This is a matter of the greatest importance. What progress has been made in this regard? Since the greatest concentration of drug addicts is in the province of British Columbia, has some arrangement been made with that province, or does that province wish to pursue this course all by itself? What is the situation with regard to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec? I mention these three provinces particularly because, second only to British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec represent the areas where the greatest amount of drug addiction is found.

Before this item is passed, perhaps the minister will give us some indication of his reaction to what I have said.

Mr. Roberge: I should like to refer to the last answer given by the minister. Did I understand the minister correctly to say that he would be agreeable to giving the committee the reasons why the crown is supporting the appeal referred to?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the position I took there was that when a notice of appeal has been filed, then it seems to me this is a matter of record in the court and is available to anyone who wishes to examine it, normally, of course, on payment of a fee—there would be no objection as I see it under the sub judice rule to my producing it here for the information of parliament. I would be prepared to do that if I am correct in my assessment of the situation, although, of course, I could not do it today because the offices are closed. I would be glad to do it just as soon as possible, subject only to one final check to make sure that I am right in my appreciation of the law that there is no objection to producing the formal notice of appeal.

Mr. Roberge: Is the minister going to table the document?

Mr. Fulton: I will table it if that is the desire, but I cannot table it today.

Mr. Howard: Before the item carries, will the minister give a sort of progress report, as it were, on the events with respect to the so-called Eccles divorce case which was referred to him by the chairman of the private bills committee last year and, as I understand it, subsequently referred back to the Attorney General of Ontario?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I will deal with the remarks of all those who have spoken this morning. The hon. member for Papineau brought to my attention some views with respect to the Bankruptcy Act. Those views have been noted accordingly. As the committee knows, we are in the course of a study of the Bankruptcy Act, and I am grateful to the hon. member for the expression of his opinion, which we will note carefully and consider in the course of that study.

The remarks of the hon. member for Timiskaming will be given the consideration they deserve.

The hon. member for Megantic brought to my attention his views with respect to section 508 of the Criminal Code as to the desirability of making some provision for those situations where it is not possible, or at best extremely difficult and expensive, for an accused to get to the place where the trial is set, and also with regard to the question of entering a written plea of guilty. We will consider both these matters. We had not included them in the Criminal Code amendment bill for this year but we will certainly consider them for the future.

The hon. member for Essex East asked me for a progress report with respect to the conference of attorneys general for the purpose of devising a recommendation as to an acceptable method of amending the constitution in Canada. In answer to that inquiry, which was also made by the hon. member for Port Arthur two days ago, I should say that the last meeting of the attorneys general was held here in Ottawa in January of this year—our third meeting. A good deal of progress had been made toward arriving at an agreement among the attorneys general on a formula that we would feel we could recommend to our respective governments for consideration by them and, if approved, for submission by them to their respective legislatures and the parliament of Canada.

May I emphasize again, because I think it is important, that we are not a plenary body. We were instructed by our governments at our suggestion to meet in order to see if we could devise a formula which we would be prepared to recommend to those governments. I say that because there has been some suggestion that we are rushing things, and that the country will suddenly be confronted with a proposal emerging from our conference which will become the law. I know my hon. friend has not made that suggestion, but it has been made in other quarters and I wanted to lay it at rest.

I certainly hope that a proposal will emerge from our conference that will be acceptable to all governments and to the legislatures and parliament. That is our objective; but it is only after, first, the governments have studied our proposal and, second, the legislatures and parliament have approved any proposal we may make, that it would become effective. As I say, up to January a good deal of progress had been made. Unfortunately I cannot say that there was unanimity, but there was a very close approach to unanimity in so far as views could be ascertained at that time on a formula which had been worked out, amended and approved and worked up, as it were, as a result of the meetings and exchanges of views that we had had.

In January the suggestion was made and accepted by the attorneys general that we had now come about as close to agreement as we could usefully come at the conference and that what should happen was that the government of Canada, accepting the responsibility of putting into draft form what appeared to be the concensus emerging from the discussions, should undertake to prepare a further draft on that basis and circulate it to all governments. It was then hoped that without the necessity of a further meeting the governments could consider that draft and indicate their views; and, as I say, it was hoped that the indication would be that it was acceptable. For what reason I am not certain, but this did not prove to be the case.

A draft was prepared accordingly and circulated by me but we heard from only a very few provinces as to their reactions to that proposal. I was in touch with them or with various of them on at least two occasions, I believe, but it appeared that, while none of them expressed any fundamental disagreement with the draft, they had become so engaged with their legislative sessions the matter was not dealt with as we had hoped it would be.

I came to the conclusion recently, therefore, that in order to ensure finality and, I trust, agreement it was desirable to reconvene another session of the conference of attorneys general. We had hoped to be able to conclude our work by correspondence, but in my view it has become evident that this will not be possible and that a little further impetus must be given. Therefore, within the last two weeks I have written again to each attorney general reminding him of the situation and saying that, since in my view it would be unfortunate if the impetus that had been gained and the results that were, we felt, so imminent of realization should be lost by lack of follow through, I was therefore suggesting that we meet again in the month of June or, if that were found not to be convenient, in the month of September, and I asked them to indicate their views as to a suitable date. Whenever we meet I hope we shall be able to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion to report back to our governments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister feel that he can indicate which provinces did not concur in the general formula, or does he feel that he should not do so?

Mr. Fulton: I feel that I should not at the moment. As I say, I have not had definite replies from any of them. Indeed, I had answers from only one or two provinces. One in particular, which will be as well known to my hon. friend as it is to me, made public its attitude toward the proposal being discussed. There is no secret about it; it was the province of Saskatchewan. They have not rejected it, but apart from their views the views of the others were very close to complete agreement. I might say that a number of provinces made proposals and put forward drafts, and we also put forward drafts from time to time. Then we had the draftsmen work up what appeared to be the nearest concensus of the views expressed at which we could arrive.

The hon. member raised a question as to the extent to which my department has proceeded to study all the statutes of Canada with a view to bringing them into conformity with the bill of rights. I have to remind the hon. member that at the time of the discussion of the bill of rights last year I made it clear it was not our intention to embark on any such study. I outlined at that time the difficulties, physical and otherwise, that such a study would raise. I said we did not consider it appropriate to embark on that sort of study, but that what we proposed was that we would be on the alert for anything that might bring to our attention a case of conflict, particularly, of course, anything emerging from a judgment of the courts. If any court judgment were to say "We consider this to be in conflict with the bill of rights", that of course would have our immediate attention in so far as the matter was one within federal jurisdiction. I also said that as various acts come up for revision from time to time or for scrutiny in any way, we would certainly look at them from the particular point of view of the bill of rights, but that we did not intend to undertake a general survey of all the statute law of Canada from that point of view.

I must disagree with my hon. friend when he says that nothing has been done to bring existing statutes into conformity with the bill of rights. I would remind him of a discussion we had in this chamber not long ago in connection with the Fisheries Act, when my colleague the Minister of Fisheries presented a revision of that act. We were careful to point out, as I think was our duty, that certain of its provisions had been opened for the express purpose of revising them in order to bring them into line with the bill of rights. Those were the provisions relating to seizure and confiscation.

In legislation very shortly to be introduced in the house my hon. friend will see a case of another act certain provisions of which, now that it is up for revision, have been revised to bring them into conformity with the bill of rights.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the minister leaves the subject of the bill of rights, may I be permitted to ask another question. My recollection is that the Prime Minister said, I think at this session, there would be amendments brought in to the War Measures Act. The government has not given any indication of its intention in that regard. I have pointed out that I have prepared amendments that are incorporated in a private bill that has not yet reached this house but notice of which exists. Is it the government's intention to proceed with amendments to the War Measures Act during this session?

Mr. Fulton: My department has been working on amendments to the War Measures Act. We are not at the moment in a position to recommend legislation. I therefore regret that I am unable to assure the hon. member that an amending measure will be proceeded with at this session.

It is also my recollection that the Prime Minister indicated that some action would be taken, but I am not quite sure whether the intended action referred to was legislation or a committee study. However, whichever it was, my recollection is that reference was made to action being taken at this session.

At the moment, so far as my responsibility goes, I am not in a position to state definitely that we will be in a position to take action at this session. If we should find ourselves in that position, and if there should be an immediate demand for action, we would then do our best to proceed; but I must say that in view of the stage the session has reached, and the state of the order paper, I think probably we all might wish to have another look at that situation.

The final question the hon. member raised concerned the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. The hon. member asked me what was the position with regard to new legislation in that field. I am very glad to be able to advise my hon. friend that if he will refer to my policy statement made on January 24 in this house on behalf of myself and my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, he will see there a fairly complete outline of the policy which we have developed with respect to these matters, particularly with respect to those aspects which come under my responsibility, namely the custody and treatment of addicts. If my hon. friend will look at Votes and Proceedings of yesterday he will see there notice of a motion in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare in these words:

> —On Monday next—Bill intituled: "An act to provide for the control of narcotic drugs".

That legislation will be introduced, if the house gives leave, on Monday. The bill is printed and will be available for distribution at first reading.

I am pleased to be able to say that we have developed what we believe to be a sound and forward looking policy—and I am glad to be able to have some part in this—after so many years during which the Canadian people have been hoping for a forward step in connection with the treatment of drug addicts. We believe we have developed a sound policy. I do not wish to be too optimistic, because it is an extremely difficult field, but I can assure the committee that the legislation, when introduced, will, I believe, come up to the expectations of the Canadian people and their desire to see, after all these years, a real effort made to come to grips with the drug problem.

The hon. member for Skeena asked me what is the situation with regard to the Eccles divorce case. I find that in reporting to the committee two days ago as to how I am dealing with allegations of irregularities in those divorce cases that are referred to me, I omitted one stage in the process that we have worked out. I believe I said that when these cases are referred to me I make certain inquiries including, for instance, an inquiry from the chairman of the Senate divorce committee, and gather all the material that seems to be relevant, and then transmit it to the appropriate provincial attorney general. I omitted to state that one of the stages in this process is to refer the material to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for investigation so that the facts can be established. Then, when that is completed, all the documents including the R.C.M.P. report, are referred to the appropriate attorney general. The Eccles case is now under investigation but I have not made a report to the provincial attorney general, although we have had some preliminary correspondence with Toronto about this case.

In addition to the Eccles case there are three others which were referred to me and which are undergoing the same process, the Isenberg, Leduc and Godard cases. One other, the Radakovitz case, has been directed to my attention and I have referred it to Senator Roebuck for such information as he may be able to let me have from the records of the Senate committee. This case has not yet been referred to the police for investigation, but the other four have been referred.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether this action arises from the activities of the R.C.M.P. or from those of the attorney general himself, but it has been brought to my attention that the activities of the R.C.M.P. in the Eccles case have placed one of the parties to the case in an unfortunate position. I am informed that Mr. Eccles attempted to obtain a transcript of the evidence heard before the miscellaneous private bills committee last year when the case was reheard by that committee, but has been refused it because it is considered a private document. In his words that is what happened. If any two people should be entitled to obtain that transcript surely they would be Mr. and Mrs. Eccles. The transcript should be made available to them.

I understand also that recently an R.C.M.P. officer of unknown rank whose name is Webster phoned Mr. Eccles in Toronto and requested an appointment the following day, to which request Mr. Eccles acceded. The following morning at 9:30 two R.C.M.P. officers visited Mr. Eccles and sought to obtain information which Mr. Eccles refused to give on the ground that he was alone and there were two officers present. Perhaps Mr. Eccles is sceptical about the police in this regard. The questions related to times and dates and other information given in evidence in the committee. The police officers indicated that they had read, reviewed and studied the transcript of evidence given before the committee.

Mr. Eccles was placed in an unfair position. Before any additional inquiries are made of any of the parties to or witnesses in the Eccles case, they should be given an opportunity to examine the transcript of evidence to refresh their memories, which may be hazy concerning some of the evidence given before that committee. I wonder whether somehow or other, perhaps through the minister in consultation with the R.C.M.P. or the attorney general, we could ensure that no further inquiries are made by the R.C.M.P. of individuals who have given evidence before the committee unless those individuals have had an opportunity to be in possession of the transcript of evidence.

I wish to point out one other thing here. On the morning the two R.C.M.P. officers went to see Mr. Eccles—when there were two of them and one of him, as it were—he was rather busy and asked if they could come back, which they did. In the meantime I understand Mr. Eccles got in touch with two other gentlemen—as witnesses, if anything, I suppose—who were reporters for the Toronto Star. When the two R.C.M.P. officers returned they found these two gentlemen there and refused to go any further into the inquiry or questioning they had originally intended to make.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think the reason for that is quite obvious, and the course taken was very proper. It is not the habit of R.C.M.P. officers to interview witnesses in the presence of newspaper reporters, especially when an inquiry of this nature is under way. I think we would be open to very severe criticism if we conducted any such inquiry in the presence of newspaper reporters. As far as I know there is no objection to Mr. Eccles or anybody else having somebody else there, but hardly a newspaper reporter, let alone two of them.

In connection with the availability of the transcript, I can only say that this is not something under my control or that of my department. As I understand my hon. friend, this document would be part of the record of the proceedings before the miscellaneous private bills committee and would be under the control of that committee. I am not aware of any reason why anyone should not secure a copy of the transcript. There may be a fee to pay for a transcript; I believe there is a scale of parliamentary fees laid down. However, the question of whether or not it is available is entirely one for the committee to determine; it is certainly not for the minister or the Department of Justice.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister is not saying that newspaper reporters are not in the same class as other people who may be present at discussions or inquiries. Regardless of that, I gather that the R.C.M.P. have obtained a copy of this particular transcript of evidence, and surely the same courtesy should be afforded Mr. Eccles. I understand he has a letter from some official which says he cannot have it because it is a private matter.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure he did not get it from me. I can only suggest again, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member take up that matter with the committee. I have no custody or control over documents that are in the possession of a committee of this house. My hon. friend is a member of that committee—

Mr. Howard: No.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry; I understood him to be a member of the miscellaneous private bills committee.

Mr. Howard: I was at one time.

Mr. Fulton: It is in that committee and with the officials and chairman of that committee that this question should be taken up.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall vote 165 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Howard: No, not yet, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, vote 165 reads as follows:

Departmental administration including annual contribution of $200 to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada and $167,500 as grants to recognized private after-care agencies as may be approved by treasury board.

My first question is this. Would the minister care to give a progress report on the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation? Second, I refer the minister to pages 240 and 241 of the blue book. On page 240 there is the following item:

Grants to recognized private after-care agencies, $167,500.

This pertains to the vote I just read. Then this item is found on page 241:

Grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies, $60,000.

My question is, are these votes the same? Why was it transferred from one to another, and what is the reason for the increase?

Mr. Fulton: In answer to those questions, Mr. Chairman, first the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada meets once a year. It comprises representatives of the attorneys general of the provinces and the Attorney General of Canada. It always meets immediately prior to the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association. Its primary task is to consider all those suggestions that are from time to time brought forward with respect to amendments to the Criminal Code.

The reason for this conference, as will be appreciated, is that the criminal law is enforced through the medium of provincial attorneys general although it is enacted here in parliament. Therefore many years ago it was thought desirable to set up some regular machinery through which representatives of the provincial attorneys general could meet with representatives of the Attorney General of Canada to discuss the implications of various suggested amendments to the Criminal Code that are made from time to time. We make a small grant to that body.

Mr. Roberge: Before the minister continues, Mr. Chairman, could we be informed of the reason for the contribution.

Mr. Fulton: I am informed that every government contributes. I am told that other governments contribute the same amount. The purpose of the contribution is to meet the cost of printing, correspondence and stationery—printing reports and so on—because there is a good deal of work carried on by the secretary of the conference during the year while suggested amendments are accumulating. These all have to be processed and distributed. Then, as I said, the commissioners meet every year during the week prior to the Canadian Bar Association meeting and go through the material that has been prepared for their consideration.

The answer to the question with regard to grants to the recognized private after-care agencies is this. Until this year the grants were made from two sources, one the Department of Justice itself and the other the penitentiaries branch. When the parole board came into being two years ago, that portion of the grant which had formerly been administered by the department was put under the parole board item. That is why last year there was an item, as is shown here, of $60,000.

This year, however, we decided there was not much point in having two different items for grants to the same agencies, so we decided to consolidate them into one sum. We have placed it under the item for departmental administration. Last year the total provided was $150,000, of which $60,000 was paid by the parole board and $90,000 by the penitentiaries branch. This year there is an increase of $17,500 in the over-all amount, making a total of $167,500.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the Eccles case because it is the only case we have had of that nature which we have been able to follow. As reported on page 581 of Hansard for December 7, 1960, the hon. member for Skeena asked a question about the position of the Eccles case at that time. In answering that question the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice had this to say:

> I am informed that the law officers of the crown, after a careful review of this case and all the facts as presented by the committee, have referred it to the department of the attorney general of Ontario for consideration as to possible action under the Criminal Code, particularly referring to perjury.
> It has been referred to the provincial authorities because it is a matter concerning the administration of justice within a province.

My question is, how did the R.C.M.P. get back into this case? I realize that the minister, replying to another question addressed to him by myself on March 2, 1961, as reported at page 2575 of Hansard, said:

> As the hon. member has pointed out, this matter was referred by us to the attorney general of Ontario, and since the initial reference certain further investigations into some aspects of the case are being conducted. The results of those investigations will in turn be brought to the attention of the department of the attorney general of Ontario. As my parliamentary secretary indicated to the house on December 7, 1960, this matter relates to the administration of justice in the province.

How did the R.C.M.P. get back into this case if the investigation was being conducted by the province of Ontario? I am told by Mr. Eccles that nobody has been to see him about this matter, apart from this investigation which took place very recently when, first of all, an R.C.M.P. plainclothes man identified himself as such and then wanted to discuss the case. Then followed the incident which the hon. member for Skeena has outlined. This would appear to indicate that either the minister has reopened the case himself, going further than he indicated on March 2, or that the R.C.M.P. are acting on behalf of the Ontario attorney general.

Mr. Fulton: As I explained a few moments ago in answer to the last inquiry from the hon. member for Skeena, there is a stage at which the R.C.M.P. conducts an investigation into the facts as alleged and as they appear from the documents. The R.C.M.P. report on their investigation is referred to the appropriate attorney general. I told the committee a few moments ago this was the procedure we had worked out. The Eccles case was the first of these which came to us, so we thought we had better work out a suitable procedure. Early this year we wrote to the attorney general of Ontario advising him we had received these complaints. Then, in accord with the answer I have already given, there were preliminary discussions with the attorney general of Ontario. Later my deputy went to Toronto to interview the officials of the attorney general's department there in order to work out a completely satisfactory procedure.

It was pointed out by the attorney general of Ontario or by officials of his department that it was felt they should have the responsibility for any prosecutions for perjury or other ordinary offences under the Criminal Code which might take place in Ontario. However, in this case, and it might well be in other cases, the offences were alleged to have taken place in more than one province. In that particular case some of the offences and irregularities alleged were said to have taken place in Quebec. So the attorney general of Ontario suggested that since the records were initially all avaliable here, and since in many of these cases there was activity going on in more than one province, it might be appropriate for the R.C.M.P. to conduct the investigation into whatever it was alleged had been improper and then, when we had concluded that investigation, to convey the files, the police report and all the other documents to the Attorney General of Ontario who would look at them from the point of view of whether prosecution is called for. This was the arrangement worked out, and it is the arrangement being followed in this case.

Item agreed to.

166. Parole Act administration, $654,790.

Mr. Roberge: May I ask the minister how many cases were reviewed last year under the Parole Act administration, how many reprieves were granted and how many conditional releases were given?

Mr. Fulton: The total number of releases last year was 2,459.

Item agreed to.

167. Supreme Court of Canada—administration, $242,715.

Mr. Howard: This item deals with the administration of the Exchequer Court of Canada. This high speed automation in the calling of the items is a bit too quick for me, because in the last couple of days we have been used to proceeding in a somewhat leisurely manner. I should like to make a few comments, if that is in order, about the Exchequer Court of Canada and its jurisdiction. I know there is on the order paper a notice of motion, or a resolution preceding a money bill, in the name of the Minister of Justice to appoint, I think, one additional puisne judge, if that is the proper expression, to the exchequer court; and without attempting to discuss the appointment of this additional judge and the use which might be made of his services I think it might be in order to deal with the present jurisdiction of the court and some of the subject matters which that jurisdiction covers.

This subject has been dealt with in parliament on a number of different occasions in the past both by way of bills moved, some of them in the name of the former hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and by way of debate and questions put to the Minister of Justice from time to time relating to the jurisdiction of the exchequer court and whether or not that jurisdiction was broad enough to cover a particular problem which has arisen from time to time. Members of the house have discussed whether or not it would be advantageous to overcome in an immediate way some of the problems confronting this house and the Senate with respect to another matter, namely the granting of divorces; and it is with regard to this field that I should like to make a few comments.

I wonder if I may call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall vote 167 carry?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before the luncheon recess I made a few preliminary remarks in respect of the Exchequer Court of Canada and its jurisdiction. I was suggesting that perhaps the jurisdiction of that court be extended to embrace the matter of divorce proceedings from the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member speaking in respect of the exchequer court, or the supreme court, because we are now on item 167 which has to do with the administration of the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I understood this item covered the administration of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

The Chairman: Item 167 has regard to the Supreme Court of Canada. The administration of the exchequer court is covered under item 168.

Mr. Howard: That is not shown in the book of estimates which I possess. It appears here that item 167 covers the administration of the Exchequer Court of Canada, and shows the details at page 241. If this item, which we are presently considering, covers the administration of the Supreme Court of Canada, perhaps I should defer my remarks until we reach the next item.

The Chairman: Perhaps there is some error here.

Mr. Macdonnell: No, there is no error.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I have misread or misinterpreted that which the item covers. If so, perhaps I may be allowed to make my remarks in reference to the Exchequer Court of Canada during the discussion of item 168.

The Chairman: Shall item 167 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item agreed to.

168. Exchequer Court of Canada—Administration, $151,110.

Mr. Howard: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for straightening me out in regard to this item. I assume that the remarks I made before the luncheon recess, during our consideration of vote 167, will apply here, and that it will be unnecessary for me to repeat them.

