a large project. It is expected it will be 6,500 feet long if the original plans of Dr. Pratley are proceeded with. Including the approaches, it will have a total length of 9,000 feet.

Some question has been raised both in the area itself and in the Senate since the original bill was first passed with respect to whether sufficient consideration has been given to increasing the width of the bridge because of the increase in the number of motor cars that will be using it. According to present plans, the bridge will be 26 feet wide which means there will be only two traffic lanes 13 feet in width. The suggestion has been made that a larger project should be considered involving a four-lane rather than a two-lane highway.

It is my hope and that of my colleagues that the bridge will be proceeded with as soon as possible. According to the last estimate, it is going to cost approximately $12½ million, with a maximum anticipated cost of $15 million. Over a period of years this bridge has been promised by politicians in provincial and federal elections in every constituency that will be served by the bridge. I accept the word of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) that the radio stations and civic-minded people in the area are interested in the bridge and that they have probably forgotten some of the election promises that have been made and are going to go ahead and build a bridge themselves. There are some questions with respect to this project that I think should be answered. The first one I should like to raise is why it should be necessary for the bridge to be authorized by the federal government. I am aware of some of the reasons but they do not seem to apply—

Mr. Woolliams: Do you know all of them?

Mr. Peters: I am not from the province of Alberta and I am not a Social Crediter. I do not talk about anything and everything like the hon. member does. There are some things I know and some things about which I should like to be informed. I will at least stand up in my place and ask my questions in a parliamentary manner. Certain questions were raised in the Senate in relation to this matter and Senator Méthot quoted certain parts of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. As quoted by him on page 478 of the Senate debates, section 10, subsection 1, of that act reads as follows:

> The governor in council may make such orders or regulations as he deems expedient for navigation purposes respecting any work to which this part applies or of which the plan and site are approved under any act of the parliament of Canada.

Section 11 reads as follows:

> No approval shall be given under this part of the site or plans of any bridge over the river St. Lawrence.

Section 3 reads as follows:

> Except so much of this part as relates to rebuilding or repairing any lawful work, nothing hereinafter in this part contained applies to any work constructed under the authority of any act of the parliament of Canada.

The problem is this. If the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) has anything to say, Mr. Speaker, I would be quite happy if he would rise in his seat and say it. I do not think he adds anything to parliamentary decorum by speaking from his seat. There is an indication in section 11 that the St. Lawrence river may not be an international body of water at all points, but I presume that because of the hazards that might have been created in days gone by the St. Lawrence river was placed in a class different from other navigable waters with respect to the building of bridges over it. Section 11 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act makes it necessary for the people of Three Rivers and the surrounding area to come to parliament to ask for permission to build this bridge whereas such permission would not have to be sought in most other parts of Canada.

I believe this has worked a hardship on the people of that area and has made it possible for politicians in the federal and provincial field to use the bridge as a political football or political offering at election time because of the fact that the federal government has within its jurisdiction the power to grant or not to grant the right to construct a bridge in this area. Furthermore, there is the fact that the federal government through the Department of Transport and particularly through the board of transport commissioners is in a position to grant the necessary approval of plans that have been submitted and will be submitted in the future with respect to the construction and maintenance of this bridge.

It seems to me that the rules and regulations with respect to navigable waters in other provinces and the requirements as to a certain type of bridge over a body of water of a certain size should be sufficient to provide for the building of this bridge under normal circumstances rather than an application having to be made to parliament for the construction of the bridge. I know that the people of this area want the bridge and need it. I am pleased to support the bill. It is a stipulation of the law that the bridge must be proceeded with within three years.

I know that a bill was introduced by Senator Dessureault in 1956 and although the bill was passed the bridge was not proceeded with within the required three years. Therefore it was necessary to ask parliament again to pass a bill. It is my hope that the bridge will be constructed within the period of three years and that the people of the area will be able to construct it either with provincial assistance which they have been promised or through subscriptions which the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska suggested might be forthcoming from the people of that area.

I hope they will have the opportunity to build the bridge within the next three years and that it will be of service to the people on the north and south shores of the St. Lawrence in that area. I hope they will not be faced with the problem of having to go to the provincial government for financing in relation to the deficit that may occur before completion of the bridge. Having these things in mind, I support the bill and I ask the government to give some consideration to changing section 11 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act which makes it necessary for the people in the vicinity of Three Rivers to come to parliament to ask that they be granted the right to build this bridge.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul Lahaye (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, it is in my capacity as member of a riding adjoining the city and the county of Three Rivers that I feel entitled to say a few words in support of this bill, the purpose of which is not to construct this bridge but, if I clearly understand the situation, to authorize La Corporation du Pont de Trois Rivieres and the provincial government responsible for this construction, to build this long needed bridge between the city of Trois Rivieres and the south shore. I do not believe that anyone questions the necessity of a bridge there, because there are about 160 miles between the most easterly bridge from Montreal and the present bridge over the St. Lawrence in Quebec city.

The Three Rivers area and the city proper have a population of approximately 60,000. In addition the few industrial cities on the north shore, including Cap de la Madeleine, that I have the honour of representing in this house, as well as Shawinigan, Grand' Mère and La Tuque, and those on the south shore which are almost as populous, make up an industrial and farm population of about 200,000 near the site chosen for this bridge.

I am one of those who have had occasion to realize the need for a bridge there, because in the course of some work I had been doing previous to my coming to this house, very often I had to wait one or even two hours before I could get across the St. Lawrence river. These long waits are most unpleasant and, of course, hinder the industrial development of an area.

A bridge over the St. Lawrence would also prove a valuable asset to the development of the tourist industry. Nobody underestimates the touristic value of the St. Maurice area, especially the upper St. Maurice region. Thus a direct throughway from the United States would run through this promising area.

Mr. Speaker, the title of the bill pleases me very much:

An act respecting the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence river near the city of Trois Rivieres.

However, when I look a little further down, in section 1, I see that this bridge will have to be built about a mile upstream from the limits of the city of Three Rivers. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, without opposing this project in any way, for if I rise at this time it is to give it my fullest support, I regret that the bill does not provide for the alternative of building the bridge either east or west of Three Rivers. I refer particularly to the possibility of building it east of the city of Cap-de-la-Madeleine, for reasons that, in my view, are important. In fact, while I do not lay claim to special engineering experience, I have noticed that the north shore of the St. Lawrence river is about 30 feet higher east of Three Rivers than where it is proposed to build this bridge.

In order to span the St. Lawrence and not hamper ship traffic on the seaway, I wonder whether it would not be economical to have a higher base of operations of about 30 feet, at least on one side of the river.

There is also another reason. I wonder whether account should not have been taken of the fact that the best highway to the upper St. Maurice area runs east of Three Rivers. I understand that a slight straightening of that highway has been planned, from a proposed crossing point on the St. Lawrence, at Ste-Marthe-du-Cap, which could link up with the road commonly called the Shawinigan road, east of that point, which runs up into the St. Maurice area.

That magnificent highway would allow American tourists to enter directly into Cap-de-la-Madeleine, on the way to Shawinigan, Grand' Mère, La Tuque and, after a road has been built between La Tuque and Roberval —a project now in the planning stage—to make a magnificent tour through the national park, and come back by way of Quebec city.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to voice any objection to the building of a bridge over the St. Lawrence, because with all the citizens of the area I have fully supported the campaigns in favour of that bridge. I am referring now to the newspapers, chambers of commerce, all municipalities and radio stations which, for ten years, have had a slogan to promote this project. However, I should like to single out a remark made a moment ago by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), when he indicated that this request had been made to the Quebec government, when the Union Nationale party was in power and that, at the time, the approval of the great premier who preceded the present premier seemed only apparent. Mr. Speaker, you will no doubt allow me to point out to the house that this is quite illogical and that I have never known a statesman who has done more for his province, and particularly for his city of Three Rivers, than the former premier of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot conclude my remarks without expressing my most sincere wishes that representations already made by the people of the area about the construction of this bridge be continued. And I do hope that the formal promise the present premier of the province of Quebec made to Three Rivers not so long ago will be fulfilled as soon as possible in the interest of the population of the province of Quebec and of Canada as a whole, and more particularly of those who live in that region in the heart of the province of Quebec and who are especially interested in the construction of this bridge.

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to add much to the explanations the sponsor of this bill gave us because, since I live in Levis and have to cross over to Quebec every day, I know the many difficulties that are caused by the lack of a bridge or a tunnel between those two cities.

Mr. Asselin: If Mr. Lesage could build it.

Mr. Bourget: Since my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) says that Mr. Lesage will build it—

Mr. Asselin: He promised it.

Mr. Bourget: —he is absolutely right, and I can understand him very well.

Mr. Speaker, I would not have raised this matter if there had not been that interjection of the hon. member for Charlevoix—

Mr. Tremblay: Will he do it without levying taxes?

Mr. Bourget: —but on the other hand, when we consider the situation—

Mr. Tremblay: Is he going to do it without levying a tax?

Mr. Bourget: Obviously, you have not yet learned to shut up. After four years, you have not learned to be polite and to maintain a certain decorum in the house. Why don't you shut up?

Mr. Speaker, would you kindly call the hon. member for Roberval to order?

Mr. Speaker: I will certainly do so, but I would also ask the hon. member for Levis to address himself to the Chair and not to pursue private conversations with the said member.

The hon. member for Levis has the floor.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, the reason why I did not address myself to you was that I knew you understood. Unfortunately, this is not the case of the hon. member for Roberval, who does not understand a thing.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I regret to see that the hon. member for Levis thinks you understand what he is saying. Personally, I will have to wait for the official record before I can make it out.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That remark was out of order, and so are the interjections from both sides. I would ask all hon. members to allow the member for Levis to go on with his speech.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say, in reply to the hon. member for Charlevoix, that the former premier of Quebec was the member for Three Rivers, and that for all practical purposes he never had anything to do with the building of this bridge. It is probably the Liberal government of the province of Quebec that will provide the city of Three Rivers, the city of Nicolet or another city in the area with the bridge that the people have been demanding for at least five years, because it is a fact that the bill now before us will be expiring soon and that it was passed in this house about five years ago.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my intervention is to state that, according to my information, both technical and economic studies were made; as a matter of fact, I am not sure they have been completed. Once those studies have been completed, perhaps it will be decided to build a tunnel rather than a bridge. Under the circumstances, I wonder whether the sponsor of the bill could inform us on this point and whether, in fact, it would not be wise to include the word "tunnel" in addition to the word "bridge". Thus if it were decided, for the reasons I have just mentioned, to build a tunnel, the petitioners would not have to come back to the house to have the bill amended.

Mr. Paul: In reply to the question of the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must point out to the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) that if he speaks now, he will close the debate. I cannot let him have the floor if there are other hon. members who wish to speak in support of or against the bill.

I see that the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) wishes to speak.

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly not delay the passing of the bill, but I shall point out to the hon. member for Levis that, if the bill were amended so as to provide also for the building of a tunnel, the Three Rivers bridge corporation would also have to amend its charter, and from then on, call itself the Three Rivers bridge or tunnel corporation.

Anyway, this is not what I proposed to say when I took the floor. I simply want to point out to the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) and the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Lahaye) that, even if we represent ridings which are at some distance from their own, and if the construction of a bridge at Three Rivers may only be more or less interesting for us, we want to assure them that we entirely approve their plan. We approve it the more that, if the Three Rivers bridge is ever built, we hope this construction will give the present provincial government the sound idea of building another bridge connecting Quebec and Levis. Indeed, as the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget), pointed out a few moments ago, the present government of Quebec should build a bridge between Quebec and Levis. The hon. member for Levis said earlier that he crossed every day from Levis over to Quebec. I wonder whether he travels that way only since there has been a change of government in Quebec, or whether he did it as frequently before.

Anyway, and even if we do not live in the said area, we know the difficulties which face the people on the south shore who want to go to Three Rivers. I do not think that anybody could reasonably oppose such a bill, and I want to assure hon. members from the Three Rivers area, as well as my hon. friend, the representative of Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), that we wholeheartedly agree with them. If the project is carried out within two years, it will, as I say, invite the provincial government of Quebec to build another bridge between Quebec and Levis.

Moreover, I would like to reassure the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska who said a few moments ago that the former provincial government unfortunately lost the election before being able to carry out its project. He did say "unfortunately". Let me tell him that, if that bridge is not built within two years, the former government, which most probably will be carried back to power, will see that it is built.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, if I said "unfortunately" it was meant for Union Nationale members.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think there has been any misinterpretation of the words used by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, in answer to questions—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house—

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) speaks now, he will close the debate. I recognize the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) and of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). From what they have had to say, particularly the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, it is quite obvious that there is a matter of importance and urgency in connection with the construction of this bridge and therefore in connection with the passage of Bill No. S-15.

I may be some 3,000 miles away from this spot in question but I have a keen interest in it. Anything which is of importance to Canada or to any section of Canada and which is correct will have my support. However, irrespective of the statements made this afternoon by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska and the hon. member for Timiskaming I must say that I cannot quite fathom what is behind this bill in view of what is of importance and urgency. Why do I say that?

I must, of course, refer to clauses of the bill but I do so only as to principle. I think that the sponsor of this bill owes an explanation to this House of Commons because one of the principles of the bill contained in clause 3 is this. It states:

> 3. The construction of the said bridge shall be commenced within three years after the plans therefor have been approved by the governor in council—

I direct attention to the words "three years after the plans therefor have been approved". As a matter of principle in this bill it is stated not only that shall there be three years after the governor in council has approved the plans but that there shall be then a period of four years before the bridge must be completed.

So after what we heard this afternoon, that this is a matter of urgency, we are now asked to support in principle a bill which provides that construction of this bridge shall not commence until three years after the approval of the governor in council, and it does not have to be finished until four years thereafter. In other words, despite all the urgency we have heard, the bill before us provides that this bridge does not have to be completed for a matter of seven years. I would also point out that these seven years do not refer to the period after the passage of the bill, but after commencement of construction.

May I also draw something else to the attention of hon. members because I think this is a matter of absolute principle. Canada is a developing country and the St. Lawrence and Three Rivers, of course, are sharing in that development. Yet right in Bill No. S-15, in the schedule on page 3, we find in paragraph 22 something upon which I wish to comment. I am now referring to strictly a matter of principle. This is something which I cannot remember ever being passed or agreed to by parliament.

What is the principle here, sir? According to the principle of this bill a period of approximately eight years may elapse before the bridge is completed. Yet we now have before us in Bill No. S-15—I hope I have your permission, sir, to speak to this principle—these words:

> During a period of eight years as from the sanction of this act and afterwards during the whole period of the utilization of the proposed bridge, no other person shall construct or operate a bridge, tunnel or ferry service over or under the St. Lawrence river between the north shore and the south shore and this, within a radius of 25 miles above and 25 miles below the site of the said bridge, subject however, to the rights of the corporation of the city of Trois-Rivières in the ferry service operated by it.

I think hon. members will understand the reason why I am speaking on this matter. Under this bill as we now have it, with all due respect to the urgency of the matter about which we have been told, it is laid down that they do not even have to start construction until three years after the governor in council approves the plans, and they then have four years in which to build it. In addition to this, it is said that as long as it is held open, be it five, ten or 100 years, no matter what is the development on the St. Lawrence in the area, 25 miles above and 25 miles below the site of this bridge nobody can build a bridge, tunnel, ferry or anything.

That is how this bill reads. I say that we need a factual explanation of this. Is it not something that may hold back the development of the area?

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton for the second reading of Bill C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder).

Mr. Paul Martineau (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment I was citing certain figures which had been placed before the royal commission on capital punishment in the United Kingdom, which tended to establish certain things, such as the deterrent value of capital punishment to the crime of murder. I hasten to acknowledge that these figures were taken from an article published by the Rev. E. L. H. Taylor, M.A., Canterbury, who was chaplain to the Canadian Legion, formerly of the parish of Temiscamingue, which is in my riding. He presented a very learned discourse on the whole question of capital punishment. His article was entitled "Should Capital Punishment be Retained". This article was widely circulated and, moreover, was published in the Canadian Bar Review.

Those figures are applicable, I suggest, to the countries and those years for which they are quoted, but are they applicable to present day conditions? I do not know. Can we establish by statistics, absolutely and in a scientific manner, that capital punishment is, in certain cases, a deterrent? This is most difficult to establish because there is no valid basis for comparison. It is all right to say that one country has retained capital punishment and another has abolished it, yet there seems to be no difference in the rate of murders committed in each.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martineau: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winch: Does the hon. member accept the figures of the United Nations in this regard?

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept them as such in view of the fact that I have not studied them with the dedication the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) has. I present these figures in an effort to establish that one can either make a case for or against capital punishment by the use of statistics. Certain learned individuals have made such cases, by figures, showing that capital punishment does act as a deterrent under certain circumstances.

We have the opinions of professional individuals who are dedicated to the hunting down of criminals. I refer to the commissioner of police for London, who testified before the royal commission, to which I have referred, giving examples establishing the deterring effect of capital punishment. That individual referred to a certain group of hoodlums. One of the members of that group was apprehended, convicted of murder, and sentenced to hang, but that sentence was commuted. That group continued its operations in the same way, perpetrating crimes of violence, including murder. Subsequently two members of that band were arrested, convicted of murder, sentenced to hang, and the sentences were carried out. Following their execution that band of hardened criminals discontinued its operations. It is the considered opinion of that man, whose life work has been devoted to dealing with crime in the largest city in the world, that capital punishment is a deterrent to murder, and I suggest his opinion should carry some weight.

In the debate on capital punishment in the United Kingdom House of Commons of February, 1955 the home secretary gave various reasons why that government was opposed to the outright abolition of capital punishment. One reason he gave in support of the government's rejection of abolition of capital punishment was the evidence of many experienced persons that the death penalty was a unique deterrent to the professional criminal. I think that is a very forthright indication of the nature of the evidence placed before the commission, which spent years investigating the matter.

In Canada we have officers of the law charged with the enforcement of law and order, who have come to this same conclusion. I refer, as an example, to the opinion of the former commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Mr. Nicholson, who during an interview conducted by a reporter of the Ottawa Citizen, and reported in that paper in February 25, 1960, is reported as having said:

> It would not be an exaggeration to say the criminal fraternity generally would welcome abolition of capital punishment.

Therefore a strong case has certainly been established for the value of capital punishment as a deterrent. There is another thing to remember in discussing deterrents. One must keep in mind the kind of offence which now will be punishable by death. It is the deliberate type of murder; it is murder planned by stealth, cunningness, and all the sordid details that go with the commission of crime. It is precisely these people, Mr. Speaker, to whom the fear of capital punishment, the spectre of capital punishment, will be the most frightening. When they put into the balance or on the scales the pros and cons which would move them to commit their crime there is, I submit, a heavy weight against the commission of the crime when they know that swift and certain justice will follow in the form of execution by hanging. I think this cannot be denied. Even if after coming to the deliberate decision to commit crime and setting out on that sordid mission of murder, when everything else, every other feeling of human decency has failed, I still think that on the road to committing that crime prospective murderers will see the road sign which reads "To the gallows", and many may, even at that late hour, be deterred and not commit the crime of murder which they propose. That is why we cannot treat the commission of murder as a statistic because statistics are silent on the hidden motive that determines criminal offences.

With all the respect that is due to the hon. member for Vancouver East, who certainly was most sincere in his exposé of his thesis, I still heartily and fully agree with the Minister of Justice who states that statistics are not reliable because there are no statistics on crimes which are not committed.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question. Is the hon. member aware that Commissioner Nicholson, whom the hon. member quoted a moment ago, on a recent television panel discussion modified the statement which was attributed to him with respect to the application of enforcement; by that I mean the certainty of apprehension rather than the punishment itself.

Mr. Martineau: I thank the hon. member for York-Scarborough for his explanation which I accept, but if words have any meaning, when Commissioner Nicholson said "It would not be an exaggeration to say the criminal fraternity generally would welcome abolition of capital punishment" he meant just that; that the criminal would feel a lot safer in this country if capital punishment was no longer in force.

What else will this bill do, Mr. Speaker? I am absolutely convinced that it will reduce the incidence of crime that will be described and charged in an indictment having to do with a capital offence. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East that it is the trend of modern criminology and also the trend of the times, but the bill does retain the essential distinction between the deliberate, the planned and the non-deliberate, non-planned murder. It creates a new substantive offence of non-capital murder.

I believe it was the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont who said that this might cause a certain amount of difficulty for the crown attorney who must draft the indictment and decide whether a capital indictment will be laid. Certainly, it places a great responsibility on the prosecution office. I am sure the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont knows that the district crown attorney is not alone in determining what type of indictment or accusation will be laid. He must consult the attorney general's department. They have a staff of experts to deal with criminal prosecutions. I am sure also that in cases where there is any doubt in the mind of the crown attorney or of the provincial attorney general, or of his department, they will rather opt for the non-capital offence than the capital offence. This is normal criminal procedure and is entirely in line with the great principles that we adhere to in this country in the matter of justice, and especially criminal justice: The cases where it will be possible, first of all to lay a capital indictment; second, the cases, where it will be imposed; and, third, the cases where once imposed the sentence will be carried out, must be reduced to the absolute minimum. I say this well knowing that the application of this law may not be easy.

As a matter of fact, there is—and I am sure the Minister of Justice has thought of this question—the serious matter of the proof of the offence. How are we going to prove that such and such a murder was a deliberate, planned murder? In how many cases is the planning done in the mind of the criminal and his deliberation is not known by anyone but his own secret soul? This is a very serious difficulty with which the law officers will be faced. But at the same time it is a recognized principle of law that difficulty of proof must not deter a legal principle. Today we are establishing new offences, the substantive offence of murder and non-capital murder, and it will be up to the law officers to apply the law with the greatest amount of care that lies within their competence.

Moreover, this bill which reduces first of all the number of cases where a capital offence may be laid, also places an intricate legal machinery at the disposal of and to the advantage of the man accused of a capital offence. Quite a bit of this is an innovation; some of it is an amplification of existing measures laid down as a safeguard for the man accused. They assure that he will have an absolutely fair trial and every possible means of defence will be placed at his disposal.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, when the present bill becomes the law of the land no person accused of a capital offence will be able to plead guilty. This surely is a reasonable enactment and disposition. When one faces such a serious offence as capital murder one's mind may very often not be too clear. One is under heavy tension and it may be that owing to despondency or other reasons a person accused of capital murder may plead guilty to an offence that he did not commit. This danger is eliminated. An accused man is not permitted to plead guilty to such an offence.

There are other safeguards provided. The law will now call for an automatic appeal of the case when an accused has been found guilty of murder. There is an automatic appeal from the court of first instance, to the provincial court of appeal. This is a reversal of the former legal disposition. An accused did have that right but he had to take the initiative in exercising it. Under the present legislation the initiative will no longer be that of the accused. The choice will no longer lie with the accused but rather the crown will take the initiative of lodging an appeal. The accused will be furnished free of charge with a transcript of evidence and other legal documents necessary to prepare his defence adequately.

Once the provincial appeal court has disposed of the case there is now an appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada on all matters of fact, law, or mixed fact and law. That is another safeguard. Again, when the jury has found an accused guilty of capital murder it is the duty of the judge to ask the jury then if it recommends clemency in the particular case. The hon. member for Vancouver East was not sure whether such a provision would be better than the existing legislation in that regard. He felt that it was almost indecent to ask a body of men who have just condemned a man to pay the supreme penalty whether they recommend clemency. But, Mr. Speaker, under the existing law juries can and very often do recommend clemency for a man whom they have just convicted of a capital offence.

I am sure that the reason this enactment is in the present bill lies in the experience that many lawyers have had. I know I have had it myself. After a jury has convicted a man of this offence and has been discharged, the jurors will come and say to the lawyer that if they had only known they would have recommended clemency. This clause makes it impossible for a jury to fail to recommend clemency because of an oversight or because of a misapprehension of their position in that regard. To my mind this is an additional safeguard in favour of the accused person. By this bill, we are providing all these safeguards.

A new offence is created which will reduce the number of cases where murder will be punished by hanging. This whole procedure is all in favour of the accused and will tend to reduce the number of cases where the sentence of death will be carried out.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member mind answering a question? Is it not a fact that over the years it has been his experience and the experience of others that the very thing he is now discussing has differentiated between those people who have received clemency and those who have not? That is the crux of the bill. Whether it is this government or former governments, over the years that is the very thing that has differentiated between those people who have received clemency and those who have not.

Mr. Martineau: That may be so. I think the hon. member should bring out the details of his argument. It is a point most worthy of the consideration of the house.

I should like to deal with another matter for a minute or two. I was struck by a word that the hon. member for Vancouver East used in his speech. He said that capital punishment was so "irrevocable", and indeed it is irrevocable. That is why we must go so slowly in imposing it and in carrying it out. I also think it is against the trend of the times. But did the hon. member ever stop to consider that the death meted out to the victim of the murderer is also irrevocable?

The gravity of the offence, the irrevocable nature of the murder that is committed, the irrevocable loss of the innocent person who is going about his business and suddenly has his life snuffed out are factors that must also be recognized.

I know that the hon. member will perhaps say that I am advocating revenge and am treating the matter on an emotional level. No, I am not, and I do not think that should be the primary consideration. At the same time, however, society being what it is, we must deal with murder with the most energetic and vigorous means at our disposal. I know that the adherents of abolition will say that capital punishment is a survival of the dark ages and we should get rid of it. Yes, get rid of it, Mr. Speaker, but murder may also be a survival of the dark ages. There is absolutely no pleasant way to deal with murder much as we in our polished twentieth century society would like to forget these things, much as we would like to forget that murder does exist and to forget that it is the duty of society sometimes to protect itself and to impose capital punishment on rare occasions. Certainly we would like to banish all that but, still and all, murders do occur and they must be dealt with with mercy but also with justice because in the last analysis justice is the basis of our society.

That is about all I wish to say on the question of murder and its punishment. I sometimes think of the words of Shakespeare when he describes murder as "murder most foul". In speaking of Macbeth Shakespeare says at one point: "Now does he feel his secret murders sticking on his hands".

These are things that this house is seized with today, and that is why I must commend the Minister of Justice for bringing in this bill which is a step forward, a step in the right direction. It gives to the man accused of murder all the safeguards necessary for his protection. It treats him with clemency, treats him with mercy, but also maintains through justice that equilibrium without which society cannot function. The minister has certainly gained the great respect not only of the house but I am sure of the great bulk of our population in that he has recognized the exigencies of a modern society tempered with mercy but based on justice. He has found a middle path between the two.

This morning when the Minister of Justice made his opening statement on this bill he referred to the history of our western civilization in the matter of dealing with capital punishment. He referred to the days of King Henry VIII when, I believe, some 70,000 persons were executed. He referred to the days of Robert Peel when over 200 offences were capital offences. Today, we are again limiting the number of offences punishable by death. We are, therefore, following along the line of progress but we are not disrupting the essential functions of our democractic society. I support this bill, therefore, and once again I congratulate the minister and all those who have worked to bring about the introduction of this measure. I feel sure it will receive the support of a vast number of our population.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a question of the hon. gentleman? Did I understand him to say that his interpretation of the bill is that those who cannot afford it will have the best possible assistance in their defence? Does that mean that a chap like Mr. Branca, Q.C., or Arthur Maloney, great criminal lawyers, will be made available for the defence?

Mr. Martineau: No, I did not say any such thing. I stated that the transcript of the evidence and the other records that are necessary in order that the accused may establish his appeal and his defence will be delivered free of charge to the accused. I did not go further than that. If I gave that impression, I should like to correct it.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to briefly express my views on this very important question and this very important bill. There is no necessity for me to take the time of the house by repeating the excellent arguments put forward in support of the principle of the abolition of capital punishment because they have been well stated by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and other members in this house. I presume all members of the house know that it is part of the policy of the C.C.F. to work for the abolition of capital punishment.

I listened with great interest to the minister's very well prepared statement of the history of legislation in connection with capital punishment and the efforts of various persons, organizations and members of legislatures to modify the legislation which imposes capital punishment. Throughout the years I have noticed with interest a growing public awareness of the importance of this question. I think that, as is the case with all reform measures and proposed amendments to legislation, we have to give credit to the pioneers who took a stand on this question when it was not by any means as popular to do so as it is today, particularly 40 or 50 years ago.

My attention was first drawn to the subject by the father of the hon. member for Vancouver East, who was then the member for Vancouver East in the provincial legislature. I had been brought up in a very traditional sort of way to accept the conventional attitude toward life and crime by my Liberal father and my Conservative mother. I heard the father of the hon. member for Vancouver East speak on this subject in 1932. At that time I did not agree with him entirely, but his speech did cause me to give the subject some consideration. Since then, I have read a considerable amount on this subject. I have listened with interest to the debates in the provincial legislature and in this house and I have discussed the matter with a number of people.

I was particularly impressed with the standard of debate on the bill advanced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee), on both sides of the question. I was particularly taken with the argument put forward by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney). In addition to the debate in this house, there has been quite a stirring of opinion in the country. I think the last debate we had on this question did create a great deal of interest in the country. There are certain organizations that have worked for years for an amendment to the law, particularly the Society of Friends, organizations of that type, and many in all churches. There have been editorials in the newspapers and articles in magazines and the wardens of penitentiaries and other officers have given their opinions to various parliamentary committees. The welfare council of Canada and other welfare organizations on a provincial scale have also given this question serious consideration and expressed their opinions by resolutions and by correspondence.

I noticed after the debate in the house on the bill introduced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, there was a big surge of interest in this subject in the press, in letters to the newspapers and I think generally speaking in the correspondence members received from organizations and individuals. I think that is a very healthy state of affairs and does indicate the value of focusing attention upon moral questions by debates in this house.

I think we must express our thanks to the member for Vancouver East and to the member for York-Scarborough for initiating these debates in recent years, and to all those who took part in these debates on both sides of this important issue. It is clear, even from the literature I have read over a period of years, that the attitude of organizations and writers is different today from what it was 30 or 40 years ago. We are in a changing society. This measure indicates there is a change in the public conscience on these questions and concern as to whether we have been doing the right thing by those who are unfortunate enough to commit crimes of this nature. I think to some extent the whole of society is responsible. No man is an island. We are all partly responsible for the crimes of an individual.

In my opinion, and I have thought a lot about this subject, I do not believe you can prove the arguments on one side or the other through the use of statistics. I have read the statistics very carefully and when you finish dealing with the statistics, you are pretty well on balance; you are where you started. In my opinion, this is a moral question. This is a matter of opinion on the moral question: Has the state the right to take a person's life? The members of this group believe that the state, in a Christian civilization, does not have the right to take a person's life. There are those who just as conscientiously take the opposite view.

This bill has been introduced because of the government's awareness of the growing public conscience with respect to this type of legislation. Those who support the abolition of capital punishment have a great deal of credit coming to them for creating public opinion and a public climate that has caused the government to take this progressive step. Like the hon. member for Vancouver East, I believe this a forward and progressive step. This amending legislation, makes our Criminal Code somewhat more humane. To that extent we welcome it and support it.

When reading the bill and looking through my files, Mr. Speaker, I found a copy of The Bulletin issued by the Anglican Church of Canada. I might mention the fact that I am an Anglican supposed to have Unitarian tendencies and be attracted to some aspects of pantheism. In any event, I am very much interested in what my church has to say on these questions.

Mr. Small: High or low?

Mr. Herridge: I had better explain, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to be misunderstood. I felt obliged to say that I was an Anglican. When I was a boy the Anglican church was supposed to be the Tory party at prayer. However, I want to remind hon. members that in quite recent years we have had an archbishop of Canterbury who believed in socialist principles, so we are well in the vanguard of reform nowadays.

I wanted to refer to this excellent bulletin on capital punishment. It deals with all aspects of it. The question has been given very careful consideration by a committee under the chairmanship of Rev. W. W. Judd of the council for social service of the Anglican church. I was taken with two paragraphs which I intend to read and which I think are particularly appropriate in view of the minister's decision to introduce this legislation. I read paragraph 1:

When one man deliberately murders another, the problem arises with the government and parliament as to what is to be done about it, and with him, in the interests of public safety, peace, order and good government. It is not a problem that can easily be solved simply by facts, reason, and argument.

We all realize that from the debates and discussions in this house. The paragraph continues:

Experience shows that it ultimately boils down to a question of opinion; opinion based on good understanding of all the facts and considerations, with good judgment, but involving also feeling, sentiment, and conscience.

Each person must make his decision with regard to his attitude towards this question on the basis of his own conscience.

On a later page in this copy of The Bulletin I read a reference to the Canadian Welfare Council which I thought was particularly appropriate after reading the terms of this bill:

The Canadian Welfare Council in a brief to the joint committee on the revision of the Criminal Code, makes the following policy statement, "The Canadian Welfare Council expresses approval of the abolition of the death penalty in principle, and recommends as a first step, the abolition of the mandatory death sentence." Their statement concludes with these words, "We believe that the adoption of this recommendation would lead to a gradual reduction in the use of capital punishment and provide an opportunity to note the effects on the rate of murder. We are fully confident that before too many years have passed the desired goal—complete abolition of the death penalty—would prove feasible."

I trust that the hopes of the Canadian Welfare Council as expressed in this resolution will be realized within a few years after this bill becomes law. That is why I am quite prepared to say it is a progressive step in the right direction. We support it on that basis.

One thing I regretted as did the hon. member for Vancouver East is this. I may say that although I am on the left wing of the party and he is on the right wing, we agree on a great number of questions. However, he mentioned the fact that he regretted that in the bill there was no mention of a change in the method of execution or of taking a person's life. We in this group are of the opinion that our present method is barbarous in the extreme. We regret that the bill does not include some revision or amendment of the present practice in that respect.

There is one other matter I want to mention before taking my seat, and I know I am speaking in the presence of persons learned in the law. When I look over at the other side and see the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) looking at me I am deeply conscious of my lay status, shall I say, when it comes to this type of legislation. But on occasion I have been impressed and concerned with the complete lack of knowledge of the law and of understanding of the purpose and function of juries by persons called to serve on juries. It is not their fault. I have seen called to serve on a jury men who, because of their limited experience—they maybe live in isolated places—or because of their lack of opportunity had not the foggiest idea of what the jury stood for or what its real purpose and function was in a democratic society in giving effect to the principles of justice found in our legal codes. In talking to some of these men I could see that they were persons who, without this knowledge would be easily influenced by persuasive counsel. Mind you, that is a very serious matter when a jury is considering such crimes as murder and other serious offences under the Criminal Code.

I have felt for a long time—and I mentioned this matter once before in the house some years ago—that something should be done to correct this situation. I wonder whether the Minister of Justice for Canada could give some lead in that direction to the provinces. I presume that the primary responsibility would be that of the attorneys general of the provinces. I think there should be published some form of simple manual that deals with the history of the jury system, its purpose in our society, its function and its procedures and which possibly contains some elementary instruction on the rules of evidence and how to deal with these complicated questions and provides information on the status of the jury, its importance and its prestige in our society. I have talked to men who have served as jurors on a few occasions—and I am not saying that this frequently happens—who were quite unconscious of the serious and important function they were going to perform as members of a jury considering a very serious charge. I think something should be done in that connection.

When the minister concludes this debate I wish he would give to the house his opinion on whether something can be done under his direction or at his suggestion—I do not want to suggest "under his direction" to the provinces—to the attorneys general of the provinces or possibly the matter could be discussed by the Minister of Justice with the attorneys general of the provinces when they meet. I think they have a meeting annually in connection with uniform legislation or something of that sort. Possibly the bar association could give some consideration to the matter. I know that I am floundering here, Mr. Speaker, because I am a bit out of my depth. However, I have often felt that something could be done to improve the present situation by providing a somewhat easily read simple manual along the lines I have suggested.

That is all I have to say at the present time. I intend to make a few comments when we are discussing the various clauses of the bill.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I think when the House of Commons passes the bill before us this evening the system of justice in Canada will have taken a long stride forward. In fact I believe, bearing in mind that the administration of justice is perhaps the strongest indication of the state of civilization of a nation, civilization in Canada is taking with this bill a very long step forward.

It may be that, being one of those who has put the sanctity of human life so high that I am in favour of the complete abolition of the death penalty, I am perhaps looking with too much enthusiasm on this amendment to our present rather stringent law.

However, I do feel I am completely correct when I invite all my hon. friends to look at the process of civilization and to study history down through the ages. I am sure they will find that the more civilized the nation, the fewer are the crimes for which their citizens may be put to death.

It is true that in this bill we do not say that some crimes are now out of the death penalty category, but the division we have made amounts to the same thing. I suggest that the question of whether or not the death penalty should apply in Canada involves not just a purely legalistic study of the problems involved; it is not a matter of logic, of cause and effect which can be determined with mathematical certainty. What we must do is satisfy the conscience, the feeling as well as the common sense of hon. members of this house and Canadian citizens generally.

I do suggest that a logical approach, a study of cause and effect is perhaps going to be guided most by statistics; by a good look at what has been done in other countries and what is the effect of the removal of the death penalty in those systems where it has prevailed for some considerable time and where the degree of civilization is in other respects analogous to our own.

I will not attempt this evening to give the house any breakdown or go in detail into these facts and figures. We have had in this house a very thorough discussion along these lines. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney), for instance, has given us a very inspiring address on this matter as well as the considerable benefit of his own vast experience as one of Canada's leading lawyers. Along these lines we have had the very hard work and dedicated service of sponsors of various bills, including the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee). We have been besieged, I might say, with statistics which perhaps in some instances are as much confusing as enlightening.

One thing that has impressed me above all in the arguments that have previously been heard, which we have heard repeated in the house today and which causes me considerable anxiety—I almost said "anger"—is the argument put forward by those who are in favour of the death penalty and who continue to misquote abolitionists by saying, "It is argued that the death penalty is not a deterrent".

Mr. Speaker, I have not heard such an argument in this house. I do not believe part of the argument used by any of us who believe in the abolition of the death penalty is that the death penalty is not a deterrent. We merely state that life imprisonment is also a very strong deterrent. We are not convinced that statistics show that the death penalty is any greater deterrent or that its removal and substitution by life imprisonment has caused any significant change, in so far as we can see, in the number of capital crimes.

I should therefore preface the first part of my few remarks on this subject by saying I am grateful that we have taken such a step forward in justice and in civilization as to reduce the number of crimes that we may punish with the death penalty.

I look forward to our next step, when we may give full scope to our Christian and humane feelings and realize that there should be no death penalty; that in a civilized society putting to death any member of society it is merely, to that extent, recognizing its own failure to provide sufficient guidance to that person, or failing that person to some extent.

As we find ourselves more and more civilized we must admit that we hold a greater duty to our fellow man and I hope our failure, however slight it may be, will not be reflected in taking away his life so long as we can point to one iota of guilt on our own part for his offence.

I think the bill before us today reflects two or three principles that we who have had some practice, at least, in criminal law must recognize. First, a look at those offences which have been made non-capital shows that here are those offences which have given most trouble to judges and juries. Here are listed the categories of cases where trial judges I am sure would inform us they have found, in so far as they are concerned, that the crown had proved guilt beyond reasonable doubt; it was legally necessary for a jury to bring in a verdict of guilty but the jury for some reason returned a verdict of not guilty.

I suggest that on looking over this list of cases it will be found that the jury has always failed to find that degree of moral guilt which would give them the necessary backbone, shall we say, to bring in a verdict of guilty when they knew it would result in the death penalty and when they felt the accused should not be put to death.

I think, further, that consideration of the breakdown of the bill before us now proposed by the government will show that by and large those non-capital cases cover most of those cases where the cabinet has commuted the death sentence to life imprisonment. I am not saying they will all be found there, but I do believe that taking the two considerations into effect; the unwillingness of juries and the results of consideration by cabinets over the years; practically all cases of non-conviction where there should have been conviction and commutations which have been handed down, would fall within these categories.

I suggest that perhaps we may have been one step further forward if we had given juries the right to consider each particular case a little further. Rather than leaving it to the crown to determine whether a particular case is or is not a non-capital case, perhaps we should have given the jury the right to decide this matter. If we had left upon the jury, the avenue of discretion in each case, or perhaps only in respect of those reserved capital cases, of considering the evidence brought before it, allowing it to present its own opinion regarding the capital or non-capital aspects of the case, I suggest we would have been further ahead with the jury system today.

These juries are, after all, selected from men and women of each constituency. They understand the circumstances existing in communities across the length and breadth of this country. It may be true to say that justice is rough and ready in one area while refined in another, but surely the individuals resident in those varying areas have a better appreciation of the circumstances involved, in respect of justice as it is found in those areas. I suggest that no more competent individuals will be found than the ordinary citizens of this country; the individuals who form our juries, who in turn decide whether an offence is of a capital nature against society, as society knows it.

In brief, I suggest that society, as we know it should regard a capital offence against itself not as a matter applying to the whole of Canada but, to a great extent, a matter of local application, which is familiar to those individuals who have lived, worked, played, and perhaps sinned in that locality. I cannot foresee a detraction in any way from our system of justice as the result of our stating that a different result may follow a different set of facts in different areas of this country. I suggest that we have not, as yet, invited juries to give proper and sufficient consideration to the facts presented to them.

Perhaps I may be permitted to discuss the question of capital punishment itself for a moment or two. We have relegated a certain number of crimes to that area which involves the punishment of death. I have mentioned that it is my belief and experience that many juries unwillingly acquit accused individuals of murder because of the knowledge that the death penalty will be imposed. If life imprisonment is substituted for the death penalty in cases of murder. I suggest that we will probably find many individuals inclined to acquit because the imposition of that penalty is against their belief, and may even be more repugnant to them. I know that statistics compiled by officials of various states of the United States, which have abolished capital punishment and adopted in its stead imprisonment for life as the penalty, show an increase in the incidence of capital offences. In view of this fact I am unable to understand the emphasis placed, by this present bill, on the deterrent effect of capital punishment. We have, in support of the deterrent to hardened criminals, only statistics showing an increase in the incidence of murder in those states which have retained capital punishment, while at the same time, in those areas which have actively attempted to abolish the death penalty, there has been little or no perceptible change. I am convinced that statistics will show that hardened criminals, who have been incarcerated, realize that this is the most effective form of punishment. I suggest, therefore, it is not the fear of death that has persuaded these individuals to refrain from committing murder, but perhaps the fear of life imprisonment itself.

It has been suggested that the abolishment of capital punishment in cases of murder, and the substitution therefor of life imprisonment, will increase the number of murders. Several of my laymen friends this afternoon, who are not lawyers, have suggested this possibility. I can perhaps understand their point of view, that juries should be instructed to a greater degree in respect of the application of the law regarding the imposition of capital punishment. However, I am unable to conceive of any case in Canada where the judge involved failed to make the jury fully aware of the fact that it was the jury who were judge of the facts but must accept the court's instruction as to the law.

I do not understand the reasoning behind the suggestions of some hon. members regarding extra instruction, of this type, on the part of judges to juries in the proper handling of their duties. On the contrary, I suggest that what is needed is a common sense approach, so that the facts may be brought before the jury made up of ordinary citizens of this country who hold the lives of men in their hands.

Most of us in this house are aware that these individuals often hold our political lives in their hands yet find, when we are victorious, that we can trust their judgment. If we find we cannot trust their judgment regarding right and wrong, surely we should abolish the jury system completely. If we find we are unable to trust these individual citizens of Canada to that extent, surely we cannot trust democracy itself. My suggestion regarding instructions to juries in respect of that category of crime involving capital and non-capital offences involves the principle that if a jury is capable of electing a man who will partake in the making of laws, surely it is capable of understanding how to administer them. When we are only capable of putting our thoughts into words which we hope will embrace the broad general situation, and on which they must vote to elect their members surely those voters acting as jurymen are capable of deciding whether or not a particular set of circumstances falls within the principles embodied in the law.

I should like to conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by reassuring the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) that I am entirely in favour of the amendments embodied in this bill, although I must say, as a lawyer, that as a result of the passage of this legislation I anticipate more convictions than have taken place to date, perhaps as a result of the fact that juries may no longer be reluctant to convict because of the knowledge that the death penalty is inevitable. I do believe, however, that justice will be better served under this law than heretofore. I believe there will be fewer lawyers who will see their clients hanged while entertaining lingering and serious doubts as to their guilt.

Perhaps hon. members will forgive me if I make reference to a particular case, and I hope the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney) will overlook my mentioning his name in saying that he, as a prominent lawyer, will have reason to support me in this suggestion. Recently there was the Coffin case and in the province of Alberta the Cook case; I feel I am safe in saying that defence counsel was in doubt as to the guilt of the accused in these cases, although they were both hanged. It is not necessary for a lawyer to believe in the innocence of the accused or even to have serious doubts about his guilt. However, individuals have been hanged while outstanding barristers have had reservations as to their guilt, and this fact alone should weigh heavily on the conscience of us all. It is, of course, only right to say that we all have great confidence in our system of justice, but it is very callous to say that we are perfectly willing to place our trust, in respect of the guilt of individuals, in our own infallibility.

This is what has happened. Hon. members know eminent counsel who have serious doubts about the guilt of people who have been hanged. I hope hon. members will understand that I am happy to know that we will have fewer hangings, and hon. members will also understand why I look forward to the day when we shall have none.

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise to place before the house my few remarks concerning what I consider a most important social problem. I refer to the abolition in some form of capital punishment in this country. It is my intention to be brief. I should like to pay tribute to those hon. members who in the course of this debate, as well as in similar debates in the past, have expressed important opinions on this matter. On this issue of capital punishment, and possibly on other major issues which have been discussed by the citizens of this country I must say that in spite of all that has been said in this house I have not materially changed my opinion on the matter. The history of the study of capital punishment in the world and of its abolition in certain countries is a long one and I must say a confusing one. Especially is this so if one were to use the study to make up one's mind as to what should be done in this respect in our country.

I do not find that in the month of May, 1961, the problem of capital punishment is an urgent national problem. I say to the Minister of Justice that we may find the consequences of this legislation important but I do not find that a bill of this kind is occupying the minds of the Canadian people to any great extent. If the business of the house permits it and if time is set aside to discuss this legislation, then I am prepared and most anxious to express my views on the matter.

Since this matter was brought up indirectly by the endeavours of and the promotion given to the problem by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) in presenting his private bill, and also by similar bills which have appeared on the order paper, we have received many memoirs. The efforts of the hon. member and others have undoubtedly prompted Canadian citizens, organizations and especially churches—I appreciate their contribution very much—to forward their views and memoirs and to express opinions on the matter.

I am not speaking for members on the government side of the house; I speak with a free mind and what I say is my own opinion. However, I accept the responsibility of representing the many thousands of people of my riding of Nickel Belt, and I feel that hon. members in making their decisions must take into consideration the opinions, the wishes and the standard of life of Canadian citizens as a whole, and especially that standard which they would like to see implemented in Canada. In coming to the opinions which I am about to express I felt it was necessary to pay as much attention as possible to public opinion on this matter. I will not give statistics to which many hon. members have made reference; they are not always helpful. I will save much of the time of the house by not referring to the many documents which we have and which relate to this matter. However, I should like to emphasize that in speaking about statistics one thing must be kept in mind. Most of them pertain to the deterrent aspects of capital punishment.

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, as I view those tables and cumulative figures, they mean very little to me because the statistics which we would like to have on this problem of deterrents are not available. In other words, I refer to the punishment which deters the commission of a crime. This deterrent is based primarily on the fact that the crime will not be committed. Therefore, throughout history there has been no way of knowing of the possible cases of murder which may have been prevented owing to the punishment which was attached to the commission of the crime. We find differences in statistics over the decades. We can make a study and in some way we can find a relation to world problems, and to wars which have occurred from time to time, connected with the commission of the crime of murder. But in no instance can one prove through statistics that the punishment has or has not minimized the commission of the offence.

I am of the opinion, as I have looked into this matter, that surely there must be a way of doing away with certain anomalies in the Canadian Criminal Code today. I would like to ascertain whether our courts are equipped to deal with this problem. As it is today, practically every case is brought to a final conclusion by the cabinet of this country.

I believe the Canadian people feel that there are types of crimes for which such a severe punishment as hanging is not absolutely warranted. Therefore, I would be prepared to approve of and support the general principles of this bill. However, Mr. Speaker, I have certain reservations as to how these principles can be implemented. I shall avail myself of the opportunity of discussing detailed problems concerning the bill when we are in committee of the whole.

On the whole this bill enunciates two principles. First, it distinguishes between the more culpable types of homicide which would require capital punishment and other types which would not. In this sense it does away with the problem with which our courts were faced in the past, namely in all cases to make a straightforward decision. As one discussed this matter with juries and judges in the past, one came to the conclusion that this position did not satisfy men placed in authority who were required to pass judgment in cases involving a sentence of capital punishment. Therefore I feel that the bill brings about this distinction as a major principle and gives to the crown and the courts the opportunity—I do not like to use the word "elasticity" in this instance—to use judgment in distinguishing the gravity of the offence of murder committed.

I realize that we are being asked to bring about a change in the way we will from now on punish those guilty of this most grave offence. There are only 265 members of the House of Commons and on behalf of the 18 million people of Canada we will make that decision. It is thus that parliament operates and undoubtedly, as with other difficult problems, the house must make this decision for itself and for the people.

In discussing this matter I should like to indicate how much I appreciate the documents that have been forwarded to me by many people. As the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) did a moment ago, I should like to express my appreciation of the most complete memorandum forwarded to members of parliament by the Anglican Church of Canada. It is a most detailed report and it indicates how the council of that church divided on the question. If I recall the figures correctly, 58 voted in favour of the abolition of capital punishment and 40 were opposed. Undoubtedly the result of the vote was forwarded to us to give members of parliament the most detailed information as to the decision of that group.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I had also the opportunity to read some French literature on that subject, and I should like to read to the house a bulletin from the Roman Catholic church of Canada, released at the time this subject was being discussed here.

I saw in Le Droit for Thursday, February 18, 1960, the following official statement from the Canadian Catholic Conference. That statement was published on the front page of the newspaper, and I should like to read an important paragraph which sums up the views of that group:

> In a bulletin published Wednesday, the Canadian Catholic Conference stated that the traditional teaching of the church is that the state has the right to impose the death penalty.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, the article does not go into details, nor does it give an opinion on the matter which awaits now and awaited then a decision from the government. Nevertheless, the article explained the general attitude of that institution toward the problem which is being discussed.

(Text):

Before I finish I must state that for a long time I have felt that too many sentences have been commuted as a result of appeals to the cabinet. I should like to refer to a graph appearing in a Canadian Press article in Le Droit of Monday, March 28, 1960. From reading the article I presume it was published because of the debate that had taken place in the House of Commons having to do with the punishment of murder in Canada. The graph outlines the number of murders and commutations of sentences in Canada in the period from 1930 up to and including 1959. Possibly because of the situation immediately after the war in Canada the number of murders, as a layman like myself can plainly see, increased greatly beginning around 1945 while at the same time commutations of sentences also increased. As we reach the year 1959 we see from the graph that the two lines representing murders and commutations are widely spread apart whereas in 1930 they were very close to one another.

In supporting the bill I must say, having in mind all the opinions expressed, that it is my honest belief that justice must be applied equitably having regard to all the circumstances. I am not too sure that the bill provides the complete remedy for that problem. That matter will undoubtedly be discussed in committee. However, I do think that the bill does make an effort to accomplish this end.

I recall that when I was at school I learned a principle that I appreciated very much. It was a Latin phrase I learned from my teacher, "In medio stat virtus", which means that the middle course is possibly the one nearest to what is right. Having regard to our Canadian way of life today, we believe that a remedy should be sought, but I am not one of those who would like to see capital punishment disappear altogether. Inasmuch as this matter was brought before parliament by a private member, I find it odd that the government, in this year in which it was going to solve so many economic problems, has brought before the house a bill which undoubtedly reflects the opinion of members who have spoken.

I cannot bring myself to believe in the complete abolishment of capital punishment. The letters I have received from many citizens indicate to me that the people of Canada are still prepared to distinguish between the man who follows the law and the man who disobeys the law. There must be that distinction, particularly when it is a case of taking someone's life by murder. The Canadian way of life is not that of a soft society in which people are tempted to say that although a man has not conducted himself properly other forces are to blame and therefore no distinction should be made between him and the person who follows the rules and regulations of society in every way. Therefore I am absolutely opposed at this time to the complete abolishment of capital punishment. I cannot perceive what may be the Canadian way of life in the future and the outlook on capital punishment. It may be that 50 years from now our society will have become very soft and may not think such punishment to be practical. As I know our Canadian way of life today, I feel sure our society is a strong one and not a soft one. It is not one which is prepared to do away with severity in distinguishing between those citizens who follow the rules and those who disobey them.

I am pleased to support the proposed bill which brings about certain required changes in those sections of our Criminal Code which deal with murder and capital punishment. As I have said, I am prepared to support the bill, and I trust that hon. members will give us more information on this subject as they speak tonight. I must say, too that although at the outset of my remarks I said I had listened to debates on this subject for the last few years and had not changed my position materially, I must state that this is not the result of any lack of desire to see the other person's point of view. I shall be pleased to continue to listen to the arguments advanced by other hon. members and I shall keep an open mind on the subject. If it is possible to change my opinion, I will certainly change it.

Mr. Arthur Maloney (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I will only say a few words because I know there are other hon. members who are anxious to speak on this important piece of legislation. As I participate in the debate tonight, I cannot help but call to mind the arguments advanced in this house on February 18 and February 25, 1960, when we debated the bill so eloquently and so skilfully presented at that time by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee). I recall very well the excellence of his argument and the excellence of the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) who spoke in support of it. I recall, too, the excellence of the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) who spoke against it. I remember the ardour and the emotions that those speeches and the other speeches evoked in the persons who participated in the debate.

I feel that the debate that is taking place today is the culmination of a long effort by the pioneers in this field, of many distinguished members of this house, including Mr. Thatcher, the member for Vancouver East and the member for York-Scarborough. I feel that in this piece of legislation the government has very sensibly and very carefully incorporated what was obviously the thinking of the public as expressed in the debate at that time by the various members of parliament who participated in it.

This is really, in my opinion, a very historic day in Canada. I recall that on the occasion of the debate in February, 1960, the attendance in the house was good and I particularly recall how crowded were the galleries as the citizens of Canada listened so intently to the speeches that were given then. Today is really an historic day. I regret that more members of the public are not here to share in its importance. I think we have reached a real milestone. The administration of justice in Canada has been advanced today by the presentation of this bill in a way that is of far-reaching importance.

I want to extend my congratulations to the government, particularly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and to the Solicitor General (Mr. Browne), because after all those are the members of the government primarily responsible for the subject matter of this bill and for the way in which this matter has been brought before parliament. I will not forget in a long time the magnificent speech that was given this morning by the Minister of Justice. It will go down in the history of this country as one of the really important contributions to parliamentary debate in Canada. I am sure he must feel proud to know that in his capacity as Minister of Justice he has occupied the position of presenting a bill of such great importance in the history of our country, a bill which is imaginative and realistic.

This measure is not, as some members have said, an important step in the right direction or a first step in the right direction. I was looking last night for a means of describing how important an advance it is in the development of our criminal law. At that time I had the pleasure of meeting the well known and popular young columnist from the Ottawa Journal, Timothy Burke. I told him what was going through my mind. I told him I thought this was far more important than a first step, and I should like to find language that would be adequate to describe how important an advance in our criminal law it was. He told me the expression for which I was groping was that it was a seven league stride. This is indeed what it is. This is far more than just a first step in the advancement of criminal law in Canada.

There were some members who participated in the debate so far who expressed some doubt about the degree of support the measure would receive from various elements in the country. Speaking on behalf, I think I can say without any hesitation, of the entire bar of Canada in the practice of criminal law on the defence side, I think I can assure the government that the bill would receive their universal support. I think that the members of the bar who practise in that area of the criminal law express views that are entitled to the respect and consideration of this house.

There are those who will find it difficult to reconcile the fact that somebody like myself and the hon. member for York-Scarborough, who have expressed such strong views and have advocated so long the abolition of the death penalty, could now support this measure. I do not unsay a single word I have uttered in that respect over the years. Nor do I recall a single syllable that I spoke in this house on February 18, 1960. I firmly believe that the death penalty is absolutely useless and that it has no more deterrent effect than a sentence to life imprisonment would have. On the other hand, I have always felt, and particularly so since the debate took place in February, 1960, that abolition lacked that basic public support which is required if laws of abolition are to be successful. There is no law that is more peculiarly required to have public support than a law abolishing the penalty of death. I believe in abolition, but I believe it must be effective abolition and it cannot be effective abolition without the support of the public, and of a great majority of the public.

I recall that last summer, I think it was late in June, there was an outbreak of capital crime in the city of Montreal. As I recall it, there were some 11 murders in approximately eight or nine days. I often thought to myself that if the bill presented by the hon. member for York-Scarborough had ever become law, every one of those crimes would have been attributed to the new law of abolition and we would now be confronted with a campaign to restore the death penalty. If the death penalty is to be effectively abolished, therefore, there must be public support. It is not sufficient to appeal to the government to bring about abolition. What the people who favour abolition, who sincerely believe in the wisdom of abolition, have to do is to create in the public an awareness of the futility of the penalty of death. Public support is an essential element of abolition.

What impresses me so much about the present legislation is the transfer to the jury of the obligation to decide whether or not an individual should be sentenced to death. As someone who has practised in the criminal courts for some 17 or 18 years now, I may say that my confidence in the jury system, my confidence in the integrity of the jurors, my confidence in their ability to somehow or other ultimately arrive at the right result in every case that comes before them increases day by day. I have faith that when they, as the representatives of society, are confronted with the issue of deciding whether or not the sentence of death should be passed, they will somehow or other arrive at the right decision. Of that I am sure. There are those who say—and I agree with them—that the new law will greatly reduce the number of occasions when individuals charged with murder will be convicted of capital murder; that is under the new law. Of that there can be no doubt, and that is exactly as it should be.

I was particularly pleased to see that, even in cases of murder where there has been a conviction, before sentence of death is passed the jury will be asked whether it is their desire to recommend clemency. That is a very forward step. That matter created a good deal of injustice I always found in the past. There were many juries who did not realize that they had any right to make such a recommendation or that there was any custom that would permit them to make any recommendation of mercy. However, I always felt that in these capital cases there were many juries in the past who would have recommended mercy had they been aware of the fact that it was within their province so to do.

This legislation will lend some standardization to that procedure in the future. In the past certain inferences were drawn from the failure of a jury to recommend mercy; and often juries which refrained from doing so, as I have indicated, did so because they were unaware of their right so to do or of the fact that a practice had grown up permitting them so to do if they so wished.

One feature of that aspect of the new bill which causes me a little bit of concern, and which I perhaps could mention more appropriately at the committee stage, is whether or not a majority recommendation from the jury with respect to clemency would be accepted. It occurs to me that perhaps not only should a recommendation of mercy be permitted by the entire jury but that if any member of the jury or any part of the jury desires to make such a recommendation it should, under the authority of that section, be forwarded to the Minister of Justice.

I am also very glad to note that under the new bill there is no interference with the present power of commutation and that there is no curtailment of the right of the governor in council to review every capital case in which the sentence of death has been passed. That is a power that should never be given up. I have in mind at the moment particularly the cases of individuals who are at present under sentence of death in Canada. I do not know how many there are; I imagine there are some 10, 11, or 12. It strikes me—and I say this with the greatest possible respect—that the government should consider the advisability of commuting every one of those sentences. It seems to me that under the present state of the law, or at least under the state of the law as it will be when this bill is enacted—as I so much hope and expect it will be enacted—a jury will be asked whether or not it will recommend clemency. It seems to me that the government, in reviewing the sentences of those who are at present under sentence of death, would be required to ask itself this question: What would the jury have done in the case now before us had this provision of the law been effective before today? There being some doubts as to what the answer of the jury might have been had that question been presented to them in such cases, it seems to me that very careful consideration should be given to the advisability of commuting every one of those sentences of death which have been imposed and which have not yet been carried out as of today.

Also, in the case of killings that result in the course of the commission of a felony, I should like to see either some consideration given to an amendment to the present bill or careful and discreet use of the power of commutation in order to make sure that the capital penalty is not exacted in any case in which death resulted, even in the course of the commission of a felony, in circumstances that were accidental. That situation is not uncommon. The Rowe case in London, Ontario, a few years ago is an illustration of a death which resulted in the course of the commission of a felony but which was committed in circumstances that were unintentional and accidental. I should like some thought also to be given to the applicability of the sentence of death to accidental killing perpetrated, even though it may have been in the course of the commission of one of the felonies enumerated in what is now section 202 of the Criminal Code.

I was very much impressed to see the appeal procedures that are provided under the new bill. There is an automatic right of appeal to the court of appeal of the province. This does not represent much change from the present practice. However, the present bill greatly enlarges the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada. It gives that court jurisdiction to review something that it never has the right to review up until now. I refer to issues of fact in a case of this sort. Up until now the Supreme Court of Canada had jurisdiction only where a question of law was involved in respect of which that court had given leave or in respect of which there had been a dissent in the provincial appeal court whose decision was under review. This additional safeguard I think is further evidence of the desire of the government to see to it that, before any human life is exacted, no safeguard be overlooked.

The present law is a great improvement on the present English law which makes distinctions that have been absolutely unworkable. For example, it is capital offence in England to kill your victim by shooting, but it is not a capital offence if you were to kill him by some slow process of torture that would not amount to shooting. The law in England has proved to be unworkable. The law presented by the government today has avoided any of the unworkable features of the law at present applicable there.

I was hopeful that this debate would proceed in a way that would be non-political. It has been characteristic of this house and of every legislature of the commonwealth, to the best of my knowledge, that debate on the subject of the penalty of death and other related subjects should avoid the characteristic of political controversy. By and large, I think that we have suceeded so far today in the house in following the same pattern. One or two of us have overstepped the line a bit, in my opinion, but I should like to think that hon. members who speak from now on will, regardless of their political affiliations, approach this bill with that non-political outlook that I think it requires if it is to be effectively discussed and voted upon in this house.

I conclude then by saying that I admire the government for the courage it has shown in what it has done and for the excellence of the legislation it has presented and that I look forward to the day when the public of Canada, schooled in the needlessness of the penalty of death, will agree some day there should be presented a bill that will bring about its complete abolition.

(Translation):

Mr. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, before I start my speech, I should like to offer my most hearty congratulations to the previous speaker. Indeed, I am sure that the house had long been waiting to hear that learned speech which revealed the ability and skill my colleague has naturally acquired during his professional practice before the courts where he devotes his energy and talents to the defence of criminals. I wish to tell him how I appreciate his contribution to this debate.

During the debate on capital punishment last year, I had occasion to state my feelings on the necessity of a bill to abolish capital punishment and I mentioned various psychological, legal and sociological considerations in support of my argument.

I stated at the time, that in trying to set aside all possible motives for the retention of capital punishment, one should not ignore the miscarriages of justice which are always possible under our judicial system. If society has the right to punish criminals, it also has the duty of rehabilitating them and of playing to the fullest extent this long established humanitarian role.

I am glad that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) is bringing in today various amendments to section 202A of the Criminal Code to give a more adequate definition of the various degrees of guilt on the part of those who are accused of murder. In my opinion, such a definition comes at a most opportune time, when the people of Canada have been following with great interest the debates held here last year on this crucial matter. I feel that the public has given so much thought to this matter over the last few years, that, today, people from all corners of Canada look to our legislators for definite leadership with respect to that most important problem.

How many people who have been brought before the courts, could have benefited by the interpretation of section 202A as it is amended today if the judge had been free to explain to the jurors the various degrees of homicide?

In my opinion, the definition of capital and non-capital murder is well timed. How often in the past have we experienced difficulty when we tried to obtain from a judge an adequate definition in order that the criminal intent of the individual indicted of non-capital murder be determined. The definition which the minister was kind enough to explain to us this morning is consistent, I think, with the continued evolution of our court jurisprudence on such a vital matter.

Some judges have in the past attempted to show jurymen that there was an important difference between the responsibility of a person committing murder under emotional impulse or extreme anger, and that of the person who has coldly deliberately arranged all the actions leading to murder. By giving this definition of capital and non-capital murder, the Minister of Justice indicated clearly an evolution of our jurisprudence which could greatly contribute to prevent misinterpretation of the actions of the man who has to answer before his peers for a charge of murder. The step taken by the government today deserves commendation because, as I say, it shows courage.

It is good that, at times, our system of justice be revised so as to clearly define the intentions of those responsible for giving our courts principles defining the whole subject of human existence and individual freedom. It was suggested this morning that the new definition of murder would place a tremendous responsibility upon the jury. Is it necessary to remind hon. members that, in the context of our present judicial system, the jury is master of the facts and must return its verdict according to the evidence before the court. The jury has always had the advantage of receiving charges from the judge not only in matters of complex legal details, but of interpretation of facts, as indicated in our jurisprudence.

Briefly, let us say that from the evidence he can bring out certain important points in the evidence and ask the jury to consider them attentively before reaching a verdict. This specific definition of capital and non-capital murder will dispense the trial judge of having to elaborate a definition so as to differentiate between manslaughter and murder.

The bill which was submitted today will ease the task of our judges and definitely confirm our jurisprudence on this very important matter.

The member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont suggested this morning that all jury decisions on homicide ought to be reviewed by three judges. I refer him to section 8 which says:

> In every case where the death penalty has been imposed, on any ground of law or fact or mixed law and fact, an appeal against this sentence is granted the accused.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that this is a satisfactory answer to the suggestion made by my hon. friend that the sentence of the jury should be revised by three judges, if, as provided by the amendments now introduced, automatic appeal is available to the accused, in such a way that the sentence be revised by judges of the appeal court on the grounds of fact as well as law.

It was mentioned this morning that women should be exempted from capital punishment. I would agree in the case of non-capital murder, but not in the case of capital murder, because such an exemption would allow certain accomplices to use women to commit the crimes they are contemplating, since women would be exempted from hanging even for capital murder. I would also have liked to see the bill now before us authorize the crown to subject every individual accused of qualified murder to a medical examination, because psychoanalysis tends more and more to prove that criminals are mostly unbalanced people who, when they commit a crime, are unable to give their full consent to their act. We know that there must be, in our country, an element of proof when we decide to have an indicted person acquitted on the ground of mental illness. It must obviously be proved that at the moment of the crime, the accused was not sufficiently in possession of his mental faculties to determine the gravity of his action and be responsible for it. Now we know, Mr. Speaker, that psychiatrists will try to determine, by means of deduction and thanks to an examination of the accused after the crime, that the said individual was mentally not fully responsible when committing the crime, so as to be able to determine that his action might constitute a criminal offence, i.e. the mens rea and the actus reus. I therefore believe that the crown should be first of all asked to subject all persons accused of murder to a serious medical examination.

Like the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, I am opposed to the system of hanging which still prevails in this country. To my mind, it is obsolete and repulsive. It is time, Mr. Speaker, to change that primitive method for the electric chair or the gas chamber, and I hope that the minister will be able to tell us in committee whether the government would consider changing a method of execution which is objectionable to whoever has even the slightest notion of humanity.

I am therefore happy, Mr. Speaker, to support the bill before us. This is a necessary evolution of our legal system and I trust that the years will prove the government right, because I think that the consequences of this legislation will help those who are responsible for the administration of law give the indicted criminal every possible guarantee of a fair trial, and protect him as much as possible against all prejudicial contingencies.

(Text):

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, before offering my congratulations to the minister on the measure he has placed before the house I should like to thank him and other hon. members for their very generous references to the measure I placed before this house last year.

When introducing his bill today the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), as other hon. members have noted, gave a fascinating and comprehensive review of the background and the movement over the years toward the abolition of capital punishment in this country, the United Kingdom and the United States. The minister was being unduly modest when he stated that he had sought to avoid the kind of result occurring from many of the decisions that have been made. There are references to that position in the homicide act of 1957 in England. This measure, which the minister has brought forward, is far more intelligent and far more difficult to assail from a political point of view. He has avoided many of the pitfalls in this bill.

When I placed before this house my bill on the abolishment of capital punishment I advanced five arguments in support of it. Of course, the first was the proposition that capital punishment is not and cannot be demonstrated to be a unique deterrent. Accompanying that proposition was evidence which shows that many countries and jurisdictions have found an acceptable alternative, the deterrent of life imprisonment. This bill, as proposed, does not refer to that proposition except in respect of the realm of public opinion, in respect of which I will speak in a little more detail later.

The question of morality in regard to capital punishment has been discussed, particularly that aspect of capital punishment which involves the degeneration and demoralization of all those individuals who are directly or indirectly connected with it. There is, of course, the record of the curious reverse effect of justice, in that juries have increasingly been reluctant to bring in verdicts which might result in the hanging of an individual. I feel this situation will be substantially corrected by measures contained in this bill, and in this respect, I congratulate the minister.

The most obvious objection to capital punishment is the irrevocable result. I will not reiterate, at this time, my statements in respect of this factor, but will only point out the additional safeguards contained in this bill, which will reduce the possibility of an unfortunate yet conceivable error in hanging an innocent man.

This proposed bill includes reference to the age limit at which an accused and convicted murderer can be hanged. It is one aspect which I feel is very acceptable, and which has been anticipated by many hon. members. This will remove the possibility of a situation existing where a judge would be required to sentence a 14 or 15 year old child to be hanged, when everyone, with the exception perhaps of the child, would be aware that the sentence would not be carried out.

There has also been considerable discussion regarding methods of execution; whether an individual should be hanged, electrocuted or put to death in the gas chamber, and whether the recommendations of the joint committee should have been incorporated in this bill. In this regard I mentioned in a speech made earlier this session that the method of execution is somewhat aside from the issue involved. I would suggest those individuals who favour the retention of the death penalty as a deterrent are somewhat inconsistent. They feel the death penalty should have menacing overtones. If that adds to the deterrent, then surely they must be in favour of hanging convicted individuals.

An aspect of this subject which I hoped would be dealt with in this bill has regard to the question of insanity. In that area, I suggest, there is much left to be desired. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) put forward a suggestion in which I think there is merit. I would follow his suggestion that perhaps a partial solution to the problem would be the embodiment of a principle of Scottish law regarding the diminished mental responsibility in respect of some murderers.

As one who is untutored in the law, I feel it would be relatively simple to add a clause defining non-capital murder to include those cases where evidence of diminished mental responsibility is apparent. I should be grateful to other hon. members in the medical and legal professions, more learned than I, for assistance and guidance in this connection.

To return to the question of public opinion, the minister made reference to the fact that in 1947, and again in 1950 the Canadian institute of public opinion made two inquiries with almost identical results, in that 68 per cent were in favour of retaining capital punishment, and 23 per cent were in favour of life imprisonment. I pointed out earlier in this session that a more recent poll was conducted last year, and I feel the results of that poll should form part of the record of this debate. The results of that Gallup poll are; 51 per cent in favour of the retention of capital punishment, 41 per cent in favour of abolition of capital punishment, with 8 per cent of no opinion.

The matter of deterrence was dealt with by the minister. He made reference to the Gowers royal commission held in England. The minister's statement in respect to this commission had reference to the fact that no statistics existed concerning the number of murders which are not committed. This same point was raised during debate last year, as well as this year. Sir Ernest Gowers, following his chairmanship of that royal commission, wrote a book from which I have quoted during earlier debates. His book indicated that at the beginning of that commission's hearings he was a retentionist, but at the end of the hearings he was an abolitionist. I feel the epilogue to that book has relevance to the statement made by the minister, and I should like to quote a portion of it. The portion in which I am interested, and which I feel has relevance, reads as follows:

> There remains the argument that without the uniquely deterrent value of capital punishment more murders would be committed. This is the only serious utilitarian argument in favour of capital punishment, and the one on which throughtful supporters of it almost wholly rely. It is also the argument that can be put most readily to the test of evidence in the proper sense of the word; and, as we have seen, such evidence as there is goes to show that the abolition of capital punishment does not in fact have this result.

The minister's statement in support of retention of the death penalty as such, was something less than an argument to that effect, and leans, I notice, very heavily on the matter of public opinion. This is, of course, as it should be. This reference occurred on a number of occasions. The minister suggested that the bill should broadly reflect and support public opinion. He goes on later to say:

> We have taken account of the fact that the country, as reflected in the house, favours retention of capital punishment.

That certainly is so. Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) said that a free vote on the question of abolition or no abolition was required to test public opinion both in the country and in the house. With the greatest respect for the hon. member who supported my bill last year, I would suggest to him that he at that time, or even now, should have made an individual sampling of this house, as I have done, not only in analysing the debates but in discussing the matter with private members, and he would have found beyond any shadow of doubt whatsoever that a bill such as the one I proposed last year would be defeated and decisively so. It would be putting one's head in the sand to think that an alternative result would be obtained.

The minister went on to say:

> —and have produced a bill which represents our views of what is the kind of law by which Canadians would wish to be and should be governed.

A later reference reads as follows:

> In our view, Canadians properly attach so high a value to the sanctity of human life, that the law which translates this feeling into effective form should provide the maximum sanction for its deliberate breach, and no other penalty would be considered adequate.

Again the reference to the public view. Then, later, in the next paragraph we find this:

> —this bill reflects the view that Canadians are not prepared to accept the abolition of the death penalty.

There is at least one more reference to the public in the concluding remarks of the minister where he said:

> We submit this bill, then, Mr. Speaker, in the belief that the protection of society demands that one who deliberately commits murder should be liable to the death penalty, and that this reflects the views and demands of Canadian society.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, with the point very tellingly made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney) that it would be folly now to move considerably ahead of public opinion in this matter and bring down a bill which would abolish capital punishment only to have an aroused and disturbed public opinion force the restoration that other members have suggested. In such an eventuality the cause of ultimate abolition would be set back at least 25 years.

As I have said, the minister, having properly emphasized the essential ingredient and importance of public opinion in this matter, must certainly appreciate the degree to which public opinion has altered in this regard. In the figures he mentioned the abolitionist group in Canada stood at 23 per cent a relatively few years ago. Last year that figure had risen to 41 per cent, and there is little doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that ultimately this opinion, which has grown substantially in the last few years, will continue to grow and will pass into the majority opinion suggested a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Parkdale. I will, and I know this is true of every abolitionist, do everything I can to hasten the arrival of that day. I would hope also that the careful and repeated reference to public opinion on the part of the minister in presenting this bill will also be repeated when public opinion favours abolition, as I am certain it will do.

Last year the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) made this statement in the concluding part of his remarks:

> Let me emphasize one truth: Vox populi, vox Dei. The voice of the people is the voice of God. If you want to know what God thinks, ask the people and you will know.

I think that when the people are asked in a relatively few years what their opinions and views are, there will be a decisive reply to the effect that capital punishment should be abolished. Many hon. members who have participated in the past and at the present time in the drive to abolish capital punishment have described this bill as a milestone and an important step forward. It has been described also, Mr. Speaker, as a measure which tempers justice with mercy, and mercy with common sense. It will, I know, receive the support of all hon. members in this house ultimately interested in the abolition of the death penalty, and it will serve as an example in the political history of our country of an outstanding case where effective government leadership has led toward an essential ultimate goal.

(Translation):

Mr. Remi Paul (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere): Mr. Speaker, last year the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) sponsored a bill which captivated public opinion at the time. After two days of debate, a considerable number of members stood up against the abolition of capital punishment while a lesser number stated their support of such a move. I think that all those who had the opportunity of expressing their views last year were inspired by a common spirit, a sincere wish to improve the situation according to the people's desires. I took part in that debate and I expressed my opposition to the bill sponsored by the hon. member for York-Scarborough. My reason for taking that stand was to protest against the freedom which the bill was going to give to the most hardened criminals, the most repulsive killers while, on the other hand, I was in favour of any legislation which would show true humanitarian sympathy to anyone who, in a moment of mental weakness, would have committed a murder.

Even though they took opposite stands, I think everyone aimed at the same thing, that is to bring the people of Canada to express their opinion on a problem on which parliament's attention has been focussed for forty years. The only difference between the two groups was the means they were suggesting to achieve that end.

Indeed, if one takes a retrospective glance at the various bills which were introduced in this house, one will see that as far back as in 1912, the hon. member for Montreal-St. James, Mr. Wilde, moved that capital punishment be abolished. I suppose that idea had not yet made its way or perhaps events were not as favourable then as they are today with respect to the amendment now introduced by the minister. Be that as it may, I feel it is every member's duty to congratulate the minister on the bill he is introducing for our consideration today.

However, even though I do not wish to play politics with this matter, I think that each and everyone of us should explain this legislation and publicize the excellent speech the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) made in the house, this morning. In my opinion, this question of the abolition of capital punishment is far too important for us to make a political football out of it to achieve personal ambitions or popularity when human lives are at stake. If, on the one hand, the state considers the fate of the murderer who must pay a debt to society for the crime he has committed, on the other hand society must also consider the needs of those who are deeply affected by the passing of the human being whom the murderer has just killed.

I think this bill is timely, because it constitutes a link between two schools of thought which are looking forward for an improvement which modern times, the evolution of thought and systems demand and which has become imperative.

As far as I am concerned, I shall support the bill because I think, in my humble opinion, it corresponds to the feelings I expressed last year when I took position against the bill introduced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, because I wanted, so to speak, to have truth strike a middle course.

However, in considering the bill closely, I note some interpretations which I think doubtful. I may be wrong, but on the other hand, after a serious reading of the various sections of this bill, a question comes to my mind which I shall put to the minister.

The explanatory notes opposite section 1 indicate that the definition itself of murder remains unchanged. When we read the definition of a culpable homicide in section 201, paragraph (a), subparagraph (ii), we find that:

Culpable homicide is murder
(a) where the person who causes the death of a human being
(ii) means to cause him bodily harm.

Now, if you read the exact wording of section 202A, you see that the difference between a capital and a non-capital murder is based on the intention of the person who commits the crime. What is the possible distinction between the actual definition of the murder and the definition to be found in section 202A, subsection (2)?

I wonder whether the Minister of Justice, when the bill is considered in detail, could not define more accurately the wording of the bill by adding, for instance, the following words: Murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, where it is—and perhaps it could be mentioned—arranged, decided, planned and deliberate. That way, there would be no doubt as to the category of the murder.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. The distinction between murder and capital murder is, of course, an important principle of the bill, but when the hon. member referred to clarification in committee I think he was quite right that the details of distinction and definition might better be left to the committee stage.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul: I endorse your remarks, Mr. Speaker, but on the other hand, I feel that during the discussion of this bill, we must point out matters which, in our opinion, are significant in order that this legislation which is extremely important and has been discussed for several years, might achieve as fully as possible the purpose for which it was designed.

For instance, under the amendment to this act, a person committing a capital murder will now be liable to imprisonment for life.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) wondered this morning whether life imprisonment really means for life.

The bill also provides that a murderer under 18 would be exempt from a capital murder charge. As for me, by reason of the evolution of our young people today, and of the many crimes committed by juvenile delinquents, I wonder whether that age limit should not be brought down to 16 or 17.

Nevertheless, I heartily endorse the bill in its present wording, but it might be wise to consider the advisibility of reducing the age of 18 years to that of 16 or 17.

In order to ensure that the law will be properly applied, I also wonder if the attorney general and the crown attorneys should not automatically lay a charge of capital murder when it is proven at the hearing that the crime, by the way it has been prepared and perpetrated, would justify such a charge. When such a charge has not been laid, the accused would have committed a capital murder but would not have been charged accordingly, for then it would not be anymore a specific crime.

The act, as it is submitted to the house, protects any person accused of murder, in order that only genuine murderers be hanged; when the murder has not been premeditated or is accidental, the penalty is life imprisonment.

Under 13, the trial judge may ask the jury if it wishes to recommend the murderer to the clemency of the court. I think this clause places the jury in a difficult position. Anyone who has some experience of murder trials knows very well what a strain it is for those who have to try one of their fellow men. After being shut in and kept apart from the others for three, four, five and sometimes ten days, their nerves are shattered and it is with much difficulty that they return a verdict which up to now involved, in most cases at least, capital punishment.

Then, before passing sentence, many a time before the relatives and the friends of the accused, the judge would ask the jury: Do you wish to recommend the murderer to the mercy of the court? If so, I shall report accordingly to the Minister of Justice.

Not a single juryman would have the courage to oppose mercy towards the murderer, and either through fear or embarrassment, the judge's request will be granted. Would it not be easier for members of the jury when the presiding judge is addressing them to be enlightened on the advisability of returning a verdict which might include certain considerations for clemency.

Therefore, this recommendation of mercy that the jury would have to make to the court in favour of the accused would have been carefully considered and decided upon under more human and less embarrassing circumstances than those that a jury will be faced with after having convicted an accused of capital murder.

They should normally object to mercy, by refusing to reply on behalf of the accused to the question that the judge presiding over the hearing would put to them.

I respectfully submit that such procedure puts the jury in a difficult position, and I wonder whether charges along those lines made to a jury before it retires to consider its verdict would not afford all murderers the same advantages and protection.

The minister will no doubt give us information as to the possibility of defining as a capital murder a second crime committed by an accused.

Let us suppose for a moment that an accused convicted of non-capital murder and sentenced to life imprisonment is released after 15 or 20 years and commits another murder.

In order to protect society, should we not then automatically define as capital murder that second murder committed by such a person?

This morning, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) seemed to plead for the fair sex, and invited the house to adopt an amendment to the act so that women be exempt from hanging.

Mr. Deschatelets: It is one of my weaknesses.

Mr. Paul: Maybe he was inspired by sympathy, maybe it was love for the fair sex—

Mr. Deschatelets: It could be, for that matter.

Mr. Paul: But I wonder if it is with deep conviction that the hon. member made that suggestion to the house.

Unfortunately, we still remember the case of that famous murder which was premeditated, planned and carried out a few years ago by a certain woman, when a plane crashed at Sault-au-Cochon, not far from Baie St. Paul in Quebec.

I think the woman who had planned such a crime deserved the punishment she received.

I therefore think we should not make any exception for women if they are coward enough to plan the suppression of one of their fellow human beings.

Those are the few remarks I wanted to make in this house.

I am sure that at the conclusion of this debate, we shall have taken a great step to meet the requirements of the two schools of thought. On the other hand, while society must be protected, it must also protect. So it continues to lend a compassionate hand to those who, through weakness, passion or distraction, have committed a crime.

I feel that in maintaining capital punishment for capital murder, we are giving a further proof to the Canadian people that Canada has had this legislation in its statutes for many years and that the members of this house intend to keep it, in order to ensure continued protection to society, the family and the individual.

(Text):

Mr. H. F. Jones (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): At the close of this great debate which has excited the interest and the emotions of Canadians, as have similar debates in other countries on this subject, I think it is fitting to pay tribute to all those inside and outside of this house who have played a part in reaching the position that we are in today in relation to a possible solution of this problem through the medium of this bill. I think that the abolitionists, and those who have favoured keeping the Criminal Code as it is, will greet this bill with considerable relief.

The bill represents, in my view, a great step forward. It removes the death penalty for those murders where premeditation is not a factor. This is a great advance. It retains the death penalty for those persons who have decided themselves that someone else's life shall be forfeited. I feel this has been one of the factors in the arguments both inside and outside of the house for retaining the provisions of the code as they are at the moment. There has been a fear that those who commit planned murders, those who engage in crimes which could well result in murder, might not receive full justice if abolition were brought about.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney) mentioned with favour the provision to leave clemency with the jury. In his remarks, he suggested that perhaps this verdict should not be arrived at unanimously. I have great respect for the opinions of the hon. member for Parkdale, particularly in this field. I do believe, however, although his suggestion is one that should interest the members of the house and should receive their serious and deep consideration, that the retention of the unanimity rule in so far as clemency is concerned would result in a much more thorough examination by a jury of the question of whether or not clemency should indeed be recommended.

The jurors when they get together by themselves to decide these matters, if they are placed in a position in which the majority could decide whether or not there should be a clemency recommendation, I feel would tend not to give the serious consideration that should be given to a recommendation for clemency. The tendency might be merely to let a majority ride and not to explore all the aspects of the case which should go into such a serious recommendation. I believe there is also a clause in the bill permitting the governor in council in commuting a sentence of death to direct that the prisoner shall not be released from the imprisonment to which the sentence is commuted without the prior approval of the governor in council, and this applies to capital murder. I wonder whether consideration should not be given to including within the bill a similar provision in respect of those murders which are not capital murders. Otherwise we might have people being released from prison after paying a relatively short penalty and without that serious consideration which should be given by the highest authority to the release of a person who has committed a murder.

Those were the two thoughts I wished to place before the house. I wish to close by complimenting the minister on this step forward. I think it will meet with general approval. Indeed, from the reports that I have read and the opinions of lawyers that I have heard on this matter, I believe it is generally regarded as being a great and imaginative solution to this question which has exercised Canadians as a whole over the last four or five years.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, an issue that concerns the sanctity of human life affects the emotions of everyone in the House of Commons. I can quite understand the zeal of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) and the support he has had from the hon. member from Parkdale (Mr. Maloney) and others on this rather moral issue. It is an issue that far transcends party lines. I can appreciate the attitude of those who feel keenly about it. I think it is a matter of deduction to arrive at what is actually meant by the sanctity of human life.

I believe I have a very kindly heart. I have terrific sympathy for anyone who even is obliged to go to jail for the commission of a crime, whether it is stealing a loaf of bread for his family, exceeding the speed limit with his car, or something else. However, while I am not a lawyer, I notice that there are degrees of penalties. A man is fined so much for going through a red light. He is fined much more if he kills a child running out on the road on the way from school. He is fined much more and he loses his licence if he is convicted of manslaughter or if, through impaired driving, he causes an accident in which a whole family is killed. I am wondering whether we are not being carried away with our sentimentality and our heartfelt sympathy for the man who has a background that prompts criminality.

I am more concerned, Mr. Speaker, about the death of one lovely little child and her innocent mother than I am about the death of all the criminals who have been hanged on all the gallows to date. Do not let us get "chicken". Do not let us get soft. It is not a matter of revenge. Good men—and there are many that I know personally—saw good comrades die in battle for the great principles of liberty and freedom. Many thousands of good men have died for fundamental principles. A few criminals have been hanged for dastardly crimes against society. We are not here to protect criminals from the gallows. We are here to protect society in general. In the twilight of my career in politics I would shudder if I thought I had cast a vote for the total abolition of the death penalty if it meant that one of my grandchildren or one of yours, Mr. Speaker, or one of the grandchildren or daughters of my many other friends in the house were killed because some fellow said, "I will only get a light penalty anyway".

One of the hon. members who has spoken said that this legislation is only a beginning and that it will develop to the point of total abolition which is the objective of some sincere hon. members in this house. Surely we should stop, look and listen. If a $1,000 fine is a penalty to a man who cannot find the $1,000, five years in the penitentiary is a greater penalty. But if a judge says, "Because of the crime that you have committed, you will be taken to the place of execution and you will hang by the neck until you are dead", surely that is a deterrent. I once heard that sentence pronounced on a man whom I knew and I felt the cold chills go up and down my back. No man can tell me that sentence is not a greater deterrent than is one pronounced by a judge who says that the man will go to jail for the balance of his life, knowing that the government might be soft enough to let him out in about 20 years.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Or 12 years.

Mr. Rowe: Or 12 years, as the hon. member from Newfoundland says. Do not let us be soft, Mr. Speaker. We are here as trustees for society. We are here to protect these happy little children that are running out of school, these innocent little girls who know nothing of the dastardly things that have corrupted society and broken hearts down through the years.

Mr. Speaker, I would vote against my party if it was inclined to abolish any provision that I thought would be a deterrent against crime and would protect society in general. I am not unaware of the fact that there may have been doubts. Some of our most eminent lawyers, hard hearted as some of our people think they are but learned in the law, believe that every man is entitled to a fair trial. I know it almost breaks their hearts if they think that some man has gone to the gallows who was a near criminal, or who was near to committing a crime but there was not quite enough evidence to prove that he committed it. We all feel very keenly on that score where an innocent man might have been hanged. But down through the ages, in the old land and in this country, how many of those cases have there been?

Mr. Winch: Enough.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friend says "enough". May I say that from my childhood I can remember scores of little girls who have been raped and murdered, little boys who have been murdered, mothers who have been murdered and clerks who have been shot. I think of the thousands of better men than we are who tonight sleep in Flanders fields as a result of meeting death in the first great war and of the thousands who are buried in the English channel as a result of the second great war. Those men died for fundamental principles. If two or three who were near crime were hanged but probably should not have been hanged, if they were a deterrent in order to save society in general, I think they died in a good cause.

I am not going to pursue this matter, Mr. Speaker. I was not in the house this morning, but I heard that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) gave a brilliant explanation, as usual, of this bill. The Minister of Justice is most capable of doing this.

Perhaps I am not as familiar with this matter, being a layman, as I might have been had I been a lawyer, but it would not have changed my sentiment at heart: we are here to protect society; we are not here to protect the criminal.

(Translation):

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, in my preliminary remarks, I intended to show to what extent the two theories confronting each other are defendable. And I think we had this evening a perfect illustration of what I was going to say as felt by all hon. members who listened to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney), speaking with all the conviction he has acquired in his brief but fruitful career at the bar. Indeed the death penalty in its present form is practically a crime.

He expounded his philosophy in a composed and passionless way, and we agreed with him.

On the other hand, the case for maintaining capital punishment is also defendable. In fact, I think that what the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), just told us, is as good an illustration of the reasons for maintaining capital punishment. Both theories were well defended, first by the hon. member for Parkdale, that brilliant young criminal lawyer who, during his career, has frequently been in touch with people who were under indictment for murder, and then by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe who had the advantage of a long experience of men and things and who was basing his judgment on that very experience, which is so valuable.

All that, Mr. Speaker, goes to show that when it is a question of forming an opinion for or against the abolition of capital punishment, the responsibility resting on members' shoulders is extremely heavy. And that is precisely why, last year, I refrained from taking part in the debate, when the bill of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) was introduced.

At that time, I felt a bit like the man in the street who, one day, believes that maintaining capital punishment is essential for the protection of society and the next, after hearing a lecture or the narration of some moving occurrence, prefers complete abolition. As I said, I did not take part in this debate because I wanted to study the question thoroughly, with an open mind, without passion, as one should when considering such a complex matter which may entail so very serious consequences. I wanted to take some advice and consult even the man in the street on the way he felt with regard to this matter.

Today, I would still not be able to determine which is my honest opinion if I were asked to decide for or against the abolition of capital punishment.

I believe that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) also thought that public opinion was not sufficiently enlightened, nor clear enough to be faced with legislation tending completely to abolish the death penalty. Now a middle way has been found thanks to which nobody, I think, may be unfairly convicted of capital murder entailing capital punishment, whereas to this day anyone who had killed has been a murderer, there being no alternative even if, deep down in his conscience, the individual having committed—and I even hesitate to say the word—a murder for some motive which submitted to a jury, would have been valueless, was doomed to hang.

In other words, if you had killed, if you had committed a murder and were unable through reliable witnesses or by your own means to justify such action on some ground or other, you were heading for the gallows. And that is precisely where the injustice was. Today, a distinction has been made between capital murder and non-capital murder.

I might perhaps immediately deal with the suggestion made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul), who proposed that anybody who killed be accused of qualified murder. I rather believe that we should do the opposite. In the vast majority of cases, the indicted should be accused of non-capital murder, because it is extremely painful to bring an individual before the courts and prove his intention, or prove that his crime was premeditated.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to call it ten thirty?

(Text):

Mr. Winch: Will the hon. member call it ten thirty?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, would the leader of the house indicate whether it is the intention of the government to continue this debate tomorrow, and if so and it is concluded, does he adhere to what he said last evening, that we would take up the estimates of the Department of Justice after the conclusion of this debate?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I indicated last evening that if the debate on this bill were not concluded today we would consider continuing it tomorrow. That is the case; we will continue tomorrow with the debate on this bill.

If it is finished in time tomorrow, we will proceed with the estimates of the Department of Justice.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.M.H.C.—PROCEEDS FROM SALE OF MORTGAGES

Question No. 232—Mr. Regier:

1. What are the arrangements that have been arrived at between the Department of Finance and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as to the disposal of the potential proceeds of the proposed sale of mortgages now held by the C.M.H.C.?

2. What have been the total amounts of repayment on principal collected by C.M.H.C. for each of the past five years on moneys that it has advanced for home construction?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

Question

1. When the corporation has effected the sale of a group of mortgages it will determine with the Department of Finance whether to use the proceeds of sale for the making of new direct loans or whether to make prepayments upon its debenture indebtedness to the treasury. The decision will depend largely upon the then current money market and the demands upon the corporation for direct loans at that time.

2. Principal Collections on N.H.A. Loans

1956	$ 24,786,802
1957	22,642,635
1958	28,526,518
1959	30,592,793
1960	36,487,987

VETERANS AFFAIRS

FOURTH AND FIFTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): I have the honour to present the fourth and fifth reports of the standing committee on veterans affairs. By unanimous consent I move:

That the fourth report of the standing committee on veterans affairs, presented this day, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton unanimous consent to move his motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Churchill: It is simply to reduce the quorum.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, before the request for unanimous consent is made may I ask whether there is any reason for requesting unanimous consent? Perhaps the mover of the motion would give us some indication on that.

Mr. Speaker: Since the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is asking for unanimous consent perhaps he would state his reason.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Speaker, the reason I am asking for unanimous consent in order to have the fourth report of the committee concurred in today is that it has been the experience of the committee that the members thereof spend 10 or 15 minutes on some occasions waiting until there is a quorum. Several committees are meeting simultaneously, and some members of this committee also serve on other committees. At the last meeting of our committee it was unanimously decided among the members present, representing all parties, that we would ask leave of the house to reduce our quorum from 15 to 10.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Robinson):

That the fourth report of the standing committee on veterans affairs presented this day be now concurred in.

That report would simply have the effect of reducing the quorum from 15 to 10.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the explanation offered by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, has he unanimous consent to move his motion?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there will be no opposition to this, of course, but the request highlights the reason for it, and that is that so many committees are sitting at this stage of our proceedings—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not rising at a time when debate is permitted. The house either gives unanimous consent or not. I take it that the hon. member for Essex East does not wish to dissent?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will now put the motion. By unanimous consent Mr. Montgomery, seconded by Mr. Robinson, moves:

That the fourth report of the standing committee on veterans affairs presented this day be now concurred in.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I take it that I may say something at this stage. I do not intend to oppose this motion except to state that I believe the reason the hon. gentleman is asking that this motion be put forward at this time is that there is difficulty in getting the attendance of members of committees at the appropriate times because so many committee meetings are being held at this stage in the proceedings of the session. For instance, the house begins its sitting at 11 o'clock, and a committee is going to meet at one o'clock. Committees are meeting this afternoon.

This difficulty arises out of the failure of the government to bring forward its legislation at the appropriate time in the session. Members of the opposition who have a responsibility are finding it difficult to discharge that responsibility because of the simultaneous holding of so many committee meetings at a time when important legislation is being discussed in this house. The other day we had a situation in which an important matter dealing with freight rates was being discussed in a committee of this house while the hon. member for Laurier, a former minister of transport and the Liberal critic in transport matters, as well as the Minister of Transport himself were engaged in discussions in this house on amendments having to do with the Canada Shipping Act.

So while I do not object to the request at this stage, I point out that the government has so mismanaged its affairs in the conduct of our proceedings—

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that this kind of request is now being put forward.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know that hon. gentlemen do not like what I am saying, but that is the fact. Not only is it a fact that opposition members are finding the situation difficult, but it is a fact that members on the government side are also finding it difficult. Some members on the government side are actually boycotting a particular committee because it is being held at a particular time. I hope these remarks will serve to remind the administration that it is largely responsible for this situation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the hon. member for Essex East, who on this occasion is my partner in protest. I agree with what he has said. I might say that in heart and in mind we agree when it comes to criticism of the present arrangements with regard to the committees. In the veterans affairs committee we unanimously agreed to reduce the quorum to 10. We accepted that suggestion reluctantly because we would attend meetings and would wait 15 minutes, 20 minutes, and 25 minutes. We would have a number of officials, whose time is valuable, waiting for the committee to meet in order to give their answers to questions raised by members of the committee. It was because of that circumstance that we agreed to a reduction of the quorum to 10. However, as the hon. member for Essex East has mentioned, there is a committee which is called to meet today at one o'clock. I refer to the committee on external affairs. I cannot attend that committee meeting.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Herridge: Because I will be attending another committee at one o'clock. This sort of thing happens repeatedly. When we consider external affairs and their importance and we find that this committee is being called during the lunch hour so hon. members can discuss international affairs in between snacks. I think it is going a bit too far.

I wish to join with the hon. member for Essex East in an effort to get some better organization of the time of the committees and earlier starting of the committees in the session. If the committees commenced sitting early in the session we would not have this situation, with all this undue haste and in many cases lack of dignity in the work of the committees.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that there is no other committee meeting at one o'clock today except the external affairs committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes; the external affairs committee.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As I have said on many occasions, Mr. Speaker, I realize the difficulty of a small opposition in securing the necessary representatives on the various committees set up. That has been now—

An hon. Member: That is not the reason—

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman who does most of his talking from a seated position will remain silent, I will continue with the argument.

Mr. Pickersgill: Keep the Minister of Public Works quiet.

Mr. McIlraith: I will give him exactly the courtesy that he gives me.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has an inveterate desire to babble away, and I do not want to interfere with that. As I was saying a moment ago, all through the years this has been a cause of complaint. We felt when we were in opposition that it was difficult for hon. members to sit in the various committees which were sitting during those days. This year we set up committees earlier than has been the case in many years in the past.

I want to point out that hon. gentlemen have been asking for various matters to be submitted to committees; they have not had enough to do. I seem to recall an argument last week on that subject, when the opposition said, "We want a report submitted to a committee". They were not so fearful then that they would not have the necessary members available.

I simply rise for the purpose of saying that what has resulted is not from a lack of organization on the part of the government but rather from a failure on the part of the opposition to bifurcate themselves or trifurcate themselves so they can attend the various committees. I would suggest that the committees might arrange to sit at different times so as to enable hon. members to attend the committee meetings.

I have been listening the last few days, and it is interesting to see that as soon as the hon. member for Essex East receives the responsibility of "acting leader" of the opposition he forever rails away at the lack of organization. I say "Physician, heal thyself".

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has suggested that the difficulty is with the opposition. I suggest, sir, that there are enough members, supporters of the government, on this committee in proportion to their numbers in this house. Why it is necessary to reduce the quorum at this time; why it is not possible for those government members to bifurcate themselves—to use the Prime Minister's words—so they can at least maintain the quorum on these committees is very hard to understand.

It is true, of course, that it has been the policy of the government all through this session to maintain what I described the other day as a friendly filibuster on their own legislation by their members in this house. But even at that, only one of them at a time can speak in the house from his place, though some, like the Minister of Public Works speak regularly from their seats. However, there would be no need to reduce the quorum of this committee because of the failure of opposition members to attend if there was a reasonable attendance on the part of hon. members on the government side of the house.

It does seem to me that this motion at this time is really quite unnecessary. It is unnecessary for another reason; it is unnecessary because the work of the veterans affairs committee could have been completed long before this if the war veterans legislation had been brought forward at the same time the pension legislation was brought forward, and proceeded with properly as it should have been. We understand that this legislation is not even ready yet, and the resolution is being filibustered on the other side because the government cannot yet make up its mind what to put in the bill.

It is true that there are so many committees meeting that it is very difficult for many of them to get a quorum. Indeed the other day, in the case referred to by my hon. friend from Essex East, when there was objection taken to the simultaneous meeting of the committee on railways and discussion of the legislation on the Canadian National Railways in the house, I think it is within the knowledge of all hon. members that a tie took place in that committee on a vote because there were so few supporters of the government at the committee meeting. This is a fact; and when the Prime Minister gets up and talks about a failure of the opposition in connection with this matter, facts rather than fiction, if I may use a word dear to the leader of the government, might be applied to the situation.

This situation has risen mainly for another reason, mainly because the hours of sitting of this house were extended in an altogether unprecedented way long before the government's most important legislation had been brought down at all, long before most of it was ready, and long before there was a budget. I cannot remember in the past when the hours of sitting were ever lengthened until all the legislation had been announced by the government—except, of course, for something that might be announced in an emergency—and practically all of it was on the order paper. I call attention to the fact that the most important legislation—that dealing with federal-provincial tax-sharing, unemployment insurance and the budget, to name only three items—has not yet been introduced, and one could lengthen the list to include the 20 items which the Prime Minister announced on April 24, most of which have not been brought down. This whole situation has been created by that precipitate effort of the government at that time, and because they were afraid to bring in their legislation before next Monday.

Mr. Pallett: Before the hon. member completes his diatribe I wonder if he would be in favour of the attendance records of the committees being tabled in the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would have no objection whatsoever. I should not mind. If, however, the hon. gentleman selects my attendance at the Indians affairs committee, which has almost always sat at the same time as the committee on broadcasting, I must point out that I am not able to bifurcate myself in that respect.

Mr. Hellyer: I shall be very brief, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the hon. member that the question before us is the reduction or waiving of the quorum required at a specific committee. I trust that hon. members will confine themselves for the rest of the discussion to this matter.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I merely rose to say that from what the Prime Minister told the house a few minutes ago it is clear that he feels the opposition needs reinforcement. I hope the electors in four districts next Monday will see fit to accommodate him.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): The hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate have mentioned the sittings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and I have a protest to make in this regard which I should like to bring to the attention of the house. We were sitting in that committee hearing witnesses from the truckers' association who were here to present their views, and the hon. member for Laurier informed us that he could not remain because he had to be in the house. However, there were five other members of the Liberal party sitting on that committee, and they told us that the hon. member for Laurier was the only one in that party who could speak on transportation.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's point, but I do not see the relevance of what happened in that committee to the subject now under discussion. There has been some latitude allowed, but the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is talking about a different matter.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): With all deference, Mr. Speaker, the other two hon. members referred to what happened in that committee and I think it is only proper there should be an understanding of what did occur.

Mr. Speaker: I do not consider that particular incident relevant to this question of what shall constitute a quorum.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Surely I have the same right as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to refer to that committee and to the specific case with which I am dealing at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry if the hon. member feels I have discriminated but there must be a line drawn, as I intimated before the hon. member rose. This debate is not a broad one, and I do not think we can discuss all the arrangements of the house.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on this motion. The meeting of the external affairs committee is scheduled for one o'clock this afternoon. In the years that I have been chairman I have attempted to meet the requests of the opposition not to sit while the house is sitting, and to try as far as possible to avoid meeting while other committees are meeting. At the inaugural meeting of the committee this year this matter was again mentioned. When I asked for consent of the house to sit while the house was in session the matter was not brought to a vote, but nearly so. When we met a discussion of the hours ensued, and one of the members of the committee suggested that we meet at one o'clock. This is an hour when the house is not in session and when no other committees are meeting with the exception of the restaurant committee.

Today the hon. member for Essex East left the impression that members of the government side were in a sense boycotting the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: He did not say that at all.

Mr. White: As I say, we tried our very best to arrange hours that did not conflict with other committees and with the house. I am sorry to say the opposition by their absence from the committee at the last two meetings have abdicated their responsibility as far as external affairs are concerned. I want to make it perfectly clear that the members of the government were present—they constituted more than a quorum—and took care of the business very well. If opposition members want to abdicate their responsibilities on a very important committee dealing with the external affairs of this country then that is their responsibility and not mine, and I hope no further reference will be made to the boycotting of the committee. The committee meets at one o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not rising to take part in the debate. He indicates that he is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Starr: No; this is just a dodge.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member said those who do not attend the meeting of the external affairs committee at one o'clock will not be discharging their responsibilities as members of this house. This is a reflection on any member of that committee who does not attend, and I happen to be one of those.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has properly said that there is some reflection on members in general who are accused of not attending committee meetings. When he says that, he is simply continuing the debate and not raising a matter of privilege, because I think similar accusations have already been made from the other side of the house. I would not think that the accusation is serious enough on which to found a question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, may I say that a question of privilege must be raised forthwith. For an hon. member to say that another hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: I heard the hon. member and I have allowed him to raise his alleged question of privilege forthwith, but in my view it does not affect the privilege of the house.

Mr. Caron: On the question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The question of privilege has been disposed of.

Mr. Caron: This is another question of privilege, then. The hon. member went so far as to say that the Liberal party was trying to boycott the committee.

Mr. Fulton: No; the hon. member for Essex East said that.

Mr. Caron: He has no right to say that, because if they want the committee to sit they have sufficient members to constitute a quorum even if the members of the Liberal party are not represented. He has no right to say we are trying to boycott the committee.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is really continuing a debate on the charges and countercharges. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the motion for concurrence in the committee report made by the chairman of the committee is one that I have no desire at all to oppose. I think the chairman is caught in the position where he is desirous of moving the business of the committee forward, and he finds himself in a predicament. In order to carry on the work he has to come to the house and ask for a reduction in the quorum. With his action in doing that I have no quarrel whatever, because of the circumstances in which he finds himself; but the necessity of taking that action does reveal a bad condition in the management of the business of the house.

When the Prime Minister of this country, who is looked to in this house as the leader of the house, rose to deal with this subject he saw fit to start off his remarks in a way that examination will reveal was most offensive, unfair and inaccurate. When I interjected, as it was contrary to the rules I was taken to task for that interjection. When I was being taken to task for interjecting the Prime Minister seemed to approve the interjections of his Minister of Public Works, as is his wont.

I merely want to point out to the Prime Minister that in handling this debate in this way—this is a subject that is debatable—and in introducing this standard of conduct he is going a long way from the subject matter, which is a difficult one, and he conducts himself in a way that other hon. members in the house are likely to follow as the proper one.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wished to raise the subject matter he is referring to, which is the conduct of the Prime Minister, he should have raised it as a point of order at the time. It is not relevant to the debate.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, then, Mr. Speaker, I do desire to say something about the substance of the argument of the Prime Minister and to answer it because I feel that if the argument was allowable and was permitted to be made it surely is in order to reply to it.

The substance of his argument was his usual line, an indirect attempt to ridicule the small numbers in the opposition. That was the line of argument. Then he went on to say that they should trifurcate themselves in order to make sufficient numbers to attend the committee sittings.

May I remind the Prime Minister that notwithstanding his rather skilful method of handling this, in the way he did, he did not deal with the real point. Yesterday morning at 9.30 the attendance of 42 members of the opposition would have been required in committees, and that is making no allowance for any meetings having to do with legislation in the house that we are going on with at the present time, or in preparing ourselves for legislation. He will recall that on Monday and Tuesday of this week legislation was brought before the house on very short notice. He must not only recall that but he must assume responsibility for it.

I would hope that the Prime Minister would take enough time from trying to make those rather appealing arguments that may or may not be wholly relevant to the point to see whether he could not give some attention to the better organization and presentation of business to the house and to committees in an orderly way that would try to meet this difficulty. I invite the Prime Minister to give some real thought and care to that subject rather than always seeking to use diversionary arguments which, by the way, he does very skilfully.

I am not suggesting it is out of order for him to follow that course if he wishes to do so, but I respectfully suggest that he should devote a little attention to the whole question of the preparation of legislation in proper time so it can be submitted to the house in an orderly way, and also the question of the arrangement of sittings of committees in such a way that we will not have the spectacle we had the other day with respect to legislation concerning the transport department, or the situation we had a few days earlier when the agriculture committee was sitting to deal with quite important matters at the very time an agricultural bill was being debated in the house. I suggest that these matters are worthy of his attention.

In making his remarks today the Prime Minister based his argument on the smallness of the opposition, and I should like to remind him of something he said on that very subject on an earlier occasion. He was quoted in the press on August 11, 1953, as having made this statement:

There is nothing much that one can say, excepting that I would have liked to have seen a powerful opposition in the House of Commons. After all, a strong opposition to the government is essential to our democratic way of life. The load that rests on the few that have been elected is almost impossible for the average individual to understand.

I simply suggest to the Prime Minister that in the light of that background we are now free to interpret his remarks today as an appeal to the voters in the four constituencies in which by-elections are being held.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say something before the question is put. If I had been at the second last meeting of the veterans affairs committee I would have opposed this change. The committee has a membership of 60, and obviously there should be enough people available to constitute a quorum.

Over the past three years the Prime Minister has suggested that the committees should be made more effective in the discharge of their functions. Obviously the veterans affairs committee cannot be effective if only 10 out of 60 members are present. I suggest that one thing we should possibly do is what the Prime Minister tried to do a year or two ago, when he installed a speaker system in his office in order to follow the debates in the house. I am not suggesting that that be done in our offices, but rather that simultaneous translation and amplification systems be installed in each of the committee rooms so that members will be able to follow the debates in the committees.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's suggestion is quite ingenious but also quite irrelevant. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Montgomery: May I say one word?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. Montgomery: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just stated that the veterans affairs committee is a 60-man committee. I should like to inform him and the house that it is only a 40-man committee.

Motion agreed to.

STARRED QUESTIONS

PRINTING BUREAU—OUTSIDE WORK

Question No. 322—Mr. McMillan:

1. What was the total cost of printing done outside the printing bureau for all departments of government for the last fiscal year?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

2. Were tenders called on any or all of this work?
3. What firms or persons received the three highest printing awards, and what were the amounts of such awards?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The answer to part 1 of this question is $5,640,658.

The answer to part 2 is yes. Tenders were called on this work in accordance with the Public Printing and Stationery Act and the government contract regulations.

The answer to part 3 is Canadian Bank Note Limited, Ottawa, the award being in the amount of $96,153.75; Ashton-Potter Limited, Toronto, the award being in the amount of $71,653; and R. L. Crain Limited, Ottawa, the award being in the amount of $57,723.70.

SATELLITE STATION, MONT LAURIER—U.S.-CANADA NEGOTIATIONS

Question No. 332—Mr. Clermont:

1. Have the negotiations with the United States concerning an international agreement on the establishment of a satellite station at Mont Laurier, province of Quebec, been concluded?
2. If so: (a) what has resulted from such negotiations? (b) at what date will the works begin, and how long will they last?
3. If not, what is the reason for the delay in the said negotiations with the United States, in view of the fact that the board of broadcast governors has recommended the granting of a licence on December 8, 1960?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Channel 3 has been assigned to Mont Laurier for the proposed station.

(b) This transmitter is to be an off-air rebroadcasting station of the proposed station at Mont Tremblant on channel 11, and construction of both stations will be concurrent. Work on the project is expected to start soon. The corporation is awaiting the final resolution of the leasing arrangements for the transmitter site of the master station at Mont Tremblant, which is to be located on property administered by the Quebec provincial government. The corporation expects that these stations will be in operation this autumn.

COST OF BORDEN COMMISSION

Question No. 335—Mr. Forgie:

What was the total cost of the Borden commission including the printing of the report?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer is $443,557.61.

CHRIS DOBSON

Question No. 339—Mr. Mitchell:

1. Is Chris Dobson employed full time in the public service of Canada?
2. If so, (a) what is his position (b) what are the duties (c) what is the salary?
3. Is this Chris Dobson the same person who appeared, under the name of Chris Bryant, on the Wally Koster C.B.C.-T.V. show on Sunday, May 7?
4. If so, did he receive any remuneration for this appearance?
5. Has he made any other stage and/or television appearances, either in Canada or the United States, while in the public service? If so, on how many occasions, and what absences from his duties were involved?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The answers are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Associate private secretary to the Minister of Justice.

(b) Preparing briefs on subjects requested by the minister; handling minister's correspondence related to various areas of minister's responsibilities, and other duties pertaining to the minister's office as assigned.

(c) $6,500.

With respect to parts 3, 4 and 5 the detailed information requested here is not in my possession. Mr. Dobson before his appointment as my assistant private secretary apparently undertook as a hobby the developing, together with a friend, of a variety act or skit for the entertainment of their friends. This eventually led to their appearance before larger audiences and from time to time their endeavours earned them a fee. All this was done in Mr. Dobson's spare time. This spare time activity was continued on an occasional basis since he joined my staff.

Being satisfied in every respect with the manner in which Mr. Dobson has carried out his duties, being satisfied that his other activities have not interfered in any way with the performance of those duties, and being satisfied that he is a person of excellent character and conduct and a proper person to be employed in the public service of Canada, I have not concerned myself with the details of his private life.

C.B.C. BROADCASTS—REPRESENTATIONS BY SECRETARY OF STATE

Question No. 341—Mr. McMillan:

1. Have any representations been made by the Secretary of State to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation either by letter, telephone, or conversation, with regard to any television program broadcast or proposed to be broadcast?
2. If so, when, and how were they made, what was the nature of these representations, and to what program were they referring?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The answer to part 1 of this question is no, and part 2 is answered by the answer to part 1.

C.B.C. BROADCASTS—REPRESENTATIONS BY AGRICULTURE MINISTER

Question No. 342—Mr. Clermont:

1. Have any representations been made by the Minister of Agriculture to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation either by letter, telephone, or conversation, with regard to any television program broadcast or proposed to be broadcast?
2. If so, when, and how were they made, what was the nature of these representations, and to what program were they referring?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I am informed that our information division is in day to day touch with private and C.B.C. stations about information and slides that the stations want for programs, but no representations, written or verbal, have ever been made about anything to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. For my own part, there have been no representations to the C.B.C. except that on one occasion I did compliment a camera crew on a very fine agricultural program which I pointed out would do a great deal to bring about better understanding between farmers and city people.

POLAR SHELF HELICOPTER SERVICE EQUIPMENT

Question No. 346—Mr. Chevrier:

1. In its answer to starred question No. 189, Hansard of March 15, 1961, page 3006, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys listed the following equipment required of the contractor to perform the helicopter service on the continental polar shelf: "4 Sikorsky S-55 helicopters equipped with float landing gear; 1 Sikorsky S-55 helicopter equipped with wheel landing gear; 1 Bell 47 G2A helicopter equipped with skid and float landing gear". When operations on the polar shelf were started in 1961, did the contractor have the above named equipment on the job?
2. Were the Sikorsky S-55's and the Bell 47 G2A's equipped with skid and float landing gear as required?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): In answer to the hon. member for Laurier, I must first indicate that my answer on March 15, 1961, Hansard page 3006, listed, at his request, the helicopter and equipment requirements for both the polar continental shelf project and a topographical survey project in 1961. Question No. 346 does not reflect my previous answers accurately. The 1961 requirements for the polar continental shelf project only are as follows: 2 Sikorsky S-55 helicopters equipped with float landing gear, 1 Sikorsky S-55 helicopter equipped with wheel landing gear, 1 Bell 47 G2A helicopter equipped with skid and float landing gear. In the light of the above, I now submit the following answers to the two specific questions.

1. It was not necessary that the contractor have the helicopter equipment on the job when operations on the polar shelf project started in 1961 as such equipment was not required until a later date.

2. The four helicopters supplied to this project in 1961 were equipped in accordance with the requirements listed in my answer to question No. 189, part 1.

NARCOTIC DRUGS, B.C. PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 350—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1957, have any narcotic drugs been found (a) in the possession of an inmate in the British Columbia penitentiary (b) in the possession of a staff member or employee in the British Columbia penitentiary, or (c) on any of the British Columbia penitentiary reserve lands, or in or near any of the penitentiary buildings; and, if so, how many said inmates or said employees were found to be in possession, and in how many instances were narcotic drugs found upon the said lands or in or near any of the said buildings with the date of each such find?

2. What volume of such drugs, by type, were found in the possession of each said inmate or employee or were found in or near the said buildings?

3. What penalty, if any, was meted out to each said inmate, or said employee?

4. Have any of the inmates or employees been suspected of being in possession of such drugs; and, if so, in how many instances?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the information necessary to be obtained to reply to this question is quite detailed, and I have not yet got it complete. Since I imagine it would be desired to have the information before next Wednesday, I suggest that this question be made an order for return. I think I will be able to table the return before the end of the week, or very shortly thereafter. Otherwise it would have to wait until next Wednesday when starred questions come up again.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS CONTRACTS WITH CANADIAN MARCONI

Question No. 351—Mr. Howard:

1. Has the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources any contracts with Canadian Marconi Company; and, if so, how many, what is the purpose of each, and what is the location at which the particular work is being carried out?

2. Has the department had occasion to check the contracts of employment which the said Canadian Marconi Company enters into with its employees; and, if so, has it been discovered that the following clause is contained within the said contracts of employment: "Native and Eskimo villages are considered out of bounds and personnel are prohibited from fraternization or association with the native populations except in special circumstances. Infringement of these orders is cause for discharge."?

[Mr. Comtois.]

3. Has the department any knowledge of persons who have been so discharged pursuant to the clause mentioned in question number 2; and, if so, how many such persons have been so discharged, and has the department taken any steps to have these persons reinstated in the employ of the Canadian Marconi Company; and, if so, what steps, with what results?

4. Has the department had occasion to investigate whether or not the clause referred to in question number 2 is in violation of the Canadian Bill of Rights and/or of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act; and, if so, what has been discovered as a result of the said investigation, and have any steps been taken to have Canadian Marconi Company comply with the above-mentioned statutes; and, if so, what steps, with what results?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the four parts of the question are as follows.

1. The only contract which the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has with Canadian Marconi Company is one under which the company operates a small heating plant at Great Whale River on behalf of the department.

2. Yes, the clause in question came to the attention of the department when Mr. T. J. Whitfield wrote to me on February 27, 1961.

3. Yes, the department has been informed in writing of one, and has been informed orally of nine others. The department did take steps to have Mr. Whitfield retained in employment by oral representations to an officer of the company. I also wrote to Mr. Whitfield indicating that the area administrator for the department would assist him in his problem. I might add that since Mr. Whitfield left the employ of the company I have endeavoured, without success, to have him visit me here in Ottawa. No action was taken in the other cases as improper relations with Eskimo women were involved.

4. No legal decision has been rendered on these two points. The clause, however, is contrary to the spirit of the government order issued in 1959 removing disabilities against the indigenous population which had existed since 1955 under directives from the former administration. I have written to the Canadian Marconi Company urging a change in the clause to bring the contract into harmony with the policies of the present administration, particularly to remove the absolute bar of contact on a racial basis, but at the same time to deal firmly with improper relations.

RESERVE TRADESMEN TRAINING PLAN, R.C.A.F.

Question No. 352—Mr. Clermont:

1. Has the reserve tradesmen training plan of the Royal Canadian Air Force auxiliary squadrons been cancelled, and, if so, for what reason?

2. What has been the cost of this program to date?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the two parts of this question are as follows.

1. Yes. It is now planned to enrol candidates directly into the auxiliary and give them similar training in the technical training units. This will eliminate the additional expenditures involved in maintaining the R.T.T.P. as a separate training program.

2. Since its inception in 1953, $3,741,772.

ORDERS FOR SELF-PROPELLED VESSELS

Question No. 355—Mr. Bourget:

As of May 12, 1961, by shipyards and by vessels, how many firm orders for self-propelled vessels now under construction or to be built, which will be eligible for subsidy, were in existence; and, more particularly, in connection with all such firm orders, the following information: (a) name of the purchaser for whom the vessel is being built, (b) yard number or proposed name if allocated, (c) type of vessel, (d) place where and purpose for which the vessel is to be used, (e) estimated gross tonnage, (f) contract price to purchaser (exclusive of escalation costs or extras), (g) estimated percentage of construction completed on May 11, 1961, (h) the amount, if any, which the Canadian Maritime Commission has authorized to be withdrawn from any funds held on deposit under the provisions of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act, or held in escrow from the proceeds of disposition of flag-covenanted vessels, to be applied to the purchase price; (i) what percentage of Canadian content, if any, is required for the approval of such funds?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, an exact answer to this question can be given only when the regulations governing the policy have been approved by the governor in council and when the operators concerned have in fact made application and have had their applications dealt with under the new policy.

MIRACLE DRUGS—PUBLICATION OF INFORMATION

Question No. 356—Mr. Bourget:

1. Has the Minister of Health and Welfare received representations from the maritime federation of agriculture asking what control, if any, is exercised by the federal government in regard to the publication of information on so-called miracle drugs?

2. If so, did the minister reply, and what was the nature of his reply?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the two parts of this question are as follows.

1. Yes.

2. Yes. I replied in part as follows:

We have no authority with respect to news items, magazine articles, editorials or other forms of communication to the public, regardless of the fact that they may deal with a food or a drug. It would only be where an advertisement was published that my officials would have any right to examine the material and to take any action ... In the field of advertising, however, we exercise control in two ways. One is via the Food and Drugs Act and the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and the other is in the field of broadcasting. Under the broadcasting regulations, no commercial can be used unless it has first been approved by my department. We examine something in the nature of thirty thousand commercials annually ...

You will appreciate it is impossible to ensure that all advertisements for medicinal products will be sufficiently tailored to everyone's taste. We attempt, however, to eliminate areas of deception and of excessive exaggeration and generally to require that the advertisement will be factual but without unduly deglamourizing its presentation. To do so, would be regarded as an unwarranted interference by the government with the right of a manufacturer to describe and to market his product in the way that he feels most suitable in a competitive system. As regards the Food and Drugs Act, we have no right of censorship and can only take action in the case of printed material after its publication. Here we endeavour to do the best possible in a very difficult area. I am sure that the quality of medicinal advertising in Canada is, in comparison with that in other countries, of a very sober and moderate character.

NATIONAL PRODUCTIVITY COUNCIL—UNION REPRESENTATION

Question No. 357—Mr. Badanai:

1. Is it the intention of the government to appoint a representative of major industrial unions on the national productivity council?

2. If not, for what reason?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answers to parts 1 and 2 are as follows.

By P.C. No. 1961-290 of February 28, 1961, the following representatives of organized labour were appointed to the national productivity council:

Claude Jodoin, president, Canadian Labour Congress, Ottawa, Ontario; Marcel Pepin, director, national metal trades federation, Quebec city, Quebec; Arthur R. Gibbons, vice-president and legislative representative in Canada, the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen, Ottawa, Ontario; Michael H. Nicols, Canadian vice president, international association of asbestos workers and president, provincial building and construction trades council of Ontario, Toronto, Ontario; John D. Carroll, international representative and assistant to the Canadian vice president, international brotherhood of boilermakers, iron shipbuilders, blacksmiths, forgers and helpers, Toronto, Ontario.

These appointments and others were announced by the right hon. Prime Minister in this chamber on that day, February 28, 1961, and are recorded in column 2, page 2483 of the House of Commons Hansard.

Starred Questions

C.M.H.C. SEWAGE PROJECT LOANS

Question No. 358—Mr. McMillan:

In connection with the amending legislation empowering Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make loans for the purpose of aiding the construction and expansion of municipal sewage treatment projects: (a) how many municipalities have applied for such loans? (b) how many loans have been approved, and to what amount? (c) what is the interest charge on the loans? (d) what is the total amount of the capital that will be written off in respect to loans already approved?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the four parts of this question are as follows:

(b) 45; estimated amount of $27,429,213.

(c) 5⅛ per cent on the first 33 loans; 5⅜ per cent on the remaining 12 loans, after the corporation's borrowing rate from the consolidated fund was raised one quarter of one per cent.

(d) An estimated $6,994,450.

MRS. FRANCES MALONEY, VANCOUVER—DEPORTATION ORDER

Question No. 360—Mr. Howard:

1. Has a deportation order been issued against a Mrs. Frances Maloney of Vancouver, and, if so, what is the date of the said order?
2. Is Mrs. Maloney a Canadian citizen, and, if not, of what country is she a citizen?
3. How long has Mrs. Maloney been resident in Canada?
4. Has Mrs. Maloney any children, and, if so, how many, what is the age of each, where was each born, and what is the nationality of each?
5. Is Mrs. Maloney's husband a Canadian citizen?
6. Has any appeal been lodged against the deportation order, and, if so, what is the present status of the appeal?
7. Has a deportation order been issued against Mrs. Maloney's husband or any of the children?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the seven parts of this question are as follows:

1. A deportation order was issued to Mrs. Frances Maloney on April 14, 1961.

2. No. She is a citizen of the United Kingdom and colonies.

3. Since November 9, 1949.

4. Mrs. Maloney has five children, three by her first husband. At the time of their admission to Canada in 1949 the three children by the first marriage were aged six, four and two years and were stated to have been born in the United Kingdom and to be citizens of the United Kingdom and colonies. They are presently in the custody of her first husband. The remaining two children are by her second husband. They are aged six and four years, were born in Vancouver and are Canadian citizens.

5. Mrs. Maloney's present husband is a Canadian citizen.

[Mr. Morris.]

6. There is no provision in the Immigration Act for an appeal against a deportation order of the nature issued to Mrs. Maloney. Nevertheless a review, such as would have been made had an appeal been permitted, has been made. The case is still under consideration.

7. No.

SUBSIDIES FOR STEEL FISHING TRAWLERS

Question No. 361—Mr. Granger:

1. Are the subsidies for steel fishing trawlers announced by the Minister of Transport on May 12 limited to replacements of existing trawlers?
2. If not, what are the requirements for securing the subsidy in the case of an applicant who requires additional trawlers?
3. Would other steel fishing vessels, such as long liners, qualify for subsidies, and, if so, on what conditions?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the regulations to be made by the governor in council will set out in a detailed manner the various conditions governing the payment of the subsidy. The regulations are now in course of preparation, and they will be made available as soon as possible.

FEDERAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH DOSCO

Question No. 362—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Was an assurance given to Dosco that if certain coal mines were kept open during the winter of 1960-61, the federal government would not object to their closure in the summer of 1961?
2. If not, precisely what arrangements were made with Dosco to maintain production in these mines during the past winter?
3. Precisely what assistance has been offered to Dosco to keep the mines open?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of this question is no.

The answer to the second part is that the arrangements which were made with Dosco are stated in a press release issued jointly on January 9, 1961, by the Minister of National Revenue and myself. We made the announcement in this manner because the house was not then in session. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate might like to have a copy of this press release for his files, and I am consequently now handing him one.

The answer to the third part of the question is contained precisely in order in council P.C. 1961-18 of January 9, 1961.

DUTY FREE SHOP LICENCES

Question No. 363—Mr. Garland:

1. What licence or permit is required from the federal government to operate a duty free shop in Canada?
2. How many such licences or permits have been issued?
3. What is the location or proposed location of each shop for which a licence or permit has been issued?

4. Is it proposed to issue additional licences or permits?

5. Does the government intend to allow the establishment of a chain of duty free shops across Canada this year?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the five parts of this question can be answered by simply explaining that what are popularly known as duty free shops are not licensed or otherwise controlled by the federal government. What are licensed and controlled are the customs bonded warehouses, in conjunction with which so-called duty free shops may operate and from which goods are ex-warehoused for home consumption or for export.

There are over 400 licensed bonded warehouses, only two of which are known to have sales outlets or duty free shops for the display of duty paid samples of the goods in warehouse. It is from these samples that the tourist makes his selection, and his purchases are then ex-warehoused and shipped by common carrier in bond to his address outside of Canada. One of these outlets is located at Lansdowne, Ontario and the other is at Cobourg, Ontario.

Licences for the operation of customs bonded warehouses are issued to applicants who meet the requirements of the Customs Act and the regulations thereunder.

PENRYN SECURITIES LTD.—ANNUAL RETURN

Question No. 353—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the companies division a record of Penryn Securities Ltd.?

2. If so, when did this company last file an annual return?

3. On such return, who were the officials and the stated shareholders?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could revert to question 353 which I asked the house to allow to stand. I now have the answer.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that we revert to starred question No. 353?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Balcer: The answer to part 1 of this question is yes.

The answer to part 2 is as at March 31, 1961.

The answer to part 3, as to the directors, is: Mrs. Alice M. W. Howe, John W. Howe, and James D. Dodge; as to shareholders there is no information available.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES REPORTS

Question No. 136—Mr. Howard:

1. Since July 1, 1957, have any reports from the restrictive trade practices commission been received?

2. If so, and with respect to each such report, what was (a) the nature of its inquiry (b) its date (c) its recommendations (d) the names of the persons or companies to which the recommendations applied (e) the action taken on these recommendations, and the results thereof?

Return tabled.

NARCOTIC DRUGS, B.C. PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 350—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1957, have any narcotic drugs been found (a) in the possession of an inmate in the British Columbia penitentiary (b) in the possession of a staff member or employee in the B.C. penitentiary, or (c) on any of the B.C. penitentiary reserve lands, or in or near any of the penitentiary buildings; and, if so, how many said inmates or said employees were found to be in possession, and in how many instances were narcotic drugs found upon the said lands or in or near any of the said buildings with the date of each such find?

2. What volume of such drugs, by type, were found in the possession of each said inmate or employee or were found in or near the said buildings?

3. What penalty, if any, was meted out to each said inmate or said employee?

4. Have any of the inmates or employees been suspected of being in possession of such drugs; and, if so, in how many instances?

THE BUDGET

DELAY IN PRESENTATION—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave, seconded by the hon. member for Welland, to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the failure of the government to divulge the contents of the annual budget to more than 100,000 electors in four federal constituencies who, in the absence of such information, will be denied the facts essential to render a responsible verdict on the policies of this government.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was good enough to give me, as he came into the house, a copy of the proposed request for leave to move the adjournment of the house, and I have had an opportunity to consider it.

I think it is unnecessary to call on anyone for assistance to determine that this is not the type of matter which could be made the subject of a motion under rule 26 which, may I remind hon. members, permits a motion for the adjournment of the house, when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, to supersede all other business of the house. My reasons, which I think I should state briefly, are these.

The substance of the hon. member's definite matter of urgent public importance is the time of the introduction of the budget which, of course, is a matter for the ministers of the crown. It is not a matter that concerns private members. The introduction of the budget is a matter in the discretion of the government. The date when it is introduced is purely a discretionary matter for decision by the government.

Reference is made to four by-elections affecting some parts of Canada. The hon. member does not suggest that the matter is of general importance but that it is of importance to those constituencies which are now electing representatives. In order to bring a matter of this kind within the rule requiring that it be an urgent matter of public importance affecting the people of Canada, one would be obliged to make the assumption that the budget, if and when it is introduced, will affect the electors of these constituencies in a different way from that in which it will affect the electors of Canada generally. With all due respect to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, may I say that I do not think the rule was designed to permit the discussion of a matter of this kind, which could be discussed at any time and which could have been discussed at any time since the by-elections were called, by way of a motion of criticism or censure of the government. In reality what the hon. member wishes to do is not to debate an urgent public matter which debate might resolve, but rather to criticize the government for delaying the introduction of its budget. On those grounds I therefore do not feel that—

Mr. Benidickson: Before you conclude your decision, Mr. Speaker, will you hear me on a point of order?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Yes; I will hear the hon. member if he will direct himself specifically to what I have said and to the point which I have made.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, rule 26 deals with several very pertinent points. First, the matter dealt with must be a definite one. I suggest that my statement submitted to you is definite. It must be urgent, and it must be of public importance. On those points I wish to address myself to you, Mr. Speaker. In so far as importance is concerned, may I say that I cannot think of anything that is of more importance to the citizens of Canada at the present time than to have an accounting upon the stewardship of this government at a time when we are in economic paralysis.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Benidickson: I believe that it is urgent. It is unusual not to have an accounting earlier than the present time. There is uncertainty and uneasiness across the country.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, do you propose to have your ruling defied by this partisan diatribe?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He has not given a ruling.

Mr. Speaker: No, I do not propose to permit that course. I think I have indicated to the hon. member what my disposition is, and I presented one or two propositions in support of what I said. I trust that the hon. member, if he wishes to say anything before I dispose of the matter finally, will keep his remarks relevant to those points and will not debate the matter which he asked leave to raise, because that would be quite out of order.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, to refer to your own remarks, you had an impression that this was not of, I think I quote, "general importance". I suggested in my statement that over 100,000 electors are involved and the constituencies represent four provinces; those constituencies go from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast. I say that I think we have an unusual element of general importance which gives rise to this motion.

With respect to other opportunity—which is another salient element for validity in making a motion of this kind—the Minister of Finance, as far as I know, is not appearing anywhere across the country in connection with this very important verdict that has to be established by our Canadian electorate—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member address himself to opportunities for debate, but not debate the matter with which he wishes to deal.

Mr. Benidickson: I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is here in the parliament of the nation, in the absence of a budget, that we should have from the Minister of Finance, if he will not go and face the electorate—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Benidickson: —a statement which would be provided under the motion which I make today—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: We should have from him an accounting, temporarily—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Can you not see the Speaker on his feet?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's remarks are directed more to the substance of what he wishes to move than to the point of order. I have no doubt that this is not the sort of matter which can be raised in this way under rule 26; therefore I do not propose to accept the request for leave.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, will you listen to further argument?

Mr. Speaker: No, I am not in need of further argument, and I think I would only be taking up the time of the house unnecessarily by listening to further argument.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, are we not to have notices of motions for production of papers?

Mr. Speaker: The point is well taken.

Mr. Ricard: This is the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST THAT QUESTION BE WITHDRAWN FROM ORDER PAPER

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, with leave of the house could I revert to the opportunity that is usually afforded by the Secretary of State when he requests that certain questions be made orders for returns? After discussion with the Minister of Finance, and with leave of the house I would ask that question No. 142 in my name be dropped for rewording.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Order discharged and question dropped.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND DEFENCE PRODUCTION CONTRACTS WITH CANADIAN MARCONI

Motion No. 130—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all current contracts between the departments of national defence and of defence production and the Canadian Marconi Company.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, agreement is given to the production of a copy of these papers, subject to the withholding of any security provisions that may be therein contained.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether before we go too much further we could have an indication of what is meant by "security provisions"? It is a rather broad, all-inclusive phrase.

An hon. Member: No, it is not.

Mr. O'Hurley: In defence projects there are classified provisions and security provisions. This refers to security provisions.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations requested by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION, NEW DRUGS—PERSONNEL EMPLOYED AND COST

Motion No. 133—Mr. Howard:

For a list of the names of, and positions held by, staff members or employees of the combines investigation branch, who worked on the inquiry regarding the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs; along with the period of time spent by each, the cost of the inquiry in terms of salary and expenses paid to each, as well as other expenditures by classification.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to accept this motion subject to the understanding that I will be unable to supply an answer to that part of it asking for an allocation of time spent on the investigation and for a breakdown of salaries, because the officers and staff of the combines branch were engaged at the same time in a number of other matters. They do not keep tab of the time spent by each officer on a given investigation. Also, the general salary expenses are not broken down on such a basis.

Subject to these reservations I would be prepared to accept the motion and comply with the other part.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATIVE ACTION FOLLOWING WITHDRAWAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that on May 31 the Union of South Africa will become a republic and will cease to be a member of the commonwealth, has the government given any consideration to the necessity for legislative action by Canada along lines announced in the United Kingdom by the introduction at Westminster of the republic of South Africa temporary provisions bill?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, very full consideration has been given to this matter. In the United Kingdom legislation known as standstill legislation was introduced providing for the continuance for a period of one year of the various acts and statutes that are in effect.

We believe there is no necessity for omnibus or comprehensive consideration of the various statutes that are in existence dealing either with South Africa in particular or the commonwealth in general, and that if there is a necessity for any legislative action it should be on an ad hoc basis.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could put a question supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Essex East, to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and ask the hon. lady whether her department has given any consideration, or is giving consideration, to what the status of South African citizens will be after May 31.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker; the number of applications which have been received have not been of a volume to require any special consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. lady perhaps misunderstood my question. I was not referring to applications for admission to Canada of immigrants; I was referring to South African citizens who were resident in Canada and whose status might very well be affected under the existing citizenship act. I wonder whether the hon. lady or her officers have given any consideration to this question.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I understand the import of the hon. member's question. If these people are here as landed immigrants, of course they are in the same situation as when they arrived. If they wish to apply in due course for Canadian citizenship, of course nothing is altered with regard to their qualifications therefor. If they are here as visitors, of course this raises another problem which would have to be dealt with in due course, but since I do not know of any specific cases at the moment I am afraid I could not give an answer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Justice, in view of the reply of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the reply of the Prime Minister, whether the Department of Justice has examined this situation to find out, for instance, whether the citizenship act, the Canada Shipping Act or any of the existing commercial treaties will in any way be affected by the action of South Africa on May 31.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Department of Justice, as usual, has anticipated the hon. member in this matter, and the result of our study was incorporated in the reply given by the Prime Minister.

INDUSTRY

USE OF SPECIAL FUND TO RETAIN CONTROL OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Could the minister inform the house whether the government is giving consideration to the establishment of a fund which would be used when necessary to purchase shares in Canadian companies in order to prevent them coming under foreign control?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I think this is a question of the type which you have frequently ruled to be improper on orders of the day, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Herridge: My question is based on an article in the Globe and Mail of today's date, and it does cause some concern and interest.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the objection taken I will give consideration to the question and advise the hon. member tomorrow.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—REPORTED STATEMENT BY NEW YORK ENGINEER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister arising from an article which appeared in Le Devoir of today's date, according to which the mayor of Sorel, Dr. Robert Fiset, is reported to have received a letter from a consulting engineer in New York, Mr. William Lathrop Rich, in which he claims that Canada apparently does not favour a study of the feasibility of the construction of a waterway on the Richelieu and Hudson rivers, and that the department of the secretary of state of the United States is still awaiting an answer from the Canadian government to questions which were alleged to have been sent in November, 1958 dealing with the New York-Montreal waterway. Would the Prime Minister care to comment on this statement.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is in effect citing a newspaper report and asking for its verification. If he wishes to direct a question based on the facts involved in that report it would be admissible under the rules, but to ask for the verification of newspaper reports is not permitted unless the hon. member who raises the matter is prepared to take responsibility for the accuracy of the facts about which he is inquiring.

Mr. Johnson: I am not taking responsibility for the accuracy of these statements. I am simply asking the Prime Minister whether he wishes to comment on the alleged facts or the reported statement by Mr. Lathrop Rich.

Mr. Speaker: If the Prime Minister is willing to accept the question I suppose it may be allowed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not know anything about the article in question. I would simply say to the hon. gentleman, whose interest in this matter is generally known, that the appropriate departments are continuing their study of this project. The review is of a continuing nature and has been in progress for some time. When the government is in a position to decide as to the proper course to be adopted on the basis of the examination which is taking place, the house will immediately be informed.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): In order to resolve this difficulty arising in connection with correspondence with the United States, does the Prime Minister not think it would be very useful to table all correspondence between the Canadian government and the United States government on this subject?

NATIONAL REVENUE

DUTY FREE SHOPS—PAYMENT OF EXCISE TAX AND DUTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): In the regrettable absence of the Minister of National Revenue I wonder if I could address a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the hon. gentleman tell the house if the sale of goods at these duty free centres now being established in Canada enables the avoidance of Canadian sales and excise taxes as well as duty?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): That is obviously not a question to be asked on the orders of the day. A starred question was dealt with earlier, and in the course of the reply any jurisdiction in relation to the licensing of such shops was expressly denied on the part of the government. If the hon. member is asking questions now about shops which are presently being operated, then the question should be put on the order paper and not be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. Garland: I should like to submit a further question based on a report which appeared in yesterday's Citizen with respect to the formal seasonal opening of a Canadian duty free centre near the Thousand islands bridge. The report continues that a second such centre will be opened by the same company at Niagara Falls on June 25. I should like to ask the minister to tell the house why Canadian retailers, paying duty, paying sales tax and paying excise tax should be subjected to competition of this kind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That emphasizes the point I made in replying to the hon. member's earlier question. If this is a matter which involves any responsibility in relation to any federal department of government, it is not a question which should be asked on the orders of the day. If the hon. member has a question of this nature to ask, I suggest that he put it on the order paper in accordance with the rules of the house.

Mr. Garland: Why does the minister not answer the question?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF STUDENTS ENGAGED IN BAN THE BOMB ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising from my reading of yesterday's issue of La Presse.

In view of an article in La Presse of May 23, which describes an R.C.M.P. attempt to infiltrate the Laval section of the combined universities campaign for nuclear disarmament in presumed search of communists, will the minister assure the house that the R.C.M.P. will cease these heavy-handed attempts to interfere in—indeed, to smear—this highly commendable student attempt to bring about a change in our defence policy?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I have not seen the article in question, therefore I am unable to say whether even that report gives any foundation for the hon. member's highly inaccurate and sensational allegation which, of course, I refute absolutely.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Inquiries by the R.C.M.P. into all matters, including security, are carried out in privacy, and information regarding them is never given except to persons properly entitled thereto. Any knowledge that such inquiries are being made, or any comments reaching the press, must therefore, on such occasions, come from those involved in or contacted during the course of such inquiries. This, of course, completely refutes any suggestion of smear on the part of the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Herridge: I would direct the attention of the minister to yesterday's issue of La Presse, which contains an important report on this matter. I should like to supplement my question by asking whether the minister is aware that the first meeting of the Laval section of the combined universities campaign for nuclear disarmament was addressed by Rev. Abbe O'Neil of Laval University, Dr. Jules Gilbert, director general of the Quebec hospital insurance service and by Major W. H. Pope, M.C.—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman is giving some very interesting information on a point which is not of urgent public importance.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—ACTION BY CABINET RESPECTING MINE CLOSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to preface my question by thanking the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys for his courtesy in drawing my attention to the press release which he sent over to me. Perhaps I might be allowed in the circumstances to read the sentence from this release on which I wish to base my question. It is this:

> The government of Canada has agreed to pay a subsidy to the corporation (Dosco) to be applied against the losses which the company reports as due to the operation of these mines. The government of the province of Nova Scotia has agreed to assume part of the cost of these additional subsidies.

The question I should like to put to the minister is this. Has the government agreed to pay these losses for any period beyond the dates specified in the press release?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): No, Mr. Speaker.

INCOME TAX

DRUMMONDVILLE, QUE.—REPORTED DELAY IN MAKING REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): I want to ask the Minister of National Revenue or, in his absence, his parliamentary secretary, a question.

I am sorry I did not give him advance notice of my question, but I suggest that he might take it as notice because it arises out of a request I received this morning from 45 citizens of Drummondville, asking what are the reasons for the delay in returning to the taxpayers reimbursements coming to them for the year 1960?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will supply some details, I shall investigate and answer him later.

PUBLIC SERVICE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CANAL SUPERINTENDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Latour (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): I wanted to ask the Secretary of State a question, but I notice that he is not here. However, he might perhaps answer my question later on. It has to do with the appointment—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suppose the hon. member might address his question to the Acting Secretary of State if he can identify the hon. gentleman, but I remind him that all questions must be directed toward a responsible minister or someone acting for him.

(Translation):

Mr. Latour: I might do so, Mr. Speaker, but I could also raise a question of personal privilege because this is a case which happened quite recently in my county.

It has to do with the appointment of a successor to the superintendent of the Carillon-Grenville canal, who died last March. The civil service commission has announced a competition on May 3. That competition was closed on May 15 and, on May 17, a successor was appointed.

I would like to know the names of the candidates who sent in applications for that competition. Moreover, I would like to know whether these candidates have been called—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question relates to the administration of the civil service commission in filling appointments to the public service, in which it exercises an independent judgment, subject to parliament. I am not sure to what minister the question could be addressed. It is rather a novel one. In any event, it asks for information that cannot be expected without notice on the order paper, and I suggest the hon. member might try putting the question on the order paper.

PUBLICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Has the Prime Minister now received the O'Leary report? If so, how soon does he hope to be in a position to make it available to hon. members?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not received the report yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the Prime Minister answer the second part of the question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the second part until the first can be answered affirmatively.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether it is a fact that he was advised by the chairman that the report would be put in his hands this week?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker, although I have read in the press that the secretary of the commission gave the press a statement to the effect that it would be delivered to me this week. I have not had that word from the chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister describe the information in the press as speculative?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would put the type of questions that I have been asked in that category.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—THREATENED STRIKE ACTION BY CARPENTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Since a vote favouring a strike has been taken by the carpenters' local on the Defence Construction Limited project in Moosonee, being carried out by Carter Construction Limited, will the minister indicate what action, if any, his officials have taken or are going to take to prevent this work stoppage?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to the hon. member for Fort William when he asked me a similar question regarding this situation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR LATEST STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): The noticeable failure of my colleague from Essex East to persist in seeking information, which is the subject of my question, raises a suspicion in my mind that the information may not be to his liking. I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him whether the figures for last month are available as to the number of men employed in the labour force, and whether he is able to make a comparison with those of the previous month. I should also like to have the number of unemployed last month and a comparison with the number for the previous month.

Mr. Speaker: Before the question is proceeded with would the hon. member allow me to eliminate the first part of his statement, which was out of order; otherwise I expect a debate will arise on the issue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before we continue with this may I suggest that the minister be allowed to make a statement on motions, and that would give me an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The dominion bureau of statistics released figures this morning showing a drop of 83,000 in the number of persons unemployed. I am sure all hon. members will agree with me that there is ground for optimism in the latest employment figures. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that 170,000 new jobs were provided in the one month period between March and April this year. I think this is a considerable achievement in the economy. If we compare it with the figures at the same time last year, Mr. Speaker, we find that we have had an employment gain of 111,000 in April. This means that we have succeeded in providing 111,000 more new jobs in April of this year than in April, 1960. Taken into consideration with other reports, this in my submission is an indication that at the present time the measures which the government has proposed and which parliament has—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the minister. I am not sure how much of the submission was heard by the reporter—

Mr. Benidickson: He ignored you, sir.

Mr. Speaker: —but the minister is proceeding to debate the effect of the government's program. I see the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a question, or perhaps, sir, you will permit me to make a comment about the figures, as the minister did.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fulton: He was stopped.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thought hon. gentlemen would be well disposed to accord that right, in view of the attitude taken by the Minister of Labour. May I continue?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is entitled to observe the rules of the house, as are all hon. members.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question, noting, along with him, with satisfaction the fact that there has been some improvement in the situation. But is it not a fact that, according to the reported figures, there are still over half a million unemployed, more than in any other country in the western world? Is this not a matter of concern even to this government?

Mr. Starr: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are people unemployed as yet, even though the number is not greater than that of any other western country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is greater than any western country.

Mr. Starr: There is every indication, as this press release shows, that the measures taken by this government are bringing about the desired result, and the problem will be minimized as the months go by.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

CLOSING OF FACILITIES ON HOLIDAYS DURING TOURIST SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Yesterday the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres inquired concerning the closing of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's birthplace at St. Lin, Quebec, last Monday. I have looked into the matter and I find the house was closed on that day owing to the indisposition of the caretaker. I can assure the hon. member that it is the policy of the department to keep all national parks and historic sites open seven days a week, particularly on statutory holidays.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO LETTER FROM B.C. PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Is the Minister of Finance now in a position to make available to the house the letter from the premier of British Columbia, dated January 13, 1961, about which the hon. member for Laurier asked on Monday and which the minister said he would be pleased to table if there was the consent of both governments? In view of the fact that the premier seems to have made selected portions of this letter public, perhaps I can ask the minister whether he really feels the whole letter should be denied to this parliament?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No; I shall be very pleased to table the letter, but I think out of courtesy to the government of British Columbia they should be approached in regard to it, and this is what I propose to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the fact that this is a matter of great public interest, does the minister intend to defer that approach, as everything is being deferred, until after next Monday?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows he is out of order in making a statement of that kind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, the hon. member has deliberately put a question that he knows is out of order. He has left, and deliberately sought to leave, an imputation on the record. He has been doing this right along. There is no deferment of any kind going on in this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why did the minister not ask him on Monday?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I believe I am to see the premier of British Columbia tomorrow. There has been no deferment of anything else, notwithstanding the attempt of the opposition to draw a lot of eyewash over this house and over the public in regard to this matter. The Leader of the Opposition makes irresponsible statements in the House of Commons and on the hustings.

Mr. Hellyer: Then you must be more incredibly incompetent than we thought.

Mr. Speaker: This is a very easy way to start an argument.

[Later:]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the letter from the premier of British Columbia, to which I alluded in an earlier question, already been tabled in the house during the present session?

Mr. Speaker: I think it is unnecessary to ask a question the answer to which is readily available to all hon. members.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order you have raised, sir, it had been suggested to me that it had been tabled. I have been searching to find out whether it has been tabled, and it seems to me a matter that would be clearly within the recollection of the minister, the only person who could have tabled it. For the convenience of hon. members I was simply asking whether the minister would say whether this had happened.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO BARRING OF POLISH IMMIGRANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I have another question I wish to put to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the hon. lady seen the article in yesterday's edition of her favourite newspaper, the Toronto Star, which is headed "Proxy Bride Barred, He Quits Canada"? It refers to a Polish immigrant by the name of Wilk, and the article suggests a rather inhumane attitude on the part of the minister. Has she any comment to make on this case?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer to all phases of the question is no.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. In view of his reluctance to disclose the nature of the nation's financial situation before the by-elections—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —could he tell us whether the budget will be presented in the house before the 5th of June?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when it is timely and proper to make an announcement of that date it will be made, but I draw your attention to the fact that the hon. member for Essex East preceded his question with an observation and I think it is my right to make an observation.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The last budget has not yet passed all phases of the parliamentary process, and at the present time the hon. member is trying to make it appear that there has been some delay. There has been no delay, and I think it ill behooves hon. members in the opposition to be making distortions of the facts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the minister and the hon. member for Essex East have gone equally far afield, and we might close the debate.

Criminal Code

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton for the second reading of Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder).

(Translation):

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, before I resume the remarks I was making last evening, I should like to point out that on this day, May 24, the province of Quebec honours Dollard des Ormeaux. History reports that, with 16 men, Dollard des Ormeaux prevented the Iroquois from attacking Ville-Marie and that his courage was such that it should inspire all Canadian youths. Today, I should like to urge once again the young people of my province to cultivate that hero's virtues and to develop within themselves a greater love for Canada, the better to appreciate the liberty we enjoy in this country.

At the conclusion of last evening's sitting, I was just going to criticize the suggestion made by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) to the effect that any murder should be considered as a capital murder. I was just going to suggest the contrary. However, in the meantime I had a chance to read over the hon. member's speech, and to give some thought to his suggestion and, since it is good to sleep on a problem, I am glad to say today that I fully agree with my colleague and that I, in turn, wish to suggest that any charge of murder should be one of capital murder.

Three reasons lead me to take this stand. First of all, if the charge is invariably one of capital murder and if during the trial, it is shown that the accused is not guilty of capital murder but of non-capital murder, the jury can always bring in a verdict of guilt of a lesser offense.

Second, if a person is accused of non-capital murder and if, during the trial, it becomes obvious that the crime committed is inded a capital murder, the jury would no longer be able to find the accused guilty of capital murder, and the accused would escape the prescribed penalty for capital murder.

Finally, if the attorney general is left to decide whether a person should be charged with capital murder or non-capital murder, he will then have discretionary powers which will cause him a lot of embarrassment since, in fact, he will then have to decide all by himself whether or not the suspect has committed a capital murder.

Therefore, I fully endorse the suggestion made by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere.

In addition, I would like to say that section 642A of the present bill is causing me some anxiety also. Let us say that, after they have deliberated, the jury come to the conclusion that the accused is guilty of murder. The judge would then pass judgment and, afterwards, would ask the jury whether they bring in a recommendation of mercy. This would more or less put the jurors under a moral obligation of recommending clemency.

Furthermore, the jury would have to have another opportunity to retire and decide whether or not the accused should be recommended to the clemency of the court.

I would rather suggest that somehow the wording of section 642A be made an integral part of the summary of the proceedings which the chairman of the court is required to deliver to the jury; the chairman would conclude his remarks by a reading of section 642A. The jurors would then be in a position to discuss two points: first, the guilt of the accused, and second, assuming that the accused was found guilty, they could immediately decide whether or not he should be recommended to the clemency of the court.

The hon. member who spoke before me last night pointed out that in the presence of the parents and friends and citizens attending the trial, it would be extremely difficult for a jury not to bring in a recommendation of clemency. It does seem that in every case, even if the accused did not deserve such a recommendation, the jurors would feel bound to make it.

Mr. Chairman, there is one extremely interesting point in this bill; the provision dealing with the costs of appeals. Under the former Criminal Code, a person found guilty of murder had to hang. However, he was told that he could appeal to a higher court, but this was on the condition that he was able to pay the costs.

There has been a tremendous amount of criticism on this score. Everywhere people would say that freedom could be bought, because if a court had made a mistake, the sentence could be appealed, but the convicted person had to pay, and in many cases a fabulous amount.

So I sincerely commend the Minister of Justice for making justice available to all, both the rich and the poor.

I would also draw the attention of the house to another point in relation to section 206-(4), in which reference is made to the penalty of life imprisonment. It is stated in subsection 4 of that section that with regard to part 20, the life imprisonment sentence provided under that section is a minimum penalty. I realize that this in no way affects the exercise of the royal prerogative, which in certain cases allows the governor in council to commute a sentence; however, I think it should be clearly set out that when an individual found guilty of capital murder is sentenced to life imprisonment, the national parole board will under no circumstances have the right to commute the sentence, and that the accused having been convicted of that crime will have to serve a life term, unless the governor in council should decide to exercise the royal prerogative.

Mr. Chairman, there is one last point I should like to deal with. I refer to the jury system which was so highly commended yesterday by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney). I must say I am not in agreement with him. I still feel that too heavy a responsibility is placed on the shoulders of those people. The man in the street—whether he be a farmer, a worker, an accountant or even a professional—is asked to act as a juror without any training whatsoever, and without any kind of court experience; he is asked to come and decide whether or not someone is guilty of murder.

I am not a criminologist, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether it was by inclination or through necessity, but I have always kept at a respectful distance from criminal law. Nevertheless, I know that the jury is strongly influenced by the counsel who is arguing before him. He is sensitive first of all to the deportment of the lawyer, his general behaviour and, it must be admitted, most of all to his oratory. He is also sensitive to the prestige of the lawyer and, finally, if a counsel endowed with all the qualities I just mentioned can find among the panel a juryman who exercises a certain ascendancy over his colleagues, he has won his case.

It is easy to spot the juryman who seems to be the cleverest and the most sympathetic, and then the next step which is quite simple is to say to oneself: I must convince that man and, once I have convinced him, he will take upon himself, once they are behind closed doors, to work on the other jurymen.

In short, Mr. Speaker, let us say that the outcome of the case rests solely on the judgment that one member of the jury will form, thanks to the ability of the counsel to convince him of the merits of his argument.

Many an accused is without the financial means necessary to engage a lawyer. In that case, a counsel is appointed by the court. He is usually a young lawyer whose experience of course does not compare with that of the crown attorney. He lacks the prestige and the resources of an experienced lawyer, so that he cannot exercise upon a leader in the jury the influence which the attorney can wield and it is the accused who must suffer the consequences.

Since we are discussing officially appointed counsels, may I, Mr. Speaker, ask the minister to seek a means by which a nominal amount could be made available to an accused person to permit him to be represented by counsel, when that person cannot afford to be thus represented and so that he may be given the fair and just treatment to which he is entitled.

I notice that it is almost one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, but, with the permission of the house, I would like to go on. I would be satisfied with a few minutes more. I may exceed the hour by one or two minutes but I will have finished my speech.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that in former years such a debated and debatable question has ever been introduced in the house. It is a matter where politics have nothing to do. It means that members whatever their party must form a personal opinion. Let us do away with a partisanship which unfortunately we have, because our responsibility is great—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, from the notes I had taken, I felt that my speech should last about 12 minutes. However, it was interrupted by two adjournments and this, of course, gave me an opportunity this morning of correcting a previous statement. However, I hope my speech as a whole will be fairly homogeneous once it is printed in Hansard.

Before the recess, I was telling the house that it bears a heavy responsibility. I am glad that today we do not have to decide whether capital punishment should be abolished because I, for one, could certainly not support such a step; it would be a little premature, in my opinion.

In conclusion, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Justice who, by sponsoring this bill, wishes justice to be done in the light of the circumstances under which a murder has been committed. Our laws concerning murder will thus be made more humane and, I would even say, more civilized. As stated last evening by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), this is a step in the right direction.

To those who seek to abolish capital punishment, I will say this: Society must be protected. Moreover, I still feel that the threat of capital punishment constitutes a useful deterrent, but I will add that criminals should be executed only in extreme cases and when all possibilities of doubt have been eliminated.

In addition, to those who vigorously advocate retention of capital punishment according to the former provisions of the Criminal Code, I shall say this: the execution of only one innocent person constitutes a heinous crime that falls on all of society.

Therefore, let us congratulate the government who is offering us today a material improvement in the treatment of people charged with murder. However, while hoping that people under a charge of murder will benefit from our sympathy, let us not forget that they owe a debt to society and let us sympathize too above all with those who were left to mourn the death of an innocent victim.

I shall be pleased to vote for this bill, but if I had to express my opinion right now on the possibility of abolishing the death penalty altogether, I would vote against the bill, because I much prefer to be over zealous against crime than to offend the freedom and the inviolable right of any individual to life.

(Text):

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, last year when this debate was before the house I did not have the opportunity to speak but as I listened to the trend of the debate I noticed that those who were in favour of the bill abolishing capital punishment had the advantage of the first thrust of debate.

It seemed to me that all the hon. members who spoke in the debate at that time were for the abolition of capital punishment. Then, as hon. members of the house were seized with the seriousness of the matter and their responsibility in this regard, they became more interested as the debate progressed. Each hon. member, as the seriousness of this matter took possession of his conscience, felt it was his duty to talk on that particular bill.

The hon. member for Scarborough introduced the bill and this gave an opportunity to all hon. members to express their views. In my opinion it was very wise to have that debate. It brought out the various aspects of the issue and the various positions which hon. members of the house took with regard to it. It also gave the government the opportunity of being able to get the pulse of hon. members, who were likewise reflecting the pulse of Canada, on whether this bill was appropriate at that particular time.

The hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) who introduced the bill, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney) and other interested hon. members marshalled their facts as to the efficacy of the bill with great skill. They are to be highly congratulated in that they did not miss very much in their submissions. The hon. member for Parkdale is to be particularly congratulated for the eloquence of his speech on this matter. Admittedly the hon. member for Parkdale has great forensic ability, but he was also very eloquent in putting forward his argument. He was very moderate in his statements and he put forward a very convincing case. No doubt he was using the same skill that he uses in court, and it was very effective.

As the debate progressed the tension mounted; everyone was beginning to feel he should go on record, and the government wisely discontinued the debate. In so doing they were able to properly assess the sense of hon. members of the house and also, as I mentioned previously, the will of the people of Canada.

The hon. member for York-Scarborough who introduced the bill admitted when speaking last evening that it was patently plain that the motion would be defeated. But it was not a question of having the motion defeated; it was important that the house was given the opportunity of discussing this matter and having a full debate on it, because this question had come up time after time, as to whether we were following the right course in the method by which the government was handling the commutation of death sentences and rehearing these cases. Now they have had time to study this law and they have brought in Bill No. C-92.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), as has been previously stated, are to be highly congratulated, along with the cabinet, on this bill. The Minister of Justice especially deserves commendation for his masterly presentation of the bill. The government has been very meticulous in setting out what the bill will accomplish, as I have said, having the benefit of the previous debate.

I think my own feelings are known on this matter but I did not have the opportunity of speaking at the time the bill of the hon. member for York-Scarborough was introduced. It would now be futile to take up the time of the house in recounting my own feelings on this matter. However, there are some things I should mention now that Bill No. C-92 is before us.

The Minister of Justice, in summing up this bill, has decided to apply, I think, what I would term the method laid down by two who are considered to be among the most outstanding authorities on law. They have been mentioned several times during the debate. I refer to Sir Edward Coke and William Blackstone. Sir Edward Coke was speaking about the execution of the Earl of Essex. I tremble to mention that name because I might make a mistake and say "the hon. member for Essex East". But this was the Earl of Essex who was up for treason at that time because of his episode against the queen.

Sir Edward Coke was talking about treason and he set out the method by which he assessed this matter. That was, that the principle of law, the rule of reason and the benefit and experience of trials should apply. I am quite sure that the Minister of Justice and the cabinet have applied the principle of law which has been set. I am sure they have also used rules of reason. Likewise they have had the benefit of long experience of trials in arriving at their decision.

For all time this bill, notwithstanding what has been said, that it is a step in the right direction, will be a bill which will not be tampered with and no attempt will be made to amend it for some considerable time. This is because it correctly reflects the feeling of the people of Canada. Because of the meticulous care that has been taken by the draftsmen of this bill there will be little need for any alteration to it in the future. To sum up the way I look at it, and the way in which I think the majority of hon. members have interpreted the feeling of our people, crimes of passion do not warrant capital punishment. Those who commit crimes that are premeditated or committed in cold blood, are the ones who will have to stand trial in court for determination as to whether justice demands the death penalty.

A great deal was said yesterday about the law, about it being punitive and retributive. I think hon. members will find that this bill is in conformity with our love of law and our system of order, which dates from the time of Alfred. At that time the king's word, Alfred's word, was law, but he insisted on the endorsation by the people of his edicts. He knew the popular heart and was close to the common people. He did not over-rate or under-rate the average mind, because in the final analysis he knew that the power was in the hands of the people themselves; it was in their hands to adopt the law and if it was not acceptable, they would not observe it.

We pride ourselves upon the justice of our laws. It has come down through the ages. The degree of civilization of society has always been judged on the basis of its concept of justice. I listened to the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton), and after hearing him I thought I had better look up the definition of "law" and see how it was set out. I went, as usual, to a dictionary in order to find out. I found the definition expressed in these words:

> All the rules of conduct established and enforced by the authority, legislation, or custom of a given community or other group: as a basic tenet of English law.
> The condition existing when obedience to such rules is general; established order.

The hon. member for Mount Royal defined the word "justice" very aptly, but I thought, nevertheless, that I should look it up for myself. The entry states very plainly:

> Sound reason; rightfulness; validity. Reward or penalty as deserved; the use of authority and power to uphold what is right, just or lawful.

I have here a reference to Edmund Burke who also has been frequently quoted. He said:

> Justice is itself the great standing policy of civil society; and any departure from it, under any circumsance, lies under the suspicion of being no policy at all.

I think that the minister, when drafting the bill, had all these concepts in mind and that this measure will result in a continuation, and even a broadening, of the conception of justice we have been following through the years. While the minority will have their rights under this legislation, it is recognized that the majority in this country also have their rights, and the system of law as we know it with its salient features of justice is being preserved.

As I followed the debate which took place last year I was impressed by the submission made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). He set out three incidents drawn from his experience during his life time. He told the house about three Indians who through misfortune, met with a sad fate. Apparently some incontinent officers charged with enforcing the law made debauching exactions upon the wives of these Indians, demands which were not within the code of morals and ethics. The Indians were incensed, went after the officers, and threw two of them over a cliff. For this they were apprehended, brought before a court of justice and condemned to death. The manner of their execution was faulty and inefficient, though that in itself was not the crux of this case, but created circumstances which were such as to inevitably arouse public sympathy for the condemned men.

The case which I have just outlined is an example of what is likely to follow any attack upon or molestation of women. If the law does not concern itself swiftly and effectively with such attacks, or if it does not mete out justice, men will resort to the law of the jungle and take the law into their own hands, because under the code of law in any land, civilized or uncivilized, men will protect their women. I think hon. members will find that the law as now proposed will cover such a case as I have just mentioned, the case which was first set out by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

The hon. member related the case of a lad 21 years of age who had been apprehended after a bank hold-up and robbery during which the teller was killed. The lad was the driver of the car that got away after a teller had been shot, but though he had taken no direct part in the killing he was condemned to death and finally hanged. The hon. member did not give us an explanation why he should not have been hanged except, possibly, on account of the lad's youth. In any event, this was a cold blooded murder, and he was an accomplice to the killing. The hon. member then told of a third case where an individual who had been away for some time in another province returned home to find his best friend in the house with his wife. In the heat of passion he killed them both. The man was tried, but the death sentence was afterwards commuted. This example does, in its own way, explain exactly what the present bill seeks to accomplish. In cases of cold blooded or premeditated murder, as well as cases of rape and crimes involving sexual deviation, there would be an application after a proper trial of the full weight of the law.

This brings us to the question whether the death penalty is a deterrent or whether it has no effect at all. The hon. member for York-Scarborough made use of a quotation from a report of a learned judge in the old country, and this probably answers the question more effectively than I could answer it. It reads as follows:

> It is certainly not a deterrent to murderers who commit suicide and one third of all murderers do. It is not a deterrent to the insane and mentally deranged, or to those who commit murder in a quarrel, or in drunkenness or in a sudden surge of passion. This type of murder amounts to 80 per cent to 90 per cent of all murders that are committed.
> It is not a deterrent to the type of person who commits murder because he desires to be hanged, and these cases are not infrequent. It is not a deterrent to the person who firmly believes in his own perfect method—by poison, acid bath, and so on—which, he thinks, will never be found out.

This also, it appears to me, sums up exactly what the bill seeks to accomplish. Between 80 per cent and 90 per cent of all murders come within this category of persons who are insane or drunk, or who act in the heat of passion; they are eliminated from consideration in terms of the death penalty. We are left with the other 10 per cent who are cold blooded murderers with regard to whom society needs to take severe action. This does not involve being vindictive or punitive; it is only a matter of enforcing justice. In the same way, a person who commits a robbery knows in advance what the penalty will be if he is caught. He knows exactly what the consequences will be. The crime of murder does not, of course, come into the same category as offences against property, and when a murder has been cold blooded, or when there has been rape plus bestial conduct, the penalty is bound to reflect this difference, and people who commit such crimes come within the 10 per cent to which reference has been made, to whom the threat of a death penalty may be a deterrent.

I wish to differ from those who say that in these circumstances the death penalty is no deterrent. It is true that it is no deterrent to those in the wider category of 80 per cent to 90 per cent referred to by the hon. member for York-Scarborough. But there has been no adequate method of measuring the extent to which capital punishment does deter people from committing murder. The very fact that only 10 per cent of the crimes involving murder are committed as a result of premeditation shows that the death penalty may well be a deterrent to a lot of people—but there is no possible way of ascertaining the intention of individuals and whether or not they have been deterred, for obvious reasons. The very fact that perpetrators of murder are caught, tried and condemned to hang for their crime is evidence that the 10 per cent mentioned serve as a most effective deterrent against similar action on their part.

Reference was made to the horror attached to murder trials. Quite often sympathy is not directed toward the victim of the murder but to the person who perpetrated the crime. The culprit was said to be suffering because of the ordeal he was going through at the trial and before the execution took place. In the early days, immediately the sentence was passed the condemned individual was taken out and executed. But because it was felt that an innocent victim may be hanged, this system was changed and sufficient time was given the convicted man to gather information and enter an appeal to prove innocence. Because of the humaneness of the justices at that time, provision was made for the gathering of evidence to launch an appeal. The result is that something which was granted as a humane action has now come to be regarded as an ordeal inspiring public sympathy because the time between the passing of the sentence and the execution has been prolonged. The result is that the relatives of the victim are considered to go through an ordeal. The relatives of the murdered individual are relegated to the limbo of the forgotten and the sympathy is always given to the person who perpetrated the crime.