At the present time there are courts with jurisdiction to handle divorce cases in each province of Canada with the exception of Quebec and Newfoundland. As is well known, divorces from these provinces are brought to the House of Commons, handled by a committee of the other place, and then finally granted by an act of this parliament. The handling of divorces from those two provinces in this way was the subject of considerable discussion in this house last session. Undoubtedly the same sort of discussion will take place this session if the divorce bills presently before parliament are proceeded with. In any event, I feel sure that each member of this house, as well as each member of that other place and, of course, a considerable portion of the general public of Canada, feels that the present system in this regard is a cumbersome and inefficient one, and that parliament should not be the arena or court dealing with these particular matters.

I realize, of course, there is some objection in the province of Quebec to the setting up of courts with jurisdiction to handle divorce cases from that province. I am not aware that a similarly strong objection is taken to this procedure in the province of Newfoundland, perhaps because there are relatively few divorce cases arising in that province.

There have been alternative methods of proceeding with divorce cases from those two provinces suggested from time to time. Without going into detail in respect of those alternatives, I wish to deal with the jurisdiction of the exchequer court in this regard.

The suggestion that the exchequer court deal with divorce cases from those provinces is perhaps not completely acceptable as an alternative providing a complete solution to the problem. However, should the jurisdiction of the exchequer court be enlarged to cover divorce cases from Quebec and Newfoundland, I suggest they would be more expeditiously dealt with than they presently are, under the petition and private bill system, and perhaps at a lower cost. I also suggest that under this alternative system there should be a more careful consideration and review of the evidence presented in support of the individual divorce cases than is received under the present system.

While this alternative method is perhaps not completely acceptable, I feel the government should take cognizance of that suggestion, with a view to making a decision in respect of amending the Exchequer Court Act, increasing that court's jurisdiction to cover petitions for divorce originating in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. Even though this sort of approach would perhaps deal only with divorces on the grounds which exist at the present time, it would not be wise to extend the grounds as well as the jurisdiction at this time. This is a finality we must look toward. I do not think that further legislative action should be taken unilaterally by the federal government but only after consultation with the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland because certainly they have an interest in this particular matter. It may well be that after consultation with these two provinces it might be decided that this sort of action would be an acceptable alternative to that which exists at the moment. Perhaps it might be found desirable to have the cases heard by the exchequer court in the city of Ottawa if another course is found to be objectionable by the province of Quebec itself.

I say that the granting of such jurisdiction to the exchequer court would bring about a more expeditious dispatch of the cases because when one proceeds by way of a petition to parliament one must comply with the rules of the Senate in so far as petitions are concerned. There is a time limit within which those petitions may be presented. It is only during the early days after the opening of the session that such petitions can be accepted. It is only by consent that petitions which are presented later are accepted by the Senate and by the house. The system used at present prohibits an individual from proceeding with a divorce action when parliament is not in session. During recesses of parliament and in the time between the dissolution and the calling of a new parliament the present system prohibits people in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland from taking action for divorce. Then, the time limit established by the rules of this house and by the Senate with respect to the presentation of petitions confines this period to a relatively few days during the year.

For argument's sake, if one of the parties to a marriage discovered that his or her spouse had committed adultery in any province other than Quebec or Newfoundland action would be instituted in the courts almost immediately and, depending on the business before the court, the case could be heard within a relatively short period of time, and the court would come to a decision. If the same set of circumstances were to occur in Quebec or Newfoundland it would mean that the aggrieved party would have to wait until the opening of the next session of parliament, whenever that might be, before a petition could be presented and the machinery set in motion to deal with the particular case.

At the moment, under the present system of petitioning parliament for divorce—and this has been authenticated by lawyers who have been active in these particular cases and by petitioners and respondents as well—the costs amount to a minimum of some $1,500. This is for the open and shut case, without any extensive work being performed by private detectives and without any contestation on the part of the respondent, or the corespondent, that adultery did not take place. If there is protestation, if a case requires extensive, or any degree of investigation on the part of a private detective or detectives, the fees and costs range upwards from $1,500. I have heard figures cited ranging from $10,000 to $15,000 as the total cost to the petitioner in obtaining evidence, providing witnesses, paying private bill fees, lawyers' fees and the like, in order to get the case before parliament.

I have heard figures cited by lawyers in other provinces with respect to an open and shut case, as they are referred to in provincial courts, and they run somewhere in the neighbourhood of $400 to $500. If we compare $400 to $500 with a minimum of $1,500 as the cost for parliamentary divorces we shall see that our present system is imposing a pretty heavy burden upon residents in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland when it comes to divorce actions. The saying has been bruited about to some extent that this system allows divorces for the rich and just misery and continued misery for the poor.

If the exchequer court were given this jurisdiction it would not be the complete answer to what exists at the moment because I doubt very much whether we could give to the exchequer court any jurisdiction in the field of alimony payments or any jurisdiction over the custody or welfare of children, since this is a matter which comes within provincial jurisdiction. Nevertheless, if we were to give this sort of jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court of Canada to deal with divorce actions arising in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland on the grounds that exist at the present time in the other provinces except Nova Scotia, where cruelty is also a ground for divorce, I think we would alleviate a great deal of the suffering, misery, and financial burdens which rest upon the shoulders of people in Quebec and Newfoundland who feel aggrieved and wish to take action for divorce. It would help somewhat in this regard and it would certainly remove from parliament what I consider to be a debasing task, namely the handling of divorce actions arising in those two provinces.

On a previous occasion the minister made some comments as to what might be done in this regard and I should certainly like to have his comments as to what studies have been made by his department and by the government with respect to this particular situation which has been advanced before in this parliament and in previous parliaments by members who are not here now. I know it is something that previous governments have considered. I think it would be well if the minister could indicate to the committee what progress is being made, if any, and what steps are being taken, if any, to deal with the divorce problem and specifically to deal with the suggestion which I have just made and which has been advanced in another form on other occasions by my friend from Timiskaming.

Mr. Peters: I should also like the Minister of Justice to reply and tell us whether changes are contemplated. We have an indication from the resolution which has been presented that changes are contemplated in the Exchequer Court Act. Does this mean that there will be additions to that court? We have made the suggestion before, and I certainly do not want to go into it in detail now, that if there were one or two more judges appointed to the exchequer court they would be able to deal with this problem without any change in the set-up of the court. It should also be pointed out that we have suggested in our presentations that the clause in the Exchequer Court Act making provision for judges of that court to travel and hold sittings in various regions should not apply so far as divorce is concerned and that judges dealing with divorce would sit only in Ottawa.

We feel that there is merit in this suggestion. We seem to have run into a blank wall in relation to this very knotty problem and inasmuch as the government agreed to consider the question of divorce it seems to me they must have taken a look at this suggestion. I would ask the minister whether he has given consideration to this suggestion as a solution of a problem that we all want settled one way or another. I should like to know whether the resolution on the order paper making provision for an additional judge of the exchequer court has any relation to the matter of divorce.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, as the committee will appreciate, I am sure, from time to time consideration has been given to the matter of the transfer of jurisdiction over divorce to the exchequer court or other methods of dealing with the problem of granting divorces to those applicants who may apply from the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. I replied to a question on the matter some four years ago and in the course of my reply I said I would look into the matter and discuss it. I am not able to hold out much encouragement to the hon. member who has asked this question. I think the hon. member for Skeena has put his finger on the very difficulty.

Quite apart from the consideration of whether there is a constitutional or jurisdictional obstacle in the way of transferring jurisdiction to the exchequer court, such a course would involve the enactment of a divorce law, and the parliament of Canada would then be in the position of having to enact a divorce law for a province. My hon. friend can readily appreciate just what sort of problems that would create.

I do not think I really need to go much further. That sums up the whole of the problem. So far as the particular proposal is concerned, that is, the transferring of jurisdiction to the exchequer court, there are methods by which parliament itself may alter its own routine in the handling of these petitions for private bills dissolving marriage, but that is a matter for parliament to determine. Some hon. members have given study to this matter and, as is known, a private member introduced a bill in this chamber. The disposition of that bill is within the knowledge of the hon. member. It seems to me this does establish that parliament itself has the power to make what alterations it wishes in the method by which it deals with this matter, but there would have to be agreement, of course, upon the course to be followed.

Mr. Peters: Has the minister considered the simple expedient of changing the one clause with respect to domicile and making provision in matters of divorce for Canadian domicile only rather than provincial domicile as at present? If provision were made for Canadian domicile in matters of divorce, would that not eliminate the problem that the minister has raised? The dominion of Canada divorce act of 1930 would then apply if that one change were made with respect to domicile. The only problem that would then face the government would be to make the necessary minor changes to provide for the addition of one or two judges to the exchequer court to deal with this specific matter solely. These judges would not travel but would sit here in the city of Ottawa to hear divorce petitions.

Mr. Fulton: With respect, I do not think that the matter is quite as straightforward as has been suggested in the remarks just made. My understanding is that the act of 1930 is not a substantive law of divorce. It deals primarily with the right of a wife to petition notwithstanding that her husband is not domiciled in one of the provinces of Canada. It seems to me that the implication of what is being suggested, however it was carried out, is that we would then have in the exchequer court an alternative court of divorce for all of Canada. There is no substantive law of divorce enacted by way of a federal statute. The law on this matter is the law that happens to be applicable in the various provinces by virtue of the sources, mainly in the United Kingdom, that were applicable at the time when the province entered confederation. So you actually have different laws of divorce applicable to the different provinces of Canada and, as I understand the legal situation, there is no single federal substantive divorce law in effect.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Peters: It is true that in the case of provinces like Nova Scotia, British Columbia, I believe, and one or two others, there was a law respecting divorce in their constitution at the time of confederation. Is it not true, however, that the Dominion of Canada did pass a law and that law is the only one that can be made applicable by any province that did not have such a provision at the time of confederation? The 1930 act is in effect the only law that can be made applicable in such a province. All we are suggesting is that the exchequer court is an alternative for those provinces that do not wish to do this.

I am suggesting that the only change that would be necessary would be to alter the requirement respecting domicile that is now in the act. As the situation is now, the domicile is that of the husband unless the wife has been deserted by the husband for a certain period of time. In that case the domicile of the wife applies. It seems to me that the act of 1930 applies to those provinces that have entered confederation since 1867. If, for example, the Northwest Territories becomes a province, the only act that can apply is the dominion act as it exists now and which is now being applied to that territory. We suggest that if provision were made for Canadian domicile in matters of divorce only it would be possible to bring a divorce action in many provinces and in those in which it was not possible such actions could be brought before the federal court. I would think that legally the government already has this right if they wish to apply it. I do not want to belabour the point but it seems to me that this is a very easy way of solving the problem.

I should like to refer in passing to what the minister said about the private member's bill that we passed. I believe this action was taken by all members of the house in their desire to find a solution to the problem but the other place has not seen fit to endorse the action. The minister will recall that the bill only applies to this year in any event. I think it has been the desire of the house that this problem be solved and that this solution should not be considered to be permanent, but only temporary in order to eliminate what many of us think is a moral problem. I refer to ruling upon situations about which we are not aware and about which we are not in a position to do anything. I am not a lawyer and I do not know all the legal implications, but from a study of this matter I would think it warrants new and immediate consideration because this suggestion would seem to me to be a solution of the problem.

I should like to add this. The provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland are in the position where they do not want to or are not able, for various reasons, to establish courts of their own in this field. It seems to me that the objection which citizens of those provinces have should be removed and they should have the opportunity of bringing their cases to a federal court, if that is the only way open to them.

I think this objection will be met as long as we do not ask the province of Quebec, for example, to have exchequer court judges hearing these cases in that province. I think this would be the least offensive method of handling what is considered to be, and probably rightly so, a major social problem in that province. I do not want to belabour this question, but I think the minister would be well advised to give consideration to this matter because I see less objection to this method than to any other which I have examined, and I have examined seven or eight methods that could be used to solve this problem.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member may well have a point there and we will be glad to give further consideration to it. However, I think I am right in saying that if there is to be jurisdiction established in the exchequer court, to make it effective we would have to enact a substantive law of divorce applicable to the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. It might be done with reference to the old English matrimonial causes act, which happens to be in force in British Columbia, but it would have to be an act of this parliament which brought into force a substantive law of divorce for those provinces.

I need only refer to that fact for my hon. friends to see the extent to which it bristles with problems. I am sure we are all interested in finding some solution that will be satisfactory to all concerned and we will be glad to give further consideration to the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I had initially understood the minister's remarks to be a delightful way of saying no, but I see he has revised that somewhat and the suggestion is now going to be considered. I do not know whether the minister has the same sort of file as his colleague, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources—I think his colleague calls it an active consideration file —but I think this is something that should be put into that file for consideration.

I should like to deal with the minister's point that parliament, by following this course, would be enacting a substantive law of divorce for two provinces. If we followed the course advanced, that of giving jurisdiction to the exchequer court for these two provinces, I think this is what we would be doing. But this course is not unprecedented in Canada.

The four western provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan have some pre-confederation, United Kingdom law that is applicable. This has something to do with the original jurisdiction of those courts. As anyone who has read about this will recall, at one time in the 1920's and before, people resident in Ontario used to petition parliament for divorce in the same manner as do residents of Quebec and Newfoundland. In the 1920's—1927, 1928 or in that general period—the founder of the C.C.F., the late J. S. Woodsworth, raised this question of divorce in parliament on grounds somewhat similar to those advanced last session by the hon. member for Timiskaming, myself and other hon. members.

As a result of that the parliament of Canada —I think this was some time in the late 1920's —enacted a substantive law for the province of Ontario. That substantive law was the law of the United Kingdom as of a particular date. I forget the date; I think it was somewhere around 1857, but I am not certain about that. In any event, the parliament of Canada took action some 30 years ago to enact a substantive law of divorce for one of the provinces of Canada, namely Ontario.

There were difficulties to overcome at that time in connection with the relationship of the province of Ontario to the federal government. I do not know how the government of Canada and the government of Ontario reached agreement on this question or whether they even discussed the possibility of reaching agreement, but certainly it is not beyond the realm of possibility that parliament, having enacted a substantive law of divorce for a province in the past, can do so again. I do not think this raises any insurmountable problem with regard to taking a similar course of action in connection with two other provinces of Canada.

I think it does require, in addition to study or consideration by the minister and the government, perhaps direct consultation in a private way, if that is desirable, with the attorneys general or the governments of the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland to see whether or not some mutually agreeable arrangement could be worked out that would be acceptable to the residents and the governments of those provinces and the government of Canada. I suggest this course be followed by the minister.

I presume that the minister is in contact with the Attorney General of the province of Quebec about other matters concerned with divorce, namely allegations of perjury, collusion, condonation or the like. Surely it would not be beyond the bounds of reason to ask that some preliminary, if only preliminary, discussions take place—if they have not taken place already—with the governments of these two provinces to see whether or not some mutual agreement can be reached on this matter.

I think that parliament, having enacted a substantive law of divorce for the province of Ontario some 30 years ago could do so again. No great difficulties have arisen since that time, and no constitutional problem arose then. Apparently it was perfectly constitutional for the parliament of Canada to do this in the 1920's, and it would appear to be perfectly constitutional to do it in 1961, 1962 or some time in the 1960's with respect to the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, one thing that has always struck me as I read the estimates of the Department of Justice from year to year has been the salary provided for the registrars of the two most important courts in this country, namely the exchequer court and the Supreme Court of Canada. I note that the salary of the registrar in this item is $9,000 which is less than that which is paid to a junior counsel in the justice department. The justice department have a number of counsel who are paid from $17,500 or more, downwards. Here is a man who has a rank I think of a deputy minister and who is handling very important duties in one of our highest courts in the land, who is taxing bills running into tens of thousands of dollars, travelling between or from Victoria to St. John's, Newfoundland handling both admiralty cases and other cases coming under federal jurisdiction. Whatever has happened—and this is not the fault of this administration only—in the justice department over so many years cannot be understood, namely why the registrars of the Supreme Court of Canada should be paid only $11,500 when the counsel of the justice department are paid up to $17,500 or $20,000, and why the registrar of the exchequer court should receive less than the amount received by the registrar of the supreme court in local jurisdictions in the province of Ontario.

I should like to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice on this matter. I would rather be assured by him that something is going to be done. As a matter of fact if he will look back at the salary provided for this year in the previous item for the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada he will find that it is shown at $11,500 and that of the deputy registrar at only $10,500. As far as the registrar of the Exchequer Court of Canada is concerned, his salary is $9,000, but the range of deputy registrar runs up to $9,800. I feel that the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada should receive the salary of a junior deputy minister in the government and certainly the same comment applies with respect to the registrar of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: I am not too happy about the salary levels in the courts, I must say. However, my hon. friend knows that it is not always the easiest thing in the world to get salaries revised. There has been some change in the position to which he last referred. I am trying to see if I can get the details in this regard from my officials. There has been a change, I believe, since the book was printed. The information I have now as to the registrar of the Exchequer Court of Canada is that his salary is authorized at $11,000. It is true that the deputy registrar's salary still ranges between $8,120 and $9,800. For the Supreme Court of Canada the registrar's salary is $13,000. Therefore, it will be seen that there have been increases of $2,000 in each case.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): While that is something a little bit better I think the minister will agree with me that owing to the fact—

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry to interrupt in order to correct myself. In the case of the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada the increase was $1,500, from $11,500 to $13,000.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): The minister realizes that this is his department and that this matter is not subject to the civil service commission. As a man of law and one who has had contact with the courts, I think he realizes that having regard to the duties of these two officials, these increases are hardly in keeping with the dignity of the office which these men occupy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This item includes not only exchequer court judges salaries and, I take it, also their travelling expenses or travelling allowances, but also includes the salaries of district judges in admiralty and their travelling allowances. Can the minister give us an indication, just to show the extent of the work of these two judicial divisions, what the travelling allowances of the district judges in admiralty are and what has been the travelling allowances of the judges of the exchequer court?

Mr. Fulton: The salaries of the district judges in admiralty are as follows: Four at $1,000; one at $800; one at $600; three at $333.33. With regard to their travelling allowances may I say this. The travelling allowance of the president and the puisne judges of the exchequer court are included this year in the estimates at $7,500. The last figure I have—that is the actual expenses for 1959-60—is $7,649. The travelling allowance for the admiralty judges is $500. The actual expenditures in 1959-60 was $148.

Item agreed to.

169. Administration of justice in the Northwest Territories including the Northwest Territories territorial court, $154,794.

Mr. Peters: On this vote, I am interested in obtaining some information. I notice that on the order paper today we have a resolution in the name of the minister. Its purpose is to provide for two additional puisne judges of the superior court of Quebec and one additional judge for the court of appeal of British Columbia. I should like to ask the minister this question. Are these judges allowed to take work outside of their own field, particularly in matters pertaining to provincial jurisdiction, and are they allowed to receive remuneration for so doing? The reason I ask these questions is that I have heard a number of complaints about superior court judges who, on being asked to sit on such and such a case, have said, "no, I am not available". They have said they were writing something in connection with arbitration,—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A conciliation report.

Mr. Peters: —a report on either arbitration cases or conciliation cases for boards on which they sat. There are numbers, I understand, who normally would be available to travel from one part to another to fill in and take cases not directly in their own area but they are unable to do this in many instances. They say, "I cannot go today because I have an arbitration board report to write", or "I have a conciliation board report to write" or "I am sitting on such and such a board". We are not referring to those judges who come to the minister and ask him for permission to undertake a certain job for the provincial government, such as the two judges in Quebec who, I understand, have asked for and received permission to make an inquiry into the whole judicial set-up in that province. That is not what we are referring to. We refer to the other jobs that superior court judges are doing. The questions I wish to ask are these. Do they have the right to do this? Do they have to get permission from the minister? Are they allowed to receive remuneration while they are doing work in a provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Fulton: As to whether judges can sit outside the territorial limits of the province in which they are appointed, the answer is yes with regard to the judges of the court of appeal of British Columbia. By an amendment last year we provided for a change in the constitution of the appeal court in the Yukon territory. Formerly, it had been the appeal court of British Columbia and an appellant from the Yukon had to go down to Vancouver or Victoria to have his appeal heard. Last year we changed that, so it is possible now to constitute a court of appeal and have it sit in the Yukon territory. A judge of the court of appeal of British Columbia may go up and sit with other judges designated to constitute that court of appeal. He would receive no extra remuneration for that work but would, of course, be entitled to his travelling expenses. This is one of the reasons why provision is made for the salary of an extra judge of the court of appeal of British Columbia.

Mr. Peters: I take it the arrangement which the minister has described has proved to be a satisfactory one. Has any consideration been given to making a similar arrangement in the northern areas of Alberta, Saskatchewan and, possibly, Manitoba to extend the scope of the court of appeal so that it might hear whatever appeals arise in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Fulton: My recollection is that we did the same thing with respect to the Northwest Territories last year by the use of the court of appeal of Alberta, Yellowknife being the administrative capital as it were. That is not strictly accurate, but it is the main centre and it is the place where the judge of the Northwest Territories presides. It is most conveniently reached from Edmonton. That is why we avail ourselves of the services of a judge from the court of appeal of Alberta in connection with appeals in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Peters: The minister said something about superior court judges within provinces who were taking extra work in arbitration and conciliation proceedings. The charge is being made that the reason why cases are piling up in the superior courts is because some of these judges are taking work outside their jurisdiction. Such a practice is said to have given rise to delays in judicial proceedings, and I should like to ask the minister whether he is consulted and whether his permission is obtained before extra work of this kind is undertaken. I should further like to ask whether the law as it now stands allows superior court judges to accept remuneration for work done outside their jurisdiction.

Mr. Fulton: The Judges Act provides in effect that if authorized by the lieutenant governor in council a judge of a superior court may act as a commissioner or arbitrator on any commission of inquiry or arbitration to which he may be appointed by any authority exercisable in that behalf by the lieutenant governor in council, so the act does provide authority for judges to act as commissioners or arbitrators. The act also states clearly that no judge so acting shall receive any extra remuneration. This is, then, in effect, made part of his judicial duties and a judge is not to receive extra pay in respect of such extra duties, though he is entitled to transportation expenses and living allowances which may be required in the course of his duty as commissioner or arbitrator.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I could pursue this question a little further. I understand the minister to be referring now to duties such as those of an arbitrator appointed, say, pursuant to a provincial arbitration act where decisions involving property and land have to be reached with respect to valuation. The question raised by my hon. friend from Timiskaming concerns the work of judges as chairman of arbitration boards and conciliation boards in labour matters. I wonder how this aspect of judicial duties is governed.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member would have to consult the statutes that are applicable. The words used in the Judges Act are these:

> —may act as commissioner or arbitrator on any commission, inquiry or arbitration for which he may be appointed under any authority in that behalf exercisable by the governor in council or the lieutenant governor in council respectively.

So if the provincial statute authorized the appointment by order in council of a judge to act as chairman of an arbitration board, or as a member of that board, it would come within the provisions of the Judges Act.

Mr. Howard: But suppose the appointment was made by a cabinet minister? For instance, as I recall the labour relations act of the province of British Columbia it is the minister of labour who appoints the chairman of the conciliation board, not the lieutenant governor in council. I assume that in such a case the provisions of the act would not apply.

Mr. Fulton: There is some danger in my making precise answers on general questions, but I would say, generally speaking that in such cases the consent of the governor in council here would have to be obtained. If it involves an appointment other than one that the lieutenant governor in council might be authorized to make, then the judge should obtain consent here.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This question was discussed, the minister will recall, in the first session after 1957. I have not referred to Hansard to verify whether or not my memory is correct, but I believe the minister said at that time that he proposed to look into the question I then raised. My question arose out of a direction given by the chief justice of the trial division in the province of Ontario that those judges who served under his immediate direction should confine themselves exclusively to their judicial duties. There was concern about their participation in the work of boards of all kinds, arbitration boards, conciliation boards and other kinds of quasi-judicial bodies. I was prompted at the time to ask the minister what his view was with regard to such judges who came under his jurisdiction, judges of the Supreme Court of Canada particularly. I do not know whether this would apply with any force at all to judges of the exchequer court. I asked this question in order to ascertain what the view of the minister was.

Since that time the hon. gentleman has had an opportunity to acquire considerably more experience in his administrative duties and he may be in a position to tell the committee today what he thinks about this problem. On one hand we have the labour unions who have very strong views, I take it, against the use of judges on conciliation boards and the like. There are others interested in the administration of justice, members of the legal profession and others, who believe that the judicial function is one which as far as possible should be confined to its own particular field. Has the minister any views which he would care to express to the committee at this time?

I know the minister says that under the Judges Act a judge may act with respect to any matter which arises out of a direction given by the lieutenant governor in council but as the hon. member for Skeena has pointed out there are certain types of conciliation boards in labour disputes which afford to the minister in charge of the department and, in some cases, to the deputy minister, authority to designate an individual or individuals as a member or members of a conciliation board. We are developing in Canada, as they are in the United States and as they are, of course, in Great Britain —I suppose it is general in all modern industrial societies—a set of circumstances which requires the use of judicial experience and the judicial temperament outside the actual determination of matters which are directly related to the interpretation of the law in civil or criminal cases. There are many instances where, I am sure, the judicial technique exercised by a properly appointed judicial person could make a much more useful contribution than people who are not trained in the sifting of evidence, and in the process of adjudication which lend themselves to more reliable determinations. I should be interested to know what the minister feels in this regard.

I realize in regard to the use of judges of the Supreme Court of Canada there is a divided view; a view, I take it, which is divided in that court itself. Different ministers of justice have taken different views with regard to the use of judges of the final court of appeal in respect of matters involving labour disputes, royal commissions and the like. I am not at this moment quarreling with their participation, but seeking to ascertain the view of the minister in regard to this matter. It becomes a matter of increasing importance in respect of the Supreme Court of Canada because, since the abolition of appeals to the judicial committee, that court has taken on an authority and, in consequence, a juridical prestige, which I am sure we are all pleased to see, and hope will grow.

Judges of the United States supreme court do not, I believe, take part in extrajudicial activities, with perhaps the exception of the chief justice, and their work is confined essentially to the work on the bench. I believe I am right in saying that in the United Kingdom it has not been the practice that those who sit on the judicial committee take part in commissions and the like. Excuse me, I am wrong in saying that. In the case of members of the judicial committee there are well known individuals, such as Lord MacMillan, who have taken part in royal commissions and the like. However, in the United Kingdom, I believe it has not been the practice for those judges who sit on the final court of appeal, as it were, in respect of domestic matters, to serve in a non-judicial capacity: I should like to know what the situation is here in this regard, and I address my remarks particularly in respect of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a word or two before the Minister of Justice speaks. I think the point raised by the hon. member for Essex East is of very great importance, and I should like the minister to recall that a former highly respected member of this house, known to both the minister and the hon. member for Essex East, the late John Hackett, had very strong reservations in respect of judges being appointed special duties because he feared, if they were drawn into matters which were controversial, particularly election petitions and things of that kind, the absolute impartiality which is so essential to the performance of their duties on the bench might be impaired by this extrajudicial function. I mention that fact because I know it will be of interest to the minister.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, at this stage I do not wish to go beyond what I said on earlier occasions, to which my friend the hon. member for Essex East has referred. I do not in any sense retract anything I said at that time, but at the moment I do not wish to go beyond that. At that time I gave a fairly extensive outline of my views regarding this question.

I can re-emphasize, however, my view that it is one thing for a judge to be asked to sit in a quasi-judicial capacity, as chairman of an arbitration board, where he is exercising at least a quasi-judicial function in the arbitration of issues, but it is a very different thing for a judge to act as chairman of a conciliation board, where he is mediating between parties, which seems to me to be foreign to judicial functions. That is almost inevitably bound to make him, in the eyes of one or other of the parties, a partisan, when the results are given. The results will favour one or other of the parties, because the judge has been carrying on mediation. It seems to me that a clear distinction can be drawn in this area and, as I said earlier, in saying so, I am not making any firm pronouncement regarding the use of judges in respect of arbitration boards. I think this practice should be resorted to rarely so as not to become the custom, because judges should spend the vast majority of their time in performing their essential judicial functions on the bench.

I should also perhaps give some indication of the attitude of this government toward the matter, certainly so far as the supreme and exchequer courts of Canada are concerned. Evidence of this attitude is found in the fact that since we assumed office in June of 1957, we have not appointed any judge from either of these courts to any outside board, commission or inquiry. That is a record which I hope we will be able to maintain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the minister quoted earlier from a statute concerning what a superior court judge may do in respect of duties outside his court functions, if that judge is appointed by the lieutenant governor in council.

Mr. Fulton: Those provisions are to be found in sections 37 and 38 of the Judges Act. Perhaps I should make quite clear what I have said. I make no prohibition against the appointment of judges to the functions which are described there. There may be cases where that is proper, and where, indeed, the only person acceptable under certain circumstances is a person holding high judicial office, and I do not want anyone to interpret me as saying that this must never and will never happen. I should like to be interpreted as saying that it is my view that this should happen as seldom as possible, if ever, and so far we have been able to live within those guiding lines.

I have referred the hon. member to sections 37 and 38 of the Judges Act. I should remind him that judges of superior courts in the provinces are judges of provincial courts. It is true they are appointed and paid by the federal government, and there are very good judicial reasons for that, but once they are appointed, they are judges of provincial courts. We would not be well founded in taking the position that the provinces cannot, by appropriate legislation, decide what will be the duties of those provincial judges, making those duties part of their judicial functions. However, the scheme of the act, as it presently is, reflects the importance of maintaining the position that this should not be a casual thing, but must be something for which legislative authority exists in the province, and the particular exercise of that authority, in so far as making appointments is concerned, is vested in the lieutenant governor in council.

Mr. Howard: I gather that if it is not within the authority of the lieutenant governor in council, but is a ministerial authority, then it is subject to the governor in council?

Mr. Fulton: That is correct.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps the minister could indicate how often the governor in council has granted consent in comparison with the number of requests for consent which have been received during the past year?

Mr. Fulton: Requests which are received are comparatively few; I should suggest in the neighbourhood of three or four per year. I do not give that figure as a firm one, but I am sure I should realize if there were more than three or four. I do not think there are more requests than that received per year.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Mr. Chairman, I should like to—

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I may be allowed to follow this subject to its conclusion. I take it this procedure applies also in respect of appointments of chairmen to boards dealing with things such as labour disputes, in that the consent of the governor in council must be acquired if a ministerial appointment is involved?

Mr. Fulton: I certainly hope that is the case because, as I interpret the act, requests should be made here.

Mr. Howard: When a judge is appointed as a chairman of a conciliation or arbitration board under ministerial authority with the consent of the two parties to the dispute, and with the consent of the governor in council, what is the position in respect of remuneration for his services?

Mr. Fulton: That is covered by the next section of the Judges Act, section 39, which says:

> No judge shall receive any remuneration in addition to his judicial salary for acting as commissioner or arbitrator—

And so on. Then, it is made subject to the provisions of subsection 3 which says he may receive travelling and living expenses which he ordinarily incurs while carrying on his duties as commissioner or arbitrator.

Mr. Howard: He may receive fees as chairman of a conciliation board? That is not prohibited?

Mr. Fulton: I think this section is clear. It reads as follows:

> (1) Except as provided in subsection (3), no judge shall receive any remuneration in addition to his judicial salary for acting as commissioner or arbitrator—

Then there are some other words which do not make the situation any clearer. Then we come to subsection 2 which reads:

> Subsection (1) does not affect the right of any judge to receive remuneration under the provisions of any dominion or provincial statute in force on the 1st day of July, 1920.

Do not ask what the historical background of that is. I continue:

> (3) A judge acting as commissioner or arbitrator pursuant to subsection (2) of section 38, or as administrator or deputy of the Governor General or performing any duty or service he is required to perform for or on behalf of the government of Canada or the government of any province, may receive, in addition to his judicial salary, such moving or transportation expenses and living allowance as the governor in council or the lieutenant governor in council, as the case may be, may fix by general or special order.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Mr. Chairman, some remarks were made a few minutes ago concerning the dignity of the bench. It seems to me it does not add dignity to the bench nor to our legal profession to have retired judges returning to practice before the bar and the courts where for many years they sat as presiding judges. I think this criticism is especially valid, as the hon. member for Essex East would agree, in matters in the Supreme Court of Canada which, of course, is now the highest court in the land. One would hope that those retired judges are not forced to take this course of action because of economic necessity owing to the inadequacy of their pensions.

As a footnote to the same comment, Mr. Chairman, it has been noted and brought to my attention that in Ontario at least certain judges have used the title of their former position in furtherance of their own professional interests when they have returned to practice.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The practice of judges retiring from the courts, of course, is not one of recent origin. As a member of the bar, I can very well understand the concern of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken with regard to this matter. I rose not so much to pursue this aspect of the problem, although I am aware of its existence and its importance, as to ask what is the position, for instance, with regard to a county court judge—I do not want to identify the person because I have no reason to suspect his good intentions, nor do I in any way wish to reflect on the integrity of the person —who takes over the chairmanship, for instance, and the administration of the liquor control commission in one of our large provinces? I do not know whether the minister knows to whom my remarks are directed, but I wish to know whether that person has the right to continue to be regarded as a judge? What is his status? Is he still a county court judge? I know this situation does not apply to the present chairman of the civil service commission who, on taking over that office, abandoned the right to the privileges that flows from the appointment as one of Her Majesty's judges in the supreme court of Ontario. I do not know whether that applies to his title. I think he bears the appellation "Mr." and not "hon. Mr. Justice". What I rose particularly to ask was this. What is the situation with regard to the particular assignment given to the individual who was a good county court judge and who I am sure is a man of great integrity, who continues to be regarded as a judge and continues to be called a judge, but who is administering an important position in a government department?

Mr. Fulton: The situation in that regard is not altogether clear, Mr. Chairman, and is one to which I hope to be in a position to bring some clarity at a time when I am able to present some general provisions revising the Judges Act in this regard. I cannot really say much more. If the hon. gentleman is really interested in following it up I might, with the greatest of good will, suggest that possibly the answer to the situation is within his knowledge or his ability to obtain because it arose during the period of time when the government of which he was a member was holding office.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want the matter to be left on that basis because I think on reflection the minister will regard that as not the way to leave it. It is true that the particular individual was appointed to this provincial post at a time when I happened to be in the government. The individual was appointed to this provincial post by a provincial government, and that appointment had nothing to do, of course, with his appointment as a judge, nominated for that purpose by a minister of justice serving the crown in the right of the federal government.

There is no law, of course, to prevent a judge duly appointed from taking an appointment of that kind. The minister may have some legislation in mind because he speaks about clarifying the situation sometime in the near future. It may be that the way to do it is by legislation, but it does seem to me that when we are so justifiably proud of our judicial system and of those who serve on the bench, whether in county court, district court or in superior court positions, we should be jealous about any act that in any way detracts from the dignity, the prestige and the authority of those courts and of those who sit in those courts. Of course the federal government cannot say to a provincial government, "You shall refrain from appointing a judge appointed by us to act in a purely administrative capacity". In the absence of legislative authority for that kind of direction the federal government cannot say that. It may be, as I said, that it will be necessary to provide that kind of enactment. The minister meets with attorneys general frequently, not only at constitutional conferences but on other occasions. It seems to me an effective way to deal with this situation is to have it clearly understood that judges are not to be used by federal or provincial executive bodies for that kind of purpose.

I am not now talking about sitting on commissions or boards. When I made my comment a few moments ago I did not express a view as to the merits. I was simply putting forward a statement for the purpose of ascertaining the minister's thinking in the matter. But appointing a judge to something that is not only extrajudicial but is entirely nonjudicial and nothing more than an administrative function is an altogether different matter, and I think it is a wrong use of experienced judicial personnel. I am not asking the minister to take steps now to cause something that has happened to be corrected.

However, I think it is only by a discussion of this kind that we can ascertain what is in the mind of the minister, and the discussion will serve to help him in the formulation of policy for the future.

I have no doubt that these things were done during the time that another government was in office, and I am not raising the matter in a critical way. The minister has said that during the time the present government has been in power and he has been Minister of Justice no judge of the Supreme Court of Canada has been used in any way that would place that judge in a position where he would be competing in a non-judicial function with some other person serving, let us say, on a board of arbitration. I think the minister is to be commended for that. I think that our supreme court judges in particular ought not to be used except in judicial functions so that they cannot be placed in a position where they are open to any kind of suggestion that has anything other than a judicial aspect to it. I raised the particular matter not because I expect the minister to correct the situation. He has said enough to satisfy me with regard to that situation, and it may be that this discussion will serve to encourage him to raise the matter when he discusses these questions further with the attorneys general.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate very much indeed what the hon. member has said. I think he and I share the same approach to this problem.

Mr. Howard: Before we carry this item, would the minister explain what is the substantive law of divorce that applies in the Northwest Territories and also the Yukon?

Mr. Fulton: In the statute that set up the Northwest Territories in 1870, I believe, the effect was that the matrimonial causes act then in force in the United Kingdom was made applicable in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Howard: Did I understand the minister to say that this was contained in a statute establishing the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Howard: It says in the statute that the law of divorce will be that of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Fulton: In effect, the laws of England as in force at the 1st of July, 1870, shall apply in the Northwest Territories to the extent they are applicable and are not excluded by special provisions of the laws of Canada. Similarly, when British Columbia entered confederation the same general situation was brought about. There was a provision in a statute at the time of entry into confederation which had the effect of making applicable in British Columbia the laws of England as they were in force at certain dates.

Mr. Howard: Did I understand the minister to say that it was the statute which provided that British Columbia would have certain divorce laws? I understood it to be a court case.

Mr. Fulton: I had not intended to say that the statute made specific reference to divorce. The statute said that the laws of England in effect shall apply and, as a matter of fact, it took a couple of cases in the privy council to determine precisely what laws of England with respect to divorce and matrimonial causes were in effect then and were therefore applicable in British Columbia.

Mr. Peters: How many divorce cases have there been in the Northwest Territories in the past year and where were they heard?

Mr. Fulton: I do not have any figures on that because these are civil proceedings and therefore they do not come to my attention nor do I have any responsibility for them. I assume they would be heard in Yellowknife which is the judicial centre of the Northwest Territories and the place where Mr. Justice Sissons presides. Mr. Justice Sissons does go on circuit and I suppose he could hear a divorce case in a place other than Yellowknife but I do not know that he ever has. Yellowknife would be the normal place where these cases would be tried.

Item agreed to.

Combines Investigation Act—

171. Restrictive trade practices commission, $94,840.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I think the practice followed last year and the year before, if not in other years, was that we dealt with the combines investigation branch and the restrictive practices commission under the same item, and I should like to follow somewhat the same approach. Under the activities of the branch I should like to raise again a specific and important matter relating to what is loosely referred to as the drug industry or the ethical pharmaceutical industry. I have dealt with this matter a number of times in the past, and recently a fair amount of publicity has been given to the activities of the Kefauver committee in the United States and also the statement of evidence by the director of the branch to the restrictive trade practices commission.

I should like to refer briefly to an article by Charles King which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of December 11, 1959, in which he deals with certain statements by

Mr. Stanley Conder of the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers' association with regard to the prices of certain types of drugs, an exchange of comments between myself and Mr. Conder through the newspapers and statements I made in the house.

I want to point out first that the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers' association, according to the latest information I have, has some 60 pharmaceutical houses or companies affiliated with it and represents, by its own statement, 90 per cent of the industry in Canada. Mr. Conder made some comments about the profit picture of the Canadian industry. He pointed out that the average profit after taxes was 6.5 per cent which he said was "not out of line with the general economy".

The difficulty, of course, in dealing with whether or not that is a correct figure is that a large number of the drug companies in Canada are subsidiaries of United States parent companies primarily or in some cases of companies in other lands. Therefore the Canadian financial picture is hidden in the annual reports of the parent company and is not shown as a separate item, so it is not possible to deal with that particular point.

I would say that the drug industry of Canada is controlled primarily by parent companies in the United States although some of the parent companies are in Switzerland, the United Kingdom or France. Primarily though it is the United States drug industry which controls the drug industry in Canada. Therefore I think we are entitled to draw some comparisons between the industry in the United States in the light of its examination by various public bodies and the industry in Canada.

In June of 1958 the federal trade commission of the United States published what it called an economic report on antibiotics manufacturing which deals with profits in the industry. I wish to make only a passing reference to it before dealing with the Canadian industry. On page 216 there is a table showing the net profit as a percentage of assets for certain antibiotic and other pharmaceutical manufacturers from 1950 to 1956. In it are named the companies and figures are set out for their pharmaceutical operations as distinguished from their antibiotic operations, and as separated from the total consolidated financial picture if indeed proprietary medicines were dealt with also. It shows so far as pharmaceutical operations are concerned, under profits as a percentage of assets for the year 1960, that the company of Smith, Kline and French had a percentage profit of 74.5. I mention this company because it has a Canadian subsidiary. G. D. Searle and Company had a profit of 55.04 per cent. That company also has a Canadian subsidiary. Schering Corporation Limited had a profit of 50 per cent. There are other companies listed here but I picked those three out because they are parent companies in the United States with subsidiaries in Canada. The weighted average for 10 companies is 37 per cent, which is an increase of 10 percentage points over the picture in 1950 for the same companies, increasing from 26.3 per cent in 1950 to 37.5 per cent in 1956.

In Canada, as I say, it is a bit more difficult to pick out these particular figures. However, there are some figures available. With respect to the various companies, although not necessarily in this order, I mention the companies involved: Abbott Laboratories Limited; Ames Co. of Canada; Ayerst, McKenna and Harrison; Bristol Laboratories; British Drug Houses; Burroughs Wellcome & Co.; Canada Pharmacal Co.; Ciba Co. Ltd.; Cyanamid of Canada; Dymond; Charles E. Frosst; Hoffman-La Roche Ltd.; Frank W. Horner Ltd.; Eli Lilly Co.; Merck & Co.; Parke-Davis & Co.; Pfizer Corp.; Pitman-Moore of Canada; Poulenc; Riker Pharmaceutical Co.; Schering Corp.; G. D. Searle & Co.; Smith, Kline & French Inter-American Corp.; E. R. Squibb & Sons; Upjohn Co. of Canada; Winthrop Laboratories of Canada; and John Wyeth. Of these companies 18 are subsidiaries of United States parent companies. I am afraid there is no date on this particular publication, of the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers' association but I received it some time last year. So at least as of last year all but four of the companies I last mentioned were members of the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers' association, and that is what is shown with respect to the profit picture of the Canadian industry.

In its relationship with other industries in Canada, and this material is taken from the taxation statistics of 1958 of various types of manufacturing industries, it shows that the highest profit rate was for paper products being 10.8 per cent; that the second highest was for pharmaceutical products, being 10.5 per cent and that next in line was non-metallic mineral products, being 10.1 per cent. Perhaps a few other references will give an indication. Just taken at random from the table they show as follows:

Manufacturing industry	Profit rate %
Foods and beverages	5.6
Tobacco and tobacco products	7.9
Rubber products	6.3
Leather products	1.0
Textile products (except clothing)	4.2
Clothing	2.5
Wood products	2.7
Paper products	10.8

And so on.

From this we find that the pharmaceutical industry in Canada has the second highest profit rate, being second only to the paper products industry. From this I think we can therefore conclude that the situation is not, as the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers said it was or claimed, namely that their profit picture is not out of line with the general economy. I think we can conclude that in reality it is out of line with the economy to the extent of being the second highest and fairly close to twice as much as the other types of industries I mentioned. Of the number of companies to which I referred to a while ago, we find that 13 of them have a profit rate of more than 20 per cent and that six fall into the category between 10 per cent and 20 per cent. So of those in a position of having a profit rate of over 10 per cent there is a total of some 19.

I should like to deal with the argument advanced by the pharmaceutical industry that its high prices are justified and necessary on the ground that the industry makes extensive and large expenditures in the field of research and must recoup these expenditures on research as quickly as they can before the drug itself is replaced by some more efficacious drug made by another company or by the same company, and that they spend on research many dollars which result in nothing usable being developed. I think this argument about extensive expenditures on research is not a factual one and is not one of the major reasons why there are such high prices in the drug industry as I intend to show.