Cold blooded murders have been mentioned. I will give the house a few illustrations of what has happened in the city of Toronto. I recall an individual who had been in a hold-up. Later his car was stopped by a policeman and he was asked to show his driver's licence. On the pretext of pulling out his licence he pulled out a gun and shot the policeman. The policeman died. I suppose in those circumstances it could be called a cold blooded murder. But excuses are made. Perhaps he ate something that morning which upset him, and his disposition was such that he did not feel right. He did not mean to shoot the policeman, but he did.

Just recently an officer of the law was hot on the trail of a couple of individuals who had committed some bank robberies. They were traced to a certain street. The officer pulled up his car, got out to question the men, and one of them pulled out his gun and shot the policeman in his tracks. He lived three months. He went through physical and mental torture before he died. All the sympathy was given to the individual who committed the robbery. The man who was murdered left a family deprived of his care and his promising future was prematurely finished. I suppose it could be said that the robber was not feeling right that day and he should not be looked upon as a serious offender. I could mention other cases.

I was raised in a community in close proximity to the jail where all the executions took place. My memory goes back to the turn of the century. Trial reports were followed very closely in those days, more so than now, because of verbatim coverage. Outstanding lawyers were engaged, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Parkdale. Budding Blackstones and Cokes were given their opportunity to gain experience. We had some outstanding lawyers in those days such as George Lynch-Staunton, George Tate Blackstock, Zebulum Lash and Tom Robinette. In the future I do not suppose any of the young lawyers coming along will be deprived of the opportunity to get experience in court trials because there will always be a demand for genius. I do not think there will be fewer murders.

The point I wish to make was mentioned by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). It is our duty to protect the citizens of Canada against the perpetrators of crime. I think the debate has been of sufficient length. As I have said, I think this bill is going to meet the purpose as I see it. However, I should try to emphasize one thing. Reference has been made to the cost of keeping those individuals in prison. Surely we are not going to measure justice in that way. We do not want to return to the vicious system of justice and law which prevailed in the olden days and to which Sir Winston Churchill has made reference and under which a person was imprisoned for a crime and the length of imprisonment was based on the status of the individual concerned. If an ordinary peasant was killed the punishment was so much; if an earl, it was so much; if it was a prince it was so much, and so on, according to the rank of the individual killed. It was a vicious and sordid system because the penalty increased according to the rank. If it was a prince, then the penalty was extremely severe. I am sure we do not want that kind of a system in this country where the penalty for murder is based on the status of the individual in the country. I do not think this country wants the sort of law under which a convicted man pays his debt to society according to a schedule of tariff tolls, as it were.

This bill sets out what the law is going to be and justice will be based on it. If the principles of this legislation are followed out there is no doubt that they will amply cover any situation. Public opinion in this country has jelled. Those who have advocated abolition of capital punishment have made certain points. No one has ever submitted proof that since confederation anyone who was innocent has been hanged for murder. Abolitionists tell you that there are many of them but they do not point out any particular case. The fact of the matter is that our system of law has been so sound and the people are so satisfied with it that very few changes are required.

Those who are convicted of capital crimes will have the right to have their cases reconsidered on recommendation of the jury. Certain categories will be set out in the law and premeditated and cold blooded murderers will have to submit to what we call punitive justice as we know it, which course reflects the will of the majority of the people of Canada.

It is said that the people of the country are in favour of abolishing capital punishment. I question that because people have communicated with me on the matter both by telephone and by correspondence. Sometimes they are very forceful in their presentations but when they become threatening I cite to them a case that took place in my own particular area. A young girl was taken from the sidewalk on the main artery to a ravine where she was raped and bestially treated. This was done by an individual who had just been released from jail after serving a sentence for the same kind of offence. When the case was being investigated one of the detectives looked at the circumstances and said that it was Mr. so and so.

The man was immediately traced to where he was working. There was no question about who had committed the murder because the evidence was on him. He was apprehended and received the full penalty of law. When I describe such a case to individuals who are so possessed with the idea of abolishing capital punishment they invariably say that there are exceptions to all rules.

That is why this bill is sound in providing that capital punishment should be retained to take care of such cases. As I have said before, the Minister of Justice has drafted the bill on sound principles of law and reasonable rules that will operate effectively. The experience of trials in the past has been a factor in assisting the minister to bring forward what the people of Canada want. I think there will be little necessity in the future for amendment of the bill in any shape or form. The cases that have been mentioned will fit within the ambit and construction of the law and justice and the result will be better for the people of Canada because the bill takes into consideration the views that have been presented on this matter. Every hon. member has been sincere in presenting his opinion and is going to make his decision on the basis of what his conscience tells him to do. As a result of this debate I think we will come up with the best possible legislation to deal with this very serious question.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, for the past six months I have been closely associated with the branch in the Department of Justice that has had a good deal to do with capital cases. I know something of the care and attention that have been given in the past to the possibility of the condemned person receiving commutation through the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. I think we can all agree with the observation of the last speaker that the bill should satisfy everybody. It should satisfy those who are opposed to complete abolition and it should satisfy those, and I know it does, who have been working toward that end because there has been a change in the definition of murder as is set forth in the bill itself.

We must always remember that the chief purpose of punishment is protection of the public. Those who are entrusted with the administration of justice have a sacred duty to see that the punishment is effective in carrying out its object. The traditional punishment for murder, as it has been for treason and for piracy, has been death. For murder this is a mandatory punishment that must be imposed as soon as the person is found guilty. Until 1955 a person convicted of rape was liable to a sentence of death. We have made progress by having that eliminated.

We have now, as most countries have, an elaborate system for the detection, prevention, deterrence and punishment of crime. We have federal police, provincial police and municipal police. We have federal courts, provincial courts, municipal courts, county courts and districts courts. We have crown lawyers and defence lawyers. This whole elaborate system has been devised for the furtherance of the administration of justice. Therefore I think it is fair to say that in this country a man accused of a crime has every safeguard to see that he gets a fair and just trial.

We recognize in this country that a man is innocent until he has been proven guilty, and it has been generally accepted by the legal profession that a crown prosecutor is not out to gain a conviction but rather to see that justice is done. In the province of Quebec there is an instruction in the code for Quebec lawyers to the effect that their duty when acting as a crown attorney is not to win a conviction but to see that justice is done. In the light of these circumstances existing in the fabric of justice in this country, I think everyone has reason to be proud and no reason to fear that any injustice is going to be done to a person who is accused.

The question of capital punishment exercises more interest than any other type of punishment. It is of universal interest and people are divided on the matter. There are strong opinions such as we heard yesterday from the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). I think the hon. member for Vancouver East went too far, and I also think the hon. member for Hull went too far in his uncompromising attitude toward any change at all. If he looks at the matter fairly, I think he will see that the bill is a very fair one because he must recognize, as I will show later in my remarks, that in each year only a very few people are executed for murder although the number of murders is many times greater than the number of executions. Not only is this so now but it has been so for many years in Canada.

I think the hon. member who preceded me also made a true observation when he said that the debate has been a most interesting one because members have spoken sincerely on this subject about which they feel so strongly. We all know that this subject has been a matter of great interest in Canada for many years and it has also been of great interest in other countries. In 1949 a commission was appointed in the United Kingdom which took four years to develop its report. I would say that the report is a classic which every lawyer and every person interested in the question of capital punishment should try to read in full or at least in part. The commission was set up for this purpose, and I read from the royal warrant:

> Whereas we have deemed it expedient that a commission should forthwith issue to consider and report whether liability under the criminal law in Great Britain to suffer capital punishment for murder should be limited or modified and, if so, to what extent and by what means, for how long and under what conditions persons who would otherwise have been liable to suffer capital punishment should be detained, and what changes in the existing law and the prison system would be required; and to inquire into and take account of the position in those countries whose experience and practice may throw light on these questions.

The commission spent four years considering this matter. They visited other countries including the United States and various countries on the continent of Europe, and they came up with this report.

In 1955 a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada was appointed to study the question of capital punishment and it reported on June 27, 1956. We have here today several members who served on that committee, including the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery), and I believe the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) served part time on it, as well as two or three other members. The work of this committee occupied three sessions and they studied the administration of the Criminal Code in Canada as it related to this question of capital punishment. I should like to read from the first section of their report, which says:

> The committee endeavoured to give consideration to all aspects of the question of capital punishment. In addition to its study of the principal issue of abolition or retention, it considered proposals for limiting or modifying capital punishment by changes in law or procedure and gave special consideration to methods of executing the sentence of capital punishment. The committee, however, expressly excluded from its inquiry any consideration of the defence of insanity and related problems—

It will be seen, therefore, that these two studies constitute the important groundwork for anyone wishing to ascertain what has been done elsewhere as well as what has been done in this country. In addition, I should like to pay tribute to the work of the officials of the Department of Justice who have been studying these reports and keeping abreast of developments in other countries. I am aware of their worth because I have been dealing with them. They are as up to date as any officials could possibly be with regard to the law relating to capital punishment.

The hon. member for Vancouver East doubted the value of capital punishment as a deterrent. We all know that it is not a deterrent in all cases because we can usually visualize circumstances in which a man, in a fit of temper, commits an offence for which he is extremely sorry immediately afterwards. I think we can easily imagine a number of circumstances under which a murder might be committed which we would not regard as a capital murder. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small) has enumerated some murders of the type I have in mind. However, it is only common sense to conclude that capital punishment must be a deterrent for many persons. The very fact that we speak of cold-blooded murder, calculated murder, is evidence of this fact. We refer to people doing something by stealth. Why do they do it by stealth? Because they do not want to be found out. How many are there who commit murder mentally, who would like to murder someone but are afraid to do so because of the punishment that might be meted out to them if they were caught?

When the hon. member for Vancouver East told us he opposed capital punishment, he did not agree with the findings of the committee of which he spoke so highly yesterday. This committee, in making its recommendations, said:

> While the committee considered that capital punishment should be subjected to periodic review by parliament, it recommends that the death penalty should be retained as the mandatory punishment for the crime of murder.

That is what we are doing. We are reviewing it here and we are introducing some modifications of the law. Under the provisions of this bill, a person who is convicted of capital murder is going to have an automatic right of appeal to the supreme court of his province. Then, if he still has any grounds for appeal, he may appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. If he cannot afford counsel, he is usually supplied with counsel. He is being supplied with counsel today, and that situation will continue. He will also be supplied with copies of the addresses of counsel and the evidence. This is a great advance.

Some hon. members referred to the provisions of clause 13 which says:

> Where a jury finds an accused guilty of an offence punishable by death, the judge who presides at the trial shall, before discharging the jury, put to them the following question:

This is a reference to the question of whether or not the jury wishes to make a recommendation for mercy. The jury is not required to do so. In other words, the jury does not have to bring in a recommendation when the judge addresses them. They may say, no, we do not wish to say anything about that or they can say, yes, we would like to recommend clemency. At the present time a jury may bring in a recommendation of clemency or they may not. In many cases they do not do so and, of course, it is said that they do not do so because they are not aware of the fact they have that privilege. This is a new procedure, and it will be interesting to see how it works out. A similar provision was recommended by the Gowers report in Great Britain. They went farther than we are going here, leaving entirely to the jury the right to make a recommendation as to whether a person should get life imprisonment or whether the death penalty should be carried out. The subject of giving the jury this discretion is dealt with at considerable length.

I should like to make an observation here in connection with the remarks made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), who asked why we did not follow more closely the recommendations of the joint committee. It must be remembered that the previous government did not follow these recommendations at all. There are 13 recommendations in this report, and of those 13 we have carried out nine in this bill. The ones that we have not carried out have to do with a change in the definition of murder, the degrees of murder—

Mr. Deschatelets: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he not agree that if the present government have accepted eight or nine of the recommendations, they have left aside the most important ones?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is a matter of opinion. We are not carrying out all the recommendations, but we are carrying out nine of them. The hon. member himself recommended that one of them should not be carried out, that is the retention of capital punishment for women. If he can recommend that this one should not be carried out, why should not the government, having considered the matter carefully, select certain recommendations to be carried out? We have not approved of any change in the method of carrying out the death penalty. The commission appointed in the United Kingdom recommended that there should be no change over there, so we are following the recommendation which was made in the United Kingdom.

There is only one other point I wish to bring to the attention of the house before I sit down, and that relates to statistics. The Gowers report deals at length with statistics. As we know, statistics can be brought forward in support of both sides of a question. Unless the statistics are of the same type, unless you are certain what those statistics really mean, they are of no value. Since I became Solicitor General, I have taken some pains to try to get some statistics to indicate what is happening in Canada with regard to capital cases. I must confess it is extremely difficult. I have a table here which I should like permission to put on Hansard. When I do so, I should like to give a warning that these statistics are not complete. There are footnotes which explain the deficiencies, and they will give some idea of the disadvantage in which we are placed in Canada in trying to get statistics.

One must remember that there are federal police, provincial police, county police, district police and municipal police. There is no central office in which these statistics are collected. We do get statistics relating to convictions, of course, but it is difficult to get information on the number of murders that occur and what happens afterwards in those cases.

May I have the permission of the house to have this table printed in Hansard?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house agree to give the Solicitor General leave to have printed in Hansard at this point in his speech the table to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I believe this bill is a very valuable one. As I have said, it should satisfy those who wish the retention of capital punishment for the more heinous crimes of murder and at the same time it is a step in the direction which those who favour abolition desire.

I should like to join with all the other hon. members in congratulating the Minister of Justice on the fine presentation he gave us yesterday on this subject.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I am, I must say, neither a criminologist nor an eminent member of the bar association, but I am nevertheless interested in this bill, as are my constituents.

This is a most important piece of legislation since it tends to make a distinction between capital murder and non-capital murder.

A moment ago, I was saying that I am not a lawyer. That means that I will never be a crown attorney nor an attorney for the defence but, some day, I may be called upon to sit on a jury. That is why I was greatly impressed by the remarks which the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) made yesterday during this debate. I should like to quote from page 5227 of Hansard:

> I am under the impression that we are imposing quite a responsibility on the jury. I think all those who have some court experience will agree—and experience points in that direction—that juries feel repugnance against the death penalty and are loath to make a decision which could send a man to his death. That is why in many instances in recent years, juries have rendered verdicts inconsistent with the evidence, simply because they felt reluctant to making such a decision—and this is a human reaction for men with no court experience—and did not want to assume responsibility for a decision which would have involved loss of life for one of their fellow men.

That is undoubtedly what happens in courts of justice. The judge always asks the jury to be as impartial as possible but, under the present law, it may happen under certain circumstances, that the accused is condemned to death by the jury. Now, as prescribed by section 13, the judge must say to the jury:

> You have found the accused guilty and the law requires that I now pronounce sentence of death against him (or "the law provides that he may be sentenced to death", as the case may be). Do

1. From 1951 to 1953 inclusive, figures for Yukon and Northwest Territories are not included.

2. In 1957, figures for murders known and solved by Ontario Provincial Police are not included. The O.P.P. did not report in that year. This also applies for the table for Ontario.

3. In 1957 and 1958 the R.C.M.P. did not report conclusions, but did report prosecutions. The data for prosecutions have been included in column B.

4. In 1958, the Ontario Provincial Police did not report conclusions, but did report prosecutions. The data for prosecutions have been included in column B.

5. Figures include charges which resulted in conviction, acquittal, jury disagreement, no bill and nolle prosequi; but do not include charges resulting in convictions for the included offence of manslaughter (See footnote (7)).

6. Figures prior to 1953 are not available. The murder charges resulting in convictions for the included offence of manslaughter are additional to the number of charges of murder listed under the column "Number of Charges of Murder" (See footnote (5)).

7. From 1951 to 1953 inclusive, the number of murders known and solved reported by the R.C.M.P. are not broken down by provinces. Provincial totals do not equal the totals for Canada.

8. Figures represent commutations and executions that took place the year mentioned regardless of the year sentences of death were imposed.

9. Figures for the Quebec Provincial Police are not available.

you wish to make any recommendation as to whether or not he should be granted clemency. You are not required to make any recommendation but if you do make a recommendation either in favour of clemency or against it, your recommendation will be included in the report that I am required to make of this case to the Minister of Justice and will be given due consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I can just see myself in the shoes of the jurors who, after several long days of trial, see the accused in front of them, placed between two policemen and looking rather depressed; under such circumstances —it is quite human—he cannot but inspire pity. I am sure that in many cases, the jurors will soften up, and following that statement by the judge, will recommend the accused to the clemency of the Minister of Justice.

However, if we refer to the report of the senate and house joint committee on capital punishment which was published on June 29, 1956, we find that the reasons in favour of capital punishment are quite decisive and can only prompt us to favour the status quo. In fact, it is mentioned that capital punishment has a deterrent effect. I quote:

The committee was deeply impressed by the support given the death penalty by those who are responsible for the administration of the law. It includes all the attorneys general of all the provinces except Saskatchewan.

Second, here is what we find under the heading "Punishment":

It has been argued that capital punishment is the just and appropriate punishment for murder. It has been claimed that more than any other penalty, it shows the horror felt by society towards the person who destroys life, and its repugnance for the crime of crimes.

Here is another quotation:

(3) Public opinion.

It has been stated that public opinion in Canada remained substantially in favour of capital punishment and that it would be unwise for the parliament of Canada to abolish capital punishment against the will of the majority of Canadian citizens.

Moreover, there is a section which relates to prison administration, where we find this:

It has been alleged that additional administrative problems would arise in the penitentiaries, if all those found guilty of murder were imprisoned.

And, under section (5), there is mention of a trend towards crimes of violence, and I quote again:

In a young country in full development, like Canada, with a population of multiple ethnical origins, the need for a deterrent like capital punishment is greater.

And a little further on, it says:

Moreover, it has been said that hardened criminals were more inclined to resort to violence. Capital punishment would be a better deterrent, for that category of criminals, than mere imprisonment, in respect of which they are already hardened and which they are inclined to consider as a professional risk.

But yet, Mr. Speaker, recommendations have been made by that committee. As the Solicitor General just said, several of those recommendations have been followed by this government. However, we should not forget that the less important recommendations have been followed, with the possibility that the more important were ignored.

Among those recommendations, you have first of all:

(1) Retention of the death penalty as mandatory in murder cases.

(2) Retention of capital punishment for treason and piracy.

(3) No change to murder definition.

(4) No "degree" of murder.

Despite this recommendation to avoid providing any degree of murder, we see what has happened and we can realize that this bill rather tends to make a classification, for it includes various degrees of murder.

Under 5 you have:

(5) No special provision for women.

And as a last recommendation:

(13) Abolition of hanging to be replaced by electrocution or, as an alternative, the lethal chamber.

Confronted with this bill, I suggest we are entitled to wonder why the government and the Minister of Justice in particular have ignored most of those recommendations.

The Minister of Justice might reply that it has nothing to do with the abolition of capital punishment, but I believe that, by passing this bill, we are progressively working towards abolition of capital punishment.

I realize that under such circumstances, it may be wise to think of the criminal. But we should not forget his victim, nor those who are left behind; I refer, for instance, to the victim's widow and orphans.

As for me, I admit that I am not here to protect the criminal—and such is the case of all other members whose sincerity I do not question—but to protect the victim. I was rather impressed yesterday by the remarks of the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) who dealt with this matter in a deeply humane way. I was particularly interested in the part of his speech where he mentioned that many of our young people are now lying in cemeteries because they have fought to protect freedom and democracy.

I consider this measure as a step toward the abolition of capital punishment, and this is why I shall vote against it.

I heard earlier the member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin), himself a lawyer, state that if the issue was the abolition of capital punishment, he would vote against it. I shall then vote against the bill and, like many others, I shall vote against abolishing capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, I must remind the house that I am much more concerned with the life of decent people than with the welfare of criminals and realizing what happened in the past in our courts, I feel that the same procedure should be maintained.

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, the question of capital punishment raises many difficulties for any individual, regardless of his experience and his qualifications.

Over the ages it was a matter which haunted the mind of man. The most brilliant brains have studied that important problem and have always come to varied and opposed conclusions. In all countries, all through the ages, everyone of those people has considered the question with utmost sincerity wondering whether capital punishment should be maintained or abolished. The same phenomenon is now observed in Canada, where we see that public opinion is almost equally divided on the issue.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the first citizen of Canada was right when he stated in the House of Commons in February 1960, that in 20 years of parliamentary experience, he did not think he had seen more interest on the part of the members on any other issue. That means, Mr. Speaker, that each and every member of parliament is fully aware of the tremendous moral responsibility he is assuming when he expresses his views on this delicate subject.

When speaking for or against capital punishment, not only are we playing our part as legislators, but we are also acting as judges.

If we are in favour of maintaining the death penalty, we are literally sending to the gallows thousands of human beings who in the future will commit murders. It is a painful obligation.

On the other hand, if we ask for abolition of capital punishment, we may be inviting some shady character who respects neither law nor religion, with no respect of any kind for human life, to commit crimes against thousands of our fellow men. This, Mr. Speaker, is a frightful risk which a government cannot easily take.

Of course, we would be in a much better position to judge the situation if we knew to what extent the death penalty is an efficient deterrent against homicide. But it is absolutely impossible to know how many individuals have refrained from committing the horrible crime of murder because they were afraid of being sent to the gallows.

On the other hand, one thing is sure. There is nothing more deep-rooted and stronger in any man, in any living being than the instinct of self-preservation.

There is another, equally certain fact: the prospect of death, the unavoidable, final and irrevocable punishment, haunts and gnaws at the mind of the potential murderer if he has the least opportunity to think it over before committing his crime. This potential murderer, even before doing this horrible thing which is the taking away or one's life, knows perfectly well that in this twentieth century, with the efficient and modern means available to the law, he probably does not have one chance in a hundred to hide his crime forever and to escape the punishment which will be inflicted upon him by the authority. Thus that fear may be for him the mother of wisdom. That is why I feel that the death penalty is an efficient and strong enough preventative to stop a murderer.

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that all human beings loathe the death penalty; I personally consider it as an extraordinary evil and do not accept it for all kinds of murders as I shall explain a little later. But even if it is an evil, we must unfortunately consider it as a necessary evil in our modern society, and I should like to see it disappear if such a disappearance did not mean a menace to public good.

I would like to be able to say: Canada has such a respect for life that it does not deliberately accept that a human being be put to death.

Indeed, it is the duty of the authorities to use all possible means to enhance to the fullest extent in the minds of men, spiritual and moral values and the concept of human dignity.

Will the abolition of capital punishment lead to that end, under the circumstances?

We must answer that question by the negative if we agree that capital punishment is an efficient deterrent against homicide and if we remember that the first and immediate duty of the state is to make the general or common interest prevail over personal interest, to protect the whole of society against the murderers of tomorrow.

The role of a legislator is often a hard task but, as far as this matter is concerned, we are here to protect society against criminals.

That, in my opinion, is the stand which the state must take on that serious problem. Besides, such a stand is in accordance with the Christian principles which have been instilled in the hearts and minds of the vast majority of Canadian members of parliament.

Indeed, this is what we read in St. Thomas Aquinas' Summa Theologica:

> Only he who is in charge of the community, has the power of life and death.

Volume X of the Dictionary of Catholic Theology adds the following corollary:

> However, there is no homicide and, consequently, no sin against the divine commandment Non occides (Thou shalt not kill), when human justice formally calls for capital punishment.
> St. Thomas adds that, in such a case, the human authorities act as the vicar of God in matters which come under them.

To that, I should like to add the following words which are taken from a profession of faith written by Pope Innocent III in the twelfth century:

> We declare that lay authorities may, without committing a mortal sin, pass a sentence which entails the shedding of blood, providing such sentence is motivated not by hatred but by judgment and is not decided hastily but in all wisdom.

Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to notice that the principle of this bill is in accordance with the sound logic on which the state must always base its decisions, and with the fundamental principles of the church to which I belong.

I must congratulate the Minister of Justice most heartily for having prepared with such devotion and understanding this bill which protects society and strictly respects the rights of individuals who are to be judged by their fellow men.

An examination of section 202A reveals that the bill sets a distinction between capital murder and non-capital murder. That is the substance of the bill. The basic principle is premeditation, and that is why I was saying a while ago that I am in favour of capital punishment but that I cannot accept that the professional killer who does not hesitate to commit a murder to come into the possession of material goods, be treated the same way as the murderer whose intellectual faculties were momentarily unbalanced under the heat of madness or passion.

[Mr. Lafrenière.]

Let us consider the case of a bank robber who prepares his deed coldly, carefully. He is familiar with all the details of the place where he will break in. He carries weapons which can mean death and, in cold blood, he decides to shoot anyone standing in his way, without any consideration for the value his victim might have for his family and the community.

That is capital murder, a murder of a calculated and deliberate nature, a murder which is planned.

But this is not the case for crimes of passion which are committed under violent emotional stress due to various circumstances, when, in a moment of mental aberration or insanity, a citizen who never thought of becoming a murderer or homicide, will deal a fellow man the fatal blow.

The legislation before us precisely sets out the difference between capital murder and non-capital murder. Besides, it strikes us that the bill is but the logical following up, or consecration by law, of a practice established by the various governments over the years.

I looked up the statistics quoted in the house in March 1960 by the Minister of Justice, covering the period from 1930 to 1959 inclusive and dealing with the number of sentences, executions and commutations. I found that during the last 30 years there have been about 608 death sentences, 210 executions and 158 commutations.

Well, this bill is conceived so as to give a better opportunity of appreciating all circumstances in each particular case.

To that end, there is, among others, a provision under clause 8 which lessens the danger of a miscarriage of justice for an indicted person.

Moreover, the bill gives greater latitude to the members of the jury. And I approve without any reservation the remarks made yesterday by an hon. member in this house, to the effect that the jury should have legally a greater latitude with regard to the interpretation of the facts and the strictness of the law.

Mr. Speaker, I now want to answer the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine), who complained earlier of the situation in which a jury could find itself when, under clause 13, the judge asks them whether they wish to make a recommendation for clemency.

It is quite clear that the members of the jury could find themselves in a situation where their will would lack firmness. However, in any case, I believe there is less chance of error in being generous than in being absolutely just. This is why I maintain that this clause 13 is drafted in quite a humane spirit and will allow the jury to precisely appreciate all particular cases, all the details, all the evidence which will be submitted to them.

Mr. Speaker, I know that other hon. members will speak on this question and I will sum up the principle of this bill by the following words: while it is quite difficult for a state to deliberately apply the death penalty by using its powers, we must remember that capital punishment is applied by the state only against the person who has been found guilty of a crime committed with premeditation and by the use of force or trickery, or both.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that our society is willing to set aside that evil referred to earlier, that is capital punishment. But, while waiting for Christian principles to make our society and individuals more perfect, I believe the legislator has the duty to retain capital punishment while at the same time introducing the necessary and humanitarian mitigations, according to circumstances, and this, for the best interests of society.

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, never before have I been so tense as I am today in rising to speak in this house.

This question of the death penalty which we are called upon to consider is so important that any member who wants to give a sincere opinion has to think it over very seriously.

No doubt, Mr. Speaker, it would be easy to rely unreservedly on the cabinet, and to say that these wise men, who have studied the question with the help of many experts and who have decided to introduce this bill must have drafted a good piece of legislation which deserves our approval and we should not question the wisdom of the decision taken.

Nevertheless, any kind-hearted man is tempted to favour an alleviation of the death penalty, but it should not be forgotten that we are here as the representatives of society and that we must reach a decision based on serious reasons and not only on pretence or feelings.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the principle of Bill C-92 is hard to detect if you look at it as a whole. In fact there are several principles involved in this bill. First of all, the amendment to section 202 of the Criminal Code by the addition of section 202A to classify murder, as defined in article 202, in two classes, that is capital murder and non-capital murder, and to classify the sentence in two categories by amending section 206: death penalty for capital murder and life imprisonment for non-capital murder.

Another principle of this bill is the amendment to section 206 of the Criminal Code which is replaced by a new section 206 exempting from capital punishment children under the age of 18 who might have committed a capital murder but under which they would be automatically sentenced to life imprisonment.

The third principle I note in this bill, Mr. Speaker, is the one whereby life imprisonment is considered a minimum penalty.

The fourth principle, it seems to me, is the necessity of having a specific charge of capital murder in order to apply capital punishment.

The fifth principle seems to be, an automatic plea of not guilty in the case of a crime involving capital punishment.

The sixth principle seems to me the impossibility of indicting an accused for non-capital murder where he has already been acquitted on a charge of capital murder.

As for the seventh principle, it involves the enlargement of the means of appeal, that is to say the appeal becomes automatic in the case of a capital murder, both before a superior court and a court of appeal, be it on law or fact, or mixed law and fact.

The eighth principle deals with the gratuitousness of the documents essential to the appeal both to the court of appeal and to the supreme court.

The ninth principle, is the suspension of execution made easier because mercy is always possible in the case of a capital murder.

The tenth principle deals with the jury recommendation. This recommendation by the jury in favour of clemency, that is the provision on that subject, does not seem very clear. It is not specified if unanimity is required, or what majority must be in favour of clemency for the judge to decide to grant clemency to the accused of capital or non-capital murder. In my opinion there is a contradiction with regard to the principle providing for a "minimum" life sentence in the case of capital murder.

Finally, another principle of this bill is the power retained by the governor in council to commute the death sentence to life imprisonment. Here again, it seems to me, that this principle tends to destroy the principle I termed as No. 3 with regard to the minimum penalty.

Mr. Speaker, there is still a great deal to be said about every one of those principles.

I could wait until the end of my remarks to consider the first principle of this bill.

Allow me to deal right now with the principle I indicated as being the second with regard to the amendment to section 206 intended to exempt from capital punishment children under 18 years of age who have committed a capital murder. I feel that capital punishment could have been retained for those young people in cases of capital murder. Be that as it may the age should inevitably be reduced to 14 years for non-capital and capital murder alike. The reason for this is obvious. For, in our days of serious delinquency, one wonders whether it would not become dangerous to exempt young people of less than 18 years from the severity of capital punishment, when we consider the gangs of young hoodlums who would not hesitate to commit a murder and who would not take the trouble of deliberating to decide whether the act they are about to commit is a capital or a non-capital murder.

Regarding the requirement of a specific capital murder charge for capital punishment, in my opinion it makes very much sense to have these provisions in the bill, for, in the main, the bill implies a distinction as between capital and non-capital murder.

I must congratulate the minister for this amendment to the Criminal Code which makes it mandatory to enter a plea of not guilty when the offence is one punishable by death. And also for rendering impossible an indictment for capital murder when an accused has already been acquitted on a charge of non-capital murder. However, Mr. Speaker, there is something inconsistent here.

It is said that the bill will abolish the death penalty in the case of non-capital murders. In doing so, it is depriving society of an essential protection, since it is preventing it from indicting for non-capital murder a person already acquitted on a charge of capital murder. There is some danger in the fact that, once a criminal is acquitted because proof of capital murder was lacking, society will be unable to lay a new charge against him.

I congratulate the government on the decision to enlarge the possibilities of appeal. That change was long overdue. Whether we are for or against the bill should not prevent us from congratulating the government for having so enlarged the possibilities of appeal by making them automatic in the case of capital murder.

I also want to congratulate the government for having laid the principle of gratuitousness with regard to the documents necessary for appeal, whether it is before the court of appeal or the supreme court. This created a great problem, I am told, for the innocent who lacked the means to ensure their defence. A person had to disburse so much money that there was a risk of the innocent being deprived of appeal.

I also congratulate the government for having extended the possibilities of suspending the execution. As far as recommending mercy is concerned, there is a possibility of conflict, in the case of capital murder with principle No. 3 according to which life imprisonment becomes a minimum punishment.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, some will ask: What is your position going to be? Let me say first of all that I still have fresh in my memory the speaking marathon we had in this house on the capital punishment bill introduced last year by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee). Some members of the House of Commons were definitely set against abolishing capital punishment. Their reasons were quite acceptable. They referred to public order and I do not have to go over that in extenso. I will merely point out the reasons I have to oppose abolition of the death penalty.

First of all, common weal has precedence over private weal. In my opinion abolitionnists are unable to differentiate the individual unjustly accused from the real culprit, when they cry for abolition of capital punishment. In short, lest an innocent be exposed to the death penalty, we should expose the life of many citizens, because the real criminal would avoid the death penalty. Society will be more adequately protected if capital punishment remains in the Criminal Code.

Allow me now, Mr. Chairman, to quote an essay published in the "Revue internationale de criminologie et de police technique", published in Geneva. I refer to page 68 of special issue No. 52, where I read:

> First of all, let us lend our ear to an examining magistrate, namely Mr. Justice Grivel, of Lausanne, who was appointed to investigate the double crime of Maracon, about which the clues lead nowhere and whose author has not yet been punished.

"Should you find the culprit, asked the investigator, would you not feel that he deserves the ultimate penalty". "As far as I am concerned", begins the magistrate, "I think the crime of Maracon appears to be a crime of the gratuitous type. No human motive can be found to excuse it. If it had been committed by a sadistic or otherwise mentally perturbed individual, there would necessarily be extenuating circumstances inasmuch as the culprit would have been irresponsible". As for the death penalty itself he added: "It should be part of the law as a menace. It may cause some criminals to think twice before committing murder".

Mr. Speaker, I have heard some people state that capital punishment should be abolished for humane reasons. I am wondering whether any of them would have been able to reply to a statement such as the one I quoted of Justice Grivel. The safety of society must be the paramount consideration of the legislator when he has to decide upon the position he must take when faced with legislation such as that before us at this time.

The primary task of public authority is to enable an honest citizen to live in freedom, peace and security. In these days of organized banditry and severe juvenile delinquency, we should think twice before abolishing the state's most efficient weapon against murderers. We must protect society against criminals of the bottle and criminals of the automobile. We must also protect society against murder committed in conjunction with rape, violence and theft. We must prevent crime with accompanying violence in view of the danger of murder. We must ensure that future generations will not lose respect for other people's lives, and we must retain the deterrent effect of capital punishment.

I mentioned a moment ago that one of the principles of the bill was to divide murder into two categories, capital murder and non-capital murder. After looking at all the reasons in support of this bill, I have been unable to avoid the conclusion that the bill as drafted will indirectly lead to the total abolition of capital punishment. Despite all the precautions which have been taken, it still leads to the abolition of the death penalty.

Now I am opposed for the time being to the abolition of capital punishment, whether directly or indirectly. I just gave various reasons for which capital punishment must be maintained.

Why am I in favour of a complete retention of capital punishment at this time? Not because I refuse to see that there are some murders which are not premeditated, but because, when weighing the advantages and disadvantages of this legislation with regard to public order, I consider that we are going too fast.

To sum it up, I have not been convinced that Bill C-92 in its present form, contains any principle affecting the retention of capital punishment which my conscience can accept.

I humbly maintain that the terms of the bill would directly lead, in the very near future, to the effective, pure and simple abolition of the death penalty, which I cannot accept for the various reasons given by many fellow members during the discussion of the bill introduced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough in the 1960 session and which it would be too long to reiterate at this time.

Our civilization has not yet attained the degree of maturity required for abolishing capital punishment.

The United Kingdom and other countries may perhaps abolish capital punishment. The United Kingdom, being an island and therefore sheltered against American gangsterism, the mafia and other criminal organizations where murder is the current practice, may perhaps abolish capital punishment. We have, perhaps, in England, the most disciplined people in the world, but we certainly may not say the same of the American people. It is unfortunate, but we have to admit it.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I quote an excerpt from an article by the French author, François Mauriac, which was published on page 77, in the Petit Journal of May 7, 1961. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, not to be able to quote the text from its original source, but I shall just read what I find in that paper clipping. The article was published under the following title:

The views of François Mauriac... Abolish capital punishment?—First, let us be worthy of it.

And the author adds:

Abolish capital punishment? To what end? Capital punishment, if it were eliminated from the texts, would still prevail in our way of life. Even if it were erased from every legislation where it still exists, innocent people would nevertheless be legally slaughtered, human beings would die everywhere in the world from want and exhaustion. Martial law and special powers would, anyhow, restore capital punishment, extending it to innocent people, whenever politicians would think it fit.

The issue of capital punishment is only brought up again to give one an illusion of still belonging to a community worthy of dealing with and settling this issue, and in order to escape the unbearable evidence that every notion of justice has been obscured within us from year to year, and more particularly during the last two decades. I am afraid that discussing capital punishment will dispense our highminded people from dealing with more urgent problems. This is pretending to believe that we belong to a world where the life of a human being, whatever the colour of his skin, remains sacred.

Abolishing capital punishment should be the ultimate aim of a law which no military or civilian police force would ever have the power to break. We know how things are today. A respect for the life of even those who are guilty of the greatest crimes—what sophistication for the sort of people we have become. How very fastidious. We could only attain that end after a successful effort of regeneration which we did not even start. Before abolishing capital punishment, let us therefore wait until we are worthy of it—

(Text):

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): As one of those who did not have the opportunity of participating in the previous debates on the subject matter of this bill, and as one who is not an abolitionist and yet proposes to support this bill, I feel I should clarify my position. I will be brief because I do not want to belabour the arguments which have been previously advanced.

I listened with intense interest to the statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) when he introduced the bill. I congratulate him upon the objective and lucid manner in which he dealt with this delicate and highly controversial subject of capital punishment. This legislation has been referred to by previous speakers as a first step or an advance forward. If by those expressions they had in mind the ultimate abolition of capital punishment as the penalty for murder, I feel they are unrealistic and overly optimistic. I believe that the overwhelming majority of the people of this country are now, and will remain, opposed to any such result. I hope the enactment of this legislation will not be construed as a weakening of opposition or a manifestation of a changing public opinion.

The salient feature of this bill, in my opinion, is the retention of capital punishment. It is retained as the penalty for deliberate and premeditated murder. The deterrent effect of this prescribed punishment for such crimes remains unfettered. That this punishment is the greatest deterrent, I believe, admits of no denial. Attempts have been made by resort to statistics to establish otherwise. As has been said so properly by the Minister of Justice, statistics have no convincing value. There are no statistics available of murders not committed or deterred by the severity and certainty of the death penalty. To argue that life imprisonment is an equal deterrent presupposes that the penalties of death and life imprisonment are of equal severity. This is an argument I cannot accept. I believe we do not need to do more than ask ourselves—God forbid that we should ever be placed in such a position—which penalty we would prefer.

If, as I believe, the death penalty is the more severe penalty, it must follow that it is the greater deterrent. To argue otherwise goes counter to all our beliefs over the years and to actual experience. No one, I think, would attempt to argue that the mandatory imprisonment penalty for drunk driving has not been a greater deterrent than the lesser penalty of a fine.

This bill also provides the penalty of life imprisonment in certain circumstances. What are the circumstances? There must be an absence of deliberation or planning. It is a killing that is not deliberate in the sense of being within the contemplation of the accused. It is the type of murder which would not be prevented or deterred by the severity of the penalty. It is perpetrated without regard to the consequences and, really, without any conscious appreciation of culpability. It is the type of murder for which pleas of clemency are made and frequently granted.

This kind of murder, in this bill called "non-capital murder", warrants a lesser penalty. There is no erosion of the deterrent effect of the death penalty, and for that reason and that reason alone, I approve of the substitution of the penalty of life imprisonment for such cases. I am, therefore, in good conscience and without compromising my convictions, able to support this bill.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): My intervention will be brief, Mr. Speaker. As one who has taken part in capital punishment debates on previous occasions and who has stood against the type of bill proposed by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee), I should like to have a chance to explain my vote.

I believe, sir, that when one approaches a matter of such basic morality as the question of whether or not a human being should be hanged, one really comes to a conclusion from a position of deep-rooted prejudice and then glosses that over with an intellectual process. So I was interested in my own personal reaction in reading the bill of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), to see whether or not I agreed with it right off the bat. I must say that I wholeheartedly support the bill.

By the process of dichotomy that he used to separate into distinct categories the crime where premeditation takes place over a long time—for example, most of the well-known poisoning cases certainly fit into that category —as opposed to the murder which arises in a man's heart and is accomplished on the spur of the moment, I think he has accomplished a most valuable feat of scholarship. I also think he has done much to resolve the conflict that existed in this house last year when we had a two-day debate on this subject and found ourselves to be either retentionists or abolitionists but perhaps most of us were unhappy as to the problems which were raised and which could not be solved by being in either particular position. I therefore salute the Minister of Justice for his bill and also for his speech which I daresay will be one that will be looked at for a long time and will give this particular parliament a great stamp of authority.

The minister has pointed out that it is almost impossible to prove a negative and to ascertain how many people are deterred from crime. That thought alone should be echoed and re-echoed whenever we try to bring to such a fundamental problem as this one the mere statistical approach.

Finally, may I say this. On another, occasion in justifying my own attitude towards the retention of the death penalty, I said that severe crimes deserve severe punishment. This thought was put much more eloquently by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) speaking in his debate last night. I endorse most of his remarks, although not all of them. It seems to me that the right to live at liberty in society is not one which exists without limits. It seeems to me that we enjoy the right to live under licence from society to ensure that we conduct ourselves properly. For these reasons I am in accord with the bill and endorse it most wholeheartedly.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take much of the time of the house but I want to say this. I was one of those who expressed themselves strongly in the debate a year ago against the abolition of the death penalty, and if I were speaking in the same debate I would still express myself strongly in that regard. I have no difficulty whatever in supporting this bill because it retains the principle in which I believe and for which I argued a year ago. For deliberate and premeditated murder there still is the death sentence.

In some of the speeches that were made in this house yesterday, or one in particular, it was stated that we might be whipped into line and that it would be interesting to note how some members were going to vote if a vote was called. Just for the purpose of the record I wish to state that I have come to my own conclusions and that I am very happy with this bill. In my opinion, the minister in particular in his presentation of this bill and the government in the solution they have brought forward in it are going to make many people happy.

No subject before parliament has brought me more inquiries in the last two years than has the particular subject of capital punishment. I know that no one wants to go around hanging large numbers of people or trying large numbers of people for deliberate murder, if the circumstances indicate otherwise. By dividing the crime into categories, as has been done in this bill, the minister is going to make many people feel that a great step has been taken for those who feel that abolition is the right thing and yet it is not taking away anything from those of us who believe that the time has not yet come to do away with capital punishment for the worst crime against humanity.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might have leave of the house to ask a question of the minister?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deschatelets: Before the minister closes the debate I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. Fulton: May I make this suggestion, Mr. Speaker? If it is the will of the house that I close the debate now, I will undertake to give the hon. member the floor for the purpose of asking me a question before I conclude my speech.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in making some remarks to conclude this debate I would be less than human if I did not express to all hon. members in the house my deep appreciation and gratitude for the kind remarks they have made. I think they applied not so much with regard to the speech I made, but particularly with regard to the bill which has been produced as a result of a good deal of thought and work on the part of the government. I appreciate those remarks and I can assure my hon. friends that I take them not personally but on behalf of the government. I am gratified indeed that it seems possible to say that we have produced a bill which represents not only what the House of Commons wishes to see as a solution of the problem but, I believe, a measure which the house accepts as being soundly based on legal principle and as carrying into effect the moral standards which this country desires to see in this branch of its criminal law.

The bill appears to have received very general, perhaps almost unanimous support in principle. It must be recognized, of course, that the reasons for such support are not the same on the part of each member who has spoken. Those members who favour outright abolition of the death penalty apparently welcome the bill not only for the restriction that it actually places on the imposition of the death penalty but also because they regard it as a step toward abolition. The vast majority, however, appear to accept and approve the bill for what it was intended to be and what it is. It is not an abolitionist measure or a first step toward abolition but a bill for the purpose of bringing the present position with regard to capital punishment into line with present day ideas of crime and punishment and for the purpose of excluding from the imposition of the death penalty those classes of cases which, generally speaking, are not characterized by deliberations and planning and where it is felt that the imposition or execution of the death penalty ought not to be provided.

I think it must be emphasized for the information of hon. members such as the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville that this bill does not abolish the death penalty. Nothing could be clearer than that. What the bill does is to divide murder into two categories, namely capital murder and non-capital murder, and to provide that for capital murder as defined the death penalty will be retained and if a person is convicted of that type of murder its imposition by the judge will be automatic.

There have been a number of criticisms of the bill on points which I might describe as points of secondary principle. I think I should deal with some of these points now. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) expressed the view, as I understood him, that the bill was juridically sound in the approach that it took, primarily with respect to the division of murder into two types, but was practically unsound.

In reply to that I can only say that a bill which is juridically sound should also, surely, be one which is sound in practice if we repose in the institutions which may carry it out, that is the prosecution agencies and the courts, the degree of confidence to which they are eminently entitled. When I speak of the institutions which must carry it out I refer, of course, to the crown attorneys, defence attorneys, judges and juries in whom, as was so eloquently said by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney) last evening, we have reason to repose the greatest confidence.

I know that juries have in the past had very great difficulties, and they may have some difficulties in future with this bill, but it is my firm belief that they will be vastly assisted by this division of murder into capital and non-capital categories. I am certain that it will be by no means impossible for a jury, when confronted with the question which will confront them under the bill, "Is it your view, gentlemen, that this was a planned and deliberate murder?", to say, "Yes, it was a planned and deliberate murder" and to convict accordingly.

I have heard no reason suggested yet as to why it would be impossible for a jury to be able to come to such a decision. But I think it is equally possible and equally appropriate that there will be other cases where when the jury ask themselves, "was this a planned and deliberate murder?", they will come to the conclusion, "No, it was not". In that case they will have no difficulty because the law is perfectly clear: They will have no difficulty in arriving at a verdict of not guilty of capital murder but guilty of non-capital murder.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont also appeared to see a contradiction of principle between the classification of murder into capital and non-capital on the one hand, and the question to be put to the jury as to whether they wished to make a recommendation for or against clemency on the other hand.

As I understood the hon. member, his point was that since cases of capital murder would be cases importing deliberation in one sense or another and were the cases we had singled out as justifying the death penalty, it was inconsistent in such cases to ask the jury whether they wished to make a recommendation for or against clemency.

Another hon. member expressed the same point—I think it was the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith)—in a different way; that was, that in putting such a question to the jury they would in effect be put on the spot. I do not think there is too much validity in either point of view.

As I attempted to indicate in my remarks in introducing the bill, it is a fact that however much you may try when you are writing law which must after all be a code, it is difficult, if not impossible, to take into account in the words of that code all the thousand and one circumstances and differences that make up human motivation.

Since, then, the code must be perfectly clear, as to principle it is perfectly appropriate that it should give some discretion in the place where discretion can properly be given. It is therefore perfectly appropriate to ask the jury to render their verdict on the simple question of whether or not this was a planned and deliberate murder as defined, and having done that and if they say it was, then to ask them in effect, "Gentlemen, is there in your view anything in the character and background of the accused which indicates the degree to which he might be held responsible or able to control and answer for his own acts and which, in your view, would lead you to recommend in favour of mercy?" That is all the jury are being asked to do; they are only being asked whether they have a recommendation to make.

It seems to me clear that this is not something which imposes too great a burden, or indeed any burden at all, upon the jury because it does not ask them to make the same decision twice. It does not ask them to decide whether or not the individual should suffer the death penalty. They are asked first to render a verdict on the law and the evidence, and they do so. Then they are asked whether they, the jury of the accused's peers, who tried him, who heard the evidence, who heard the defence and who understood all the background of the case, as human beings have any recommendation to make. I think that, quite contrary to being an improper thing to ask a jury, it is a very proper question to ask.

While all these views which have been expressed in criticism or reservation are, of course, entitled to respect, I do not believe they represent a defect in the bill. Indeed I might on this very point remind hon. members that the Gowers commission, which is regarded as the finest piece of research that has been done in this field, itself actually recommended that the jury be asked to pass on the sentence and that after a verdict of guilty it should be the jury that decides whether the accused should be sentenced to death or whether a lesser sentence should be imposed.

That, I personally believe, would be to impose an improper task upon the jury. We have rejected that course and have enacted a law which in my view asks the jury to do something which they would probably be glad to do, and to do something which will be of the greatest assistance in the ultimate decision as to whether or not that particular sentence, in that particular case, under those particular circumstances, should be carried out.

Another suggestion has been made, that it is wrong that the crown should have to decide whether or not to lay a charge of capital murder or non-capital murder, and that in all cases the crown should be required to lay a charge of capital murder and then we should let the jury, if the evidence so warranted, bring in a verdict on the lesser offence of non-capital murder.

I do not believe it would be wise to tie the hands of attorneys general and their prosecuting officers in this way, because there must be a certain onus upon the crown to decide what charge to lay. I do not think it is enough just to say, "Let every case be charged as capital murder and then let the jury decide whether or not capital murder is proven".

I do think it appropriate to impose upon the attorneys general and their crown prosecutors the obligation to decide whether the elements which the law now says must be there in order to constitute capital murder are in fact there.

Therefore it is a perfectly proper duty to impose upon them to decide whether or not to charge capital murder, and if they feel the elements are not there, then of course they must charge non-capital murder.

There were a number of other points made of an individual nature which I am quite certain will again be brought forward in committee. I should like to deal with just one other point which seemed to be of concern to a number of hon. members who took part in the debate. I refer to the point as to what will be the effect of a sentence of life imprisonment, which will be the sentence in the event of a verdict of guilty of non-capital murder.

In my view there should be no differentiation between the person who is serving a sentence of life imprisonment, as will be the case in the future, for non-capital murder and other prisoners who are serving sentences of life imprisonment. We have recently set up in this country with the unanimous approval of parliament a parole system. We have appointed a national parole board to administer that system, and it is within the discretion of that board to decide at any time and on every occasion whether or not a person undergoing sentence in our penitentiaries is a fit person to be granted parole.

It is necessary to bear in mind that an inmate out on parole has not received a remission of his sentence. He is on parole for the balance of his sentence; he is merely serving that balance outside the institution. While on parole he is subject to the supervision and the surveillance of the parole board. It is not as though he were suddenly cast adrift free of all supervision by authority.

Second, it is essential to bear in mind that he would not be granted parole until the parole board had come to the conclusion after a thorough and careful study of all the aspects of the case, whether the person concerned was a fit person to be placed on parole. In reaching such a decision the parole board will have available all details as to the man's background, reports of his behaviour while in the institution and reports of psychiatrists and others as to his general mental attitude. It is only after examining all those background criteria that the board will come to a decision.

Finally, I say that it would in my view be an intolerable and impossible situation if we were to segregate into two groups in our penal institution, on the one hand those with a chance of being paroled and going out, and on the other those who would literally be caged up there for the remainder of their natural lives like animals who had been permanently deprived of liberty. I do not think the house would want to see this, and even if the house did want to see it I do not believe such a situation would make it possible to maintain any sort of institution which a Christian and civilized society would regard as desirable.

I assure hon. members that there have been many cases in the past where persons condemned to life imprisonment have been released on parole or on ticket of leave as it used to be called. This is not something new which is going to develop suddenly as a result of the bill now before the house. At the same time there have been few cases, if any, where persons who have been sentenced to life imprisonment and subsequently paroled or released on ticket of leave have proven to be a menace to society. So on that point I can give the most sincere assurance that anyone in my position can give to this house, and, through the house, to the country, that there is nothing dangerous in the fact that those who will be sentenced to life imprisonment in the future come under the authority of the national parole board.

I also remind hon. members of the provision of one of the clauses in the bill, clause 15, which I shall not read at this stage but which no doubt we shall be discussing later in detail when we come to the committee stage. This clause, of course, provides that in any particular case the governor in council when commutation of a sentence of death is ordered may at the same time provide that the particular individual dealt with shall not be paroled at any time without the prior approval of the governor in council. It is possible there may be cases where it may be felt that the mental condition of the individual—perhaps the very condition which justifies the commutation—also brings about a situation where the greatest care must be exercised before allowing him to be at large again. It is this very case which we had in mind when we put that provision in the bill so that the governor in council could, in an appropriate case, ensure that such a person could not be paroled or released unless the governor in council, responsible to parliament and the country, had the opportunity to review the case before any release was authorized.

In conclusion, may I return to what I said at the beginning of these remarks, and express once again my appreciation of the response which the house has shown to this bill. As I have said, I believe the reception given it reflects the fact that the bill accords with the moral standards which our Canadian society desires to see incorporated into our law in this difficult field of murder and the penalty for murder.

I think, also, that it is only appropriate that the country should know the extent to which this bill has, or has not, the approval of the House of Commons. Some hon. members who have spoken have indicated that they are opposed to the measure. I think in legislation of this kind it would not be sufficient if we were merely to leave it to be carried on a voice vote. I think the country would desire to know, and is entitled to know, the extent to which its elected representatives are in support of this measure and for that reason, Mr. Speaker, because I think, also, it is desirable we should have recorded the degree of unanimity with which the people's elected representatives accept and support this measure, and because it is my belief that there will be virtually complete, if not complete, unanimity, I would ask that you call for the yeas and nays on this question.

Mr. Deschatelets: I think the minister was agreeable to the suggestion that I might put a question to him at this stage, and I wish to thank him. Many hon. members who have spoken in this debate have stated that their minds were not yet made up with regard to its provisions. My question is this: because of the nature and the importance of this bill does the minister not think it would be advisable to refer it to a special committee of the house after second reading in order to give it a more thorough study? Notwithstanding the discussion which took place this morning concerning committee work I do not hesitate to make the suggestion because of the special nature of the bill before us. The minister will remember the outstanding work done last year—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member knows he has not the opportunity to speak again. He seems to have made his question clear and I suggest he allow it to be answered.

Mr. Deschatelets: That is my first request, Mr. Speaker. I have another. Should the minister not agree to refer this bill to a special committee, I would ask him to postpone the study of it in committee of the house until another date in order to permit all hon. members to make up their minds, to read the speeches which have been made and to consider the various suggestions which have been put forward from all corners of the house. I think it would be unwise to rush this bill through right now.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I believe I am making a sensible suggestion. I hope the minister will give it the consideration it deserves.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, as to the first suggestion that the bill should be referred to a special committee, I am not going to indulge the temptation which I must confess is very real and remind the hon. member in detail of the discussion which took place this morning.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A different situation altogether.

Mr. Fulton: I will simply say this—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): An unworthy remark.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Essex East is always making unworthy remarks; I do not take any notice of this interruption.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a matter as important as this we should not be playing politics.

Mr. Fulton: There is no doubt that a bill of this importance deserves consideration in the widest possible forum, and the widest possible committee forum we can place it in is the committee of the whole house. I am not inclined to think that with respect to a bill of this kind a detailed study by particular members, as my hon. friend has suggested to me, would be appropriate. I think the committee of the whole house is the appropriate place to have a detailed clause by clause consideration of this bill.

With regard to the second suggestion that we might defer the consideration of the bill in committee of the whole, while I appreciate the remarks the hon. member has made as to the desirability of studying the speeches made here, I do remind him that the bill itself has been in the hands of hon. members for over a week now.

An hon. Member: Not their speeches.

Mr. Fulton: The subject itself has been under intensive study and consideration by members of this house for over a year, ever since the bill of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) came up for debate in February of last year.

I know that hon. members are under considerable pressure. Members of parliament are hard-working and conscientious persons; but I doubt very much whether their consideration of these matters would be more thorough if we waited for a day, for 24 hours or for 48 hours than their consideration has been up to the present time. I sense rather, on the other hand, a desire on the part of hon. members in all quarters of the house to get on with the detailed consideration of the bill as early as possible in order that this excellent measure may become law at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): May I ask a question for clarification just before the motion is put? Could the minister give us some indication of how long a man sentenced to life imprisonment for non-capital murder would be expected to serve before he would be eligible to apply to the parole board for parole?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest the hon. member ask that question in committee. There will be ample opportunity when the relevant clause is under consideration to ask questions on details.

Bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Classification of murder.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Chairman, I rise today to say a very few words because I have spoken at length on this matter on previous occasions. This is one occasion on which I can honestly say that I am completely and unreservedly in favour of a piece of legislation. I believe that this bill, as a compromise, represents not the lowest common denominator but the highest common factor. This is the sort of legislation, frankly, I should like to have thought of myself.

I believe that this bill is as just and reasonable as erring human beings are capable of achieving. I believe that mercy and humanitarianism are taken about as far as possible by this bill without being subversive of law and order, unless human nature is going to change which is highly unlikely. I believe this bill deserves to be, and undoubtedly will be, a model for similar legislation in other countries.

Finally, I believe that 50 years hence, long after most of us have disappeared not only from this house but from this life, this bill will reflect credit on this government and on its Minister of Justice.

[Mr. Speaker.]

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, a moment ago, I made two suggestions to the Minister of Justice. My second suggestion was to postpone until another date the study we are now making of the bill. My request was based on reasons which seemed to me very important, since several members have pointed out in the course of their remarks that they had not yet formed their opinion on the merits of the bill.

I cannot see why the government wants to rush this bill through. It is a most important measure, and by implication, touches upon fundamental problems in our society.

I have suggested that its consideration in committee be deferred to another sitting. I think my suggestion at the time was welcomed by the majority of the members of this house.

The house is now in committee of the whole, and is dealing with section 1, which is perhaps the most important. I do not know whether the government thinks this measure cannot be improved. There is no doubt that if a few more days were allowed, several members could consider all the suggestions that have been put forward and could come back and make important recommendations.

This bill is being put forward on the initiative of the government, and no doubt the government accepts responsibility for; but if it is passed, it will become the law of the land. We want to help make it as practical as possible, and it is with that purpose in mind that I have suggested that its consideration in committee be deferred to another day. I renew my plea to the minister.

I cannot see why an attempt is being made to hurry this bill through. There is no urgency involved. Many sentences have been commuted over the past three years, and a few days more could not make that much difference. On the contrary, it would enable us to study the bill and also to consult authorities and go over some of the speeches which have been made.

I must say to the minister that I was quite disappointed and surprised at the astonishing attitude he adopted a moment ago, in refusing to give us one day or a few days before the bill is considered by the committee of the whole.

I hope section 1 will not be passed before six o'clock; I know this would give satisfaction to several members on the other side of the house, who would also like to see some improvements made to various aspects of the bill.

I therefore ask the minister to give serious thought to my request and to allow us a few days more to make a thorough study of such an important bill.

In fact, once the bill is passed by the house, perhaps the matter will not come up again for another generation. In any event, we will not be here to deal with it at that time.

Therefore, I would ask the minister to allow us at least that much more time, which I consider necessary if we want to improve this bill. We need more time to consider this important measure, and I hope the minister will grant my request, which follows the one I submitted a moment ago.

(Text):

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I have not taken part in this debate up until now, although I took part in the debate on the private bill of the hon. member for York-Scarborough. I should like to say to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont that we have had many days' debate on this whole question, but members have searched their consciences and that, having decided how they feel about this measure, they know how they will vote. No one could read the speech, for instance, of the hon. member for Parkdale without seeing the side of those who wanted revision of the law as it is. This was the side of reason, logic and common sense. On the other side of the picture we had strictly emotional appeals which would not stand up under investigation or under the experience which has been gained in other countries which have taken steps such as this one. I had on the order paper at the beginning of this session a resolution calling upon the government to take the lead in bringing in measures to amend the archaic and Mosaic type of legislation we had on the statute books before this measure was introduced.

Although I am one of those who supported the hon. member for York-Scarborough, I am one of those who believes as does the hon. member for Parkdale. I am pleased with this measure. I believe it is a real halfway house. I believe it is a long step in the right direction. In my opinion, this bill is a credit to the minister, to the staff who had the job of developing this legislation and to the government. I am wholeheartedly in support of it.

Mr. Howard: At this stage I have only a few brief and general remarks to make following those of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and the hon. member for Vancouver South, and they are along somewhat the same lines. As to the major principle contained in the bill, I think each member has undoubtedly made up his mind and perhaps did so not at the time this particular bill was under debate but during previous sessions when we discussed or debated bills presented by the hon. member for York-Scarborough.

However, while one may have come to a certain conclusion with respect to the essence of the bill itself, I still think that a sufficiently large number of points of view were expressed during second reading of this bill to require some consideration and some reflection on the part of hon. members with regard to whether or not these different ideas might be contained within detailed parts of the bill itself. I am thinking of such matters as pleadings in court, functions in court, and whether or not we should alter somewhat the definitions of what is capital murder or what is non-capital murder. These are things which perhaps require some degree of cogitation on the part of members. It is for this reason that I would support the expression of view of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont to the extent that we have possibly a day or two in which to consider and to reflect upon all of these various ideas that have been suggested, some of them differing greatly.

I know that each member has approached this problem from the point of view of his conscience and not from the point of view of whether or not the legislation was introduced by a particular cabinet minister and the natural things that follow from supporting government bills. However, I think this conscience of members should be given an opportunity, over an extra day or two, to work a little bit more. Perhaps we may then be able to come up with suggestions in the committee of the whole which the minister said is the place in which we can in the broadest possible manner assess the feeling of the public. In committee of the whole we may be able to come up with suggestions and ideas with regard to particular methods rather than suggesting those amendments on the spur of the moment. I have one amendment particularly that I should like to propose to a subsequent clause. It is something which I would rather not introduce right on the spur of the moment, as it were. I would rather think about it for a while, talk with other members about it and get their ideas on it.

I also think there is a tendency, particularly on matters such as this one, to legislate with long intervals of time elapsing between the various changes that take place in the legislation. I think it will be some time again before parliament, in a formal way, gets down to the question of considering the statute dealing with capital punishment or capital or non-capital murder, as it is referred to in this bill; it might be another ten years or another 15 years. It is difficult to say when we will again get to that point of time in social thought when it is considered necessary to make some other amendments. I think we want to be as sure as we possibly can now, while we are at the task, that we are legislating in a manner which each of us really thinks is the best possible way to legislate on this particular subject.

In general I am in support of the bill and the subject matters contained therein. I have expressed these points of view on other occasions, especially when dealing with the bill introduced during the previous session by the hon. member for York-Scarborough.

I support it, not because it represents what some people have called a compromise between abolitionists and retentionists—because I do not think this is a subject matter we can approach from the point of view of compromise, especially if our conscience is involved—but because I think the bill recognizes, and certainly the reflection of the government is recognition of this fact, that capital punishment is no greater deterrent to murder than is some other form of punishment, notably, in this instance, life imprisonment.

I think this bill recognizes that capital punishment in some instances is not any greater deterrent to certain crimes being committed than is the threat of life imprisonment. I maintain that this is substantially the case with respect to those types of murder which are classified as planned and premeditated where a person plans a heinous crime. One such case that comes to mind is where an individual planted a bomb on an airplane in order to kill a member of his family and thereby collect the insurance, and in the process killed everybody else on the airplane. That was a planned, premeditated and foul type of murder.

In this and other instances where murder is planned and premeditated by an individual, I submit that the threat of capital punishment is no more a deterrent to that individual than is the threat of life imprisonment. I think what that individual is thinking about, or what he convinces himself will occur, is that he can plan and carry out a murder and use his wits in such a way that he will escape detection. He has convinced himself that he will be able to do this and will be able to escape detection, arrest and conviction by the police.

I support this bill, because it recognizes the fact that in some instances the threat of capital punishment is no more a deterrent than is the threat of life imprisonment. I submit that this is true in so far as planned and premeditated murders are concerned.

[Mr. Howard.]

I would say, however, that the retention of capital punishment in so far as concerns certain types of planned and premeditated murders will be acceptable to those who maintain that it is a deterrent; it will be acceptable to those who think in terms of the necessity for revenge; it will be acceptable to greater or lesser degrees to people in different parts of the country, depending upon the circumstances which might exist at any particular time.

Public opinion on this particular question of the necessity for capital punishment in certain cases will rise and fall as circumstances vary in a particular locale. If there is in an area a particularly fiendish individual who commits murder and the inhabitants are incensed about the murder and the manner in which it was carried out, the feeling in that area will rise and insist upon capital punishment being the proper punishment. At some other point of time, if nothing occurs in the same community, the feeling in that regard will diminish.

Mr. Chairman, I know other hon. members wish to rise and speak on this subject because I saw them rise when the first clause of this bill was called. Therefore perhaps I should not say anything more at this particular time, because it is ten or 12 minutes to six o'clock and I know other hon. members wish to participate in this debate and express their views today and keep them connected as closely as possible with the vote that took place. On later, subsequent clauses I think we could perhaps engage in a more extended debate.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, since I first became concerned with this subject a number of years ago as a result of having served on two successive murder juries I have been engaged in continuing study, discussion, argument and debate on this matter and I have come to know the retentionists' argument very well indeed.

I would not care to hazard a guess as to the number of debates outside of this house in which I have been involved, but it is a considerable number. As a person will in any discussion or any continuing argument, I have made it my business to try and probe surface reasons in the minds of those persons who are advocates of the death penalty being retained.

I have also made it my business, in travelling across this country, as I have had the good fortune to do in the last year or so, in particular visiting universities in almost every province of this country, to continue to probe the reasons offered by persons who would retain capital punishment. I think I should offer to the minister and the committee the benefit of that experience and those discussions, which experience is perhaps unique in this committee.

It seems to me that in general the great majority of retentionists are in favour, as they have indicated in overwhelming numbers in this house today, of a limitation and a reduction in the application of the death penalty. No one, not even the most fire-breathing retentionist or any hon. member of this committee, enjoys contemplating participating himself in an actual execution, in spite of the phrase commonly heard following a particular ghastly murder, "I would not mind pulling the rope myself" and other statements which have been made in a burst of emotion following such incidents.

However, it seems to me that the great majority of retentionists agree that the application of the death penalty should be reduced and limited. The statement I have heard over and over again is, "Yes, I go along with your bill, your idea about abolishing capital punishment, except in the case of", and then the person goes on to describe the one unforgiveable crime from his point of view.

I must confess that most frequently the crimes mentioned and presented to me in these extensive discussions have been those committed against children, specifically the crime of rape of a child followed by murder; the crime of kidnapping followed by murder; the crime of murder committed on an old, weak and helpless person. These are the crimes most frequently suggested as being incapable of forgiveness.

I wonder whether in describing what capital murder is and attempting to define what we mean generally—and by "we" I mean the people of Canada—should be the exceptions to the limited application of the death penalty, we should perhaps embody in the language of the law some of the descriptions applied to such crimes. The words which occur, and which have occurred in this debate and in the ones that have preceded it, are, in particular, the words "cold blooded". I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that words have meanings; people use them for that purpose. As I say, the expression "cold blooded" has been used time and time again in this house in this and other discussions. Is it not reasonable that the law should contain what the great majority of people, according to my investigations, and in my opinion, feel to be a description of a crime to which the death penalty would apply.

Another word frequently used to qualify this degree of culpability for which the death penalty would be warranted is the word "foul". Several hon. members—I shall not mention any in particular, have used this word to describe what they regard as an unforgivable murder, a murder that must be punished by capital punishment.

There is another ingredient in this question of the degree of culpability which has troubled many people and which has been described as presenting the greatest problem. It is the person who clearly represents a threat and a danger to society. The argument put forward—and it was used in this debate as well as in previous debates—concerns a man sentenced to life imprisonment who kills a guard. The argument is: what has he got to lose if, ultimately, there is no death penalty. What has he got to lose by killing a guard? As I say, I have given an answer to that in previous debates as far as the abolitionist argument is concerned, but we are not discussing that today. We are attempting in this first clause to define in terms as clear and unmistakable as possible what we mean by capital murder, the type of murder which we say must be punishable by death. I am not prepared, as the hon. member for Skeena mentioned a few moments ago, to offer now an amendment containing these particular phrases and words, but it seems to me some consideration should be given to translating into the law, to writing into it, those terms which our people and our society have used and are using to describe such crimes, and I suggest again that perhaps "foul" and perhaps "cold blooded" should be added to the phrase "planned and deliberate" and that some consideration might be given to this question of whether such people clearly represent a threat and a danger to society. As I have said before on this argument concerning a person killing a guard while attempting to escape, surely if we can develop, design and bring forward such tremendously complicated, complex and technical devices as have been developed during this century we are capable of so designing a prison or place of incarceration as to reduce to an absolute minimum the threat or danger to those persons charged with the care of prisoners.

As I mentioned before having regard to the definition of capital murder—again I think the M'Naghten rules—the legal definition of insanity as compared with the medical or clinical definition of insanity, leave much to be desired. As I mentioned when speaking on second reading there is clearly room for improvement here in this notion of diminishing responsibility and I do hope we can qualify the definition of capital murder to exclude specifically those who are suffering from a diminished mental responsibility for their actions. I do not think the intention of the M'Naghten rules or any other consideration of insanity was ever to ensure that persons who are not sane should be hanged.

These thoughts, which I should like to leave with the committee, are in no sense an attempt to push the minister over the brink. Rather, these suggestions are intended to give the committee the benefit of what a great many persons in this country are thinking. These are the thoughts of people vitally concerned with this subject. I offer these suggestions as being the ingredients which, according to my judgment, the majority of people have in mind for the one category of murder for which capital punishment will be applicable.

Mr. Fulton: I rise, not to reply to those hon. members who have spoken on the substance of the first clause so far but to deal with the question which was raised some time ago by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, suggesting that discussion of the bill in committee might be deferred. I must say that when I first heard his request it seemed to me that, after all, the bill had been before the house for nine days since it was read the first time and distributed, and that all hon. members had probably made up their minds not only on the principle of the bill but also with regard to the details. I thought, therefore, it would be appropriate to continue at once to consider the bill in committee.

I must say that I was also a little conscious of the fact that there had been some criticism—though I wish to say we do not consider that criticism to be justified—that the government was at fault for not having legislation on the order paper for the house to deal with. Well, this bill has been on the order paper for nine days, and if it were the fact that there is not a great deal of other legislation presently before the house and I considered that members would have had an opportunity to consider this subject carefully and make up their minds.

These arguments could all be advanced; nevertheless, I am sure the hon. member put forward his views with sincerity and for a good purpose. For that reason I have had a discussion with my colleague the leader of the house and I may tell the committee that, having today opened up the discussion of clause 1, if it meets the wishes of hon. members opposite we should be prepared to defer further consideration of the bill in committee until next Monday.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the leader of the house whether we continue this bill or go to estimates tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, by special arrangement, which I hope is appreciated, we will take up the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare tomorrow; and on Friday we shall take the estimates of the Department of Justice. If there is time available on Friday or Saturday, contrary to what I announced earlier, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys would come in ahead of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Justice gave us no concession a while ago.

Mr. Fulton: Certainly I did.

Mr. Churchill: I gave the concession. The arrangement for Thursday is to help out the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes; I was not referring to the house leader; I was referring to the Minister of Justice.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CHINESE-CANADIAN TRADE AGREEMENT

Question No. 227—Mr. Argue:

Question

1. Does the Chinese-Canadian long term trade agreement contain any obligation on the part of Canada to purchase goods from China?
2. If so, what are the terms of any such undertaking?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

1. No.
2. See (1) above.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 25, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PRIME MINISTER OF ISRAEL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to refer to the presence in the gallery of the Prime Minister of Israel, Mr. David Ben-Gurion, the valiant nation builder of modern Israel. He is not unknown to Canada, having been here on more than one occasion, the first of which was in 1917 or 1918 when, following the Balfour declaration for the acceptance of the setting up of a national home for the Jews, he belonged to the Royal Fusiliers who were then taking their training in Windsor, Nova Scotia.

Throughout the years he has given leadership to his country. Our distinguished visitor is no stranger to parliament. He has served in the knesset, the parliament of his country, for many years, and represents that belief in parliamentary democracy which has been an essential element of his life and dedication. He comes from a land where our religious faith originated and from which many of the values of western civilization have been derived. Since the creation of his country in 1948 the people have been engaged in a remorseless struggle against climate and economics. As the leader of that nation he has earned admiration for the perseverance which has enabled him and those associated with him to meet almost insuperable obstacles in the directions I have indicated.

We welcome him to Canada for the position which he occupies, and for the contribution that the people of the Jewish race have made to Canada over a period of slightly more than 200 years. I am sure I speak for hon. members everywhere when I say that we extend to him the warmest of greetings and good wishes, and through him to the president and people of Israel.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Leader of the Opposition and on behalf of the Liberal opposition I am happy to join the Prime Minister in extending a sincere welcome to Canada and to this parliament, to the distinguished Prime Minister of Israel, the head of government in that dynamic little state.

On the occasion of his visit to this parliament it is appropriate that we should remind ourselves that Canada has been in the forefront of almost every vital step in the development of the state of Israel since 1947, when partition was first voted. This, too, is an occasion to recall that partition itself was urged and actively supported by the Canadian representative on the United Nations special committee on Palestine, Hon. Mr. Justice Rand, then of the Supreme Court of Canada. It was he who, along with others, pleaded for the creation of a Jewish state.

Then, of course, I am sure that all members will recognize the fact that is was the Leader of the Opposition who actively lead the move to admit the newly created state of Israel to the family of nations. Canadians generally, I think, are proud that he has been recognized for those efforts.

The applause that greeted the remarks of the Prime Minister, when he extended a welcome to Mr. David Ben-Gurion, as prolonged and as sincere as any we have had in a long time in receiving a foreign visitor, indicates our admiration not only for Israel but for the great statesman who is its prime minister. Mr. David Ben-Gurion is a man of action but he is also a man of thought. Like Balfour and Smuts, he has been able to combine the qualities of the statesman with those of one who loves philosophy and learning generally. His life has been dedicated to the survival of the Jewish people. History will demonstrate that, along with Herzl and Weiszman, he is truly one of the fathers of his country, this boy who at the age of 17 left Russia to come to what he calls Zion. Mr. David Ben-Gurion is a man of the world, and he has fought for the rights of man everywhere.

The Prime Minister mentioned yesterday that he recalled with satisfaction his own visit to Israel, and I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I may just make this personal note. The last time I saw Mr. David Ben-Gurion was in the desert, in his kibbutz, in Israel. I shall never forget the remarkable and memorable day I had with him there in 1958. So in welcoming him here today I can characterize our visitor in no better words than those used in 1958 by Hadassah in its award to Israel's premier for distinguished humanitarian service:

> With insight derived of wisdom, with perseverance and courage inspired by prophetic vision, guided always by the spiritual teachings of the holy Bible, he has translated the moral concepts of our ancient heritage into a humane and democratic leadership, this assuring for Israel and himself a unique and honourable place in the history of man's struggle for freedom.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the national leader of the C.C.F., I am very happy to join in the words of welcome expressed by the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Essex East to Premier Ben-Gurion, who I understand was exiled by Turkey in the first world war, later came to Canada, trained in Windsor, Nova Scotia, under British guidance and later served with the British forces in the Jewish legion; who fought against evil at that time and who has been working for all that is good ever since.

Independence came to his country 13 years ago as a result of his guidance and decision. We are proud to know today that it is a democratic socialist state which has conducted a successful experiment that is no longer an experiment but a reality that really works. Except for a short period when he became a shepherd, Mr. Ben-Gurion has been a premier. A shepherd named David became a king; a premier named David became a shepherd. He is a prophet in the land of prophets. The rewarding rehabilitation program being undertaken in Israel follows the biblical instructions given in Leviticus 19:23:

> And man realizing his loss, must set out to clothe the land with trees.

That great English orator, political philosopher and statesman, Edmund Burke, said:

> The nerve that never relaxes, the eye that never blenches, the thought that never wanders—these are the masters of victory.

How aptly do these words apply to Premier Ben-Gurion, our guest today, the head of a state that has nourished democracy, where it has blossomed, and has caused the desert to bloom, giving new life and hope to millions.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Fifth and sixth reports of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines—Mr. Howe.

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN ELEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber) moved:

> That the eleventh report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Tuesday, May 23, 1961, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

NATURAL RESOURCES

REPORT ON PREPARATIONS FOR CONFERENCE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, as members of parliament are aware, preparations for the resources for tomorrow conference to be held in Montreal, October 23 to October 28 next, are now well advanced. The governments of all the provinces have co-operated with the government of Canada in planning to make the conference a most significant event in the history of our country, in so far as the development of Canada's renewable resources is concerned.

Background papers form an essential basis for the conference discussions. In all, 80 such papers have been submitted. As a number of these have been written by co-authors, upwards of 100 scientists and other experts in the various resource fields have contributed to the fund of information and judgment on which conference deliberations will be founded.

As a service to parliamentarians and the press, as well as to radio and television reporters and interested organizations and individuals, the resources for tomorrow secretariat has assembled, in each of the seven sectors involved, short summaries of background papers. For each sector a resumé of highlights of the papers will be prepared. This resumé is, in effect, a digest of contents designed to indicate the general pattern or trend of approach by the authors to the renewable resource development problems.

The first of these completed digests pertains to the waters sector, and this document is available in both English and French. The water sector resumé will be followed, in due course, by information compiled in similar form in respect of wildlife, forestry, land use, fisheries, recreation and regional development sectors.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO LETTER FROM B.C. PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, to ask him whether he has yet been able to obtain permission from the premier of British Columbia to table the letter from the premier of that province written to him and dated January 13, 1961, as asked for by the hon. member for Laurier on May 22 and again yesterday by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I took the request that was made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as having regard to the tabling of all correspondence that had passed between Premier Bennett and myself in respect of this subject, and that was what I undertook to speak to the premier about. I expect that I will be seeing him during the course of the day.

As far as the letter of January 13, 1961 which the premier wrote me is concerned, that has already been put before the house, and is to be found on page 1652 of Hansard for February 2, 1961. My reply to that letter in full was placed before the house on February 2, and is to be found at pages 1650 and 1651. It will be seen by all hon. members who care to refresh their memories as to the contents of these two letters—

Mr. Hellyer: The minister's memory is fresher today than it was yesterday.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that while Premier Bennett's letter was written prior to the signing of the treaty between Canada and the United States, the premier's letter arrived here on Monday morning, January 16, when the Prime Minister was already on his way to Washington to take part in the signing ceremonies which had been arranged previously to be held on the morning of Tuesday, January 17.

It will be seen also by those who care to read Premier Bennett's letter that he did not ask that the treaty be not signed. As a matter of fact the tripartite discussions to which the governments of Canada, the United States and British Columbia had been parties had been proceeding for some time previously with a view to leading up to the signing of the treaty, which actually took place on January 17.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for his somewhat extended answer to a rather simple and direct question concerning whether or not he had obtained consent to the tabling of a certain document. In any event, I take it that it is quite clear from the record in Hansard that both the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred to the specific letter by date. I take it from the minister's answer that it is also quite clear that the letter quoted in Hansard at page 1652 is the letter in question, and the only one that passed on that date from the premier of British Columbia to the Minister of Finance. As to the debatable part of the answer of the Minister of Finance which was rather extended—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask what is the hon. member's question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have a Speaker in this house. The minister is not the Speaker.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, must we listen endlessly to this long winded exponent from Ottawa West?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am still waiting to hear what the question is. I take it that the hon. member for Ottawa West intends to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I find myself in some difficulty at this time. I asked a direct question of the Minister of Finance in which I inquired whether he had obtained consent to the tabling of a certain document. The minister made a lengthy reply, part of which was addressed to the question. In his reply the minister said that the document was published in Hansard, and he gave me the page reference, but the latter part of his answer contained matter which was debatable, and I wish to raise a question concerning it.

Mr. Grafftey: One of our clearer questioners is now on his feet.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has the floor to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. McIlraith: My supplementary question is this, Mr. Speaker. I take it from the minister's answer—the latter part of his answer, in any event—that it is quite clear that the letter from the premier of British Columbia—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McIlraith: —had been received in Ottawa well before the signing of the agreement with the United States?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, not "well before" at all. I made this quite clear when I was asked this question several days ago, and I have made it clear again this morning. The letter of Premier Bennett which appears in full at page 1652 of the Hansard of this house for February 2 was dated January 13. It arrived in Ottawa on Monday, January 16. The treaty was signed in Washington on Tuesday morning, January 17. The letter of Premier Bennett arrived here when the Prime Minister was already on his way to Washington to take part in the signing ceremonies which had been previously arranged and with full knowledge on the part of the representatives of the British Columbia government who had participated in negotiations on this matter with the government of Canada and, at times, with the government of the United States. This was a matter of arrangement among the three governments and was completely within the contemplation of all three governments.

Mr. Hellyer: They certainly took the minister for a ride.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister of Finance explain to the house why he said yesterday he would have to get consent to table a letter which he had already tabled in this house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I would not have thought that anything would require explanation when the situation was so clear. I had been asked on two days this week about tabling correspondence with Premier Bennett. There is other correspondence in addition to these two letters. I was asked about tabling correspondence and before I could table correspondence, which has extended over some period, I stated and I still believe that the consent of the government of British Columbia should be required. I said yesterday that I expected to see Premier Bennett today, not in Ottawa but elsewhere, and that I would have an opportunity to ask him about these letters. I remind the hon. member for Essex East, Mr. Speaker, who cannot be quite so lacking in intelligence as he tries to show this morning, that this letter was not tabled. It was read into Hansard—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the difference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —in the course of a statement which I made to the house on this matter on February 2. It was the hon. member for Kootenay West who asked me then if I would table the letter of Premier Bennett to which my letter was written in reply, and I complied with that request.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Such ineptness.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask a supplementary question arising out of the discussion with respect to this letter, as reported in Hansard of February 2, 1961. My question has to do with the request for the tabling of the letter of Premier Bennett, which the minister ascribed to the hon. member for Kootenay West, and I would ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I cannot hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. McIlraith: After pointing out that the minister ascribed the request for the tabling of the letter and its printing in Hansard to the hon. member for Kootenay West, I was going on to point out that it was the hon. member for Laurier who made the request and I would ask the minister when he moved that hon. member's constituency to Kootenay West.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the supplementary should not be admitted as it arises out of some ancient error in Hansard.

Mr. Stuart Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice. In view of the confusion that has developed in British Columbia because of press reports in recent days, did the Minister of Justice himself receive any communication from any member of the government of British Columbia prior to the signing of the treaty, indicating that the government of that province objected to that course?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have received no communication at any time from any member of the government of British Columbia indicating any reservation whatsoever about the advisability of signing the Columbia river treaty last January, or about the merits of the treaty itself.

On January 9 I forwarded to Hon. Mr. Williston, minister of lands and forests for British Columbia and chairman of the British Columbia section of the Canada-British Columbia policy liaison committee on Columbia river development, a copy of the text of the treaty which had been unanimously recommended by the Canadian and American negotiators to their respective governments. This recommendation was signed by the deputy minister of lands of British Columbia as well as by myself.

In my covering letter to Mr. Williston I advised him that it was our intention to sign the treaty on January 16 and that under all the circumstances, including the participation and signature of Mr. Bassett, his deputy minister, we assumed that the British Columbia government was in accord with the terms of the treaty unless I heard from Mr. Williston to the contrary. Mr. Williston acknowledged receipt of the copy of the text of the treaty and of the Canadian negotiator's recommendation on January 12. No suggestion was then, or ever, made that the treaty should not be signed.

It was, of course, understood by both governments that in the interval between the signing and the ratification of the treaty by Canada certain agreements, including an agreement on the financing of the treaty projects, should be negotiated. It is obvious that if Premier Bennett had intended to communicate to the federal government—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question of fact involved is the time of receipt of the communications that were exchanged. I think we are perhaps extending the matter into a debate on what transpired, and I suggest to the Minister of Justice that he terminate his answer there unless he feels there is some further factual explanation that is needed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to do so briefly, because I was asked whether I had ever had any communication with the government of British Columbia involving reservations with regard to the signing of the treaty, and I think I should conclude my answer simply by saying that it is obvious that we have not had any such representations. It is obvious that the letter from Mr. Bennett of January 13 to the Minister of Finance was not intended by Mr. Bennett at that time—

Mr. McIlraith: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —on the basis of its contents, to raise any objection—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: —to the signing of the treaty but was concerned entirely with the collateral matter of the financing of the treaty project.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point or order. My point is that in the latter part of the minister's answer he went on to debate the position; because it is quite clear from the letter itself, which is now before the house—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: —and which can be found at page 1652 of Hansard, reference to which has been made by the minister, that the position the minister is now taking is a debatable one and not the type of thing to be put forward in a factual statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think there is a strong desire to debate this matter and that this is not the appropriate time. I suggest that the supplementary questions terminate and that we pass to the next order of business.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Can he inform the house whether he had been made aware of the contents of the letter from the premier of British Columbia at the time Canada signed the treaty?

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I have just indicated, it seems to me that there has been ample opportunity to verify the facts by question and answer, at least as far as can be done at this stage of the day. Therefore I cannot admit any further supplementaries or answers on this matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that in view of the fact that you asked the Minister of Justice to desist and he carried on—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There we are again, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: There you are again.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the hon. member for Essex East is raising a point of order. There was a point of order taken by the hon. member for Ottawa West about the answer of the Minister of Justice. I heard what he had to say and I am inclined to agree that the answer did go on into the expression of opinion as well as fact, but I consider the matter closed now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The only point I was seeking to suggest to Your Honour—

Mr. Fulton: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East had the floor. I will hear the minister's question of privilege immediately.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The suggestion I was seeking to make before I was so rudely interrupted by the Minister of Justice was that the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres put a question to the Prime Minister, which I suggest is an important one, and the Prime Minister was about to reply. While I understand Your Honour's desire to restrict questions, in the circumstances, I would think that since the Prime Minister was about to reply he should be allowed to do so.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I not only want to correct what the hon. member for Essex East has said but also to point out that at no time did I act in disregard of your suggestion. The hon. member said just now that you, sir, asked me to desist and that I carried on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Fulton: You will recall that you suggested I might terminate my answer unless I had some other factual information. I said that in my view there was other factual information that I should like to give in reply to the question which had been addressed to me. I carried on in accordance with your own suggestion that there was a possibility of a proper continuation of the reply.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

SUGGESTED DISTRIBUTION TO PROVINCES OF TULIP BULBS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a rather unusual and flowery question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that a great many Canadians will never be able to come to Ottawa to enjoy the full glories of our tulip festival, would the minister consult with the national capital commission and any other appropriate bodies to ensure the distribution of at least some of the Dutch tulip bulbs to our provincial capitals of Canada, to the end that Queen Juliana's wartime association with the capital of Canada may be celebrated by lesser tulip festivals throughout the nation?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will give my usual flowery answer; yes.

THE CENSUS

STATEMENT ON FORMS TO BE USED BY ENUMERATORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the reported turmoil in the census division of the Department of Trade and Commerce following the publishing of a magazine article advising readers to demand a confidential census form, can the parliamentary secretary assure the house that steps will be taken to guarantee that the taking of the census and publication of the results will not be delayed as a result of the incident?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, since there is no census division within the Department of Trade and Commerce I presume that the hon. member intended to refer to the demography division of the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Hellyer: That is correct.

Mr. Morris: Under the direction of my minister I am in contact with that division, and let me say there is no turmoil within it.

If the house would permit, perhaps I should state factually what the two forms are in connection with the taking of the population census and, in so doing, again bespeak, as my minister has done, the active support and co-operation of members of parliament, who can give a most significant and meaningful direction to this great national undertaking which has such an important bearing upon the future economic and social life of Canada.

In reply to the question let me indicate that there are two forms involved. One is known as form 2A. It is in padded shape and consists—

Mr. Benidickson: The appointments are also padded.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Morris: —of a series of questions kept in the pad by the enumerator. These questions are normal to all census taking both in Canada and in other countries which undertake census work. These questions have been asked in previous Canadian census taking.

At each fifth household a form known as form 4 will be left with every person 15 years of age and over. Some of the questions asked on form 4 are confidential in nature. These questions elicit information concerning gross earnings and the component sources of income which make up the individual's gross earnings. As I have said, this form will be left with each individual 15 years of age and over in every fifth household. The individual will be asked to complete it in privacy. Having completed it he will be requested to seal it with the gummed stickers provided for the form. The form will then be collected by the enumerator and returned by him directly to the dominion bureau of statistics, where it will receive attention from the dominion statistician. The sealed form will not be opened by the enumerator.

There will be no delay in the conduct of the 1961 census of Canada which will commence on June 1 through the activity of 27,000 enumerators. I bespeak again such support as the hon. gentleman and other hon. members can give to the conduct of this meaningful national undertaking.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the parliamentary secretary give us an estimate or indication as to when that part of the census information used for redistribution will be made available?

Mr. Morris: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The returns from the population survey, form 2A, will be transcribed by two electronic computer machines.

Mr. Benidickson: Progressive Conservative machines?

Mr. Morris: After the returns have been fed through the machines we will have the population total, provided the electronic machines do not incur any disabilities such as afflict the opposition—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order.

Mr. Morris: —and I think we can count on a meaningful answer in about 10 or 12 months.

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to direct another question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the parliamentary secretary aware of the fact that the confidential information to be given in form 4 is readily discernible by merely placing the form in the line of sight in any reasonable light, and therefore can be deciphered by any person who would be willing to look at the form?

Mr. Morris: I and the dominion bureau of statistics do not have the same imputations which the hon. gentleman has about the 27,000 enumerators. I have just courteously sent him the form. The form will be sealed. If he will kindly turn it over he will see three pieces of gum which will seal the form and prevent that situation which he has just mentioned.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a further supplementary question. I am sure the parliamentary secretary was aware of the fact that I was referring to the sealed form. It is still possible readily to discern the information—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has brought the matter to the attention of the parliamentary secretary, and it seems to me that is all that can be accomplished on the orders of the day.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I wish to ask a supplementary question of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Because of the development of this second sealed questionnaire, has consideration been given to allowing the people themselves to fill in the regular census forms and have those sealed forms delivered to the enumerators also?

Mr. Morris: Mr. Speaker, we are carrying on in the 1961 census the standard census procedure.

Mr. McIlraith: Not in hiring staff.

Mr. Morris: The hon. member for Ottawa West has made some interjection with, I presume, his typical lucidity. He would know all about this matter, because he ostensibly handled the last census.

Mr. Hellyer: And it was very efficiently handled.

Mr. Morris: The general census form does not contain any information which, in the view of demographic scientists, would require it to be prepared in an attitude or atmosphere of confidence over and above the oath of secrecy taken by the enumerator and for which protection is provided in law. Those details which are regarded as individually intimate are in form 4, which is taken from every individual 15 years of age and over in the fifth household ending with the numeral 3 or 8 in the enumerator's chronological order.

Mr. Hellyer: But it can be read just as easily as if it were open.

[Later:]

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce another question relating to my previous one. Since the last census was able to provide information for redistribution in a nine month period, I wonder whether he could tell us why the Conservative machine—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is obviously intent on presenting an argument, a course which would be improper and which would probably prolong a discussion which has already been too long.

Mr. Morris: Notwithstanding—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has no question before him.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can inform us of any new developments in the situation in Laos.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, on May 20 the international supervisory commission in Laos mentioned the reported build up of arms and ammunition on both sides. Because of the tension created and other problems, the commission expressed the hope that military supplies from outside Laos would cease forthwith. As well, it expressed the view that the withdrawal of foreign forces and advisers introduced into Laos since 1954 should take place with the least possible delay.

The principle that a status of genuine neutrality for Laos requires the withdrawal from that country of foreign military personnel who are not there by specific international agreement is generally recognized. In expressing the view of the Canadian government to the conference on May 17 the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> Such status would involve no foreign military formation on Laotian soil.

Also, on the same day, the United States secretary of state, Mr. Rusk, speaking for the delegation of his country said:

> Foreign military personnel, except for those specified in the Geneva accords, should be withdrawn from Laos—
> There is no problem about the withdrawal of the limited United States military personnel assisting with the training and supply of government forces if the 'Vietminh brethren' and other elements who have entered Laos from the northeast return to their homes.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Geneva conference on Laos is about to be postponed until May 29, can the Prime Minister say whether it is the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to return to Laos to act as the Canadian spokesman?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman made a slip—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I intended, of course, to refer to the return of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to Geneva.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —not an unusual slip, but one which was apparent to everyone on this occasion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was that nice crack?

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the Secretary of State for External Affairs returns to the house, which I expect he will do this afternoon, possibly he will be in a position to advise what further course will be undertaken. In any event, the postponement underlines the lack of urgency in the situation at this time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONCTON AND NORTH BAY—REPORTED LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport concerning the Canadian National Railways. Last night and this morning I received word from Moncton by radio and press concerning a large C.N.R. lay-off at the Moncton shops. Yesterday the railway announced the curtailment of heavy repairs to passenger car equipment at Moncton, and the transfer of this work elsewhere. The employees predict that 130 men will be involved in this lay-off, while management has told the press that between 80 and 90 men are involved.

Would the minister instruct the C.N.R. and particularly Mr. Gordon to delay this order and to call a special meeting of the board of directors to review this policy decision of management?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, knowing the sincere and continuing interest of the hon. member in all matters concerning the Canadian National Railways and its employees, I can assure the hon. gentleman I will take up this matter with railway management immediately.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the assurance given by the minister that the government will take action in this situation, will the minister also undertake to discuss with the management of the railway the cut in employment on the railway in North Bay, resulting in additional people being put out of work at this critical time of unemployment?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I shall also bring this matter to the attention of management.

TELEVISION

SUDBURY, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO OPENING OF FRENCH STATION—REQUIRED APPROVAL OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Transport concerning the forthcoming opening of a French T.V. station in the Sudbury area. Since Canada and the United States have now come to an agreement on the use of channel 13, would the minister inform the house as to whether the required approval by his department before the work can be undertaken will soon be given.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED DENIAL OF DAY'S BENEFITS TO UNEMPLOYED DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister aware that a board of referees at St. Catharines has rendered a two to one decision disallowing the appeal of 15 unemployed persons from Welland county against the decision to suspend unemployment benefits for the day of their visit to Ottawa?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Miss LaMarsh: I have a supplementary question. In the light of the fact that the decision indicates that the suspension arose originally because of improper instructions given by the Welland office of the unemployment insurance commission, is the minister prepared to intervene on behalf of the applicants to ensure that they receive their benefits?

Mr. Starr: The applicants now have recourse to appeal to the umpire, whose decision is final.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Does this situation apply to other areas from which men came here to Ottawa on that day? Are they also deprived of their unemployment insurance benefits for that day?

Mr. Starr: Under the act anybody who does not report on the day on which the act specifies that he shall report is deprived of one day's unemployment insurance benefits.

IMMIGRATION

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—REPORTED PROVISION OF BEDS TO IMMIGRANT STRIKEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): In the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration I should like to pose a question to the parliamentary secretary, and ask him whether he or the minister will check into allegations that the immigration officials in Saint John, New Brunswick, are supplying beds and bedding to immigrant strikebreakers at the shipyards there.

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will check into that question.

THE BUDGET

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON REPORTS OF DEFICIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the minister has decided to keep the facts and figures to himself until after next Monday, would he care to confirm or deny reports that he will be setting an all-time record in his budget presentation and will be reporting the biggest deficit in Canadian history?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, to every hon. member of this house it will be perfectly obvious that the question which has just been asked is an abuse of the rules of this house. It attempts to make assertions which are untrue on their face, and it attempts to argue the case. This is not the latest period for the submission of a budget, and I do not know of any precedent for an opposition asking for the introduction of a budget when there is one measure of the previous budget still waiting final enactment by parliament.

Mr. Hellyer: That is your responsibility.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman opposite and some of his colleagues on this subject have been making assertions which are entirely lacking in truth. Some of these assertions might be permissible on the part of persons who do not know any better; but when it comes to assertions of the kind that the hon. member repeated in his alleged question, coming from experienced members of this house like the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) out on the hustings, it is a different matter. These assertions of theirs are insidious and utterly irresponsible.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Since the hon. gentleman has addressed himself to me in such an affectionate way, Mr. Speaker, may I ask him a supplementary question. If there is a deficit of these proportions, does he not think that deficit ought to be made known to the 100,000 electors in these four by-elections?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I cannot think of any greater service that could be rendered to the electors in those four by-elections or to the people of Canada than to know what an utter deficit the hon. member is to the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am hurt.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PETAWAWA—INQUIRY AS TO RESULTS OF INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Will the minister advise the house whether he has yet received the report of the inquiry into the establishment and operation of the Petawawa yacht club?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to report on this matter at the present time.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister take the question as notice and advise the house tomorrow?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO OFFICIAL REPORT FOR MAY 24

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Yesterday on the orders of the day, as found at page 5296 of Hansard, the hon. member for Kootenay West attempted to ask a supplementary question which appears in the left hand column on page 5296. My specific recollection of the question was that it was interrupted by yourself, Mr. Speaker, about four lines before he reached the name of Major W. H. Pope, M.C., and that the last three lines of the question were not pronounced by the hon. member. I am wondering how it is that they appear in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of the hon. member, perhaps the matter could be deferred until he is present.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I am present, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman wishes to find out how it appeared in Hansard I wish he would go up to the Hansard office and find out, because I have not been there.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply. Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

165. Departmental administration including annual contribution of $200 to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada and $167,500 as grants to recognized private after-care agencies as may be approved by treasury board, $1,194,583.

The Chairman: Department of Justice, vote No. 165. This item will be found on page 35 of the blue book, and the details on page 239.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order having to do with the conduct of the business of this house and the estimates we are about to consider. On Tuesday last the leader of the house was asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, following a consultation I had with him, as the hon. member for Laurier had, what the order of business would be on Wednesday. The minister replied what the business would be and indicated that today, Thursday, we would be taking up the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Just before we terminated our day's work last evening the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, as will be found at page 5326 of Hansard, asked the leader of the house what we would do today. The leader of the house replied:

> Mr. Speaker, by special arrangement, which I hope is appreciated, we will take up the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare tomorrow; and on Friday we shall take up the estimates of the Department of Justice.

Then he continued and said what the order of business would be on Friday and Saturday, and that, of course, is not material. At five minutes to eleven this morning the whip of our party was telephoned, I presume by the Minister of Veterans Affairs—no; I understand it was by the government whip, and this is a new arrangement. The whip of our party was telephoned by the government whip and told that the order of business today would not be the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare but those of the Department of Justice.

[Mr. McGee.]

As we all know, intimations are made as far ahead of time as possible by the government as to the order of business on a particular day, and sometimes on successive days, in order to give hon. members, particularly those who are primarily interested and who have given special attention to the particular estimates or proposed enactments, an opportunity of preparing and arranging their personal affairs and public engagements. To be told at five minutes to eleven that there was a change in the order of business is obviously unfair to the private members on the government side, and such an abrupt change is eminently unfair to those in the opposition groups.

The government, of course, is master of the arrangements in this house, but unless it wishes to be guilty of the charge of tyranny by majority it must take into account the interests, the concerns and the convenience of opposition groups as well. This is a clear manifestation of the lack of regard this government has for parliament and for the opposition parties. The opposition parties, under our constitution, play a role no less important in our deliberations than that of the government. To have the whip of the Conservative party—not the leader of the house or his spokesman—call up the whip of the Liberal party and say in an arrogant way which we have now come to associate with this government, "The order of business to day will not be as announced last evening by the government, but it will be the estimates of the Department of Justice" is most unfair, and I rise in my place to protest—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the manner in which the public business is being handled by this government, and in particular in this instance.

Mr. Pallett: What a thespian.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "What a thespian"; I say "What a government". This is a government that is supposed to take into account the rights of parliament. They have not consulted us, as the Minister of Veterans Affairs does and has done with fairness, but we were approached in this manner this morning and told, "We shall not go on with what the minister said yesterday and what he said the day before". The whip of the party announces that we will go on with the estimates of the Department of Justice. I want to ask the government if this is a fair way in which to conduct our proceedings.

Mr. Churchill: You will get an answer shortly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Members of our party who were here and who are here now are interested in the Department of National Health and Welfare. Other members who have been following matters concerned with the Department of Justice have made other arrangements, as attends all hon. members in the adjustments they must make in their daily schedules. Is it fair that we should have this sudden change imposed at this time, when it is not possible for us to apply our best and most experienced skills with regards to the estimates that have been called? This is not a fair way to treat parliament.

The fact that the whip was the instrument for providing this notice causes me to suggest that this was not a decision made by the leader of the house. I cannot believe that the leader of the house, having given these undertakings, would have resorted to this kind of action. I do not believe it. I can only conclude that the whip has done so on the instructions of the Prime Minister—

Mr. Churchill: That is entirely wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —on the instructions of a man who is primarily interested in what happens on Monday.

Mr. Churchill: That is entirely wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can only suggest to the leader of the house that this change arises out of the fact that the Prime Minister or the government, knowing that the government had been committed to bringing in the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, was not anxious to have any discussion at this time in this committee about matters that might be of interest to people concerned in the four by-elections—

Mr. Churchill: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and which are connected with health and welfare. They did not want us to discuss pensions; they did not want us to discuss matters having to do with health and welfare.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege the hon. member has risen on a point of order and is now ranging into a debate on subjects which he thinks should be discussed. The hon. member has been making attacks on hon. members in their absence, and has been indulging in personalities. I think the hon. member should restrict his remarks to the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this is not a point of order. What I am saying—

The Chairman. Order. I think the hon. member for Essex East has explained why he rose in his place, which was because of the change in the order of business. The hon. member has explained why he does not favour this change, and I think he has sufficiently explained his point.

I see that the hon. member for Kootenay West wishes to speak on this point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I have not finished.

The Chairman: I trust that the hon. member will keep to the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I trust, Mr. Chairman, that you will allow me to finish my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pallett: Withdraw that.

The Chairman: I recognize the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have the floor and I am speaking about rights which affect us very seriously—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am speaking on behalf of our party—

The Chairman: Order. I have already indicated to the hon. member for Essex East that the Chair has a discretion in hearing the hon. member on the point of order; that is clear. I now recognize the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order—

The Chairman: Order. I cannot entertain more than one point of order at the same time, and I recognize the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am rising on a point of order. Do you rule that I do not have the right to proceed?

The Chairman: Order. I have indicated to the hon. member that I recognize the hon. member for Kootenay West. If the hon. member persists in remaining on his feet, having heard what I have said, I shall report him to the Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I now appeal your ruling. You have ruled that I cannot continue with my point of order, and I appeal your ruling.

The Chairman: Order. I do not think the hon. member may appeal this ruling.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

The Chairman: I had indicated I was going to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West, adding that if the hon. member for Essex East would not remain in his seat I should have to report him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are you now suggesting we do not have the right to appeal your ruling?

The Chairman: This is not a ruling which I have made. This arises on a point of order. I have not disposed of the point of order. I simply indicated to the hon. member for Essex East that I thought he had made his point and that I was going to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West on this point of order. If, later on, I think the hon. member may add something to the debate I will recognize him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, you asked me if I had anything further to say, and I said yes.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen over there will not even let us make our points; then you allow another hon. member to intervene. I indicated that I had not finished making my point. If I had been out of order that could have been pointed out, but that was not the case. You have now ruled that I cannot continue and that I cannot appeal that ruling.

The Chairman: I have ruled that the hon. member was discussing something which was extraneous to the point of order. I said I thought he had made his point in what he had to say, first about the order of business and second, about the inconvenience the change was causing to the members of his party. Later I indicated that I wished to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West.

If, after the hon. member for Kootenay West has spoken, the leader of the house has something to say, and if the hon. member for Essex East wishes to reply, then it will be in order for him to speak. After all, the hon. member was discussing things which were not relevant to the point of order. The Chair may allow an hon. member to speak on a point of order but it has discretion to intervene in the discussion, to close the debate or to hear another member. That is the final point I made.

[The Chairman.]

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: I want some information, Mr. Chairman. Which standing order provides that the Speaker or the chairman can silence an hon. member who has not completed his statement on a point of order?

I think I am entitled to an answer on that matter.

The Chairman: The hon. member will realize that I have not recognized him.

Mr. Caron: No. I rise on a question of privilege concerning every member of this house. Which section of the standing orders does the chairman take as a basis to silence an hon. member who is raising a question of privilege?

The Chairman: The point is clear. If the hon. member will let me consult the standing orders, I shall let him know the number of the standing order in a moment.

In the meantime, so that we will not take the time of the house, I recognize the hon. member for Kootenay West.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I intend to be brief, but I wish to support the hon. member for Essex East. He mentioned while speaking on the point of order that the Conservative party whip notified the Liberal whip of this change at five minutes to eleven. I was notified of the change by the whip at 11.25. My first point is that I do not like the assumption made by the whip of the Conservative party that this group is running 30 minutes behind the Liberals.

Members plan their work for the next day, both in the house and in the committees, and it is very important, particularly in view of the circumstances under which we now have to work, that these plans should be on the firmest basis possible. On account of the inconvenience caused by this change at very short notice I wish to protest strongly on behalf of this group with regard to these last minute changes in the arrangements for business on the orders of the day.

I think the committee is entitled to an explanation. Decisions of this kind should only be made in situations of extreme urgency when altogether unexpected developments take place. I hope the leader of the house will give an explanation. We in this group would like the leader of the house to give us far more information than we have received this morning with respect to this change in the order of business.

Mr. Churchill: This is an unfortunate and unexpected change in the business of the house, but once in a while unexpected changes do occur. As to the question of how the notice was passed to members on the other side of the house, that is immaterial. In my instructions I asked the whip if at the earliest moment he would convey to members of the other side of the house the information about the change in the program. I myself was tied up attending to matters which are of great concern to members opposite. They are continually asking questions about legislation which will be brought before us. I was engaged in pressing on with the preparation of certain bills which will come before the house next week. The only possible way to continue my work and still get the message conveyed to those on the other side of the house was to ask the whip to convey that message, which he did.

On other occasions when a change of business has unexpectedly arisen I have endeavoured to inform the house immediately at the opening of the sitting. Unfortunately it was impossible for me to be present here when the Speaker called the house to order. I was hoping I would have an opportunity now to make an explanation before a complaint was lodged, but I was not given that opportunity. I want to make it perfectly clear that the change was made when I received a message from the Minister of National Health and Welfare saying it would be impossible for him to be present today. I then instructed the whip to pass that information to hon. members on the other side.

On the question of notice of business, an indication was read out to us that certain business had been announced for today. That is true. Each week—and this has been going on now for two sessions—I have changed what was the practice in years gone by and tried to keep the house informed a week in advance as to the business which would be before it. I think most hon. members have found this arrangement very convenient.

From time to time I have been asked by members on the other side to change the order of business. By far the most convenient order of business for us this week would have been that which I announced on Friday night, when I said we should carry on with the estimates of the Department of Transport followed by those of the Department of Justice. That would have suited us perfectly. But at the wish of the hon. member for Laurier I was asked to postpone consideration of the estimates of the Department of Transport, which could not be done without great inconvenience to us. However, after some consideration, and after discussing the situation with the hon. member for Laurier, I consented to make that change.

This involved a whole series of changes. Then, having decided to go ahead with the estimates of the Department of Justice instead of the Department of Transport, I was met with a request by the hon. member for Essex East to bring on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare today. I said that would be impossible, that we preferred to call them, perhaps, on Saturday. But, no, the hon. member said he was going to be away Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are the one who altered it. You ought to be ashamed.

Mr. Churchill: I said we might make an arrangement, depending on how we proceeded with the bill which the Minister of Justice was putting before the house yesterday, and I made a further suggestion that we should carry on with that bill today, which we would have preferred to do, interrupting the business at 7.30 tonight in order to begin consideration of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the convenience only of the hon. member for Essex East. But that did not suit him.

I then consulted with my colleagues, and we thought it might be possible to carry on as I announced last night. However, I had to make a further change in the program for the week because of the illness of the Secretary of State, whom I expected would be present. I have no control over these things happening, such as individuals being called away unexpectedly. Often members of the opposition are called away, perhaps unexpectedly, and the house has to adjust to the situation.

As far as preparation is concerned, weekly notice is given, and has been given every week since this session started. The estimates have been before the house since the book of estimates was tabled in January, and it is strange to me that individuals are not prepared to go ahead with the subject indicated. In any event, the estimates of a department do not often reach completion in the course of one day, and there is normally an opportunity for absent members to enter the debate at a later stage. This situation exists quite often. That is the explanation I have to make in respect of what happened today.

Let it be quite clear that I very much regret not having been able to inform hon. members of this change earlier, but I had not received the information in time to do so. Because I was engaged myself in very important business, I asked the whip to be the messenger. That is something which also happens often in this house. The whip is continually discussing these changes in the program with the whips of the parties on the other side, and I suggest it is nonsense to say that is not a proper way of conveying a message. Under normal circumstances I should have telephoned the house leaders of the two other parties myself to convey this message, but it was impossible for me to do so. There is nothing abnormal about this situation, except that it has come as a bit of a surprise to this house. However, I feel the house is equal to the situation.

In so far as dealing with the estimates of the Department of Justice is concerned, this was forecast last week. I presume that members on the other side are prepared for the consideration of these estimates today. In any case they perhaps will not be completed today, so that hon. members who are absent will have the opportunity of dealing with them at a later stage.

If this house would prefer, we can go back to the consideration of the Department of Transport estimates today, which is what we originally wanted in view of the fact that we had spent three and a half days on those estimates to date, and it was felt that perhaps we could wind up the consideration of those estimates today. However, to accommodate hon. members on the other side who had made other arrangements, and because we unexpectedly had to change the program, I think it will be generally agreed that this is all that could have been done under the circumstances.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to what the minister has said in explanation, but in the absence of further information it is difficult to understand this sudden departure of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and why this change could not have been known to the house before the closing hour last night. However, to be informed at five minutes to eleven, whether it be through the whip's office or by the minister himself, that the order of business for today was to be suddenly changed is not in keeping with our practice nor with the way the hon. gentleman, as leader of the house, has personally sought to conduct the business of this session in collaboration with opposition groups. The fact is, however, that opposition groups have made particular preparations, and it is not fair to the proper discussion of the public business to have this sudden change made, in view of the absence of certain hon. members because of arrangements previously made.

The hon. gentleman stated that the arrangement to consider the estimates of the department of health and welfare today was made to accommodate me. I readily acknowledge that the leader of the house did accede to the suggestion of the hon. member for Laurier that, as I could not be here on Friday—there was no suggestion that I would not be here on Saturday, and I will be—and perhaps in view of the fact that I had formerly been in charge of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the estimates of that department could be brought on today. The minister acceded to that request, which I readily acknowledge, and I personally expressed my gratitude to him at the time. But that is not the issue. The fact is, the house was informed that it would be dealing with the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare today and not those of the Department of Justice, and that it would not be considering the estimates of the Department of Justice before Saturday.

Mr. Fulton: Friday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Friday; the Minister of Justice properly corrects me. Mr. Chairman, we have spoken with some heat this morning because this change seriously affects arrangements the opposition parties have made for its scrutiny of the estimates. Under our parliamentary system the house cannot properly scrutinize the estimates unless there is participation in that scrutiny by those who sit in opposition. I suggest that is clear under our system. If the government wishes to railroad these things through—

Mr. Churchill: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —there is nothing we can do to stop it. The Prime Minister looked at me very crossly a few moments ago and I returned that look with one of equal concern, because I place on his shoulders, as Prime Minister and leader of this house, the responsibility for the proper conduct of the business of this house, and we have not had that conduct from this government this session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to enter into a controversy, but I understand that the hon. gentleman, while I was absent—which of course is not unusual for him to do—made an observation, suggestion or insinuation that because the communication was made through the whip I had communicated with the whip. May I say to him, that was unworthy of him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nonsense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was very unworthy of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You do it all the time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman while he was speaking, and I should hope he will accord me the same courtesy, unless he has a question to ask.

Situations necessitating this kind of change have arisen quite frequently in the past. During the time I was in the opposition things sometimes took place which made it impossible to proceed with the announced business of the house. While I realize that there will always be inconveniences involved, the fact remains that hon. members have known for the last week or more that the estimates of the Department of Justice were coming up for consideration. The change yesterday was made to accommodate the hon. gentleman. As circumstances have developed, it is impossible to proceed in that direction today. In the absence of hon. members opposite—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just a moment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister asked me if I had a question.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just one moment. I am surprised to find that the hon. member opposite who was to deal with the estimates of the Department of Justice is among those who are absent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, no; he is here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is here? Oh, well, I thought possibly the hon. member who was going to deal with the estimates of the Department of Justice was not here. That not being so, this whole situation becomes another tempest in a teapot. I thought possibly the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was going to deal with the estimates of the Department of Justice, he being the expert on the law. I am sorry, and beg your pardon; I should have known better than that. In view of the presence of the hon. member of the opposition who will deal with those estimates, and because hon. members opposite have known since last week these estimates were coming up for consideration, there can be no discomfiture. As to the railings and rantings that have taken place, I suggest that sometimes the railings of the hon. member for Essex East are—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They are getting under your skin.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I say this—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They are beginning to worry you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Essex East has tried over and over again to leave the impression that things are being railroaded.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is true.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He got two supporters that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are going to lose four on Monday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member is working himself into a state of synthetic annoyance. However, let me say that these situations arise from time to time, and there is no reason whatever why we should not proceed with the estimates of the Department of Justice, in view of the opposition expert, who can now speak with authority being present.

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us now get on with the business of this house. Changes are made from time to time when circumstances arise making it impossible to follow the announced program. However, the suggestion that these estimates are being pushed through is absolutely false. As a matter of fact, we are taking much more time in respect of the estimates than is ever taken in any other democratic parliament within the commonwealth. The opposition is given all the time it desires in asking helpful questions, but the repetition is continuing. Let that be; that is the function of the opposition. However, the government's function is to get on with the business, and to try to secure the approval of the house in respect to the estimates. If there is any item in the justice estimates in respect to which an hon. member will rise and say that with some expert now absent, for some inexplicable reason the house will be able to deal with it in a manner that will assure the fullest investigation, and without whom it cannot, that item can be postponed in order to accommodate. Let us get on with the business.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the courteous Prime Minister a question? Would he tell the house why he could not have extended to opposition parties the courtesy of advising them before five minutes to eleven that there was going to be this change, when as a result of not doing so all the government was doing was putting a gun at the opposition's head?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know what good it would do to put a gun at the hon. gentleman's head. There would be no damage done in any event.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What a wonderful reply. What a dignified Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must have hit the target. I simply point out that the explanation has been given by the house leader. Let us get on with the business.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the house leader a question, and I might add that his remarks were relevant and he did try to be courteous to the house. What was the reason for the delay in communicating the change in plans for today? After the decision was taken to change from health and welfare to justice, what was the reason for the delay in communicating that decision to the opposition?

Mr. Churchill: I said earlier I did not get the information myself until nearly eleven o'clock. I immediately got in touch with the whip, and as soon as he appeared I asked him to relay the message.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to thank the minister for giving the explanation, an explanation that was not given before.

Mr. Habel: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think it is my duty to be fair to the chief government whip. I imagine that he did what he thought was right. He certainly called me as soon as he got the news, but I could not do otherwise than advise my leader today of what had taken place. I am not blaming the whip for it at all. I think the government is to blame.

The Chairman: For the information of the hon. member for Hull I would refer him to standing order 34, where it is indicated that Mr. Speaker may permit a debate on a point of order. This has always been interpreted to mean that if he may permit debate he may also interrupt or end it. It has been the constant practice in the house for the Speaker to do so when in his opinion he has heard enough to be able to rule.

Second, the point of order raised by the hon. member for Essex East was not, of course, a point of order in itself because standing order 18 (2) provides:

> ...government orders may be called in such sequence as the government may think fit.

I have allowed expressions of regret for half an hour, and I think we should now proceed with the business of the house.

Mr. Pallett: If I may have your indulgence for one minute, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something with respect to the comment of the hon. member for Kootenay West as to the time he was notified. I would advise him that I got in touch with the office of the leader of the new C.C.F. party and he was not there. I then endeavoured to get in touch with the hon. member for Kootenay West and there was no answer on the telephone. The office of their whip also did not answer. I waited until after the welcome to our distinguished visitor, because I thought the hon. member might wish to prepare notes, depending on what had been said before, and he was informed immediately after that. I thought that in courtesy to him he should know the sequence of events.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thanks for the courtesy to me, too.

Mr. Herridge: I accept the information in good spirit. I was in the veterans affairs committee prior to that time.

The Chairman: Shall vote 165 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Chairman, let us discuss it.

Mr. Eudes: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman. It has not been customary to make a statement on the first item of the Department of Justice, but for the information of hon. members I might say that it is my intention to make a statement by way of a progress report on the first item of the penitentiaries branch, and I shall probably have something to say on the first item of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police estimates.

(Translation):

Mr. Eudes: Mr. Chairman, the impression we get from the estimates brought down by the Minister of Justice for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, is that of a marked increase in that department's expenditures over the past few years.

At the moment, we are called upon to vote estimates totalling $33,481,664. During the last fiscal year, the committee approved an expenditure of $28,328,287 for the same services, that is $5,153,377 less than this year. In other words, this year's estimates are slightly more than 18 per cent higher than last year's.

In 1957 when this department's estimates were examined by a special committee, parliament authorized the then minister to spend $18,615,230, namely $14,866,434 less than this year.

That means that the estimates we are asked to approve are 75 per cent higher than those voted by the house in 1957.

We would understand and agree if the increase in this year's estimates over those of 1957 were proportionate to the salary increases granted by the civil service commission, to the increase, since then, in the number of judges of the various federal courts and to the additional expenditures incurred by the implementation of certain recommendations of the Fauteux commission, like the ones concerning the national parole board, to the improvement of a few of the existing penitentiaries and the construction of a few new penitentaries.

But those items—the national parole board, the penitentiaries and the various federal courts, come under a different heading in the estimates now tabled by the minister.

If you consider the item before us, dealing with departmental administration, you find that the minister is asking the committee to vote an amount of $1,194,583, or $250,346 more than last year, an increase of close to 30 per cent.

In 1957, for the same item which was then numbered 166, the then minister asked the house to vote the amount of $513,658, or $680,925 less than what the minister is asking for now. For this item alone, the expenses anticipated by the minister for the current fiscal year are therefore 130 per cent above those incurred in 1957.

The administration of the Parole Act and the penitentiaries service show increases of $79,503 and $4,443,532 respectively, which makes a total of $4,523,035, or 20 per cent more than last year. Those two services will cost the taxpayers, for the current fiscal year, the sum of $24,687,224.

Last year, for those two services, the Department of Justice had been voted a total of $20,164,189.

In 1957, this committee had voted appropriations of $186,585 and $11,514,643 respectively for those two services, a total of $11,701,228, or less than half what we are now asked to vote.

Faced with this impressive and rapid increase in the votes asked by the Minister of Justice, we are forced to recall the criticism the Conservative party used to make when they were in the opposition and their promises to the electorate in 1957 and 1958, that, once elected, they would cut each department's expenses and would follow a policy of strict economy to reduce the taxpayer's burden.

As the elected representatives of the people it is our duty to check the use which is made of the money the people pay daily through taxes and to ask ourselves whether the people get out of this increase in government expenditures, advantages which are equivalent to the sacrifices they have to make, and, finally, whether those funds are used in accordance with the principles of efficiency and thrift we can rightly expect the government to follow.

This obligation brings us to make a closer and more accurate examination of the items included under the heading "Departmental Administration."

Thus, we find that we now have five people, instead of three last year, who hold the ranks of deputy minister, associate deputy minister or assistant deputy minister.

Even though I have no intention of criticizing the salary paid to any one of those people, I notice that the total expenditure under this heading for the current year is $92,500 whereas, in 1957, the salaries of that category of officials cost $65,000. That means an increase under this item, for this year, of $27,500, or approximately 40 per cent.

The number of the department's advisory counsel which totalled 31 in 1957, has gone up to 40 since last year. That item entails an expenditure of $353,360 in salaries whereas, in 1957, this item was $176,220; that is an increase of 100 per cent.

In 1957, the then minister and the solicitor general had on their staff a private secretary and two executive assistants, which cost the public the sum of $19,000.

Today, the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General are assisted in the dispatch of their work by a private secretary, an executive assistant, a special assistant, an associate private secretary, a private secretary to the Solicitor General, an assistant private secretary and an executive assistant to the Solicitor General, which means a staff of seven instead of three in 1957 and a cost of $50,480 a year; this is an increase of $31,480, or 160 per cent, over 1957.

In 1957, the Department of Justice had two administrative officers and one technical officer, and their salaries came to a total of $14,170.

This year, the same department has seven administrative officers and seven technical officers, and the taxpayers have to pay those people in this fiscal year, an amount of $58,180, or an increase in expenditure of over 300 per cent under this item.

I will not take the time of the committee by making a detailed review of every item under this vote. It is enough to say that in 1957 about 109 employees came under this central administration vote, with salaries to an amount of about $460,000. This year, the minister put under this vote 157 civil servants and he now asks for an appropriation of $910,983, or about double the amount provided in 1957.

The increase in personnel that I have just mentioned requires necessarily an increase in personnel in other departmental branches.

The number of clerks, secretaries of those high officials, stenographers, typists, messengers, which was 68 in 1957 reaches 96 this year.

Auxiliary expenditures have also gone up accordingly, for instance, those for professional and special services, travelling expenses, telephone, telegrams, publications, stationery, books, etc.

In 1957, these auxiliary expenditures amounted to $52,000. This year, they total $146,000, or an increase of almost 200 per cent.

In the figures I have just mentioned are included, of course, statutory salary increases authorized by the civil service commission.

Nevertheless, the personnel of this section of the Department of Justice, that is the departmental administration, has increased to such an extent that it can only be justified by a proportionate increase in the duties and the tasks assigned to it by the minister, and that increase in work must, in turn, be assessed according to its necessity and its efficiency.

I should like to read now, if I may, without commenting on them—comments are not required anyway—the three following excerpts, the first from a report on a meeting held in Truro, Nova Scotia, published in the May 2, 1957 issue of the Toronto Telegram.

(Text):

The Conservative leader told an overflow meeting that a Tory government would drastically cut government expenditures and give relief to long-suffering taxpayers.

(Translation):

The second excerpt from the London Free Press, which was published on the occasion of a meeting held on June 7, 1957 at Woodstock, reports the following statement by the present Prime Minister:

(Text):

The Conservative party in the house had insisted that the government itself first of all should reduce the high cost of big government.

(Translation):

And the third item, from the Ottawa Journal, reporting an interview granted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on June 26, 1957, says this:

(Text):

Finance Minister Fleming told the Journal today that he is declaring war on waste and extravagance... Thrift is a virtue of individuals as well as of nations and governments.

(Translation):

I shall let the members of this committee draw their own conclusions.

I now have a few brief remarks to make in regard to those who are generally called the top officials of the Department of Justice, that is, those who enjoy the confidence of the minister and who, because of their experience and ability, are called upon to advise him in his important function. I mean, for instance, the Solicitor General, the deputy minister, the two associate deputy ministers, the two assistant deputy ministers, the executive assistants, the private secretaries, the assistant secretaries, the legal advisers, the administrative and technical officers, as well as the heads of the various branches.

Those high officials help the Minister of Justice solve the many legal issues which are submitted to him by the various other government departments.

The Minister of Justice is, in fact, the legal adviser of his cabinet colleagues and, sometimes of the provincial legislatures on these matters.

The advice of those high officials is therefore sought whenever the government intends, for instance, to amend the Criminal Code, the Bankruptcy Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Patent Act, and in general, in respect of any bill submitted to parliament.

All those bills, are necessarily more or less directly connected with civil law.

However, the province of Quebec has a civil law of its own, which differs substantially from that of the other provinces, and which, needless to say, is a most highly prized part of its heritage.

I am not in any sense suggesting that those officials, in discharging their duties, fail to take cognizance of this peculiarity of the province of Quebec in their advice to the minister. However, this peculiarity logically calls for a reasonable representation, within this group of officials, of people steeped in Quebec civil law.

Last year, there was one deputy minister from the province of Quebec out of three. This year, out of five deputies, only one seems to be from the province of Quebec.

Similarly, out of five members on the national parole board, only one seems to be from the province of Quebec. The same remark applies to practically every division of the department.

It seems to me that in the discharge of such important duties, particularly in view of the complications arising from this peculiarity of Quebec civil law, the task of these officials, and hence that of the minister, would be made easier and more effective if there were a more adequate representation of people thoroughly trained in the civil law of that province.

I have just referred to the national parole board.

I am pleased—I had raised this question in the house on April 22 and June 18, 1959—that the minister has accepted the recommendations then put forward by the associations particularly interested in the rehabilitation of criminals of the female sex, to the effect that a woman be appointed to that parole board.

The female inmates in our penitentiaries, while they do not represent a large proportion of the total number of inmates, nevertheless are increasing in numbers year by year, and surely they need, with respect to both detention and rehabilitation, a treatment different from that which is applied to the male inmates.

Miss M. L. Lynch will, I have no doubt, be of effective assistance to her colleagues on that board in this particular aspect of the important social problem of rehabilitating criminals of the female sex.

Since the end of last war, especially, crime in every shape and form has been on the increase to a frightening degree in all countries and such outbreak often attended by violence has caused persons who generally remain indifferent to social problems which do not concern them personally, to revolt against it.

Public opinion has been alerted. Sociologists, moralists, criminologists, public officers, the people's elected representatives are considering the problem.

In this connection the third biennial Canadian congress of corrections was held in Toronto from May 14 to May 19 last.

That interesting meeting shows the importance being attached today to the problem raised by the criminal in society and it will be of valuable help in finding a solution.

According to the program, on Wednesday, May 17, Mr. George McLean presided over a discussion on information or communications of an administrative nature. The man is introduced in the following terms: Information Representative, Department of Justice, Canada.

But what seems strange to me, is that nowhere in the government telephone book, under any division of the Department of Justice could I find the name of that Mr. George McLean.

If he is not an employee of the Department of Justice, why was he described as "Information Representative, Department of Justice, Canada". I wonder if the department has paid him representation expenses.

After that digression, I should like to come back to the serious and difficult problem facing society and the government, because of the increased number of crimes.

Following extensive and objective studies in several countries, it has been found that there is a tendency to consider criminals in a more humanitarian light.

Criminals are seldom considered nowadays as reprobated and repugnant human beings to whom, on account of their crimes, must be meted out exemplary punishment.

More and more the tendency is to examine criminals in their psychic and psychological behaviour, instead of merely banishing them from society.

So people wonder why, among so many human beings possessing in general the same moral and physical faculties, living in an almost identical environment, subject to the same difficulties, one of them should become guilty of an act for which the court will condemn him to reclusion for years, in a penal institution.

Personally, I think a criminal, even for his first offence, does not deserve absolution without penance. Besides, our judges, in the case of first offences, show much understanding and humanity toward the accused.

Most of the time, sentence is deferred in order to give the judge a chance to consider the accused under the circumstances which have surrounded his criminal act and his conduct up to that time, precisely in order not to punish him harshly but to impose upon him the fair punishment he deserves.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

(Text):

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Eudes: Mr. Chairman, before the house took recess, I was speaking about the upsurge in the incidence of crime and of the growing tendency to look upon the criminal from a more humanitarian angle.

In this respect, however, we must take care that our humane feelings do not lead us to the other extreme, i.e., mawkish sentimentality. Even in the case of his first offence, the criminal must be considered as a malefactor towards his victim, though he himself may only too often be considered as a victim of society, in the widest sense of the word, for instance through lack of family education, or a deficient family education, and, therefore, because of bad examples in his family surroundings, without the necessary correctives; he may be so as a result of lack of understanding on the part of a teacher or employer, with a resulting attitude or rebellion against any authority or persons considered superior; or again he may be a victim because he cannot earn a living by his own work and according to his abilities and needs, which again is a cause of resentment against society as a whole. After he has served his sentence, the criminal tries to reinstate himself into society. It is at this point that society must play its part, accept him into its ranks, and give him employment as soon as possible. Otherwise, if he remains out of work, he will turn again to crime, convinced as he will be that he has to live outside the pale of society.

Unfortunately, it seems that, in spite of the activity of the national parole board no progress worth mentioning is apparent with regard to the rehabilitation of criminals or their reintegration into a normal life within society.

That remark is based on the last report submitted to the minister by the penitentiaries commission.

The report reveals that, on March 31, 1960, the total number of prisoners registered in the penitentiaries was 6,344. Judging by the sentences meted out every day in the courts, I think this number must have increased since.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me to interrupt and say that if he wishes to make some remarks on penitentiaries at this stage. I will not seriously object, but I indicated that I intend to make a statement on penitentiaries when we reach that item, at which time I expect we will have a discussion related primarily, if not exclusively, to penitentiaries, so I wonder if his remarks would not be more appropriate then.

Mr. Eudes: Mr. Chairman, I am not talking on penitentiaries; I am talking on crime in general, but I am using statistics which are important.

[Mr. Eudes.]

(Translation):

Mr. Fulton: I understand.

Mr. Eudes: I therefore have no doubt that following the many sentences meted out each day in our courts of justice, the number of those criminals will have increased since then. From this number we have to deduct the criminals who have avoided arrest.

The same report notes a general and steady increase, since 1956-57, in the number of admissions to penitentiaries. The St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary has set a sad and regrettable record in this respect, with an increase of 435 compared to the previous year.

A fact which makes us think and which motivated my earlier remarks is that out of this total of prisoners, 1,186, i.e., 18.69 per cent are serving a first sentence. We may therefore gather, which is more deplorable still, even if we consider the previous record, that 5,158 of all those prisoners were at that time habitual offenders, in the appalling proportion of 81.30 per cent.

During the year ending March 31, 1960, 3,403 prisoners were sent to the penitentiaries, 1,468, or 43 per cent, of them being habitual offenders.

On page 16, paragraph 47, the same report notes that the influence of the national parole board has been felt to a marked degree, for, by virtue of the parole board act, 1,427 prisoners were discharged, compared to 839 during the previous year. Now, during the same period, 1,468 habitual offenders were sent back to the penitentiary. It might therefore be interesting to know how many of the 1,427 discharged prisoners are today leading a normal life and have not, since their discharge, been brought again before the courts under some criminal charge.

Another revealing fact which may give a better idea of that dark and gloomy picture of crime, is found in paragraph 52, page 17, of the said report where is is said that 776 prisoners among the 3,403 incarcerated during the year ending March 31, 1960, were under 21 years of age, that is 23.28 per cent, which represents an increase of 124 compared to the previous year. Among those 776 inmates under 21, a total of 401 which means 50 per cent, are habitual offenders.

This completely objective examination of the criminality situation in this country, based on official statistics which do not include the number of inmates of prisons under provincial jurisdiction, warrants some serious reflection.

Not one of us, I presume, remains indifferent when, in reading his newspaper every morning, he finds the lengthy account of the crimes committed the day before.

I do not claim to know the causes of this constant rise in criminality, but while I am no specialist in the field, one can accept without fear of error the theory that the criminal is not alone responsible for his crime.

Every day we hear of accused people who, having either pleaded guilty or been found guilty, are asked by the judge "But why have you committed this crime for which I have to sentence you to so many years in prison?" And they reply: "It is because I was led to it".

Indeed, many factors can lead to crime: defective home education, bad examples from parents, bad literature or movies, the failure of society to provide means of earning a living, and on the other hand, the inexplicable ease with which one can obtain weapons, the unconcern of society and even its refusal to assist in the rehabilitation of the criminal.

I am reminded of the case of a federal civil servant who was dismissed after years of loyal and competent service, when it was discovered that some ten years before, he had been found guilty of shattering a store window with intent to steal.

As to movies, despite the constant efforts of the various organizations which, across the country, are concerned with morality and particularly with the problem of criminality, it is astonishing to see the number of pictures using as their theme either crime or gunfights.

In fact, those movies are advertised in the newspapers and on movie house billboards, with pictures always showing as the centre of attraction an actor holding a revolver in his hand. Even if those pictures do not glorify crime, they seem to revel in its detailed exposure and in showing the many uses to which firearms may be put. In many cases, they may be regarded as a kind of finishing course for budding criminals. Their suggestive pictures—we all know the influence of pictures—cannot but leave a damaging imprint on the minds of the young.

In that regard, television networks, whether of the C.B.C. or not, surely deserve no compliment. There is no doubt that close to four pictures out of five which are shown in our homes through television display a hero, good or bad, who packs a pistol.

While each one of those pictures may not be immoral in itself, the repetition of fights, battles and killings can only have a bad influence on young minds.

The same remarks also apply, of course, to comic strips published daily in most newspapers.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Is it the pleasure of the committee that the hon. member be allowed to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Eudes: I wish to thank the members of this committee.

(Translation):

Thus—unconsciously perhaps, for the purpose of making money—a climate is created which gives the impression that crime is easy, less odious, and that the use of firearms is normal and practically necessary in society.

The publicity given each day in the press to crimes which have been committed the day before certainly does not help to improve that dangerous climate either.

I understand that the duty of the press is to inform the public but there is a certain difference, which newspapers disregard too easily, between keeping the public informed and giving detailed descriptions of crimes.

Allow me to give you an example to illustrate the power of bad example.

A few months ago, the newspapers reported that a Montreal bank manager had received a telephone call threatening to kill him and his family if he did not leave a certain amount of money at a set time and place. The scheme worked, but on account of the ensuing publicity, it was tried again several times without the same results.

In this regard, I feel the committee would be interested in learning from the minister what consideration was given to the brief submitted to him by the chiefs of police association of Canada asking that use of the telephone to threaten, insult or annoy other people be considered as a crime punishable by law and subject to severe punishment.

According to experts in that field, one of the main causes for the increasing number of crimes and their increased violence is the ease with which firearms can be obtained.

Without those arms, there would be practically no crime.

Mr. Justice Wilfrid Lazure, president of the court of Queen's bench, in Montreal, and a foremost authority in criminology, said that his 20 years' experience as a judge of a criminal court led him to believe that at least 75 per cent of the crimes are caused by the use of firearms.

On the other hand, Montreal police officers have stated that, in that city alone more than 2,000 shady characters are unlawful owners of firearms and that each of them is a constant threat to the public.

How many other persons are legally in possession of a firearm whose necessity is highly questionable, and how many crimes would have been avoided if their author had not been in possession, even lawfully, of one of those firearms?

I cannot understand how, despite the strictness of the law, despite the minute precautions prescribed by legislators as regards the manufacture, sale, use, exchange, loan and even repair of those arms, all those bandits are able to secure them.

I have been told that many of those small arms have been sold by the crown assets disposal corporation after having been declared surplus by the Minister of National Defence and many of which came especially from the air force.

I wonder whether it would not have been a better plan for the government to store those dangerous weapons instead of putting them into circulation.

Anyway, either the law is not strict enough, and I wonder how it could be made more stringent, or it is not properly enforced.

That question was brought up on June 30, 1959, when the Criminal Code was amended, and again last year, on June 30, 1960, when the estimates of the same department were before us.

According to page 5619 of Hansard for June 30, 1960, the minister stated:

> The problem of firearms generally is a large, important, urgent but very difficult problem, and I have given instructions to my department and to the R.C.M. Police to review this matter, to prepare tables of what amendments might be made to the Criminal Code that would be of assistance in dealing with the sort of situation about which people are concerned in Montreal, and to give me those papers, at which time I will study them and hope to make a reference to the conference of commissioners on uniformity, and have their consideration this fall, and after consideration report back to the house again at the next session.

On Tuesday May 16, 1961, answering a question put by my colleague the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) concerning that matter, the Minister of Justice said:

> I do not think I will be in a position to introduce amendments relating to this matter at this session. There are discussions and studies under way at the moment concerning the whole question of the control of firearms, but I do not expect they will be completed in time to make possible the introduction of amendments at this session.

In view of the urgency and gravity of this problem, the delay is extremely regrettable.

During the studies that are under way in order to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code in relation with firearms, perhaps the minister would consider adding a section which, if it had existed, would have prevented the murder of constable Marcel Lacombe, of the Montreal police force, on May 5, last.

This constable was shot point-blank, at police headquarters. His murderer, on the preceding April 18, had been arrested for illegal possession of the very arm with which he killed constable Lacombe.

This 17-year old murderer had previously appeared before the welfare court, then was referred to welfare agencies, who tried to no avail to help him.

Arraigned in magistrate's court on April 18, he pleaded not guilty and was released pending preliminary inquiry. When he failed to appear at this inquiry, an order to appear was issued against him.

Arrested once again, he came back before the court which found inadequate the evidence in support of the charges of illegal possession of a firearm.

Once released, he insisted on regaining possession of his arm which, in fact, was given back to him the following day. And it is with this very arm that a few days later he killed constable Lacombe.

The Criminal Code could perhaps include a specific provision allowing a judge, at his discretion, even if he releases a man charged with committing a crime or attempting to commit a crime with an offensive weapon, to order final confiscation of the weapon, to annul the accused's permit to carry a firearm and make it impossible for him to renew his permit.

The minister might also consider the possibility of amending the Criminal Code with regard to drugs in general and barbiturates in particular.

I understand that his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) will soon introduce in this house a report on this urgent matter. Indeed, the seriousness of the present crime wave and the number of upheavals in penitentiaries are certainly due to the use of barbiturates.

Under present legislation, legal proceedings for the use of narcotics must be taken under chapter 201 which comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The crimes listed in that chapter are of a restricted and limited nature.

I would therefore ask the minister to consider the possibility of amending the Criminal Code so as to make it an offence to use those barbiturates and narcotics. Such an amendment would enable law enforcement officers, whatever their jurisdiction, to fight more freely this evil which is so dangerous for society.

Finally, before I conclude my remarks, I should like to draw the minister's attention to another important question which was mentioned several times in this house but especially on June 18, 1959, by my colleague from Papineau (Mr. Meunier), during the debate on the same department's estimates.

I am referring to the appearance on the market, during the past few years, of those trading stamps which affect the unwilling consumers who use them more and more every day and which the Criminal Code has been unable to prohibit because it could not foresee their existence.

The well founded representations which the Canadian consumers' association made to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to the Minister of Justice makes you wonder.

Those trading stamps are nothing but a sham. Calculating the number of stamps he needs to get the premium, the article described in the catalogue, the consumer no longer stops to ask himself if he needs the product he is buying; his sole ambition is to collect the required number of stamps. He does not realize that this premium he is coveting, it is he, the consumer, who is paying for it; it is he, furthermore, who is paying for the printing costs of those stamps, publicity and other intermediate operation costs of that gigantic enterprise, all of which add to the price of the article he is buying, most of the time without any necessity, but only to have more stamps.

Such practice is certainly not in keeping with the spirit of the law. It offers unfair competition to the small retailer and is an important inflationary factor in our economy.

In January 1960, to the representations made by the Canadian consumers' association, the government replied that it was awaiting a decision on a specific case before taking any position on the matter.

That test case was decided by the supreme court in both suits against Loblaw Groceterias Co. Ltd., and David Thompson (Niagara I.G.A. Grocery) by the attorney general of Manitoba. The supreme court rendered a decision indicating that under the present wording of the Criminal Code the use of those premium stamps was permitted.

Therefore the time has come for the department to indicate the position it intends to take in this connection.

Finally, it would be most interesting to know the reaction of the minister at the results of the poll recently conducted by the newspaper La Presse about a provincial or national lottery.

We know that the poll has shown that in the province of Quebec, at least, a large majority of the population was in favour of such a lottery.

The minister might tell the committee whether it is the government's intention to bring forward an amendment to the Criminal Code to legalize such a lottery if not throughout the country, at least in provinces that would favour lotteries.

To conclude my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I will respectfully ask you to assure the minister that all my comments were inspired by a complete and honest desire to co-operate.

(Translation):

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I should first like to thank the hon. member for Skeena, who expected to speak at this time but who allowed me to go on instead, because of another engagement I have.

Before entering into the discussion in respect of the estimates of the Department of Justice, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Hochelaga. I listened to his remarks with great care and can only conclude that he has made a great study of this subject, and is a man with considerable knowledge of jurisprudence.

In speaking on the estimates themselves, my first words are of praise for the Department of Justice and in particular the Minister of Justice. It is in no spirit of affectation that I say, and I think hon. members will agree, that the minister is young in years, an earnest student of jurisprudence, and a reformer. Since he has taken over the Department of Justice we have been able to consider such things as the reform of the practice of parole of prisoners—a subject which has been dealt with by the hon. member for Hochelaga—as well as reform in respect of the pensions of widows of judges, which certainly needed reviewing. We have also been able to think in terms of legislation in respect of judges themselves, in making certain that we have a strong judiciary at all times in every province of this great country.

I also have in mind, as I am sure all hon. members have, the question of the reforming of prisoners. When lawyers have occasion to speak about this matter they think of young men from good families who through no fault of their own sometimes get into serious difficulties and are incarcerated in one of the institutions in this country. There has been a lot of reform in that regard. I also think it took a real statesman like the minister to come to grips with the subject of capital punishment. I do not want to deal with that because it is before the house in another measure. I simply wish to say that the minister has come to grips with the subject, and we have now progressed along the road in that if the bill is passed, capital punishment will be abolished with respect to certain kinds of murder.

I should like to deal with some of the matters I mentioned in my introductory remarks, and one of them is the parole board itself. I think all of us appreciate that this country is only as strong as its families. When one of our sons or daughters runs afoul of the law and is incarcerated in an institution, we want to have that son or daughter rehabilitated so they may take their place in society with other Canadians. I wish to congratulate the minister most warmly in this regard, because the emphasis has been placed on the rehabilitation of such prisoners wherever they may be incarcerated. We have set up a new parole board which reviews cases from the psychological and sociological points of view. The board takes into consideration the crime of which the person was convicted and all other circumstances; and if we can put one person back into society, if we can save one Canadian every day, we are doing a job in this particular field. I would say that the national parole board and its officials are doing an excellent job in that regard.

I should also like to mention the changed attitude with regard to penitentiaries. The old bars and cement are disappearing to some extent. We now have three types of institutions, minimum, medium and maximum security. When a person has been convicted of a first offence surely that person, as has been said many times before in the house by able jurists, should not be forced to mix with hardened criminals who need to be under maximum security. Therefore we have established a different kind of penitentiary that does not have maximum security. We have established prison farms for people of this type, and rehabilitation starts immediately they come to such an institution. At these prison farms we have now established a person takes his place with others knowing full well that he will be assisted in rehabilitating himself to take his place in society.

Then we have medium security institutions for people who may have committed the same offence again, or are put there because other circumstances enter into the picture. Last, we have maximum security institutions for those persons who do not respond no matter what the penitentiary officials do or what judges may say. These people have come before the bar of justice many times for offences and, of course, a criminal of this type must be kept away from society until there is some sign that he is prepared to be rehabilitated. I think this reform was necessary and overdue, and I wish to congratulate the young and aggressive minister for bringing it about.

I should like to say a few words about the judges themselves. After all, I think the administration of justice really is the window dressing and the colour of democracy. Just recently I picked up an old book that belonged to my mother. The book is 100 years old, and I should like to quote a statement which represents the view of those who believe in the rule of law:

> Law does not put the least restraint
> Upon our freedom, but maintains it;
> Or, if it does, 'tis for our good,
> To give us freer latitude;
> For wholesome laws preserve us free,
> By stinting of our liberty.

In other words, we have to give up a little of our freedom for the good of society, but out of it all we get a greater degree of freedom. As a lawyer I believe that over the years we have always had a good and independent judiciary. Not only under the present government but under the former one good appointments were made to the bench. Only two weeks ago I was before a judge who was appointed by the former administration. He is a man who was born in Alberta and whose parents came from central Europe. He was able to hand out the kind of justice that every Canadian feels should be dispensed. This is the calibre of man that we need on the bench. I think the government has seen to it that our judges have continued to be of a high calibre so that at all times in our democracy we have a judiciary of high standard which exercises great care in the application of the laws of our country.

With respect to those men who have dedicated themselves to serve as judges, I would point out that too often people say that this judge or that judge is making so many thousands of dollars a year. There is a tremendous responsibility in accepting a judgeship in this country. Many of our top lawyers who could earn three or four times the salary of a judge by practising law make a financial sacrifice in order to assume this responsibility in our society, to see that our way of life remains free, and because they believe that the right calibre of man should sit on the bench to administer justice. When we have men of this type coming forward and making sacrifices to serve their country, I think it is up to us to make certain that their families are protected. A judge is expected to maintain a certain standard of living, and their salaries over the years have been far from commensurate with the work they do. I know of several widows of judges who have been left without the necessary security and whose pension is very low, sometimes $3,000 or less. I am glad to see that the situation is being reviewed, because if we expect these men to make the kind of sacrifices they do make in many cases when they go on the bench, the people of this country should be prepared to make certain that their families are protected and compensated for the sacrifice the head of the household has made.

With reference to judges' pensions, while it may not be true today it certainly was true in the past that men went on the bench at an early age to serve their country and were not able to save very much money before doing so. When the time of retirement came they found themselves having to reduce their standard of living considerably. I am glad to see that this matter is also being reviewed.

I want to deal now with something that concerns my own constituency. I would ask the minister to bear with me, because I have another engagement and I may not be here when the particular item is being dealt with. I feel the matter is very important to the constituency of Bow River and particularly to the Drumheller area. Hon. members have heard me mention this matter on other occasions, and I want to be fair in dealing with the circumstances. I am talking about the soft coal mines in the Drumheller area, and I will relate this matter to the estimates before us at the present time. There are two industries there. On the one hand there is a rich farming area and, on the other hand, there is a very depressed coal mining industry. Because of the competition of natural gas and petroleum with coal, miners have been thrown out of work and as a result there is a degree of unemployment in the area similar to that in Springhill.

I come now to the point. I am asking the minister and his officials to give serious consideration to the establishment of a penitentiary in the Drumheller area when a penitentiary is constructed in western Canada. I have various reasons for this request which I will deal with now. I have mentioned that it is an excellent farming area, and I have referred to the unemployment situation. Unemployment there is not something new. It occurred between the first and second wars and has happened again since the second war because of the competition of other fuels with coal. The kind of coal mined in that area is domestic fuel; therefore the industry was hard hit by the petroleum industry immediately it entered the competitive picture. These men who have put everything they have earned over the years into their little homes or their little institutions are forced to leave that area when the mines close. Many of them are men who have reached a time of life when they are not able to take up another kind of employment.

I say, therefore, this is a disaster area because of the relief situation. If something could be done, such as the erection of a federal institution, these men would be helped. Alberta is the only province in this country which does not have a penitentiary. The prisoners from that area go to the city of Prince Albert and are incarcerated in a Saskatchewan penitentiary.

Let us look at the attributes of the area itself. It is a large farming area. As I have said, there is a great deal of unemployment. Only this year another coal mine was closed, thus eliminating a payroll of $400,000 from that area. There is a good water supply, because the Red Deer river runs through the city. There are good access roads, because that area has been represented by a member of the legislature who has been minister of highways for a number of years. The area, therefore, has excellent hard top roads. The city of Drumheller is on the main Canadian National line from Calgary to Saskatoon. If you take a look at the map you will find that Drumheller is located pretty well in the centre of the province.

Last, but not least, I believe that the area desires such an institution. In many cases people do not want a maximum security penitentiary located in their area. Certainly the records show that the people of this area do want it. The united mine workers of America have petitioned the department for such an institution. The chamber of commerce of Alberta has asked for it. Organizations of coal workers have asked for it. In fact the people of the whole area have petitioned for it, because they have the same feeling that I am endeavouring to express in words today in respect of these people who find themselves in a very unhappy plight.

May I just review the evidence, on the strength of which I am requesting that this institution be located in this area. It is a good farming area in which to establish the farm type of institution which I discussed earlier in my remarks. There has been a great deal of unemployment there for almost 20 years. There is an adequate water supply, and we have the main line of the Canadian National and good roads in that area. I would ask in the strongest possible terms that consideration be given to the building of a penitentiary in that area.

I want to refer to two or three other matters before I conclude my remarks. I promised to be brief because the hon. member for Skeena was kind enough to allow me to speak in his place, since I have to leave. At the beginning of my remarks I mentioned the importance of the administration of justice in the province of Alberta. This is the one province in which the right to a jury trial in the supreme court can be waived because of the old Northwest Territories Act which is still part of the law of the province of Alberta. I have been one of those men at the bar who think that the guilt or innocence of an accused person should be determined by a jury of his own peers. There is danger in the belief that when you can waive a jury trial you can speed up the administration of justice. There is danger, too, that the jury system will eventually disappear from the province of Alberta. I may say that, except for capital offences, it is very rare now to have a jury impaneled.

This leads to three difficulties. One is that the judiciary itself loses the knack or the experience of addressing a jury and charging so far as the law is concerned in reference to criminal cases. Second, there is a feeling that they would rather not have the jury there. Defence counsel, who is an officer of the court, gets away from the idea of the jury system. I suggest that this is a matter which could be worked out by the federal and provincial governments, and which should be looked at with great caution before the jury system is eliminated from the province. There have been some cases in which defence counsel have asked that the jury be eliminated in so far as capital offences are concerned. I do not say it would happen today, but there is a danger that judges may say we do not want juries, and then if defence counsel insist on juries and the accused is convicted, the sentence might be a little more severe. These are dangers that exist in an environment in which there is no jury. I suggest, as I speak for the province in that regard, that we should exercise great care when we are thinking about doing away with the jury.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

I believe that ours is the only province in Canada in which the attorney general is not a lawyer and, therefore, has not had experience before the bar in so far as the jury system itself is concerned.

Mr. Hellyer: That could be a big advantage.

Mr. Woolliams: One member says that could be a big advantage. This has not been so in the past in those provinces which have had Liberal governments. I do not believe this has proven to be an advantage. In fact I have pointed out what one of our leading lawyers, the Minister of Justice, has done in so far as the reform of the law and administration of justice are concerned.

Once again may I say that I appreciate the hon. member for Skeena allowing me to speak at this time. I know he had planned to address the committee, but I had another engagement and I want to thank him very much for his kindness.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, may I first say that it was, of course, a pleasure to be able to assist the hon. member for Bow River or any other hon. member who finds himself in similar circumstances. It is not something for which an hon. member should offer extreme thanks, because I feel it is something each member of the house would like to do for another hon. member who finds himself in a similar position.

The Department of Justice, Mr. Chairman, is one which covers a wide variety of subject matters, many of which are not connected, that perhaps at this stage one might follow the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice and by others participating in the debate and leave specific suggestions and remarks about specific branches of the department until such time as we are dealing with the items for those particular divisions. For example, we have some argument to make in connection with the penitentiary branch and the parole structure which would be better left until the committee deals with those items. Certainly in so far as the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and two or three other subjects are concerned, I think they would be better dealt with when those specific items are before the committee rather than—what was the word used today?—bifurcating our remarks about this department.

Initially I should like to deal with the functions of the Minister of Justice and to say I believe he has not properly carried out his duties. I refer to the functions of the minister pursuant to section 3 of the bill of rights. At the outset, Mr. Chairman, may I say—this is the result of hindsight—that I feel it was a great error for parliament to enact that particular section in the bill of rights. What we did was to put into a statute a responsibility of the minister in so far as the internal functions of parliament were concerned. We were then drawing into our activities the Senate, the crown and presumably the courts.

This has been dealt with in a couple of instances in the United Kingdom, when members introduced bills dealing with the internal functions of parliament itself. It was held on a couple of occasions by Speakers in the United Kingdom parliament that it was not competent for parliament to entertain bills which contained provisions relating to the internal functions of the house itself. This is what we have done by the enactment of section 3 of the bill of rights giving the Minister of Justice a certain responsibility to examine the bills presented to parliament.

I think perhaps an error was made in doing it in this particular way. Nevertheless, it is the law. That is the responsibility of the minister under section 3. Perhaps I could make reference to it and read it. Section 3 of the bill of rights states as follows:

3. The Minister of Justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the governor in council, examine every proposed regulation submitted in draft form to the clerk of the privy council pursuant to the Regulations Act and every bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this part and he shall report any such inconsistency to the House of Commons at the first convenient opportunity.

I think the situation is made quite clear there. The section states:

The Minister of Justice shall . . . examine . . . every bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons—

It also states that he shall do this in pursuance of or in accordance with such regulations as may be provided. I have the regulations here, and I shall make brief reference to them. This is from P.C. 1960-1792, December 31, 1960, regulations respecting the examination of bills and proposed regulations pursuant to section 3 of the Canadian Bill of Rights. Again it is stated here:

3. In the case of every bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons the minister shall forthwith upon receipt of two copies of the bill from the Clerk of the House of Commons,
(a) examined—

And so on. It also states that he shall make a report. The words used here are similar to those found in the statute itself. I submit that the minister has failed to carry out his statutory obligation in this regard with respect to one bill before the house at the present time. I refer specifically to Bill No. C-76, which is set down for second reading, having been introduced or presented, as the bill of rights states, and standing in the name of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. This bill was given first reading or introduced in the house on March 22, 1961, a little more than two months ago.

It should be remembered that the bill of rights and the regulations say that the minister shall examine every bill introduced in or presented to the house. We made some inquiries earlier, as you may recall, Mr. Chairman, about what had happened with respect to this particular Bill No. C-76 in so far as examination of it was concerned, and with respect to Bill No. C-86 which has already been passed by this house. As found at page 4213 of Hansard of May 2, 1961, I asked the Minister of Justice whether he had so examined Bill No. C-86. On that day he stated as follows, and I am quoting from Hansard:

I can assure the hon. member that the Minister of Justice always exercises his responsibility under section 3 of the bill of rights and the answer, as I am sure he has anticipated, is that this has been done in the case referred to and no inconsistency has been found.

That was in connection with Bill No. C-86, to which I referred. I then asked him in a supplementary question whether he had examined Bill No. C-76, which had been introduced, as I said, on March 22. The minister said this:

The Minister of Justice has looked at the proceedings of the house and the purported Bill No. C-76, and had discussions on that matter with the Chair. It is my view that this is not a bill which is properly before the house at all in that it purports to be a bill to amend a statute while actually it does nothing more than re-enact the same statute. In my view it is nothing more than an abuse of the procedure of this house, but I do not care to go further than that at this time.

The minister may have some opinions and they may be valid opinions in his mind. I think they are not, but they may be valid. But merely because the Minister of Justice has these opinions about a bill which has been introduced in or presented to the House of Commons, this does not allow him to get around section 3 of the bill of rights. He cannot in that way get out from under his duty and obligation to examine that particular bill. It is one which has been introduced in or presented to the House of Commons. What the minister's feelings are about this being in order is another matter entirely.

The minister was asked further about this particular subject matter, and as reported at page 4213 of Hansard he stated:

I have not concluded my consideration as to the propriety of Bill No. C-76.

I would point out that the Minister of Justice has examined Bill No. C-76, standing in the name of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. He has examined that bill from the point of view of its consistency or inconsistency with the bill of rights, and I submit that the Minister of Justice has found that certain parts of Bill No. C-76 are inconsistent with the bill of rights. By his own admission he has done this in another way; yet he refuses to report this inconsistency to parliament.

I therefore submit he has been derelict in the duty ascribed to him by this parliament under section 3 of the bill of rights. As found at page 4229 of Hansard of May 2, 1961, when the Minister of Justice was then discussing Bill No. C-86, which was the bill in the name of the Minister of Fisheries to amend the Fisheries Act, this is what the minister said:

> I can assure the house that my colleague the Minister of Fisheries is, as are all members of the present government, most careful to review the legislation and the activities of the officers for which he is responsible to ensure that the legislation does not place him or his officers in a position where things are likely to be done contrary to the bill of rights.

On that occasion the minister said that Bill No. C-86 was designed to overcome the inconsistencies of the old Fisheries Act with the bill of rights. Then he pointed out further as follows, and I quote again from page 4229 of Hansard:

> —we have here before us today a very concrete example of the effectiveness of the bill of rights. When you see the extent to which the Fisheries Act, a statute which has been on the books for many years, has offended the provisions of the present bill of rights, you will understand the important step forward made in introducing this piece of legislation entirely in conformity with that bill of rights.

As found on page 4230 he said further:

> This government has had this under consideration since last fall, shortly after the bill of rights became effective in order to bring in legislation which will remove the objectionable features so that the officers of the Department of Fisheries, from the minister down, will be administering a piece of legislation which is in conformity with the bill of rights.

Here on three separate occasions or in three separate comments during the same day the Minister of Justice said that the old Fisheries Act to some extent was inconsistent with the bill of rights, and that Bill No. C-86 introduced by the Minister of Fisheries cleared up those inconsistencies.

We know what is contained in Bill No. C-76, in the name of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. That is a bill to re-enact the old Fisheries Act, with an additional clause that it should be studied to find out whether it is inconsistent with the bill of rights. I submit that the minister, by his own admission, has studied Bill No. C-76. By his own admission in another way he has told us that it contains a provision which is inconsistent with the bill of rights. Yet he adamantly refuses to carry out the responsibility placed upon him by parliament and to report those inconsistencies to parliament, all because of some political embarrassment, perhaps. Regardless of the embarrassment that might be felt, I submit that the minister has no right to hide his embarrassment behind the argument that he feels Bill No. C-76 is not a bill properly before parliament, and he has been delinquent in his duties in this regard.

The bill of rights says the minister must examine and report at the first convenient opportunity. Surely the first convenient opportunity has passed in as much as it is now two months since Bill No. C-76 was introduced. Surely the first convenient opportunity has passed when the minister, by his own admission, says he has already examined the Fisheries Act and the bill introduced by the minister and found that certain inconsistencies in the old act were cleared up.

I do not want to suggest that the minister should take himself to court and sue himself under the section of the Criminal Code which deals with this question. There is a section of the Criminal Code which applies, section 107, and the minister is not above this particular section. This section says it is an offence against the Criminal Code to refuse to carry out responsibilities that a person is duty bound to carry out.

I think in this instance, Mr. Chairman, there is a prime example of a minister of the crown failing for one reason or another, or deliberately refusing to comply with a statute passed by this parliament, namely the bill of rights, to examine certain legislation and report to parliament upon it.

While we are on the subject of the examination of bills which are presented to the House of Commons may I again make reference to a question which I asked the minister concerning his activities in the field of divorce bills. On March 7, 1961, the minister was extremely busy because he examined 108 divorce bills which had been presented to this house, and he found none of them inconsistent with the bill of rights.

Let us take a look at one of the divorce bills which the minister examined and said is not inconsistent with the bill of rights. Let us take Bill No. SD-36 as an example. This is one of the bills the minister examined on March 7. Let us just see what he examined. This is the bill:

> An act for the relief of Hela Hinda Fachler.

The preamble says:

> Whereas Hela Hinda Fachler, residing at the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, wife of Szmuel (Samuel) Fachler, who is domiciled in Canada and residing at the said city, has by her petition alleged that they were married on the twenty third day of October, A.D. 1945, at the city of Lodz, Poland, she then being Hela Hinda Chaim; and whereas by her petition she has prayed that,—

This is what the minister has examined:

—on the ground of his adultery since then, their marriage be dissolved; and whereas the said marriage and adultery have been proved by evidence adduced and it is expedient that the prayer of her petition be granted: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. The said marriage is hereby dissolved, and shall be henceforth null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

The minister says this bill is not inconsistent with the bill of rights. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is as inconsistent with the bill of rights as anything could be. I should like to quote again from the bill of rights. Section 2 (e) provides that no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to:

—deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations;

I submit that Bill No. SD-36 has deprived a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations.

Let us take a closer look at what occurred with regard to this particular bill. I have here a sworn affidavit and I should like to read it. It was sworn in the province of Quebec, district of Montreal, on the fourth day of May, 1960, before Mr. Morton Morris, commissioner of the superior court for the district of Montreal. It reads as follows:

I, Charles Charron, investigator, residing at No. 252 Georges Etienne Cartier Square, in the city and district of Montreal, and therein domiciled, do solemnly declare:

1. That on the twenty sixth day of April, 1960, between the hours of five and six p.m., I did serve the corespondent Rose Franklin with a true copy of the notice hereto attached and marked "A", by giving the said copy and leaving the same with the said Rose Franklin in person, at her domicile, at No. 3145 Clarke street, in the city of Montreal, province of Quebec.

2. That at the same time and place and in the same manner, I also served the said Rose Franklin with a true copy of the petition, hereto attached and marked "B", and a sworn declaration of the petitioner attached to the copy of the petition and also marked "B", appended to which copy there was a true copy of the information to the corespondent Rose Franklin which hereto is also attached and marked "C".

3. That I believe that the said Rose Franklin to be the person described in the said information to the corespondent.

4. That when serving the above upon the said Rose Franklin she admitted to me that she was the person described in the said information to be to the corespondent.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

That is signed by Charles Charron. You will note that the relevant parts of this, Mr. Chairman, are that Mr. Charron swears that he served someone by the name of Rose Franklin who is named as the corespondent in this particular case, at a particular address, 3145 Clarke street and she admitted she was Rose Franklin, the person described therein.

The only point in all this is that there is no No. 3145 Clarke street; it does not exist. If the address does not exist, how can Mr. Charles Charron swear that he served someone with a series of documents at that particular address? I submit that not only does the address 3145 Clarke street not exist, but neither does the corespondent.

Letters were mailed to Rose Franklin at 3145 Clarke street. A letter was attempted to be delivered by the postal service and I will quote from a letter received from the postal authorities in this regard:

The address of 3145 Clarke is inexistent and a directory service did not establish the present address of this Rose Franklin. The item is included.

This was after the letter was mailed to Rose Franklin at that address, after it had been returned by the Post Office Department indicating on the letter that the address did not exist, after it had then been sent back to the postal department with the request to check again and make sure that the information I just read out was correct, that the address of 3145 Clarke street was inexistent.

If the Minister of Justice says he looked at Bill No. SD-36 and at the part that says, "and whereas the said marriage and adultery have been proved by evidence adduced." without going into the evidence adduced, and came to the conclusion that this was not inconsistent with the bill of rights, what about the right of the individual, of the respondent in this case? This same gentleman, Mr. Charron, who swore that he delivered something to a woman at an address which does not exist also swears—and we are entitled to cast some doubt upon this—that he served the respondent at his particular address, and the address is given here.

I submit that Bill No. SD-36 is inconsistent with the bill of rights because it deprives a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Is it not the right of an individual who was named as a corespondent to have the opportunity of a fair hearing? And how can there be a fair hearing when there is no address at which the investigator can call or leave his papers? Our old friend Mr. Charron, whose evidence has given rise to several difficulties in the past, swore, nevertheless, that this address existed in the case to which I am referring. We are changing the status of the respondent in this case from that of a married person to that of a single person, without, I submit, giving him the right of a fair hearing.

This is something serious and casts a bad light upon the administration of justice in this country especially when we consider that this incident occurred within the very building which we occupy at the moment, when we consider that Mr. Charron and people like him can come before the Senate and swear affidavits to the effect that a particular address exists, when subsequently it is discovered that the address does not exist.

Let me take another case. I understand I have only a few minutes of my time left. Perhaps I should go into it on a subsequent occasion and draw to the attention of the minister another case where an individual swore on oath by affidavit that he had served a particular person with a notice at a particular address when that address does not exist, or at least, has not since 1952. We made a check on this through the legal department of the city of Montreal and we have correspondence from the city of Montreal with respect to a number of addresses which do not exist and which have never existed since 1952 according to the search which the city of Montreal made into its records. Yet in each of those instances somebody, a bailiff or an investigator, swore a statutory declaration on oath that he had served a person with copies of certain documents at the address which does not exist.

Surely this is an abuse of the efforts and of the credulity of parliament. In addition, it demonstrates how carelessly these divorce cases are dealt with and how much responsibility must fall on the shoulders of the Minister of Justice, as laid down in the bill of rights, to examine every bill to see that the rights of individuals are fully protected. Contingent upon that I say responsibility falls upon the minister to examine the evidence given before the Senate in every instance in order to ensure that this sort of hanky panky does not continue on the part of individuals such as Mr. Charron upon whose evidence grave doubts were cast, I submit, on three occasions last year.

Here again we find a certain person swearing he did a certain thing, and yet the particular address at which he was supposed to have done it does not exist. I have only mentioned this one case at this time but, as I have indicated, there are more of them, and in my opinion they should be placed on record so that they can come to the attention of those who are petitioning for these divorces, come to the attention of the persons whose names are blackened because they have been placed in categories to which they do not necessarily belong, come to the attention of the Minister of Justice directly, so that he may have immediate knowledge of them, and, finally, come to the attention of members of the other place so that those who study these proceedings there may not be so careless in the future when they deal with these petitions. I think they should be placed on record, too, in order that the bill of rights may be carried to its full conclusion and innocent people protected to the greatest possible extent.

Mr. Fulton: I rise at this time not because I think that what the hon. member has said is very serious—indeed, I think he himself realizes that he had his tongue in his cheek most of the time when he was saying it—but because in the course of his observations the hon. member drew a number of conclusions which, I think should not be allowed to stand isolated on the pages of Hansard. I think the true facts should be put on record so that they will appear as closely as possible to the inaccurate conclusions which were drawn by the hon. member who has just spoken.

To deal generally with the question of divorce bills, the hon. member seems to have concluded that the bill of rights requires the Minister of Justice to become a private detective rather than Minister of Justice. That was never the intention of the bill and it certainly is not the intention of the minister. If the hon. member had stopped to reflect, or if he would stop to reflect, he would himself be forced to the conclusion that there is nothing in any of these divorce bills which in itself is contrary to the bill of rights. There is nothing in any of these bills which deprives any of the persons concerned of the right to a fair hearing.

The hon. member is seeking to make an oblique and indirect attack upon the Senate divorce committee. I think it would have been open to me to have raised a point of order, but I refrained because I did not think it would have advanced the interests of this house to do so. All the hon. member has been doing is suggesting that the Senate divorce committee has not properly investigated the evidence which came before it. The hon. member read into the record of this committee an affidavit which, he said, was full of false allegations. He went on further to suggest that the Minister of Justice had somehow been negligent in not reporting that the bill to which that affidavit related was inconsistent with the bill of rights. My obligation is to examine the bill. The affidavit is not part of the bill. Therefore, the fact that I reported the bill as not being inconsistent with the provisions of the bill of rights is in no way influenced by the fact that there may be one, two, or six or a dozen affidavits presented to the Senate committee on divorce when it is considering a bill which comes before it.

The hon. gentleman has interested himself in these divorce proceedings. He has constituted himself a private detective—quite properly, if that is what he feels his role should be. But he has every right to bring before the private bills committee of this house any evidence he has that the affidavits presented in the other place are not in accordance with the facts. My obligation is to examine the bill and to report whether or not it is consistent with the provisions of the bill of rights, and not one of these multitudinous divorce bills—bills which, incidentally, are each checked in the department; it is not a routine check; every one of them is considered—is in conflict with the relevant provision of the bill of rights. The hon. member's approach has simply been to try to draw the Minister of Justice and the Department of Justice into his private vendetta with the Senate divorce committee. Into that vendetta we refuse to be drawn.

More important, although even less accurate, is the hon. member's allegation that I have been negligent in my duty under the bill of rights with regard to Bill No. C-76, which is the bill introduced by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo purportedly to amend the Fisheries Act. First I should remind Your Honour that the hon. member for Skeena said the Minister of Justice, if I recall his words correctly, had been in direct and deliberate violation of his duties under the bill of rights. The bill of rights imposes upon the minister the obligation to examine every bill introduced or presented to the House of Commons in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions therein are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of that part of the bill of rights, and requires that the minister shall report any such inconsistencies to the House of Commons at the first convenient opportunity.

The hon. member has read certain questions and answers that were exchanged between himself and myself subsequent to the time when the bill was introduced. Those questions and answers make it perfectly clear, in my opinion, that Bill No. C-76 is not properly before the house.