Again referring to the United States and their federal trade commission economic report on antibiotics for 1958 at page 205, we find some statistical information given by the federal trade commission. In this instance they do not identify the companies by name but merely designate them as company No. 1, company No. 2 and so on. For the period 1956, so far as salary and advertising expenses are concerned—and I will deal with this part of it first—as a percentage of the sales dollars, company No. 1 expended on selling and advertising 26.4 per cent of its sales dollars. Company No. 2 in the line expended 24 per cent on selling and advertising. On company No. 3 there is no information available. Company No. 4 expended 28.1 per cent; No. 5, 14.4 per cent; No. 6, 30.7 per cent; for No. 7, No. 8 and No. 9 there is no information available; No. 10, expended 14.4 per cent; No. 11, 14.6 per cent; No. 12, 8.5 per cent.

With respect to Canada the picture is somewhat the same. Without going into a long series of statistics about each of the companies I mentioned earlier I would say this. The average of all the companies I mentioned earlier is not quite 25 per cent. That is the percentage of their sales dollar which is expended on advertising, salesmen, detail men, direct mailings, supplying samples and the like. Perhaps I should give the committee the exact figure; it is considered that 24.93 per cent of the sales dollar is expended on selling, advertising, research, and so on.

If we calculate this in relation to the cost of goods sold by these companies, we find this averages out at 36.21 per cent. I think anyone would agree that this is a particularly high percentage of the sales dollar income to be expended on selling, advertising and promotional activities of the industry. I will relate this to research expenditures in a moment or two.

This matter has also concerned the Canadian medical association and is referred to in the Canadian medical association journal of September 3, 1960. At page 505 we find a portion of the report of the committee on pharmacy of the Canadian medical association, which reads as follows:

> The cost of drugs has been a matter of much discussion in recent months. There is no doubt that the pharmaceutical houses have made many contributions in past years to our ability to alleviate illnesses which in the aggregate represent an almost incalculable economic and humanistic gain to our community. There is some evidence to suggest that the return which they are receiving on their original investment is excessive.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member what he is reading from?

Mr. Howard: This is a reference in the Canadian medical association journal of September 3, 1960; it is volume 83, page 505.

Mr. Fulton: That is the document from which my hon. friend is reading now?

Mr. Howard: No, this is an excerpt taken from the Canadian medical association journal.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering what document my hon. friend is reading from, if he would be kind enough to say.

Mr. Howard: I am reading from a document, page 118, called "Material collected for submission to the restrictive trade practices commission in the course of an inquiry under section 42 of the Combines Investigation Act relating to the manufacture, distribution and sale of drugs by director of investigation and research Combines Investigation Act, Department of Justice, Ottawa, 1961".

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for giving me the information. I have to raise a point of order. The hon. member is reading from a report on material obtained by the director of investigation and research and transmitted by him to the restrictive trade practices commission.

On a number of occasions recently motions have been made in this house by the hon. member who has just spoke calling for the production of this report and the production of various documents that were before the director in the course of compiling his report. The house has decided that these documents should not be produced, and the motions in every case have been rejected by the house.

I recognize that some portions of this document, copies of which were supplied by the chairman of the restrictive trade practices commission to parties and persons whom the commission thought it might be appropriate to ask to appear before it, have found their way into the hands of the press. It is alleged that portions of them have been reproduced in the press.

However, I raise the point of order that in so far as proceedings or discussions in this committee at this time are concerned, it would not be proper to attempt to introduce any portion of that report, from wherever it may come, whether by reading from the report itself or by reading alleged portions thereof which have been reproduced in the press.

I take my position on that point of order on the basis of section 28 of the Combines Investigation Act, which says:

> All inquiries under this act shall be conducted in private, except that the chairman of the commission may order that all or any portion of any proceedings before the commission or any member thereof shall be conducted in public.

The house has taken the position that this is a document which should be kept private, and it is therefore not open to me, and I submit it is not open to any hon. member of the house or this committee, to seek to discuss that report or to attempt to introduce any portion of it into the record.

If it be argued by the hon. member that this position is not consistent, that a portion of a report which has been reproduced in the press and may therefore be read by hon. members of the house outside the house should not be excluded from proceedings in the house, my answer is that the only purpose for which these portions of the report could be read here must be for the purpose of discussing the report. Since the discussion of the report is in my submission out of order, it is not appropriate or in order to read the report or portions of it at this stage. I point out further, sir, that it seems to me to be a matter of judgment or, to use the words in May's Parliamentary Practice, a matter of "good taste" as to the extent to which a private member is permitted to read from documents which cannot be produced in the house.

In that connection may I emphasize that the report of the director, while it is impartial in so far as the director is concerned—his task in this kind of inquiry is not to make a case for or against any individual or group of individuals, but to report what he finds and his conclusions thereon and lay that report before the commission—at this stage it is a one-sided report because the parties had not been given the opportunity to present their cases in full.

When the time comes for the commission to hold its hearings, the commission, with the director's report before it, copies of which are supplied to the parties, invites the parties to make their comments. Then the commission's report is of course made public and at that stage we have a balanced report; the case on both sides is summarized.

The second ground of my point of order is the matter of the propriety or, as May says, "good taste" in permitting reference to this kind of document which, as I have said, is a one-sided document at this stage.

The scheme and purpose of the Combines Investigation Act, as appears so clearly in section 28 which I have read, is that inquiries by the director should be private and nothing should be published unless and until the chairman of the restrictive trade practices commission, in his sole discretion, decides that the hearings before his commission should be in public; otherwise nothing is published until the commission makes its report. Then, by the statute, that report is required to be made public.

At this stage, therefore, with respect to the report of the director it is my submission that it is not in order to read from it or to read purported extracts from it, because it is not a document which can properly be before the House of Commons at this stage, and the house on three separate occasions in the very recent past has so decided.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out with respect to this particular document that it is true a motion was made and the house rejected the motion to table a document called a report of the director regarding the pricing and selling policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs, if I recall the words correctly. I have used them so often recently that they are almost as familiar as my own name. It is correct that the House of Commons decided it should not be tabled, but I submit, with respect, that this decision under which the Minister of Justice was not required to table the document does not prevent any hon. member reading from that particular document.

We hear continually in this chamber hon. members reading from correspondence and documents of a like nature which are considered to be private. Some years ago a famous debate arose about horses on the payroll. That involved a private document, yet references were made to it and extracts were read from it by various members, including members of the Tory party. There is no ground for a point of order being raised here. I am not infringing any rule of the committee, unless it be said that I am reading a speech, but I would point out that I endorse the point of view expressed in whatever observations I do read, and, in any case, I am not reading from the report of the director himself but from a photostatic copy of that report, if hon. members want to get technical about it, reproduced in a publication which is in the public domain.

Not long ago—I believe it was a week ago Wednesday—the House of Commons agreed to a motion of mine—and the parliamentary secretary to the minister said it was fine and dandy—that a list of documents and publications to which the public has access, with bibliographic reference to material perused or used by the combines investigation branch should be produced, and this is undoubtedly one of the published documents used or perused by the combines investigation branch. As I say, the house has already ordered that we should be furnished with such a list together with bibliographic references. The only condition attached to it was that it was not to be taken that any publication so listed or any of the bibliographic references were necessarily contained in the report itself.

All I am doing in this instance is to read from a document entitled the Canadian medical association journal. The public has access to this particular publication, and I am reading from it, even though the actual words are not written by the journal itself but are reproduced from it. I submit, on these grounds, that there is no substance in the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to make a few comments on this point of order, but before I proceed to do so may I take this opportunity to express the hope that the hon. member for Spadina, the assistant Deputy Speaker, will soon be able to return to this house. I mention this not because you are in the chair, sir, but simply because I happen to have visited the hon. member yesterday. While I express this hope, I want you to know, sir, that we have every confidence in the person who is occupying the chair at this moment.

[Mr. Howard.]

I rise to support the position taken by the hon. member for Skeena. The votes which have taken place in this house are not involved in this particular dispute. The house has voted on three different occasions that the minister should not be required to produce the particular report in question, nor should he be required to table it. That is not the point at issue at the present time. The minister quotes, in support of the position he takes, section 28 of the Combines Investigation Act which reads as follows:

> All inquiries under this act shall be conducted in private, except that the chairman of the commission may order that all or any portion of any proceedings before the commission or any member thereof shall be conducted in public.

That section does not in any way affect the nature of the dispute between the hon. member for Skeena and the Minister of Justice. That section deals with the in camera character of the proceedings of the commission. It does not preclude any publication of the proceedings of the commission, and certainly it in no way affects this committee of supply. It is a provision which is confined entirely to enquiries held under this act.

The document in question has been made public as a result of action taken by the chairman of the commission—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): That is not right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Am I wrong in that?

Mr. Fulton: I would take issue with it. This was made public, apparently, by some of those to whom the commission had sent it on a private basis.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I accept the correction. However, it was put in the hands of a number of people and it became a public document and was referred to in the press. Now the minister has taken the position that a document which is at the present time, in its essentials, public property, cannot be referred to in this committee by the hon. member for Skeena, that it cannot be dealt with in the way in which he is endeavouring to deal with at least part of the report. I cannot agree with the contention advanced by the minister. I think the hon. member is perfectly justified in discussing in this public forum a report which is now public property, and it would seem to be that for the minister to take the attitude he does is unusual, particularly if we bear in mind that on another occasion the Prime Minister had no hesitation in disclosing in this house what admittedly was a secret document, namely the so-called economic report which he revealed so brazenly in 1958.

Mr. Fulton: And tabled.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And which he had tabled; a confidential document, a document which had not been the property of the public. But the Prime Minister had no hesitation in taking that confidential document and using it for the purpose which served him at that particular moment.

The hon. member is referring here to something which has become a matter of public concern and public knowledge. This being the case, he seeks to take advantage of the fact by discussing in this chamber what he could go out and discuss in any public hall at any time. If the hon. member were to take this report and go down to the Chateau Laurier and call a public meeting in the ballroom to discuss this report, no one could stop him. Yet because of milieu in which we find ourselves, he is denied the opportunity to do something he could do at any time outside this chamber. If the Minister of Justice seeks to set aside my argument on the ground that he can not be compelled to table the report, I say that the decision of this house was not that the report should not be discussed but simply that the minister should not be compelled to produce it. That was the decision which was made, and it is defensible, although I do not myself agree with it. It is defensible because the minister is the minister to whom the chairman of the commission is responsible. He argues that in these circumstances the position he must take in respect of these matters until they reach finality is a neutral position. That would be a legitimate argument for the minister to use in connection with the production of a document and it was, in a sense, the argument which he did use at the time. But it does not in any way affect this situation and the right of the hon. member for Skeena.

So, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to you that it is clear that the hon. gentleman should be allowed to discuss this report just as much as he would be allowed to discuss it outside this house, and just as much as editorial writers, radio commentators and others are discussing this report, which has come to them, in the way which we have already mentioned it has come to the public. For those reasons I strongly support the position taken by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say one or two things in this regard. There is one point which I do not think emerges as clearly as I should like, from what I first said. Perhaps first I may be allowed to make a correction, with which I am sure the hon. member for Essex East will agree, in that he said the minister was responsible to the restrictive trade practices commission. It is my understanding that the responsibility is the other way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right, certainly.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, in the consideration which I asked the committee to give to the point of order raised, I ask the committee and you to include this fact. At page 460 of May's sixteenth edition, it is stated that a minister may not cite a paper or document which he is not prepared to table. If, then the situation is that it is not proper to table a document, a minister is unable to discuss it. Therefore I am in a position where I am unable to discuss this document, for I think it is quite clear that I would be in breach of the spirit as well as the letter of the statute which I am responsible to administer if I were to discuss this document at this time. I am precluded from discussing it, as May has pointed out at page 460 and page 461. I suggest hon. members are also in this position, although greater latitude has been permitted in this regard to members than to ministers of the crown.

Since, in my view, this document should not be tabled because it is private, and the house has supported that principle by its decision, it seems to me the hon. member should not discuss it. Whether he does or not, I cannot discuss it, and it seems to me, therefore, that the committee and you, Mr. Chairman, should give some consideration to the question as to whether it is in accord with the rules and customs of this house that reference should be made to an extract from a document which should not be discussed, and which I cannot answer during the consideration of my estimates.

Consideration should also be given to the principle of good taste, quite apart from the fact that the report itself at this stage does not present a full picture, but only one side. Is it proper that an hon. member, into whose possession a photostatic copy of this document has come, should be permitted to discuss it when it is not a matter which I am able to discuss in the consideration of my estimates at this stage? That is the third reason, in my submission, why this document should not be read into the record or tabled before this house at this time. I suggest when the whole inquiry has been concluded and the commission has made its final report, then the matter can be discussed and will in fact be discussed in public. To discuss it at this time, I submit, would result in a one-sided presentation, and I suggest the committee should ask itself very carefully whether that would be proper. In addition to that, I suggest it is not in order for an hon. member to read from a document which cannot be tabled.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one statement regarding—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I recognize the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, apart from the suggestions made before, I feel the minister is raising another consideration under this point of order, and is in reality prejudging his own decision of some future date. He has said on this occasion, as well as on at least one other occasion in this house, that the report of the restrictive trade practices commission will be made public. I suggest that is not necessarily the case. The act gives the minister the authority to make that report public if he deems it in the public interest to do so. I should just like to correct him in that regard. The minister at this stage is not in a position to prejudge his own opinion in regard to a report which has not been completed, and which he has not seen as yet. I suggest his statement in respect of tabling the report should be qualified to the extent that, if within 30 days of the time the report is completed he deems to make it advisable to make it public, it will become public.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, when the minister referred to the citation from May, he did not identify it, and I was not, therefore, in a position to understand it. Since that time the Solicitor General has sent me a copy of the sixteenth edition of May. While I do not complain about anything the minister has read from May, I think it is important that the concluding paragraph in May under the title "Citing Documents Not Before the House" ought to be placed before Your Honour. That paragraph reads as follows:

> Members not connected with the government have also cited documents in their possession, both public and private, which were not before the house:

Therefore, there is—

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member read the rest of the paragraph?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I intended to and I shall. I suggest, therefore, there is strong precedent for what the hon. gentleman has done today.

[Mr. Fulton.]

As the Minister of Justice has requested, I shall read the rest of that paragraph, which is as follows:

> —but though the house is equally unable to form a correct judgment from partial extracts—

That is what we have today. I continue:

> —inconvenient latitude has sometimes been permitted, which it is doubtful whether any rule but that of good taste could have restrained.

The matter is not laid obviously to a decision of the Chair, because there is no rule that has been contravened as a result of the action taken by the hon. member. It will simply have to be determined whether the action taken by the hon. member today is in good taste. On that score, I suggest that is a matter which the hon. gentleman has to decide, and which the house is not given authority to decide because it does not involve any violation of any rule, as May points out. I simply repeat that what the hon. gentleman has done today, any persons outside this house could do, and are doing now through different agencies of one kind or another.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I should like the minister to assist me in respect of one point. At page 500 of Votes and Proceedings there appears a motion of the hon. member for Skeena for the production of specific documents. I should like the minister to confirm my impression, that the motion which appears there has regard to this particular report?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, the motion of the hon. member for Skeena was, that an order of the house do issue for a copy of the statement of evidence by the combines investigation branch regarding the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of certain new types of drugs. The vote of the house in respect of that motion was 37 in favour and 148 against, as reported in Hansard of May 3, 1961. This is the document to which that motion referred.

Perhaps I may take the advantage of this moment to say one or two more things in this regard. I rest my case on the matter of good taste, as covered in the passage from May, as read by the hon. member for Essex East. My case in this regard is, whether it is in good taste to read from a document in light of the fact that all we can get is a one-sided presentation in respect of which I am not at liberty to participate in the discussion.

I should also like to assure you, Mr. Chairman, that there is a distinction between the situation involved in the tabling of the economic report, referred to by the hon. member for Essex East, and the tabling of this report, because the Prime Minister took the position that the confidentiality of that document no longer existed, and therefore no objection could be taken to its being tabled. Therefore, that document was properly laid before this house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That document continues to be confidential.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, in respect of the point raised by the minister, I should like to suggest that I am trying to present a one-sided case; the people's side. I do not advance this as having any actual bearing on your ruling, Mr. Chairman, or on the point of order, but I would point out there is some doubt whether the document from which I am reading is actually the document with which the motion dealt. I do not think it is particularly important because, if I can quote it correctly, the motion referred to the statement of evidence by the director of investigation and research regarding the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs. I have not it exactly before me but I think I have given the gist of the motion.

I have not a statement of evidence before me. What I am quoting from to identify the document for the minister is "Material collected for submission to the restrictive trade practices commission in the course of an inquiry under section 42 of the Combines Investigation Act relating to the manufacture, distribution and sale of drugs by director of investigation and research, Combines Investigation Act, Department of Justice, Ottawa, 1961". The comparable words are "the director of investigation and research". These words are mentioned both in the motion and on the front page of this particular document. This does not mention certain pharmaceutical houses, as does the motion. In the identifying sheet it makes no reference to certain pharmaceutical houses. The document I have here does not relate to what are known as new types of drugs. It refers to the manufacture, distribution and sale of drugs.

May I emphasize this in another way and refer to what is known as the preface dated February 28, 1961, signed by D. H. W. Henry, director of investigation and research. To avoid any misunderstanding may I emphasize that this is not a report under the Combines Investigation Act. It is a statement of material collected and analysed by the director of investigation and research for the purpose of being laid before the restrictive trade practices commission in the course of an inquiry under section 42 of the act. The text of section 42 is set out on page 1 of the statement and provides that the commission is required:

> ... to consider any evidence or material brought before it ... together with such further evidence or material as the commission considers advisable and to report thereon in writing to the minister.

The preface goes on to talk about the present director's predecessor, Mr. MacDonald, and so on, but nowhere is there any reference to certain pharmaceutical houses or to new types of drugs nor to the selling and pricing policies of certain houses but merely to the manufacture, distribution and sale of drugs. I cited this only because a question was raised whether this was the matter referred to in the motion which I submit is not too relevant, anyway.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly clear that this is the only report prepared by the director. Its correct title is, "Statement of Material". It is the only document that he has placed before the commission, and by one of the sections of the act this investigation is made an inquiry, and that is what is referred to in section 28 as the thing which should be conducted in private. All inquiries are to be conducted in private. This is the only document. I do not think my hon. friend from Skeena really quarrels with my suggestion that all of us all along have known that this is the document which was the subject matter of the motion which was placed before the house on an earlier occasion.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I start with the premise that the Chair is under the control of the house. On Wednesday, May 3, a motion for the production of a report, which I am satisfied has been identified as this report or part of a larger report, was rejected by a vote of 148 to 37. Therefore, this puts the minister in the position where any reference by the hon. member to this report cannot be commented on by the minister. I refer the committee to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, citation 159 (2), which reads:

> A minister of the crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a dispatch or other state paper not before the house, unless he is prepared to lay it upon the table. This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevent counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence.

I take it that the point made with respect to the matter of not being in good taste is something which is also worthy of consideration. I go back to my original point that the Chair is in the hands of the house. On an earlier occasion the house came to a decision and accordingly I must rule that any reference to the document by the hon. member concerned is out of order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, you are coming to the conclusion that the document from which I am reading is the same document which the house said would not be tabled. The minister may think it is but I for one do not. However, I shall abide by your ruling and I will not quote from the document itself in the house, although I gather I am at liberty to quote from it outside, if I so desire, as well as anyone else who wishes to do so.

If the minister is at a disadvantage now in being unable to table the document I have no objection at all to tabling it. I make it available freely to anyone. I will table it and the minister will be at liberty to discuss something that is before the house.

In any event, I would point out with respect to the high expenditures of the drug industry on selling and advertising, this has been of great concern to the Canadian medical association. At its annual meeting last year the Canadian medical association received a report from one of its committees, I believe the committee on pharmacy, and this report referred to the excessive charges of the pharmaceutical manufacturing industry. The committee on pharmacy of the Canadian medical association was of the opinion that far too much expenditure was being made by the pharmaceutical industry, in selling, in promotional advertising and in gimmicks such as recordings and the like with a nursery rhyme on one side and a plug for one particular brand of pharmaceutical on the other. All of the other costs such as reproduction of oil paintings, paper weights, pencils, knives, office material and the like are considered by many members of the medical profession and by the association to contribute toward the high cost of drugs and to constitute one of the main reasons why high prices are charged to the consumers.

With reference to the expenditures on research, I should like to refer to a document which is in the public domain. It is published by the federal trade commission of the United States. I refer to the economic report on antibiotics manufacture. I would point out that in substance there is no difference whatsoever between the federal trade commission report in the United States in so far as its connection with companies and the like are concerned and the particular document to which I referred and which you ruled, Mr. Chairman, I could not use. This is precisely the same kind of document. Apparently in the United States it is O.K. to have these things made public but we want to be a bit more secretive in Canada.

Let us look at the expenditures on selling and advertising of some of the companies mentioned. Company No. 1 spent 8.1 per cent on research. The committee will remember that earlier I said it spent 26.4 per cent on selling and advertising. It spent three times as much on selling and advertising as it did on research. Company No. 2 spent 3.9 per cent on research and 24 per cent on selling and advertising. In other words, the amount of money spent on selling and advertising was more than six times the amount spent on research. For company No. 3 the information is not available. Company No. 4 spent 7.9 per cent on research compared with 28.1 per cent on selling and advertising. Over three times as much was spent on promotional gimmicks and through expense accounts and so on as was spent on research.

Mr. Skoreyko: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. member agree that a great deal of the cost of selling and advertising is absorbed by the wages of salesmen?

Mr. Howard: What my friend is now doing is asking me to refer to a document to which I am prohibited from making reference. My information is taken from the report of the federal trade commission and all I can say is that there is no differentiation made between salesmen's wages and so on. It is all lumped together as selling and advertising, and I am not able to answer that question by referring to this document. If you would agree to reverse your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and allow me to refer to this other document, I could give that information without any difficulty.

What is the picture in Canada? The picture in Canada is that in the main the pharmaceutical industry spends practically nothing on research. In company after company what is the percentage of the sales dollar that is spent on research? One per cent, 1½ per cent, 1¾ per cent. For the 27 companies I mentioned earlier an average of 1.21 per cent of the sales dollar is spent on research compared with approximately 25 per cent spent on selling and advertising.