I submit to you, sir, that it is my duty only to report in respect of bills that are properly before the house. It was not the intention of the bill of rights to enable an hon. member to obtain a legal opinion from the Minister of Justice in respect of an existing statute by a device which misleads the house.

Mr. Howard: Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: The fact of the matter is that the question of whether Bill No. C-76 is properly before the house is still under discussion by the house leader and his honour, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Peters: We passed it.

Mr. Fulton: That matter has, therefore, not been determined.

The hon. member for Skeena has suggested that the Minister of Justice must report any inconsistencies to the house at the first convenient opportunity. I should, therefore, suggest there are two questions invilved. First, is the bill properly before the house and, second, when is the first convenient opportunity of reporting inconsistencies?

May I remind the committee that when the bill was introduced, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo said, as reported at page 3217 of Hansard for March 22, 1961 as follows:

> —the purpose of this bill is to revise the Fisheries Act to bring it into conformity with the Canadian bill of rights and in accordance with the report to be tabled by the Minister of Justice under standing order 40, as required by the Canadian bill of rights regulations.
> More specifically, the purpose is to determine whether the clauses which empower a fisheries officer (1) to accuse a person of violating fisheries laws, (2) to adjudicate on that person's guilt or innocence, (3) to confiscate without a hearing the property of persons, boats, fishing gear and fish, and which deny an appeal to the courts or to the Minister of Fisheries for restitution of the confiscated property if the confiscation is not coupled with a criminal charge, are consistent with the Canadian bill of rights.

When one looks at Bill No. C-76 and reads the motion of the hon. member, one will realize that it was represented to the house, when introduced, as a bill to revise the Fisheries Act, to bring it into conformity with the bill of rights, and it was on that basis that leave to introduce the bill was given. It was also on that basis that the bill was read the first time and distributed. When we examine the bill we find it is not a bill to revise the Fisheries Act to bring it into conformity with the bill of rights, but is a bill to re-enact the Fisheries Act.

As I have explained, this is, in my view, an abuse of the legislative processes of parliament and in my submission, which I made to his honour, Mr. Speaker, the bill is not properly before the house; first, because leave to introduce it was obtained by a subterfuge, and second, because it is—I have no doubt about this point—a bill which simply re-enacts the provisions of an existing statute, and is, in no jot or tittle, different from the existing statute already on the books with the exception that, at the end of the bill, there is a clause saying that the existing statute is repealed. It is, therefore, not a bill at all, nor a legislative process. It accomplishes nothing. How can one solemnly ask the House of Commons to entertain the proposition that it should go through all the legislative processes of first reading, second reading, committee stage and third reading, simply to re-enact something which exists already? That is an absurdity, a monstrosity, and an abuse of the processes of parliament. My view is that, as Minister of Justice, I should not lend myself to such a process. That is my answer in respect of the first question, as to whether indeed this bill is properly before parliament.

The second question is, when is the first convenient opportunity at which the minister should report to parliament in respect of any inconsistency? As I have said, I have taken up the question with his honour, Mr. Speaker, as to whether this bill is properly before parliament and, at the moment, it appears to be his honour's view that the time to raise the question is when, and if, the bill should be called for second reading. Should the hon. member attempt to proceed with this solemn farce, then most certainly a point of order should be raised as to whether this bill is properly before parliament, and at that time I should properly present my views. If it were ruled that it was properly before parliament, then, of course, it would be incumbent upon me to express my view as Minister of Justice, and I should do so without hesitation.

In the interim I suggest that the proper position is that the Minister of Justice should not be asked to do that which the bill of rights never intended him to do—express legal opinions in respect of existing statutes, on the basis of a bill introduced, by a subterfuge and misinformation, to the house. The Minister of Justice, in my opinion, would be expressing an opinion as to whether a bill is inconsistent with the bill of rights when, in my view, it is not properly before the house.

Therefore, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing to the point raised by the hon. member for Skeena, and that in the interim the government acted, as it had intended all along, following a study of the Fisheries Act, by taking the appropriate, open and honest course in introducing its bill to revise the Fisheries Act, in order to remove those portions of that act which, upon review, were found to be inconsistent with the bill of rights. That has been done, and my opinion of the bill, presented by the Minister of Fisheries, was given in the course of the discussion in respect of that bill. I submit now that I have complied, as Minister of Justice, not only to the letter, but to the spirit of the bill of rights and, in so doing, have avoided compounding an abuse of the parliamentary processes.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss a matter in connection with the administration of justice in respect of an impropriety which probably exists to a very limited degree.

I hold all judges, appointed by this parliament, in very high regard, and believe their decisions are as impartial as they can be, and the judges are beyond the realm of politics. I also hold in high regard those individuals appointed by our provincial governments to administer the law in our junior courts. I do not know of any one of them who is, or has been, partial in his duties. However, I do not think any of them should take an active part in an election, nor should they take any direct or indirect part in the patronage which might flow from an election. An infringement of the Canada Elections Act can occur; in fact, it often does occur. I do not suggest and I have no right to suggest that they would be other than impartial but yet I would think that their decision might be suspect. This would do nothing to enhance in the minds of the people the view that the administration of justice in Canada is always impartial. It occurs to me that anyone who is strongly partisan by act or deed and who has to do with the administration of justice may be acting quite legally within the law but not with propriety under the law.

As a member of another profession, I do not propose to lecture members of the legal profession. I am referring only to those who have something to do with the administration of justice. I am as interested as any other Canadian in seeing that the administration of justice is always above reproach. In bringing this matter before the committee may I say that I quite realize that these appointments are made by the provincial governments and therefore the matter is outside the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice. However, the Criminal Code is a federal statute and we should all be interested in seeing that it is applied impartially.

After all, many more people come in contact with the junior courts than with the senior courts and their opinion about the administration of justice is formed from their experience in these junior courts. I do not bring up this matter in a partisan way and I hope the minister will not regard it as such. As I have said, the condition probably exists only to a very limited degree. I do not know whether it existed under the former government. Frankly, I have no information on the matter but if it did exist I think it was wrong then just as I think it is wrong now.

I am not complaining because of any partisan action against our party on the part of the presiding officer of a court of lower jurisdiction. I am appealing to all Canadians to maintain the administration of justice on a high plane and above reproach. I do not suggest there should be any change with regard to the exercise of the franchise by these people although this is denied to the judges of our senior courts. I do not suggest that anything that has been done is illegal.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he tell us what he means by junior courts? Does he mean magistrates' courts?

Mr. McMillan: I refer to magistrates' courts.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Or family courts?

Mr. McMillan: Magistrates' courts. I should like the minister to reply and I should like to hear the opinions of other members of the committee. If I am wrong in my thinking I should like to be corrected. I have always thought that this practice should not be carried on and I should like to hear the opinions of other members of the committee.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, of course I would deplore any partisanship in any court, and I am glad to say that so far as I know there is no partisanship in any of the courts, certainly not those presided over by judges who are appointed under the authority of parliament. Mind you, all of us who practice in the courts and occasionally lose cases may be tempted, I suppose, to ascribe reasons, but I am satisfied it is correct to say that on the whole the bar and the public of Canada are well served indeed by their judiciary, whether it be in the superior courts of the province, county or district courts or in magistrates' courts.

The hon. member has brought before the committee a general proposition that justice should be administered without partisanship or favour, and with his proposition we would, of course, all agree. He said, however, that the situation he has in mind exists primarily with respect to magistrates' courts. He did not identify the situation. If it is in a magistrate's court, if there should be any such unidentified situation, all I can say is that it seems to me that the matter should be taken up with the authority responsible for the appointment to the magistrate's court.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to make a comment at this point. I have had some experience in this connection. I was brought before a magistrate who was a member of the legislature who was of a different political persuasion from myself. He found me guilty with a great deal of relish and ordered me to pay a certain sum. I told him to go to hell, and that I would not pay the sum in question, and I have never paid it yet.

Mr. Fulton: The question there likely was, was the hon. member really guilty or not? I am glad to say that those bad old days in British Columbia are at an end. Even though the government of the province is not now one to whose political doctrine I subscribe, those bad old days are pretty well gone, and generally speaking that type of magistrate does not exist in our province.

Mr. McMillan: I did not mean to bring about a general discussion. I happen to know of one or two cases where this does occur, where magistrates do take part in federal elections. I have never made inquiries to ascertain whether or not the practice is general but if it is I think it is wrong. I think most hon. members would agree with that.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure they do, and if the hon. member would bring such a case to the attention of the provincial attorney general it is a matter upon which effective action should be taken right away.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the minister not agree that if it is apparent that there is the possibility of bias because of political partisanship any litigant has the right to apply for prohibition to prevent his case being heard by the particular magistrate?

Mr. Fulton: I would not care to give a snap decision on that point. I should like to reflect on it a little.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we have the estimates of the Department of Justice before us again. Its operations are very important to everyone but in some respects they remind me of the expression "Jefferies is chicken" used in the press gallery. It seems to me that the department acts in somewhat the same manner. The minister has referred to his obligation under the bill of rights and in that regard I should like to refer to divorce bills. Anyone who has read a divorce bill knows that it contains a petition. There is an allegation that adultery has been committed. Evidence is submitted to support the petition and a decision is made on that basis. I think the bill of rights gives the parties involved in a divorce bill a protection they are not getting at the present time from the examination that the minister gives these bills. Because of the problems that have arisen over the past few years in relation to the divorce law administered by the federal government and the responsibility of the federal government except in those instances where jurisdiction is given to the provincial governments, it seems to me that some change must be made so that some of these things do not happen. The minister will debate, and can debate, his responsibility in relation to this matter of divorce. However, Mr. Chairman, the committee will be aware of the fact that a number of cases have been referred to the minister by the miscellaneous private bills committee and we have never received any answer.

One of these cases was the Eccles case of last year which received a great deal of publicity in the newspapers and other media of publicity across the country. To date, we have not found out the ultimate disposition of this case. We were told that the occurrence was within the jurisdiction of the provincial government, but since the occurrence took place within this building I doubt that that would be the case. Even so, there must be some follow up as to what the decision in that case was. The province of Ontario itself has gotten into a great deal of grief in this field, but at the moment inquiries are being conducted across the province in an effort to solve the problem.

I offered to help the minister this year by suggesting the setting up of a parliamentary proctor, a Queen's proctor, to do the job of making inquiries about divorce cases when that course seemed to be necessary. We have done some work in this connection and I think the minister is going to have to do some work or take some responsibility in connection with this subject. It is quite true that, technically, the minister reads the divorce bill and sees nothing wrong with the bill. This is obviously the case because there is nothing in it except the petition; there is nothing in it to prove whether or not the people involved are being given any of the protection they should expect under the bill of rights.

By May 9, 1961, the hon. member for Skeena and I had sent letters to 242 persons involved in divorce cases. Actually, as you can see, there would be 484 people who received letters in this regard. Of this number, 114 letters were returned to us for these reasons: No such street, number or person in Montreal, and for respondents there were two, for corespondents five; not in the directory, unknown, 19 respondents and 45 corespondents; moved, not at that address, 16 respondents and 18 corespondents—

Mr. Fulton: I regret that I must rise on a point of order here, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it can be said of me that I am unprepared to discuss anything which is within my responsibility and to give a good deal of latitude in that connection. However, it does seem to me that what is being done here by certain hon. members is to seek to avail themselves of the opportunity of these estimates to discuss and to criticize proceedings before the divorce committee of the Senate, and to attempt to make a case—which may be right or wrong, I do not know, because it is not within my jurisdiction—that the committee has been careless or has been misled or whatever may be the case.

In my submission, sir, this does not fall within the responsibility of the Minister of Justice in any way whatever and should not be discussed on these estimates.

Mr. Howard: I should like to speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman. You will recall that last session the miscellaneous private bills committee reheard a particular divorce case referred to as the Eccles case. This case was referred to the Minister of Justice, and he took certain action in respect of it. We have inquired of the Minister of Justice on three separate occasions on orders of the day as to what was happening to that particular inquiry. As a result of that referral to him, he gave pertinent information as to what he had done about the case and what was happening. Recently, the minister was sent a copy of an affidavit, both from myself and I gather from the chairman of the Senate divorce committee regarding certain alleged improprieties in connection with a particular divorce case. In reply, the Minister of Justice wrote me on March 30, as follows:

Dear Mr. Howard:

Thank you very much for your letter of February 28 concerning alleged irregularities with respect to the proceedings before the Senate committee on divorce on the petition of Yvette Dubois Leduc for a bill of divorce from Jacques Leduc.

I received the original of Mrs. Barriere's letter from the chairman, Senate divorce committee, and by letter dated March 13th I informed him that I was having an investigation undertaken immediately.

In both of these instances, the minister accepted some responsibility and took steps to deal with the cases. I submit that, surely this is something within the competence of the Minister of Justice. By his own admission in the letter of March 30, he was undertaking an investigation, just as he had in respect of the Eccles case. His answers on three separate occasions indicating that certain courses of action were being taken were an acceptance of some responsibility in the field.

Last year the miscellaneous private bills committee which dealt with the Eccles case felt the Minister of Justice was the only one with whom they could deal because this was a question of possible perjury which had occurred within the parliament buildings. I do not believe the minister can now disclaim all responsibility in this particular field.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, in so far as one or two particular cases are concerned, I have taken them up when they have been referred to me. With regard to the Eccles case, as I have explained before, after a discussion with the Attorney General of Ontario, that case has been referred to the Attorney General of Ontario for investigation. I do not recall the situation with regard to the other case to which my hon. friend refers. My recollection is that the same course of action is being followed there. Where particular cases are referred to me with a specific allegation of perjury or something, then in accordance with a system I have worked out with the Attorney General of Ontario, these matters are referred to him. But in so far as the jurisdiction over, responsibility for, or control of proceedings with respect to divorce in the Senate committee is concerned, that is not my responsibility. It is not, in my submission, something which should be discussed on my estimates.

I am prepared to answer questions with regard to cases that have been or may be referred to me, but I am not prepared to answer questions with regard to cases that have been or may be before the Senate divorce committee, because I have no knowledge of them.

Mr. Peters: On the point of order, I should like to suggest we have a right to discuss this subject for the simple reason that we have been studying the problem over the years and the most logical conclusion to come to is to give the exchequer court jurisdiction in the matter of divorce. At the moment the minister has a bill on the order paper to add another one or two judges to the exchequer court. I believe a fair conclusion to draw from this would be that the judges are being appointed to take care of divorces and that parliament will be free of this burden.

The Chairman: I will not object if the hon. member puts that question to the minister, but the answer he receives may not give him permission to debate what he wishes to pursue. I may say that before the minister rose I had some doubts as to the relevancy or propriety of discussing the divorce situation when the estimates of the Department of Justice are being considered because, unless I am mistaken, there is no federal law on divorce.

Mr. Peters: Yes, there is.

The Chairman: Is there a law?

Mr. Peters: The only law is the Canada divorce act of 1930 and the British North America Act which gives Canada the sole right in matters of divorce.

The Chairman: I appreciate that the British North America Act—

Mr. Fulton: May I put it in this way, Mr. Chairman. Certainly the jurisdiction over divorce is in the federal parliament. But the responsibility for what parliament does is not that of the Minister of Justice. It is the responsibility of parliament itself. What I am pointing out is that it is inappropriate to seek to hold the Minister of Justice responsible for what a committee may do in the other place or even for what a committee may do in this place, a committee of which I am not a member, over which I have no control and before which I have never appeared. It is the responsibility of parliament itself, not that of the Department of Justice whose estimates are before the committee.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I hope you will allow me a word on that subject, in view of the fact that I am interested in this discussion, because I intend to deal briefly, in a few moments, with the matter of an amendment to the confederation pact with regard to divorce.

Subsection 26 of section 91 of the British North America Act grants exclusive jurisdiction to the federal government in all matters pertaining to marriage and divorce, except the celebration of marriage.

Since we are discussing the estimates of the Department of Justice, I think it is in order at this stage to suggest an amendment to that section. I want to give notice to the house of the question I shall be raising shortly in my remarks. I feel sure it will be appropriate to deal with divorce from that angle. At the present time, I have no knowledge of what my colleagues had to say on the subject.

The Chairman: Could the hon. member indicate what is this divorce legislation to which he referred a moment ago?

Mr. Deschatelets: It is section 91, subsection 26 of the British North America Act, which gives jurisdiction to the federal government over all matters pertaining to marriage and divorce.

The Chairman: I think I know that provision. I thought the hon. member was referring to a piece of federal legislation dealing with divorce generally. Is there any such legislation? I put the question to the hon. member.

Mr. Deschatelets: No, there is none, but—

The Chairman: I see.

(Text):

As I was starting to explain, there is no act concerning divorce in general. This house as well as the other place pass certain divorce bills but each bill is a separate case. The Minister of Justice has nothing to do with the procedure of the other place and of this place concerning the enactment of these bills. This is the responsibility of parliament as a whole and not the special responsibility of the minister.

Although it may not be wise on my part to give an opinion in advance on the point which the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont said he wanted to raise later on, I think generally that what I have said would apply. There may be certain circumstances where one could discuss the opportunity for the government to introduce some legislation in the matter of divorce but that would not be the responsibility of the minister. It would be the responsibility of the government to introduce legislation of that kind. It would therefore not come under the estimates of the Department of Justice.

The hon. member mentioned that the British North America Act gives the federal government power to legislate in the matter of divorce and marriage. I would point out that this authority is not given to the government but to parliament. That is why a distinction must be made between the responsibility of parliament and the responsibility of the minister. That is why I do not think the minister can reply to any problem raised on the general policy of divorce. This is a problem for parliament; it is not a problem for the minister. That is why I indicated that the discussion up to the present time has been out of order when referring to the procedure which is followed in the other place or here in connection with divorce.

As to the other point raised by the hon. member for Skeena with regard to certain cases to which he drew the attention of the minister last year, may I say this. He must remember that the enforcement of the law is a provincial responsibility. It may well be that the minister will wish to co-operate when certain facts are drawn to his attention by reporting to the attorney general of the province concerned; but that will not give the minister authority or jurisdiction on this matter under his estimates. Again it is a problem for parliament but I think it is not a problem for the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Howard: Before we proceed, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. The initial raising of the objection by the Minister of Justice and the subsequent discussion in my opinion raised three other matters which should be considered before we finally determine where we stand on this particular issue. The first one is this. If the administration of justice is a matter of provincial responsibility, then I submit that the Minister of Justice had no right whatsoever even to receive a communication from the miscellaneous private bills committee of last year with respect to the possibility of perjury or collusion in a particular case.

Mr. Fulton: How can I avoid receiving a communication? I must open the letter. I cannot send it back unopened. Don't be so ridiculous.

Mr. Howard: After all, I am talking about a ridiculous situation such as that with regard to parliamentary divorce. Anything more ridiculous has never occurred in the history of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member himself sent me a communication.

Mr. Howard: I sent you a communication and it takes you months to answer it. To the letter I wrote on February 28, 1961 I received an answer on March 20, 1961. It was a month before I received a reply. It leaves the miscellaneous private bills committee in a foolish position, not having any place to turn if they find the possibility of perjury or if they find, in fact, that there is perjury. The miscellaneous private bills committee is an element of this house or of parliament and has not any direct relationship with the provinces of Canada. The only relationship it might have is through the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice is the person with whom the miscellaneous private bills committee deals.

The second matter that I think is of importance to consider is this. Under the Department of Justice comes the question of the operation of the Exchequer Court of Canada. Some few years ago the Minister of Justice, in answer to the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Knowles, made a comment to the effect that he, the Minister of Justice, was going to discuss the question of Exchequer Court jurisdiction in divorce with the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate. Surely we are entitled to talk about the Exchequer Court of Canada and whether or not its authority should be extended to include the question of divorce, especially in so far as the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec are concerned. Surely we are entitled to go into that particular phase of the matter. There is a direct responsibility of the minister shown here under item No. 170, administration of justice in the Yukon territory, including the Yukon territorial court. Surely we are entitled then to discuss the subject of divorce in so far as it is concerned in the Yukon territory if this is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice.

I think that on all counts we are entitled to proceed on this course in dealing with these particular items. I think we are also entitled to deal with the responsibility of the Minister of Justice, under the bill of rights, to examine bills introduced or presented to parliament to see that they are not inconsistent with the bill of rights.

The minister has said he examined all these various divorce bills and found them consistent with the bill of rights, and I think we are entitled to review his examination and see whether or not he is correct.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has said that divorce might be discussed under certain particular headings, but the point is, that is not what he is trying to do. If the hon. member wants to discuss the jurisdiction of the exchequer court, there is an item here on the administration of the exchequer court. I am not attempting to say how widely he can discuss the matter, but surely that is the place where he should discuss it and relate it to the exchequer court.

However, that is not what the hon. member has been trying to do. He has been trying to attack the proceedings of the Senate divorce committee on the first item of my estimates, and I submit that is completely irrelevant.

Then the hon. member says that surely he is entitled to discuss any particular case that may have been referred to me. I have already said I am prepared to discuss any such case and what I have done with regard to it. But the hon. member has not even done that; he is trying to have a general discussion.

It is quite clear, Mr. Chairman, that the British North America Act gives parliament jurisdiction over divorce. How parliament exercises that jurisdiction is a matter for parliament to decide; it is not a matter within the administrative responsibility of the Department of Justice, whose estimates we are discussing. We are asking this committee to vote these estimates to enable my department to carry out its administrative responsibility; and jurisdiction over divorce is not one of those responsibilities. I hope hon. members appreciate that plain and simple point and will keep their discussions relevant to the items before the committee.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree with the minister at all. I think part of the trouble stems from the fact that what the Minister of Justice says concerning the Department of Justice is probably true, but the minister also acts in the capacity of Attorney General of Canada. In that respect, what he says is not true.

I think that quite frankly he has done a fairly good job as Minister of Justice, and a lousy job as Attorney General of Canada. I think he has done an exceptionally poor job in that capacity, and I think the hon. member for Skeena hit on a sore spot when he mentioned the date of this letter. I have written letters to the minister and it has taken him over two months to reply to them. I have never received an answer earlier than three weeks after writing my letter.

I do not think it is my responsibility as a parliamentarian to examine all these cases. I do not think it is the collective responsibility of all hon. members of the House of Commons to examine these cases. It is not our responsibility, certainly individually, and I do not think it is collectively, to examine all these cases; but nobody else is doing it and this parliament is passing these bills. We are giving consent by remote control at the present time, or we let somebody else to it on our behalf on a temporary basis, but we are making the decisions.

I wrote a letter to the Attorney General of Ontario and received a reply much faster than I have from the federal Attorney General. I sent copies of my letters to both these people, and also to Senator Roebuck, because for all I know he may be the attorney general of Canada in this relationship. But somebody is the attorney general of Canada; somebody represents the highest appeal court from the courts of this land and must hear an appeal.

I suggest that the gentleman who holds the office of Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada must be the man to whom we should talk—

The Chairman: Order. I would indicate to the hon. member that as far as concerns what may happen in a committee of this house or the other place, they may be able to act on their own initiative to correct any improprieties that may occur. However the fact remains that the administration of justice is a provincial responsibility; there is no doubt about that.

Even if the Minister of Justice is the Attorney General of Canada, that does not give him any jurisdiction in the matter of the administration of justice. With regard to the bill of rights, this question may be discussed, but only the point regarding the responsibility of the Minister of Justice in relation to the bill of rights. The discussion must not revert to the point made with regard to the procedure followed in the other place or here in the matter of bills of divorce.

With regard to the relevancy of some of the remarks being made under special items, I think the Chair should not rule on that point for the time being. I am just trying to indicate some general boundaries and I think the hon. member should bear in mind that there is a difference between the responsibility of parliament and the responsibility of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice made a statement not long ago in relation to this P.C. order which requires him to examine bills which come before parliament.

The minister went on to say something that surprised me. I think what he said should not be interpreted in the manner in which he said it, but he mentioned the fact that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo introduced a bill—and quite properly, in my opinion—so that the government would have to make some decision in relation to the P.C. order of 1960, No. 1792.

This bill was introduced and the government got on its bicycle and introduced a bill that took out of the Fisheries Act those sections which would be contrary to the bill of rights. The minister said they were going to do this anyway. If this P.C. order had been passed before the Feeds Act was passed by the House of Commons last year, that act would not be on the books in its present form, because it conflicts in many respects—and I would be quite happy to point out at least 12 of them—with the bill of rights.

Obviously the Customs Act conflicts violently with the bill of rights. It may be true that private members are taking advantage of the inefficiency of the government, but it is also true that perhaps the government should have extended this P.C. order to permit them, through their agencies, to examine all the legislation and bring it into line with the bill of rights. This would have made it unnecessary for hon. members to find methods of removing clauses which are so much in conflict with our wishes in this regard.

With regard to the matter we were discussing a few moments ago, I have a signed affidavit here, of which the minister also has a copy. It is true that it was signed in the province of Ontario, because that is where I live. It was signed by a barrister of the supreme court of Ontario, but it was from a lady in the province of Quebec who had never been in the province of Ontario in her life until she came here to protest the fact that she was being divorced and did not know it.

While it may be all right to send this to the Attorney General of Ontario, which I did, I think it also has some interest for the federal department because they were the ones who were causing her problem; they were the ones to whom she was going for relief against something they were doing, not the province of Ontario. She had really no argument with the province.

[The Chairman.]

The Chairman: Order. I must point out to the hon. member that I cannot accept this argument. The fact that somebody calls on his federal representative does not give jurisdiction to the Minister of Justice or even to parliament. As I indicated, the administration of justice is a provincial responsibility, and the enactment of divorce bills is the responsibility of parliament and not of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I wrote to the Minister of Justice with regard to this matter and I included a copy of this petition. This is the reply I received from the minister, and the committee will be interested in noting that the minister does not mention the Attorney General of Ontario in his reply; he keeps it purely a federal matter:

Dear Mr. Peters,

Thank you very much for your letter of the 17th ultimo concerning alleged irregularities in relation to the petition for divorce filed by Ignatz Radakovitz.

I have written Senator Roebuck with respect to this matter and I shall communicate with you further in due course. I enclose herewith a copy of my letter to the senator for your information.

At this time the minister did not see fit to even call on the Attorney General of Ontario, although I had done so and sent him a copy of the petition. At the time I was not sure what course to follow. This is one of the cases to which the minister said he would give consideration.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the hon. member whether I am correct in my recollection that in my letter to Senator Roebuck I asked him if he would have anything which in his view or in the view of his committee would assist the appropriate law officers in the enforcement of the provisions of the Criminal Code? Did I not ask him to let me have any material in his possession so that I might then turn it over to the appropriate attorney general for a decision as to whether any action should be taken under the ordinary law, because perjury is an offence under the Criminal Code and it is my view, as it is, so far as I know, the view of the provincial attorneys general, that it is the responsibility of the attorneys general of the provinces to take action with regard to it?

Mr. Peters: What the minister has said is correct. I would be happy to read the letter itself:

My dear Senator:

I enclose herewith a copy of a letter dated 17th ultimo which I received from Mr. Arnold Peters, M.P. together with a copy of the statutory declaration referred to. I would appreciate it very much if you feel free to let me have your comments on this matter together with copies of any documents in the possession of your committee which you consider may be of assistance to me in giving this matter further consideration.

The letter is signed by the minister. Again, the province of Ontario was not mentioned in this case. I have another here; in fact I have a number. We asked these people in some cases for statutory declarations. I am not a lawyer and I do not really understand what weight that carries. We have had it done in the proper manner. A number of hon. members of the house have been very co-operative in doing this work for us. People have had the opportunity of being heard in this way. Then nothing happens, and that is what bothers me. The Attorney General of Ontario may make some investigation, but that is not my problem. If it were, I would run in Ontario as a candidate. The only thing that interests me is that it is costing me money when Mr. Kelso Roberts is doing work which I think the Minister of Justice should be doing. That is my difficulty. Also, the action appears not to be appropriate because it relates to people who do not reside in the province of Ontario. The foundation for this case was established in the province of Quebec, and if any attorney general should be referred to it should be the Attorney General of Quebec rather than Ontario. The difficulty which faces us is that the Attorney General of Canada is not, in my opinion, functioning in the manner in which he ought to function. Why is he not doing the job himself?

The Chairman: Order. I have indicated earlier to the hon. member that the Attorney General of Canada is not responsible for dealing with the cases to which he has referred. I thought I had made myself clear on that point. On another occasion the hon. member may have opportunities to discuss what he is now desirous of discussing, but it does not appear to be the duty of the Chair to indicate when that matter might be raised. All I can do now is to rule on whether the hon. member's remarks are relevant at this point and in my opinion they are not.

Mr. Fulton: May I assist in this matter by saying that we have considered this very carefully and we have come to the conclusion that where a possible offence is brought to my attention concerning perjury alleged to have been committed in Quebec or an offence in connection with a false affidavit, then it should be brought to the attention of the Attorney General of Quebec. Where perjury was alleged to have been committed in Ontario it would be brought to the attention of the attorney general of Ontario.

We have considered all aspects of this matter very carefully and have reached the conclusion that it is not the constitutional practice for the Attorney General of Canada to prosecute under the Criminal Code of Canada in the case of ordinary Criminal Code offences committed within a province. However, as I have said, when a particular case is brought to my attention I am not simply going to say: you must write to the Attorney General of Ontario, or Quebec, as the case may be. Perhaps I have been wrong. Perhaps I should have said that. But the practice I have followed is to write to the member and tell him that I would get in touch with the chairman of the Senate committee, bringing to his attention the material which has been supplied to me and asking him whether in his opinion there is any information available in the records of this committee which would throw any further light on the matter. The purpose of that inquiry is that we may have all the reports before us in order to lay them, in turn, before the appropriate attorney general. The purpose of that inquiry is not for me to decide whether to lay information but whether there is a proper case to bring to the attention of the provincial attorney general. That is the extent of my interest or authority. That is how I have tried to deal with particular cases brought to my attention. But with respect to divorce generally, the question of how this house handles it, or how the Senate handles it, is a matter over which I have no control.

Mr. Carter: When the minister was replying to the hon. member for Skeena he made some reference to myself which I cannot allow to go unanswered. He charged that I had used subterfuge in order to get a bill before the house, that I had misinformed the house and misrepresented what was in the bill. I want to say to all hon. members that I am not in the habit of using subterfuge to gain any purpose and it is unworthy of the minister to make such insinuations.

Mr. Fulton: I only hope you won't do it again.

Mr. Carter: I say to the minister now, that as far as straightforwardness and integrity are concerned I am prepared to match my record against his any time and any day.

Mr. Fulton: Except for this one case.

Mr. Carter: You keep quiet. You have had your say and I am going to have mine. Let us take this question of subterfuge. No bill can come before the house unless it complies with certain rules. If the rules have been complied with there can be no basis for a charge of subterfuge and the minister himself is lowering his dignity by suggesting it.

Let us look at the facts and not at the smokescreen which the minister has tried to throw up. The rules governing the introduction of bills in this house are clear, and in addition we have standing orders applying with similar force to this procedure. Standing order 71, section 2, provides that a motion for leave to introduce a bill shall be decided without debate or amendment provided that any member moving for such leave may be permitted to give a succinct explanation of the provisions of the bill.

The practice which has been followed in introducing this bill is set forth in the fourth edition of Bourinot at page 494, where the following words are found:

> When the two days' notice has been given, the member in charge of a public bill rises as soon as motions for the introduction of bills are called, in the course of routine proceedings, and moves formally for "leave to introduce a bill, intituled, etc." He sends to the Speaker the motion in writing with a copy of the bill. The Speaker will then propose the question. "Is it the pleasure of the house that the honourable member has leave to introduce his bill?" But if the Speaker finds that the bill is "in blank or in an imperfect shape" he will decline to put the question and will return the bill to the member who must take another opportunity of bringing it up in conformity with the rules.

Standing order 71(1) provides that every bill must be introduced by leave with the title of the bill specified. Standing order 72 provides that no bill may be introduced in blank or in an imperfect shape.

Mr. Chairman, Bourinot provides that two days' notice must be given. I submitted my bill to the Speaker 48 hours before it was introduced in the house for the purpose of having the Speaker determine whether it conformed with the rules, and whether it was in blank or in imperfect shape. I was not informed that there was anything wrong with it, and naturally concluded that I was entitled to proceed with the bill. I suggest, therefore, the minister's charge of subterfuge breaks down in respect of Bourinot's citation, that 48 hours' notice be given, because it was duly given. I suggest the minister should eat the word "subterfuge".

In respect to his suggestion that it was misleading, the purpose of the bill was explained on the blank page opposite clause 1 of the bill, which was to determine whether it was consistent with the bill of rights and to re-enact it in conformity with a report which the minister is obliged to make pursuant to the Canadian bill of rights examination regulations.

The minister also suggested that I was asking for a legal opinion. The examination regulations of the Canadian bill of rights makes no mention of a legal opinion, but do refer to the report which the minister must present. What good would such a report be if hon. members are unable to make use of it in determining what changes should be made to the legislation which is passed by the house? The minister talks about a farce; I suggest that is the biggest farce of all. That is, the minister makes a report which can serve no purpose, is of no use to anyone, nor of any benefit to our deliberations. It is beyond any intelligent person to understand why the minister dreamed up that requirement in the first place, if it was not to serve some useful purpose. What other purpose could the report serve than to guide members in the methods of improving legislation as it comes before this house?

The minister then went on to say that my bill was not properly before the house. Here again the minister has displayed his confusion, because at one point he said the bill was not properly before the house, yet later on he said that question was still being considered by Mr. Speaker and the house leader. Surely the minister cannot have this both ways.

I should like to inform the Minister of Justice that it is not his business to decide whether a bill is properly before this house, but is a function of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear. The Minister of Justice continually seeks to usurp that function.

Mr. Fulton: Just wait, I will read you what Mr. Speaker said.

Mr. Carter: I do not have to wait because I can tell you what Mr. Speaker said. He said this bill had no legislative effect.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Carter: It is upon that statement that the minister has based his argument this afternoon.

Mr. Fulton: No, not at all.

Mr. Carter: I suggest there are two things wrong with the minister's argument. The first is, he said, this afternoon, it cannot be decided whether a bill is properly before the house until a bill comes up for second reading.

Mr. Fulton: I have never said such a thing.

Mr. Carter: That is not the procedure we have followed during the 12 years I have been in this house.

Mr. Fulton: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Carter: I suggest any bill which receives first reading is properly before the house.

Mr. Fulton: I never said any such thing.

Mr. Carter: Oh, yes you did; you said it could not be decided because the question would not arise. Your very words were, that the question woud not arise as to whether the bill was properly before the house until it came up for second reading.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, with respect to this particular bill.

Mr. Carter: This bill has had first reading and is therefore either before the house or not. The minister cannot have it both ways.

I would also suggest the bill is not in blank or in imperfect shape, but complies with the rules. There is a tradition in the mother of parliaments of introducing blank bills.

I should like to point out to the minister that if this bill has no legislative effect and is improperly before the house on that account, would that situation not apply to Bill No. C-60, the Canadian Bill of Rights, which the Prime Minister introduced in 1958? The Prime Minister stated when introducing this bill of rights as reported at page 4644 of Hansard for September 5, 1958:

> I hope we will be enabled next session to discuss this question again fully and completely,—

Then he went on to say, as reported at the same page:

> —whatever changes should be made in this bill of rights can be made in the bill then to be presented—

There was no motion for leave to introduce such a bill during the next session, and there was no similar bill introduced. The Prime Minister, in introducing Bill No. C-60 in 1958, did in fact introduce a bill which had no legislative effect. If it did, I should like the Minister of Justice to explain how it did.

I made it quite clear, when I introduced my bill, that the purpose of introducing it was for the consideration of the house, so that any inconsistencies in the bill might be removed. The Minister of Justice has seized upon the last clause of my bill, which stated that the Fisheries Act was to be repealed and re-enacted and I suggest the minister has made himself ridiculous in seizing on that one final clause and saying that it represented the whole bill. What about all the other clauses in the bill? Are they not part of the bill? How does he know we would ever get to the final clause or what changes would be made before the final clause was ever reached? The minister is basing his argument on the assumption that the bill is to be introduced in perfect shape and must go through in perfect shape without any changes whatsoever being made. This is in line with the arrogant attitude of the minister and his party toward parliament.

90205-6—339

As far as taking advantage of the house or abusing parliamentary processes is concerned, I want to emphasize that I have complied with every rule laid down by the house for the introduction of legislation and we want the minister to take back what he said when he used the word "subterfuge".

Mr. Fulton: With the greatest of regret I find myself unable to comply with the hon. member's request, and I shall endeavour to explain in words of one syllable precisely why not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo points out that the minister said he had resorted to subterfuge. That, of course, is a reflection on the character of the hon. member if the minister used these words, and he now confirms that he did because he says he refuses to withdraw them. It must be obvious, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Justice should know better and ought to be asked to withdraw words that clearly reflect on the character of the hon. member who complained—

Mr. Fulton: Once again the hon. member—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would you mind—

Mr. Fulton: May I speak to the point of order? Is the hon. member for Essex East the only one who has any right to speak in this house? That is the position that he has sought to assert increasingly over the past weeks and months.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Never mind the lecture.

Mr. Fulton: I have a right to speak to the point of order whether or not the hon. member for Essex East likes it, and I suggest to him that he try to maintain some of that equanimity for which he formerly used to be well known—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will not take any lecture from you—

Mr. Fulton: —but which seems to have departed from him in recent days.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —or from anybody on that side, from the chairman or from you.

Mr. Fulton: To deal with the point of order, it is a well known feature of our rules that if objection is to be taken to what is said the point of order must be raised at the time that the words are spoken.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nonsense.

Mr. Fulton: This was not done, and in my submission there is nothing to the point of order raised by the hon. member in any event.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order—

Mr. Fulton: It so happens, Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order—

Mr. Fulton: —that I am speaking to the point of order and I have not yet finished.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman says that he has not said anything contrary to the rules of the house. He has confirmed that he said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that the hon. member had resorted to subterfuge.

The Chairman: Order. I am hearing the minister on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He has gone on to another speech.

Mr. Fulton: I had about concluded my remarks on the point of order when the hon. member proved once again unable to restrain himself. The point I have made is that a point of order of this kind must be raised when the words were spoken. In any event, the hon. member for Essex East is this time so far out of court to be obvious even to himself. There is nothing in his point of order because the word used was in itself not unparliamentary. That is my submission. I was about to go on to deal with the position taken by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo.

The Chairman: Order. I do not think I was in the chair when the words about which the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo complained were spoken. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, who is the member concerned, did not raise a point of order at that time. He has said that the minister should withdraw these words but that does not indicate in itself that the member considers that the words are unparliamentary. He may have implied only that they were unfair. I do not know in what context the word "subterfuge" was used and I would point out that in some cases it may be parliamentary. It all depends on the context. It may be unparliamentary if the implication is that the hon. member was trying to do something unethical. Would the hon. member explain exactly what the words were?

Mr. Carter: I do not know that I can quote the exact words but the implication was that I used subterfuge to get the bill before the house, that it was brought before the house by misrepresentation and in an improper manner. A few minutes ago the minister confirmed that and on the basis of his confirmation I am now asking him to withdraw. If I missed doing so on the earlier occasion I am not missing doing so now when he confirmed it a few minutes ago.

Mr. Fulton: As I apprehended what the hon. member said, he endeavoured to establish that what I said was not correct and therefore as it was not correct, that I should apologize or admit that I was in error. I had risen and said that I did not admit that I was in error when the hon. member for Essex East raised a point of order that the word "subterfuge" was unparliamentary. To that I replied that the point of order should have been raised when the word was used, which must be upwards of an hour ago, if there was objection taken to it. No objection was taken to it.

Mr. Benidickson: It is still a crime.

Mr. Fulton: In all simplicity, I submit that what is being done now is done in an attempt to waste time.

Mr. Carter: If you want to be a man you can withdraw it; if you want to be a weasel you can weasel out of it.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo would apply to himself the principle he has just asked me to apply to myself he would admit that what I said was correct, as I shall prove.

Mr. Carter: I do not admit one word of it, not one word of it.

Mr. Fulton: I shall read to you, Mr. Chairman, the dictionary definition of the word "subterfuge" in order that you may ascertain whether or not it is in fact unparliamentary. I am reading from the concise Oxford dictionary which defines "subterfuge" as follows:

> Attempt to escape censure or defeat in argument by evading the issue, statement et cetera resorted to for such purpose, use of such statements et cetera.

I see nothing unparliamentary in suggesting that the hon. member is attempting to evade the issue. That is done frequently. So, sir, I think there is really nothing to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Essex East. I am sorry to have to take so much time—

Mr. Carter: The minister himself is evading. He said I used subterfuge and engaged in misrepresentation.

Mr. Fulton: It is obvious, sir, that the hon. member for Essex East is inflaming the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. It seems to me that is an unparliamentary practice. I would suggest that we might try to get back to the point at issue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, it is clear from what the Minister of Justice has said that there has been a violation of the practices of the house in the characterization that the Minister of Justice has used with regard to the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend did not even hear it. He was not here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps the Minister of Justice will contain himself and try to acquire that serenity which we knew he possessed on other occasions. If the Chair does not insist on the Minister of Justice doing what any man with decency would do, then, of course—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member is now following a course which would not help to settle the problem. The Chair has not made any decision but I think I can make one right away. I realize now that I was not in the chair when the word was used so it is very difficult for me to rule now that the word was out of order or unparliamentary at the time it was used because as the definition of the word indicates it may be used in a parliamentary sense. What is unparliamentary is the imputation of false or unavowed motives. Maybe we could settle the problem by asking the Minister of Justice to indicate that he did not use words attributing false or unavowed motives to the hon. member. That is the only way I can rule because the hon. member for Essex East will realize that as I was not in the chair at the time, as I do not have the exact words and as the word in itself is not unparliamentary outside of the context, I cannot force the minister to withdraw. On the other hand, I am sure the minister will not hesitate to say that he did not impute to the hon. member motives of that sort.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, of course not. I hope I am too good a parliamentarian and have too much respect for all my colleagues in this house to impute motives of that sort. The word was quite simple and it was used in a perfectly normal, proper context. It stands by itself. I had no intention of imputing motives of the sort you have described.

I come now to the question of whether or not the bill in question was introduced to the house on the basis of an explanation which misled. This was my complaint against the hon. member and against the bill. I said the bill was placed before the house on a basis on which the issue involved in the bill was not explained. This is my understanding of the meaning of the word "subterfuge", that the issue involved in the bill was evaded in the explanation that was given.

It is a custom in this house which has arisen out of the rules, and has been sanctioned, that when an hon. member asks for leave to introduce a bill, he may be asked to give an explanation.

Now, the introduction of a bill, of course, has in itself no effect. The only thing that has effect is when a bill is read formally the first, second and third time. But our custom has grown that when a member is asked for an explanation so as to allow the members of the house to form a judgment on whether he may have leave to introduce the bill, because it is only when leave is given to introduce the bill that it can be read a first, second and third time. First reading is given a bill under our rules immediately upon leave for the introduction of the bill being granted. It is important, therefore, whether or not a member gets leave to introduce a bill.

While it has rarely, if ever happened, the house is quite entitled to refuse leave to introduce a bill. Certainly, if the house felt that an explanation given of a bill made the bill repugnant, the house would not give leave for the introduction of the bill. Certainly if the house were given an explanation which, on its face, raised a serious question as to whether or not the house should give the bill first reading, then the house would say, no, we will not give first reading now. We will wait until we see a copy of the bill or until we get a further explanation. Then, we would defer first reading and the bill would not have, in fact, been read a first time. I say, therefore, the explanation given by a member when he seeks leave to introduce his bill is a very important thing.

In this case, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo did explain his Bill No. C-76 on March 22, 1961. Here is what he said, as recorded on page 3217 of Hansard of that date:

> Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to revise the Fisheries Act to bring it into conformity with the Canadian Bill of Rights and in accordance with the report to be tabled by the Minister of Justice under standing order No. 40, as required by the Canadian Bill of Rights regulations.

There is another paragraph, and I will read it if the hon. member wants me to do so, but in my submission the operative and impressive words were, "the purpose of this bill is to revise the Fisheries Act to bring it into conformity with the Canadian Bill of Rights". It was on that basis, Mr. Chairman, that the house gave leave to the hon. member to introduce the bill to revise the Fisheries Act and bring it into conformity with the bill of rights. Leave was given, the bill was introduced and it was then read a first time on the strength of the hon. member's explanation. But when we came to read the bill, we found that the impression we had been given was completely erroneous. This was not a bill to revise the Fisheries Act. This was a bill to re-enact, word by word, comma by comma, clause by clause and in precise detail, the then existing Fisheries Act. I ask how anything could be a clearer case of the house having been misled?

I am not discussing motives, I am simply asking the house to assess the fact of whether or not it was misled by the explanation given. The hon. member sought leave to introduce a bill to revise the Fisheries Act, whereas what was pushed through first reading quickly, on the basis of the house accepting the explanation in good faith, was a bill to re-enact the present Fisheries Act and then repeal that act so that the hon. member's bill would have been the operative act.

Mr. Peters: It accomplished what he wanted to accomplish.

Mr. Fulton: It accomplished nothing except to mislead the house, on the basis of the explanation given, and it drew from Mr. Speaker words which I shall presently place on record. Mr. Speaker was candid enough, as Mr. Speaker always is, to tell the house he had not been aware of what was being done. The Speaker himself did not know what was being done. He accepted the explanation in good faith. The words of Mr. Speaker are reported on page 3353 of Hansard for March 27, 1961, as follows:

> Perhaps the house would permit me to call attention to an omission or error of the Chair and ask for the indulgence of the house. It arose in a similar circumstance, where an hon. member had risen to ask leave to introduce a bill, namely on Wednesday, March 22, when Bill No. C-76 was given first reading, just as we have given first reading at this moment to another bill.
> If I had performed my duty at that time I should have called the attention of the house to the fact—which I did not actually know, but I should have known, in my responsibility for the form in which matters come before this house—that the bill is designed to do only one thing; that is, to repeal and re-enact the Fisheries Act.

Well, is that a bill to revise the Fisheries Act? Of course not Mr. Speaker, the responsible officer of the house, says himself that the bill was designed to do only one thing, to repeal and re-enact the Fisheries Act, whereas the explanation which we accepted in good faith informed us that it was a bill to revise the Fisheries Act. Mr. Speaker continues:

> In other words, it does not propose any legislation but it is simply a repeal and re-enactment of a statute now on the books, and accomplishes nothing whatever in a legislative way.

Now, I am sure that all hon. members, even my good friend from Essex East, will admit there is a substantial difference between a bill which we are told is a bill to revise the Fisheries Act—and that is what we were told by the hon. member when he introduced the bill—and a bill which, as Mr. Speaker said, is simply a bill to repeal and re-enact a statute now on the books. It accomplishes nothing. It was for this reason I said the bill was introduced by subterfuge. It was introduced as a result of an explanation which evaded the issue and led hon. members to believe that they were being asked to give leave to introduce a bill to revise the Fisheries Act, whereas they were being asked to give leave to introduce another, different kind of bill.

I do not propose to pursue this matter any further. I gave my explanation earlier this afternoon as to why, under those circumstances, as Minister of Justice, I had not felt called upon up to now to report on this so-called bill. In my view, it was not properly before the house. As Mr. Speaker says, it accomplishes nothing. In my view it is questionable whether it is, in fact, a bill at all and therefore I felt—and I discussed this point with Mr. Speaker—that there would be a point of order to be raised when the bill came to second reading if that stage ever arose. At that time the house would decide whether or not this bill is properly before the house. If the house decided that, then of course I would be called upon to examine the bill and make my report.

I did not consider I was called upon to make a report with respect to a monstrosity to which, in my view, this House of Commons being a sensible body would, if the bill ever came to second reading, decide was not properly before us, that it accomplishes nothing, that it should never have been introduced, so that it would not be proceeded with.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo makes some point of the fact that perhaps the bill would have been amended and then, perhaps, the bill would have accomplished something because somebody in committee might have amended it in a way to make it worth while instead of the nullity it was when he introduced it. This might have been the case if we proceeded with the bill, but when he made his explanation he was talking about the bill as he introduced it, and not what it might be at some other stage when some of the common sense of the other members might have been brought to bear on this monstrosity. He was talking about the bill that he introduced and he said, "This is a bill the purpose of which is to revise the Fisheries Act". As a matter of fact, it was nothing of the sort. Therefore, although

I like to try to get along with all hon. members, I am sorry that I am unable to accommodate myself to the request of the hon. member that I should apologize for the word "subterfuge".

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I recognize the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to let the minister away with that.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I have recognized the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Carter: I am speaking to a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): What is the point of order at this stage?

Mr. Carter: My point of order arises out of the words just used by the minister who has said that he sees no reason to withdraw the word "subterfuge". If you will just give me a few moments I shall state my question of privilege. If I used subterfuge in introducing this bill, I did not comply with the rules of the house. I challenge the minister now to tell me what rule of the house I violated.

Mr. Fulton: I never said the hon. member violated a rule of the house. I said that the hon. member, in making his explanation, did not give the house the correct explanation of his bill. That is all I have ever said.

Mr. Carter: On a question of privilege, may I say that I did give the explanation to the house.

Mr. Fulton: Not the correct explanation.

Mr. Carter: The minister emphasized only one part of what I said. When I introduced the bill I said—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Order. I think the hon. member, in raising a question of privilege, is raising a matter of argument. I had understood this point of order had been settled with the explanation that had been given, namely that there was no direct imputation against the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo and therefore no question of privilege upon which he had risen. I had therefore recognized the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: The minister obviously studied well at law school for he has been able to use so many words to attempt to confuse the issue. However, I think he has failed to do so. The bill of rights and the order in council to which I referred, specifically, without equivocation, state what the minister shall do with respect to every bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons. The order in council states what he shall do with respect to every such bill that is so introduced and then transmitted to him by the Clerk of the House of Commons. The question of the propriety of a particular bill and whether it is in order is one relating to the orders and functions of this particular house.

I say again, as I said earlier, that the minister has deliberately used his reasoning or his thinking that Bill C-76 is not properly before the house in order to avoid making a report which would have shown that the old Fisheries Act had in it many parts which were inconsistent with the bill of rights. If that is not the case, then I am quite sure we can expect tomorrow to find notice on the order paper by the Minister of Agriculture that he is going to revise the Feeds Act in order to bring it into conformity with the bill of rights. It is full of inconsistencies. The hon. member for Timiskaming referred to at least 12 instances where the Feeds Act introduced by this government is inconsistent with the bill of rights. I am sure we can expect that the Customs Act will be revised and brought up to date so that its inconsistencies with the bill of rights will be straightened out. But presumably what will be necessary before that event takes place is for other hon. members to introduce bills similar to Bill No. C-76, except that they make reference to the Feeds Act, the Customs Act and other statutes that I have not named which are inconsistent with the bill of rights.

The minister mentioned the fact that when instances of perjury were brought to his attention he would transmit these instances to the attorney general of the particular province within which the allegation of perjury itself as alleged was supposed to have taken place. I have drawn one of them to the attention of the minister already. I proceed now to draw another one to his attention. This also is connected with his duties and responsibilities under the bill of rights, section 3 of which states that he shall examine every bill. Here is another bill that the minister examined. He examined Bill No. SD-38, an act for the relief of Jack Warran Jones. In examining this bill the minister came across these words:

> —and whereas the said marriage and adultery have been proved by evidence adduced—

These are the words the minister examined and on which he came to the conclusion that adultery had been proven by evidence adduced. Yet how does he know this is not inconsistent with the bill of rights? I am referring to the bill, not the evidence. Yet the minister on March 7 ridiculed it and said, "That is not inconsistent with the provisions of the bill of rights." I submit that section I read previously of denying a person the right to appear applies in this case also. Let me read an affidavit sworn in Montreal on March 22, 1960 before Ouila Deroches a commissioner of the superior court in and for the city and district of Montreal, province of Quebec. It reads as follows:

I, Harry Golden, bailiff of the superior court, in and for the city and district of Montreal, residing at No. 4870 Jean Brillant St., in the city of Montreal, province of Quebec, do solemnly declare:

1. That on the 21st day of March, 1960, between the hours of 11 and 12 in the forenoon, I served the corespondent Alfred Sabourin with a true copy of the notice hereto attached and marked "A" by giving the said copy to and leaving it with the said Alfred Sabourin in person at his place of employment at No. 553 Dollard Ave. in the town of Lasalle, district of Montreal, province of Quebec.

2. That at the same time and place in the same manner I also served the said Alfred Sabourin with a true copy of the petition hereto attached and marked "B" and sworn declaration of the petitioner attached to the copy of the petition and also marked "B" appended to which copy there was a true copy of the information to the corespondent which is hereto also attached and marked "C".

3. That I believe the said Alfred Sabourin to be the person described in the said information as the corespondent.

4. That when serving the above upon the said Alfred Sabourin he admitted to me that he was the person described in the said information as the corespondent.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

And I have signed:

And there appears the signature of Harry Golden. This is the original document from the report of the committee on divorce, not the printed document but the original in each instance, and the original typescript as prepared by the reporter who attended at that particular hearing. You will note that it is sworn that the gentleman Mr. Alfred Sabourin was served at his place of employment at No. 553 Dollard Avenue and that he received this particular document.

Mr. Chairman, there is no such address as 553 Dollard Avenue. Again, communications were addressed to this individual at the address shown on the sworn statement and again we have communications from the Post Office Department; again the letter was returned. Again demands were made to have it re-routed, or for other action to be taken through the postal department. Again we have a letter from the postal authorities in connection with this particular case and I quote from the letter:

The address 553 Dollard avenue does not exist.

I submit this is something that is within the responsibility of the Minister of Justice, as the minister himself announced a while ago. When evidence of perjury is brought to the attention of the minister, he undertakes to communicate with the responsible official in the province concerned in connection with the allegation.

I strenuously disagree with the contention of the minister that he has no responsibility to review this particular evidence taken in such a careless manner before the committee of the other place. I submit that the minister has a responsibility. Certainly the bill of rights says that he shall examine every bill, although it does not say anything about evidence.

This is another instance of the minister interpreting the bill of rights to suit his own convenience because he does not want to be bothered with these divorce cases, just as he interpreted it to suit his own convenience with respect to Bill No. C-76.

The bill to which I have just referred says that the marriage and the adultery have been proved by evidence adduced. The minister read those words and said to himself, "I will take them at face value. I will take at face value what is said in this bill". How can you prove that adultery took place when the address of the corespondent which is given here does not exist, and when someone obviously signed a declaration which is not in fact true? There being no such address, are we not entitled to entertain some doubt about whether there was in fact a corespondent? Are we not entitled to ask ourselves whether this is another of the cooked-up arrangements —and there have been so many of them, as we discovered last session—under which someone obtains a divorce by using a fictitious name or corespondent?

With regard to the question of whether or not this individual, Mr. Sabourin, actually existed we can refer to the evidence taken before the divorce committee. I refer to the evidence given by Mr. Clovis Paquette, who appeared as a witness for the petitioner. He was sworn and testified that on a particular day certain things happened. I will read from the evidence. Mr. Jacobs asked:

Mr. Paquette, on the evening of February 24 and into the morning of the 25th, 1960 was Mr. Jones in your company? A. Yes sir.

Q. Who else was with you? A. Mr. Brault.

Q. Where did you go that night? A. Well, I was there in the afternoon of the 24th.

The Chairman: Get around to the night in question.

I do not know whether or not this witness showed any undue interest in this matter, but anyway Mr. Jacobs then asked:

After Mr. Jones met you outside a certain place? A. He did.

Q. Where? A. On O'Brien Boulevard at 11.30, and I saw his wife arrive at one o'clock with another man driving a car, a Chev. convertible; and I went upstairs with Mr. Brault and Mr. Jones at two o'clock and I found his wife was in the house, because he had identified her to us.

By the Chairman:

Q. Did she hear him identify her to you? A. Oh, yes.

Q. And she didn't deny it? A. No she didn't deny it. I asked Mr. Jones if this woman was his wife, and he says yes.

By Mr. Jacobs:

Q. Where was this woman upstairs? A. She was in the room.

Q. What room? A. There was only one room and there was only one bed to accommodate two persons.

Q. Could you observe the condition of that bed? A. That bed was disturbed, and it is my opinion that it had been used by the two of them.

Q. Did you know the name of the man that was there? A. Yes, Mr. Alfred Sabourin.

By the Chairman:

Q. When did you find that out? A. I was there in the afternoon talking with the landlady downstairs. I asked her who was the man upstairs, and she said Mr. and Mrs.—

Then there was an interruption by a question:

But that is hearsay evidence. You must have found it out some other way. A. I was informed by the office he was living there.

Q. Did you hear him called Sabourin upstairs that night? A. I asked him his name.

Q. And he admitted it? A. Yes.

Then they come to the question of dress, of course, and who was wearing what. I think the committee will have noticed that throughout this evidence given by Mr. Paquette—who, as I have indicated, is an investigator—nowhere does he say where they went that evening. He was asked what he saw, and did he see this woman upstairs; he said she was in the room; he was asked what room, and he said there was only one room and only one bed. We do not get to the question of where they went, what was the address, or anything else.

Perhaps in this regard we are entitled to wonder whether the address existed, inasmuch as they could not find Mr. Sabourin later, and yet swore that they did. Mr. Chairman, if I look a little further here—

Mr. Fulton: You might find something juicy.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Order. I wonder whether the hon. member can assist the Chair as to how this is relevant to the discussion. I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member, but I think he is wandering rather far from his original intention of trying to show that some offence has been committed in which the Minister of Justice would have some interest. I do not think the hon. member would go to the extent of casting a reflection on the proceedings of the other place.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I hope you are not inviting me to do that, because we could be here for some time following that particular course. I think this is quite germane to the discussion under way and to the announced responsibility which the minister has assumed and yet declines to accept.

It is the accepted responsibility of the minister to transmit to the attorney general of the province concerned any allegation of perjury. I am seeking to show there is an offence of perjury here, first by someone swearing an affidavit that he served documents on a person at a particular address, which address does not in fact exist; and second by making reference to the evidence taken before the committee. I admit that the Minister of Justice should have done this in the first place; he should have looked at this particular bill and others, in his role as custodian of the rights and freedoms of people. I submit that had the minister done this he would have seen that question of perjury does arise in this case.

We again get to the question of not being able to find the address at which this couple were supposed to have been discovered. The committee will recall from previous occasions on which we have discussed these matters that invariably the private detective says the address was such and such, the street was such and such, the time was 11.35, the lights were on, and gives all the intricate details about what was found.

I am attempting to show that nothing was found here, because nothing existed; that this is one of those instances of a put-up job and is an attempt to mislead the Senate divorce committee, the House of Commons, the miscellaneous private bills committee and His Excellency the Governor General when he comes to give royal assent to this particular bill. It is an attempt to mislead us into thinking certain conditions existed and certain things took place, when in fact they did not. I think it is one of the functions of the Minister of Justice to examine these particular bills.

I again quote from the typescript of the evidence in this regard to prove my point. I will now read from the evidence of Mr. Jones.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Again, I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member but I think he is going too far in that he is bringing before this committee a matter upon which he asks the minister to make a judicial decision regarding whether a proceeding was right or wrong.

Having regard to the ruling made earlier, I think the hon. member is within his rights in bringing to the attention of the minister a matter which he felt had caused an injustice or a wrong. However, having done that I think it is up to the minister to take whatever action he considers appropriate in referring the matter to whatever authority he may think proper. I think the hon. member is going beyond that point in reading into the record evidence of the proceedings of another place, discussing it and in effect endeavouring to make this committee take part in a judicial inquiry, which is not part of the matter before us.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I submit with deference, before your ruling becomes final, that by reading the affidavit sworn by Mr. Golden, where the address mentioned does not exist, I have shown that there is a question, or certainly an allegation of perjury in this matter.

Second, I wish to make reference to the evidence taken on oath before the committee of the other place to show that other facts should be investigated. That is why I seek to read from the evidence given before that committee, to bring to the attention of the minister another instance of possible perjury which should be examined. If I may be allowed to proceed—

Mr. Churchill: On the point of order, I think the committee will have to be very clear about this: if it is permissible to read evidence given before the committee of the other place it will become permissible to read other transactions which occur in the other place, and to my knowledge that has never been the practice of the House of Commons.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): That has been my concern as the hon. member has read on. I can see there may be some justification under our rules for his bringing this matter to the attention of the minister as something which may require investigation, but when it is considered that the bill itself is not before the committee I am concerned lest the matter should go too far and fall outside the terms of the business before us today. I think this whole matter is one for the house, if it wishes, to consider further when the particular bill concerned is up for consideration. In my opinion, having brought this question to the attention of the minister and having pointed out to him the existence of conflicting affidavits which, he alleges, amount to perjury, he has gone as far as he can under our rules. If he were to continue he would open up a discussion upon lines which the precedents governing this house do not allow.

Mr. Howard: If I understand your ruling I shall not be able to make reference to evidence given before the committee of the other place in order to show that a possibility of perjury exists.

[The Acting Chairman.]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I would suggest that it is not for the hon. member, today, to prove that the evidence is right or wrong. He has brought the matter to the attention of the minister for investigation. Whether the hon. member is right or wrong is something for another forum to decide. I would further suggest that the time to make the allegations he has made would be when the bill is before this house or before the committee; the committee will be perfectly right to decide on the evidence given whether the allegations are true or not.

What is, in effect, being done now, is to attempt to have a trial of that case in the course of our consideration of the estimates of the Department of Justice. I think that would be an improper precedent to set. In my opinion, in bringing this matter to the attention of the minister, alleging that there is something wrong, and making some references for the minister's guidance, the hon. member has gone as far as he can.

Mr. Howard: There is one other point. Originally, the reference to the possibility of perjury related to one Harry Golden who declared himself to be a bailiff. The second instance relates to someone other than Harry Golden, a person who gave evidence under oath. I was attempting to proceed with the allegation of perjury in the second instance.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): I think that would be taking the subject beyond the scope of the administrative responsibility of the minister, since proceedings in the other place would be involved. I think the hon. member has made his point and I trust he will not persist in following his present line.

Mr. Howard: With all due deference, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I am prevented from bringing before the committee this other case where perjury is alleged and some evidence taken under oath to show that the possibility of perjury existed, then with due respect I feel I must appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the acting chairman of the committee made the following report:

Mr. Speaker, in committee of supply when the estimates of the Department of Justice were being considered I ruled that the reading and discussion of evidence taken before the Senate committee on divorce were not relevant to the administrative responsibility of the Minister of Justice. Whereupon the hon. member for Skeena appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling of the chairman of the committee of supply. In committee of supply, when the estimates of the Department of Justice were being considered the chairman ruled that the reading and discussion of evidence taken before the Senate committee on divorce were not relevant to the administrative responsibility of the Minister of Justice. Whereupon the hon. member for Skeena appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

Martin (Timmins)

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to a problem and ask you to give it your consideration. The procedure of the house is that it is obligatory for five members to rise if a vote is to be called. I would ask you to consider very carefully whether, when that is done, members who have insisted on a vote should not be present when the vote is taken.

The situation is that five members of the C.C.F. party obliged the house to have a vote and yet only three were here when the vote was taken. I think this is possibly a new point and you may not wish to rule on it immediately but perhaps you would give it consideration and advise the house at a later date as to what rule should be maintained under these circumstances.

Mr. Howard: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that a number of members of parliament are absent from the house from time to time and no question is raised as to their absence. No question is raised why particular members are absent or others are present, and I submit that the same should be true in these circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the point the Minister of Veterans Affairs makes as a point of order is that if a member takes part in insisting on a recorded vote his obligation is to remain and see the vote through. It is a novel point and I shall take it under consideration.

And the house having resumed in committee:

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, if I remember rightly, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) stated in reply to a question put to him by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes), that it is not customary for the minister to make a statement at the outset of the examination of his estimates.

It seems to me that the Minister of Justice is not only the custodian and administrator of our laws, but that he should be an innovator in this sense that he should keep abreast of all possible reforms in an effort to remedy the problems of our society and also to protect the citizens of this country as well as possible.

That is why I felt it would have been most interesting to hear the minister speak of the numerous problems which the government is considering at present. Indeed, I intend to say a few words about a few of those problems.

I hope that when he closes the debate on item 1 which deals with the administration of his department, the minister will be kind enough to tell us what the government is doing and intends to do to implement those suggestions.

First of all, I should like to comment on a suggestion I made at least two years ago. I come back on this subject whenever I have the opportunity of doing so. I am speaking of the amendments which should be made to the Criminal Code concerning firearms.

I repeat what I said a few days past, namely that I, for one, was extremely disappointed when the minister informed us a week or two ago, that the government is not ready to introduce, at this session, amendments to make more stringent the requirements for allowing a person to carry a firearm and for greater control over their possession. He added that the government is not even ready to introduce amendments to prevent firearms to be sold as freely as they are today.

We are here first of all to protect society. We are here also to take all preventive measures, including the strictest legislation possible, to prevent honest citizens from being at the mercy of criminals.

I see here, in an article of La Presse for March 8, 1961, that the chiefs of police association of Canada sent the minister a brief on the various problems they consider most urgent.

One of the first problems considered urgent by that association is this and I quote their first recommendation:

> That people found in possession of loaded firearms, when they commit, or will commit, or have committed, a criminal offence be subject to five years imprisonment.

I do not quite see why we tolerate that individuals, arrested while in possession of firearms that are usually loaded, people with very long criminal records, can get away with it by paying a minimum fine. I said—and I repeat—that, whenever an individual who has served a sentence in prison is subsequently arrested and found in possession of a firearm, our legislation should, for such an offence, provide a minimum prison sentence without the alternative of a fine.

And I repeat what I said a few days ago on the subject. The attorneys general of the provinces had the right idea on the problem.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

As a matter of fact, renewals of permits have been refused in most cases in the province of Quebec.

I trust that the Minister of Justice will encourage such action by communicating with attorneys general of the other provinces to ensure that permits for carrying firearms would be granted only in exceptional cases. He is well aware that, in the United Kingdom, for instance, even constables are not armed, while some members of the police force are required to leave their firearms at headquarters when they quit work for the day and pick them up again the next day before going on duty. All this means that as a deterrent to crime, it is extremely important that such amendments, which are requested by our judges, be adopted as soon as possible.

How many times do we read in the press that judges blame lawmakers for not being stricter when preparing legislation by providing a penalty which might stop many crimes from being committed.

Mr. Chairman, let us go on to another matter.

Hon. members will recall that during the first session of 1958, the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) caused a certain amount of sensation in the house by raising, for the first time, the problem of goof balls.

I have here an article published in La Presse of Saturday, April 22, 1961, of which I would like to read out a few lines. It describes what is meant by a goof ball. After talking the matter over with several of my colleagues in the house, I found that several of them were not familiar with this problem. I therefore, think it would be quite useful to read here a few lines explaining the nature of these barbiturates known as goof balls.

> The report first describes the nature of goof balls. Technically, goofballs include a variety of well-known drugs of common medical use. However, by reason of their association with other drugs or of being mixed with other substances such as alcohol or by reason of their consumption in large doses, those drugs acquire special properties and cause peculiar phenomena of psychic stimulation or depression.

And in the same issue of La Presse, here are some recommendations which I think are very much to the point:

> To summarize the situation, even in these brief terms, is to summarize the recommendation of the municipal sub-committee: amendments should be made to the criminal code and to the federal food and drugs act in order to bring barbiturates under the same control, the same regulations and the same penalties as narcotics.
> The investigation which has just been conducted in Montreal, while brief and incomplete, should be enough to prompt the federal authorities to initiate the required legislative and punitive measures without delay.

In my view, the recommendation that barbiturates be assimilated to narcotics and drugs would, for the time being, be an efficient remedy, provided we could organize increased supervision in all provinces, as well as educational facilities, particularly for young people, and also a rehabilitation program for those who are already addicted to barbiturates.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal for a few brief moments with a matter that is very close to my heart: rehabilitation. In my view, we have made tremendous progress in that field. Up to the moment when the inmate leaves the penitentiary, I think we have made tremendous strides in preparing him to go back to civil life. I do feel, however, and I speak on the basis of experience, that a rehabilitation program is completely useless if, when the inmate is given his freedom, we cannot offer him a job that will enable him to live a normal life.

There is no point in fooling ourselves. We must face the fact that an inmate who leaves the penitentiary with the idea of "going straight"—having had the benefit of the advice of our rehabilitation experts—will more often than not go back to crime eventually, because society has not yet understood his problem. When I say society, I mean industry, the government, indeed everybody, because there is still a complete lack of understanding of the problem of the ex-convict.

I have here an article from the Star for May 4, 1960, in which there is a very good description of the opinion I am now voicing, and I quote:

(Text):

Convict rehabilitation a two-part job.

They are tactful about it, but spokesmen for the justice department talking about what is being done in the way of penal reform rarely fail to put in their word for what we may label extra-penal reform. That is the necessary change in attitude on the part of the public toward the man—or woman—released after discharge of his "debt to society". If his community won't make a place for him, then the effort put into preparing him to play a useful part is rather apt to have been made for nothing. And year by year the justice department is releasing men better prepared to justify public trust.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I referred earlier to the public's lack of understanding for the ex-convict. I think that we can plead guilty to this charge. I should like to tell you briefly about an actual case that I witnessed last year in my practice and which shows, much better than I could, this lack of understanding even on the part of certain civil servants.

I shall give no names, of course, but I would be willing to do so on request.

A youth of 18, charged with armed robbery, was brought before the court for the first time in his life. After the young man admitted his crime, the judge, who was very understanding, summoned him to his office and told him: I shall give you a chance. You have good parents. You never had any trouble with the law before, and I'll give you a chance if you want to enlist in the army. This young man then came to see me. I sent him to army headquarters in Montreal but, before leaving he asked: What am I going to say to them if they want to know whether I have ever been convicted? And I answered: Start right now to tell the truth; tell them exactly what happened.

The young man went to army headquarters. He passed the exams but at a certain point, when asked whether he had ever been convicted, he honestly admitted it, whereupon the army officer told him: That is really just too bad, but we cannot accept you. If you had said that you had never been convicted, we would have taken you on, and no further inquiry would have been made.

Well, the conduct of this officer seemed quite extraordinary to me. Of course, I do not want to give the impression that the army should be a haven for people in the process of rehabilitation but, in such a case, when a judge feels that a young man is in the right disposition for rehabilitation, I wonder why the army should refuse him.

By that, I mean that all this rehabilitation work fostered by the minister is bound to come to naught unless people are prepared to give a chance to men who have served time. I think a press campaign should be launched in this country, so that, in industry and in all places where it is possible, an ex-convict may have an opportunity to start a new life and prove that he wants to keep out of trouble.

Mr. Chairman, let us now turn to another matter. I wonder if the minister is aware that a while back a Toronto manufacturer of pharmaceutical products was fined for selling contraceptives. May I bring to the attention of the minister the content of section 150 of the Criminal Code, subsection (2) (c) of which reads as follows:

Every one commits an offence who offers to sell, advertises, publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method of preventing conception or causing abortion or miscarriage.

Furthermore, I wish to call the attention of the minister to subsection (3) which reads:

No person shall be convicted of an offence under this section if he establishes that the public good was served by the acts that are alleged to constitute the offence and that the acts alleged did not extend beyond what served the public good.

Now, I am wondering whether it would not be advisable to revise that article of the Criminal Code to prohibit in the future the sale of those contraceptives unless prescribed by a physician.

I would appreciate it if at the end of my remarks the minister would say a word on that matter, and if he would tell us whether the problem has ever been taken up with him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of the bill we examined yesterday, we were denied the right to refer to particular methods of capital punishment. I would like to say only a word about it here, because if I should be out of order in doing so now, I do not know when I might have a chance to take up that point at some other time.

I would urge the minister, since it is not too late for that, to consider the possibility of amending Bill C-92 to provide for some form of capital punishment other than hanging.

I fail to see why the government should not make use of the report of the joint committee of the House of Commons and of the Senate to abolish our present practice of putting condemned criminals to death by hanging.

I think there would be almost complete unanimity in this house if the minister were to apply the conclusions of this report concerning the method of execution.

I hope that between now and Monday, when we resume the discussion of this bill in committee, he will be in a position perhaps to introduce an amendment to his bill providing for some new method of capital punishment.

Mr. Chairman, I made a request yesterday and I take this opportunity, when these estimates are before us, to repeat it today, but I shall be very brief.

I again urge the minister to refer Bill C-92 to a special committee of the house where the Canadian Bar Association could be invited—

An hon. Member: Order, order.

Mr. Deschatelets: —might be invited to tell us what they think about it.

My hon. friend just called out: order. I do not wish to dwell any longer on that. However, I hope this request I am making again, which seems wise to me, will be taken into serious consideration.

Last year, when we considered the bill of rights, we set up a special committee of the house and then we came up before the committee of the whole; and heaven knows that if there was some similarity between the original bill and the one which was reported later, it was purely accidental.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, I should like, in closing, to say only a few words about the law relating to divorce.

I have no intention of going into details on the question of divorce. I will simply say this to the minister in his capacity as Attorney General and legal adviser to the cabinet: this divorce issue had left the House of Commons for the Senate; it is now back with us. We have fallen from the frying pan into the fire and we are facing a serious problem. When the minister replies to our suggestions, I wonder whether he would inform us on the stand which the government intends to take in respect of this question of divorce.

I shall say no more—

The Chairman: Order. I am very pleased that the hon. member states his intention of not making any other comment on this point, for he has already gone too far.

I have already indicated that this problem is not the responsibility of the minister but of the house.

We are now considering the department's estimates.

(Text):

Mr. McGee: It had been my intention to rise this evening merely to comment on the impressive program initiated by the Minister of Justice in the field of penal reform, but I cannot let pass the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. This great humanitarian who, I notice, voted against the bill which was presented to the house yesterday, presumably because he did not think the application of the death penalty should be limited, in a burst of compassion this evening decided that he wants to extend to human beings the same methods that this house voted to provide for the slaughter of animals a few years ago. I must say I am unimpressed by this sudden concern. The hon. member also made reference to special committees and I think if I were in his party I, too, would want to send out for a lot of experts and a lot of help. It is obviously a continuing process over there—

Mr. Deschatelets: We would not call on you, I am sure.

Mr. McGee: It seems to me that the members of this house are perfectly capable of processing this bill, as they have proved capable of processing other measures and bills over the years.

Coming back, now, to my original purpose in rising this evening, I want to discuss the impressive program of penal reform which is being carried on by the present administration under the guidance of the Minister of Justice. I had the opportunity to examine some of our penal institutions at first hand not too many months ago. I had occasion to visit the city of Kingston and Queen's University and I took advantage, while I was in that city, of the opportunity to visit two institutions, the Joyceville medium security institution just outside the city, and that great monument to the reform instincts of the Liberal party, the women's prison in Kingston.

I should like to tell members something of my experience in visiting first the Joyceville institution, the medium security institution containing prisoners carefully selected as being prisoners who are deemed to be the best risk and to offer the greatest opportunity for reform and rehabilitation. This, as I say, is a medium security institution. The degree of control on the part of the guards is roughly equivalent to that of a foreman in charge of a work gang. In effect the work gangs, or work groups, were, when I saw them, leaving through the open front door of the institution and proceeding down to the side of the highway, highway No. 15, I think it is, which passes by the gate, on their way to perform various tasks connected with the prison farm, bush clearing and other outdoor activities. The institution itself is obviously adequately staffed, and supervision is as strict as it has to be. The point is that some individuals of very substantial size were wandering about in relative freedom to pursue their tasks. They were putting in a full working day and within the prison itself the main endeavour was to provide to many of the prisoners who had little or no useful experience in earning a living, the opportunity to learn a trade, to operate machine shops, tailoring shops and so on. Here is a forward looking, progressive policy in practice, and it makes so much sense that there is little serious area for criticism.

The contrast between this medium security institution and the women's institution in Kingston is, to say the least, striking. At Joyceville I had seen a burly 200 pounder walking through an open gate. At Kingston there were endless barricades, walls 40 feet high fortified with barbed wire, oak doors and bars in series, bars strong enough to resist the charge of a herd of elephants, all to be passed through before one encounters a woman prisoner who would not have weighed more than 100 pounds soaking wet. The contrast between the open door and the animal cage was striking.

The person presently in charge of that institution was reluctant that I should visit the institution, and after I had completed my visit I could understand why. She had recently taken over the institution and was in the process of initiating some very constructive and effective measures. She was reluctant to allow me to inspect the buildings because she was in the midst of effecting these changes, and felt that if my visit was deferred two or three months, she would then be able to impress me with the efficiency and effectiveness of the operation. While I appreciate the feelings of that lady, I am pleased I had the opportunity at that time of seeing exactly what the situation was. There was, at that time, enough evidence of the previous arrangement remaining to impress me with the hopelessness of the situation as it existed before the introduction of these new methods, effected by that enlightened lady under this present administration.

There used to be at that institution a school to teach the inmates hairdressing. The female inmates were being taught how to earn an honest living at some considerable expense and effort. This school was finally discontinued because graduates, when they applied for jobs upon their release, although qualified, were refused.

I am pleased to say that, with the opening of the new building, there are now classes held in special rooms designed and equipped to teach the inmates different trades. It is my considered opinion that the old arrangement, which was an exercise in futility, has been replaced by a productive and beneficial arrangement whereby the inmates are able to learn typing, shorthand, bookkeeping, accounting and the like, and upon discharge are able to be placed in good positions. Classes in academic education also take place now at this institution in an attempt to bring the average education of the inmates up to a grade 6 level.

I should also like to mention that there is a laundry operating in the institution which has, over the years, looked after the laundry needs of the institution itself as well as neighbouring men's institutions and which worked a four hour day. Obviously this is an appropriate occupation for women prisoners but I wonder about the effectiveness of having the prisoners work only a four hour day in terms of preparing them for useful occupations after release. There is also a shirt factory in the institution which worked on the basis of a four hour day. Women who have worked there and who upon release sought employment in shirt factories found themselves unable to sustain the pace of working an industrial eight hour day, after having worked a four hour day for four or five years. As a matter of record, very few have been able to hold their jobs after release. It is my understanding that the inmates only put in a four hour day because the guards were required to escort them from the laundry room to the mess room, to the laundry, and back to their cells. These guards worked only until 5 o'clock in the evening so the inmates had to be returned to their cells before that hour. Apparently the thought of the guards working shifts had never occurred to the officials of that institution, so that a normal seven or eight hour working day could be carried out.

If such a procedure had been followed, perhaps those inmates would have become accustomed to working a long day, and thereby would not have been faced with the sudden change upon their successful placement in a laundry in the outside world. Had this been so, at least some of them might have survived the difficulties of the transitional period from imprisonment to private life. It is unfortunate, though true, that in most cases, inmates released and placed in jobs outside met with unhappy results. I should in all fairness say, with the new programs being instituted in these institutions, the results are much better. I understand there is very little resistance to the increase in the length of the working day, although resistance was anticipated.

I have related some of my impressions of the operation and success thereof, which I found on my visit to this institution. I could take up more time in describing what I term, quite fairly, the dungeon conditions which I found there, such as one basement room in which there was a puddle of water surrounded by 20 or 30 beds. I suggest the existence of those conditions is the reason why the lady, to whom I referred earlier, was so reluctant to let me inspect the institution. However, as I say, the institution was in the midst of a change-over period, and conditions are now much improved. I was very impressed by the before and after picture.

It is quite clear that for at least a quarter of a century, perhaps more, the conditions existing in institutions in this country were completely ignored. I am happy to say that a new program is being carried out with vigour and interest, initiated by the present Minister of Justice and carried out by the officials of the penal institutions that come within federal jurisdiction. This program has had a dramatic impact, particularly in view of the difficulties which were encountered at the commencement of the program.

[Mr. McGee.]

The subject of penal reform has been discussed in this house, as well as by a number of interested individuals outside this house. It was discussed just recently during the debate on capital punishment. I have often heard statements made by uninformed individuals which would have lead me to believe, had I not known better, that a sentence of life imprisonment in these institutions could be likened to a vacation in Florida. That, of course, is not the case. The present program initiated by the Minister of Justice was embarked upon in a constructive way, in an attempt to train the inmates of these institutions, so that upon their release they would be capable of being placed in society in respectable positions and occupations. A great deal of careful planning and thought has gone into the designing of this program. I think the philosophy behind the project is sound, and that the pattern now being developed is desirable. These programs, plans and policies, however, are only as good, in the final analysis, as the results—the placing of released inmates in gainful and productive forms of employment.

I note an increase in this year's estimates of some $17,000, bringing the total to $167,500 in the form of grants to after-care agencies. The vanguard in this respect is composed, of course, of the John Howard and Elizabeth Fry societies, which are doing an outstanding job in this field. But, as I said before, Mr. Chairman, the work being done, the effort being made, the care and time taken, go for nought if upon release society in effect slams the door in the face of these individuals. This problem is, of course, aggravated in time of economic recession and, I suppose, according to the season of the year when release takes place. I think it behooves us as members of parliament, regardless of political party, to act within our capacities as ambassadors for the minister's programs and the programs instituted by these after-care organizations. If the first few doors are slammed in the face of the released inmate, we are simply and obviously increasing the possibility of recidivism, of having the released prisoner back in our institutions.

Finally, I think the most impressive feature of the minister's program of penal reform is that not only does it make sense but it actually saves the taxpayers, you and I, Mr. Chairman, money in the long run. This can be and has been demonstrated to be a fact from the point of view of cost to the state itself.

I hope that at some time during consideration of the minister's estimates he will shed further light on the question of life imprisonment and the implications thereof. There is a theory abroad, erroneous, I believe, and I hope the minister will confirm me in my belief, that the frothing, foaming criminal guilty of a murder or a series of murders, who is found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment, will be invited, if not encouraged, in a relatively few years to come back into society. Quite understandably fear has been expressed by members of the house and persons throughout the country that men of this type would be virtually invited to go free to kill again.

From the information I have gained in other quarters it is my impression that in our institutions at the present time there are persons who are serving sentences of life imprisonment and that for all practical purposes the sentence will be just that, life imprisonment. I say "for all practical purposes" because it seems to me that, in terms of the threat to society and the safety of society, when the person is aged, infirm and sick, literally not strong enough to harm himself let alone anyone else, there is no useful purpose in extracting the full sentence of life imprisonment and keeping such a person in hospital behind bars rather than in hospital on the other side of the bars. I hope the minister will clarify that matter for me and for the fairly large section of the public who, I believe, are under an erroneous impression concerning the effect of life imprisonment. As I said before, it is my belief that the person who clearly represents a threat to society or a likely threat to society if released simply is not released. Finally, Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the minister on the part of the program I have followed with interest and examined at first hand and at the same time to wish him well in his future activities in this field.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I noted with interest that the hon. member for York-Scarborough was interested primarily in the penitentiary program and, indeed, he discussed some aspects thereof. As I indicated to the committee at the commencement of discussion of my estimates today, it is my intention to make a general statement by way of a progress report on our correction and reform program when we reach the penitentiary item, and I would hope, therefore, that we might have a discussion of this matter on that item. Since it appears to me to be the fact that members are beginning to turn their attention to that matter, possibly they might be prepared to conclude the general discussion on the first item and perhaps it might be timely if I were to reply now to some of the remarks that have been made on that item so that we can proceed with the specific items in the estimates.

The hon. member for Hochelaga commenced his remarks by drawing attention to the fact that there is an appreciable increase in the expenditure we are asking for this year compared with 1957, and there is no doubt that he is correct in drawing attention to that fact. I would, however, draw to his attention, and to the attention of the other members of the committee, that the main increase in expenditure consists primarily of the increase in the penitentiaries branch, the parole board and the salaries of the officers of the department, the penitentiaries branch and the other administrative boards that are under the general heading of the Department of Justice.

With respect to salaries, I point out that there have been two increases authorized by the civil service commission and approved by the government since 1957, that is, since the date with which the hon. member was making his comparison. I would draw his attention particularly to the fact that this increase in total expenditure by no means indicates that we are getting less value for the money that is being spent. Indeed, in my submission, we are getting more value. I would, for instance, direct his attention to the fact that under the penitentiaries branch—I am not going to discuss this in particular but this is an illustration of what I have in mind—the item for administration this year is $14,912 less than it was last year although the penitentiaries branch is spending more money this year than last year under such items as construction and maintenance. This is the pattern we have endeavoured, I believe successfully, to institute in the department.

There are certain things which are recognized as uncontrollable expenditures. If you have an increase in salaries authorized, then your salary item goes up. If you have an increase in your over-all activities, if you have a program which has the general approval and support of the house and the country and on which you must spend more money than previously, your estimates are going to reflect that increase.

The fact of the matter is that although the program has increased very considerably the proportionate amount being spent for administration has, as in the case of the penitentiaries branch, generally speaking been reduced, so that the country is getting better value for the money in part because the program is sounder than was the case before. One of the reasons why the over-all expenditure of the department has increased is, of course, that under this department there are being performed functions and activities which were not being carried out before. I have referred to the establishment of the national parole board, and I refer also to the new correctional reform program. Both of these represent programs for which the country had had a very real need over the past years but which were not implemented until within the last two or three years.

Then, the hon. member referred to the increase in the number of legal officers, senior advisory counsel, and so on, within the department. I think the committee might be interested to know that the Department of Justice services the whole of the government of Canada, services all the departments. This work, of course, includes legal advice and counsel offered by the minister to his colleagues in the cabinet, opinions given by my deputy minister to the administrative heads of departments, assistance in particular matters given by my officers to their opposite numbers in other departments, litigation conducted on behalf of the government of Canada, the work of the criminal law section, which has responsibility for the general supervision of the Criminal Code, and those fields in which the federal government must take action under that code, and includes the legislation section, which is charged with the responsibility of the drafting of bills which are submitted by the government to this house. All of this work that I have mentioned, and much work that I have not mentioned, is carried on for the government of Canada with a total staff of 40 legal officers.

I think that if the committee will stop to reflect for a moment on the volume of work that must be done by the Department of Justice for the government of Canada, which means the people of Canada, they will realize that a staff of 40 legal officers is a very reasonable staff indeed with which to carry on that work. This number includes all the legal officers in the department from the deputy minister down. It is quite true that there has been a relatively modest increase in the number of legal officers employed by the department since 1957. One reason for this is that we have adopted, as a conscious policy, the practice of conducting more litigation, actually having the prosecution of more cases in the courts by our officers, rather than employing outside counsel.

I am not suggesting for a moment that we have adopted the practice of employing no outside counsel. We still retain and will continue to retain large numbers of outside counsel as agents of the Department of Justice in that litigation. We are, especially in certain fields, and I am thinking particularly here of important taxation cases as well as constitutional cases, endeavouring to have our own officers carry more of the litigation burden. May I give an example? For instance, in the year 1960, officers of the department took 90 cases in the courts, supreme court, exchequer court, tariff board or provincial courts, which occupied 145 full days. The cost of this litigation to the government when carried out by departmental officers is, of course, less than the cost would be if we had retained outside counsel for all those cases.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: I must of course emphasize that, in addition to the work they did as counsel in court, all these officers were doing other departmental work as well.

Mr. Benidickson: My question to the minister was simply to wonder at this point, since he has statistics about this enlargement of the role of crown employees in actual court cases, if he also had avalaible for the committee information as to the expenditure by the department for the engagement of outside counsel on a comparative basis for some years back?

Mr. Fulton: I believe that for an answer to that question I would have to refer my hon. friend to the tabulation in the back of the estimates book under the heading "Professional and Special Services", column 4. I say this because, while all litigation on behalf of the government of Canada is conducted under instructions by the Department of Justice, the fact is that this litigation is conducted on behalf of the departments concerned and the cost of litigation is charged to the department. It is not, therefore, reflected in our estimates. The total is reflected in that item.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister give the figure for 1961-62, with his proposal in front of us for that kind of expenditure?

Mr. Fulton: I have just explained the reason why I am not able to give the total with respect to the Department of Justice. If, for instance, we prosecute a taxation case for the Department of National Revenue, we may well retain outside counsel but then the cost of that litigation is charged to that department. Similarly, if we prosecute a case or conduct a case on behalf of the Department of Transport, the cost of that litigation would be charged to that department. I am not able to give a precise figure. It is not reflected in the estimates of the Department of Justice.

The point I am making is that the extent to which we carry on litigation by our own officers, represents a substantial saving to the government and the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Hochelaga advanced by way of criticism the suggestion that there is not, in the Department of Justice, a sufficiently high proportion of senior officers who are connected with the bar of the province of Quebec. This is a suggestion which I reject absolutely, and I am able to bring proof to support my statement. As I have said, there is a total of 40 legal officers in the Department of Justice. Of this total, 10 are members of the Quebec bar. In other words, one quarter of all the officers of the Department of Justice are qualified civil lawyers and members of the bar of the province of Quebec. At the deputy minister, associate or assistant deputy minister level, may I point out that we do have now a member of the bar of Quebec as associate deputy minister, one of the very senior officers of the department.

The department is now organized so that we have a deputy minister, two associate deputies and two assistant deputies. The position of associate deputy was created last year by an act approved by this house creating two such positions. We appointed to one of those positions a member of the bar of Quebec, a former director of studies in the faculty of law in the University of Ottawa. I therefore think I can say without fear of contradiction that this department recognizes full well, as indeed we should, the importance of having at our disposal and in the employ of the government of Canada a proper proportion of officers who are qualified members of the bar of Quebec with knowledge of the civil code. Indeed, we have a separate and complete section to deal with problems arising out of our field of responsibility under the civil code in the province of Quebec.

In connection with the question of whether or not there has been an unwarranted increase in senior officers, may I also point out to the committee that in 1957 and for several years prior thereto there were a deputy minister and three assistant deputy ministers, one of whom was a member of the Quebec bar. At the present time there are one deputy minister, two associate deputy ministers and two assistants. The picture is therefore not quite that which was presented by the hon. member for Hochelaga. There has not been an increase of two. There has been, in fact, an increase of only one in the senior levels of our department and I think a much more rational and logical approach to the problem of organization of the department.

Then I come to the question that was referred to by the hon. member for Hochelaga and by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, namely the matter of the control of firearms. That is an extremely difficult question. We have had it under active study for over a year now. We have had an interdepartmental committee working on it.

Last year we referred the whole question, with certain informal suggestions arrived at by that committee, to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation, criminal law section, at their meeting prior to the Canadian Bar Association meeting of last year. That conference was unable to arrive at any concrete and agreed point of view so the matter is still before us. We are examining the views of the association of police chiefs and others and it will be our intention to refer it back to the conference again this year in the hope that we may get an agreed recommendation as to what amendments should be made to the criminal law in this respect.

It will be appreciated that, although the enactment of criminal law is the responsibility of this parliament and therefore this government must take the responsibility for recommendations in that field, the enforcement is the responsibility of the provinces and views on this subject are held by large numbers of bodies including municipal as well as provincial police forces. It is therefore not a subject on which you can arrive overnight at hard and fast conclusions as to what should be done.

However, I would say this and what I have to say here is suggested by some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Hochelaga himself when he pointed out—and I am summarizing his words as I recall them—that the police in Montreal have stated that more than 2,000 persons are in illegal possession of firearms. Without for a moment denying that there may be room for improvement and appropriate amendment to the legislation, I suggest that a large part of the problem relates to enforcement. There are in existence now very definite provisions regarding the registration of firearms, making it illegal to be in possession of firearms that are not appropriately registered. Where you find, as is reported here, a responsible authority saying that more than 2,000 persons are in illegal possession of firearms, I think I am justified in saying or suggesting that the answer does not lie exclusively in another amendment to the Criminal Code. Part of the answer, at any rate, lies in the field of more vigorous enforcement of the existing provisions. Indeed, from my own thought and studies, I am led to suggest that in this matter, as in so many cases, the whole answer does not lie in enacting a criminal statute. The provinces and municipalities have authority now to license persons who may carry on certain businesses. One of the businesses that might be subject to licence—that is the business itself—is the business of selling firearms. As I say, while not for a moment denying that there may be, and indeed there is, room for improvement in the Criminal Code of general application, I suggest that there is also very definite reason for our citizens who are concerned in this matter to ask their provincial and municipal authorities to look at their own responsibility and their own fields of jurisdiction and to ascertain whether in fact, there is not room for some improvement and control within these fields of jurisdiction.

Another matter that was of concern to several hon. members and particularly the hon. member for Hochelaga and the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont was that of goof balls. I should here emphasize the fact that this matter has been under study for some time. As far as I personally am concerned, it came forcibly to my attention first during the course of a visit to Halifax early in 1958, when, if I recall the events correctly, there had been, if not a death, then certainly some outbreak of violence, which was attributed to the sale to and the use by juveniles of goof balls. Ever since that time the matter has been increasingly of concern. I immediately raised it with my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare and again, as he has pointed out and as I have pointed out on more than one occasion, an interdepartmental committee was appointed and it has been studying the matter in the meantime. As was announced earlier by my colleague our studies are now advanced to the point where we have devised what we believe to be satisfactory legislation that will go a long way towards giving a method of control of this very dangerous situation. That legislation will be introduced into this house by my colleague, as I understand it, within a matter of the next few days or probably at the latest within another week. I hope the house will find that it represents a great forward step in the control of the problem of goof balls.

I recognize the fact that it is a matter of years since the problem first began to be discussed and first began to be one of real concern to municipal and other responsible agencies. I can only say that in fields such as this effective and acceptable legislation is not a matter of hasty drafting or hasty enactment. Here you are dealing with a problem of drugs, namely barbiturates which, legally and properly used are perfectly proper and legal and indeed salutary medicinal aids. You therefore do not enact out of hand and without consideration legislation which will make their use illegal or ban them in certain circumstances and in certain cases. Legislation of this type requires exhaustive and careful study and consultation between representatives of the department of health and welfare, the medical profession, the police and other enforcement agencies, municipal bodies, licensing bodies and so on before you can come up with a statute which you can with confidence recommend to the House of Commons as being appropriate legislation to enact. So I have no apologies to make for the time it has taken. I believe we now have satisfactory legislation which will be introduced in a matter of a few days by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

On the question of rehabilitation, which was also referred to by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, I have only this to say. I am in thorough agreement with what he himself said on that score. Indeed our whole penal reform program, designed as it is to enable us to rehabilitate so far as we can the inmates of our institutions, is of greatly diminished value if, having done that, we find that those who leave our institutions as, we hope, better men than when they went in, are not accepted in society. That will undo and negate the whole purpose of the program and I have been at pains in all my public speeches on this matter, wherever appropriate, to emphasize the responsibility of society in this regard as well as the responsibility of government.

The responsibility of government is a responsibility on behalf of society to design and implement effective programs of training and rehabilitation, but we cannot fulfil the role of society itself, which is the role of understanding and of acceptance. What we can do is ensure so far as possible that when a man comes out he is ready to resume his place in society; but unless society is prepared to give him a chance, the best program in the world will be defeated.

All I can say there is that I agree thoroughly with what the hon. member has said and express the hope that as our correctional reform program becomes better understood, and as its results become more obvious, there will be a corresponding and increasing acceptance by society of those who are what I might call the graduates of that program. But with respect to the program itself, as I have said, I would prefer to wait until we reach the penitentiary item, when I shall be able to make what I think will be an interesting and encouraging report to the committee on the progress made to date.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, there are a number of questions I should like to put to the minister, in general covering the area of his responsibility. I should like to start off by asking him what his view of this particular statement is:

"Too often and for too long in this country one of the qualifications of a judge, aside from ability, is political competence... I suggest that a move towards elevating the judiciary would be a declaration by the attorney general and Minister of Justice of the country that from now on, within reasonable limitations, political qualifications shall take second place to ability, capacity, judgment and the possession of the faculties that result in a judiciary so necessary to the maintenance of our security and our freedom".

I suppose the minister recognizes that statement and knows who made it. It was made by the present Prime Minister, in 1948, and it is contained in an editorial in the Gazette of February 7, 1961. I want to ask the minister, in relation to the vacancies and the opportunities which exist, whether he agrees with this point of view expressed by the Prime Minister and whether he can assure us that at least a portion of the judiciary he has appointed or is planning to appoint is not composed primarily of members of the Conservative party.

We would be very interested in knowing, in view of this high-minded statement made by the Prime Minister, whether the minister can indicate if some of them are absolutely not connected in any way with politics. I ask this question just as a matter of interest.

I wish to ask another question in this same field but perhaps from a different point of view. The other day the Associate Minister of National Defence was very candid to us in the house in pointing out that, like the Liberal opposition when they were in power, this government recognized its friends; it could see its friends more quickly than it could its opponents.

In relation to the lawyers that the minister hires, I wonder whether he could give us the assurance that those lawyers who are being hired and who have been hired to handle these various cases of which he gave us statistics are friends of the government in the sense that—well, I think the minister understands the sense in which I speak. I ask this question because so often people say to me, "Why is it that there seem to be so many lawyers in politics?"; meaning, I suppose, not necessarily as active politicians but associated with parties. In all the small towns and smaller cities they seem to form the nucleus of the structure of either the Liberal or the Conservative party. The other day when I was in Peterborough somebody was setting out who the bigshots were in the Liberal and Conservative parties. In each case it seemed to be a little cluster of lawyers.

Mr. Grafftey: What is wrong with Frank Scott?

Mr. Fisher: Someone says, "What is wrong with that?" I am not suggesting there is anything wrong with that, but I am always looking for an explanation to give people who raise these questions. One of the answers I always give is, "Look", as Marx said, "for the cash nexus". It pays a lawyer to be connected with one of the "in" parties, and especially one that is going to be in because he can count on getting some work from them. I just wondered whether the minister could assure us that these fees which are paid to outside lawyers are not only going to lawyers throughout Canada who are friends of the party.

The other question I wanted to ask the minister was this. I wondered whether the minister could give us some report of his negotiations with the attorneys general of the provinces in relation to ways to amend the British North America Act. It is very difficult to understand what is happening by following the press reports, and I do not believe the minister has given the house a comprehensive statement in this regard. It is very difficult for us to appreciate just what are the obstacles and what are the positions of the various parties. I know the minister would not want to interpret what may be the position of Saskatchewan, Quebec or Ontario, but perhaps he could give us some idea of the negotiations which have taken place and what the difficulties seem to be that are preventing a breakthrough.

There is one other point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister, and I must in a sense apologize to him for this. Several years ago when the minister introduced amendments to the Criminal Code relating to obscene publications I was one of those who feared that this could open the door to a great deal of censorship of material that had literary merit. However, so far the legislation has been almost completely ineffective, and I say quite candidly that I am delighted that this is so.

One of the things I have come to appreciate more and more is that if censorship in Canada is to get any real toe-hold it will be done through the Department of National Revenue and the customs officials. I am delighted to see that in this particular area the present minister has been much more liberal than ministers and officials of the previous government. I am not saying this lightly or without any—

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, I wonder what the hon. member means by saying that the legislation has not been effective. Presumably this legislation was designed to keep out smut and salacious literature. If this material is not coming in, the legislation is being effective.

Mr. Fisher: My point with regard to this, as the hon. member knows from what I said last year when the legislation was going through, is that these amendments to the Criminal Code could put into the hands of very narrow minded justices, and particularly magistrates, in provincial jurisdictions powers that would ultimately lead to the censoring of material for the whole country.

I am very pleased to see that, so far as I have been able to find out, there has only been one case. That is in a sense one where there is a really ridiculous element, because I have learned from the publishers that there are at least 250,000 copies of this particular book, D. H. Lawrence's "Lady Chatterley's Lover", in Canada at the present time. I have an estimate by several publishers that there are at least 250,000 copies of that book in Canada. That is a tremendous circulation for any book to achieve at the present time in this country, so it would be really ironical if any judicial process were to lead to the banning of a book so many copies of which are already in existence here.

One of the aspects of smut or pornography with which the legislation was supposed to deal used to obsess the minister a good deal when he was sitting in this house as a private member; I refer to the field of comics, and picture magazines dealing with various sadistic poses and various aspects usually of the female form. I, myself, could wish that the legislation had been more effective in dealing with publications of this type. I know that in Ontario the attorney general has set up a most curious quartet of people whose job it is to advise him as to what is on the newsstands and to examine any material which they believe should be brought to the attention of the attorney general as likely to provide grounds for proceeding, as I understand it, under this part of the Criminal Code. Again according to my understanding of how this arrangement is working out, in over two years this quartet has still not made a single recommendation. I am not being critical of this but I do know they have had huge quantities of these picture magazines before them—all the various things that are put forward as obscene and pornographic—but as yet they have come to no decisions. Some of my more literary friends may say: that is excellent; we are not having any control or censorship, and you should be grateful. But I should like to make a distinction between work with literary or artistic merit, put together within some kind of covers, behind which stand the names of an author and a publisher and the kind of material, particularly of a sadistic nature, which appears in so many of those so-called men's magazines.

I am certainly not suggesting that we do not need this particular amendment any longer, but I should like to hear from the minister some comment concerning the operation of this section of the Criminal Code and perhaps some explanation from him as to why it has been generally ineffective. It may seem paradoxical that I should welcome the effectiveness of the section as far as books are concerned while being a little disturbed by its lack of effectiveness in the field or men's magazines or the sadistic kind of monthly pot boilers.

Another point I should like to make underlines the reason why in my opinion the minister should give the committee an explanation. If he would recall what he said when he introduced this change in the Criminal Code, I think he will remember using the argument that one reason for this change was that it would lead to the removal of pulp trash from the newsstands. That was the main objective, as I recall it, of the change which was made at that time. I think that is a fair paraphrase of the position he took; the account which appeared in the Globe and Mail, at least, confirms my recollection. For this reason I should like to know how this legislation is working out in practice. I realize that the minister could say that this, after all, is something which must be worked out under provincial jurisdiction by the provincial authorities themselves, but it seems to me that to take such an attitude would not be good enough in the light of the promises the minister made at the time the change was introduced. He cannot now wash his hands of what was done. Perhaps he will be able to correct my impression that the amendment is not working very well, but in any case I think he owes the committee an explanation of what is happening.

There are some further remarks I should like to make in relation to the R.C.M.P. and to the Combines Investigation Act but I will wait until the appropriate point is reached in our study of the estimates. I must say, however, that I was startled by the minister's remarks reported from Toronto the other day to the effect—if I may paraphrase them—"please, Mr. Fulton, keep a file on me and some day I shall be able to show how innocent I am". There is an irony in this which I hope the minister will explain when we come to the estimates of the R.C.M.P. I should also like to ask the minister if he would consider giving an explanation which he has come close to making a couple of times in past years about not what is in the file but how the files are retired in so far as the security investigation branch is concerned. It seems to me the minister indicated three or four sessions ago that work was going along to develop a new standard of appraisal of the files which are kept. I should like to hear later from the hon. gentleman what he has to say on this subject.

Mr. Jung: Mr. Chairman, I wish at the beginning of my remarks to congratulate the Minister of Justice on the recent announcements which he has made regarding the adoption of a new attitude towards the rehabilitation of criminals. This enlightened attitude towards inmates serving their sentence in penal institutions deserves great praise because rehabilitation is emphasized and the positive aspect of penal servitude is stressed. I can appreciate the research which is being done by the Department of Justice into all phases of crime and delinquency and I commend the minister for the vigorous leadership which he has given in instituting these long needed studies and reforms. Notwithstanding the great amount of research which has been done into the problems of crime and delinquency, I feel that there is one area in which we still have insufficient information and that is in the field of drug addiction.

The minister will remember that last year, during the discussions of his estimates, I took the opportunity to put on record my grave concern about this problem. I pointed out that out of some 3,400 drug addicts in Canada, half are found in British Columbia and more particularly in the city of Vancouver, and most of their activities appear to revolve around a certain area in my riding of Vancouver Centre.

I mentioned then that there appeared to be a growing number of juvenile addicts. In 1957 for example, there were 25 teenagers in Canada who were drug addicts. In 1958, there were 47, and in 1959 the number had increased to 55. British Columbia had the dubious distinction of having the majority of those teen-age addicts because of the figure of 55, 46 are to be found in my province. I also said and I quote:

> It would appear therefore that apart from teenager addicts there is some tendency towards stabilization in the number of addicts.

I expressed concern for the growing number of teen-age addicts last year and I am afraid that my fears have been justified because in the fifth annual report covering 1960-61 of the narcotic addiction foundation of British Columbia in Vancouver, British Columbia, the report of the director to the chairman of the board of directors disclosed that the number of young people voluntarily seeking help from the foundation had increased from the previous year. This is what the director's report had to say, and I quote:

> The age groups of under 20, and 20-25 years showed an increased percentage of the total, and would tend to confirm the impression that the age of onset of addiction is being reduced, i.e., younger people are being more exposed to addicting drugs than they were say five to ten years ago.

A questionnaire compiled by the foundation which was completed by 330 young people in Vancouver revealed information which is disquieting in its implications. For example, 19.5 per cent of the 18 year old males admitted having had the opportunity of using heroin. Of all the persons questioned, 56 per cent stated that they had had their opportunity to use heroin when they were drinking.

The questionnaire created some controversy in Vancouver, and some quarters have questioned the interpretation of the results of that questionnaire. Without entering into the merits of the argument, I feel that the foundation should be congratulated for having the courage to persist in conducting research into this most complicated problem.

The 330 young people who received the questionnaire included persons in the 15 to 18 year old group. Some of the information gained is startling. For example, 12.9 per cent of the 17 year old girls believe that there is no harm in occasionally using heroin, and to the question "Have you had an opportunity to use heroin yourself?", 5.9 per cent of the females aged 16, 11.6 per cent of males aged 17, and 19.5 per cent of males aged 18 replied "Yes".

Another question was included dealing with the availability of illegal drugs. It asked "Do you think you could get some narcotic drug illegally if you wanted to?" To this question 47.9 per cent of 16 year old males, 38.9 per cent of 17 year old females and 66.6 per cent of 18 year old males replied "Yes". These figures are alarming, and I hope there will be an opportunity to conduct a more comprehensive program of education and research.

The Vancouver Sun on May 3, 1961 reported that the senior councillor of the foundation stated that of the 285 addicts treated at the foundation during a two year period, it was disclosed that almost one half the group were addicted before their twentieth birthday, and he estimates that there are now 200 addicts under the age of 21 in Vancouver. I shall have more to say on this subject when the narcotics bill is brought forward by the minister.

I should now like to say a few words regarding the subject of increasing the salaries of judges. Let me say at the outset that, while I believe the salaries of judges are, by and large, already adequate, bearing in mind the generous pension provisions, I feel there is one class of judge which deserves an increase. I refer to county court judges.

I am well aware that the work of the county court judges varies across the country, so I base my remarks in regard to the work done by those county court judges serving in Vancouver. I do not want it thought that I feel that the judges of the supreme courts of the provinces, or of the courts of appeal, are not deserving of salary increases, but at this time I think a more urgent case can be made in respect of county court judges. County court judges now receive salaries of $10,500 per year. The jurisdiction of these county court judges is very extensive, and compared with the salaries paid to others, I suggest there is some justification for an increase.

For example, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has set up a series of naturalization courts across Canada. The presiding judges receive $11,000 per year. As well as the presiding judge, there is an administrator, a principal clerk, senior clerk, a clerk and a stenographer collecting salaries totalling $24,000. Prior to the establishment of these naturalization courts applications for naturalization were heard by county court judges who performed this duty along with their other duties at the salary of $10,500 per year. These judges were assisted by a grade III clerk and a grade I stenographer in the court registry, these two persons receiving salaries totalling $6,000 per year.

I am not casting any aspersions on the judges of the naturalization courts, but it does seem unfair to me that for performing one duty they receive more than a county court judge who has a very wide jurisdiction and, under the Criminal Code and provincial summary conviction act sits as a court of appeal where, by way of re-hearing, hears appeals from judgments of police and stipendiary magistrates. The responsibility of the county court judge is very heavy in these cases, because his decision on the facts is final.

The city of Vancouver has six magistrates with salaries, according to seniority, ranging as follows: $15,000, $13,500, $12,500, and two at $10,750. Some of the junior city prosecutors are in receipt of salaries exceeding those of county court judges. With comparisons such as those, I believe a good case can be made for increasing the salary of county court judges, and I sincerely hope the minister will give sympathetic consideration to my request on behalf of this group of citizens who are forbidden to speak for themselves but who, none the less, have answered a call of duty no less than have members of parliament.

Finally, I should like to say something about the R.C.M.P. investigation into the illegal entry of some Chinese into Canada. In so doing, I want to urge those Chinese, who have entered the country illegally, to come forward and regularize their status.

[Mr. Jung.]

Hon. members will recall that, almost one year ago, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration made a statement in the house to the effect that it was not the intention of this government, in connection with the current investigation, to prosecute or deport from the country any Chinese presently in Canada who have not themselves engaged in assisting other Chinese, apart from their own relatives, to enter Canada illegally. It is reasonable to assume that the R.C.M.P. must have had knowledge of these irregular entries. It is also reasonable to assume that if the R.C.M.P. were to proceed against these people in the usual manner, a substantial number of arrests would be made.

There are some individuals who think, because the R.C.M.P. have not made mass arrests, the government does not have any real evidence of large scale illegal immigration. Others construe the lack of arrests as a sign of weakness on the part of the government. Arguments have also been advanced that these Chinese people really have not broken the law in telling minor lies. I should be the first to agree that it would be very difficult to make out a moral case against the majority of these Chinese, because the Immigration Act, as it stands, was, and is, unduly restrictive.

I suggest that if the Immigration Act had permitted the early Chinese immigrants to bring their wives into Canada with them, none of this trouble would have started. Anyone who has been away from home for a long time, as for example, during the war, can understand how lonely persons can become after a few months' separation from their families. Imagine the unhappy state of affairs for those Chinese who were separated often as long as 20, 30 or 40 years from their wives and families. I suggest that had wives been allowed to come in, any children born would have been properly registered under Canadian law, and there should not have been the opportunity to create a fictitious family, which has made it possible for illegal immigration.

In so far as the actions of those people, who were prompted by a desire to rejoin their families, are concerned, it is very difficult to make out any kind of a moral case against them, particularly when they have been good and law abiding citizens since their arrival. I want to emphasize the fact that I limit my remarks to those individuals whose illegal actions were prompted by a desire to rejoin their families, because there is a suggestion that in some cases being re-united with the family was not the guiding motive.

In an article dated April 29, 1961, written by Mr. Robert McKeown, an eminent writer, entitled "How Chinese Are Smuggled Into Canada" he states:

> But the facts that have come to light through the current investigation seem to indicate that in relatively few cases is strong family feeling the basis for illegal immigration. The real cause of the racket is the money to be made from it.

It may be that such is the case, Mr. Chairman, but in all the cases that I have brought to the attention of the department a family relationship was established. I am not denying the truth of Mr. McKeown's statement, but because of my experience in a substantial number of these cases I want to put on record my impression that reunification with the family or some member of the family was the underlying factor. Indeed, in an article also published on April 29, 1961, in the same Weekend Magazine and entitled, "I Was An Illegal Immigrant", the author of that story said that his father died in the war with Japan and that his grandfather who had been in Canada since 1910 had helped his mother and brother by sending money and it was his grandfather who conceived the idea of him coming to Canada. Why did this young man come to Canada? Because his grandfather obviously could not go on forever supporting him, his brother and mother. As this anonymous author said, "I am working again in a restaurant and sending money to help my family who have got to Hong Kong from Toy Shan. My grandfather helped them for so long and it is right that I should help them now."

I think the government recognizes that there is this difficult humanitarian problem and that is why the minister announced the amnesty provision. It is not and has not been the intention of the government to prosecute those who came into the country illegally if that person was not an active agent engaged in making financial gain from such transactions. I can speak from personal knowledge in this regard because not one of those people whom I have advised to make voluntary statements has been arrested, fined, or deported by the Canadian authorities.

By regularizing their status these people can resume their proper names and identities and they can be granted proper landed status. In time they will also be able to apply for the admission into Canada of members of their family. The heavy fear of arrest is also removed and they are able to enjoy the benefits of living in this country. However, there has been some reluctance on the part of some to come forward because they fear that they will implicate others whom they consider as friends and benefactors.

Those who come forward voluntarily and make a full statement have everything to gain. This government, far from prosecuting the Chinese in Canada, has taken the unprecedented step of extending amnesty. But the period of amnesty cannot, in my opinion, go on forever. No matter how charitable a government may be, you cannot hope forever for special treatment when, after all, the law has been broken. Unfair though these immigration laws may have been and no matter how strong a moral case may be advanced for the actions of certain Chinese, the fact remains that the law has been broken. Two wrongs do not make a right.

It may well be that if more people in the Chinese communities across Canada had worked together earlier in order to urge a change in the immigration laws, these unfortunate incidents might not have happened. One could be tempted to say that such representations were made by certain individuals but they were not well received by the previous administration. If I were to say that, I would also point out that we in this party have not done as much for Chinese immigration as I had hoped, even though I understand that the present act is being amended.

The R.C.M.P. have had a difficult task in this investigation. By and large I think their conduct is commendable. However, I have reports that some who have worked with them in this investigation have not fully understood their position, but it is my understanding that where such cases have been reported prompt action has been taken to ensure that those persons concerned were instructed as to the exact nature of their duties and their spheres of responsibility.

I think that the R.C.M.P. have acted with great restraint because under section 16 of the Immigration Act they can arrest anyone whom they have reason to suspect of being in the country illegally. The power is there. The fact that the R.C.M.P. have not used it should not be construed as lack of evidence. Far from showing weakness, I think that the government is demonstrating a high degree of sympathy and I would be reluctant to think that advantage was being taken of this attitude and that the investigations were being unduly delayed by passive non-co-operation.

I regret that I have spoken at length on this subject. You can appreciate, Mr. Chairman, that it is a painful subject for me. But because I believe strongly that the law must be obeyed no matter how unpleasant it may be or until such time as it is changed, and also because I feel that Chinese who have entered the country illegally have nothing to lose and everything to gain by regularizing their status, I have taken this opportunity to bring these facts before the house so that we will all exercise moderation and understanding in this difficult time in the history of the Chinese communities in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the hon. member a question? I appreciated his statement, but he indicated that there might be in the future, and he did not define what he meant by the future, a time when this immunity might cease. He has closer connections with the Minister of Justice than I have these days and I wonder whether he would indicate to the committee what his opinion is as to the possible time when this immunity might cease?

Mr. Jung: Surely the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River would not expect me to announce government policy. I think that question should properly be directed to the minister. What I have said is based purely on my own personal assessment of the situation as I see it.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I want to take a few minutes to reply to one of the arguments the minister made this afternoon. Before the committee rose for the supper recess the minister ridiculed Bill No. C-76 which I introduced on March 22. He said the bill was a monstrosity, that it did not accomplish anything, that it merely repealed an act and re-enacted it again and therefore it was a farce. The minister makes bald announcements but he never backs them up with any quotations or evidence and he never cites any authorities to support his words. The minister's pronouncements do not become truth just because the minister utters them. I am not prepared to accord infallibility to the minister and the more I listen to him the more convinced I am of his fallibility.

I should like to put before the committee this evening two precedents that I think are analogous to the bill which the minister has described as a farce and a monstrosity. There was a time before the Statute of Westminster was enacted when certain laws of the British parliament applied in Canada. The Canadian government did not like that situation and sought to remedy it. So certain laws were passed which we thought would correct the situation. In one instance we brought into effect a section of the Criminal Code, the old section 1025, I believe, which contained a clause that there would be no appeal from any sentence or judgment passed under that section.

Another one was the Supreme Court Act which contained a clause to the effect that the judgment of the supreme court would be final. In spite of all this, these laws were not effective in supplying remedies because they were declared ultra vires. In spite of our own laws which we had passed here in parliament, cases and appeals were still taken to the British privy council.

Finally, the Statute of Westminster was passed—I think it was about 1931—and that statute contained a clause giving effect to future laws passed in this House of Commons from that time forward. But the Statute of Westminster validated only future laws that were passed in this house. It had an effect on future laws similar to the effect the bill of rights will have on laws passed in the future after the bill of rights was put on the statute books. There is quite a good analogy there.

These two examples which I have cited, the section of the Criminal Code and the appropriate clause of the Supreme Court Act, were brought before this house, repealed and re-enacted in exactly the same way as I sought to do through Bill No. C-76. If what I sought to do was a monstrosity and a farce, well, there is a very good precedent for it. It was necessary to follow this course because the Statute of Westminster applied only to future laws, so the old law had to be re-enacted. It was re-enacted in exactly the same form. There may have been a change in a word or a phrase, but there was no change in the intent, no change in the meaning and no change in the force of the old act. To all intents and purposes, it was exactly the same old bill which was brought in, repealed and re-enacted. This is what the minister says is a farce and a monstrosity.

Just as the Statute of Westminster was not in existence when the old laws were passed and future laws came under its influence, so there was no bill of rights in effect when the old Fisheries Act was passed but the passage of the bill of rights created a new situation which was similar to the situation created by the passage of the Statute of Westminster. I cite these cases to the minister, and I ask him to place on Hansard similar authorities, similar precedents, to bolster the argument he has made.

The minister keeps shifting his ground. He does not reply to the arguments that are made. The other day when the minister intervened in the debate with relation to the amendment to the Fisheries Act, he said Bill No. C-76 was not properly before the house. Today when the hon. member for Skeena had him backed into a corner by intimating the minister had been derelict in his duty by not submitting a report on the bill as the law required, he shifted his ground and said a decision had not been made. There was no ruling as to whether or not Bill No. C-76 was properly before the house. This question was still under consideration by Mr. Speaker and by the house leader. Well, this bill was introduced on March 22 and today is May 25, which means this consideration has been going on for eight weeks.

I am, therefore, a bit curious about this report the minister is required to make under the bill of rights examination regulations and when the minister replies I want to inform the committee just exactly what the purpose of this report is. If the committee is not to make use of it or if we are not to have the benefit of it in considering legislation that comes before the house, what purpose does the report serve? I want to tell the committee that when I introduced the bill I did so in good faith. When the minister replied to my argument this afternoon, he kept emphasizing only one part of my statement. I said that I had introduced this bill to bring it into conformity with the bill of rights but I also stated it was to bring it into conformity with the report which the minister was obliged to make on this bill.

I could have followed my own ideas about changes in the bill which I thought might take care of any inconsistencies with the bill of rights. However, if there is to be a report handed down by experts who have studied not only the particular clauses in which I was interested but the whole bill, surely the sensible thing to do if we want to do a good job on this legislation as we put it through the house, is to get the best ideas we can about it. If I made a mistake, it was in taking the minister's report at face value. I thought it meant something and I thought it was for the purpose of guiding the members of the house in doing the best job we could on the legistlation that comes before us. If that is not the purpose of the report, I cannot see what other useful purpose it serves. I certainly would like to have the minister enlighten me on this point when he replies.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to call the minister's attention to the rather irregular way the R.C.M.P. carries out certain investigations.

I have been told that, with the help of the food and drug branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the R.C.M.P. makes investigations in establishments where pharmaceutical products are sold, especially in retail drug stores. Yet, the way the constables do their work, they should not be called investigators but instigators. Indeed, under false pretences, they succeed in getting special drugs from people who act in good faith, professional pharmacists whose only care is to exercise their profession conscientiously and do their duty by serving the public well.

Constables present themselves as sick people and pretend they have forgotten their medical prescription or that they are strangers visiting relatives and that they urgently need the drugs. They play on the druggist's sympathies so that the latter, moved by their plight agrees to give them without a prescription, drugs which call for one.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the minister's attention to two particular cases which happened recently in the Sherbrooke district, in the province of Quebec. R.C.M.P. constables went to a drugstore and told the pharmacist that they were on a trip and did not have a medical prescription for certain drugs they wanted. Out of sympathy for those supposedly sick people, the druggist gave them 12 tablets. Needless to say, that in both cases, the R.C.M.P. laid charges against the pharmacists who are highly respected in the profession and who render great services to the public. They were brought before the court and had to pay a nominal fine but it remains, sir, that this use of false pretence with druggists who act in good faith, who are conscious of their obligations, is what I would call a disgusting behaviour, if it did not reflect upon those who use such means to succeed in their investigations.

Consequently, I would ask the Minister of Justice if he could not impress upon the R.C.M.P. that its constables who are in the employ of the Department of Justice should not instigate honest people to break the law.

Mr. Chairman, since I am not a lawyer I feel I am in an advantageous position to make this second point which I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. members of this house. The general public are sometimes justified in complaining about the slowness of court proceedings. Indeed, people who have to go to court, sometimes have to wait one, two and even five years before their cases are heard and passed upon. Such a delay in the proceedings is highly prejudicial to the taxpayers, that is to the Canadian people, and especially to those whose interests are at stake.

I personally know people who suffered serious money problems before they could obtain justice.

I would therefore ask the Minister of Justice whether he could take steps to increase the number of judges so that justice could be rendered more expeditiously, thus insuring better protection and greater justice to the Canadian people.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: I have brought to the minister's attention the fact that I should like from him an explanation of his speech in Toronto and his views on R.C.M.P. security. Just a moment ago I went to the reading room and found that one of his old friends and associates who worked together with him on "Freedom Wears a Crown" by John Farthing, namely Miss Judith Robinson, in the Telegram has a comment on this very point. I thought he would be interested in hearing those observations and I thought it would help him to understand the point I was getting at. Miss Robinson in her column of today says this:

Last week end in Toronto Hon. E. D. Fulton, Canada's Minister of Justice, opened a new line of thought. He was explaining, to a dentists' convention, "the role of the police in a non-police state." Security dossiers on private citizens could, Minister of Justice Fulton said, be very useful in that role:

Then we have a quotation which I assume is from his speech.

"If slanderous rumors have been circulated about an individual and the police investigate and find him to be loyal and honest, then his file proves this fact," Mr. Fulton said.

"If his integrity is ever in doubt again, his file would attest to that," Mr. Fulton said.

Mr. Fulton did not say to whom it would attest or to whom it would prove; which makes it confusing. In old days the member (P.C.) for Kamloops made a good battle in parliament against an R.C.M.P. habit of leaking information from police security files. He was one of the freedom fighters who, in the parliamentary session of 1954, pursued another minister of justice until they cornered him on that issue and forced him to a statement:

"That it is government policy to forbid the giving of information to private citizens from secret police files."

So it would be strange if Minister of Justice Fulton's remarks in Toronto last week end meant what they seem to mean. It would be regrettable if he were really saying that information from police security files could be used to attest to any fact or prove anything, good or bad, to any citizen, about any citizen except under oath and in a court of law.

The courts are open to Canadians whose loyalty and honesty are impugned by circulators of slanderous rumor. Police, as Davie Fulton once knew, should have no power to attest to anything anywhere else. The quickest way to change a non-police state into a police state is to lift that limitation. Citizens are not dependent on character references from secret police files in a free country.

This also Canada's Minister of Justice knew before he was Minister of Justice.

Nothing like old Hansards for checking new speeches. 'Twas just such a spring as this seven years ago when the M.P. (P.C.) for Kamloops, E. D. Fulton, took after the government of Canada on its security procedures. He found them dangerous.

In the civil service an anonymous "security panel" of government employees, acting on secret information from secret sources had power to deprive men and women of their jobs without appeal and without giving reasons for dismissal.

In the Department of Justice security files were not being kept secret. As a case brought up in the house revealed, R.C.M.P. officers felt free to leak, and had leaked information from secret files to a potential employer about a Canadian citizen's past political associations; all completely lawful.

The member for Kamloops spoke strongly and followed a clear line in condemning this sort of thing. The government's security measures he said had in them "all the elements which make them potentially unfair."

The house, he said, was entitled to know "that there will be the maximum possible fairness to the individual who may come under security investigation."

It was inherent in our whole system of justice, he said, that a man suspected "should have an opportunity to know the case against him and answer it."

The question is do the principles of justice apply in the use of police security files which the Minister of Justice was reported as recommending in Toronto last week end. On the evidence of Hansard, it seems unlikely that the member for Kamloops would have thought so, back in 1954.

As I say, this expresses the point about which I should like the minister to speak later much better and more succinctly than I could express it. I hope the minister will be prepared to give us an appreciation of this position put by his former co-author, I was going to say, but certainly his co-worker on that great book by John Farthing entitled, "Freedom Wears a Crown".

(Translation):

Mr. Eudes: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a remark in relation to the point just made by the member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) and to this afternoon's discussions regarding the powers of revision and assent which the Minister of Justice must exercise on the various bills which are submitted to parliament, under the authority conferred upon him and the responsibility placed upon him by the bill of rights.

Section 3 of chapter 44 of the 1960 statutes provides, and I quote the English version because I do not have the French one:

(Text):

3. The Minister of Justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the governor in council, examine every proposed regulation submitted in draft form to the clerk of the privy council pursuant to the Regulations Act and every bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this part and he shall report any such inconsistency to the House of Commons at the first convenient opportunity.

(Translation):

One is justified in the conclusion that the Minister of Justice is required to examine only those bills which are referred to him since the assent to that bill.

However, Bill C-76, which was put forward by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo in the present session for the purpose of amending the Fisheries Act to make it consistent with the bill of rights shows the need to clarify this section of chapter 44 of our statutes. Proof of this need is found in today's debates, in the long discussions that took place in the house when the bill was considered, and in an elaborate ruling made by Mr. Speaker on March 27, 1961, in connection with Bill C-76.

The minister might perhaps consider amending section 3, to make it compulsory for him, as Minister of Justice, to examine not only the bills submitted to parliament since the date of assent to that bill, but to revise already existing legislation, in order to give assurance to every citizen that it is in all respects consistent with the rights and privileges to which he is entitled under the Canadian Bill of Rights.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before the minister replies to some of the questions that have been raised I should like to mention briefly one of the subjects which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre raised, namely the question of narcotic drugs addiction.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre read what I believe was an article from the Vancouver Sun. I saw the results of a survey in the city of Vancouver with regard to high school students and their attitude toward the use of narcotics. The survey gave the number of high school students who have tried narcotic drugs, and how they could obtain them if they so desired.

I think one of the most shocking results of that survey, apart from the age of the people concerned, was that a fairly large number of them felt there was nothing injurious or wrong in the use of these drugs; they felt they would not suffer any harmful effects from the use of narcotics. They seemed to look upon trying out narcotics in somewhat the same light as a child of a similar age or younger looks upon smoking a cigarette, as being relatively harmless; making one nauseous perhaps, and a little green around the gills, but beyond that nothing too serious involved. I think this is extremely unfortunate and is a very strong condemnation of the past attitude at both federal and provincial levels of government and on the part of others toward the question of the use of narcotics.

I think perhaps every narcotic addict, at least during the early days of using drugs, is of the opinion that they are not harmful, they are not addictive and he is not really a slave to the drug; that he can, as the expression goes, "kick the habit" any time he feels like it. This, of course, as everyone knows who has paid even the slightest bit of attention to the problem, is simply not the case.

I think there is an extreme need in the field of public discussion and education to impart knowledge of the fact that tremendous dangers exist from even thinking in terms of experimenting with a narcotic drug. I think a great deal of public discussion, information and education must flow from the federal and provincial authorities, from various social workers and the like to enlighten as many people as possible about the extreme dangers inherent in the use of narcotic drugs.

I think in Vancouver, or on the west coast, there is the largest concentration of known criminal addicts, as I believe they are called, anywhere in Canada. The largest population in any penitentiary in Canada of those convicted of possessing or trafficking in narcotics is also in the British Columbia penitentiary and in the provincial jail at Oakalla. In neither of these institutions—at least, certainly not up until the last few months—has there been any opportunity or even, I submit, any great desire toward segregation of narcotic addicts from other classes of inmates.

No attempt has been made at segregation and there is no possibility of segregation because of overcrowding both in the penitentiary and in Oakalla. There has been no approach to the treatment of these individuals and no treatment whatsoever other than, if this is a treatment, isolating an addict from narcotics by having him institutionalized and thus making as sure as possible that he does not have the opportunity of obtaining drugs while he is in the institution.

However, this is not always the case. I think there have been a number of instances where this has not been the case. It is common knowledge in Vancouver that it is possible to obtain narcotic drugs in the Oakalla prison farm and there have been instances of guards in penitentiaries providing these drugs.

One instance which comes to mind is the case at Kingston penitentiary a year or so ago. A guard at the Kingston penitentiary was arrested and charged with being in possession of narcotics. He had them in his possession when he was entering the penitentiary to work. I understand that individual was acquitted, but nevertheless this is one instance that comes to mind. I have also heard in the past of attempts being made to smuggle narcotics into the British Columbia penitentiary.

This is understandable too, because as I said, there is no effort at treatment and there are no facilities for treatment. The only approach taken to the poor individual addicted to narcotics, if he is caught and convicted of being in possession of them, is to put him in a penitentiary. This is all that has been possible under our system.

I understand that as soon as the minister took office he and his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, paid a great deal of attention to this question. I gather they have had conversations with provincial authorities, because they are involved in so far as the question of treatment is concerned.

I think before we proceed further with the various items of the estimates it would be of great interest to the committee if the minister would give us an account of the progress being made toward the establishment of narcotic addiction treatment centres, how long it may be before such centres are established, where they may be established, and all the other necessary information to apprize the committee of the actions being taken in this direction.

While I am still on my feet, Mr. Chairman, I should like to pose one other question to the minister. I wonder whether the minister could explain to the committee, say for the period of the last year, what have been the duties, responsibilities and functions assigned to the Solicitor General in so far as his work within the department is concerned.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I might deal with the various points which have been raised in the order in which they were raised, beginning with the comments and queries of the hon. member for Port Arthur who was concerned with the question of the efficacy of the Criminal Code provision against obscene literature. The hon. member suggested that because there have not been large number of cases before the courts the legislation has not proven very efficacious. Might I suggest to him that such a situation might, in fact, prove exactly the opposite of his conclusion. It might well indicate that the legislation is so effective, especially in dealing with the class of material with which it was mainly designed to deal—the pulp trash—that numerous prosecutions have not been required because an appreciably smaller quantity of this stuff is getting into the stands throughout this country. I do not make that statement as a categorical statement, but I leave it with the hon. member as a suggestion indicating that the legislation is having its desired effect quietly and without fanfare.

I do know that I and my department used to receive, up to two or three years ago, a large volume of this stuff from people concerned with these "girly" magazines and other trash reaching the newsstands. We had a substantial "library". I had one in my office and used to get embarrassed about it and put it away in the bottom drawer of my filing cabinet. My officials had a similar "library", if one can dignify it with that word. But mail of this kind has fallen off to a mere trickle and this may well indicate that this stuff is no longer in mass circulation. I think it is open to that interpretation.

I, too, am glad that so far as works with respect to which there may be genuine differences of opinion as to whether or not they possess artistic merit are concerned, they have not been swept away in undiscriminating fashion and declared to be obscene. The case to which the hon. member referred—"Lady Chatterley's Lover"—is going to the highest court. I think this is the way it should be. I think this also shows that the judges in Canada are not, as the hon. member feared they might be, apt to approach this matter with closed minds, throwing out anything new which anyone had said on the subject. At the same time I would draw attention to a judgment given by Mr. Justice Parker in the Yukon Territory in connection with a series of pulp magazines in which, as I recall it, in every case he found them to be obscene within the meaning of the new definition in the code.

The hon. member also asked me to make some comments in connection with security and the activities of the R.C.M.P. May I ask him to allow me to defer this until we reach the R.C.M.P. item at which time I shall be prepared to have a full discussion on security and all the other activities of the R.C.M.P.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo endeavoured to raise again the controversy we had earlier regarding his bill and the effect thereon of the bill of rights and my obligation to report thereon under the bill of rights. I am not going to revive this controversy. I am simply going to say, in respect to his assertion that I never quoted any authority in support of my position, that the hon. member had not been listening carefully to what I said. I quoted the Speaker of this house and I quoted what the hon. member himself had to say when he introduced his bill. My position has been throughout, and still is, that this bill was introduced on the basis of an explanation given to the house which does not accord with the facts. I have never shifted ground from that position and I have no reason to do so however the hon. member may seek to change his position. It is a fact that leave to introduce the bill was given on the basis of a misunderstanding induced by that explanation, and rather than attempting to justify himself I think the hon. member should apologize for having treated the house in that manner.

The hon. member for Skeena raised a question of narcotic addiction, or followed up the reference made to narcotics by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. He reminded us of the long period during which there was no adequate provision for the treatment of narcotic addicts and no provision for the segregation of criminal addicts in our penitentiaries. With that, I thoroughly agree. With respect to the program we have in mind I would draw the hon. member's attention to the official policy announcement I made in this house on my own behalf and on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare on January 24 of this year. I would be fully prepared to have a discussion on our program with respect to narcotics on the penitentiaries item. The hon. member will appreciate that under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act the main responsibility is borne by the Minister of National Health and Welfare but my colleague and I have reached a workmanlike agreement with respect to this matter under which he assumes primary responsibility for the legislation regarding the control of narcotics while I assume responsibility for that part of the legislation which deals with the custody and treatmnt of offenders under the act. So I shall be prepared to discuss our program in that regard when we reach the penitentiaries item because our program for treatment will be undertaken by the penitentiaries branch.

I might also add that the bill substituting a new measure for the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act will be introduced in the house within the next week or ten days. It carries out the policy statement that I made. However, I think we could have a useful discussion of this question on the penitentiaries item without too much anticipation of what the legislation will provide.

With regard to the work of the Solicitor General I should like to say in unequivocal terms that my colleague the Solicitor General does extremely valuable work in the department and for the cabinet and the government generally. The Prime Minister, approximately a year ago, gave a full answer to questions asked with regard to the position of the Solicitor General and I do not think I have anything to add to it. The position of the Solicitor General is a traditional one and it is one which both by tradition and by the character and ability of the present encumbent is a most important and valuable position in the cabinet and the government of Canada.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might ask the minister a question? He has made reference on two occasions to legislation which will be introduced within a certain period of time. Could the minister indicate to the hon. members of this committee when they may expect the introduction of the revised Penitentiary Act?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I should again say, within a matter of the next week.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, just a brief remark before proceeding any further with the study of the estimates.

I listened with attention to the remarks of the minister in reply to suggestions made by the various hon. members who rose on this matter.

What particularly impressed me was that his remarks were to the point. Certain claims were made by the press and the radio. Hon. members themselves asked for an amendment to the Criminal Code so as to put a stop to certain crimes which are being committed in this country.

To my mind, all the suggestions made by hon. members today had already been formulated last year, and every time the Minister of Justice answered, he said that "it was being considered," and that "an investigation was under way".

Every year, we come back to the matter, which means that in spite of the requests made by the general public nothing is being done to amend the Criminal Code in that way.

Barbiturates and narcotic drugs have been mentioned, for instance, as well as addiction, and the crimes committed by addicts. The hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) used to take up the matter every year in order to call the minister's attention to the many abuses and acts of violence due to drug addiction.

Again, the minister just answers that things are being studied, that some project is under consideration—always under consideration.

Last year, as well as two years ago, several hon. members rose in this house to protest against the use of premium stamps. Last year, the minister said that a certain case was being considered as a test case. Moreover, he mentioned that the matter was under the jurisdiction of provincial attorneys general. To sum it up, he gave all sorts of answers and shifted the responsibility from this government to somebody else's shoulders.

Nothing is easier, it seems to me, than to get in touch with the various attorneys general of the provinces for the purpose of reaching an agreement on the subject, making an arrangement to stop once and for all the abuse of gift stamps which, as various speakers have pointed out, are profitable only to large stores, trusts and chain stores, while the small corner grocer has to supply services not provided by those large stores and therefore is unable to sell at lower cost and giving stamps such as are given by the large chain organizations.

Here again, the minister has been remiss in failing to satisfy the wishes of a very important group of the Canadian people.

As I pointed out a moment ago, the same thing happened in the case of barbiturates. Every day we see the evil effects of such drugs and of those narcotics which, incidentally, perhaps do not affect the system when taken in small doses, but which, taken in excessive doses, produce the results we read about in every newspaper. Young girls and boys, even from good homes, first yield to the temptation of trying them, and then go on using them and finally go to extremes. They finally bring dishonour to their family and often end up in jail.

One means which would at the same time act as a preventive to crime would be to apply a strict control on firearms. Anyone at the present time, can obtain a firearm without having to register it, and this is true for all parts of the country.

I think we should make it more difficult to get a licence to carry a firearm. Moreover, when an accused is found guilty of robbery or robbery with violence, or of any other offence, an investigation should be conducted to find out whether or not he owns a firearm.

Last year, some members of this house discussed this subject and once more, the minister said the matter was under consideration. He told the house that an investigation had been started. True, but it has never been completed. I fail to understand why, every time a member of the house, whether on the government or the opposition side, asks a question to the minister, he is unable to give a definite or even encouraging answer.

The same applies to the matter of a national lottery. For several years, the members of this house have been asking for the creation of a national lottery. Certain newspapers with a wide circulation made surveys, and in one province in particular the report on one such survey showed that almost everyone was in favour of a lottery, provincial or national. The minister, in view of that almost complete unanimity within an important sector of the population of this country, should take immediate action. I wonder why the minister does not introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code and comply with that request. No, in this case as in many others, the Minister of Justice simply says that he is considering the question or that he is inquiring into whatever request is put to him. But what does he really do? He offers us a mitigated abolition of capital punishment, something nobody asked for. I say that nobody asked for that, except perhaps the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) because he seems to ride this subject to death, so much so that I wonder whether this question has such a vital importance for him.

However, the hon. member for York-Scarborough is considered an expert in this field, and this enables him to see his picture in the papers and also to appear on television. In addition, this gives him an opportunity of bringing on television his colleagues who are in favour of his measure, except a few who are against it. Besides, we find today that opinions are divided on this subject, among the Conservatives and the Liberals, as well as in the press.

Allow me to point out that last year, as the minister will remember, the matter of capital punishment was brought up and some members on the government side—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member must remember that the house disposed of that matter yesterday and that, besides, the bill will be brought back before the committee next week.

Mr. Denis: You are perfectly right, Mr. Chairman, but that was only the minor premise to a conclusion to be drawn. As a matter of fact, the point is not only to deal with capital punishment but also to provide for a strict control of firearms, following the findings of a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which sat for a year or two, if not more, and which included Liberals, Conservatives, C.C.F.'ers, Social Crediters, as well as senators of the same political affiliations. Moreover, if I am not mistaken, the Minister of Justice was on that committee.

The committee assigned experts, particularly in matters such as crime in general, hanging, and even degrees in the crime of murder.

I want to underline once again the fact the Minister of Justice was a member of that committee which heard judges, attorneys general, wardens, penitentiary directors, chaplains, criminologists, psychiatrists, etc.

Finally, all the available experts were there to consider any amendment on the three subjects: capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries. As the chairman does not want me to over-emphasize these points, I will make no further comment in this respect.

Now this committee, having made a full investigation, submitted its recommendations. I cannot understand why the minister does not follow the suggestions of the committee on which he was sitting, but does just the opposite. I am talking here of the joint committee.

Therefore, what is the use of the Minister of Justice telling us: "We will study the matter and make an investigation", if, the following year, he introduces a bill inconsistent with a report based on the evidence of experts on the matter.

As far as firearms are concerned, I wish to quote part of the evidence given by the chief of police of Vancouver, Mr. Walter H. Mulligan.

This is what he said, as it appears on page 14 of the report. Mr. Fulton himself was questioning:

Q. According to you, is the fact that there is capital punishment preventing criminals from carrying firearms and therefore from becoming murderers?

A. Certainly.

Q. In other words, they do not carry revolvers for fear one of them gets angry or nervous and uses it?

A. Yes.

Q. Is this opinion of yours based on conversations you had with criminals?

A. Yes. I spoke to criminals with long records and that is the opinion they expressed.

There it is, Mr. Chairman, evidence not only establishing the fact that reports are not only disregarded, but that steps contrary to the recommendations they contain are taken.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: Would the hon. member permit a question? Was the person whom he quoted from that book Walter H. Mulligan?

Mr. Denis: Walter H. Mulligan, chief of police of Vancouver. He was called as a witness before the Senate committee.

Mr. Howard: He ran away to California too a while ago.

Mr. Denis: Yes, but the report does not say so.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: I would ask the minister to take into serious consideration the suggestions made by some members, instead of always answering the same way, saying that everything will be considered, that an enquiry will be made.

I should like the minister to make other amendments to the Criminal Code, if there is still time, this year, in accordance with the report of the joint committee, whose enquiry lasted three years and a half and which cost thousands of dollars to the Canadian people.

The minister was himself a member of that committee, and it is his recommendations that I would ask him to carry out.

Other recommendations have been made by previous speakers, as well as by newspapers and the general public.

Let him implement these recommendations submitted to him, and let him refrain from serving us a review or an investigation every year.

If the minister wants the reputation of a man who has done something during his short term as Minister of Justice, I suggest that the least he can do is to propose the amendments that the members are asking for.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I look forward to the enthusiastic support of the hon. member for St. Denis for the three bills which are going to be introduced in the house in the next week or ten days and on which we were working long before he suggested them, namely, a bill to carry out a narcotics control program, a bill to revise the Criminal Code to deal with dangerous sexual offenders and matters of that sort and also a bill to amend the Food and Drugs Act to deal with barbiturates. We have been acting while he has been talking.

Mr. Denis: I should like to thank the minister for what he has promised, but may I tell him that for two or three years the Liberals have been asking for these improvements.

Mr. Fulton: For 22 years they did not do anything about them.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, in view of the statements made by the hon. member for St. Denis which you very properly ruled out of order after he had been speaking for some time, I would hope I would have the opportunity to reply because of the fact that my name was mentioned. Apparently the hon. member has been following post office robbers too much to have time to read the newspapers. If he had done so he would have found that editorials in every newspaper in this country, with one or two possible exceptions, have concurred in and supported the proposition put to the house last week by the Minister of Justice. To suggest that there was no demand for any change in the law concerning capital punishment is patent nonsense. I would refer the hon. member to the 1960 Gallup poll for an expression of public opinion on this matter.

Mr. Denis: In answer to my hon. friend, may I point out that during that inquiry a list of states in the United States which had abolished capital punishment and then restored it because of the increase in violence and murder was submitted.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Could we carry the first item tonight, Mr. Chairman, so that tomorrow we could get into the details which hon. members are so anxious to consider?

Some hon. Members: No.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the business for tomorrow, may I say that the house leader has always been generous with the opposition, but is there any possibility that the Prime Minister may intervene again tomorrow and upset the arrangements?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: What will the business be tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: The Prime Minister has not intervened to change any arrangements whatsoever. The estimates of the Department of Justice will be the business for tomorrow.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

RUSSWOOD RANCH—ADVANCES ON LIVESTOCK PURCHASES

Question No. 179—Mr. Winch:

1. Did the Department of Agriculture ever make an advance to the Russwood ranch in cash for the purchase or supply of livestock to same?

Question

2. If so: (a) what were the conditions of the advances, and has any financial return been made to the government? (b) under what act of parliament were such advances in cash or livestock provided by the government? (c) has any statement of the assets and liabilities of the Russwood ranch ever been presented to a government department? (d) what are the names and addresses of the owners or stock holders of the holding known as the Russwood ranch?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

1. No.
2. Not applicable.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO VIOLATIONS OF CEASE FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister give the house an up to date report in respect to the alleged violations of the cease fire in Laos?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, since the commission returned to Laos it has received a number of complaints about breaches of the cease fire. These complaints have been from both sides. They have been considered and discussed with the leaders of the principal parties.

The commission has received assurances that no intentional violation of the cease fire had taken place and that whatever actions had occurred had been taken under provocation and in exercise of the right of self defence.

The hon. member for Trinity will realize that absolute control over widely scattered forces is difficult because of the absence of a detailed cease fire agreement, the nature of the terrain, which of course is exceedingly difficult, and the lack of communication between commands. Nevertheless the commission has decided to send representatives to two areas, one in the north and one in the south, where the most serious incidents are reported to have taken place. The intention of the commission to carry out these investigations was communicated to the leaders of the various parties in Laos on May 22; that is, four days ago. As yet I have no information on the results of the investigations.

I might say in addition that, as the hon. member will recall, at our urging in Geneva the co-chairmen, the United Kingdom and the Soviet union, wired the chairman of the international commission for a submission as to what equipment that commission would need. The reply has now been received and it goes into some detail in connection with the requirements of the commission. If these requirements are met by the co-chairmen the work of the commission will be greatly facilitated.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the minister including the short range aircraft and helicopters which he requested in order to improve the communications between commands? Can the minister say whether they have been supplied yet?

Mr. Green: During the discussions in Geneva I dealt at considerable length with the need for airplanes and helicopters.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Before asking it, I must say that I wish the editor of the Province had been here to see the response when the minister rose. Would the minister inform the house whether there is daily communication between our representatives in Laos and the department here?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are getting reports regularly from our commissioner in Laos, Mr. Leon Mayrand.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH PRIME MINISTER OF ISRAEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would care to make a report to the house in respect of the visit of Mr. Ben-Gurion, the prime minister of Israel?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house is aware, the prime minister of Israel ended his visit today. A joint communiqué is being issued which will set out, in that detail characteristic of communiqués, a resumé of the various discussions that took place. I am sure I am reinforced in my belief that meetings between leaders of various countries are most beneficial. I found the visit of Prime Minister Ben-Guirion most helpful, and a further indication of the close relationship between the two countries. I think perhaps it is proper for me to table the communiqué although I have it only in English, the French translation not being available yet. This communiqué sets out the various facts to which I have made reference.

Mr. Lafreniere: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Text):

Could the Prime Minister tell the house whether there has been any request for military assistance?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there was none. The prime minister of Israel naturally discussed questions relative to the middle east. However, there was no request either directly or indirectly for military equipment or the like.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO LETTER FROM B.C. PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister following the one I asked yesterday. Can the Prime Minister today inform the house whether he had been made aware of the contents of the letter from the premier of British Columbia before Canada signed the treaty with the United States on the Columbia project?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to satisfy the curiosity of the hon. gentleman. I would have done so yesterday had I had the opportunity. The answer is no.

[Later:]

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and ask him if he has anything further to report on the Columbia river project, after seeing the premier of British Columbia yesterday.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I had a discussion yesterday afternoon with the premier of British Columbia on the subject. I must correct one possible misapprehension that I detected in the hon. member's question. I gather that he thought Premier Bennett came here. In fact we met at a conference at which both of us had been invited to deliver addresses. We had a few minutes together to continue the discussions which had been held in March in Victoria.

The discussion was carried on in the same frank manner that characterized the meetings in Victoria. I may say that I did submit, as I told the house earlier I would, the suggestion or the request that he might give his content to the tabling in the house of the correspondence which has passed between us. He has given his consent on behalf of the government of British Columbia to the tabling in the house of the correspondence which has passed between us up until the time of my visit to Victoria at the end of March.

Therefore, if I may, I should like to table two copies of the correspondence passing between Premier Bennett and myself, the first letter being dated December 8, 1959 and the last, March 3, 1961.

Mr. Speaker, these letters are in addition to those which have already been laid before the house. Following my statement to the house on my return from Victoria I laid before the house both the letter I had written to the premier previously, setting forth the federal government's financial proposal, along with the letter written to me by Premier Bennett, together with the two alternative financial proposals submitted by the government of that province.

I also drew attention yesterday to two letters which had been exchanged between us earlier this year. I now think this house, with the tabling of these letters this morning, is in possession of all the correspondence which has passed between Premier Bennett and myself in relation to financial proposals, down to the time of our meeting in Victoria at the end of March last.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister suggesting that these very important letters be appended to Hansard of this day?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if it is the wish of hon. members that this correspondence be printed as an appendix, I have no objection at all.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house concur in the request that these documents be made an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I hear some objections.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps there is one fact I should mention. That is, Premier Bennett has not agreed yet to the tabling of a letter which I wrote him about a fortnight ago.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—STATEMENT AS TO CAUSE OF DEATH OF FISH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): On May 19 the hon. member for Kootenay West directed a question to the Minister of Fisheries as follows:

In view of reports that dead codfish and herring have been noted floating in Newfoundland's Fortune bay and in other waters off the western shore, which is puzzling even the most experienced and oldest fishermen of that island province, would the minister inform the house whether he is having this situation investigated in an attempt to discover what is causing the death of these fish and, particularly, whether radioactive wastes are a factor.

In the absence of the Minister of Fisheries, I should like to reply. This matter was thoroughly investigated by officials of the Department of Fisheries in Newfoundland, including Dr. Templeman, director of the biological station of the fisheries research board at St. John's. These officials report that the story in the press was exaggerated. The incident occurred during January or February of this year, and I am advised that it could have been caused by codfish pursuing herring bait and suddenly entering extremely cold water near the surface. The abrupt change in water temperature could easily cause mortality among the fish. The officials in Newfoundland also report it is extremely doubtful that the cause was radioactive waste. There is no evidence that large quantities of dead fish were involved.

I hope the hon. member will not think I am being unduly frivolous if I add that the poor fish are unlike human beings inasmuch as they get into trouble when they get into cold water.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTING LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Could it be indicated, out of the 18 members of the official opposition present, who is the leader of the opposition?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

GRAIN

QUEBEC—REPORTED PROTEST AS TO TRANSPORTATION COST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Labelle): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a telegram from the Saguenay catholic union of farmers seeking to remedy the situation whereby farmers in the Saguenay district have to pay $10 to $20 more than western farmers for the transportation of grain in their area? Is any action by the government contemplated in order to correct this situation?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have no knowledge of the receipt of that communication. However, I will ask the office and give the hon. gentleman an answer tomorrow.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MANITOBA—REQUEST FOR COMPARISON OF DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is prepared to answer a question I asked of him on May 13, of which he took notice. The question related to a comparison of delivery quotas in Manitoba with the other two western provinces. I might indicate to the minister that the Manitoba quota is considerably lower, according to the information I have.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I was sorry that I did not have the information with me on the last occasion. Since it is now a week later, perhaps I should bring the information up to date. The hon. member asked for a comparison between May 8 and May 11, but I shall give the figures for May 8, May 11 and May 23. On May 8 Manitoba had 114 stations on a 2 bushel quota; on May 11, 38 and on May 23, 0; on a 3 bushel quota, there were 178 stations on May 8, 239 on May 11 and 193 on May 23; on a 4 bushel quota, there were 53 on May 8, 65 on May 11 and 132 on May 23; on a 5 bushel quota, 19 on May 8, 10 on May 11 and 19 on May 23; on a 6 bushel quota, none on May 8, 12 on May 11 and 20 on May 23.

Perhaps the figures can be best illustrated by a comparison with what happened between those two dates in all the provinces. In all provinces there were 213 stations on a 2 bushel quota on May 8, 58 on May 11 and none on May 23; on a 3 bushel quota there were 742 on May 8, 841 on May 11 and 627 on May 23; on a 4 bushel quota there were 394 on May 8, 419 on May 11 and 575 on May 23; on a 5 bushel quota there were 645 on May 8, 443 on May 11, and 445 on May 23; on a 6 bushel quota there were none on May 8, 233 on May 11 and 347 on May 23; on a 7 bushel quota there were none on May 8, none on May 11 and none on May 23.

TRADE

COAL—INQUIRY AS TO SALE TO CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as senior member of the opposition on the front benches this morning—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: —in age, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of an article appearing in the Globe and Mail of May 24, 1961, to the effect that Cuba needs a million tons of coal per year for its new iron and steel mills and smelters, and since it is reported that French, German and other European mines are earnestly soliciting this business, would the minister inform the house what is being done by the Canadian government to promote the sale of Nova Scotia coal to Cuba?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. As he knows, this item in the Globe and Mail is a letter from Mr. E. C. Lantz of Kitchener. In answer, my officials advise me there is grave doubt whether what is stated in this letter is a fact. We have been in touch with the situation since June of last year. There are two steel rolling mills in Cuba which we understand are electrically heated.

According to Cuban statistics the total import requirements of coal and coke for that country for all purposes have been between 200,000 and 250,000 tons per annum. The trade commissioner has been advised to investigate this report.

IMMIGRATION

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—REPORTED PROVISION OF BEDS TO IMMIGRANT STRIKEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked whether there was any truth in the allegation that immigration officers in Saint John, New Brunswick, were suppling beds and bedding to immigrant strikebreakers at the Saint John Drydock Company, whose employees have been on strike for the past four or five weeks.

The first complaint I received in the matter of this strike was from the industrial union of marine and shipbuilding workers of Canada in Saint John. It was alleged that the Saint John Drydock Company intended to import labour from abroad to replace Canadian workers on strike. For some time prior to the strike this company had been recruiting, with the assistance of my officials abroad, specialized workers in the United Kingdom. They had been unable to recruit these workers anywhere in Canada, even with the assistance of the national employment service. To the best of my knowledge only a few men came to Canada before the strike began. Since the strike immigration officials in the United Kingdom have been holding in abeyance applications received from prospective immigrants coming forward to the Saint John Drydock Company until confirmation is received that the company is no longer strike bound.

The second complaint was from the general strike committee in Saint John. It was alleged that the local immigration office was assisting the company by recruiting strikebreakers from newly arrived immigrants and was supplying them with beds and bedding at a private home in Saint John. An investigation has clearly established that there is no basis whatever for this complaint. The owner of the private home which was mentioned in the complaint is not even known to our officers, and no immigrant has been referred for employment to the Saint John Drydock Company since the strike began. It has been suggested to the general strike committee that these matters could best be clarified and settled by direct liaison between the committee in Saint John and the local immigration office.

COMMUNICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO CO-OPERATION IN SPACE PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Minister of Transport if he would comment on the circulation of a press story in the United Kingdom that Canada, through his department, is co-operating with the United States, the United Kingdom and France in a space project relating to or involving communication by satellite?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have had discussions with both the United States and the United Kingdom authorities regarding research and development work in this field, and we expect to be sending some senior departmental technical engineers to work with a special United Kingdom team in this field on a civil research project which is being developed on an international basis. I am not in a position to say more at this stage, but hope to be able to report in greater detail at a later time.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

QUEBEC—RESULTS OF STUDY RESPECTING ILE AUX TOURTES BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister tell us whether the survey that his engineers were to make regarding the Ile-aux-Tourtes bridge has been completed? As the minister knows, that bridge is to be part of the trans-Canada highway.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, or this morning, the engineers of my department received from the province of Quebec public works department the plans in question, which are under study at this moment.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PETAWAWA—INQUIRY AS TO RESULTS OF INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence whether he is in a position today to answer the question of which the associate minister took notice yesterday, having to do with the inquiry into the establishment and operation of the yacht club at Petawawa.

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Yes, the report has been received.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. Can the parliamentary secretary indicate to the house the findings of the report?

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to refer the hon. member's question to the minister.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONCTON—STATEMENT ON REPORTED LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): With reference to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Westmorland concerning the passenger car shop situation at Moncton, the management states that early in March the employees were advised that because of substantial reductions in passenger car mileage during the past five years, together with the acquisition of newer equipment which has lengthened the average shop cycle for passenger cars, the work load for passenger car repairs has been reduced substantially across the system. Accordingly it was indicated that it was the intention to discontinue gradually heavy repairs to passenger equipment at Moncton. Light passenger repairs would continue to be performed.

The current situation is that a number of employees previously engaged in passenger car work have been transferred to freight car work at Moncton. Discussions are continuing with the employees' representatives on their request for the transfer of some 34 Moncton men to other shops, but net reduction of staff because of the cessation of heavy passenger work will be less than 20.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO COST OF MINISTER'S TRIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General. According to a very important press release from his office the Postmaster General is very young, very active and very fast, travelling 9,000 miles across this country and the United States and even riding in a chuckwagon at Calgary. All this occupied the space of three and half days, during which he beat the clock and broke the sound barrier. Did the minister consider the advisability of carrying the mail with him, so that at least letters from Premier Bennett could reach the Minister of Finance in a shorter period of time?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker, I find that the mail is very effectively carried by the normal service. However, I do want the hon. member to know that at least at the opening of the wonderful new post office in Calgary I had occasion to think of him because of the view I had looking straight ahead while riding in a chuckwagon behind some white horses.

Mr. Denis: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order; before the hon. member asks his supplementary question perhaps I should remind him that the best humourists do not attempt to cap their own stories.

Mr. Denis: This is a more serious question, Mr. Speaker, and should receive a more serious answer. As the taxpayers' money flies with the Postmaster General, will he tell the house, in between trips, the cost of these travels?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member can put a question on the order paper, Mr. Speaker, if he wants that kind of information. I would point out to him that the purpose of these trips was to attend the postmasters association meetings in Edmonton and in Winnipeg. I am leaving again tonight for Peterborough for another such meeting, and then going on to Chicago to say something about Canadian postal policy and postage stamps. If the hon. member feels that this administration should not meet the postmasters and learn something about their problems, that it should not see that Canadian views are expressed across this country and in the United States, then I may say that I certainly do not agree with him.

Mr. Denis: I was asking about the cost of these travels. There is no reason why the minister could not give the cost of his next trip after he has returned home.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think perhaps the request relating to the cost was taken as a criticism of the journey and, in that sense, the answer was not out of order. In any event, if the hon. member wishes to know the cost he can put a question on the order paper.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

165. Departmental administration including annual contribution of $200 to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada and $167,500 as grants to recognized private after-care agencies as may be approved by treasury board, $1,194,583.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, examining the estimates submitted by the Department of Justice and comparing them with the main and supplementary estimates submitted for the previous fiscal year, or comparing them with those for 1959-60, I find certain discrepancies.

That is why I should like to put a few questions to the Minister of Justice.

If one takes the blue book tabled this year, which indicates that this year the same method was followed as in every other year, one sees in the first column the amounts we are asked to vote for the current fiscal year; the second column shows the amounts voted by the house for the previous fiscal, that is the 1960-61 fiscal year.

That second column is made up of the main and supplementary estimates we voted. In addition, we have the supplementary estimates which were introduced only after the blue book was printed and distributed, I think, around February.

This year the same procedure was followed as in previous years, that is in 1960-61 and in 1959-60.

Having indicated, Mr. Chairman, what I believe to be the truth concerning the procedure to be followed and that which was followed, I should like now to make a few remarks based on figures taken from the estimates, and with your permission I shall begin with the fiscal year 1959-60. These figures include items to be discussed as well as statutory votes.

According to page 34 of the blue book for the fiscal year 1959-60, we voted an amount of $27,335,204 in the main estimates.

[Mr. Denis.]

Later during the year we were asked to vote supplementary estimates. At this point I refer the committee to page 4 of the supplementary estimates. We had voted an amount of $1,727,541.

These amounts together give a total of $29,062,745.

We also voted other supplementary estimates included in the new supplementary estimates No. 2. The amount was $52,300, which gives a grand total of $29,115,045 for the year 1959-60.

And now, I want to refer to the blue book for the 1960-61 fiscal year and to the second column which includes main and supplementary estimates for the previous year; I find a total of $29,062,745, which is the amount we voted then in main and supplementary estimates. This means that at the time the blue book for the 1960-61 fiscal year was printed, supplementary estimates No. 2 were not included.

Now, if I take the amounts we voted last year and that we find in the first column of the 1960-61 blue book, I find—at page 34 of that book—that the total amount of the main estimates is $26,382,901. However, last year we voted the further supplementary estimates No. 2 which, according to page 4, amounted to $719,382. We also voted the further supplementary estimates No. 4 which according to page 2 were to the amount of $365,000. Those three amounts make a total of $27,467,283.

According to my findings, this year's book of estimates was distributed to us after we had voted those supplementary estimates No. 4. Well, this addition I just mentioned completes the total amount of $27,467,283.

Perhaps the minister, after I am through with my remarks, would tell me whether I am right and give me, at the same time, an appropriate explanation.

In the second column this year's estimates, the main and statutory estimates that we have voted make up a total of $28,328,287. So there is quite a difference. But I will go further.

A while ago, I said that as far as I know, the book of estimates for the current year was distributed during the month of February. Now, in March, we voted an amount of $82,000 under new supplementary estimates No. 5. Adding to that amount the main estimates, new supplementary estimates No. 2 and new supplementary estimates No. 4, we get a total of $27,549,283.

As I have just said, the total in the second column of the blue book for the current year which, if I am not mistaken, is supposed to indicate the total amount we have voted for the previous year, is $28,328,287. Now, I notice that all in all we have voted only $27,549,283.

How is it then that the blue book indicates that $28,328,287 has been voted that year, that is $779,004 more than we actually voted? Have there been transfers of funds or changes in the administration? Have additional amounts which concern other departments been transferred under the Department of Justice? I feel those are questions we have a right to ask.

To summarize my point, if we compare the total of the funds voted for 1959-60 with the amount shown in the second column of the blue book for 1960-61, we find that the figures are the same—not including the supplementary estimates—that is $29,062,745. On the other hand, a comparison between the total amount —including the last supplementary estimates for last year—that is $27,549,283, and the amount indicated in the second column of the blue book for 1961-1962, we find a discrepancy of $779,004.

Before continuing with my remarks on item No. 165, which shows an obvious discrepancy, I should like to ask the minister to give us the explanations which are necessary under the circumstances.

(Text):

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a very few remarks in connection with the bill of rights, because I have heard it mentioned both in the house and outside. This act, in the very brief time since last summer during which it has been in effect, has been frequently invoked and fulfils a notable function in our system of jurisprudence. I think a grave disservice is being done by those who seek to scoff at its usefulness by attempting to attribute to this law certain characteristics which were not and could not be attached to it, and then saying that the bill has failed in its purpose because in these respects it did not serve to protect certain individuals.

In the first instance, many of the cases where it has been suggested there has been a failure on the part of the bill of rights have been concerned with matters entirely within provincial jurisdiction. Time after time I have heard statements pointing out certain alleged weaknesses in this legislation with reference to injustices which it has created. In many of these cases there is no doubt that provincial laws and regulations were involved. It is my respectful submission that if much of the energy which is misdirected in improperly attacking and criticizing the bill of rights was instead used in trying to persuade provincial legislatures to pass complementary legislation, that is provincial bills of rights, which will have the same effect in the provincial field that this bill of rights has in the federal field, it would be a very fine thing.

In many cases there has been an erroneous conception of the way to make use of the law. Not only is it a shield against oppression; it is also a sword with which to obtain rights. But it is a sword that must be properly used. In many instances the person to use it is the individual whose rights have been curtailed or interfered with.

Thus if a person is removed from his employment because of his employer relying upon a clause or provision in the contract of employment, and the employee thinks the dismissal contravenes the bill of rights, one remedy is an action for damages for wrongful dismissal. This may not give the same measure of publicity for those in public life who seek publicity, and it may not make an interesting news story for those who write about it, but what is most important is that it does ensure some measure of reparation for those who are entitled to it.

I would ask the minister, before the estimates of his department are completed, to give the committee any statistical information he may have as to the number of instances in which the bill of rights has been invoked. I know that in due course there will be a body of jurisprudence built up and established in the law reports of the country. However, I am wondering whether at this time the minister or his officials have been able to secure any information as to the number of instances in which people have invoked the bill of rights in connection with certain matters before the courts.

I have read a great many news stories, as I am sure other hon. members have. If you take those as being that part of the iceberg which is above water, there is no question at all that this legislation, in the very brief time since it was passed, has been of great value and service. As a practising lawyer over many years I know there are instances which I look back upon where the presence of this legislation would have served to secure redress for my clients.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Chairman, there are two other matters I should like to place before the minister under this item by way of suggestion. First there is the question of the procedure for dealing with appeals from magisterial convictions. I think the hon. member for Welland said the other day that before the magistrates' courts is where you find the greatest percentage of people who make their first contact with the administration of justice, and the right of appeal from magistrates' courts should be carefully guarded. It has been my experience, and it has been brought to my attention, that sometimes difficulties and impediments do arise under section 722 of the Criminal Code, which is the section dealing with the procedure as to service of notice of appeal, because it is not possible to seek out and serve the respondent or the informant within the time limit provided by that section. Sometimes it is not possible to serve the person who was the informant and would be the respondent. This is particularly true in the more remote areas of the country and, I think, in many rural districts.

I would ask the minister to give some consideration to introducing an amendment to the code by which provision for substituted service could be provided. In addition I would ask the minister to give consideration to extending the time within which the notice should be served and the proper affidavits filed either before or after the expiration of the 30 day limit. In my experience this would be very useful and would give appellants the right to which they are entitled which sometimes, because of the present rigid requirement of the law, is not the case. This is a statutory right of appeal, and all judges insist that there be rigid compliance with all the requirements.

The other question I should like to ask the minister at this time is whether he would give consideration or has given consideration to amending the present law in the Criminal Code where penalties and offences are set out in so far as driving automobiles is concerned. The minister will recall that a number of years ago we had what was known as the offence of dangerous driving. As I now read the code we are limited at the present time to the offence of criminal negligence. It has been my experience, and this experience is reinforced by statements which have been made to me by people who should know, that it is becoming increasingly difficult to secure a conviction on a charge of criminal negligence.

Having in mind the slaughter and the necessity of striving to cut down the accidents and this dreadful toll of human lives which continues to infest our highways, does the minister think it might be worth while to consider restoring an offence of an intermediate nature where convictions might more readily be obtained, rather than having only the offence of criminal negligence, of which juries and judges are loath to convict?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to take advantage of this item to bring to the attention of the minister and the committee a certain circumstance that affected a young lady, which clearly demonstrates the ineffectiveness of the present bill of rights to protect the freedoms of Canadians. I support the principle of the bill, but I am rising briefly to bring this to the attention of the minister to indicate that we must go further. We have either to incorporate the bill in the constitution or get agreement with the provinces to enact enabling legislation.

In the Calgary Albertan of May 11 this year I read an article entitled "Free speech? Fire girl for talk". The article continues:

> Miss Valerie Smith, the young Calgary draftsman who spoke a kind word for Cuba under Castro at Tuesday's meeting of the Knights of the Round Table, has been fired from her job. Miss Smith, an employee of Midwest Surveys Ltd. for the past 3½ years, was dismissed Wednesday morning by the company's manager, J. J. Simpson, after an account of her speech at the Knights of the Round Table appeared in The Albertan.

I have a copy of the speech here which I have read with interest, and hon. members may wish to know that the factual information contained in it is based on a report by Professor Samuel Shapiro, assistant professor of history at Michigan State University (Oakland) and also on various articles which appeared in The Nation which as we all know, is a United States magazine.

I think this raises an important question, and the reaction to this young lady's dismissal shows the extent of the public interest in the preservation of fundamental rights and human freedoms for Canadian citizens. No one with an objective turn of mind, reading this speech, could see any reason for this young lady suffering dismissal for expressing her views. Some people might not agree with those views, but they are presented in a fair and clear manner. The public interest to which I have referred was indicated by the Knights of the Round Table themselves, who have written letters to various members of this house. Here is one of these letters, addressed to the hon. member for Assiniboia:

> We, the undersigned, were all present at the meeting of the Calgary Knights of the Round Table on Tuesday, May 9, when Miss Valerie Smith spoke on Cuba.
> Speaking only as individuals, and not officially for the Table, we wish to state our opinion that Miss Smith's report on what she saw in Cuba was very similar to those of other unprejudiced observers, dealing, as it did, chiefly with the improved living conditions of the rural population and better educational opportunities generally.