They also claim that expenditure is necessary for what they call quality control to ensure that the consumer gets the best possible type of product, that the product is of the purest quality and the most efficacious in the treatment of the ailment for which it is prescribed. Again, the Canadian pharmaceutical industry spends in some instances three quarters of 1 per cent of the sales dollar on quality control. Some of the companies spend nothing on quality control. The average is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 1 per cent of the sales dollar which is spent on quality control. If I may quote again from the December 11, 1959, issue of the Ottawa Citizen, this is what Stanley Conder of the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers' association says is "a very, very costly proposition". Approximately 1 cent of the sales dollar goes into quality control to ensure that the public is protected and gets the purest drugs. One cent is spent to ensure the safety of the public while 25 cents is spent by the manufacturers to ensure that they bamboozle the doctors into remembering the particular brand name of a pharmaceutical.

There is another phase to this matter with respect to why this situation has come about. Hon. members will recall that I mentioned that our drug industry is controlled by the drug industry of the United States. The patent picture also shows that is the case. I should like to make reference to the patents held by the United States companies if I may. I have here an order for return which is referred to in Votes and Proceedings No. 30, page 195, for February 24, 1960. I had asked who held certain patents and there are 15 pages of information here. There is no need to go into them extensively. I would point out that in each and every instance the patents for the so-called wonder drugs or antibiotics are held by the parent companies in the United States regardless of whether or not they have Canadian subsidiaries. I note that Merck and Company, for instance, of Rahway, New Jersey, holds a total of 30 patents on the drug or pharmaceutical known as streptomycin. Charles Pfizer and Company of Brooklyn, New York, holds nine patents on the same drug. When it comes to tetracycline, one of the broad spectrum antibiotics and an important base for a lot of these drugs, Charles Pfizer and Company of Brooklyn holds nine patents, American Cyanamid of New York holds 18 patents, Bristol Laboratories of East Syracuse, New York, holds five patents, and so on.

All the way down the line, for pharmaceutical after pharmaceutical the control is concentrated in the hands of these companies in the United States. Because of patent control, which puts the company holding the patent in somewhat of a monopoly position, these companies are able to charge higher rates for their products than they normally would.

I should like to place on the record some figures giving a comparison of prices paid by the Department of Defence Production in purchases it has made with the prices that the consumer has to pay for the same drug. This information was given in answer to questions of mine during the last session of parliament. I do not have the return with me but it is easily obtainable by reference to the Journals of the house. I should like to give one or two examples of the cost to the Department of Defence Production compared with what the consumer has to pay.

At the top of the list there is a drug known as tyrothricin with benzocaine lozenges. The manufacturer is Merck, Sharpe and Dohme and the brand name under which the consumer buys the product is tyrozets. In October, 1959, the Department of Defence Production paid 22 cents per vial of 12 for these lozenges while the cost to the consumer was $1, or almost five times as much. The difference between the retail price and the price paid by the Department of Defence Production for this same pharmaceutical or drug is 454.5 per cent at the retail level and 272.7 per cent at the wholesale level.

You can go down the list and pick out others that are used regularly and which show precisely the same picture. Perhaps I might refer to one that has been in the news recently because of the activity of the food and drug directorate in issuing some suggestions about its possible misuse. I refer to a drug called chloramphenicol. It is a Parke Davis preparation and its brand name is chloromycetin. In November, 1959, the Department of Defence Production purchased this product at a price of $11.25 for 100, 250 milligram tablets. The cost to the consumer for the same pharmaceutical was $56.70 per 100 tablets. This is a retail difference of 504 per cent or 302 per cent at the wholesale level.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to mention all of those that are shown here but I would point out that substantially the same picture is evident throughout. The difference ranges from 200 per cent to 400 per cent or 520 per cent.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What was the name of the drug to which the hon. member just referred?

Mr. Howard: Chloromycetin.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How do you spell it?

Mr. Howard: C-h-l-o-r-o-m-y-c-e-t-i-n.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am sorry; I thought the hon. member said something else.

Mr. Howard: The nomenclature is a little bit difficult for a layman to get his tongue around sometimes, and it may have sounded like something else.

Here is another example I point out in order to show that there are differences in price and that it is possible to sell these pharmaceuticals at a lower price. If I may, I want to refer to the federal trade commission economic report on antibiotics manufacture of 1958. At page 192 there is a table headed: "Broad Spectrum Antibiotic Prices—16 250-milligram capsules". These are of the same class of drugs. I think this is an important table to which to refer, Mr. Chairman, in so far as the United States is concerned. As I said, because of their corporate control and their patent control the Canadian picture is influenced to a great extent or perhaps almost exclusively by the picture of these companies in the United States.

At September 27, 1951, according to the reference here, a drug called terramycin was sold in the United States to the retailer at the price of $5.10 for 16 capsules and was sold to the consumer at the price of $8.50 for 16 capsules and that situation continued from then on in October, 1951; November, 1953; April, 1954; September, 1954; October, 1954; December, 1955; and December, 1956. It is shown during those same months to which I have just referred that other similar types of broad spectrum antibiotics entered the market at exactly the same price or were sold to the retailer at $5.10 and at $8.50 to the consumer. The report lists these drugs by their names. I think the conclusion to which we can come is that since September 27, 1951, the price range has not varied one penny even though there have been tremendous increases in sales of this type of antibiotics Even though other companies entered the field with the same sort of antibiotic under a different brand name, they entered the market at the same price that was established as of September 27, 1951. This will lead one to believe that there is relatively little room for price differentials or competition to take place at least in the broad spectrum antibiotic field. I think all this leads us to assess what this means in terms of a consumer in Canada. How about the individual who has a prescription in his hands and walks into the drug store? How is he concerned or how is he affected by the activities of the drug industry?

I wanted to be able to put into the record a bit more information in this particular field so it would not appear that it was in bad taste, as the minister said. However, I am now prevented from doing that and attempting to balance the picture out, even though I think the document I have here is not the one to which the minister referred. The names are certainly different on it. But in any event, I am prevented from doing that, Mr. Chairman. Nevertheless I think there are certain conclusions that can be drawn in a general way. I think this is advantageous because this matter requires some public discussion, in my opinion; and the more public discussion there is about it, the more possibility I believe there is of drug prices declining. Some newspapers in the country have conducted surveys in this regard, and with respect to some types or classes of pharmaceuticals in the ethical pharmaceutical industry there have been reductions in prices within the last year and a half or two years, whereas for some considerable time previously there were no reductions in prices. I found this statement to be substantiated by having talked with two separate individuals who are pharmacists and whom I know. They also pointed out that they have noticed this fact in the various price lists they get from time to time from the pharmaceutical concerns, namely that in the last year and a half or thereabouts, so far as some drugs are concerned, there has been a decline in the price charged by the manufacturer.

I am sure that this is to a large extent the result of the activities of the Kefauver committee in the United States and the publicity that has been attached to the inquiry that has been conducted in Canada by the combines investigation branch, and the attendant publicity that was given to some of the material contained in that particular statement of evidence.

I think my time is running short at the moment. Rather than proceed to deal with my conclusions drawn from the information I have been able to obtain, perhaps I should leave my remarks stand there at the moment. There may be another opportunity, following the comments of other members who are interested in this field or a statement by the minister, for me to rise and draw some conclusions from some of the things that have been said.

Mr. Peters: As I listened to the discussion on this item I have been wondering whether there is not something wrong having regard to the delay over a long period of time that has taken place with regard to the investigation into the drug industry, as with a number of other investigations. The one into the drug industry has been of more than three years' duration now and we have not yet reached the point at which there is available a report which would give some factual knowledge to the general public of what is going to be done in this particular field.

Discounting the one advantageous thing that has come from the investigation, it would seem to me that there are many disadvantages attached to such prolonged discussions in this particular field. The one advantage, of course, has been mentioned by the hon. member for Skeena. It lies in the fact that there has not been any major increase in drug costs over the period of the investigation and that the field has been relatively stable over that period of time.

It is also a fact that many segments of our population have been and are plagued with what they consider to be abnormally high drug prices or costs. Many of the drugs that the old age pensioners receive are a positive necessity to them. They are not just drugs they may like to have such as antihystamine and other extremely expensive drugs that we sometimes take for colds. After you have taken them you wonder whether you have not thrown your money down the drain and whether the cold might not have been cured if you had not taken them. Many of the drugs that old age pensioners have to take are expensive. Some advantage would accrue if the investigation report had been available and had pointed out the weaknesses in our administration of drug prices and I am sure would have recommended some reduction to the people who are dependent of these drugs. As the minister has pointed out, the inquiry has not proceeded to the extent that any suggestions can be made by his department. However, I think some suggestions can be made by the average citizen.

In this connection I think consideration of these prices is a matter of government responsibility and the government could give assistance in this regard. In some cases the government could manufacture certain types of drugs and thereby greatly reduce their price. I am thinking of such drugs as those which are necessary for prolonging life, insulin, blood-clotting drugs, drugs that are used in the treatment of arthritis and rheumatism, and so on. In this connection I include cortisone and those vaccines which are proving effective at the present time; Salk vaccine and others. Many of these drugs could probably be manufactured under government auspices, and certainly in some cases under government licence. This would make it unnecessary to spend 25 per cent or 30 per cent of their total cost on advertising and promotion.

There are not very many people who have not at some time gone to a doctor and seen the elaborate promotional schemes that are used by some of the drug companies; the fancy containers that the drugs are packed in; the effort that is used to boost the sales of a particular company's drug over that of a competitor.

Drugs which are essential to life itself could, in my opinion, quite easily be manufactured either under government licence or by a government agency. This would eliminate the necessity of high advertising and promotional costs which raise the price of drugs by 25 per cent or 30 per cent.

It is true that there is some competition in drugs. I received a letter from an old age pensioner the other day. He is taking a patented drug. I am not sure of its name; I have never heard of it before. In pricing it around town he found the price ranged from 35 cents to $1.25. He is an old age pensioner; it is necessary for him to have this drug and he must buy it as cheaply as possible because his pension is not very large.

I wonder whether there is not a little profiteering on the part of some of the retail outlets for some of these drugs, in view of the fact that a drug can range in price from a low of 35 cents at a chain drug store to a high of $1.25 at another drug store.

I should like to point out that it may well be the department is much too slow in making these reports public. Those conducting the inquiry are much too slow in making a final report. There should be an interim report, which would offer some assistance in relation to the price of drugs at the present time. After an interim report had been made, the matter could be studied further. In other fields we have interim reports which refer to specific matters and I think this is one field in which this could be done, particularly in regard to those drugs that are essential to life itself.

I make these suggestions, Mr. Chairman, in light of the fact that I have received letters from many of my constituents condemning the high prices they pay for drugs, and the fact that with the very limited amount of money which they receive, old age pensioners, for example, cannot really afford these high price drugs. For this reason I think consideration should be given to this aspect of the problem. The research director has given consideration to this matter and may now be in a position to report on it. I think the situation warrants a report in the very near future in order that something may be done, if only in a limited field.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I have been a little reluctant to be drawn in, as it were, as third man in this combination which has reminded me of the old combination of Tinker to Evans to Chance. In this case it has been from Skeena to Timiskaming and back to Skeena again.

However, I think I should make a few comments, if only for the purpose of pointing out that at this stage there is nothing I can say about this drug inquiry for reasons which I indicated in the course of the discussion of the point of order.

The matter has been looked into by the director. A lengthy document has been presented by him to the commission and the matter is now before the commission for hearing. Not only, then, is it improper for me to discuss anything which is contained in the director's statement of material, but I think it would be untimely for us to make a decision now and for me to attempt to tell the committee what conclusions the government has arrived at and what it intends to do, because we are not yet in possession of the report which will ultimately be provided to us in accordance with the provisions of the act. I refer to the report of the commission. This report will be provided when all the inquiries and hearings have been concluded.

At that time I hope and expect we will receive a report that will be helpful, based on the complete study which the act contemplates, and not on a partial consideration, which is all we have before us at the present time. We naturally would be expected to look into the matter in the meantime and I can assure the committee that this is being done, to see if there emerges from what is now available anything that really indicates that something could be done in the federal field without waiting for a further report.

There may be one or two particular aspects where the results of our consideration may suggest courses of action, but these, I submit, would be of an interim nature. Before it would be sensible for us to make up our minds as to the comprehensive action we should take, surely we should wait until we receive the over-all report which covers the whole field.

Certainly these inquiries take a long time. I am not happy about this; no one is happy about it, but they are pressed with all dispatch in the light of other work and other inquiries which come before both the director and the commission. I have not in my possession the information as to the actual length of time taken by the F.T.C. study in the United States, but it is my impression that it was a lengthy study. Certainly the committee in the United States of which Senator Kefauver is head has been working for at least two years and there has been as yet no full report. Indeed, I understand that in the United States nothing by way of executive action has emerged even as yet from the F.T.C. report, with the exception, I believe, of one prosecution in connection with Salk vaccine.

As will be appreciated, the situation in this country with respect to Salk vaccine is not at all the same as it is in the United States. The prices of Salk vaccine are pretty well controlled by the fact that the Connaught laboratory is at least the prime mover in the field although it does not actually control the whole field.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the institute of microbiology of Montreal.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend from Essex East reminds me that the institute of microbiology of Montreal is also engaged in that field. I say this not in the way of boasting of the fact that these inquiries take this long, but simply to ask hon. members to realize that a proper sense of proportion suggests that inquiries of this kind in other countries as well as in Canada are necessarily time consuming, and even after they are concluded it is not possible to take startling and widespread action in a matter of days or weeks. We shall, however, be looking forward with interest to the report of the commission, at which time we shall be able to ascertain what action it is proper to take to deal with whatever problem is outlined in the over-all field and, I repeat, if in the interim a study of the material now available enables me to make any useful recommendation to my colleagues as to what could be done on an interim basis I shall do that, and I have arranged that the material should be studied, from that point of view. This study is going on now.

Mr. Howard: Before this item carries, may I say I can appreciate that these matters do take a considerable period of time to examine and study. Perhaps other hon. members will now appreciate why it sometimes takes a long time to talk about this in the House of Commons.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder if the hon. member will permit a question. In a house with a present membership of 261, does he realize that on Thursday and Friday of this week he occupied approximately 25 per cent of the time spent examining the estimates of the Department of Justice, and perhaps he has been doing the same today? I wonder if he thinks that is fair to the other members of the committee?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I am not rising now to defend the hon. member for Skeena or to confirm the validity of the things he has said over the past two days, though I do not quarrel with him on what he has been discussing now. But I do strongly take the position that it is not in order for an hon. member, and particularly a minister of the crown, to rise and complain about the length of time taken by a member of parliament in discussing the items brought before this committee. If any hon. member wants to catch your eye, Mr. Chairman, he has that privilege and he will catch your eye. This is certainly an indication of the growing arrogance of this government—

Mr. Churchill: Steady, now. Hold yourself to the point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —when one of its ministers rises to complain about the participation in the debate by a private member of this house.

An hon. Member: He only asked a question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member against whom the complaint has been made does not belong to my party, but I believe so strongly in the value of this house that I would fight for the rights of any member, including private members supporting the government, and for the minister to complain because an hon. member has discharged his responsibility as he sees it, is, I contend, an indication of the increased arrogance of a government which is growing in public disfavour.

Mr. Churchill: That is a lot of nonsense. I was making no complaint about the hon. member exercising his right to speak. I was speaking on behalf of the other members of this committee who should have the opportunity to take part in a discussion of the estimates of this department.

Mr. Howard: Yes. I cannot help it if the minister's supporters are hesitant and bashful in approaching these matters and if they do not want to engage in an examination of the workings of the department. If the minister wants to have a bunch of silent Sams or rubber stamps behind him, that is for him to decide.

An hon. Member: There are no rubber stamps behind the minister.

Mr. Howard: What did the Prime Minister say the other day about inveterate babblers? In any event it applies to the hon. member for Saskatoon, I can say that.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): On a point of order, I think the hon. member should withdraw the statement that we are a bunch of rubber stamps. It is not true.

Mr. Howard: I think that there is a certain amount of special concern attaching to the activities of the retail pharmacists within the pharmaceutical industry. The retail pharmacists are, of course, subjected to the largest degree of complaint by the general public, a great deal of which is unjustified. This arises because the retail pharmacist is the individual with whom the consumer deals.

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order I do not believe retail pharmacists come within the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Howard: Where have you been all day?

Mr. Speakman: I have been here longer than you have.

An hon. Member: You have not.

Mr. Howard: I say that this complaint is registered against the retail pharmacists because they are the individuals with whom the consumer deals. He sees his fifteen or twenty dollars passed across the counter, in exchange for which he gets a small bottle or vial of tablets or cream or lotion. There is an activity in the retail field which does, I think, give rise to concern and contributes to the high cost of drugs. I should like to cite two examples. I refer, first, to a prescription which was given for aspirin, ordinary aspirin which anyone can buy. The purchase price of aspirin on this prescription, which was supplied here in Ottawa, was 50 cents. Without a prescription aspirin costs 32 cents. This is an indication of the effect of what is known as a prescription fee within the pharmaceutical industry. I have been told by others of an instance in which some tablets were sold by prescription at $1.15 a dozen, or a total cost of $9.90 a hundred. When sold by the hundred without prescription, because they are not an ethical drug, the selling price is $1.85. This represents a difference of some $8.00 and indicates another contributing factor to the high cost of drugs in this country.

In addition to that there is, of course, an 11 per cent sales tax on drugs, and on some items a tariff is applicable also. I think in essence we can say that in relation to the sale of drugs in Canada patents have been and are being used to create monopolistic situations which Canadian law appears to have been designed to prevent and the control exercised over the manufacture, distribution and sale of certain drugs through patents has virtually eliminated price competition in respect to these drugs and has encouraged other forms of competition. These, while possibly bringing other benefits to the public have resulted in prices being increased rather than decreased. Practices which are quite legal and unobjectionable in themselves—promotion, use of trade names and the like—appear to have been carried to extremes because of the insulation of certain sectors of the industry from price competition by reason of the control exercised through patents.

As is indicated below, the effects of the control exercised through patents affect the prices of certain drugs only. On the other hand, the practices of retail druggists affect the prices of all products sold in drug stores. These practices have resulted in the virtual elimination of price competition at the retail level.

Prices of drugs in Canada are among the highest in the world. These prices tend to reflect current prices of the same or comparative drug products in the United States, but because of the sales tax applicable in Canada prices to consumers in Canada are about 11 per cent higher.

The general information that we have indicates that prices of proprietary drug products are not unduly high in any sense, and I refer to those that are not included in the ethical drug field. Also, an established brand which has wide public acceptance is normally sold at a premium price. There are numerous substitutes available, and the consumer has a wide choice of products at various price levels. It is obvious that, because of considerations of health and personal well being, brand name product preference is likely to be more important in cases of proprietary drug products, than in the case of other merchandise.

In the case of standard, widely available ethical drugs, the situation is much the same. Brand preference is somewhat more important, and products of long established ethical drug firms, which enjoy a high reputation for the quality of their products, are able to command premium prices. There are practical limits to the amount of the premium which can be charged. The history of the industry indicates that once a drug becomes generally available to manufacturers, numerous alternative products are offered and prices tend to fall until they reflect only a modest mark-up over actual cost of production. As a drug becomes widely available, manufacturers usually stop promoting it aggressively and concentrate on promoting their more exclusive lines. This reduces the general costs of sale and distribution of the particular drug.

Regardless of what conclusions may be reached in respect of such matters, the fact which makes high prices possible is the patent control exercise over such drug. The clear intention of the special provisions of the canadian patent law, is that this situation should not obtain. However, advantage has not been taken of these provisions, and the drug industry in Canada is, for all practical purposes, operating under conditions determined by the patent law of the United States.

Patent controlled drugs are imported into Canada by a few small firms, other than United States companies, generally classified as foreign, without any licence arrangements with the Canadian patent holders. The basic fact is, that such importations are made, and that importing firms offer dosage forms of such drugs at lower prices than the equivalent products offered by the patent holders.

To date, the availability of such products does not appear to have had any significant effect on the prices charged by the firm holding patents, except to a very limited extent in the case of some institutional buyers. This is due to a controversy which has raged and continues to rage about the quality of the imported products, and the products of small firms. Until doctors generally are satisfied as to the quality of such products, their impact on the market and on the prices of established brand name products will continue to be slight. This situation, of course, would be entirely different if such drugs were available to all manufacturers.

Mr. Clancy: Would the hon. member tell me the difference between generic and brand name drugs?

Mr. Howard: I did not understand the question.

Mr. Clancy: What is the difference between generic and brand name drugs?

Mr. Howard: There is no difference.

Mr. Clancy: Forget the malarkey, and tell me what the difference is.

Mr. Howard: As I said before, there is no difference between a generic and brand name drug, in so far as the drug itself is concerned. It is simply the same as one person calling a box of material Rinso, while someone else calls it soap flakes.

Mr. Clancy: That is the worst malarkey I have ever heard in this house. The hon. member does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the reference to soap came to my mind when the hon. member rose to ask me a question.

Mr. Clancy: All this C.C.F. malarkey is the same. I asked the hon. member a question, and he has not answered it.

Mr. Howard: You received your answer although you may not be able to appreciate or understand it.

Mr. Clancy: I appreciated it.

Mr. Howard: If you wish me to go further I shall.

Mr. Clancy: Just tell me what the difference is.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. The hon. member for Skeena has the floor, and until he yields it for a question by sitting down, I ask the hon. member for Yorkton to remain in his place.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could use another example to illustrate the difference, using a product for which the hon. member may have use later on. One brand name of a product is Bayer aspirin, and the generic name is acetylsalicylic acid. They are the same thing, but one is the generic term and the other the brand name.

Mr. Clancy: How many grains are there in an aspirin? How many grains are there in a Bayer aspirin?

Mr. Peters: There are no grains at all, there is acetylsalicylic acid.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order.

Mr. Howard: Now that the hon. and noisy member has gone behind the curtains, perhaps I can proceed.

Mr. Clancy: I am back.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that the hon. member will need a whole box of aspirins, or perhaps one of the more powerful chemicals, tomorrow morning.