I have had Canadian Press men tell me that within the last two or three weeks.

> The Knights of the Round Table is an organization of business and professional men and has been in existence for some 35 years. It prides itself on offering a platform for the free expression of opinion on any question however controversial. Consequently we feel very concerned at the unjust treatment of Miss Smith by her employer.

This letter is signed by half a dozen members of the Calgary branch of the Knights of the Round Table. I noticed, in addition, a press item which appeared on May 12 in the Albertan, as follows:

The Knights of the Round Table, a group of leading Calgary business and professional men, Thursday night "deplored" the firing of Miss Valerie Smith for expressing pro-Cuban and pro-Castro sentiments.

Miss Smith, who addressed the Round Table on her return from Cuba, was fired from her drafting job with Midwest Surveys Ltd.

In a statement to the Albertan, Charles S. Lee, president of the Knights of the Round Table said "We are a forum for free expression where all shades of opinion may be presented."

That is the very basis of democracy:

"The existence of freedom of speech in the community is put to the test when someone expresses an unpopular view.

"Any action to penalize a speaker or deprive him or her of natural and legitimate rights is deplored by this Table, and we are anxious that any action of this kind should not pass without protest".

Then again, I notice that the Alberta federation of labour has shown an interest in this case, as is clear from the following report which also appeared in the Albertan on May 16:

The Alberta federation of labour will request the provincial government to immediately enact a fair employment practices act, Frank Bodie, A.F.L. executive secretary, announced Monday.

The move of labour was sparked by the dismissal of Miss Valerie Smith following her recent talk to the Knights of the Round Table in which she praised conditions as she saw them in Castro's Cuba on a two week holiday.

The A.F.L. will also protest the company's action in a letter to the board of industrial relations.

In addition to the numerous articles and letters which have appeared in the Alberta newspapers, we have received a good number of letters ourselves. I have one in my hand, Mr. Chairman, asking that some of us should raise the question in the house since it is felt to be a supreme example of discrimination but which has far wider implications—these are the words of my correspondent—in that it will result in the muzzling of any citizen who does not choose to be subservient to the generally accepted opinions. This letter goes on to ask that the question be brought before the Minister of Justice in order that he may consider whether it would be possible to amend the bill of rights so as to make it more effective, or to incorporate the bill of rights in our constitution.

I fully appreciate the difficulties in this regard because of the nature of our constitution, but I do think a case such as this demonstrates clearly the necessity for the government to continue to press for the incorporation of the bill of rights into the constitution or for the co-operation of the provinces in passing enabling legislation to support it.

The dismissal of this girl was, possibly, an action taken in haste because the manager in question was irritated by the views she had expressed. As I said before, in my opinion the speech was very tolerant and moderate in tone. It expressed the view that Castro is doing a great deal for the Cuban people, and so on, but that is a matter of opinion. Good gracious; if we do not allow an individual to express unpopular opinions, democracy cannot survive. We need to take an example from Great Britain, where you can go any day of the week, particularly to Hyde park, and hear people talking about the desirability of burning down Buckingham Palace; and there is a constable on duty nearby to protect them while they say it.

I shall never forget being in Britain during the Suez crisis. I was in the House of Lords on the second day of the debate. The universities sent delegations to London to protest the action being taken by the government. They came in busloads from Oxford, from Bristol, from Manchester and from other towns all over Britain. They paraded in front of the palace of Westminster. We were provided with a stand in front of the building by an official of the commonwealth parliamentary association and we saw them as they went by holding up banners containing such slogans as "Down with Eden", "Stop the Murders", and all the rest of it. Policemen were walking alongside. Then following were thousands of members of the communist party carrying the union jack and the red flag, marching in columns. Those in the crowd, instead of hurling bottles and invectives behaved in an altogether different manner. I heard one old cockney standing to my right shouting as the red flag went by "Blimey, mate, where did you get that bloody old rag from?"

That is the spirit which preserves democracy; that is the spirit in which fair play is maintained, and in these circumstances people rally to the defence of democracy. People who become irritated and are impelled to all kinds of hasty action when opinions are expressed with which they do not agree, do not understand what democracy really means.

As I say, I undertook to bring this question to the attention of the minister and I should like him, later on, to refer to the incident in question and inform the committee what is being done at the present time to secure a wider acceptance of the bill of rights and ensure fundamental freedom to all persons. I should like him to tell us, further, what educational work is being done by the federal government to secure a wider understanding of the principles behind this bill.

Mr. Peters: I should like to endorse what has been said by my hon. friend from Kootenay West. I have received a number of letters on the same subject, the firing of Miss Smith, from people in my riding as well as from others outside my riding. I think the public in general is entitled to know just what the bill of rights means to them and to what extent it protects them in relation to this matter of free speech. An article appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of May 17 entitled "Bill of Rights Penned on Calfskin". It says:

> Copies will be distributed widely. Already there are 15,000 orders for it. The price is likely to be around $1. But nobody will get the bill of rights alone. All will have this extract from Mr. Diefenbaker's speech:
> "I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom, I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind."

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we as Canadians should ask whether this is a right which we now possess, or a law that has been passed enabling individuals to go to court to prove their rights by litigation. If the latter is the case, I suggest this right will not apply to the majority of Canadians at any time, and that they are no better off than before. We in this country have always believed that laws of various kinds, in respect of various subjects, protected the people of this country from violations of the four freedoms which have been fundamental to our way of life. I also suggest that Canadians as a whole believe that the bill of rights is a bill which the government intended to see implemented on behalf of the people of this country so that litigation would be unnecessary to establish those rights, that the rights were inherent to all Canadians.

I have in my hand a copy of a letter from a resident of Alberta where the offence took place to which I have referred. This letter is addressed to my leader.

Mr. Drysdale: Who is that, Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Peters: I should like to read a portion of this letter. The letter is dated May 11, 1961 and reads as follows:

> Since you are one of the few M.P.'s who are championing the cause of true Canadianism—

Mr. McCleave: What a laugh that is.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this may be a laugh to some hon. members, but I am sure the people of Alberta are well aware that my leader, the hon. member for Assiniboia, is one of the few Canadians who champion the cause of Canadianism.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the hon. member for Assiniboia. I thought the hon. member for Timiskaming was referring to himself.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The same holds true for the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the letter reads as follows:

> Since you are one of the few M.P.'s who are championing the cause of true Canadianism and attempting to restrict the foreign control of our natural resources and way of life, I am enclosing the attached clipping from this morning's local paper.
> This is surely in direct contradiction to our bill of rights and everything that we stand for in Canada today and, I thought, the so-called free world.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, how is this relevant to the estimates of the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I suggest we are getting into the problem of deciding whether we are discussing the estimates of the Minister of Justice or the estimates of the Attorney General of Canada, who administers our laws and is responsible for that administration as attorney general. Perhaps the hon. member who made the interjection could inform me that we are discussing only the estimates as applied to the Department of Justice, and thereby solve a problem which has puzzled me for some time. If it is the contention of the hon. member that we are only considering the estimates of the Minister of Justice, I should like the minister to clarify this point. Is the minister the attorney general, as well as the Minister of Justice, serving in the same capacity for Canada in relation to the administration of our laws as the attorney general does in each province?

Having heard nothing from the minister to the contrary, I assume we are discussing his function as attorney general as well as Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, does the hon. member wish to know the functions of the Attorney General of Canada? If so, it may help him to be relevant in his discussion if I read section 5 of the Department of Justice Act, which is as follows:

> 5. The Attorney General of Canada shall
> (a) be entrusted with the powers and charged with the duties that belong to the office of the attorney general of England by law or usage, so far as those powers and duties are applicable to

Canada, and also with the powers and duties that, by the laws of the several provinces, belonged to the office of attorney general of each province up to the time when the British North America Act 1867, came into effect, so far as those laws under the provisions of the said act are to be administered and carried into effect by the government of Canada;

(b) advise the heads of the several departments of the government upon all matters of law connected with such departments;

(c) be charged with the settlement and approval of all instruments issued under the Great Seal of Canada;

(d) have the regulation and conduct of all litigation for or against the crown or any public department, in respect of any subject within the authority or jurisdiction of Canada;

(e) be charged generally with such other duties as are at any time assigned by the governor in council to the Attorney General of Canada.

I should say that I personally fail to see how, under that description of the duties of the Attorney General of Canada, there rests upon him any responsibility with respect to action, such as the hon. member has made reference to, over which jurisdiction is entirely provincial.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that if one looks at the estimates it will be seen that the salaries paid to the Minister of Justice and to the Solicitor General are included in the same estimate. I suggest, therefore, the two should be considered as one department. There are no estimates for the Solicitor General of Canada, except in so far as the estimates of the Department of Justice apply to him.

The Chairman: I draw to the attention of the hon. member for Hull that the minister was indicating his responsibilities as Attorney General of Canada, and not those of the Solicitor General of Canada. I think the problem in respect to this point was dealt with in an answer to a question put to the Minister of Justice, on orders of the day, by the hon. member for Skeena. It was indicated at that time that these matters of employment, or the cessation of employment, were matters within the jurisdiction of the provinces, for the reasons advanced at that time. I suggest this involves a question of civil rights, and the administration of justice in this regard is a provincial matter.

Therefore I do not believe that the hon. member is entitled to make reference to a case which is entirely within the jurisdiction of a province. The Minister of Justice is concerned with legislation which is introduced in the house, having regard to the bill of rights, and a discussion in that respect would be relevant. A passing reference to the bill of rights by hon. members could therefore be proper, but a discussion of individual cases over which the minister has no control because they come under the administration of justice within provinces, or perhaps involve civil rights under the jurisdiction of the provinces, would not be relevant. I hope, therefore, hon. members will not discuss the details of problems in respect of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the Minister of Justice for outlining his duties. That probably represents the information which Canadian people have been looking for to understand his duties having regard to the bill of rights.

I should like to ask whether the bill of rights is of any value as it presently stands, or should it now be included as part of our constitution. I suggest that is not what the Prime Minister indicated when he said that the people of Canada should have the right of freedom of speech in this country. The individual to whom I have referred is a girl who took the opportunity, which was also offered to members of parliament, of going to Cuba during the Easter holidays to examine at length the situation there. Upon her return she attended a meeting of the Knights of the Round Table service club and presented her opinion of what she had seen during her visit to that country. She did this in a manner completely divorced from the field in which she was employed, but was fired as a result.

I would think that when the bill of rights mentions freedom of speech, it includes protection against the loss of one's job. While it is true that the actual loss of employment may be a provincial matter and not fall within the jurisdiction of the federal government, yet it is a fact that we have a bill of rights which the Prime Minister and others have stated will give protection for freedom of speech, freedom of association and the other freedoms inherent in our Canadian way of life. That being so, the bill of rights should guarantee these freedoms to all citizens, and certainly one of the easiest ways to prove that it does not exist is when some company, particularly a company under the domination of the United States oil industry, discharges someone for speaking in a manner that is not detrimental to Canada or even to the company for which the individual works but as he saw things, and for expressing his own views publicly.

I had occasion to watch the program "Close-Up" the other night when this matter was discussed. Three well known and well respected business people from the city of Calgary who took part were of the opinion that the things the lady said probably were harsh. She is a woman 26 years of age. Maybe she was harsh in expressing her opinions on an international matter, but there was nothing wrong in what she said. Nothing was contrary to the good and welfare of Canada itself. I, and I think most citizens of Canada, believe that if the bill of rights is for the protection of our people it should not be necessary for this lady to sue or to do any of the other things that are open to her in the provincial field. She should have the protection of a federal act. I suggest that the responsibility for this situation must rest with the attorney general.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: Yes.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Does the hon. member believe that the freedoms enumerated in the bill of rights include the right to work? Is this not the line on which he is speaking?

Mr. Peters: I believe the right to employment is the right of every person, and that we should have the opportunity to work. I presume the hon. member is referring to the right to work in another context with which, of course, I disagree. I believe in the right to employment, but that is not the right in question at this time. We are discussing only the rights that appear in the bill of rights.

I believe that changes, amendments or qualifications must be made in the act. Some change must take place in the office of the attorney general so that it will function not only in the prosecuting of people under such legislation as the Combines Investigation Act, through charges laid by the R.C.M.P. and in other fields, but it must work also for the protection of the individual in Canada, to give him the protection that we in the House of Commons thought we gave when we passed the bill of rights. If this is not done, if the bill of rights is not giving these freedoms to everyone as a right, not by litigation or by court procedure, then the bill of rights is a hollow mockery and the country might as well know it. It will be up to the people to make the bill of rights a part of our constitution; then it will be administered as the constitution is administered, and the benefits from it will flow automatically to everyone resident in the country.

There are many other cases that I have been interested in where the attorney general's office, in my opinion, has not functioned as it should. Individuals have made decisions with respect to which the attorney general could act on behalf of the Canadian people, without any need for litigation, if he so desired. I should like to refer to one of those cases. This matter has been brought to my attention and I have communicated with the minister with respect to it. I have made some other inquiries. It has to do with the sale of merchandise to some people in this country. This merchandise may or may not be as represented. Companies are being set up—the hon. member can keep on shaking his head as long as he wishes; I am quite well aware of the fact that he does not understand this problem or hardly any other problem. I am not a lawyer. I did not pass the bill of rights to make lawyers rich. My vote helped to pass the bill of rights to see that Canadians received justice without having to go to court. If the bill of rights means that lawyers are going to make a fortune out of it, then may I say that was not my intention.

I received a letter from an individual in my riding referring to knitting machines that were being sold there. This is a case where misrepresentation took place. Many machines were sold. The company either folded up immediately or the individuals left town. The merchandise sold to the people was unsatisfactory. Immediately after the contract was signed it was assigned to another agency, which may or may not be a part of the original organization. The negotiable instrument was sold after the delivery was made. This is the situation that results. The people who receive the merchandise will return it because it is unsatisfactory, but they will still be required to pay for the merchandise itself. I would place one case on the record.

The Chairman: Before the hon. member continues I should like him to indicate to me how he relates this problem with the estimates of the Department of Justice. I fail to see any relation it may have. It is a problem of the administration of justice, which comes under property and civil rights, which is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Unless the hon. member is referring to a federal law or a federal act I fail to see how he can be relevant in discussing this matter.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed I wonder whether I might deal with one matter which I think without question is within the jurisdiction of this department. While it is a question of employee-employer relationships, it is one which comes within the jurisdiction of the federal government and has a relationship with the bill of rights. The case has been well publicized in the newspapers because of the unique situation which existed. Questions have been asked in the house about it, and documents relating to this particular incident have been tabled.

I am referring specifically to what I consider to be an abrogation of that which has been classified in the bill of rights as freedom of association, and specifically to a Mr. Terry Whitfield who was summarily dismissed by Canadian Marconi Company under a clause in their contract of employment, which is completely contrary to that part of the bill of rights relating to freedom of association.

The Marconi company wrote to Mr. Whitfield with respect to this matter on April 12, 1961, under the signature of Mr. S. M. Finlayson, the president. I should like to read the relevant part of this letter if I may, Mr. Chairman, to indicate what I mean. It is addressed to Mr. Whitfield, c/o Canadian Marconi Company, R.C.A.F. Station, Great Whale River, Box 6121, Montreal, and reads:

Dear Mr. Whitfield:

Since receipt last week of your letter dated the 27th ultimo I have had an investigation made of the circumstances relating to your employment to which it alludes and am now in a position to reply.

Under the terms of your employment agreement, set out in the letter of November 2, 1960, addressed to you by Mr. R. MacLeod, manager of our special services division, and signed and accepted by you the following day, it was expressly provided:

Then he quotes the section from that particular contract:

Native and Eskimo villages are considered out of bounds and personnel are prohibited from fraternization or association with the native populations except in special circumstances. Infringement of these orders is cause for discharge.

Mr. Lambert: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. While this subject may be relevant in another context, I fail to see how a contract of employment can be a subject of discussion under the estimates of the Department of Justice, even though there may be rights under the bill of rights which should be invoked on behalf of the individual. The individual must invoke those rights by an action against his employer. This is a contract of employment. I feel, therefore, that the discussion of this subject is not germane, although it may be in another context. I submit that all this discussion is out of order.

Mr. Howard: If I may comment on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, I should like to indicate what the bill of rights says in this respect. I quote section 1, as follows:

It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely—

Then there is an enumeration of a number of them, and paragraph (e) says:

(e) freedom of assembly and association;

The Minister of Justice was one who participated in the passage of this particular act under which he has certain responsibilities. The act declares that certain conditions have existed, and I merely point out this particular incident as an example of something that is contrary to the provisions in the bill of rights. This incident shows these conditions have not existed and do not exist in respect of Mr. Whitfield and Miss Witalktuk, the young lady to whom he is engaged and whose association with him caused his dismissal.

I submit that it is entirely in order to discuss the subject from the point of view of justice to this individual. If the bill of rights means anything at all, if the minister has any obligation whatever in this regard, certainly it is in order to discuss this obviously callous and arrogant treatment by the Canadian Marconi Company of Mr. Whitfield, which is completely contrary to the provisions of the bill of rights. If we cannot discuss it here, if it is not a question of justice to this individual, where can we discuss it? Perhaps we can discuss it outside the house, as we are able to do on so many occasions when hon. gentlemen opposite object to things being debated here.

The Chairman: The hon. member must realize that he is in the House of Commons of Canada and must discuss matters which are within the province of the federal parliament. I suggest that he is not free to discuss matters which come within provincial jurisdiction. He is free to discuss those matters outside of this house.

In so far as the bill of rights is concerned, this bill does not apply to matters within the jurisdiction of the provinces. As I indicated before, the matter of employment involves a civil right which is clearly within the jurisdiction of the provinces, as is the administration of justice. I feel, therefore, that the hon. member cannot really discuss subjects of that kind on the estimates of the Department of Justice. I would not say there would not be other occasions on which the problem of the bill of rights could be discussed in general, but certainly not in the way the hon. member for Skeena is seeking to do and as the hon. member for Timiskaming sought to do earlier. I rule, therefore, that in the way this discussion has been going up to the moment, it is not relevant.

Mr. Caron: In order to clarify the situation, Mr. Chairman, may I ask if the Minister of Justice is responsible to the house for the bill of rights?

The Chairman: In relation to those matters indicated in the bill of rights. For instance, when legislation is brought before the house it must be examined by the Minister of Justice in order that he may determine that there is nothing within the legislation contrary to the bill of rights.

Mr. Caron: There is another question that I should like to put. If a member wants to ask the minister whether there is any possibility of amending the bill of rights, in view of the conflict between provincial and federal rights, would that be within the rules of this house?

The Chairman: I fail to see how the hon. member, by directing a question to the Minister of Justice during the discussion of the departmental estimates, could force the minister to impose any obligation on the provinces to implement the bill of rights within those provinces, or to direct that a provincial bill of rights be enacted. This is certainly not the responsibility of the minister. I think this case is clearly in the same position as the one that has been discussed, which clearly was not the concern of the Minister of Justice. It seems to me that this discussion is clearly irrelevant.

Mr. Howard: I think there has been a misunderstanding about what we are getting at in this particular case to which I referred, the relationship between Mr. Whitfield and the Canadian Marconi Company and his discharge because of this fraternization clause. I submit the matter is within the jurisdiction of this federal parliament because Mr. Whitfield was working for the Canadian Marconi Company, which company has a contract with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for certain activities near Great Whale river. It is this relationship that I was getting at. Here is an individual working for a company—

The Chairman: I understand the point that the hon. member is trying to make. It may be a problem for discussion with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to ascertain what the department can do about a practice like that from an administrative point of view when it gives a contract to a company. However, the employment by Canadian Marconi of any person in the execution of this contract is certainly not a problem that is related in any way to the Minister of Justice or the Attorney General of Canada on these estimates; that is another matter. There may be an administrative problem to discuss with the minister concerned but, as the hon. member has clearly indicated, the employment contract is between a company and an individual and has nothing to do with the Minister of Justice. It is a private matter between the Canadian Marconi Company and the individual in question.

Mr. Howard: What I was leading into was an attempt to show where the bill of rights is deficient in this regard—the Attorney General of Canada has some responsibility in some fields, even though it is not precisely clear just what they all are—in not providing some machinery in the Department of Justice to enable Mr. Whitfield to find some solution to the grievance he has apart from spending all his time and money wandering around the courts attempting to deal with a monopolistic outfit like the Canadian Marconi Company.

This is the matter to which I wanted to direct my remarks, Mr. Chairman. However, if you rule that I cannot do that, I am prevented at this stage anyway from dealing with the specific case of Mr. Whitfield, even though I think other hon. members who have spoken about the case, or have made reference to it slightly, feel that he has a justifiable grievance against the Marconi Company.

Yesterday there was great discussion about the introduction of a bill by way of subterfuge. Perhaps I had better try to find the exact words used. The minister said "because leave to introduce it was obtained by subterfuge". He was dealing then with Bill No. C-76. I think I am quite at liberty to say that we have before the House of Commons, and the Minister of Justice has examined a number of them, bills that have been introduced into the House of Commons by way of subterfuge also, and that he did not decline the opportunity of examining those bills and to pass on them at all. He went wholeheartedly into that effort to meet—

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order, may I ask the hon. member whether he can be more specific?

Mr. Fulton: No; because he would be out of order. The Chairman has already ruled that discussion out of order.

Mr. Howard: We have all sorts of statements from the Minister of Justice on matters for which he has no responsibility. He obviously wants to have the responsibility of being chairman or Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: I just want to get on with my estimates.

Mr. Howard: I am quite sure the minister wants to do that with the least amount of discussion, but that is not the way in which parliament functions.

Mr. Fulton: I ask for discussion of the estimates, not all these irrelevancies. That is my only request.

Mr. Howard: All I can do is follow the lead given by the Minister of Justice when he used to sit on this side of the house. I can see the advantage it brought to him and to his party. I think we are entitled to follow somewhat the same course. However, I should be glad to comply with the request of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and relate specifically to him the bills to which I refer. In fact I did that yesterday on two separate occasions and then, as you will recall, Mr. Chairman, we finally appealed a particular ruling to the house and the house decided that I could no longer go into that matter. Therefore I may do it only in an indirect way, although I would enjoy very much accommodating the hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

Last night I inquired of the Minister of Justice about the specific duties that have been assigned to the Solicitor General in so far as his functions within the Department of Justice were concerned and what those were in, for example, the past year. In reply the minister made a general comment about the matter saying in general terms that the Solicitor General was carrying on his affairs, doing extremely valuable work and so on, and he referred me to an answer of the Prime Minister about a year ago which I read into the record or dealt with on a previous occasion.

This statement does not answer the question. The Solicitor General may well be doing valuable work. There is no question about this matter. He may well be a most important and valuable person, as the minister put it, in the cabinet and the government of Canada. But what I should like to know specifically is what the Solicitor General has been doing, if he has some functions or some duties and has been carrying them out within the Department of Justice, surely this committee is entitled to know what those duties are before we proceed to deal with other matters in the Department of Justice.

I know that the Department of Justice is an extensive one. It may well be that there are all sorts of activities in which he engages, such as in the operation of the Parole Act. In passing, and before we get to that item, I should like to pay a tribute to Mr. Street, the chairman of the board, for the fine work being done in this particular field. It may well be that the Solicitor General has had assigned to him some responsibility in the particular field of the operation of the Parole Act. I do not know. It may well be that he has had assigned to him some responsibilities in the field of penitentiaries.

I think the committee should be entitled to have some explanation of this matter before we pass from this item to the other ones. It may well be that he is involved in the field of the Combines Investigation Act or in any of the other items under the Department of Justice. Before we proceed I think the Minister of Justice should explain in the necessary detail the functions of the Solicitor General and what he has been doing within the Department of Justice over the past year.

While the minister is at it and is dealing with that matter, he might deal with another one. I notice that last night the hon. member for Port Arthur raised one particular matter as shown at page 5387 of Hansard. Without quoting or reading the words of the hon. member for Port Arthur, I think we can in essence say that he wanted the minister to give some indication to the committee that the lawyers or members of the legal profession who have been retained by the department for certain activities have not been at the same time or previously members or supporters of a certain political party.

I wonder whether the minister would care to deal with those two items before we proceed to pass the first item?

Mr. Fulton: A number of points have been raised this morning. If I may, I will start with the point made by the hon. member for Megantic with regard to an apparent discrepancy between the totals shown in the second column of the blue book for this year as having been the expenditure by the department for 1960-61 and the totals as he arrived at them by adding up what was shown in the main estimates for last year plus various supplementary estimates. As I recall it, he pointed out that the discrepancy between the two totals was something of the order of $800,000 and asked me for an explanation.

The explanation I have is this. In the estimates for last year—that is for 1960-61—provision for salary revision for all the public service was made in one place, namely in the general salaries vote of the Department of Finance. In other words, the increase in expenditure that resulted from the salary increase which was approved last year, and amounted to many millions of dollars, was last year asked for under one item in the estimates of the Department of Finance.

Of course that would not give the true picture of the expenditures by departments, because the increase for convenience let us say it was in the neighbourhood of $40 million, although I am not saying that it was that amount—would obviously be divided, with so many million dollars to this department and so many million dollars to each of the other departments. When the book of main estimates was made up for this year, in order to reflect what was felt to be a truer picture, the amount of the salary increase attributable to each department was added to the amount shown in the second column in the book so that the amount in the second column in the book this year—that is the amount that is reported to have been spent last year—includes the portion of the salary increase attributable to the respective departments. But in last year's main and supplementary estimate none of it was shown as attributable to a specific department; it was all lumped in the Department of Finance estimates in a single item. I am told that the difference this year accounts for an amount of $861,004, and I think that is the difference to which the hon. gentleman was directing our attention.

The hon. member for Peace River raised two matters in connection with possible amendments to the Criminal Code. He drew attention to what he considers to be a situation which makes it desirable to amend section 722 of the code. I have to say that it is not our intention to make an amendment to this section this year. The Criminal Code amendment bill is practically ready, and it does not include an amendment which would cover that suggestion. However, we will certainly give it careful consideration for another year.

With respect to the second suggestion the hon. member made, I am glad to be able to say that in our study of this matter we have come to the conclusion that his suggestion is a proper one; that is, that there should be an amendment to the code in connection with offences committed while driving an automobile. I am confident that when my hon. friend sees the Criminal Code amendment bill he will approve of the amendment which we have included in that respect.

There was a considerable amount of discussion on the bill of rights and its application to one or two specific cases which were mentioned. You have ruled, Mr. Chairman, that in as much as it is not the responsibility of the Minister of Justice or Attorney General of Canada to enforce the bill of rights on behalf of individuals, particularly where the right concerned is within provincial jurisdiction, this is not a matter which should be discussed on the estimates of this department.

With that ruling I of course agree, but perhaps, I might, without violating your ruling, Mr. Chairman, refer to one part of the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West, who asked me what is being done to persuade the provinces to take similar action in their fields. This in my view would be the answer which hon. members who have raised these cases are seeking. If the provinces would enact similar bills of rights in their fields of jurisdiction—that is, similar to the bill of rights in the federal field—the whole field of rights and freedoms in Canada would be covered. It seems to me this is a desirable thing and I hope that the case in Calgary may serve as a further incentive, a further spur to citizens in the provinces to urge upon their governments, and finally urge successfully, that they too should adopt bills of rights which would be effective within the field of provincial jurisdiction.

For the rest, Mr. Chairman, the fact of the matter is that it was carefully explained at the time the bill of rights was before the house that the courts are an integral and essential part of the protection of our rights. All the legislature can do is define the rights and put them in statute form, which is a very effective form, to show that these rights exist and are the legislative entitlement of the Canadian people.

However, it was carefully explained by me in the course of the debate on the bill of rights that the courts were an essential part of the protection of our rights, and that if it was felt these rights may have been violated and should be asserted, protection or restitution should be sought from the courts.

Therefore hon. members should not feel they have been taken by surprise when they find this to be the situation. Of course it would be quite intolerable to take seriously the suggestion hon. members made—I am not relating this to any specific case—that the Minister of Justice or Attorney General of Canada should himself be responsible for deciding when a Canadian citizen's rights had been violated and what should be done to protect them.

I can understand their views when, as they view it, a large and powerful company is at fault here. However, let me ask these hon. members to consider the implications of what they are suggesting. I am quite sure they would resent it very deeply indeed if I made a finding that one of them, for instance, had violated the rights of somebody else and if I brought a prosecution myself and attempted to determine in what respect restitution should be made.

This, of course, is a matter for the courts. It would be an intolerable situation if the Minister of Justice or Attorney General were to accept this invitation and set himself up as an arbiter in cases where he felt a right had been violated. That would be a dictatorship; that is exactly what the bill of rights was designed to protect against, and it is something which this government would never allow, once it brought—

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that the minister is deliberately misconstruing the remarks made from this side of the chamber in order to paint an incorrect picture. While the minister may be trained in the use of words, he is using his position as minister to do this. It is most unkind and most unfair.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): C.C.F. nonsense.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend does not like to have the logical conclusion of his suggestion drawn to his attention. But that is what I am doing; I am drawing to his attention the logical conclusion of the suggestion he has made and the position that he and the hon. member for Timiskaming have taken in this respect.

The hon. member for Skeena also asked about the responsibilities of the Solicitor General. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I might just finish this subject before one o'clock. I direct the hon. member's attention again to the answer given by the Prime Minister, which was referred to in debate by the hon. member and by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert on May 19, just a week ago.

That, I think, is a complete answer; but to give some more particulars I can of course say that the Solicitor General is individually responsible for the review of all cases where the question of commutation of the death sentence arises. He is in charge of the review of cases generally where the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy is concerned, including the remission of fines and forfeitures, temporary releases from prison for compassionate reasons, applications for ordinary pardons and a number of other matters of that type, the submissions on which are numerous and involve a great deal of careful and very detailed consideration, research and comparison.

In addition to these particular duties, as the Prime Minister pointed out in his answer last week, the Solicitor General undertakes such assignments as may be referred to him as a member of cabinet, and of course he does act as Minister of Justice whenever the Minister of Justice happens to be away. I am not away too frequently, but there are occasions where official business takes me away. For instance, I was with the Prime Minister in London for ten days this year. During the period of negotiation of the Columbia river treaty I was frequently absent because of attendance in Victoria and Washington. On these and similar occasions the Solicitor General acts as Minister of Justice.

Therefore I think my hon. friend can set his mind at rest on the point of whether or not the Solicitor General, by his industry and by the importance of the tasks which he performs, merits the salary which is provided for him.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall vote No. 165 carry?

Mr. Howard: No. At one o'clock the minister was in the process of dealing with some of the questions which have been raised, specifically with one mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Port Arthur about the hiring of legal talent outside the department, and I think the minister had not concluded.

Mr. Bourque: On May 20, 1958, I brought up in this house the question of goof balls. At that time I was laughed at and sneered at by everyone—I see one hon. member sneering now—but I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the goof ball problem when I made reference to it then was a serious problem and that today it is a calamity in Canada.

Yesterday my colleague from St. Denis asked the Minister of Justice a question about what the government is doing in connection with this goof ball problem—he called it the barbiturate problem—and the minister replied, saying that while the hon. member was talking the government was acting. As I have just mentioned, I raised this subject in the house on May 20, 1958, and here is the minister saying in 1961, three years later, that the government was acting, that they were not talking. Well, if this is an example of the speed at which this government acts, then God help us poor Canadians. As I said, I brought the matter up in May, 1958, and today the minister tells us three years later, that they are acting. What were they doing in the meantime? They have spent three years doing nothing. For three years they stood idly by watching a problem, which could easily have been settled then, grow to a point where it must be considered as a national problem almost impossible of solution.

When I spoke on goof balls in May, 1958, the then chief of the inspection services of the Department of National Health and Welfare gave an interview to a newspaper saying there was no goof ball problem. He said he did not take seriously the term "goof ball". "I heard that one 30 years ago", he said. I said then that this official of the Department of National Health and Welfare must either have been asleep at the switch or trying to avoid his responsibility. I have here hundreds of clippings and editorials from Canadian newspapers dealing with the seriousness of the goof ball problem and urging that prompt measures be taken to combat it. Yet this official, this man who should have been on the alert, instead of investigating whether what I had said in the house was true, promptly denied my statement, claiming that there was no such thing as a goof ball problem.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether you and whether the hon. member who is speaking would not consider it more appropriate to raise this matter when the bill dealing with this subject, which will stand in the name of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare is introduced. I am, of course, prepared to accept my responsibility, but it seems to me the hon. member's remarks have made it abundantly clear that he is criticizing another department and, at the moment criticizing an official of another department for whom I am not responsible. I am sure an answer can be made, but I have not got the facts at my disposal to give it. I have no doubt that this discussion would be more appropriate when the legislation is brought down and when the minister who can accept responsibility for it is here, together with his officials.

Mr. Roberge: On the point of order, if I am not mistaken, my colleague from Outremont-St. Jean intends to relate his remarks to a situation prevailing in certain parts of the country where persons using goof balls are becoming involved under the Criminal Code and especially with the traffic in goof balls inside penitentiaries. I think, with respect, that it would therefore be in order for him to continue to discuss this matter.

Mr. Caron: Further to the point of order, in answering the hon. member for St. Denis, the minister said that next week or within ten days at the latest, the government was going to bring in legislation. I have only the details in French of what he said:

(Translation):

—a bill to carry out a narcotics control program, a bill to revise the Criminal Code to deal with dangerous sexual offenders—

(Text):

So, if the minister can announce in the house that a bill is to be brought in to amend the narcotics act, that is in accord with what my hon. friend is saying, namely that goof balls are becoming as dangerous as any other narcotics. The minister has stated that he intends to bring a bill before this house. I suggest this is a serious matter, and that the hon. member is simply trying to suggest to the minister that the bill should be made completely perfect in order to deal with this problem. Therefore, I think the minister should answer that suggestion.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I did not say that I would introduce the bill. My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has several times informed this house that he would introduce legislation in respect of both the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, and the Food and Drugs Act, which are the responsibilities of that minister. He will be introducing measures to deal with both problems, and at that time will outline the legislation in full and answer criticisms. I am not in a position to do so, because these acts are not within the administrative responsibility of my department.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, the minister said yesterday that he was going to introduce the bill.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I simply stated that legislation would be introduced to deal with the problem which has been referred to, namely, the problem of goof balls.

Mr. Caron: The house was informed that—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I am inclined to agree to some extent with both statements regarding the point of order raised by the minister. Very wide scope is generally allowed during the debate on the first item of the estimates of a department, and to the extent the hon. member is able to relate his remarks to the administration of justice and the Criminal Code itself, in view of the legislation referred to by the minister which is not yet before this house, I feel he should be allowed to carry on with the discussion of this general topic. However, to the extent that he was moving toward a discussion of another department of government, for which the minister, whose estimates are before this committee, is not responsible, I cannot find that the hon. member was in order. I should ask him to relate his remarks to the general topic of administration of justice and the Criminal Code itself.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I am concerned with the goof ball problem because it has been suggested by police officers, who have dealt with the problem on different occasions, that it is a more serious problem than the narcotic problem. These officers suggested they would sooner deal with a narcotic addict than a goof ball addict. I suggest that, with the passage of the proposed legislation in this respect, the vending of goof balls will be a criminal affair, with which the R.C.M.P. will have to deal. This will then be within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice, and I feel I am entitled, therefore, to refer to it.

Mr. Chairman, at the time I was interrupted, I was suggesting that this serious problem had been brought to the attention of the government.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

We are now considering the estimates of the Department of Justice and of the judiciary administrative power. Now, the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) takes it for granted that the very serious problem of goof balls is the responsibility of the Department of Justice. However, in order that there be a relationship between the estimates we have before us and the statement of the hon. member, the problem of goof balls would have to be made an illegal act under the Criminal Code. Unfortunately, no bill has yet been put forward to this end, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) will soon be submitting a measure to the house in that regard. Therefore, I respectfully submit that it is out of order for the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean to go on discussing goof balls or barbiturates.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, I think that is precisely the point made by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque). He hopes that the problem will be settled soon. If the matter of barbiturates or goof balls were covered by the criminal code, and if the enforcement of that legislation, as any federal legislation, were made a responsibility of the R.C.M.P., it could be dealt with rapidly.

As far as I know, there is nothing in the law or in the standing orders which forbids an hon. member from asking the minister to deal with the problem. That is what the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean has been doing, and I feel it would be placing too great a restriction on our discussions if the hon. member were forbidden to ask the minister to place this problem of goof balls or barbiturates on the same footing as narcotics.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I have made my comments in connection with the point of order. I will listen very carefully as the hon. member proceeds and, if I feel he is straying too far from the consideration of the estimates of this department, I will then intercede.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, at the point I was interrupted I was in the process of suggesting that the government could very easily have put an end to this illegal traffic some three years ago when the situation was brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

The use of goof balls has become a plague which is undermining the youth of our country. This fact was brought to the attention of the Department of Justice some three years ago, and I suggest that department should have taken it into consideration, enacted legislation making it illegal for pushers to sell these goof balls to the youth in our schools and elsewhere. However, at that time the government did nothing in this regard. Now, three years later, the Minister of Justice announces that it is intended that measures be found to combat this serious menace.

I suggest the use of goof balls is the first step toward drug addiction. Boys and girls from 12 to 18 years of age—perfect boys and girls—can become criminals over night through the use of goof balls which they are able to purchase at confectionery stores and ice cream parlours. If a boy or girl consumes a bottle of gingerale, or other similar drink, in which has been placed a goof ball, he or she is quite capable of committing murder or carrying out any other similar terrible crime. Three years ago there were three or four hundred girls and boys who were using goof balls. The government has done nothing to correct this situation, and today I suggest there are thousands of young boys and girls across this country who have fallen far down the social ladder through the use of goof balls. Nothing has been done to prevent men and women from despoiling our youth by selling them goof balls.

Authorities in Montreal have become alarmed by the growth of this goof ball traffic. They have called together scientists, statistical men, doctors, and other learned individuals in an attempt to find out what can be done to eradicate this evil. I understand that representations have been made to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in respect to a meeting to be held in Ottawa to discuss this situation. As long ago as May 20, 1958 I suggested in this house that the confectionery and ice cream parlours where these goof balls were being sold, should be kept under surveillance in an attempt to find out who the pushers were, with the intention of adopting measures to stop these harmful transactions. As I said a moment or two ago, nothing has been done.

I should like to direct hon. members' attention to an article which appeared in Time magazine of March 31, 1958, which I quoted in my remarks in this house on June 27, 1958, as reported at page 1700 of Hansard for that day. This article indicated that a young man, 14 years of age, died in Halifax from an overdose of goof balls which he had taken from the drug store where he was employed as a messenger. When this young man got home that evening his folks found that he acted strangely, as if he were drunk and foolish. Next day he went out for a walk and disappeared. Three weeks later his body was found in a wooded area near his home. The verdict of the coroner's jury was barbiturate poisoning.

I should also like to bring to your attention, Mr. Chairman, a small portion of an article entitled "Goof Balls Smuggled Into Prison", which appeared in the Montreal Star on Tuesday, March 25, 1958. In this article it was stated that an investigation had revealed that four dozen goof balls, barbiturate pills, had been smuggled into the prison on Sunday by a visitor. One hour after this visitor had left the prisoners had smashed all the windows, lights and water fixtures in the jail wing of the Joliette court house. If a few goof balls smuggled into a prison or a penitientiary will bring about the devastation that those brought about, namely the smashing of the wing of the jail, then just imagine what a gang of young hoodlums provided with goof balls will do.

I should like to proceed to another matter which I mentioned on August 22, 1958, in my remarks which may be found in Hansard for that day. I want the committee to bear in mind that the year was 1958. I shall have to proceed in French because this article is in French. I hold in my hand a few pages from the magazine Prevention, dated July, 1958. The magazine is published by the police and the fire chiefs of the province of Quebec. It is their official organ.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, there is on that page an article which deals specifically with goof balls. It reads as follows:

Teen agers threatened by the evil of substitutes for drugs.

The article goes on to say:

R.C.M.P. authorities have received over 20 complaints about young people who had been using sedatives or barbiturates, commonly known as goof balls.

And further on:

Complaints of that nature have come from several towns in the province, as well as from many quarters in the Montreal area.

It has been clearly established that young people are getting the habit of using goof balls in their customary meeting places, such as certain colleges and high schools, as well as in dance or community halls.

The article states that goof balls have become a social evil.

"According to an official spokesman of the social welfare court, this evil, which is taking on increasingly alarming proportions, seems to have started among our young people three years ago."

You will note, Mr. Chairman, that already in 1958 it was being said that the evil had existed for three years; and only now are steps being proposed to deal with a problem which has been with us for six years.

[Mr. Bourque.]

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member allow me a question? For the guidance of this committee, would he tell us when these barbiturates which he calls goof balls were first discovered?

Mr. Bourque: Well, personally, I cannot tell. I am not a druggist and I certainly was not the one who compounded the prescription for goof balls. On the other hand, it was I who called the attention of the house to this evil on May 20, 1958.

Therefore it is not up to me to find out whether the problem has been there for ten or 12 years.

Now, the statement is not mine; it is from an article published in an official publication of the chiefs of police and fire chiefs of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Martineau: May I ask the hon. member a supplementary question?

Mr. Bourque: Certainly.

Mr. Martineau: Seeing that the hon. member has raised this matter several times, it may be reasonably inferred that he is an expert as far as it goes. I should therefore ask him if he has made a special study of it and if he could tell us when the ills he has mentioned have been found to exist in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Bourque: The matter is before the public, and it has been investigated several times by the Montreal police, I have here hundreds of clippings dated from 1958 to 1960 and 1961.

The hon. member must be blind not to have read on the matter in the newspapers, because scores of articles were published about it in almost all the Canadian papers. Some appeared in Weekend and some in La Patrie du dimanche. Some can be found in every newspaper, Mr. Chairman, and not only short reports but feature articles covering full pages.

Consequently there is no need to go into the background of the matter. That the evil exists is common knowledge. It is an affliction, a cancer feeding on society and the government has not done a thing to stop it.

Mr. Martineau: I have heard the hon. member say so several times. I take the liberty of asking him questions again. Did he ever say in this house that the problem did not exist before 1958? That is what I would like to know.

Mr. Bourque: All I can say to the hon. member is that the problem came to my knowledge in 1958 and I immediately brought it to the attention of this house.

That is why I say that the government did not do a thing to remove this calamity.

I am still quoting, Mr. Chairman. Prevention is the official publication of the Quebec chiefs of police and firemen's association who, no doubt, must know their business. Therefore this publication must know what it is all about, for all those people are interested in eliminating this problem.

Besides, it is in the light of that social evil, which is a fearful threat to the physical and the moral health of our young people that the federal minister of health took proceedings against some 25 Montreal druggists who had sold "sedatives" or tranquilizers to teen agers without a prescription

Therefore, at that date, the federal minister was aware of existing difficulties. There were difficulties in July 1958, since there were 25 prosecutions against Montreal druggists. I quote again:

Similar proceedings were taken against druggists in Quebec, Shawinigan, Grand'Mère, Three Rivers, Valleyfield and a few other towns in the province. All were found guilty and fined.

Therefore the government cannot say that the problem was inexistent. It was very real. They even took proceedings. Further on, the text says this about St. Vincent de Paul:

Just a few days ago, two wardens of the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary were dismissed for introducing goof balls into that institution for distribution among the prisoners.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I don't know what conditions were before. It was only then that I learned about this business of goof balls.

Authorities tell us that in the last two years, the number of juveniles using such tranquilizers has risen from 40 per cent to 250 per cent in certain areas.

This percentage may now have gone up to 2,500 or 15,000 per cent, I would not know.

Every day we read press reports of criminal action by juveniles under the influence of goof balls.

Inspector Ovila Pelletier—

He is now deceased.

—chief of the youth assistance squad of the Montreal police, tells us that the problem is the most serious one he has to face at this time.

Later on we learnt, which is another proof that the federal Department of Justice knew about the matter, that, after action had been taken against a number of druggists:

The federal department of health and welfare has been congratulated on its gesture by various social agencies, by the authorities of the welfare court, various youth agencies and other organizations, because they considered the problem such a serious one.

Mr. Paul: On a point of order.

The last remarks of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean consisted of information received following certain court proceedings by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Now, for the last five or ten minutes, the hon. member has been speaking on a matter which is not under the jurisdiction of the department of the Minister of Justice, whose estimates we are now discussing.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean not to stray from the matter being discussed.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the question—

(Text):

May I be permitted to say a word about the question?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I have heard the point of order raised, and I confess to being very lenient, but this is a general principle we follow in connection with item 1 of departmental estimates. The fact of the matter is, however, that the prosecutions and so on to which reference has been made have been conducted under acts which are the administrative responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare. In any case, I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired, so this provides a good opportunity to intercede.

Mr. Deschatelets: No doubt leave could be obtained for the hon. member to continue. A certain amount of latitude has been granted to other members, and I presume the minister would not disagree with my suggestion.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): This is not the usual practice followed. The first speaker on departmental estimates is normally allowed an extension of time, and I do not think it would be right or proper to break the precedent. The hon. member will have another opportunity to participate in the debate if he wishes.

Mr. Howard: May I speak to the point of order? Surely, it is not the responsibility of the chairman to interpret the feelings of the committee in so far as the granting of additional time is concerned. This is something that requires unanimous consent. If unanimous consent is not given, then no extension of time is allowed. I do not believe it is the responsibility of the Chair to interpret what might be the attitude of the committee.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I was only pointing out what the practice of the committee normally is. I was not making any ruling. If the question is put to me, I will put it to the committee. Has the hon. member unanimous consent of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Roberge: I want to say just a few words on this question of goof balls. I should like to refer the Chair to an article that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of March 8, 1961, under the heading, "Brief to Fulton; Police Want Laws Changed". This article refers to seven recommendations with which I shall not deal in detail. However, recommendation No. 4 reads:

> Inclusion under the vagrancy section of unemployed drug addicts who do not have a doctor's certificate declaring them unable to work.

At this time. I wish to ask the minister to study the matter to ascertain if it is feasible to include in the amendments which will be introduced to the Criminal Code a section in the vagrancy provision that will take care of drug addicts and so on.

Mr. Fisher: Last night, Mr. Chairman, I had the opportunity of reading some words of one of the admirers of the minister. I am going to take advantage of the opportunity today to read another account in praise of the minister in order to give me another point from which to ask him a question or two. This is from a great admirer of the minister, Pat Nicholson, who puts out an Ottawa report for the Thomson papers. The heading in the Port Arthur newspaper of May 23 is, "Give High Rating For Davie Fulton".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: I am only going to read a couple of paragraphs which I know will delight the minister and his backers. I am glad to see them here today. The article reads in part:

> Thousands of words have flowed over his lips since that cold December day, only 4½ years ago, when British Columbia's own Davie Fulton challenged John Diefenbaker for the leadership of the Conservative party.
> But those words, unlike water flowing downstream to the sea, have not been lost. Dammed behind some personal wall of determination, they have gently but surely accumulated into a powerhouse of countrywide good will and respect for their speaker.

I know his colleagues in the committee will forgive me for leaving out a few paragraphs that are along the same general lines, but then we get down to this:

> Davie Fulton without question possesses the finest intellect in the cabinet today. For pure mental training and intellectual stature, he has no equal.

Then, I go on to this particular paragraph:

> He is, ex officio, the minister in charge of the R.C.M.P. In this role, he has had pleasant and unpleasant duties to perform, gaining the most headlines, perhaps, by his action in refusing to send R.C.M.P. reinforcements to Newfoundland when requested to do so by Liberal Premier Joey Smallwood who sought their aid in the labour dispute in that province.

[The Acting Chairman.]

Just as an aside, I should like to congratulate the minister on the strong fight he must have put up in the cabinet in order to obtain support for not sending police into Newfoundland.

Going on in the article, we come to this phrase. Mr. Nicholson suggests the minister could have been a hero if he had gone to British Columbia and taken over the leadership of the Conservative party there but, as the author says:

> —he chose to remain in Ottawa, from which strategic centre he breaks out to deliver good fighting speeches to public audiences, campaigning for his government and for his own future, showing that he can call on wit, derision, learning, common sense, farsightedness and rhetoric to uplift and persuade his audience.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this article sets out, perhaps properly and perhaps accurately, an estimate of the minister's worth. I certainly am not going to gainsay or deny this. But in view of this breadth and ability that the minister seems to have, I want to turn to one small point and ask him whether he has considered looking at the operations of other departmental offices or ministerial offices as a basis of comparison in order to see whether perhaps it has developed that, because of his general brilliance in an over-all way, he has not looked at the little details of his own department in order to see how things go through his office.

I do not have much contact with the minister but I am always astounded at how long it takes to get a reply from his office. If you get one in three weeks, I think you are doing very well. Not long ago I pointed out to the minister that a man in Sault Ste. Marie had written to him complaining that the R.C.M.P. had broken into his home and had messed things up. The minister has satisfied him and I suppose other people that the R.C.M.P. were not the ones involved. But the point is that six weeks after the man had written to the minister he had received no reply from the minister's office. I do not care whether he is the worst and lowest thug in Canada, any person who writes to the minister surely deserves a more prompt reply than that. I am not going to speak for other members but from conversations I have had with others I know that they report that same pattern in so far as this department is concerned. It takes much more than the ordinary length of time to get any kind of response to a request either by phone or by letter.

I am just wondering whether the minister would not check into this phase of his operations. It would be dreadful if we had his continued build up on lines that Mr. Nicholson has set forth and yet right within his own office there were a situation in which the satisfaction that perhaps might be deserved, was not being given by him or his personnel. I might appear to be flippant in bringing this matter before the committee. However, I would suggest to the minister that it would be a worth while thing upon which to check. If you write to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Transport, the Minister of National Revenue or the Postmaster General you get a reply in from three to five days or someone contacts you in the office. But in this department with this brilliant head you wait and wait. This is just a minor detail of administration but I thought it would be worth while to bring it to the minister's attention. I know that he would like to live up to—and perhaps he does so—all these elaborate assessments that have been given by such astute observers as Mr. Nicholson.

The hon. member for Skeena somewhat misinterpreted the question that I had asked the minister yesterday and to which I did not receive a reply. The hon. member for Skeena wanted to know whether with regard to these legal jobs or legal fees the minister would make a statement to the effect that they had not been given to Conservative party members. What I really was seeking was an assurance that they had been given to supporters or members of the Conservative party. But much more important than that, I wonder whether the minister would give us some information on the matter I raised in relation to amending procedure in connection with the British North America Act.

He will recall that at the dominion-provincial conference in July last year, at one of the afternoon sessions the Prime Minister made this matter one of the central points and stressed very strongly that the procedure to amend the constitution was one of the most vital things ahead of the nation as a whole. Subsequently, there were a number of meetings which received a considerable amount of publicity and last night I suggested that some of these left a very vague impression as to what was happening and what were the difficulties. Before the minister leaves this part of his estimates I should like him to bring us up to date on that matter.

The last point that comes to my mind results from the minister's explanation of the difficulty with the bill of rights. He pointed out that if he was expected as attorney general or Minister of Justice to take up every case in which someone felt that someone was infringing or impinging upon his rights, he would be involved in extremely great difficulty. I wonder whether the minister or the government has given any consideration to a practice that has been developed in other parts of the western world and has received a certain amount of critical acclaim from journalists, academic people and even editorial writers. I refer to the idea of an office similar to that of ombudsman that has been worked out in several of the Scandinavian countries where there is an office created by the government but separate from it to which anyone can take any appeal for any injustice that he feels he has suffered through legislation or impingement of government activities.

I realize that a federal government can properly deal only with things that fall within the federal framework. But when we have so much delegated authority as we have today, it seems to me that this procedure becomes more and more a worth while possibility. I wonder whether the minister has given any consideration to the matter, whether this has been a subject of discussion with the executive of this government, whether he has had any memoranda prepared on it or whether anyone in the government has studied how it works in other parts of the world.

The last point upon which I wish to touch under this item is the question of where the minister stands in connection with appointing justices in relation to the article or editorial in the Montreal Gazette from which I quoted last night which indicated that this government had a marvellous chance to follow the line indicated by the Prime Minister when he was in office, namely to make the prime factor in appointing a justice his merit or ability rather than his political colour. I wanted to ask the minister where this particular government stands in this regard.

Mr. Carter: I wish to rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I merely want to correct a statement which the hon. member for Port Arthur put on the record, I am sure inadvertently. Obviously referring to an incident that took place a couple of years ago, the hon. member for Port Arthur referred to a request that had come from Premier Smallwood for R.C.M.P. reinforcements. The fact is that the request did not come from Premier Smallwood. It came from the commanding officer of the R.C.M.P. and was transmitted to the minister through the attorney general's office, in accordance with the procedure laid down for a request of this type. The hon. member's remarks gave the impression that the request had originated with the premier of Newfoundland whereas it originated with the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Fisher: Speaking to the point of order, may I say that I did not say that. I was referring to Mr. Nicholson, one of the fearless members of the press gallery. This was his interpretation. My whole point in reading this article was not to raise this problem but rather to underline the valiant stand taken by the minister probably within the cabinet to make sure that the mounted police did not go to Newfoundland.

Mr. McMillan: Like some other departments in the government, the Department of Justice has certain small statutory expenditures presumably to pay pensions to widows or to deceased employees. These expenditures are not discussed under any estimates. I want to ask the Minister of Justice by what authority this fund was set up covering statutory expenditures. I always presumed it was by reason of an order in council.

I notice one item in the estimates of the Department of Justice for an amount of $2,400. This $2,400 is to pay annual pensions to three widows in respect of their husbands who lost their lives in the performance of their duties.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. member to which item he is referring? I have not located it and I wonder whether the hon. member could give me the item number.

Mr. McMillan: It follows item 177 and appears to be a special item under the heading "Pensions and other Benefits."

Mr. Fulton: Thank you.

Mr. McMillan: Two of these widows receive an annual pension of $900 each and the third widow receives an annual pension of $600. I do not know when these pensions were determined or how long they have been paid to these particular widows. They seem small in relation to the increased cost of living and increased pensions. I wonder whether the word "pension" is a misnomer.

I have been in parliament for 11 years and these pensions never seem to increase. They always remain the same, and I do not think things are the same today as they were before. I should like to have the minister's comment on these particular pensions. I think the committee will find a number of such pensions in other departments of the government.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, as I was saying a short time ago, on May 20, 1958, I asked that cases made against pushers or drug addicts using goof balls be changed from the Department of National Health and Welfare and placed under the Criminal Code or some other law so that the R.C.M.P. could act under it, take these people in and prevent further distribution if possible.

All hon. members can see this article. "Goof balls" is big enough there for anybody to see; it occupies almost half a page. This is La Patrie du Dimanche of February 19, 1961 and the title of the article is:

(Translation):

Alarming situation

Goof balls available to high school students.

(Text):

That is, "Goof balls on the road of scholars". The article has five by-lines, but I will only read one because it is a very lengthy article:

(Translation):

Doctor and two nurses assaulted by patient, 15, in Notre Dame hospital.

Within a few days, riots in Montreal jail and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary.

Woman murdered on St. Lawrence blvd., her assaillant hardly aware of what he was doing.

Within a few months, four in morgue due to poisoning.

Damage by goof balls, which represent an increasingly complex problem for justice and are the main enemy of order and public rest.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are five subheadings which reveal the damage wrought by goof balls and are evidence of the fact that those crimes were committed under the effect of goof balls.

(Text):

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member a question. Would the hon. member please define "goof ball" for me? I do not know what it is. Will the hon. member tell me exactly what is in it and how it works?

Mr. Bourque: I am not a druggist and I cannot tell the hon. member what it contains. The users purchase these goof balls from druggists, I presume, or obtain them through some other channel.

Mr. Hicks: But I would like to know what it is. What is it? Is it made up of bread and butter, or castor oil, or Epsom salts, or what is it? What is in it?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman. I wonder whether the answer to that question could perhaps be given by my hon. friend's colleague who was applauding so loudly a moment ago and who is a member of the medical profession.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, does this not demonstrate pretty clearly that this question should be discussed under the estimates of the department of my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who will have the officials here who can give us all this information?

Mr. Bourque: The minister—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order.

Mr. Bourque: The Minister of Justice—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order; I am already on my feet. I am inclined to the view I have already given to the committee. To some extent the hon. member was touching on the Department of Justice at various times and that was the reason why I permitted him to continue. But this is really a discussion of a social problem and it is the direct administrative responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The hon. member will have an opportunity to present his case when the estimates of that department are before the committee. To the extent to which the hon. member is referring to the importation of drugs or trafficking in narcotics over the border, or bringing them in from other countries as was discussed by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, I think it was, yesterday, this would appear to be applicable to the discussion.

Therefore I would ask the hon. member to limit his remarks to matters which are the direct administrative responsibility of the minister. With regard to that portion of his remarks which concern the responsibility of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the hon. member can deal with that matter at a later date.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I submit with respect that if we took up this matter on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, it would be out of order.

Let me explain that in our view, the situation created by the use of goof balls is so alarming that it constitutes a problem for the Minister of Justice. We are seeking amendments to the Criminal Code to place barbituates on the same footing as drugs and put them under the same control of the R.C.M.P. In making this request, we find it necessary, to bolster our arguments—and I feel the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean is completely in order—to establish the seriousness and dire social consequences resulting from the use of those barbiturates at the present time.

Therefore, I think the minister should tell us whether he soon proposes to bring forward amendments to the Criminal Code in an effort to stop the damage caused by this serious problem.

(Text):

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, you have referred to the question of relevancy and I think there is also the question of repetition to be considered at this stage.

The hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean has pointed out the situation and now he persists in repeating the same thing in all sorts of colours and guises. He is not really adding anything to what his colleagues, the hon. member for Megantic and others, have already said. His colleagues have said the same thing, and I think that on the point of repetition the hon. member should be ruled out of order, as well as on the question of his remarks not being relevant to the matter under discussion.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, some time ago, a question was directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare about the review which could be made to solve the problem of the use of barbiturates, known as "goof balls".

At the time, the minister said he was considering the matter in co-operation with the authorities of the Department of Justice. Therefore, it is impossible to solve that problem without the co-operation of both departments.

I did not have time to read the page of Hansard where the matter is recorded, but I have a good memory and I recall what the minister said. He stated that the authorities of the Department of Justice had to be consulted to introduce legislation. Therefore, they are closely related in this matter. Furthermore, he cannot deny that the Department of Justice has some interest in the matter. Now, the hon. member is specifically asking the Minister of Justice to see to it that the matter be placed under the Criminal Code, in order that the R.C.M.P. may intervene in the matter, like in the matter of any other barbiturate. Consequently, I submit that the hon. member is not out of order.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the argument put forward by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, I must say that the situation should first of all be cleared and that no member in this house considers the seriousness of the goof ball problem. But when the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont states that the Minister of Justice is the person qualified to hear the grievances of this house, I do not think that we can share his views because the use of goof balls cannot be considered as an unlawful action punishable under the Criminal Code before any legal definition is given of what goof balls are.

Mr. Denis: Then, let him do it.

Mr. Paul: The hon. member for St. Denis says: Let him do it. Any amendment to the food and drugs act must be introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated that barbiturates or goofballs are drugs, the Criminal Code will then be amended accordingly and a provision to this effect will be included therein. Then, from the moment on, all transactions, sales or use of goof balls will constitute a crime and the Minister of Justice will have the authority to reply to the arguments raised by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean.

For the time being, we respectfully submit that the hon. member has no right to deal with goof balls.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if I could help to dispose of the point of order in a helpful manner and, indeed, dispose of the discussion as well by pointing out that as I understand the case of those who support the right of hon. members to speak about goof balls, it is that they were urging that we should place them under the provisions of the Criminal Code in the same way, one of them said, as narcotics presently are. May I point out that this is an entirely erroneous approach. Narcotics are not under the Criminal Code. There is a separate act—the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act—which is administered by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare who is responsible for dealing with discussions concerning that measure. With regard to goof balls, I have referred repeatedly to what my colleague has said, namely, that he intends to introduce legislation to amend the Food and Drugs Act so as to deal with goof balls. That, again, will not be an amendment to the Criminal Code, and the responsibility of introducing and administering that act will be that of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Because this question does not come under my administrative responsibility I have no officials here who can advise me. It is, in my submission, irrelevant to my department. Perhaps if hon. members would understand and appreciate the point that we are introducing legislation in the form of an amendment to the Food and Drugs Act, and that the question was never then, nor is it now, one of my administrative responsibilities, they will understand why I have endeavoured to point out, reasonably, I hope, that this is not a matter upon which I can be helpful. However, they can obtain all the information they feel they should have if they will wait until the appropriate time.

In connection with the length of time which has elapsed before bringing down legislation, I know that some hon. members are concerned about that, but we have been concerned about it, too. It is, of course, easy to assume an expert knowledge, but I can assure hon. members opposite that expert knowledge on the subject is not easy to come by and when you are dealing with a drug which, when properly used, is a legitimate aid to medicine you do not lightly pass laws outlawing it and making its possession illegal. This question must be approached on the basis of knowing that the measures taken are appropriate ones, that they are acceptable and that they will be enforceable. I know this has been one of the problems of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I can assure hon. members it is not a case of simply writing an act and producing it within a month or two. There is more to be done in connection with this problem than might appear on the surface. However, my hon. friend has been working on this matter in conjunction with other departments that are in a position to advise him and his officials, and is now in a position to introduce legislation into this house next week if not earlier. At that time the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean and others interested can get the fullest explanation, the fullest accounting of how the legislation will work. I am sorry, but I am unable to advise them on that point, with the best will in the world. So I suggest again that having had a fairly full reference made to this problem it might be considered appropriate to leave it either until the estimates of the other department are discussed or until the bill itself is introduced.

May I take advantage of this occasion to reply to some of the questions which have been asked on other subjects since I last rose to reply. The hon. member for Port Arthur praised me with one hand and damned me with the other. There is no objection to that on my part. I do recall that I had occasion once to admit to him that there had been delay in sending a reply to a letter, and I explained to him then some of the circumstances accounting for the delay. It was due to my absence at the moment when the reply was being prepared, and again after it had been prepared.

I was not aware there was a general feeling that correspondence from my office was slow. I will certainly look into that question and do what I can to remedy any defects. It may be that one reason why, in some cases, some extra time is taken to answer letters is that many deal with problems of a legal nature to which a swift reply cannot readily be given. It is one thing to send replies on subjects which deal with statistics, where all that is needed is to look up the record on the basis of the actual figures, and altogether another to deal with the great majority of the communications which I receive, in connection with which time and care are necessary in order to prepare a suitable answer.

Another reason which may account for some delay is that I have made a rule, perhaps erroneously, that I should answer every letter which comes to my office. I am not referring to letters directed to the department. But when somebody writes to me, whether it is a member of parliament or somebody outside the house, I do like to send a reply. This is the general rule, and I have laid it down because I feel that people who write to a minister are entitled to an answer signed by the minister. I do not say this is done in every case, but it is my general approach. I must confess that on occasions this has had the result that there is more correspondence for my signature than I am able to keep up with, especially on occasions when I have been absent from Ottawa for fairly lengthy periods. I think perhaps I may have to modify that approach to see that interim acknowledgement goes out, signed by someone else. I shall have to look at the situation to see what can be done to remedy this dissatisfaction. My approach has been that every letter addressed to me is entitled to a reply from me, and I have always felt the reply should be carefully considered. For that reason, as well as the others which I have given, I should not deny that I may on occasion have been rather more behind with my correspondence than perhaps I should have been.

A further question was raised regarding the appointment of agents of the Minister of Justice and judges. I am not sure which point of view the hon. member for Port Arthur takes in respect of the appointment of agents—lawyers to act for or on behalf of judges. That hon. member has expressed a different approach today from that which I understood him to take yesterday. May I assure him, as well as other hon. members of this committee, that the criterion which is followed is, that agents of the Minister of Justice must be the most competent and proper persons in the field to represent the Minister of Justice in the carriage of litigation on behalf of the crown and the government of Canada. I have received criticism on occasion in that these persons, who were appointed as agents, have not always and inevitably been individuals who have been associated with me in a political way. I have not received very many criticisms of this kind, but I have received some.

In respect of the appointment of judges, we follow the same standard, in that a very high calibre must be secured in respect of each appointment to the bench. I have not made a statistical examination, or even attempted to make an analysis, of what may be the affiliation of those individuals we have appointed, because we attempt to avoid the influence of that factor upon our decisions. We try to obtain the best men available.

I can refer to one individual we elevated to the Supreme Court of Canada, who was a judge appointed to the Ontario bench by our predecessors. I am sure if I made an analysis I should find other similar cases. However, our approach has always been that members appointed to the bench must be the best men available for the job. That is the only criterion that we follow.

The hon. member for Port Arthur raised the question regarding the appointment of some one equivalent to an ombudsman in the Scandinavian countries, to carry out his functions in respect of our bill of rights. We did consider this matter very thoroughly, both at the time the bill of rights was being prepared and presented to the house, and since. While not rejecting the suggestion in principle, we felt that it is not capable of direct application to Canada, which is a country with a federal system. Outsiders may feel there is rather an anomalous situation in Canada, in that the criminal law is enacted by the federal parliament while its enforcement and administration are matters of provincial responsibility. The type of complaints with which I understand the ombudsman deals in Scandinavian countries are closely connected with the enforcement of criminal law, and it seemed to us it would not be an acceptable situation, in view of the provincial enforcement of criminal law, to have an individual, who fancied himself aggrieved, appealing to the federal government through an ombudsman, because of their complaint against the enforcement of the law by the provinces, which are responsible for that enforcement. I recognize, however, that an ombudsman is not confined to matters of criminal law, and that the suggestion is made that such an individual might also be useful in the function of reviewing administrative procedures of the federal government itself, in the enforcement of statutes which are the responsibility of the federal government. We have considered this suggestion but have felt, to the present time at any rate, that there is no indication that we cannot produce an equally satisfactory result, through a very careful check by the minister and the Department of Justice of legislation which is introduced, and a readiness to review any complaints which may be made with respect to actions of other departments. It is appreciated, of course, that I cannot direct other departments or veto their actions. We have had a number of cases of complaints being made regarding other departments, at which time I have discussed these complaints with my colleagues on the basis of there being no objection to my discussing it with them, with the intention of reviewing and examining the complaint to see if there is anything involved which is contrary to the spirit as well as the letter of the bill of rights. In a number of cases we have made very extensive reviews of the activities of other departments on that basis.

It must always be borne in mind that the Minister of Justice cannot dictate in these matters. However, we have had no indication, as yet, that there is any serious gap as a result of this system which would necessitate the appointment of anyone in the nature of an ombudsman in this country. For those two reasons—the peculiarities of the federal system, and the fact that we have taken pains to review our own activities, as a government—I suggest that, as yet at any rate, we are not satisfied that there is any need for such an appointment.

The hon. member for Welland asked me about the authority for a statutory item appearing at the bottom of page 36, which provides $2,400 for pensions to dependents of penitentiary personnel, who lost their lives in the performance of their duty. In the first case there was a statute of 1914 which authorized the payment of an allowance of $500 to a Mrs. Jointson, the widow of an officer employed at the British Columbia penitentiary. This amount was increased by $400 in the main estimates of 1959-60, so that it was only last year that Mrs. Jointson's annual pension was increased from $500 to $900.

The second case involved a widow of another guard employed at the British Columbia penitentiary, and by an item appearing in the estimates, which was incorporated under the Appropriation Acts in 1927, this lady was granted an annual allowance of $600 commencing April 1, 1937. Last year we increased that amount by $300, making a total of $900, to continue during her natural life.

The third case was in respect to the widow of a guard employed at the Kingston penitentiary who was killed in 1926. Under the same authority in 1927 his widow was granted an allowance of $600 per annum. That amount has not been increased.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Before I give the floor to the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, who assures me his remarks will be brief, I should like to place on the record my concurrence in the remarks made by the Minister of Justice regarding the point of order. Therefore, I should ask the hon. member to give his co-operation to the Chair, in the light of my concurrence in those remarks, by confining himself to a consideration of the estimates of this department as nearly as he possibly can.

Mr. Bourque: I will be very brief, Mr. Chairman. You have not given your ruling on the point of order. I was directing my remarks toward having this matter brought under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice instead of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. At the bottom of page 4487 of Hansard I had this to say in French:

(Translation):

I quote the Hon. W. Monteith, Minister of National Health and Welfare:

> Mr. Speaker, I have been investigating this situation for some months in co-operation with my colleague, the Minister of Justice.

(Text):

Therefore, it was being studied by both departments. If I cannot bring the matter up now I do not know when I shall be able to bring it up. This seems to me to be the proper time. I still believe I was in order until an hon. member across the chamber asked me the question, what are goof balls? He will find the answer at page 8 of the translation section of Hansard of May 25, 1961. The definition is given there.

Before I take my seat I should like to say that I sympathize with the Minister of Justice. I realize he is going to have a very difficult problem to handle because he will have to stop the sale of certain drugs. This may bring about a hardship on certain classes of society but since we are faced with a problem which must be dealt with we cannot delay and let it go on any longer. Therefore, I ask the minister whether he will not give this matter every possible consideration so that the proper measures will be taken to protect our youth in the future and goof balls not be available to them at any time.

Mr. Howard: The remarks of the Minister of Justice having to do with the implementation of legal justice are commendable. As I understood him, he obtains the services of the most competent lawyers in order to see that cases handled by the crown are handled in the best possible way.

Mr. Fulton: Within the requirements of the case. I did not mean to say that we always go to the man at the very top of the profession because that is not necessary in every case we have.

Mr. Howard: I understood the minister to say the most competent, I accepted that as meaning that the department selected a competent person. That is the sense in which

I am accepting it. So far as prosecutions under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act are concerned, it seems that the most competent lawyers or firms of lawyers are Conservatives. This may be coincidental. It appears also that none of the lawyers or firms of lawyers who were retained for prosecutions prior to the minister's party taking office are now considered to be competent. Coincidentally again, these firms and lawyers are Liberals. This is shown conclusively. I think it is pretty well acknowledged that the change in government resulted in a change in the retention of certain lawyers and law firms in this country in the prosecution of narcotic offences. The change in government resulted in the dropping of the law firms and lawyers who were Liberals and who had been retained by the Liberal government when it was in office. Substituted for those lawyers and law firms has been a group of firms and lawyers who are Conservatively oriented, and I mean Conservative with a large "C". From the remarks of the minister I would say that this is purely coincidental. I will not bother to put the details of this on Hansard; I do not think it is necessary, Mr. Chairman. I submitted a question to the ministry about this and it bears the date January 17, 1961. My question had to do with the fees and remuneration paid to legal counsel for activities in prosecutions under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, the names and rates, the amounts paid to each individual, and so forth. It is rather an extensive list. One has merely to look casually at it to see the coincidental situation which has existed and which started when this government took office.

Mr. Fulton: I will be quite frank and say that we do not exclude from the list of those qualified those who happen to be our own friends.

Mr. Howard: I am sorry; I did not catch that.

Mr. Fulton: I will be quite frank and say that we do not exclude from those who are qualified those who happen also to be our friends.

Mr. Howard: I agree with that. It was put quite clearly on the record the other day by the Associate Minister of National Defence. I did not for a moment assume that there was this sort of division in the cabinet. I realize there may be divisions on other matters but certainly not when it comes to rewarding one's friends. I am sure this situation still prevails. I take it it is not coincidental that they all happen to be Conservative. Perhaps there is a bit more to it.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know what some of them are.

Mr. Howard: Before the committee took recess at one o'clock I had raised a question regarding the relationship between a Mr. Whitfield and the Canadian Marconi Company as it was affected by the bills of rights. In replying at that time the minister proceeded to draw what he called a logical conclusion from my remarks, and then proceeded to say that it was the advancement of an idea leading to dictatorship in granting arbitrary powers to the minister. Of course, this is not what I was suggesting at all. Further, I would say that when it comes to this government introducing legislation in this house, albeit prior to the time that the bill of rights was introduced, which is contrary to the bill of rights and which in fact places dictatorial powers in the hands of certain individuals and which in fact eliminates in one sense the operation of the courts as an integral part of our legal processes, hon. members will find this in the Feeds Act, being chapter 14 of the 1960 statutes. I merely bring this instance to the attention of the committee because this act contains sections which grossly violate the bill of rights and which, in my opinion, should be dealt with in somewhat the same manner as the Fisheries Act was dealt with. In other words, there should be a revision of this act to repeal those particular sections so that the bill of rights may really mean something.

Section 8 of the Feeds Act, Mr. Chairman, gives authority to an inspector to seize articles by means of or in relation to which he reasonably believes that a violation has been committed either against the act or the regulations. This is an arbitrary power, a dictatorial authority given to an inspector appointed under the Feeds Act to deprive an individual, contrary to the bill of rights, of his right to property and without due process of law. Presumably the word "reasonable" refers to reasonable grounds in the mind of the inspector, who reasonably believes that the Feeds Act or the regulations have been violated.

In addition, he reasonably believes that the property so confiscated or so seized was used to commit the offence. The act further provides that the inspector may release this property after a period of six months if a charge has not been laid. Here we find authority given by this government, and endorsed by this parliament, to a civil servant to deprive a person of property contrary to the bill of rights, and completely at variance with the minister's statement relating to the growing need to have the courts function as an integral part of our judicial system. The act further provides that if litigation is entered into the goods so seized may be forfeited to the crown in addition to any other sort of fine or penalty imposed by the courts if the individual is found guilty.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is not in keeping with our good sense in attempting to discuss these things on an impartial basis for the minister to draw logical conclusions from the remarks of one member, and then extend those logical conclusions to include a charge of advancing a dictatorial type of system. I think those remarks are completely unfair, unjustified and are not what the minister, upon reflection, would call logical conclusions. In any event, even if he does consider they are logical conclusions, then we must come to another logical conclusion, namely, that this government does believe there are cases in which it is permissible to have the bill of rights violated by a statute of this parliament, a statute which was introduced by a colleague of the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Agriculture. The Feeds Act introduced by this government does violate the bill of rights in that it permits an individual to be deprived of property without due process of law, unless one extends the term "due process of law" to include dictatorial powers given by statute to an inspector. The act permits the minister to deprive an individual of his property for a period of six months without even getting around to laying a charge, and then to give that property back. The property may be of a perishable nature. It may be grain or it may be property which the farmer, for the sake of argument, needs in the conduct of his particular business, such as a truck or motor vehicle or some farm implement that he cannot use and which depreciates with the passage of time. I feel that this act also, to some extent, deprives an individual of the right to a fair hearing.

Another section of the Feeds Act provides that in a criminal prosecution—this is section 10 (2),—it is merely sufficient for the crown to prove the offence was committed by an employee or agent of the person accused, whether or not the employee or agent is identified or whether or not the employee or agent is actually prosecuted for the offence. In this instance we are talking about a function of the Attorney General of Canada, and we have finally found a case in which he is obligated to take some action. In this case the individual charged is being deprived of the right to a fair hearing because he has not had the opportunity of confronting the employee or agent or witness against him, nor has he had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness against him.

In this case we have action on the part of the government in introducing a bill, endorsed by the cabinet, at exactly the same time as the cabinet was considering and endorsing the bill of rights at the last session and which is indicative of an effort on the part of the government to operate in two different ways. On the one hand, the government is trying to say we will have a bill of rights that will protect the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual; we will have a bill of rights which will say an individual shall not be deprived of his property except by due process of law; we will have a bill of rights which will say an individual is entitled to a fair hearing. Then, on the other hand, the government introduces a piece of legislation like the Feeds Act which in these two instances—there are about 10 others to which I shall not refer—violates these principles of the bill of rights about which this government gloats so much.

I think, Mr. Chairman, when we have the state of affairs where the minister is coming to some logical conclusion, as he calls it, and then founding on that conclusion a presumption of a dictatorial situation while at the same time the minister and his colleagues are guilty of violating the bill of rights itself, it is a rather sad situation. The government has violated the bill of rights, first, by enacting this Feeds Act; second, by retaining on the statute books, without amendment, other legislation such as the Customs Act and the Income Tax Act, which are in conflict with this bill of rights. In so far as the Income Tax Act is concerned this is not my opinion alone because there is a court decision, I believe in the province of Quebec, supporting this point of view.

I think it is a sad and sorry state of affairs, Mr. Chairman, when we have a minister with the intellect and ability of this minister, as was evidenced by the article written by Mr. Nicholson to which the hon. member for Port Arthur referred, lauding to the high heavens the efficacy of the bill of rights and how much it means, a minister who belongs to a political party which is shipping out propaganda prepared by Allister Grosart to the effect that the bill of rights really means something in this country, while at the same time drafting legislation which contravenes the bill of rights and is completely contradictory to it. This government, at the same time, refuses to introduce amendments to such legislation as the Income Tax Act and the Customs Act, both of which contain provisions that contravene the bill of rights in a terrible way.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, when we have a minister who belongs to a government that has this sort of record of supporting legislation which is contradictory to the bill of rights, supporting legislation which permits individuals to be deprived of their property, supporting legislation which really removes the courts of this nation from their position as an integral part of the judicial system, we must look askance at any spurious reasoning on the part of that minister or his government in coming to so called logical conclusions on the basis of opinions expressed by other hon. members.

Mr. Fulton: May I answer this at once because this is the second year in which my hon. friend and others in his group have made similar assertions with regard to the Feeds Act, all of which are equally unfounded, and it is time they were answered again at once.

My hon. friend makes the assertion, and appears to believe that it will gather strength by repetition because he repeated it many times, that the Feeds Act is directly contrary to the bill of rights. The fact of the matter is that the Feeds Act is not contrary to the bill of rights and does not contravene it in any particular in letter or in spirit. Of course we had the bill of rights in mind in 1960 when the Feeds Act and other statutes of that year were drafted and were presented to the house. We took care, as we have taken care ever since 1957, that no statute that we present to the House of Commons will be contrary to the bill of rights because that was one of the basic views of this government as it still is.

My hon. friend refers to section 8 of the bill which gives an inspector the right to seize property which he believes has been used to commit a violation of the act. There is seizure, yes; and there is nothing contrary to the bill of rights in authorizing seizure of property which is believed on reasonable grounds to have been used for the commission of an offence against our laws, but there is no forfeiture without due process of law.

The very section to which my hon. friend refers goes on in its succeeding words to provide that the property shall be restored to the person from whom it was seized, at the end of six months unless within that time judicial proceedings have been instituted in respect of the violation. Then it goes on to provide that it is only as a result of conviction for the offence that the property may be retained by the crown: it is only then that the owner may be deprived of his property. That scheme was developed with the bill of rights very much in mind.

This committee will be aware of the fact that in many statutes in the past providing for seizure, the seizure became forfeiture, in many cases without due process of law, without the owner, whether innocent or otherwise, having any chance to assert his innocence of the crime or offence in connection with which the goods were seized. Whether innocent or otherwise, he was deprived of his property rights without the necessity of any conviction.

Here, because of our awareness of the bill of rights and the principle upon which legislation of this kind should in our view be founded, we have deliberately provided that there would be no forfeiture except on conviction and then the court may order the goods forfeited. Nothing then can be clearer than that forfeiture—that is actual deprivation of property—can only come about by due process of law. And in order to make certain that the crown cannot in effect deprive a person of his property simply by seizing it and then refraining from bringing action on the offence, it is provided that unless proceedings are started within six months the goods must be restored. That provision again was put in out of an abundance of caution. We do not believe that responsible administrators would be likely to follow such a course, but it is possible that they might do so. We therefore put in that provision expressly to make it impossible for the crown effectively to deprive a person of the enjoyment or ownership of property by seizing it and then just leaving the matter in abeyance. Hence there is no contravention of the bill of rights there. Indeed, the section was clearly drafted with the principle of the bill of rights very much in mind.

The other point that my hon. friend makes is that the bill contains a provision that makes it clear that although an offence may have been committed by an employee, it is sufficient to prove or to establish that it was committed by that employee or agent of the accused without the necessity of identifying personally who that employee or agent was and that then the owner is liable for the offence.

It is a well understood principle of criminal law, as it has been for years, and indeed it is a well understood principle of common law —and it is not contrary to the bill of rights —employers are liable for the acts of their employees committed in the course of their employment. The criminal liability of an employer for the act of his employee committed in the course of his duties is a matter that has been well understood and well recognized and that the bill of rights does not in any way challenge. But it must be borne in mind that even although that is a fairly complete liability, the Feeds Act does not relieve the crown of any onus of proof with respect to the offence. The crown must prove that the offence was committed by an employee of a person charged. They do not have to prove by name who that individual was but they would have to prove that it was an employee or agent of the person charged. They cannot just come along and say "We know that somebody committed this offence and we think it was an employee of the person charged". They have to prove that it was an employee or agent of the person charged. Then the well known doctrine of liability for the acts of employees or agents authorized and committed in the course of their employment speaks for the rest of the situation.

I am sorry if my hon. friend does not, as I expect he will not, accept my explanation. However, I can only assure him that all the persons with whom I have discussed this act and in whose advice as experts I have confidence, have assured me that technically it has been drawn with the bill of rights concept in mind and that there is nothing in the act which in any sense runs counter to the bill of rights. This is the technical situation, and it is the same with regard to the spirit and intent of that act. As I have indicated, because of our awareness of the bill of rights and the bill of rights concept and the principle upon which we believe legislation should be founded, even though the bill of rights had not been enacted we carried its spirit into the Feeds Act.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if I might follow up that particular point. I can see the bill of rights becoming more and more a piece of flexible legislation and fairly soon, if we keep on with this practice, it will be distorted beyond all recognition and use. I can also see why there was such an insistence on the part of this government to include in the bill of rights the provision which would give a political figure the right to determine whether or not particular bills introduced to the house or particular regulations presented were or were not or are or are not consistent with the bill of rights. Because all this does is this, and it is becoming more obvious all the time. I say this with due regard for the minister as an individual and with strict reference to the office of the Minister of Justice no matter who may hold that position.

It is obvious that section of the bill of rights was designed to give to a political figure the right to determine whether or not bills were inconsistent with the bill of rights and whether or not proposed regulations were inconsistent with the bill of rights. This was done in the full knowledge that the Minister of Justice was a political figure, being part of the cabinet and sharing part of this so-called collective responsibility that exists within the cabinet. It was done knowing full well that the Minister of Justice would then be in a position to stretch the point, as it were, and to say in one instance, in so far as government legislation is concerned, that all of it is consistent with the bill of rights, and to say in another instance, in so far as legislation introduced by other hon. members is concerned, that it is inconsistent with the bill of rights or, "I do not want to make a decision" because it is politically embarrassing and therefore the minister argues the point that it is not properly before the house.

I think this shows that we do not need the Minister of Justice—I did not mean to stop there—to examine and determine whether bills and regulations are contrary to the bill of rights, because the Minister of Justice is likely to take a flexible point of view, a partisan point of view, a political point of view, or he may be simply hammered into a particular point of view by other members of the cabinet—again, Mr. Chairman, please remember that I am not referring to this individual minister; I am talking about ministers of justice in the sense of that office—to the point where the bill of rights becomes distorted by political considerations and by what is considered to be politically advantageous.

I think this also clearly indicates that what we do require is a body of the house somewhat similar in structure, perhaps, to the Auditor General's office, which would have the responsibility of reviewing the various bills as presented, various regulations as proposed and all statutes on the statute books at the present time. This body should have the authority to report to parliament, as the Auditor General reports regarding his discoveries in the financial fiscal field, in order that parliament would get a true, correct and non-politically advantageous point of view with respect to these particular bills.

The minister was correct in his assumption that I would not agree with what he said, and in this connection I refer particularly to section 10(2) of the Feeds Act. I did not read it all previously but I may just as well read it now:

> In a prosecution for an offence under this act, it is sufficient proof of the offence to establish that it was committed by an employee or agent of the accused whether or not the employee or agent is identified or has been prosecuted for the offence.

This is held by the minister to be completely in accord with the bill of rights. Let us place that on the scales against section 2 of the bill of rights which says that no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to:

> (e) deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations;

Is it one of the principles of fundamental justice that you can convict a person, sentence him to jail and fine him because of the actions of one of his employees? Is this what is known as fundamental justice? This may be the type of fundamental justice in which the Conservative party believes. It existed some time in 1400 or 1500, but it is not the type of twentieth century justice that we have come to believe should be apparent in all walks of our society. This type of fundamental justice may well have existed in the days to which the party of my hon. friend looks back regularly, that is, to its birthday many years ago when people had relatively few rights under the law, but this certainly does not apply today.

Is it one of the principles of fundamental justice that the Minister of Justice, for argument's sake, if he were a farmer, could be convicted, sentenced to jail and fined because of the activities or actions of one of his employees, without his even knowing who the employee was?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I answer that question at once. Yes, certainly it is a principle of fundamental justice, and has been for generations. What my hon. friend does not seem to realize is that where you have, for instance, a store and the clerk in the store sells something contrary to the act, it has been a principle for years that the owner of the store may be prosecuted and convicted. There is nothing new in this.

I cannot say any more than that it is a fundamental principle of justice, because otherwise what my hon. friend is asking is that we have two convictions, that we prosecute the employee individually and convict him, and then go after the owner. This has never been a principle of our law or of justice.

If the store is owned by an individual or a corporation, and a clerk sells something contrary to the act, the owner is liable, and always has been, and I think most sensible Canadians would want that situation to continue.

Mr. Howard: And I presume the employee is also liable?

Mr. Fulton: He may be liable also.

Mr. Howard: This, again, amounts to depriving somebody of the right to a fair hearing.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all, because under the provisions of section 8 the employee cannot be convicted unless he is prosecuted. Section 8 is directed to the situation with regard to the employer, who may be prosecuted and convicted even though the employee is not identified personally, provided the crown shows that it was an employee of that man who committed the offence. Of course, you would have to prosecute the employee before he could be convicted.

As I say, I think most Canadians would not want owners who operate stores to be sheltered behind the fact that some minor employee was involved. My hon. friend apparently wants the minor employee to carry the responsibility and the owner to get off scot-free. That is not our idea in the bill of rights.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, this is a deliberate misuse of what I was saying.

Mr. Fulton: No, it is the logical outcome of what you have said.

Mr. Howard: I do not know whether the Minister of Justice was the attorney general a while ago, or the crown prosecutor, or what he was, but just a moment ago the Minister of Justice deliberately took my words, distorted them and levelled accusations against me which were not implicit in what I said.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend does not know what he has been saying, that is the trouble, or the implications of what he has been saying.

An hon. Member: That is his usual trouble.

Mr. Howard: I merely say again to the Minister of Justice—and we need not get too excited or heated about this—that this is about the third time he has been caught out making accusations against me during these estimates—

An hon. Member: You are the one who has been caught out.

Mr. Howard: —when matters have been raised which are embarrassing to the minister and this government, and that is all it is.

Mr. Fulton: None is so blind as he who will not see.

Mr. Howard: I would commend to both the Minister of Justice and all hon. members the words of the Prime Minister:

> If the hon. gentleman, who does most of his talking from a seated position, will remain silent, I will continue with the argument.

I would also refer the minister to the Prime Minister's reference about those who have "an inveterate desire to babble away".

Mr. Fulton: Who has been on his feet all the time this afternoon?

Mr. Howard: The remark I have just quoted applies to a number of hon. members. First the Minister of Justice was accusing me of trying to promote a system of dictatorship in this government, when he himself is a member of a government that really believes in it.

Mr. Churchill: That is quite wrong.

Mr. Howard: When he became embarrassed about that particular question the minister then attempted to accuse me of some other sort of activity with respect to a clerk selling something in a store, saying that I want the employee to be prosecuted without the due process of law.

Mr. Fulton: That is not what I said.

Mr. Howard: These assinine accusations are typical of these gentlemen who come from Kamloops, and in this regard the Minister of Justice has a good counterpart in another gentleman from Kamloops who is in the M.L.A. of British Columbia. I refer to the minister of highways. What it shows, conclusively, I think, is what results from having a political figure interpret whether or not particular bills are in conflict with the provisions of the bill of rights and how it is so easy to give political considerations the first run and have relatively little use for the real facts of the case.

I consider that the Minister of Justice has flexibly interpreted the bill of rights in order to protect his government and the Minister of Agriculture in so far as the Feeds Act is concerned and that he has flexibly interpreted the application of the bill of rights so that he would not need to make an embarrassing decision in connection with Bill No. C-76 introduced by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. These are instances where the minister has been caught out, and the hon. gentleman has resorted to his usual tactic of attacking other members, on the basis that attack is the best form of defence.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman should not try to put the blame on me when he is convicted out of his own mouth. I am not going to carry this argument further. It will be obvious to any hon. member who is prepared to look at this matter dispassionately, on which side of this discussion reason is to be found, though I know it will not be admitted by the hon. member who has just spoken. There is a further misunderstanding which will be obvious, I suggest, to everyone, though, once again, I do not think for a moment it will be admitted by the hon. member for Skeena. The hon. member persists in saying that it is a mistake to give the Minister of Justice responsibility for determining whether or not a statute is contrary to the provisions of the bill of rights. I point out for the information of the committee that the bill of rights does not give the minister any such responsibility. The courts, and the courts alone will determine whether a statute is contrary to the provisions of the bill of rights. I endeavoured to explain this in the course of the debate on the bill of rights.

It is true there is an obligation imposed on the minister to report to the House of Commons whether there is in his opinion anything inconsistent between a particular bill and the provisions of the bill of rights. This is the one occasion on which, as far as I know, the minister has a statutory duty to advise the House of Commons. But the House of Commons does not have to accept his advice. The house can say, if it wishes, tha it does not agree, and may take the view that a particular bill is contrary to the provisions of the bill of rights, notwithstanding the report made by the Minister of Justice. The House of Commons is the master of its own decisions, and the Minister of Justice neither can nor wishes to dictate to it. But whether the minister is right or wrong, and whether the House of Commons accepts his opinion or not, it is the courts and the courts alone which have to make the final decision, and this was the system envisaged in the bill of rights, as we endeavoured to make clear at the time.

As far as all the other red herrings trailed by the hon. member for Skeena are concerned, may I say to him again that it is perfectly clear I am not in the least embarrassed by any report I may have to make. I did not report on one particular bill because I did not think it was properly before the house, but I stated without hesitation, when the proper occasion arose, that in my view the Fisheries Act as it previously existed contained provisions contrary to what is contained in the bill of rights, and this government introduced legislation to remove those provisions and bring the act into conformity with the bill of rights. The hon. member will find another bill to be introduced shortly where provision is made for bringing a statute into conformity with the bill of rights by amending an existing statute. We have no embarrassment about saying that a measure is contrary to the provisions of the bill of rights and taking action to amend it when we present bills to the house. However, with deference to the views of others, I must be allowed to interpret for myself what my duty is and I suggest I can scarcely be criticized if I interpret my responsibility as being not to make a report to the house at the wrong time.

Mr. Howard: The minister says he does not expect me to be in accord with the views he has expressed. Technically speaking, it is true that the courts interpret our statutes and find out what they mean, but in the first instance the minister has a duty to examine bills and say whether or not they are consistent with the provision of the bill of rights. He is ordered to examine every bill presented to the House of Commons with that purpose in mind. Certainly this involves interpreting those statutes in the light of the requirements of the bill of rights. It is in this sense that I used that expression. I do not think the minister would deny that he has the obligation to examine bills from this point of view. Certainly, when they become statutes the courts are involved and would then determine whether or not they are consistent with the provisions of the bill of rights, along the same lines as the decision with respect to the Income Tax Act in Quebec and the decision reached in the community of Lillooet in British Columbia concerning whether a certain section of the Indian Act is in conflict with the bill of rights. However, the minister has the initial responsibility of reviewing new legislation and it is in this sense that I say it is a mistake to give this authority to a political figure.

Mr. Fulton: There is no authority given to me. There is a responsibility imposed upon me to report to the house.

Mr. Howard: Then you should exercise it once in a while.

Mr. Carter: If this is the responsibility imposed on the Minister of Justice, it is certainly one which he imposed on himself, or which his government imposed on him, because it was his government which brought in the legislation requiring the minister to make a report of this kind on bills introduced in the house.

I gather from what the minister said in his reply to the hon. member for Skeena a few moments ago that the purpose of this report is to advise members in dealing with legislation going through the house. I take it that is the reply to the question which I sought to have answered by the hon. gentleman yesterday. But what is the use of this advice to hon. members if we are unable to get it, as we could not get it in the case of Bill No. C-76, and what use is it if the minister himself can determine whether or not a report should be made, if he is to be the sole arbiter of whether something is before the house or whether it is not before the house. If the hon. gentleman can refrain from making a report whenever it suits him, what kind of a report is it? I think that is the heart of the question which the hon. member for Skeena is raising.

Earlier this afternoon in replying to the hon. member for Skeena the minister said that the seizure of a person's goods did not constitute an interference with the rights of an individual provided there is no penalty—

Mr. Fulton: That is not what I said.

Mr. Carter: The minister referred to seizure. The minister also said, again this afternoon, that the new fisheries legislation, Bill No. C-86, was examined by him and found not to be inconsistent with the bill of rights. I want to put a concrete case on record which I think will prove that the minister is wrong. Hon. members will recall that I protested at the time this particular piece of legislation was before the house, on the grounds that the seizure of property—

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we had a debate on this subject when the Fisheries Act was before the house. The question of whether or not is was in conformity with the bill of rights was raised, and the house apparently accepted my report that it was in conformity with those provisions. I suggest that it is not in order, on my estimates, to revert to that debate.

Mr. Carter: On the point of order, I am not reviving a debate on that legislation. The hon. member for Skeena drew attention to a number of cases in which the provisions of the bill of rights were contravened, including the Feeds Act. I am doing the same thing now.

Mr. Fulton: That was passed two years ago.

Mr. Carter: I intend to direct the minister's attention to a situation which contravenes the bill of rights in respect of the Fisheries Act. To do so I shall cite an example.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, with all respect I must ask you to rule on this matter. I do not recall for certain, but I believe the hon. member voted for the bill to revise the Fisheries Act. It was carried after we had a discussion as to whether it was in conformity with the bill of rights or not; that was one of the issues raised at the time and was thoroughly discussed. A decision was made in respect to it during this session. I simply wish to draw attention to the rule of this house which makes it out of order for any hon. member to revive or debate decisions of this house made during the same session. The Feeds Act was decided two years ago, and I should suggest there is no similarity between raising a question in regard to the Feeds Act conforming with the bill of rights, and reviving a debate in respect of the revised Fisheries Act, the debate of which has only been concluded at this session.

Mr. Carter: I am not reviving the debate on the Fisheries Act. The minister has not permitted me to say enough in respect of what I intend to place before this committee so that the chairman can make a ruling.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will pursue his remarks a little further, in order that I may decide whether he is within the rules.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I base my remarks on a statement made by the Minister of Justice earlier this afternoon in reply to the hon. member for Skeena. I intend to present an example indicating that the Fisheries Act does not conform to the bill of rights. I intended to point out that, where a seizure is made of any property, whether it be made under the provisions of the Fisheries Act or any other act, which deprives an individual of earning a livelihood, that act, under which the seizure is made, is contrary to the principles of our bill of rights. I suggest that is true, because the greatest right a citizen may enjoy is the right to live and, when that right is removed through the seizure of his means of earning a livelihood, it is contrary to the bill of rights.

I intended, when I was interrupted, to present an example which would indicate the accurateness of what I suggest, which happens to involve the seizure of fishing property under the Fisheries Act. I did not intend to revive the debate on the Fisheries Act, but to suggest that such a seizure, under any act, would exemplify the situation I have in mind. The example I intend to use involves a fisherman whose nets were seized by a fisheries officer under the provisions of the Fisheries Act.

Mr. Fulton: Which Fisheries Act, the old or the new?

Mr. Carter: I suggest it does not make any difference.

Mr. Jones: You do not know the difference.

Mr. Carter: The point which I have in mind is one of four which the minister did not change in the re-enactment of the Fisheries Act, and is the reason why I protest the certification, given this house by the minister, in relation to the new Fisheries Act, that it does not contravene the bill of rights. I agree with the suggestion of the minister that I voted for the bill. I did so because it contained better provisions than the old Fisheries Act. I felt that half a loaf was better than none at all.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the provisions regarding seizure and forfeiture under the new Fisheries Act are quite different from those under the old act. I suggest the hon. member is not only seeking to revive a debate of this session, but is now seeking to discuss a statute which is no longer in force.

Mr. Carter: No, Mr. Chairman, I am not doing that at all.

[Mr. Carter.]

Mr. Fulton: You are.

Mr. Carter: Will the minister deny that the present act allows a fisheries officer to seize a fisherman's property? If the minister will deny that, I will sit down. I suggest he cannot deny that fact, and is interpreting my remarks without any foundation of fact at all.

Mr. Chairman, to go on with the example, a fisherman's nets were seized apparently by individuals who had no knowledge regarding boats or fishing equipment, and who were probably more at home behind a desk. Following the seizure of this man's nets the man was brought before the courts. After the case against him was presented, the magistrate found that he had not offended against the Fisheries Act in any way, and dismissed the charge against him. The nets which had been seized, and stored, were eventually returned to him. They had not been properly taken care of; had been left wet to mould and rot. Upon their return to the fisherman they were worthless and of absolutely no value to him.

I remind hon. members that the court decided this man had committed no offence at all. Nevertheless, because of the fact that the nets were returned to him in a useless condition, and because he had been denied the use of the nets from the time of seizure, and thereafter, he was penalized. In addition to that, this man now finds himself without nets and, because of his lack of finances, unable to purchase new ones. He has no recourse and is unable to recover the value of his nets because he is a poor man; unable to go through the legal processes of suing the crown for the damages he has suffered. I suggest in this instance the man has been deprived of his right to earn a living and suggest, therefore, the act under which this seizure was made contravenes the provisions of our bill of rights.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I may stop the hon. gentleman at this point and say that I have been wondering whether the general discussion has been in order, inasmuch as it has not been confined to section 3 of the bill of rights. Hon. members have adopted a course that the Minister of Justice is responsible for any provision which may be contained in any act. That does not represent my view of the situation, and I would suggest it should not be the view of the committee generally. Any discussion in regard to the application of section 3 of the bill of rights is, of course, in order. However, I suggest that in any discussion based on the provisions of any act, one should not confuse the responsibilities of the minister, the government, or parliament itself. It is for that reason I have expressed some doubt as to the propriety of many of the comments which have been made since I returned to this chamber this afternoon. I did not intend to interrupt the hon. member in view of the great number of references which have been made this afternoon, as well as yesterday, in respect to this particular subject, but I suggest that hon. members confine their discussion to subjects which are in order, and appropriate to our consideration of the estimates of the Minister of Justice. I do not intend to make any ruling now, but I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that I have some grave doubts regarding the propriety of some of the statements which have been made.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I will now pass to another subject which will probably put the discussion on more solid ground.

The minister announced the introduction of:

A bill to carry out a narcotics control program, a bill to revise the Criminal Code to deal with dangerous sexual offenders and matters of that sort and also a bill to amend the Food and Drugs Act to deal with barbiturates.

The point I wish to make is that penalties are not proportionate to the crimes committed.

I see that section 138 of the Criminal Code authorizes judges to sentence to life imprisonment or to whipping, according to the judgment of the one who hears the case, any man who is found guilty of having had sexual intercourse with a woman, other than his wife, who is less that 14 years old, regardless of whether the accused knew or did not know that his victim was less that 14. Judges are not compelled to pass such sentence; they merely have the authority of doing so.

I feel that when a child under 12 is raped, the minimum sentence should be made more strict.

We have heard of psychopaths attacking chidren four or five years old and causing such harm to them that the latter were practically maimed for life, not to mention the dangerous inclination they were given by coming into contact too early with things they should have learned much later in life.

Yet, some judges, either because they lack firmness or for some other reason, have handed out sentences of only three to four years while the victim was left to suffer all her life from the attack. Minimum sentences should be more stringent in such cases.

Since the minister is presently preparing a bill in that regard I think he should provide for a stiffer minimum sentence and take away from the judges the authority of passing a lighter sentence, at their discretion.

When the victim is a child of less than 12, when violence is involved, when the victim's personality has been practically destroyed, not only should the penalty be life imprisonment but there should be a minimum of 25 years detention with the whip as an extra.

Perhaps it will be said that I am a sadist. Yesterday evening, I heard a psychiatrist say on television that those who demand the retention of capital punishment are sadists, in a way. Such sadism is good for the protection of society. Our first concern should be the protection of society rather than the protection of criminals.

This is why I suggest that the sentence should be at least 25 years when a child is violently assaulted to the extent that it will be marked for the rest of its life.

I suggest that in such cases the minimum sentence be 25 years in the penitentiary with flogging.

A judge should be empowered to impose capital punishment to an individual convicted of such a crime. Capital punishment applies to kidnapping in the United States, and the individual convicted of that crime goes to the electric chair.

For my part, I think rape involving a child is a far more odious crime and, therefore, I do not think that 25 years with flogging is too much. I even suggest that the judge be allowed to sentence the convict to capital punishment under certain circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, I now turn to another field, narcotics.

There are those who will say that the narcotics act is the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

However, it must be remembered that the Minister of National Health and Welfare cannot amend the narcotics act without first consulting the Department of Justice.

And as the minister indicated yesterday, a new bill will be submitted shortly. Under the circumstances, and following the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), I say we must make every effort to try to cure the drug addicts.

I think very severe penalties should be imposed when it is proven that a person was the leader of a narcotic ring, as happened recently in Montreal.

Indeed, I consider the drug distributor as guilty of an even greater offence than murder, because he kills the personality and draws the victim of this vice into a dead end.

Such a person should get not ten years, as it happened, but a minimum of 25 years and the lash.

Furthermore, in such a case, the judge should be entitled to impose the death sentence, because the drug peddler has killed the souls of people by destroying their personality. Those victims may later become murderers and be sent to the gallows.

A person who organizes the sale of narcotics in this country, thus promoting a new attitude on the part of drug addicts, is worse than a murderer.

In that case, the only true murderer is probably not the one who killed, but the one who prepared him for it by supplying the necessary drugs and inciting him to commit the offence.

That is why I ask the Minister of Justice, to see to it, when drafting those laws that we shall discuss, that they at least be strict enough to be a deterrent for those pushers who accumulated millions by selling the drugs. For, having been sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, they will probably be released after five, and return to society to enjoy their accrued capital under the very noses of their victims. The matter is important, and I shall ask the minister to study very seriously that aspect of the legislation in order to protect society not so much against the murderer, who committed the act because of the drugs sold to him, and therefore tends to be considered as the real offender, but against the narcotics pusher who is the true offender. Society must be protected against those swindlers at any price.

I therefore ask the minister to provide stricter legislation with regard to such people, rather than murderers, because the latter are in a way, often the victims of individuals who, all their lives have made profit out of vice.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I note that yesterday, hon. members for Hochelaga and Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Eudes and Mr. Deschatelets) raised certain points in respect of a brief which was submitted to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) in March 1961, and, as I have only a few more minutes to go before the period set aside for the discussion of public bills, I wonder whether he would give an answer in that respect.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: I replied certainly in part, if not completely, to that matter yesterday when I said that the matter of firearms—I think this is the one dealing with the firearms provision of the code—is very much before us. We submitted certain tentative proposals to the commissioners on uniformity of laws in the criminal law section last year. They reported back to us for further study, and we intend the matter to go before them again this fall. In the meantime the brief reflecting the point of view of the association of Canadian police chiefs will be carefully considered and those suggestions borne in mind in the reference back to the commissioners and in discussion there.

Mr. Peters: Will you call it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Fulton: We have had a good two days' discussion. Will the committee carry the first item and deal with the particulars tomorrow?

The Chairman: Since it is five o'clock, in order to permit the house to deal with public and private bills, pursuant to standing order 15 (3), it is my duty to report progress and request leave to sit again later this day, or next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

SUGGESTED REVISION OF MEDIATION AND CONCILIATION PROCESSES

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-30, an act to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.—Mr. Howard.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) and the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) both raised a point of order with respect to the position of this order of the day on the order paper, which I deferred for disposition at this time. I shall be glad to hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who I see is rising, if he has something to add to what he said the other day on the same point of order.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to make one or two more comments on this matter. At the time I raised the point of order before I did not have before me the copy of Hansard for the previous day. I should like to bring to Your Honour's attention page 5083 of Hansard of Friday, May 19, 1961. When the order for second reading of Bill No. C-30, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, was read by the Clerk, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) had an opportunity to move second reading of his bill. I believe that the citation which I drew to Your Honour's attention at that time, namely citation 380 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, indicates quite clearly that an obligation is placed on an hon. member. When the order is read by the Clerk he is then obligated to rise and move second reading of his bill.

Now, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) failed to do that at that time. I suggest to Your Honour that by attempting to have hon. members call it six o'clock when it was only five minutes to six, he indicated quite clearly he was not prepared to move second reading of the bill. If I may refer to Hansard, the same page, 5083, I find that after the house declined to call it six o'clock, the hon. member for Skeena then went on to say this:

> If hon. members are not inclined to follow the course suggested by me,—

In other words, because we declined to call it six o'clock when it was not six o'clock, the hon. member went on to take another course to dispose of the bill. I feel very strongly that this course of action was taken simply to prevent the second reading of the bill at that time in order that it would retain its place on the order paper, which it should not have retained. I submit this very seriously affects the rights of every private member to have bills heard. As we know, the time for the consideration of private bills is limited during the session. It is obvious that if this bill is heard first, some of those at the bottom of the order paper will not be heard at all. This very seriously affects the rights of hon. members.

There has been difficulty in this regard already involving the hon. member for Skeena because he is one of those members who, during the whole of the last session, filibustered the divorce bills and prevented other private bills from being heard.

Mr. Speaker: Order; I think the hon. member would be departing from the point of order if he were to discuss the conduct of the hon. member in connection with other matters.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am drawing to the attention of the house the difficulty in which other private members are placed in trying to have their bills considered. Almost half of the time allotted for private members' bills during this session has been taken up by a filibuster in connection with another bill, and the hon. member for Skeena has been involved in this event as well.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member one question, the answer to which would be of considerable assistance. Does he assert that the purpose for which an hon. member raises a point of order has any relevance when the house is considering that point of order? In other words, if a member has a right to raise a point of order, is there any obligation to consider the purpose for which he raised it? That is one argument which the hon. member advances, and I wonder whether or not he has considered the proposition and asserts it to be the case?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I do raise that point for your consideration. I fail to see how a point of order could possibly intervene after the order for second reading of Bill No. C-30 was read by the Clerk. At that time there was an obligation on the hon. member for Skeena to move second reading of his bill. The raising of a point of order for the purpose of ensuring that the bill does not come before the house, does not relieve his obligation.

I started to read citation 385 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, but at that time Your Honour felt the whole matter could be considered at a later time and I did not complete my reading of that citation. It is relevant, and reads:

> If, when the order of the day is read at the table, no motion be made for the second reading or other stage of a bill, or for its postponement, it becomes a dropped order, and does not appear again upon the notice paper, unless another day be appointed for its consideration.

I suggest to Your Honour that no motion was made for second reading of this bill and, therefore, it clearly comes within this citation and should be considered as a dropped order.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka brought to Your Honour's attention citation 87. He placed one or two of the relevant clauses before you at that time, but I should like to read citation 87 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, section 4, which has a bearing on the matter and reads as follows:

> It is one of the fundamental principles of parliamentary procedure that when nothing is done respecting an order of business it is struck out and cannot make further progress until the procedure regulating its passage has been regulated by the house.

Now, nothing was done in connection with the case. It was not brought before the house. Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 87, points out very clearly that when an order has been read it must thereupon be proceeded with, appointed for a day or discharged. I suggest that none of these things happened in this case, although there was sufficient time.

In addition to the arguments I have advanced in connection with these citations,

I believe that the only reason the hon. member raised the point of order was that he wanted to call it six o'clock. In his own words, he indicated that he was raising the point of order because we would not agree to call it six o'clock, thus ensuring that the bill would not come before the house. I suggest that was the only reason he raised that point of order and for that reason I believe the relevance of the point of order does become a factor in this discussion.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I might say a word on this point of order. Actually, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) did raise a point of order and in speaking to it he said, as recorded on page 5083 of Hansard:

> My point of order is that some time ago a statement of policy was made by a representative of the government with respect to public bills sponsored by private members.

The hon. member then went on to say that such bills shall be heard and given full study. He said:

> Today we have seen this course followed in an admirable way,—

Actually, the hon. member had no point of order and I would suggest to Your Honour that his bill was up for second reading, the order was read to the house, and the hon. member for Skeena actually raised an invalid point of order in order to protect the position of his bill on the order paper.

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): May I make one or two comments on this particular matter, Mr. Speaker? I had a very edifying experience very early in my career, sir, when I tried to do something of a similar nature. As will be seen from a perusal of page 1730 of Hansard for June 27, 1958, I was speaking to a motion for second reading of my bill when Your Honour indicated that I was not entitled to read from an editorial. My situation at that time was similar to that of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), and I rose on a question of privilege relating to my right to refer to this particular editorial.

At that time, you, in effect, questioned the right of an hon. member to interrupt himself and proceed with another matter. I suggest that, although at that particular time I raised a question of privilege, a point of order is similar and what the hon. member for Skeena was seeking to do was to interrupt himself. Once the Clerk of the house had read the order, as is clearly indicated in Hansard at page 5083—

> Second reading of Bill C-30, an act to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act—Mr. Howard.—
> [Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

—the hon. member then had no alternative but to proceed with this particular measure. He endeavoured to interrupt himself, just as I did, and I suggest a ruling should have been made that he was not entitled to interrupt himself. The bill was called for second reading and the hon. member decided to take up the time by talking on another matter which, I suggest, was irrelevant. If he wishes to utilize the time available for this particular bill by discussing a point of order, then perhaps that is his prerogative. I would suggest that the bill was properly before the house. The hon. member should have proceeded with it. He was not entitled to interrupt himself on a point of order as he sought to do. But if he wished to dispose of the bill himself by talking it out on a point of order, I might suggest that perhaps that was up to him, because there was not sufficient time for a reply to be made. But having erroneously interrupted himself and proceeded to that particular point, I think he is estopped in effect from proceeding with the bill. I think there was a strong indication, that the course of action he was taking was a delaying tactic in light of the fact that at five minutes to six he called it six o'clock.

But having had his day in court, shall we say, I think the bill is passed. There are other members such as the hon. member for Kingsway (Mr. Browne) and myself, as a matter of fact, who are very close to getting our bills before the house. We are approaching the end of the session, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and myself are anxious to have our bills discussed before the house. Although I sympathize with the hon. member for Skeena in the unfortunate situation in which he finds himself nevertheless I feel that he has had his chance. His timing was not too good but his opportunity has passed. I think we should now proceed with the next order of business, Mr. Speaker, and that you should rule that the hon. member for Skeena has had his opportunity to speak; that if he chose to speak on a point of order, that matter was up to him, but that his opportunity has passed.

Mr. Howard: I wish to make one brief comment, although I covered it when this point of order was initially raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne). I contended that he was incorrect in raising it then just as I contend that he is incorrect in raising it now. I think that is the essence of it, although it was not put very well there. It is interesting to note that the viewpoint is being maintained by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale) who, by his own admission, along with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has a peculiarly personal interest in this matter. Those hon. members are next in line.

I would say this. While the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond on a previous occasion was prevented from interrupting himself, I pointed out that by raising the point of order I was not interrupting myself because no motion had been made with respect to the matter.

Mr. Drysdale: I would point out that in the rules there is no provision which permits an hon. member, once a bill has been read out by the Clerk, to intervene on a point of order. Perhaps it might be possible to do so on a question of privilege. I would suggest that the proper way for it to have been done was for him to indicate that he was proceeding with the bill, to start the discussion of the bill and that then it might have been possible to raise a point of order at that particular time.

As a matter of interest, I may say that I am down to seventh or eighth place in the matter of precedence. There are several other hon. members ahead of me and behind me who have a similar interest in getting on with a discussion of their particular bills. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member in that respect is erroneous.

As to the time of intervention or interjection by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, may I say he raised it last Saturday morning at the first opportunity when the order paper was obviously in error in having the hon. member's bill at the top of the list. I would suggest that he was completely in order today in rising on this specific point of order again when the bill was improperly at the head of the list. I think the hon. member for Skeena is in error in suggesting there was a mistake on the part of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway when he raised this matter.

Mr. Pallett: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this matter because I think there may be something to be added to what has already been said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond and the hon. member for Skeena. They have very carefully referred to Beauchesne, paragraphs 380, 385 and 87. However, the matter hinges on the interpretation of standing order 19 (1) and (2). If I may, I should like to refer for a moment to some of the documents of the house itself in order to assist Your Honour in interpreting this particular section.

I think the matter is one of considerable importance to the private members of this house. The time allocated to them is set out on definite hours or definite days. If for some reason or another—and I am not suggesting that this was the situation in this case—an hon. member's bill is not reached until the private members hour is fairly well along, it is not beyond the realm of possibility that a point of order should be raised by that member with, for example, even 15 minutes to go of the hour and that such time could be used up in that way. It is not a question of a few minutes—I just used that figure by way of illustration—but it is a question of whether this procedure might not be used as a device some time in the future for the purpose of getting an hon. member's bill in a priority position on the order paper or by way of a device to maintain it there.

With that point in mind, I think this decision is probably one of the most serious ones affecting the private members of the house that Your Honour has been called upon to make for some time. Standing order 19 states:

(1) Questions put by members and notices of motions, not taken up when called may (upon the request of the government) be allowed to stand and retain their precedence; otherwise they will disappear from the order paper. They may, however, be renewed.

(2) Orders not proceeded with when called, upon the like request,—

And it has been ruled by Your Honour in this house that "upon the like request" refers to a request of the government.

—may be allowed to stand retaining their precedence; otherwise they shall be dropped and be placed on the order paper for the next sitting after those of the same class at a similar stage.

(3) All orders not disposed of at the adjournment of the house shall be postponed until the next sitting day, without a motion to that effect.

In ruling I think Your Honour must determine what is meant by the words "proceeded with when called". I would refer Your Honour to the record of this house which is called Votes and Proceedings. Nowhere in it in reference to orders do you find a question called. I refer to the day on which this particular matter was dealt with, namely Friday, May 19. Proceeding to some bills that preceded Bill No. C-30, we find in Votes and Proceedings of May 19, at page 565, under the heading "Public Bills" and referring to Bill No. C-27:

The order being read for the second reading of Bill C-27, an act to amend the the Senate and House of Commons Act (Solicitor General's Eligibility);

Then we go on to the next one and we find the following:

The order being read for the second reading of Bill C-29, an act to amend the Representation Act;

Following this recital in Votes and Proceedings we then have the recital that the hon. member made a motion, duly seconded, in the particular cases. I suggest to Your Honour that under standing order 19 (1) and (2) the motion being "called" is identical with being "read"; and so in Votes and Proceedings also of May 19 with respect to the bill in question, namely Bill No. C-30, we find the following:

> The order being read for the second reading of Bill C-30, an act to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act;

I submit, Your Honour, that this is the same as being called under standing order 19. Whether or not the point of order raised was a bona fide or a bogus one is a matter I think Your Honour is not called upon to decide. I think it is a question of these particular words.

In the event that "called" is not the same as "read", some steps will have to be taken to rewrite Votes and Proceedings for many years, because it is in this context that the official records of the house have been kept.

If "read" is the same as "called", the authorities referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway contained in Beauchesne, citations 380, 385 and 87, are pertinent. Your Honour will also find in May, fifteenth edition, and all other authorities, that when an order is read—he refers to "read" and not "called"—and not proceeded with, it is dropped.

I submit these points for Your Honour's consideration in making this very vital decision, which is one that could have very far reaching effects on the rights of hon. members of this house to proceed with the business that is "called" by our wording but "read" by the wording in the official record of proceedings of the house and by the wording in the authorities for other houses.

For these reasons I submit that the arguments advanced by the hon. members for Vancouver-Kingsway and Vancouver-Burrard are most important and certainly should be given very earnest and serious consideration by Your Honour.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Speaker, I just want to supplement very briefly what the hon. member has said. Perhaps I should correct the hon. member and tell him that my riding is Burnaby-Richmond. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is not present at this time.

Mr. Pallett: I am sorry.

Mr. Drysdale: He probably has enough problems without this submission being attributed to him. I should like to refer to Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, sixteenth edition, page 533. The wording is somewhat similar to Beauchesne. May refers to bills dropped and says:

> It may here be stated, that if, when the order of the day is read at the table, no motion is made for the second reading or other stage of a bill, or for its postponement, it becomes a dropped order, and does not appear again upon the notice paper, unless another day is appointed for its consideration.

The facts are exactly on point, because as is indicated at page 5083 of Hansard, the order was very clearly read. The hon. member then had the choice of proceeding with second reading or requesting postponement of this particular bill, and it is very clear that he had to make his choice at that specific moment.

The fact that the hon. member chose to raise a point of order when there was no provision for this indicates, I think, that he chose to treat it as a dropped order, since the only choice presented to him was to make the motion, which he chose not to do, or make a motion for postponement.

The rule is very clear; the onus is on the hon. member to take some specific form of action. By not taking any of the forms of action indicated in the rules I suggest he is estopped from proceeding. The effect is that the bill then becomes a dropped order, as I suggest it rightly is now.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, in reply to what the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) in particular said, and those other hon. members who put forward this facetious reasoning, I would draw to Your Honour's attention Votes and Proceedings for Friday, April 21, page 463—

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Drysdale: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I object to the reference of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) that this is a facetious question, because the matter is one of great importance. Although the hon. member may view it in a facetious fashion, it is extremely important to hon. members following him whether or not their bills will be discussed.

Mr. Speaker: The imputation is not serious enough to raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious to all what is happening. May I draw Your Honour's attention to Votes and Proceedings for Friday, April 21, page 463 which says that at five o'clock public and private bills were called pursuant to standing order 15. Then it says:

> On the order being read for the second reading of Bill C-20, an act to amend the Small Loans Act, the honourable member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) requested that the said order be allowed to stand, and raised a point of order to the effect—

Then it sets out certain things and says there was a ruling by Mr. Deputy Speaker which was subsequently appealed to the house and the house decided a certain way. Then after disposition of the point of order, it says:

Accordingly, Mr. Argue, seconded by Mr. Regier, moved,— —second reading of the bill.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I consider this matter to be of such importance that the house should give serious attention to it, because the ruling Your Honour will make will stand as a precedent for a very considerable time, if not forever. We are faced here with a suggested reversal of long established practice.

The hon. members who have preceded me have read our own rule in the house. They have quoted from Beauchesne. I should like to refer to the other references so that we have on record a clear picture of what has been the practice of the house, the rules and the comments on the rules over the years with regard to dropped motions or dropped orders.

Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, page 221, contains very much the same wording that we have in our rule. The complete citation is page 221, section XII, subsection 2 of rule 32 of that day, and it reads:

Orders not proceeded with when called, upon the like request, may be allowed to stand retaining their precedence; otherwise they shall be dropped and be placed on the order paper for the next sitting after those of the same class at a similar stage.

Obviously, sir, this has been the long established practice of the House of Commons because the third edition of Beauchesne dates back to 1903 and I suppose the fourth edition is a repetition of that.

I should also like to draw Your Honour's attention to the reference in Beauchesne, fourth edition, page 81 which was read by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne); but there is an additional sentence there which is interesting. The hon. member read as follows, and this is page 81, citation 87, subsection 4:

It is one of the fundamental principles of parliamentary procedure that when nothing is done respecting an order of business it is struck out and cannot make further progress until the procedure regulating its passage has been regulated by the house.

I suggest, sir, that this order of business having been called, or read out, and nothing having been done with it, according to our rules and the practice of the house it was then automatically struck out. Beauchesne goes on to say:

Neither the Speaker nor any officer of the house have the power to move it forward.

I suggest, sir, that this order should have been struck out, dropped entirely or placed at the bottom of the list. Then the onus would have been on the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) to draw to Your Honour's attention whether or not that was established practice and whether it should have been dropped. But no officer of the house should have placed on the order paper in the position in which it appears, an order that had been read out and which had not been proceeded with. It should have been struck out or dropped, and it seems to me that the action taken exceeded the authority which is permitted according to the sentence which I have read from Beauchesne.

Then, in times of doubt concerning matters of rules and procedure we look to May, and the sixteenth edition of May at page 392 has a further comment to make with regard to dropped orders and indicates, of course, that they may be revived. May I point out in passing that although we suggested this order should have been dropped or placed at the bottom of the list, this does not mean further discussion on it is prohibited at a later date; it is not being thrown out entirely, because it can be revived by the hon. member. There is no prohibition involved in this at all. It is just a question of the order of precedence. May, at page 392, has this to say:

When an order of the day has been read, the proceedings thereon may be cut short by the adjournment of the house whilst those proceedings are in course of transaction. An order of the day, in such cases, or if, when the order is read, no day is appointed for its future consideration, drops off the notice paper, as the house has made no order thereon.

I suggest to you, sir, that the house was unable to take any action with regard to second reading of Bill No. C-30 because of the intervention of the proposer of the bill, at his own desire, in order, as we see it, to prevent consideration of the measure. According to the rules we have quoted to you and the citations we have placed on record in Hansard this particular order should not now be standing at the head of the order paper. The opportunity was available for the proposer to move it. He did not take that opportunity. Therefore, the house took no action with regard to it and the order is a dropped order and should not stand where it now stands.

Mr. Speaker: The question before the Chair is one of considerable interest and importance and one to which I have given a good deal of thought in the interval since it was raised. I think certain principles are clear enough but I have one difficulty which I have not been able to resolve, and perhaps if I set out my views on the position of the order for second reading of Bill No. C-30 I may be able to get some assistance on that doubtful point.

When an order such as this order of the house for a second reading of a bill is read by the Clerk, as was done in this case, the matter is not before the house for discussion until the motion has been moved. The motion must be taken up. After the order is read, various things may happen and most of the contingencies are provided for in our standing order No. 19. If the order is not proceeded with it is dropped under paragraph 2 of standing order 19 and it is argued that that is the applicable clause in the circumstances we now have under consideration. If the order is not disposed of, then paragraph 3 applies, and paragraph 3 of standing order 19 says:

> All orders not disposed of at the adjournment of the house shall be postponed until the next sitting day, without a motion to that effect.

In fact, this matter was not disposed of—whether rightly or wrongly is a matter still to be determined. But if hon. members will turn to Hansard for the report of the debate in question the facts will be clear enough. The order was read by the clerk assistant, and the hon. member in whose name the order stood was then given the floor for the purpose of moving his motion. A motion can be put before the house either by being read from the chair, which is the customary practice—I suppose, to save time—or it can be moved by the hon. member in whose name it stands before it is read from the chair. The hon. member was given the floor for that purpose. I do not need to repeat what transpired, because it is set out in full at page 5083. The hon. member first suggested that it was six o'clock. It was not, in fact, six o'clock and the house did not concur in his request that it be called six o'clock. Then, without apparently relinquishing the floor or without any intervening action, he said, "Then I should like to raise a point of order".

It has been argued, and I think, correctly by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale) that a member should not rise on a point of order in order to deter or impede the progress of his own motion. In other words, he cannot raise a point of order against himself. I think that is a sound principle. It is certainly sound in forensic practice—a man cannot both approbate and reprobate if he is moving a motion. He cannot say, at the same time: "I am out of order in moving, but I move." That is what the hon. member, in effect, did. I accept that argument—the argument that it is not open to a member of the house who has the floor for the purpose of moving a motion or carrying on some proceeding in his name, or making a speech, to make a point of order against his own progress in that manner. Having got thus far, I am up against the difficulty that, in fact, the hon. member's point of order was entertained instead of being rejected at that time, as I suggest it could have been rejected. And it was being entertained when the sitting came to a conclusion at six o'clock. Therefore, the question which is unresolved by the argument so far is this: assuming that what has been said is correct and that the duty of the hon. members was either to decline to proceed, or to proceed, or to move the postponement, or to take whatever other course was open to him, what is the position when as I have said he took a course which was not open to him, to raise a point of order against himself? As I have said, the hon. member did in fact proceed to speak without a motion having been made. He was heard, and six o'clock intervened. That is the way the order paper stood when the clerks had the duty of preparing the order paper for the next day. If the point had been taken at the time when the hon. member for Skeena had the floor for the sole purpose of moving his motion or asking that it should stand, and for no other purpose, then this difficulty about the subsequent order paper would not have arisen. Or, if the time had been sufficient for the nature of the point of order, which, appears to have no substance, to have been determined, it would then have been necessary to move second reading, and the hon. member would then have been under the obligation of moving, or allowing his motion to drop.

However, time intervened while this irregular discussion was proceeding and the question now is whether that intervention of time saves the place of this motion on the order paper. That is the difficult point which is involved; whether the point of order, having been in fact entertained, and the time having lapsed, allows the hon. member to escape the consequences of the irregularity of his course. In fact the order was read, but had not been disposed of, and subsection 3 of standing order 19 states positively that all orders not disposed of at the adjournment of the house, shall be postponed to the next sitting day without a motion to that effect. Should I interfere with the order as it stands today on the order paper? To do so I should have to cancel all that which was done on the last day, and I do not think hon. members would expect me to take that course.

I should like to present one other point of view before disposing of the matter, and then ask for the opinions of hon. members regarding the difficulty involved.

I am satisfied that when an order is read, it is not before the house, until the motion has been moved. Beauchesne says, in citation No. 380, to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) referred, that when a bill comes up for second reading in its proper course, and one of the clerks at the table reads the order aloud, the member in charge of the measure will then move its second reading. I accept that as a correct statement of normal practice. Similarly, I accept as a statement of normal practice that which is contained in citation 385;

> If, when the order of the day is read at the table, no motion be made for the second reading, or other stage of the bill, or for its postponement, it becomes a dropped order.

However, I point this situation out for hon. members' consideration: After an order is read there may be an intervening procedure before a motion is made. It is within the rights of any member of the house, other than the member whose duty it is to move the motion, to raise a point of order. For instance, the point of order which we are considering now could well be taken after the reading of an order but before the consequent motion; in other words, the point that the order of the day is not properly on the order paper. The point of order arises as soon as the order is read, and before the motion is proceeded with.

As another instance, a point of order might well be taken under standing order 74, that the bill was not printed in both English and French and therefore could not yet be read the second time. This point of order could well be taken after the Clerk had read the order at the table, but before the motion had been put. If such a point of order was taken, it would then have to be discussed. The discussion would then have intervened and prolonged the time during which the mover of the second reading of the bill must move his motion, or decide not to proceed with it. In fact, that is what did happen in respect of this particular bill, C-30. I have said it could happen, and it did happen.

The difficulty involved is, that what did intervene was something which should not have been allowed to intervene. It having been allowed to intervene, I do not intend, unless hon. members can persuade me otherwise, to alter the effect of the rule as contained in subsection 3 of standing order 19, which would allow the order to keep its place on the order paper.

If any hon. member has any suggestion to contribute to this aspect of the problem, with which I am faced, and before I dispose of the matter, I should like to hear him.

Mr. H. F. Jones (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a maxim of equity that he who seeks justice must do justice. I suggest that has a pertinent effect in respect of this particular point, because the point of order is a bogus one, and was raised by the hon. member who was called upon to move the particular bill. The meaning of that maxim surely must be that if a person wishes to rely on the rules, in order to advance his cause, he must, in the terms of that phrase, do justice himself. The corollary of that is that he is estopped from relying on the technicality of a point of order if he raises the point of order himself.

In regard to the question as to whether the point of order had been entertained, I do not think the house can properly be seized with a bogus point of order, particularly one raised by the hon. member who was moving the motion. I suggest, therefore, that the point of order which was raised has no effect at all, and the situation is simply as though the passage of time had lapsed, and it was not possible for the Speaker in the time that intervened to make a ruling in respect of it.

Your Honour mentioned another course during your remarks, as to whether any hon. member had objected to the member raising this point of order. It will be noted that at page 5083 of Hansard for May 19, 1961 it is recorded right after the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) said "Then I should like to raise a point of order," that an hon. member said "The order has been called". I suggest, in view of that, it was impossible or improper for the hon. member for Skeena to raise a point of order against himself.

Returning again to the original point—he who seeks justice must do justice—I suggest in procedural terms, this means that if one seeks to rely on the procedures of this house, or of the courts, one must not offend those procedures one seeks to invoke to support his cause. I suggest that is exactly what the hon. member has sought to do by talking out, in effect, his own bill.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make two brief comments. First of all, when the hon. member for Skeena rose to the point of order, it would have been impossible for any other member to rise on another point of order, because he would not be recognized. I suggest, therefore, this is the first opportunity we have had to do so.

The second point I should like to mention is that the hon. member for Skeena referred to the procedure followed on April 21 in respect to Bill No. C-20 amending the Small Loans Act. He suggested the procedure followed at that time was very similar to the present situation, in that when this bill was called for second reading the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) the mover of the bill, said "Stand." The hon. member for Assiniboia, the leader of the party of which the hon. member for Skeena is a member, obviously had in mind very properly standing order 19 (2), which states that orders may be allowed to stand; but the point that is indicated very clearly—and the hon. member for Skeena gave this particular citation—is that the hon. member for Assiniboia realized that when the orders were called he had to take some sort of positive action. He had to request that the order be stood over, proceed with the motion for second reading or allow it to become a dropped order.

I suggest that by doing nothing the hon. member for Skeena has permitted his order to become a dropped order. The fact that he raised this point of order and that it was impossible for other members to intervene I suggest would have no effect on the ruling, Mr. Speaker. Your clear decision is to point out to the hon. member that he should have acted as soon as the order was called. Then, if he wished to raise a point of order, that was the time to do it. Since he chose to take no stand I would suggest that it became a dropped order, and that is the way it should stand now.

Mr. Howard: I raise another point which was not developed in the original discussion.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I understand you have given your ruling. Now the hon. member for Skeena is going to compound his error of last week by speaking to a point of order and thus prevent the moving of his own motion.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Howard: Surely, that is not so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: We have been speaking to the point raised with respect to his action and I think he is entitled to say something. However, I think I have heard ample to permit me to dispose of the matter.

Mr. Howard: May I be permitted—

Mr. Speaker: I would not like this hour to expire without this matter being disposed of. It is an important matter and it points up the necessity of following the rules of the house at all times. There is no question that when the order was called, notwithstanding there were only a few minutes left, it was the duty of the hon. member to move his motion, if he wished to proceed with it, or allow it to stand. However, he did intervene and—

Mr. Howard: May I speak on the point of order now?

[Mr. Drysdale.]

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Speaker: I have had ample assistance on the point.

Mr. Howard: Have I not the right to speak on the point of order?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will refer to the rules he will find that the Speaker may permit such debate on a point of order as he sees fit. I have come to the conclusion that as the hon. member used improperly the opportunity given to him to move his motion, to raise a point of order against his own progress in the matter, and as it was permitted at the time, I cannot correct it now. The effect of that is that the order for second reading now comes before the house. It has been read from the table; it has not been put to the house in the usual way by my declaring that the motion has been made and seconded, and opening the debate, nor has it been stood. In the circumstances, I think I must do that now unless any hon. members wish to take the course which is open to them with respect to my disposition with regard to this rather difficult point of order. It has served a purpose. At least it emphasizes the need for proceeding in accordance with the rules at all times and not to allow irregular proceedings to intervene and take an improper advantage. I therefore find that the order paper is correct, and the order having been read today I call on the hon. member for Skeena to propose his motion.

Mr. Howard: I raise a question of privilege. Surely the rights of myself and the privileges of this house have been abused by hon. members opposite in having ample opportunity to express points of view, some of which reflect upon me—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has allowed me to intervene, and it is too late to raise the question now. Unless he moves his motion it will be dropped.

Mr. Howard: Then, Mr. Speaker, at your suggestion it will be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Then the order is dropped.

Order dropped.

Mr. Howard: This is an arrogant government if there ever was one.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

FINANCE

PROVISION FOR PRINTING OF NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS IN BOTH ENGLISH AND FRENCH

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-31, an act respecting the printing of negotiable instruments in the English and the French languages.—Mr. Pigeon.

Mr. Churchill: I am prepared to call it six o'clock at this stage.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Peters: Proceed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the absence of the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm—

Some hon. Members: Dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Order dropped.

Order dropped.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO WATER POLLUTION

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Criminal Code (nuisance).—Mr. Herridge.

Mr. Herridge: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: May the hon. member call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is on the horns of a dilemma. He must proceed or drop the matter.

Mr. Habel: On a point of order, two clocks say six o'clock and a third says that it is a couple of minutes to six. All the clocks in the house should show the same time.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has a point of order. If two clocks say it is six o'clock and the other one does not, which one is the official clock? Is the house prepared to agree that it is six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hellyer: Will the house leader indicate the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: We shall carry on with the estimates of the Department of Justice and of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the house leader indicate the proposed business for the first two days of next week?

Mr. Churchill: Sometimes there is not much advantage in doing this, Mr. Speaker, but I will concede the point tonight and announce that on Monday and Tuesday we shall be taking legislation. The first item that will be considered is Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, May 27, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

PERSONNEL OF SESSIONAL COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING OWNED AND CONTROLLED BY THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. John Pallett (Peel) moved:

Thart the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping appointed May 15, 1961, be composed of Messrs. Badanai, Brassard (Lapointe), Broome, Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway), Campeau, Carter, Chevrier, Chown, Creaghan, Granger, Grills, Howe, Horner (Jasper-Edson), Kennedy, McDonald (Hamilton South), McFarlane, McPhillips, McWilliams, Mitchell, Monteith (Verdun), Pascoe, Robinson, Rowe, Smallwood, Smith (Simcoe North) and Winch.

Motion agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TOMASZ BIERNACKI—REARRAIGNMENT ON PREFERRED INDICTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the unusual situation involved, will the minister give the house a report in respect to the rearraignment of Mr. Tomasz Biernacki after his release by a Montreal judge?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): This matter is before the courts and I do not think there is anything I can properly say with regard to it. A preferred indictment was authorized by the attorney general of Quebec, and the matter is now before the courts. Perhaps I should and could properly say, in supplement of my answer that the issues involved in the case referred to are in our view far too important and, in some respects, new, not to take every proper step to have them determined by at least a superior court.

Mr. Hellyer: Notwithstanding the grave implications in the answer the minister has just given us, can he assure the house that the procedure being followed is in accordance with the law of the land?

Mr. Fulton: Yes sir; absolutely. While I do not think there is any precedent for this actual case, there is a clear precedent for the same situation in the United Kingdom. The law of Canada provides for the bringing in of a preferred indictment as has been done here.

POWER

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING EXPORT OF POWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister inform the house whether during his recent visit to Trail he had discussions with senior officials of the West Kootenay Power and Light Company, or with senior officials of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, or with Mr. Douglas McMynn, president of the association of chambers of commerce of eastern British Columbia, who is also a senior official of the West Kootenay Light and Power Company, with respect to the export of power?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I had no such discussions, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

OTTAWA—EFFECT OF CHANGE IN PHOTOGRAPHIC POLICY OF "CITIZEN"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if I could address a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him whether he has any information with respect to the number of Canadians who will be out of work as a result of the impending action on June 5, when the Ottawa Citizen, belonging to the Southam newspaper chain, begins a contract for all its photography with a foreign press service, namely United Press International.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the hon. member has given notice of the question, but it relates to some event in private business which is not the responsibility of the administration, although the hon. member appeared to relate it to ministerial responsibility by asking the minister if he knew how many men would be out of work. I think if this does come within the responsibility of the administration in any way the question ought to go on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRY

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS—REPRESENTATIONS BY AUTOMOBILE WORKERS UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister if he and the government will reconsider the decision not to meet representatives of the united automobile workers who have been in touch with the Prime Minister's office regarding representations which they wish to make concerning the agricultural implement industry?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I will take the question as notice.

GRAIN

QUEBEC—REPORTED PROTEST AS TO TRANSPORTATION COST

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Perhaps I might take this opportunity to reply to a question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Labelle. His question, as reported on page 5405 of Hansard, was as follows:

> Has the Prime Minister received a telegram from the Saguenay catholic union of farmers seeking to remedy the situation whereby farmers in the Saguenay district have to pay $10 to $20 more than western farmers for the transportation of grain in their area? Is any action by the government contemplated in order to correct this situation?

I did receive the telegram in question, which was referred to the office of the Minister of Agriculture. Representations were also received from the hon. member for Lake St. John in this connection. A brief prepared by the organization in question was brought to the attention of the government.

My information is that an active study is being made in regard to the whole question of the movement of feed grains into British Columbia, the central provinces and the Atlantic provinces. When policy is decided upon in this regard it will be announced in the usual manner.

PUBLICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, having regard to statements made earlier this week, whether he has yet received the report of the royal commission headed by Mr. Grattan O'Leary.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received a copy of that report.

[Mr. Speaker.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister another question arising out of an answer he gave to a question I asked some weeks ago, in which he stated that he hoped very, very, very soon to appoint the remaining members of the royal commission inquiring into the matter of medical care insurance.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the answer I gave was well justified, and that the appointments will be made very shortly. I hope to be in a position to inform this house of those appointments within a few days.

TRADE

FLOUR—INQUIRY AS TO MILLING CAPACITY TO FILL CHINESE CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister say whether Canadian owned flour milling companies have sufficient excess capacity to mill the grain for the Chinese government in respect of which he has made commitments in recent contracts?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should say the answer to that question is yes.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether Canadian companies which are subsidiaries of United States owned companies require permits from the United States government to do this work for the Chinese government, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of last night?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I suggest this is no concern of ours. We have simply provided this market to the flour mill companies, and they must take the necessary action. I am not quite clear about what the hon. member is referring to, as I have not seen a copy of the Toronto Daily Star.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO BILINGUAL TRAINING PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Vincent Brassard (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport or, in his absence, the acting minister. Could the minister tell me how many instructors among the six recently appointed to train the operating personnel of the C.N.R. passenger service in the province of Quebec are able to speak both English and French?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the question as notice and the Minister of Transport will answer it Monday.

Mr. Brassard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister were told that five of the six instructors are unable to speak French, would he take up the matter with the Canadian National Railways to correct such a situation?

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

165. Departmental administration including annual contribution of $200 to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada and $167,500 as grants to recognized private after-care agencies as may be approved by treasury board, $1,194,583.

(Translation):

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Chairman, at this stage in the study of the estimates of the Department of Justice, I should like to direct a few remarks to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) with regard to an act which is of concern to his department. I refer to the Bankruptcy Act.

Much is being said in the newspapers about the administration of that act, which has been in force since July 1, 1950, a period of 11 years.

Much is made of fraudulent bankruptcies. Representations have been made by all kinds of organizations, including the Canadian lumber association, with the support of the national retail lumbermen and the provincial wholesale association, in May 1961.

Those businessmen complain about various provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. They claim that transfers which are made within three months before a bankruptcy, and which are valid, should be extended over a period of two years. Others feel that no one should be allowed to go into bankruptcy unless indebted to an amount of at least $3,000.

Mr. Chairman, I feel the act should be improved. In fact, the time has come to refer it to a committee of the house for consideration and for necessary admendments. However, if some amendments cannot be submitted to a committee before some time, it would certainly be possible to improve it in the meantime.

The situation is this. There are many complaints about fraudulent bankruptcies. There is no doubt some bankruptcies are fraudulent, and in that regard, the Canadian Bar Association, at a meeting held last winter in Quebec city, made certain recommendations to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to protect the people who resort to fraudulent bankruptcies, and I suggest that to prevent such things, we should apply tighter controls in such cases.

What happens today is that some trustees go into remote districts where they consult credit agencies and suggest to the debtors that they file a petition for bankruptcy. The bankruptcy is not, in such cases, registered in the place of domicile of the bankrupt, but in the larger centres such as Montreal and Quebec, with the result that the creditors are not interested. If they are appointed as inspectors, they do not attend meetings because they live too far away from the place where the bankruptcy was registered. Then the goods described in the bankruptcy are carried away and sold elsewhere at ridiculous prices. The result is that the creditors get very little out of such sales.

I feel that if the act were amended in such a way as to force the bankrupt to register his assignment of property at his place of domicile, a great deal of fraud would be avoided.

Now, the Canadian Bar Association has also made a very useful suggestion, namely that:

> An assistant superintendent of bankruptcy be appointed for each province to follow the procedures more closely and to ensure that assets be converted to the advantage of the creditors.

We must admit that the superintendent of bankruptcy, whose office is in Ottawa, is much too far from the places where bankruptcy petitions are filed.

The appointment of an assistant superintendent for the province of Quebec would already be an improvement.

But we should not mention only the person who is bankrupt; there are also voracious creditors who are always in a hurry and who could just "eat up" the debtor.

I have here a brief submitted by the credit granters' association of Canada where it is requested that the chapter of the Bankruptcy

Act dealing with small debtors whose debts do not amount to much, be amended especially as far as summary administration is concerned.

I would not state this categorically, but I am quite sure that unscrupulous finance companies are sponsoring the amendment proposed by the association.

Recently creditors have sold all kinds of furniture to businessmen in the Montreal district. They are in a hurry to file a bankruptcy petition.

Now, we know that under the Bankruptcy Act no petition may be withdrawn without leave of the court.

As I was saying, there are at present in the Montreal district a certain number of bankruptcy petitions. Every week someone comes before the court to ask that a petition be withdrawn. In other words, the Bankruptcy Act is being used to collect debts.

Now, before we scratch out the chapter on summary administration, I feel we should get rid of that epidemic of salesmen.

I will give you a few examples, for instance, that of the knitting machine salesmen. The Minister of Justice must certainly be aware of the case since the knitting machine industry has moved from Montreal to Vancouver to continue its highly suspicious work.

Here is how those people operated. They would sell a knitting machine for $400, give knitting lessons to the purchaser and undertake to buy any article the latter knitted. One fine day, the purchaser would find out that the salesmen had disappeared into thin air.

Before they left, however, they had been very careful to sell their sale contract to finance companies which undertook to collect any balance owing.

What could those unfortunate debtors do except file a petition in bankruptcy triggered by unscrupulous people?

There has been another racket involving salesmen of machines to manufacture milk powder. It was being carried on mostly in the province of Quebec. After they had made a sale the salesmen undertook to buy the milk powder. In the meantime they transferred the note to a finance company to look after the collection, and they dropped out of sight.

Finance companies are frantic. Most of them are loan shark outfits fattening on refunds paid out weekly by labourers. If 200 or 300 labourers have contracted to make those weekly payments, just multiply that figure by $5, and you will see that these companies are doing pretty well.

I am not prepared to admit, like the granter's association, that the whole chapter on summary administration should be removed from the Bankruptcy Act, because we must get rid of those unscrupulous and greedy creditors.

Those are the only remarks I wanted to make. I hope that the minister will take them into consideration.

I hope too that he will not be content to listen to the grievances of large companies but will also heed representations of low wage earners, who are fairly often the victims of unscrupulous operators.

I should like now to deal with another matter, this one of current interest which was raised yesterday in Montreal. It is about the right of a defendant to be tried and heard in his own language.

Of course, I should not make a plea in favour of the individual in question, Pierre Biernacki, who is now before the court.

However, it seems to me that the R.C.M.P. did behave in a despicable way towards the accused. They knew that he could speak and understand French better than English. Yet he was charged and examined in English and directed to make confessions in that language.

Justice Lazure, whose efficiency and integrity are well known, admonished the R.C.M.P. yesterday, stating that it is the right of an accused to be tried by his fellowmen in the language of his choice.

I hope the minister will make a few comments on the matter after having seen this morning's papers.

I feel I must add that there are many French speaking R.C.M.P. officers in Montreal, as there are no doubt in the rest of the country.

We should see to it that such a situation does not happen again, even though the accused is a national of another country.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member to what case he is referring?

Mr. Meunier: The case referred to this morning.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, with respect to this case I would say immediately that the case is now before the courts and therefore comment must be restricted. With respect to the matter of interpreters, my recollection is that I have been advised that Mr. Biernacki was asked several times if he wished to have an interpreter or the services of an interpreter and he indicated that he did not desire an interpreter, that he understood fully what he was being asked and did not wish to have the whole thing done through an interpreter. That is my recollection of the situation, but I will have more information on that when we come to the R.C.M.P. estimates if my friend wishes to pursue the subject then.

(Translation):

Mr. Meunier: Even if Mr. Biernacki was provided with an interpreter, I was told that he is more fluent in French than in English, having started learning English only after he came to Canada.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that at least the bills of indictment could have been made out in French and that his admissions could have been taken down in French, since that is the language he talks best. I feel it would have been the natural thing to do.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member for Papineau a question based on his remarks.

He raised the matter of summary administration, suggesting that this procedure too often favoured the activities of loan sharks at the detriment of low wage earners.

Would the hon. member tell us if he is in favour of abolishing assignment and summary administration in so far as it brings us back to assignment of property as contained in the civil code of the province of Quebec?

At the same time, could he tell me whether, in his opinion, judges are not overly given to the practice which consists in letting debtors go free after six months when they have sought protection under the procedure known as summary administration or assignment of property, in cases where trustees take the initiative of preparing such summary administration or such assignment and ask that the debtor be allowed his freedom at the end of six months, where the sums involved are not very large and where creditors dare not oppose the move because the expense would be too high?

Mr. Meunier: The hon. member's question is quite long. I take it he does not favour deletion of the chapter on summary administration from the Bankruptcy Act.

My remarks had to do with the Bankruptcy Act in general and the chapter on summary administration in particular.

I also said that we should not always listen to grievances put forward by large finance companies, associations and societies, but also take into consideration the poor and the lowly.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of problems to raise with the minister, but before doing so let me say this. I am not a lawyer and have no legal training. I did, however, check with the constitutional lawyer concerning the responsibilities of the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Attorney General of Canada to give legal advice to all departments of government in relation to changes in legislation. The minister's responsibilities include some of the duties which I thought were his, and his role as Attorney General of Canada is not as barren of responsibility as some hon. members may believe. I refer, of course, to the dual role of the minister and the degree of dexterity that is demanded of him in performing two separate functions simultaneously.

I wish to refer to the case of a Riceville farmer, Gerald Rowe, against whom action was taken some time ago under the provisions of the Live Stock Pedigree Act. On a number of occasions the minister has been asked to grant a new trial or to take other action in his capacity as Attorney General of Canada.

I will quote briefly from an editorial published in the Glengarry News. The first portion of the editorial refers to the bill of rights and may not be relevant to this case. The editorial reads in part as follows:

> Equality before the law and the protection of the law were the chief aims of Magna Carta back in 1215 when men who felt oppressed struck for freedom of the individual, no matter his station in society.
> These individual rights must be guarded by each of us, we were thinking last week end after a talk with a Riceville farmer who for six years has been fighting to have what he considers an injustice against his person redressed. Periodically through those years Gerald Rowe, of Riceville, has been in to tell us of his troubles and his efforts to have what he considers a wrongful court conviction corrected.

I think all hon. members of the committee are familiar with the details of this case, which are set out in the editorial. A later paragraph reads:

> He has spent thousands of dollars since seeking evidence that would refute the testimony offered against him at the trial. He has had a lengthy brief prepared by a lawyer and it purports to show evidence against him was not well founded. Mr. Rowe has approached Prime Minister Diefenbaker, Premier Frost, justice Minister Fulton, Ontario chief justice Dana Porter and many other public figures in an endeavour to have his case reopened. All his efforts have proved fertile—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: I am sorry; the word is "futile". I continue:

> Mr. Rowe is convinced that the legal profession in Ontario has closed ranks against him. His lawyer was paid a retainer to appeal the conviction, he declares, and let the time for appeal elapse without taking necessary action. According to Mr. Rowe he has since contacted a number of solicitors who, for reasons unknown, failed to take proper steps in the case. The law society of upper Canada promised him an inquiry, he says; but nothing has come of it.
> This is the feature of the Rowe case we like least. Here is a man who must be convinced he has been treated unjustly by the law, else why would he be still striving six years later to clear his name. And in his efforts—

The Chairman: Order. I do not see how the hon. member can relate the case he is talking about to the estimates of the Department of Justice. As I indicated yesterday, the administration of justice is a matter of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Peters: This is the point; what Your Honour has said is not quite true. The administration of justice does fall within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice, I am advised by constitutional lawyers. On the point of order Your Honour has raised I wish to read a letter written to the minister by my leader's executive assistant under date of November 15, 1960, the relevant portions of which are as follows:

Mr. Rowe's case appears to be unusual since his desire to appeal his case seems to have been subverted by the action or lack of action of his own solicitors. Now, as you have pointed out, your power under section 596 of the Criminal Code is insufficient to allow you to order a new trial in this case.

Could you not, therefore, consider bringing in an amendment to the Criminal Code which would allow you to grant a new trial to Mr. Rowe and to others like him who have been convicted on summary conviction?

The reply of the minister written in his capacity as Attorney General of Canada under date of November 29, 1960, is as follows:

Thank you for your letter of the 15th instant recommending an amendment to section 596 of the Criminal Code to include convictions in proceedings by way of summary conviction as well as by way of indictment.

The last paragraph reads:

While I am not satisfied that Mr. Rowe's case would, in itself, warrant such an amendment you may be assured that your suggestion will receive most serious consideration.

The Chairman: Order. I would permit the hon. member to discuss the proposed amendment, but certainly not to bring in a case that has nothing to do with the proposed amendment. That is the view I take of the situation.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of discussing the case. It is quite a lengthy case, and I had no intention of discussing it. I was only reading this editorial, which does not discuss the case itself but only the legal aspects of it and the fact that this gentleman cannot obtain a retrial. I should like to read the last portion of this editorial in the Glengarry News:

This is the feature of the Rowe case we like least. Here is a man who must be convinced he has been treated unjustly by the law, else why would he be still striving six years later to clear his name. And in his efforts for a new hearing over the years he has come to feel the legal profession has closed ranks to prevent any chance of a retrial. His feeling is that those involved now know they erred in convicting him, but that the legal profession and the courts prefer to cover up, rather than admit a mistake was made.

That is not a healthy belief for even one individual to hold in a society which proclaims the equality of all before the law.

We hold no brief for Mr. Rowe. We know nothing of the complexities of this case, but we have read his brief and we think the attorney general should study it again. Much better that the province incur the expense of a new trial rather than that one citizen be left with the conviction the law and the courts are set against justice being done.

What I am curious about, Mr. Chairman, is why the minister will not make this change which would allow an appeal to be heard. An appeal would be possible if this case had been proceeded with in any court other than a court of summary jurisdiction. I am told that if the case had been tried in any other court there would have been a much greater possibility of this man appealing his case.

The request has been made of the government within the last few weeks that there be a retrial in this case because new evidence can be produced and presented to the court. It seems to me all people should be given the opportunity to proceed through the due process of law in a manner which will obtain justice for them, and it seems to me the fact that a lawyer himself may have made a mistake should not prevent justice being given in any particular case.

Is it not within the power of the minister to allow this to be done? I have been told by those who are conversant with the law that the reason this course is followed is that otherwise litigation would be carried on over a period of years; you would never know when you had settled a case or whether you were ever going to settle it, if it could be reopened at any time. I have been told that there must be limits upon the time for appeal. However, in this particular case the crown was involved, and I should think even a person convicted of murder, or an offence which carried a sentence of life imprisonment should at any time during the course of that sentence be able to appeal for a new trial because new evidence had been produced.

The lawyer who prepared the brief is of the opinion that sufficient new evidence is available to warrant a reopening of the case, but under section 596 of the Criminal Code, which is the section covering this matter, at the present time the minister has not the right to reopen this case. It seems to me that some consideration could be given to changing the law itself, or this section of the Criminal Code, to allow those persons convicted in a court of summary jurisdiction, particularly in a case which affects the crown directly and where the crown is the only party involved, to proceed and either be proven guilty or have the case dismissed.

This case has also been taken to the remission branch. I have considerable correspondence that has taken place over the years where the remission branch has been involved. The farmer has been asked to go to the remission branch where he can appeal for a pardon. This is not satisfactory to the farmer, who does not want to be pardoned for something he feels he has not done. All he wants is what he considers to be justice. Farmers, like myself, not understanding the finer points of law, see no reason why they should not have the opportunity to prove their innocence. It should be noted in this case—as in many others, I presume—that the farmer knew he was not guilty and did not believe he had to prove that he was not guilty. He thought someone had to prove that he was guilty. It seems to me that he is now willing to prove he was not guilty because he found that he would be convicted if he was not willing to prove that in the first place.

I think the minister could give some consideration to at least clemency in those cases which he reviews himself and decides have some merit. I know the minister is not too sympathetic in this case. I know he had the R.C.M.P. throw this farmer out when he came to ask him to intervene in his case.

Mr. Fulton: That is a falsehood.

Mr. Peters: He had the gentleman taken to police headquarters and questioned for a considerable length of time. I know the minister may not be sympathetic. These people who visit members of parliament or ministers can become nuisances, there is no question about that; but I think we should be able to agree—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, do I understand the hon. member to be alleging that I had somebody thrown out who came to see me? Is that the allegation the hon. member has made?

An hon. Member: That is what he said.

Mr. Fulton: If it is, sir, I give him the lie, complete and absolute.

Mr. McCleave: Shameful.

Mr. Peters: The minister says he did not and I have been told that he did—

Mr. McCleave: Withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): You made that allegation.

Mr. Peters: I am only saying what I was told.

Mr. McCleave: Withdraw.

Mr. Peters: I have no intention of withdrawing something I was told.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Then don't say it.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member took the proper stand in the first instance, because he was asked to accept something that is within the personal knowledge of the minister. I think the hon. member should not change his mind because of some interjections.

Mr. Peters: I did not change my mind, Mr. Chairman. I have said this is what I was told, and that is a fact. The minister says it is not true. I accept his word for it, and therefore it is not true. But I still have been told it is, and I do not think I have to withdraw that.

There is another matter I should like to raise. It is something the same as the previous matter. I think it comes within the jurisdiction of the minister in that he administers the legal aspects of the act, chapter 15 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1952. This matter relates to negotiable instruments. In this case I ask the minister whether he will give consideration to changing the right of people to transfer negotiable instruments from one company to another, and the difficulties that arise from this practice.

I have a case in mind which happened in my own riding. A woman had bought one of these knitting machines. The machine was unsatisfactory; it was not as represented. Accordingly she sent the knitting machine back, but shortly afterwards she received a letter from a collection agency. It is headed "Without Prejudice" and reads as follows:

Re: Sentinel Credits—$330.00.

We enclose for your perusal a mimeographed copy of an article published in the Toronto Daily Star, February 2, 1961. Your position seems to be exactly the same as the defendant's in that case.

We have been assigned your promissory note. What you did with the merchandise after signing this promissory note is of no consequence to us.

We will accept weekly payments on the complete balance or a cash settlement on a reduced balance.

If you wish to prevent a costly court action (followed, after judgment, by a garnishee of your wages and/or bailiff action), contact this office immediately with your offer of settlement. We would like to help you save court costs and interest.

This letter is put out by the Sentinel collection agency, described as a division of the Sentinel Credit Corporation Limited, Toronto.

There are many things wrong with this letter. In particular it seems to imply that were the case to come before a court the decision could only be in favour of the collection agency, the defendant having to pay costs and other legal expenses. The letter refers to an article which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star on February 2, 1961, and I should like to put this article on record. It is headed: "Knitting Machines—It Wouldn't Work, Must Pay Anyway."

A couple who claimed they didn't pay for a knitting machine they bought because "it was rusty, the needle was bent and it wouldn't work" has to pay for it anyway.

Judge H. W. Timmins ordered Mr. and Mrs. Dymitro Haluk of Windermere Ave., to pay $380 owing on the knitting machine to the Diamond Discount Corp. Ltd.

The finance company was suing the Haluks for that amount, claiming on February 10, 1957, the defendants had signed a promissory note in favour of the now defunct Trans-World Machine Co., Spadina Ave. for $360. The defendants never paid the note, now held by the finance company, the plaintiffs claimed.

The plaintiff company were asking the court for the $360 principal of the note, plus interest at 1 per cent a month from April 10, 1959.

Mrs. Jeannie Haluk told Judge Timmins she and her husband bought the machine after the Trans-World Machine Co. salesman told them they could knit socks and sweaters on it and the company would buy back the knitted products at 25 cents an ounce. She said when the machine arrived, it wasn't the one they ordered, that it never worked and even a teacher from the company couldn't make it work.

Mrs. Haluk said she and her husband finally returned the machine to the company.

I suggest to the Minister of Justice that we should take some action in Canada to protect people who buy merchandise and then find that the promissory note they signed has been transferred as a negotiable instrument to a second party which has no obligation to cover the warranty or extend any of the protection which would have been given, or should be given, if the note had remained in the hands of the first party. In other words, the sale of this note eliminated the rights of the buyer. I think some consideration should be given to changing the provisions which govern instruments of this type.

Mr. Baldwin: It may be late to raise a point of order, Mr. Chairman, but we have been listening to the hon. member discuss this question for some time, and surely it is essentially provincial in nature. It deals entirely with the rights of a holder of a negotiable instrument or a conditional sale agreement. This whole field is under provincial jurisdiction. It has nothing to do with the functions of this committee and, surely, nothing to do with the estimates of the Minister of Justice. It has no place in a discussion of these estimates.

Mr. Peters: On the point of order, I would think the Minister of Justice does have a responsibility in this field. I suggest it comes within the field covered by the Bills of Exchange Act—

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Fulton: Which comes under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Peters: That is a statement with which I would agree—

Mr. Fulton: It is not relevant to my estimates.

Mr. Peters: If the minister say he has no administrative responsibility I must accept that, and I appreciate his position; but I would think that in his advice to his colleague the Minister of Finance—and giving advice of this kind must be part of his duties as attorney general—he might be able to suggest certain changes in legal terminology which would prevent practices of this kind being employed as a result of anomalies in the Bills of Exchange Act. All I am asking is that in his capacity as attorney general the hon. gentleman should offer advice to the Minister of Finance which would lead to the elimination of this abuse which is widespread and which, in my opinion, is making a mockery of justice as it is received by many people in relation to promissory notes handed over by companies with very little sense of responsibility.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay unduly the passing of the first item of the estimates of the Department of Justice, but before the committee does pass that item, I should like to point out an individual case referred to me by a Toronto correspondent. While it is an individual case, it might concern everyone, since it has to do with an amendment to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that a person prosecuted on an indictable offence may, under section 508 of the Criminal Code, appeal to the presiding judge of the court for what is known as a change of venue. In fact, that section provides that a change of venue can be granted by the presiding judge, if he decides that it is to the best interest of justice. And we realize that the interest of justice means, not only the interest of society, but also the interest of the accused who is entitled to a complete and thorough defence.

As I said a moment ago, section 508 applies to cases of indictable or criminal offences which can be submitted to a jury. But it is entirely different, as far as I know, in the case of a trial before a judge only, either before or after the preliminary hearing, or when proceedings are taken under part 24 of the Criminal Code concerning summary convictions.

Now, the case submitted to me may be summarized as follows: if an accused, say from Montreal, is charged with an offence committed in Vancouver, after which he has returned to Montreal, he must necessarily appear in court in Vancouver. Is it possible, at present, for that accused to apply for a change of venue, that is to say, can he request to stand trial at the place of his domicile? I do not think so. This might be advisable in less serious cases, especially in cases of summary conviction.

At present, it is easy for an accused from Montreal to avoid being at a hearing in Vancouver; in such a case the crown would submit ex parte evidence, in the absence of the accused who would obviously be convicted on some charge and sentenced to pay court fees.

Now, if this accused has an excellent defence and is unable to go to Vancouver because he cannot afford the railway fare between Montreal and Vancouver, how can he submit a defence under the present system? I do not think anything provides for that case in the Criminal Code. I would like to make a few suggestions in this connection.

The officials of the department might perhaps look into this matter of distance, in the administration of the act.

Besides, they might consider the possibility when the crown proceeds according to part 24 of the Criminal Code; that the crown states its case in Vancouver and the record, including the reporter's transcript, could be transmitted in some way to Montreal where the accused could present his defence before a magistrate. Later on, the record could be returned to the place where the charge originated, and the judge who heard the first part of the evidence could then pass judgment.

This procedure might not be too satisfactory in the case of an accused who decides to enter a plea of not guilty. But I believe it would be wise to amend the Criminal Code to provide for the acceptance of a written plea of guilt in cases of summary conviction, as they are commonly called.

I do not know what is the traditional procedure in other provinces. Nor do I know whether in such cases, judges in Quebec city and in Montreal accept written pleas of guilt, but I know that in the rural areas of my province, the judges often accept such pleas.

In order that an individual, who is indicted and brought to court, may be saved considerable expense for the only purpose of personally recording a plea of guilty, a clerk of the court and the judges accept written pleas of guilty, and the presiding magistrate or judge returns his judgment in the absence of the accused, thus saving the cost of an enquiry.

Therefore, I would ask the minister to submit these few remarks to his legal advisers in order to determine the advisability of amending the Criminal Code to that effect, and more particularly part 24 of the Criminal Code.

Before resuming my seat, I wish to say a word or two about a point which was raised yesterday by my hon. friend for Skeena (Mr. Howard) concerning a judgment passed recently in Montreal in relation with the Canadian Bill of Rights and the Income Tax Act. I am referring here to the judgment by Mr. Justice Brassard on February 17, 1961, in the case of Lafleur v. Guay and the Department of National Revenue, in which the judge states that it is contrary to the Canadian Bill of Rights—

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. gentleman does not know, but I think in the interests of the committee's consideration I should point out to him, that this case is now under appeal.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I did not know this case was under appeal. I should like to ask who has appealed; whether it is the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Justice, or the employee of the department.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the case is, of course, between the individual and the Minister of National Revenue, but it is the crown that has appealed.

Mr. Roberge: Would it be in order to ask the minister what the grounds for appeal were?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, in so far as that is a matter of record, I feel I can give that information. However, before being in a position to do so I shall have to get in touch with counsel who prepared the notice of appeal. I know of no reason why these documents, which have been filed with the court and are matters of record, should not be placed before this house. The merits of the grounds given in the notice of appeal would not, of course, be open to discussion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I understand the hon. member for Skeena made reference the day before yesterday to a conference which the minister held with the provincial attorneys general regarding the procedure to be devised for amending our constitution in Canada. I was not here at the time, I have made a hurried examination of Hansard but do not find any reply by the minister in regard to that question. Perhaps the minister could indicate to me by a nod whether it has been dealt with.

Mr. Fulton: I have not replied in respect of that point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has held very important conferences with the provinces regarding this matter and, outside of the answers to one or two questions addressed to him during the course of this session, one asked by myself, there has not been, to my knowledge, any discussion in this house of this matter. Before the minister concludes his statement I think he should give us a report regarding the situation as it is at the present time.

As I understand it, there was a disposition on the part of most of the provinces, if not all, to try and find some modus operandi to provide for unanimous agreement between the provinces and the federal government in the matter of amendments to our constitution, and the placing of the power to amend with the proper legislative authority, or the proper legislative and executive authority, or authorities, here in Canada.

There are, of course, matters which concern the federal government and the provincial governments together in respect of constitutional amendments. There are matters which concern the provincial governments alone, and other matters which concern the federal government alone. We are not concerned with respect to those latter matters, but with those matters that concern both provincial and federal governments. I am sure there is an almost universal desire in our country that Canada should have the power to amend the Canadian constitution without resorting to another legislative body outside Canada. All that stands in the way of this is agreement between the two senior levels of government. It would be appreciated if, some time before this first item is concluded, the minister could give us indication as to what the situation is. As I understand it there was put forward by the spokesman for the province of Quebec, Mr. Gerin-Lajoie, a formula which seemed to be satisfactory to most of the provincial governments and the federal government. It would be interesting to hear from the minister in this connection.

I should also like to bring the minister's attention to another matter regarding the first item of his estimates. What progress has been made by the Minister of Justice particularly in the examination of all existing statutes which are thought by the law officers of the crown to be in any way inconsistent with the provisions of the bill of rights? During the discussion in the house prior to the enactment of the legislation it was argued that the bill of rights did not in any way add to our substantive law; that it was no more than declaratory of the existing law and that, in any event, some of its provisions would be found to be inconsistent with some of the existing statute law of Canada. It was further argued in this context, notwithstanding the contention made, notably by the Prime Minister, that the bill of rights would not supersede any inconsistent measure. It was pointed out by the Canadian Bar Association in the committee on the bill of rights that the bill would be inconsistent with certain legislation, notably the Immigration Act, and that the bill of rights itself would not remove that inconsistency notwithstanding the provision declaring that certain legislation inconsistent with the bill of rights would have the effect of causing those inconsistent enactments to be inoperative.

It is my feeling that this matter is still not clearly settled juridically, and the minister ought to give us some report. What steps have been taken by the administration to remove any anomalies or inconsistencies between the existing statute law and the bill of rights? Certainly nothing has been done by the administration thus far to indicate that it is prepared to bring forward amendments to any existing statutes to bring those statutes into conformity with the bill of rights.

We were told last session, for instance, that the War Measures Act would be amended in a manner to make it consistent with the bill of rights. It was strongly argued by the Minister of Justice last year that the amendments to the War Measures Act should not be made part of the bill of rights; that hon. members could be assured that that was in a sense a separate matter, and that it would be dealt with by the administration separately at the next session of parliament. The next session of parliament referred to at that time is this session, the end of which we are looking forward to and anticipating, but no measure has been brought forward by the government to amend the War Measures Act.

Indeed, there stands in my name now a private bill to amend the War Measures Act, which would make that act consistent with the concepts and provisions of the bill of rights. If the government proposes to allow a measure introduced by a private member to do what it said itself it woul do, of course I have no objection. The important thing is to make sure that the War Measures Act and all other enactments do in fact conform with the spirit, the legal implications and directions of the bill of rights.

The third matter I should like to mention has to do with an announcement made by the minister during the course of the present session. It involves both his own administration and that of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and has to do with the treatment of drug addicts. The minister might indicate whether he proposes to bring down any legislation in that regard. I do not know whether the legislation to which he referred the day before yesterday in regard to barbiturates is to be regarded as more of an omnibus measure than the mere announcement would indicate.

In any event, it would be interesting to know what progress has been made by the government in its discussions with the provinces with regard to the treatment centres contemplated. What does the government propose by way of additional legislation? Does it propose to increase the penalties for illicit drug addiction? Does it propose to take powers that would enable the crown to keep in confinement users of drugs who have violated the Criminal Code or the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, thereby taking advantage of the confinement to give those individuals the opportunity to be rehabilitated in a government institution? Is the institution the government has in mind something along the lines of that in Lexington? This is the only major institution of its kind where those administering the criminal law and those administering the health services in the United States combine in providing for detention and rehabilitation.