As I said, there is very little price competition at the retail level, and that which does exists is chiefly in respect of proprietary and sundry drug products; tooth paste, and things of that nature. Apart from a very few discount drug outlets, most Canadian drugs stores sell their ethical drug products—drugs on prescriptions—at the manufacturers' suggested resale price, as a matter of course. This appears to be due firstly to the practice of the manufacturers in basing all trade prices on the listed or suggested resale price, and the acceptance of this price by pharmacists as the only proper selling price. Second, this is due to the pressure exerted by certain pharmacists' associations and their members to maintain certain price levels.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go further in this discussion, but I think what I have said sums up what I have said on previous occasions in respect of this item, as well as what I said during the last session in respect of an item in the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I feel the comments and conclusions which I have presented fairly well meet the conclusions arrived at by the director of the combines investigation branch following extensive research and investigation into this particular field. I suggest also that, to the extent it is possible to analyse the wealth of material that was presented to the Kefauver committee, similar conclusions were reached by that committee in respect of this situation, except with reference to the control by patents and sales tax regarding comparable prices paid to importers.

I feel similar conclusions were also arrived at by the United States federal trade commission as contained in the report of that commission, to which I referred earlier. I do not have that report now, as I gave it to Hansard and it has not been returned.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I express the hope that an inquiry into this very important field will not be delayed, but will be undertaken with the greatest dispatch. I understand the combines investigation branch, and the restrictive trade practices commission, will deal only with selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of certain types of drugs. These were the words used in the annual report by the director of research and investigation, but not the words which appear in the document which I was prevented from reading a while ago.

But this is only one phase of the drug industry, Mr. Chairman. I think the minister and his colleagues should take this under consideration and advisement and also take some steps to deal with it. There is ample room for additional study in some other related fields, for instance, in the field of the physiological and psychological effect upon an individual who may be taking certain of the so-called tranquillizers. What about the medical effect on him? This is something which is not thoroughly understood by doctors themselves. They are discovering new things as each day goes by.

These are questions which have been raised by eminent people in the medical profession and by writers in this particular field. What about the effect on the individual of the so-called multiple vitamins? They take a number of them and put them together. What about the effect on the individual of the maxing up of different types of drugs into one tablet? These are things which I appreciate come more directly under the Department of National Health and Welfare, as well as the question of the ethical drug industry advertising directly to doctors. I think this is something that I can mention in passing because it has a relationship with the drug industry.

As I understood the minister earlier, he said that they were keeping this matter under review to see what possible action could be taken after studying the statement of evidence, or whatever it is called. The minister works very closely with the Minister of National Health and Welfare on the question of narcotic drugs and their effect and in the prosecution of offenders, together with the treatment of people who are addicted. As I say, this is another field in which the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Health and Welfare can work together very well. They should look into the activities of the drug industry from all points of view and their effect upon the consumer, the medical profession and illnesses. I submit that not only are the selling and pricing policies of immediate concern but the question of advertising of the ethical industry directly to doctors, and the question of the physiological and psychological effects of compounded drugs and new drugs on the individual who takes them.

Perhaps I should close my remarks on this particular phase of the matter and make just one more comment about another subject at the risk of incurring the wrath of the Minister of Veterans Affairs but I think I must do this.

Mr. Churchill: Give some other members a chance.

Mr. Howard: Recently there has been a fair amount of publicity attached to activities of certain companies in the province of Quebec. While I think this is a sort of minor part of it all—I do not wish to play up what is taking place on the political scene in Quebec—yet it is from a certain activity there that this information comes. I think there is ample material for investigation or study by the combines branch to see just what is going on.

Evidence was presented to the royal commission in Quebec to the effect, for argument's sake, that Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation was paying a rake-off or a kick-back of $10 on a ton of steel. I am not concerned at this time about who got the money or whether it was illegal to pay kick-backs and so on, but I am concerned with the question of kick-backs. Dosco has been prosecuted and fined once already for price-fixing under the Combines Investigation Act, along with Stelco and one or two other companies, that had subsidiary companies. As I say, this is a company which has been prosecuted and fined on one occasion for price-fixing. I wonder whether the combines investigation branch should look very carefully into whether kick-backs or rake-offs of $10 a ton, as it is said Dosco paid, have been used to enhance the position of Dosco within the industry and to ensure that price competition did not have its full play? This is something which I think should be inquired into very carefully.

There are certain other things from the corporate moral point of view that we should look at. I am wondering whether it is morally correct for Dominion Steel and Coal Company to receive subsidies from the federal treasury and then take part of those subsidies and channel them back into the Union Nationale party coffers in another province?

As I say, this is another matter which perhaps is not of concern here. There is also attached to it the question of whether these rake-offs are really a charge against the operations of the company and are reflected in less income tax being paid into the federal treasury. Armco Drainage and Metal Products of Canada Limited is another company that has been mentioned as paying phony commissions or rake-offs to the extent of $1,200. We must remember that Armco Drainage and Metal Products of Canada Limited is another company that was prosecuted and fined under the Combines Investigation Act not so long ago. Brandram-Henderson is another company that was mentioned. The reference there was that this company was paying phony commissions of $1.50 a gallon on luminous paint for sidewalk and street markings, and so on. The combines branch has an obligation to look into this question of rake-offs or kick-backs or the paying of phony commissions in order to get certain contracts from the provincial government of Quebec. There should be an inquiry to learn whether the payment of these phony salesmen's commissions or kick-backs, or whatever you want to call them, was not in fact a device used to limit or prevent competition and to ensure that the companies mentioned and others who were involved in this were not using it as a means to get into a monopolistic position and eliminate competition in that particular field.

The other day the minister said he did not want to get involved in the political picture in Quebec. From the point of view of the activities of the Combines Investigation Act I think this is something which requires very serious study and investigation, and I am sure the minister will bring these comments to the attention of the director if he himself has not already noticed these things in the press and undertaken some preliminary inquiry.

173. Bankruptcy Act administration, $118,770.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to say a few words on this item which has to do with the administration of the Bankruptcy Act. I am inclined to do it owing to an experience of some years ago. I became very interested in the administration of the Bankruptcy Act and even at that time I was convinced that there was room for a great deal of improvement to protect creditors of the companies going into bankruptcy. As a matter of fact, at the request of a number of creditors at a creditors meeting I was appointed a special inspector to deal with certain aspects of bankruptcy because I had some knowledge of the physical assets and circumstances surrounding the bankruptcy of the company. I must say that it was that experience over a period of two or three years that caused me to become quite interested in the administration of the act and aware of the necessity for some improvements and amendments in the administration. I am not going to deal with the circumstances of that day but I am particularly inclined to raise the question again because of a rash of bankruptcies that occurred in the southeastern portion of British Columbia, particularly since world war II.

Bankruptcies in the lumbering industry have taken place under very suspicious circumstances. Generally speaking the companies were owned by United States citizens who operated in southeastern British Columbia, particularly in the Kootenays, for a period of one, two, three or four years and then went bankrupt. The owners or managers disappeared across the line and the merchants and other persons who were involved were, in ordinary language, left holding the bag. Mind you, this occurred repeatedly during the period when the forest industry was particularly flourishing. There did not seem to be much reason for this succession of bankruptcies, in one case repeated on three occasions by one man who at the present time is the owner of a company of considerable size south of the line.

I have made reference to this matter previously this session. In particular, I have referred to the bankruptcy of the Hilco Company Limited near Fruitvale which went bankrupt late last year. The owners disappeared across the line and in fact it was quite difficult to proceed with the bankruptcy and to ascertain who was responsible for the company later. Merchants and ordinary workmen were left holding the sack with very little knowledge of their rights and the responsibilities of officials and so on.

I have knowledge of the circumstances surrounding this case because I attended a meeting of the creditors. I did not do so because it was my personal responsibility. I was invited to attend the meeting because I had had some previous experience and had had a somewhat limited experience in the lumber industry. These people considered that I knew a little more about such matters than the average creditor involved. I attended with the idea of listening to the story of the creditors as to the circumstances surrounding this bankruptcy. This again leads me to believe that there must be amendments to the act to provide creditors with at least a rudimentary knowledge of the law—I am not suggesting that creditors can become as skilled in law as lawyers are—the responsibilities of the officers of the crown in administering the Bankruptcy Act, the sequence of procedures in administering the act and their rights in these matters.

I mentioned this matter briefly at the beginning of the session and the commercial attache to the United States embassy read my remarks in Hansard and very kindly telephoned me and told me they were very concerned about the information I had placed on the record. Later he came to my office and I discussed the circumstances with him and gave him the balance sheet and the other information that had been given to me. He undertook to see that an investigation would be carried out in the United States and an investigation was in fact carried out in that country as to the operations of this company in the United States and in Canada. I am not going into the details. I have a letter here dealing with that. I can say that the report I received from this gentleman is not a credit to the company concerned.

That leads me to believe that there has to be some amendment to the act with respect to circumstances of this type where the owner has disappeared across the line. The minister will have an idea where the Lardeau district is because he likes to visit a beautiful district on occasion. I remember one case where a company had operated there for some months. The owner was able to get the men to work without wages for two months with the idea that he wanted to increase his capital so that he could expand. The company was shipping lumber to Nelson from where it went south on the Great Northern to the international boundary.

These men worked Saturdays and Sundays in an effort to assist the owner, but when the last trainload of lumber went out by rail and then by barge the owner went with it. He told the men that he would be back on Wednesday, that he had enough lumber now to get credit at the bank in order to be able to pay them. They waited until Wednesday and nothing happened. They waited until the following Saturday and then they began to make inquiries. The owner had this trainload of lumber shipped from Nelson over the Great Northern into the United States, and that was the last the men ever heard of it.

That circumstance has been repeated on a number of occasions in different forms. That is why I am particularly interested in amendments to the Bankruptcy Act, and if I heard the minister correctly yesterday I understood him to say that the department is giving consideration to amending the act. These repeated bankruptcies clearly indicate that some shady business goes on at times and that worthy creditors and workmen are not adequately protected. I wrote later to the superintendent of bankruptcy and received a letter from him in reply. He was quite concerned about this matter and I should like to quote part of his letter dated April 21, 1961. He said:

> I have your letter of the 13th instant and enclosure the contents of which are noted. However, unfortunately, the Bankruptcy Act as now constituted does not seem to contain a remedy and I must confess that the solution is not immediately apparent. Should you have any suggestions, I shall be only too pleased to receive them and to give them due and proper consideration in conjunction with a study of the present provisions.

I frankly admit that I am not a lawyer and my suggestions are simply made on the basis of the experience of a layman with a number of these cases. I suggest that amendments are required to protect the public and creditors to a greater extent than is provided in the present act. I suggest that amendments are required to provide more severe penalties to restrain dishonest persons to a greater extent.

I suggest that in the administration of the act there is a necessity for permanent regional officers so that people will know where to go and so that someone will be available whose sole duty it is to administer the Bankruptcy Act in a certain area with a knowledge of the law.

I suggest that action be taken to provide that the minutes of creditors' meetings should not just be entered as minutes but that a stenographic report should be made by a court stenographer so that there will be an accurate record of the questions and answers. I also suggest that there should be something in the nature of an information booklet to give creditors of companies going into bankruptcy some general information as to how to proceed.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: My final suggestion, and I will not be long—heavens above, I have sat here in patience for two days and I am trying to conclude in a few minutes. If it were not for the time factor and my sympathy for the minister I could go on at much greater length. My final suggestion is that there should be amendments to provide for situations where a person who goes into bankruptcy goes across the line and is out of reach of the creditors. I noticed in the Canada Gazette recently the reappointment of the trustees in bankruptcy and there is one omission. There are no trustees appointed for the Kootenay district, east or west. In view of our history in this respect and the need for a trustee, I suggest that until the law is amended the minister give consideration to the appointment of a trustee in the Kootenay district to serve that area. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Fulton: I want to thank the hon. member for his remarks and tell him that we will give consideration to the points he has raised.

I appreciate that it is after six o'clock but I wonder whether the committee might agree to carry items 173 and 174 so that we could start with the penitentiaries branch the next time these estimates are before the committee.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall vote 173 carry?

Mr. Caron: No, it is after six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Benidickson: Would the leader of the house indicate perhaps a little more fully than he did last night the likely business for Monday and Tuesday of next week?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned before, the first item on Monday will be Bill No. C-92, an act to amend the Criminal Code. That will be followed by item No. 7 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. C-97, an act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. The third item will be No. 11 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice pertaining to the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act.

If these three items are finished we will then take item No. 3 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-77 dealing with agricultural development. The fifth item will be No. 2 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-93, to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act. If the house is in a very co-operative mood on Monday and wants to proceed with the business expeditiously, we can take item No. 10 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealing with the Export Credits Insurance Act.

The order in which I have announced these items will stand without change for the first three of which the Minister of Justice is in charge. If I have to make a change with respect to Nos. 4 and 5 I will let the house know at the beginning of the sitting on Monday.

It being seven minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

ANNOUNCEMENT OF COMMONWEALTH TECHNICAL TRAINING WEEK

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with leave of the house I should like to make a statement on commonwealth technical training week, which begins today. The idea of holding a special week to focus attention on the importance of education and training, particularly the technical form of training, originated with His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. This week is being observed simultaneously in Great Britain and many other countries of the commonwealth.

As a first step in arranging for this week, I consulted with the premiers of the provinces, and early this year I called a meeting in Ottawa which was attended by representatives of the federal and provincial governments, labour, management, and a number of national organizations. The idea received complete endorsement.

At the national meeting, five broad objectives for a commonwealth technical training week were adopted. The first is to try to create more public awareness of the excellent career opportunities which exist in the technical and vocational fields. There is still, among an ever decreasing minority, I am glad to say, a tendency in this country to think of the "white collar" occupations as being more desirable, even though many of them demand less education and training than do many of the skilled and technical jobs. We must give the technical and vocational careers their proper place of importance.

The second objective is to stimulate more apprenticeship and other in-plant training programs. There are not enough programs of this kind now in existence, although where they are they have proved their worth both in Canada and other countries.

The third objective is to convince young people of the necessity of planning a career and of staying in school until graduation, seeking training which will fit them for the modern demands of advanced technology. Present rates of drop-outs from school reveal that 70 per cent of students entering grade 11 of elementary school will have left before they get their junior matriculation. This is a serious matter when viewed in relation to the widespread reduction, since world war II, of unskilled and semi-skilled occupations through the introduction of more and better machines and more efficient methods.

The fourth objective is to encourage adults to upgrade their skills and increase their education, and to stimulate the establishment of more adult education and training programs. There is a reluctance on the part of adults to take advantage of available facilities, as illustrated by the fact that less than 5 per cent of unemployed persons apply for the training in programs operated in a number of the provinces.

The fifth objective of the week is to bring together industry and the schools so there can be a greater understanding of each other's needs. The rapidly changing pattern of employment and occupations makes it essential that industry and the schools develop closer co-operation so that more courses can be vocationally oriented.

All these broad objectives, I realize, cannot be reached during one short week; but if public attention is drawn to them, and more people in positions of leadership at all levels, national, provincial and municipal, become aware of the need for positive planning and action to reach these objectives, then this commonwealth technical training week will have been worth while.

It was agreed at the federal-provincial planning meeting that each province would organize the observance of the week within its own jurisdiction. The federal government will provide assistance in the way of pamphlets and posters for the schools, along with film material for the schools and television, as well as generally assisting in organizing some national publicity for the objectives of the week.

All these plans give full respect to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in respect to education. This has been worked out, and each province has organized a variety of methods for bringing attention to the objectives of the week. Special pamphlets are being distributed through the secondary schools to each student to point out the need for young people remaining in school to get as much education and training as possible before seeking their first job. It is expected that the fundamental message, namely the need of action will be carried to young people and their parents. Through the co-operation of press, radio and television, I hope the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. will join me in approval of what is being done and what is being attempted this week not only in our own country but in the United Kingdom and in various countries of the commonwealth.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side are very happy to associate ourselves with the Prime Minister in what he has just said about the value of commonwealth technical training week. The importance of that week and the steps taken to publicize it in Canada have been made clear in a memorandum from the Minister of Labour, which I have before me, and by what the Prime Minister himself has said this morning. Also we can join the Prime Minister and others in expressing appreciation to the Duke of Edinburgh for the initiative he has taken in bringing about this important development.

It is a cliché, of course, Mr. Speaker, to say that we live in a technical and scientific age, but it is something that is very true, so it is necessary for technical education to keep abreast of the fantastic changes that have taken place both nationally and internationally. Perhaps it is also important to point out that while technical education is now more important than ever, and it is well for the federal government to associate with and assist the provinces in the development of technical education in every appropriate way, we can emphasize the importance of technical education without minimizing the importance of education in the humanities and in the social sciences; because it is also true that if we do not learn how to use for constructive purposes the machines we create, technical education itself may not be of any great value. The necessity for reconciliation of the two kinds of education was put in a striking way the other day by the head of the Carnegie Corporation in the United States when he said:

> We must have respect for both our plumbers and our philosophers, or neither our pipes nor our theories will hold water.

Commonwealth technical education week also reminds us that progress in such education has been uneven within the commonwealth. Therefore, those members, including Canada, which have been more fortunate in their development in this field can help and are helping other members of the commonwealth to make similar progress. This is a kind of mutual aid which can underline the meaningful character of the commonwealth association. In short, for domestic, commonwealth and international purposes it is important to give all the support we can to commonwealth technical training week. We on this side will be glad to support in any way we can the initiative and the work done by the government in this field.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I am pleased on behalf of this group to associate myself with the words of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in giving support to the commonwealth technical training week. I think we are becoming more and more aware of the fact that educational facilities require continuing change, and that the present unemployment situation and some of the things that have been learned from it demonstrate the great need at this time for increased skills for many of those who are out of work at the present time and require such training.

We are pleased that this is a commonwealth venture. We need such facilities and emphasis on such facilities in Canada, and they are also needed much more in other parts of the world. There is a challenge to the west today. There is a challenge to our educational system. Coupled with further improvements, we think this is a very good step to underline the need for further emphasis on technical training in Canada and in the other commonwealth nations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUDAN—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC APPOINTMENT

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on March 15, when I announced some diplomatic appointments, I expressed the hope that Canada would shortly be able to open diplomatic relations with the Sudan as part of a program of strengthening Canadian representation in Asia and Africa.

I am pleased to announce that the government of the Sudan has agreed to accept a Canadian ambassador even though the Sudan government will not itself immediately be able to accredit an ambassador to Ottawa. Mr. R. A. D. Ford, who recently took up his appointment as Canadian ambassador to the United Arab Republic, will be concurrently accredited to the government of the Sudan.

The Sudan has close ties with both the Arab world and Africa south of the Sahara, and is becoming increasingly important in the United Nations. The appointment of a Canadian ambassador to that country reflects the importance which the Canadian government attaches to developments in Africa, and will encourage closer relations with one of that continent's most important countries.

DRUGS

On the order:

Introduction of bills—The Minister of National Health and Welfare—Bill intituled: An act to provide for the control of narcotic drugs.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare may I ask that the first item under introduction of bills, an act to provide for the control of narcotic drugs, be allowed to stand and that the second item be proceeded with.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF BARBITURATES

Hon. E. D. Fulton (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-99, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister give us an explanation?

Mr. Fulton: On behalf of my colleague I should explain to the house that the purpose of the bill is to provide a system of controls under which it will be possible to deal with the problem of barbiturates and other drugs commonly known as goof balls.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PURCHASE AND SALE OF SECURITIES BY MINISTER, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Financial Administration Act to permit the Minister of Finance to buy and to sell securities guaranteed by Canada as well as securities of Canada; to permit the governor in council to authorize the deletion from the accounts of debts due to Her Majesty not exceeding $1,000 and to also permit the treasury board to make regulations for the deletion from the accounts of small debts not exceeding $100, rather than $25 as at present; and to provide for further amendments in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

LABOUR DISPUTE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the decision by Trans-Canada Air Lines to disregard the safety and well-being of its passengers by taking action to replace its present stewardesses, hostesses and pursers with other personnel who will not be required to undergo medical or physical examination and who will be accepted from any large group regardless of whether or not they qualify as flight attendants.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member can tell me when the decision to which he refers was taken, or whether it has been taken.

Mr. Howard: Yes. The decision referred to, and which just came to my attention over the week end, was taken by way of a teletype directive to all T.C.A. stations, sent by Mr. H. W. Seagrim, the vice president, on May 17, the day before a conciliation board report on this matter was released by the Minister of Labour; and this recruitment of personnel along the line suggested in the motion is currently taking place.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this dispute is under collective bargaining procedures and meetings were held last Thursday and Friday. I have no word that they have been discontinued. I feel that any motion such as this would have an effect on the discussions that are at present under way.

Mr. Speaker: The definite matter of urgent public importance which the hon. member for Skeena wishes to have discussed under standing order 26, which involves the interruption of the normal course of business in order to discuss the matter, relates to a labour dispute between Trans-Canada Air Lines and some of its personnel, namely stewardesses, hostesses and pursers. It is put forward by the hon. member as a matter of the safety of passengers.

There are two aspects to the matter. One is the labour dispute, which undoubtedly is an important matter, as is that of the safety of passengers who travel by Trans-Canada Air Lines. The whole administration has been given to Trans-Canada Air Lines by parliament, and the management has the responsibility of continuing labour negotiations and assuring the safety of passengers.

It has been suggested that the decision interposes a matter of such urgency for debate that we should interrupt our proceedings. In view of the fact that this is a continuing labour dispute which, in so far as it is a matter of administrative responsibility, comes under the Department of Transport whose estimates have been before the house in the last 10 days—in fact as recently as last week, I believe—and will be before the house again, as I am advised that the first item has not yet been passed, it seems to me that unless the matter is of immediate urgency for discussion—that is, that it must be discussed today or within a day or two—urgency of debate does not arise.

Furthermore, I think we would be abusing the rule if we projected labour disputes into our discussions every time there was a difference of opinion in an important section of labour relations in the country. Those are not unusual in occurrence. If we invoked the rule for this kind of thing I think we might have to change the rule, because we would be talking about little else.

As to the other aspect, that of safety, in view of the record of administration I think it will bear waiting until the hon. member can raise the item on the estimates. Therefore, with all respect to the hon. member, I do not think we have here a matter that should be allowed to intervene under standing order 26.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, or to the Minister of Labour, or to both, asking whether they have received representations on behalf of the Canadian air line flight attendants association regarding action of the management of T.C.A. which they regard as being in violation of section 4 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. If so, what action is the government going to take with regard to these representations?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, such representations have not been brought to my personal attention. I will check in the department to see whether or not this has been brought to their attention, and I will report to the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. May I ask the Minister of Transport whether he has received a telegram from Robert R. Smeal on behalf of the Canadian air lines flight attendants association.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I received such a telegram this morning and I sent it to my colleague, the Minister of Labour, under whose jurisdiction such matters fall.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope we will have a reply before the day is over.

[Mr. Speaker.]

TRADE

FLOUR—REPORTED U.S. ACTION RESPECTING BIDS ON SALE TO CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of a press report that Canadian flour milling companies with United States affiliations have been forbidden to bid on contracts for the export of flour to China.

In view of the answer given by the Minister of Agriculture on Saturday last, that the question of permits being granted by the United States to such companies is no concern of ours, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is not the policy of the Canadian government that all corporations operating in Canada should follow Canadian policy and should operate in the best economic interests of this country, and whether or not he feels it is an impingement on our sovereignty if these companies—as it is claimed in the report—are forbidden to export flour to China.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the Prime Minister can deal with the matter without notice, and I of course do not wish to intervene, but the hon. member's question is largely hypothetical. He does not take responsibility for the report, he indicates that he does not know whether the point arises at all, and then asks a rather indefinite question.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think the accuracy of this has been rather well established by the answer from the Minister of Agriculture last Saturday, that the question of companies operating in Canada obtaining permits from the United States government is no concern of ours.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. Is it not the well known policy of the Canadian government that corporations operating in Canada should follow Canadian policy and should not have to go to the United States for permits to carry on export business with a country to which Canada is selling? I think the question is very much in order, and I thought the government had a policy on it.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member interjects gratuitous statements that have no foundation whatever. He starts off with a question and states he has no information in this regard—

Mr. Argue: Except the press statement and the minister's statement in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow me to continue. The hon. member has had two bites of the cherry so far and has not achieved anything. If the hon. gentleman had asked me at the beginning the question which he asked at the end of his hypothetical excursion, I would have answered immediately.

We have taken the stand, and very definitely, that in so far as Canadian corporations are concerned, they are governed by the laws of Canada. I can say further, without going into detail which would not be helpful at this or any other time, that the attitude of the administration of the United States has been most favourable to that viewpoint expressed most strongly in the past by the present government.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do I take it, then, from the Prime Minister's reply that flour milling companies operating in Canada are not required, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, to obtain any permits in the United States? I am referring to those corporations which are undertaking this work.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has already stated that he has no knowledge that any flour milling companies have been interfered with. Therefore the question is entirely hypothetical.

Mr. Argue: I ask the Prime Minister this question. Has the Prime Minister—and this is the point—any knowledge that these companies in Canada have to be suppliant and have to ask for permits from the United States government? This is the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would not have superior knowledge to that possessed by the hon. gentleman. There is no subject upon which he does not pretend to have the fullest information.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Answer the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have heard nothing that would bear out the suggestion the hon. member offers.

Mr. Argue: Can the Prime Minister deny that this is a fact?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has exhausted the subject.

Mr. Argue: I have exhausted the Prime Minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONCTON—PROTEST AGAINST TRANSFER OF REPAIR WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. My question has to do with a statement made to this house by the minister on May 26 on the reported lay-offs at the Moncton C.N.R. shops.

Has the minister received a telegram from the president of the Moncton labour council protesting against the transfer of repair work from the Moncton shops? If so, will the minister use his good offices with the C.N.R. in order to meet the request of the labour council?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I received such a telegram this morning. I immediately sent a copy of it to the management of the C.N.R. asking them to keep me informed of any developments and also asking them to give the utmost consideration to any avenue or possibility of these people either keeping their jobs or securing new jobs with the railway.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister will inform the house whether he will report back the reply he gets from the C.N.R. management on this very important problem.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I always report to the house such reports as I receive. If my hon. friend had been in the house he would have heard that I answered in detail the question asked by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Creaghan) on this very matter.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to inform the minister that the reason I am raising the question today—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: —is because of the unsatisfactory answer he gave on Saturday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member has not a point of order there.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS—INTENTION TO PROCEED WITH LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask him whether or not it has been a decision of his or of the government not to proceed with Bill No. C-70 this session. This bill refers to the furnishing of financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of corporations and labour unions carrying on activities within Canada.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I was asked that question about a week ago by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I think it was, or the hon. member for Essex East. I have nothing to add to the reply I gave then.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister did not really say anything on that occasion, would he say something now?

Mr. Fulton: What the minister said on that occasion is well within the understanding of most hon. members in this house.

WAR MEASURES ACT—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, having regard to the statements made by him during the debate last year on the bill of rights and similar statements on January 27 this year, whether the government intends to submit the War Measures Act to this session of parliament for consideration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only say at this time that depending on the progress that is made in the house, a decision in that regard will be announced to the house.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the government does not proceed, could I ask the Prime Minister whether the government will support the bills standing in my name that seek to do what the government itself promised it would do?

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I can say to the hon. gentleman is this; that his interest in this matter is commendable, even though for all the years he was a minister he did not see fit, and the government to which he belonged did not see fit to follow the course he now recommends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

N.H.A.—INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): May I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Does the government intend to introduce legislation this session to amend the National Housing Act so as to permit loans to be made on existing homes?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I do not know what the hon. member has in mind in asking that question. This is a broad field, and perhaps he would be more specific.

Mr. Garland: The National Housing Act now restricts lending in such a way that loans can only be made with respect to construction of new houses. My question is simple. Does the government intend to amend the act so as to permit loans to be made on used or existing houses?

Mr. Walker: As the hon. member knows, the government has made it possible for loans to be made for the improvement of old homes at the present time. The loans by the banks are guaranteed by the government. Also, there are 1,500,000 rental houses throughout Canada, the owners of which can obtain loans of up to $4,000 for the improvement of those homes. That is something which is new this session. However, as to extending these operations to enable direct loans or mortgage loans to be made with respect to old houses, the answer is no, because the government finds it has to extend itself in order to provide sufficient money for loans with respect to new houses.

Mr. Garland: A supplementary question. I wonder if the minister does not believe—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should not pursue that subject, which is one involving broad questions of policy. He has received a specific answer to this first question, and he may ask the minister to explain that answer if he thinks it necessary, but it would not be in order for him to make a statement.

Mr. Garland: I simply want to ask the minister whether he does not believe that the residue from the proposed sale of mortgages presently held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would allow sufficient elbow room to assist financing in respect to the sale of existing houses.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member had better ask that question on the estimates.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED SIGHTING OF UNIDENTIFIED SUBMARINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. If the minister is unable to answer perhaps he will take the question as notice. Can the minister give the house any information about the reported sighting of an unidentified submarine by fishermen off Burgeo, on the south coast of Newfoundland, last Wednesday, May 24?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a report on this particular incident. I will be glad to ask for one and inform the hon. member.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CANADIAN ARSENALS LTD.—REQUEST FOR PRIORITY IN CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Defence Production. In view of the concern being expressed by members of the union concerning the dearth of contracts being awarded to Canadian Arsenals Limited at Lindsay, which is causing the work force to be reduced to the lowest level in 15 years, can the minister assure the house that priority in awarding defence contracts is given to this crown corporation over unorganized, privately owned plants?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): I wish to remind the hon. member that this plant has been kept in production since the end of the war and since the present government came to power. We wish to continue doing so. I must add that sitting where I do I receive a daily reminder from my hon. friend who represents Victoria about the desirability of keeping this plan in operation.

INDUSTRY

TEAR GAS—INQUIRY AS TO MANUFACTURE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Notice has been sent to the hon. gentleman. My question arises out of a news item which appeared in the Wall Street Journal indicating that tear gas manufacturing is becoming a big secondary industry with exports to countries all over the world. I should like to ask the minister if there are any tear gas manufacturing facilities in Canada and, if there are not—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Badanai: —whether it would be in the interests of Canada to encourage the establishment—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. Tear gas is not being made in Canada at the present time. It was produced during the war, but the plant has since been shut down and destroyed because it was badly contaminated. There is very little demand for tear gas in Canada, and any produced here would have to depend almost entirely upon export demand. I am advised that it is doubtful whether a manufacturer would be interested in starting production without at least a reasonable volume of domestic business in prospect.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROCEDURE RESPECTING APPLICATIONS FOR ROUTE CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport based on a statement the minister is alleged to have made on Friday, reported in the Montreal Gazette of May 27 under the heading "Local Air Carriers Given New Routes". The report attributes this statement to the hon. gentleman:

> Up to now T.C.A. has been able to alter its routes and schedules without reference to the board. Other air lines are not able to do this.

The question I want to ask the minister is this. Did he take cognizance of a denial by an official of Trans-Canada Air Lines, who stated that the publicly owned air line T.C.A. has always been required to obtain government approval before changing its domestic operations? Then the spokesman went on to say that in fact T.C.A. does go before the air transport board. I wonder whether the minister has any comment to make in these circumstances.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I do not think the statement attributed to the T.C.A. spokesman constitutes a denial. It merely said that, so far, T.C.A. has always had to obtain government approval in connection with new routes and that the air transport board has been consulted. The purpose of my statement was to make it amply clear that from now on Trans-Canada Air Lines will be using the same procedure with respect to public notice and hearings before the air transport board as must be followed with respect to other applications by private companies. Whenever T.C.A. wishes to change any of its domestic routes it will have to appear before the board, and other air lines which are interested or affected will be afforded a chance of coming before the board and expressing their views.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOT ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister if he can tell us whether or not it is a fact that the Prime Minister of India has communicated with him, as he has with the heads of government in the United Kingdom, West Germany and Japan, regarding commitments for assistance to India in the development of its third five year plan.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I received a personal letter, as I recall, from Prime Minister Nehru in connection with the next five year plan generally. It is a purely personal letter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the government in a position to say what it proposes to do with regard to the request made by India?

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the government is in a position to announce a decision in this regard, it will, of course, be brought to the attention of the house.

THE CENSUS

PENALTY FOR REFUSAL TO ANSWER QUESTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Could I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Is it an offence for a person to refuse to answer certain of the questions contained in the census forms and, if so, what would be the penalty for such a refusal?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): If the hon. member would let me know what particular question he has in mind, perhaps I could give him a more accurate answer.

Mr. Caron: I am speaking of any of the questions which are in the form.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member should consult a lawyer.

Mr. Caron: Very funny. I was asked by a resident of Canada yesterday if I could answer that question, and I did not know. I am asking the minister who is in authority and who should know; or else he should be the one to consult a lawyer if he does not.

Mr. Speaker: It is not customary to ask for the interpretation of statutes on the orders of the day. I have regarded the hon. member's question as seeking for a legal opinion. Perhaps I am wrong about that. If it is a question which is capable of being answered in a factual way I certainly have no objection to it being answered.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR PROHIBITION ON USE OF TRAWLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries or, in his absence, to his parliamentary secretary.

Has the minister received a petition from the fishermen of Calvert, Ferryland, Aquaforte, Fermeuse and Renews requesting that the use of bultows or trawls be forbidden in the area between Renews head and Burnt head in accordance with the regulations which have existed since 1895, and which were confirmed again in 1943 by the Newfoundland commission government?

Mr. Roland English (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice and provide an answer as soon as possible.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder)—Mr. Fulton—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Classification of murder. (Translation):

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, while I have no claim to being a linguist, I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) to a possible interpretation of the French translation of section 1 of Bill C-92. The English expression seems to cover the primary purpose of this piece of legislation.

More than ever, in considering this bill, we must face the two essential conditions of a crime. There must first be the actus reus, which is clearly determined in this case, and also the mens rea.

It seems to me that if we added the word "préparé" to paragraph (a) of subsection 2, we would have an exact translation of what the government and the Minister of Justice had in mind in introducing this bill. Thus the paragraph would read as follows:

Le meurtre est dit qualifié, à l'égard de toute personne, lorsqu'il est préparé, projeté et délibéré de la part de cette personne.

I do think the French translation would then be more complete and would not lend itself to any discussion. In my humble view, the intention of the legislators would also be much better expressed.

I wanted to make these few remarks to the Minister of Justice, as the matter was brought to my attention over the week end when I had the privilege of discussing this bill with members of the legal profession in Three Rivers.

I shall not belabour the point, but I think the French version should be more complete so as to convey the meaning of the English word "planned", which reflects the idea that the government had in mind in introducing this bill.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, the house passed on the principle of Bill C-92 when the motion for second reading was put.

As far as I am concerned, I will try to suggest various means of improving it so that it may meet as much as possible the expectations of the public on this important question of capital punishment.

Section 1 introduces a new section into the Criminal Code, section 202A, which does not change the definition of murder itself found under sections 201 and 202; it merely distinguishes between two categories of murder, capital and non-capital, depending on whether the crime is premeditated or not. Section 202A is therefore the key to the whole bill.

When I spoke on second reading of the bill, I stated that even if such a distinction could be justified in principle, in the general context of the bill it necessarily leads to what is practically the complete abolition of capital punishment. Now, not only the hon. members of this house but a vast majority of the citizens of this country wish to keep capital punishment in our statute books, not as a museum curiosity but as a necessary and efficient deterrent for the protection of honest people.

May I say first of all that by establishing two categories of murder, section 1 is contrary to the recommendations of one of the most important joint committees of the house and Senate. I will now repeat what I said the other day as reported on page 5227 of Hansard for May 23, 1961:

> Several witnesses suggested that consideration might be given to the creation of degrees of murder which would take into account the difference in moral culpability between different types of homicides. All witnesses representing law-enforcement authorities opposed the establishment of degrees of murder. The committee shares the conclusions of the United Kingdom royal commission on this question. The committee is of the opinion that the present distinction between murder and manslaughter is quite clear and straightforward. It considers that any attempt to break murder down into degrees may lead to the creation of technical and confusing distinctions without, at the same time, creating any precise delineation between murders of differing degrees of moral culpability.

Moreover, by proceeding as we are asked to do under section 1, we also depart from the legislation passed in the United Kingdom in 1957, which is known as the homicide act, 1957. Indeed, as seen on page 5221 of Hansard for May 23 last, the minister said with regard to that act:

> In 1957 after further consideration the parliament of Great Britain passed an act entitled "The Homicide Act, 1957". This act adopted the approach of dividing murder into two classes, those which carry the death penalty and those for which the penalty is life imprisonment. The division, however, is based rather on the method or weapon by which the killing is accomplished, or in certain cases upon the person or class of person killed rather than on the nature and circmustances of the crime itself.

The minister went on to say:

> This has produced some arbitrary and rather unsatisfactory results.

The minister has expressed an opinion and I must admit that I am not sufficiently acquainted with the results of the enforcement of this act in Great Britain to advisedly discuss with him this matter of opinion.

Still I am prone to believe that this change on the part of the minister is unadvisable.

Moreover the minister is not in the best position to express such an opinion, and I do not think we have anything to teach the United Kingdom jurists in this matter of legislation on capital punishment.

It is a fact that there has been mass commutations in Britain, 14 death penalties being commuted from April 16 to June 10, 1948.

It should be remembered that, in 1948, a member of the British House of Commons had introduced a bill for the abolition of the death penalty during a 5 year experimental period. This bill was subsequently defeated by a huge majority in the House of Lords.

Here in Canada, in spite of the recommendations from the joint committee and a majority opinion in the house favouring the retention of capital punishment, 39 death penalties were commuted out of a total of 49.

I acknowledge a great respect for British criminal law. In fact, the greatest reforms in this field originated in that country.

Commenting upon the Gowers report, the minister could not conceal that he thought highly of this document when he said, as found at page 5221 of Hansard:

> Its report was presented to parliament in the month of September 1953, and it constitutes the most complete analysis of the question in modern times.

It should be noted that all major changes in British criminal law followed intensive studies made by jurists and experts in the field, while here in Canada through section 1 of the bill now before us, we reject one of the most important recommendations made by the joint committee.

This new clause dividing murder into two kinds is brought forward as an ordinary government measure.

This new concept of criminal law apparently does not result from any special studies made by jurists or experts in that field.

In that regard, I must say that I hold the highest opinion of the Minister of Justice and all the senior officials of his department. But in all deference and while I recognize the high standards they set for the general administration of the Department of Justice, I do not feel I will reduce their prestige when I say that clause 1, in particular, is not the result of discussions by Criminal Code specialists, by jurists with a considerable experience acquired in criminal courts or by writers of criminal law.

While it is true that the newspapers, following the introduction of this legislation, agreed to that idea of two kinds of murder, several articles have been published since giving us the views of jurists, of experienced men, and I think—the minister has probably seen those articles—that this bill, and particularly clause 1, has been received by several jurists with mixed feelings which raise very important questions.

I have here an article that appeared in the Toronto Star of May 24, 1961, under the heading:

(Text):

Two murder penalties injustice—Ex-Judge

London, Ontario.—Proposed legislation to establish two degrees of murder was described last night by Arthur M. Lebel, retired Ontario appeal court judge, as a system which would make fish out of one man and flesh out of another.

He said if one man hangs and another does not, if one is locked up and another is not, "the sense of justice in all of us will say let us scrap the whole thing... let us not have any capital punishment".

The new government bill on capital punishment separates deliberate murder, punishable by death, and non-premeditated murder, punishable by a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment.

Mr. Lebel told the Canadian Progress club of London that mandatory sentences have never worked and would not work under the proposed new law.

"What will juries do if they do not like life sentences" he asked, and added, "reduce the charge to manslaughter."

Mr. Lebel also criticized the clause which would require cabinet approval for the release of a person sentenced to death but whose sentence is commuted. "What is wrong with the national parole board?" he asked.

He also questioned why there should be any interference from the cabinet when a court and jury find a man guilty of capital murder.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, the minister based the introduction of this bill on the following principle, as reported on page 5223 of Hansard for May 23, 1961:

We have taken account of the fact that the country, as reflected by opinion in this house, favours retention of capital punishment.

Well, there is in law a proverb or a gibe which states:

Law is what it is, and not always what we should like it to be.

Well, what is the purport of clause 1, especially in relation to the other clauses of the bill? I firmly believe that by drawing this distinction between capital and non-capital murder, as set out in clause 1, we lay down premises which will in fact make capital punishment inoperative. More than that, our premises are contrary to the specific distinction made by the minister when he introduced this legislation, convinced as he is in spite of all that, that the country is of the opinion that capital punishment should remain efficient.

It seems to me that in an effort to solve a problem created by the government itself, the government is submitting, through this distinction between capital and non-capital murder, a project whose full implementation is not supported by the statement made by the minister when he introduced the bill. This distinction, provided under section 1, is meant, I think not only to satisfy the government's abolitionists who are getting impatient, even among the most eminent members of the cabinet, but those who want to keep capital punishment in our statutes. Therefore, we are faced with a compromise that is not realistic and which, in practice, disavows public opinion.

This bill, which is based on the fundamental distinction of section 1 between capital and non-capital murder, has not been sufficiently examined, in my opinion, and section 13, which I may not comment in detail, is evidence of what I claim—this bill, and especially this basic distinction of section 1, has not been studied by experienced law officers and practitioners in criminal law. It is contrary to the recommendation of the joint committee which submitted its report in 1956 and, furthermore, it suggests a legal distinction contrary to the 1957 homicide act of the British parliament.

For all these reasons, I submit there is no urgency to adopt, in its present context, a legal definition based on legal uncertainties and this distinction between degrees of murder should be reviewed by experienced law officers.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the rules of this house do not allow me, at this stage, to move a motion to this effect, but if I were free to do so I would do so immediately, in order that section 1, as well as the whole bill, be again referred to experts in this field. However, nothing prevents me at this time from renewing my request to the Minister of Justice, and I would remind him of the amount of work accomplished last year by the special committee during the discussion of the Canadian Bill of Rights. In spite of all this work, once we had considered the views of the experts heard in the special committee the subject was again referred to the committee of the whole of this house.

Mr. Chairman, those were the remarks I had to make on section 1. I shall ask the minister, as well as the government, to give serious consideration to that suggestion. I think, that if the minister and the government followed up the idea of reconsidering the bill, it would meet the views of this country's press.

Besides, there is no urgent need to go ahead with this right away; the whole matter might well be reconsidered in a special committee and we could take it up again during this session and pass the bill which the government would then submit. This legislation would be much more efficient. We would thus establish a much less disappointing basis than if we went ahead with the bill in its present form.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Deschatelets: With pleasure.

Mr. Martineau: Earlier today, the hon. member quoted an article referring to a lecture given by the Hon. Justice Labelle, and he pointed out when quoting him—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Former Justice Labelle.

Mr. Martineau: The former Hon. Justice Labelle, and pointed out, in his quotation, that in practice mandatory penalties were not very satisfactory and did not give proper results. Now as the existing legislation with regard to murder makes the death penalty mandatory, could the hon. member tell us whether, in his view, such a system is satisfactory in practice, and whether it meets public opinion on this matter?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I would not say that the present system should not be improved.

In fact, I would be in favour of its being so, but the article I referred to a moment ago I quoted in its entirety. It is the view of a former justice of the appeal court of Ontario, and what is especially interesting about this article is that a judge states that this bill now before us, Bill C-92, is not practical on account of the categories mentioned in section 1.

I am therefore impressed by that opinion given by an ex-judge of an appeal court. That is why I ask for a review of this bill on the basis of the opinion of this expert.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately I was unable to be present during the debate on second reading of the bill, and I should like to avail myself of the opportunity now for a moment or two to put myself on record with regard to this all-important measure.

I thought the debate on second reading was of a character of which all members of the house could be proud. As I say, I should like to put myself on record, and I can best do so by means of a very short quotation from the words used by the Minister of Justice in presenting the bill to the house. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should like to read a short passage from the minister's words as found on page 5226 of Hansard of May 23:

> Finally, we present it in the conviction that in its merciful and progressive provision of an age limit below which no one shall be executed, and of an automatic review by an appeal tribunal to remove so fast as possible the element of human or judicial error, together with its other progressive features, it represents a proper reconciliation between the necessity for the protection of the lives of decent and law-abiding citizens on the one hand, and the desire of a Christian and civilized society to see justice tempered with mercy and forbearance on the other. On this basis we submit it for the approval of the house.

On that basis, Mr. Chairman, I am happy to vote for the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have not taken part in the discussion of this subject since the matter was first introduced in the house by the hon, member for York-Scarborough in the bill he presented last year. Like other hon. members without exception, I regard the bill as one of the most important projects put before us for consideration and decision. The details of the bill are now before us, and it is possible to examine what the minister has sought to encompass. I think it is important that at this stage we should indicate our feelings as to the extent to which the bill meets the principle involved.

Murder is the most serious crime in our Criminal Code. Yet this, with our allied offences, is the most difficult of all crimes to define and deal with. Over the week end I spent some time discussing this matter with certain persons, one of whom has had very considerable experience at the bar in criminal matters. In large measure I am influenced by his experience and advice in what I want to say today.

I believe there is more case law on the subject of murder than any other single crime. That statement may not have the significance for those who are not lawyers than it will have for those who are. But if it is a fact that there is more case law on this subject we should be careful about adding needlessly to our jurisprudence in a matter as vital to human beings and to our society as this matter is. It seems to me that because of the extended and far-reaching changes contemplated in this measure we should make sure that we take no final decision without the most thorough study.

I join with the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont in his plea to the minister this morning that at this stage we make sure that we in this parliament give the most careful consideration to this measure. Nothing the hon. member has said or that I am about to say is in any way a reflection on the care which hon. members of this house have given or will give to this bill. However, all of us are members with divided interests and occupations. I take it that none of us are experts in this matter, and that our knowledge of criminal practice, generally speaking, is not such as to give us the authority with which to arrive at a final judgment in this matter when there are at our disposal advice, experience and judicial and professional skills that can assist us greatly, in the light of our common law decisions, to make sure that we are doing the correct thing not only in principle but in the maintenance and furthering of that principle.

I believe, after careful examination of this bill, that one can say that it is not without much ambiguity, and that it is in some respects muddled. No legislature in a matter of this importance would want to pass a bill of this kind if that is the case. I submit that it is the case, and I hope at the proper stage to indicate that fact.

It is a fact—and I am sure the minister will not deny this statement—that many of those who have participated in many murder trials in our country, both for the defence and for the prosecution, are not clear on the meaning of this bill. As I have already indicated, I myself over the week end discussed the matter with a number of individuals who have had a good deal of experience both as crown prosecutors and as defence counsel, and I may say that is their judgment.

Why this bill has not been sent to a committee of the House of Commons is difficult to understand. I hope the minister, in offering a defence, will not seek to do as he very nearly did the other day, namely suggest that we are inconsistent in the Liberal opposition by making this proposal, in view of the attitude which I personally, on behalf of our party, took in this house the other day when I complained about the contemporaneous sittings of parliamentary committees. This question is too important to be disposed of in that way. If this bill had been introduced early in the session there certainly would have been no real difficulty. I can well understand the minister wanting to see his measures receive ready dispatch, but in a matter of this sort I submit that is not a justifiable position to take.

In the United Kingdom this problem has been confronted and a solution has been put forward which is not the same as the solution provided in this bill. There has been a pinpointing of the instances when punishment by death will be permissible and will be the sanction provided under the law. However, before that decision was arrived at, after much discussion in parliament itself and after much discussion among the people of the United Kingdom generally, a royal commission on capital punishment was appointed.

That commission sat for four years from 1949 to 1953. It is interesting to note that the royal commission had before it the most experienced professional witnesses, including crown prosecutors, defence counsel and, more particularly, members of the judiciary who by their long experience, I think by what they said, proved to be indispensable in the evidence they gave. For instance, there came before the committee Lord Chief Justice Goddard, then the leading criminal judge in Her Majesty's courts.

With all this background they reached a decision. I am not saying it was the right decision, but it was a decision different from the decision which we are providing in a bill the principle of which I have voted for and will vote for. However, I point out that this bill now before us, which is not the English bill, represents a departure from our present law and that fact itself is a matter of the greatest importance.

I hope the minister will not think I am speaking about him personally in what I am about to say, because that certainly is not my intention. I am seeking to be as objective as possible in this matter. I have said that in England a royal commission was appointed and that the royal commission gave to the lord chief justice of England, many of his colleagues, leading crown prosecutors, leading defence counsel, professors and the like, the opportunity to come and lay before it their opinions as to the formula, legally conceived, which they thought should be provided, to say nothing of the number of people with social welfare interests and others who appeared before the commission. But we have had none of that procedure nor have we had advice from such persons.

Mr. Fulton: In order that I may be clear with regard to the point my hon. friend is trying to make, may I ask him this question. Do I understand him to suggest that at the time of the Gowers royal commission a bill was then under contemplation? That is not my understanding of the matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Fulton: There was no draft bill or proposal before the Gowers commission.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right. My hon. friend is quite correct. If I gave that impression I did not intend to do so. However, there was discussion of the kind of formula, involving legal precepts, that should be embodied in any kind of bill that would be dealt with. As a matter of fact, in his evidence the lord chief justice spoke of the distinction between various classes of murder and gave an indication of the very phraseology which should be used in order to meet certain particular objectives.

What I am seeking to establish is the fact that the parliament there made a decision only after there had been careful study. We are going to make a similar decision, and we have not had the same study. Who are the authors of this bill? The minister himself is a distinguished member of the bar. I do not in any way wish to suggest anything that would be regarded as the expression of a view that he is not eminently qualified to be Minister of Justice and that he is not a distinguished member of the bar. However, I am not aware that his experience at the bar has been on the criminal side. I am not aware that there is in the Department of Justice at the present time any official who has had great experience in criminal practice. I may be wrong in this, but I gave careful consideration to the point before making the statement. I do not believe there is anyone in the Department of Justice now who has had any experience professionally, either in private practice or as a professional officer of the department, in the field of criminal law. I think this would be very important, if true, in giving us the kind of confidence we would want to have in the absence of the study about which the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont spoke a moment ago.

I suggest to the Minister of Justice, as a further argument for no undue haste, that I am sure we could determine this matter within the course of the present calendar year and yet give this measure the kind of study representation and care which I feel must antedate the passage of a bill of this importance. I would be prepared to suggest to the minister that every judge, every defence counsel and every crown attorney would say that in this matter we have not had—I do not say this with regard to the subject matter of the bill, necessarily—the study which this bill deserves. If the United Kingdom took four years to consider this matter, surely we are not asking too much of this parliament when we say it would be worth while to spend more time in the study of this measure.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, does my hon. friend forget the two years our parliamentary committee spent on the matter?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That parliamentary committee was conducted under the chairmanship of my former colleague the hon. member for Essex West. It was a committee that pursued its course with care and responsibility, but the witnesses who were called before it were not all of the character of some of the people about whom I have spoken today. Also, it was a committee that did not deal exclusively with this particular problem; it dealt with a variety of other matters as well.

What objection can there be to having this kind of bill, for instance, submitted to a carefully selected committee of the Canadian Bar Association? That was done, as the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont pointed out, in the case of the bill of rights. The Canadian Bar Association and other interested bodies appeared before a committee and gave their views as to the bill of rights. If the bill of rights was regarded as warranting that kind of treatment, surely a bill dealing with the particular subject matter at hand deserves similar treatment. Yet this bill will not be submitted to these various bodies. The proposal is that we should give it the finality that we give to all measures passed in this house after it has gone through various stages.

I have supported this bill in principle, but even so I believe we would be wise in making sure that we have ourselves given the greatest possible care to this matter, and also that others who by training and experience are particularly competent to assist us have made sure that the drafting, the legal phraseology and the legal formula employed in the bill are such as to enable the proper dispensation of justice in the future, both from the point of view of the crown and of those charged with murder.

Some hon. members may suggest, "What is wrong with having the committee of the whole deal with this matter?" I suspect that would be the viewpoint of the hon. member for York-Scarborough. "Why should not every hon. member of this house be given an opportunity of discussing this matter? Why should it be confined to members of the committee?" My answer to that question is that if you have a parliamentary committee, obviously you cannot have the whole house in that committee, but that does not preclude the widest participation by hon. members of this house who are especially interested or especially qualified to deal with this matter; nor does it preclude an ultimate discussion of the committee's deliberations in this house. I am afraid that the bill as drawn up at the present time will provide defence counsel for a long time in the future with all kinds of ammunition which may or may not be in the interests of the administration of justice in our country.

I suggest to the Minister of Justice that the proposal made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont with regard to further study of this matter, enabling those especially qualified to give evidence, is a step which is both prudent and, I believe in the circumstances, urgently necessary if we are to avoid passing a measure of such importance without employing every safeguard that it is possible for us as human beings to resort to in trying to evolve an enactment of the best possible character. I believe that only in this way will we have the feeling that we have taken the right course.

I agree with the basic principle of the bill, which seeks, as I understand it, to provide a distinction between murders for which there is to be the death penalty and other murders. That being the case, it seems to me it is most important that the distinction should be drawn as precisely as possible. If this plea is not accepted, what we will be doing will be passing this bill in as many days as we pass other measures in this house of much less consequence. Are we prepared, as members of parliament, to say that in a matter involving security of the person, life, death and the administration of justice we want to pass a measure without using those instruments of understanding and assessment which were used in the United Kingdom when they were confronted with the same problem a few years ago?

I believe the suggestion made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont is a very worthy one. We should be satisfied that we have put into this bill provisions which will allow no room for doubt or uncertainty as to when the death penalty is to be imposed. I do not believe this bill does that.

It would be interesting to know what suggestions could be put forward in that regard. I say this bill is not clear because, as we know, all convictions for murder require the existence of mens rea, or the element of intent. I ask, after reading this bill, what additional elements are required to make a murder a planned and deliberate one. I do not see anything in this bill that answers this question. It is true that this bill makes a distinction, but it is a distinction that is going to offer to defence counsel and any unobjective crown counsel, an opportunity which I do not believe should exist in the interests of justice.

There are some other ideas I should like to express when we come to the appropriate clauses. Even though it is not open to us now to make any amendment along the line suggested by the hon. member who made the proposal for a further study a few months ago, I suggest that the Minister of Justice has a responsibility in this matter. I know he takes that responsibility seriously. I suggest to him that this responsibility can be exercised more carefully at this moment by recognizing the desirability of calling in those who administer the criminal law and asking the views of the law officers of the crown in the provinces—I do not say the attorneys general, for other reasons—and crown prosecutors, eminent defence counsel, the Canadian Bar Association and other interested bodies with strong views for and against capital punishment.

I support the principle of this bill, but I do not have confidence in the measure as drafted, for the reasons I have given.

Mr. Chambers: I did not participate in the debate which took place on a somewhat similar bill last year, and it had not been my intention to take part in this discussion today, but I think it is important, lest what was said by the hon. member for Essex East should give the impression to the public that we as members of this house have not given enough consideration or taken sufficient advice to be able to pass on this matter, that something should be said.

As the Minister of Justice has pointed out, a special committee of this house undertook a most extensive study of this question generally some years ago, and since I have been in the house no subject has occasioned more discussion both on the floor of the chamber and among members outside the house. I am sure that practically every member here has, like myself, consulted the best legal opinions he could get among his private associates on this important subject. We frequently read in accounts of trials of the efforts of lawyers and of the judiciary to establish what was in the mind of parliament when a certain measure was passed. Surely, then, it must be parliament which takes the responsibility for the character of the measure which should be passed in connection with such an important subject as this which we are now considering.

The hon. member for Essex East made reference to the experience in criminal law of those who had to do with the framing of this measure. I think it would be true to say that probably the most experienced criminal counsel in the country today is one of those who passed upon this bill before it was placed before the house, because I am sure the cabinet had a look at the bill before it was sent down.

The only point I wish to make is that I have done my best, not having the advantage of being learned in the law, to give full consideration to this matter and to take what competent advice I could find. I am sure every other member of the house has done the same.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Within our capacity and experience, undoubtedly.

Mr. Chambers: I am sorry, but I missed that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Every member, I am sure, has done that within the limits of his or her capacity and experience. It is the lack of experience in connection with these matters which I think is important in this discussion.

Mr. Chambers: I am glad that point is established, because I think we should be wrong if we gave the impression that this measure was being considered today in committee without a great deal of thought having been given to it by hon. members and, as I say, a resort to such experience as is available to them through their private contacts. As a result of my own thought, study and consultation, I shall support the bill.

Miss LaMarsh: I did not have the opportunity to take part in the previous debate on this measure at the committee stage, nor when the bill came up for second reading. I listened, however, with great interest to the statement made by the minister on this occasion and have since that time—up until the time of the vote—considered carefully whether I should be in a position morally to vote for it or against it. Fortunately, my colleagues and I in this group as true Liberals were guided by our conscience and our experience in our decision in voting for or against the principle of the bill.

As far as I am concerned I have always felt in a dilemma, in that I am incapable in deciding whether I am completely for abolition or completely for retention. In spite of the fact that I have had some limited experience as defence counsel in four murder trials, I have not been able to reconcile in my mind that there should be complete abolition, and I have felt there should be retention of the maximum penalty for at least two classes of crime. Therefore I found it within my conscience to vote affirmatively for this bill in principle.

But having regard to the heart of the bill, that is clause 2 of Bill No. C-92, perhaps I may point out that from my own experience and my reading on capital crimes which have occurred within this country it appears that a very high percentage of them—and these figures, so far as I know, are not available—have occurred by reason of the relationship between men and women, whether it be two men fighting, or the husband causing the death of his wife, or the wife causing the death of her husband. I suggest to the minister that because of the intensity of this relationship a deterrent is seldom present regardless of the provisions of the criminal law. When it is considered that, added to this particular fact that crimes arise mainly because of the man-woman relationship, there is the fact that in most Canadian crimes there is an element of the use of alcohol, I think this more than ever points up the fact that a deterrent does not exist; because when one commits such a crime, either arising from the man-woman relationship or because of the excessive use of alcohol, there is no deterrent which works on the mind at that moment.

This being the case, I have felt that if there is any deterrent at all to causing the death of another person it must be the thought of being apprehended, and not of what would occur following that. Perhaps even more so, when one considers a deliberate murder, where one has made a deliberate plan involving more thought, perhaps a higher intelligence, if anything were to deter that person it would be more likely to be life imprisonment rather than the ending of a life by hanging.

Because of the gaps which are in the legislation I would like to identify myself and my remarks, with the two hon. members from my party who have already spoken, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and the hon. member for Essex East, inasmuch as I would ask the minister to make arrangements for a further study by those who have had experience in this field prior to bringing the bill to a vote for final decision.

In particular I would ask the minister why it is that this bill contains no provision for one of the most important things which the public should protect, that is, the possibility of the death of a prison guard during the course of a prison riot. Hon. members will recall that in the last few years there was one of these in the state of Michigan where a Canadian was involved, where there was a riot and a guard was killed. In this incident the Canadian had been sentenced to life imprisonment for murder and could not be sentenced to anything further.

Under the legislation which is now before us, if there is an attempt to escape from prison or lawful custody and a murder is caused, it is a capital murder. However, if there is a riot, during which there is an unpremeditated killing, nothing in this legislation makes this a capital murder. In the interests of protecting those who must work in our maximum security penitentiaries, I suggest the minister should give consideration to this type of killing which, for the general good of the community, should be included as capital murder.

In every case involving a second murder, I suggest it is certainly necessary to retain the death penalty. In the British homicide act of 1957 there is a provision stating that an individual who is convicted of murder for a second time must pay the supreme penalty. While I appreciate that under the provisions of the act before us if a murder is deliberate, whether it be a first or second one, in all likelihood the culprit will pay the maximum penalty, it is not beyond the realm of possibility that an individual could commit two non-capital murders. I suggest that one should not be entitled, to use the phrase of the Prime Minister this morning in respect of another matter, to more than one bite out of the cherry. If an individual is so skilful as to cause the death of two persons on different occasions I submit the state should demand the death penalty in respect of the second murder.

There is another provision contained in the British homicide act of 1957 which I recommend to the minister particularly for the protection of police officers in Canada. I appreciate that English police officers are unarmed, which is not the case generally in Canada. However, in most provinces of Canada police officers are not only ill trained but ill paid, and must assume the risk of dealing daily with criminals and the risk, more than any other private citizen, of thereby being injured or killed, I suggest there are great benefits, for the good of the state and of those people who stand between us and the criminal element, to be derived by the inclusion of that provision of the British homicide act retaining the death penalty in respect of the killing of police officers.

I can recall, as I am sure all hon. members will, that this has happened once or twice in the last ten years in the province of Ontario, causing great public outcry because of the necessity, in this ever more complex society, of depending upon those individuals to protect us from the criminal element.

Bearing in mind that the present legislation seeks to make a difference between capital and non-capital murder based mainly upon the element of deliberation, whether it be under paragraph (a) or (b), there is no provision in this legislation, as there is in the British homicide act of 1957, in respect of an individual who suffers, not from insanity, as judicially defined, but from diminished responsibility. I should like to refer to section 2 of part 1 of the British homicide act of 1957, which reads as follows:

> 2. (1) Where a person kills or is a party to the killing of another, he shall not be convicted of murder if he was suffering from such abnormality of mind (whether arising from a condition of arrested or retarded development of mind or any inherent causes or induced by disease or injury) as substantially impaired his mental responsibility for his acts and omissions in doing or being a party to the killing.

Surely this principle should commend itself to the minister and hon. members of this committee. If the essential element to be used in differentiating between non-capital and capital murders is the element of deliberation, these poor unfortunates in our society, many of whom are attracted to a criminal way of life, who are incapable of being completely responsible for their acts who are incapable of that, mens rea which must always be proved, should never be placed in jeopardy of being hanged.

I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, the following situation. A person in full charge of his mental capabilities hires an individual who is mentally retarded to accompany him in committing a bank robbery. The mentally retarded individual equips himself with a weapon. He is not given the weapon by the person who planned the robbery but provides it for himself, so the individual actually in charge of the robbery cannot be convicted of counselling or procuring the other person to acquire this weapon. The two go together to the bank where the one in full possession of his faculties commits the robbery and is the only individual actually involved in the robbery. During the robbery the individual who is mentally retarded, through fright or for some other reason, fires at and kills a person in the bank. As I read the legislation before us the mentally retarded individual, who had not considered murder but who committed murder during the course of the robbery, is liable to be hanged while the other person, fully aware of what he was doing, not having planned the murder but being unmindful of it, cannot be convicted of a capital offence.

I have outlined some problems and situations which have occurred to me within the last few days. I certainly am not an expert regarding the crime of murder, either as it exists presently or as it appears in this bill. However, I suggest there is in this chamber at the moment an individual who has had experience with a great many cases of this type. That is the chairman of the national parole board, now sitting before the minister. As a magistrate in the county of Welland he frequently presided at preliminary hearings on charges of murder, and I do not know of any individual who has been in a better position to see the day to day effect of such crimes in a community, either from the position of the defence or of the prosecution.

So I suggest to this committee that when someone as inexperienced as I am can make four or five suggestions which require consideration, surely there are many more qualified individuals who should be heard before this committee makes its final decision.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, on the first full day of discussion of this most important bill I consider it a privilege to take part in the debate. I appreciate the remarks which other hon. members have made, but I must say I find it most unfortunate that, although some members on the government side have spoken for a minute or two, no one has helped hon. members who are to make a decision by an analysis of this most important legislation or have given the necessary details to indicate that this bill meets the requirements of our Canadian society at this time.

Before we vote on clause 1, I trust that members from all sides of the house will have expressed the reasons why they find this is the legislation on capital punishment that is required in Canada today. I trust that we shall not leave it to the Liberal opposition alone to scrutinize this bill which we are now studying clause by clause to ascertain that the protection of our society is fully met by this legislation.

Although I appreciate the remarks made by the Minister of Justice, I must say that he has in no way given a substantial reason why he supports the new ideas, opinions and laws which he hopes will help to solve this important problem. We know of no public document this government has received which contains instructions or opinions of specialists on the matter. There is no such public document in the possession of any member of the House of Commons. We know of no special committee set up to study this matter and define and phrase a statute of this importance. As I say, we do not know why this bill was not referred to a committee to make sure that it incorporates all the protections which would meet the desires of the Canadian people and possibly the desires of specialists in the matter.

We all recall how the bill of rights was improved by the study given to it by a special committee formed for that purpose. I for one am absolutely surprised at the conduct of this government in asking hon. members to pass upon a bill the phraseology of which we cannot individually analyse, nor do we know the significance of all its details. This is why I should like to see members on the government side of the house give reasons why they feel that clause 1, which we are now discussing, meets in full the desires of the Canadian people.

Recently I said I agreed with the principle of the bill. I am one of those who feel that it is important at this time in our history to solve some of the problems which pertain to capital punishment in our country. This is what we are doing, and this is what the Canadian people whom we represent are thinking about for two or three reasons. I should like hon. members on the government side to realize this and to give opinions which would be constructive in the study which we are now giving to this legislation.

We know there has been difficulty with juries and judges who found their hands tied because the law did not give them the directives required to reach a proper, honest and justifiable decision in the matter. We know also that in Canada people resent the fact that with respect to practically every conviction for murder, where capital punishment is imposed, the final decision rests with the cabinet of this country. I do not wish to discuss the royal prerogative in regard to pardon, but I believe the view is commonly held among people throughout Canada today that we must try to find a way to end the procedure whereby the final court of appeal in murder cases is the cabinet.

We know that in the past the royal prerogatives were limited. I only have to recall to the minds of hon. members the television program of a few days ago wherein Baldwin insisted that the crown should not change a law which the representatives of the people had decided to pass. Hon. members know that is so, and I am afraid that the way this legislation is phrased it will bring about a greater degree of inconsistency.

Mr. McGee: No.

Mr. Godin: The hon. member for York-Scarborough says no, but I should like to indicate to him the problem that the people of Canada see so far as capital punishment is concerned. Our judges and juries find their hands tied because of the lack of a proper definition of the crime which should deserve capital punishment. On the other hand, I believe the Canadian people do not see any good reason why the final court of appeal with respect to murder should be the cabinet of Canada, which is composed of politicians.

There are three divisions in the administration of the affairs of our country. There is the legislative body, this House of Commons. There is the judicial section composed of judges and juries in accordance with our method of administering justice. We also have the division which is composed of crown attorneys and policemen. Having regard to the problems with respect to capital punishment and the criticisms that are made, I say it is our duty to make sure that, on the one hand, we keep the decision as to capital punishment out of the hands of politicians and, on the other hand, out of the hands of those people employed in the administration of justice.

I find after analysing the bill that it brings about a situation whereby the authority of politicians in the matter of capital punishment is increased, as is the authority of those people who are employed in the administration of justice. It is unfortunate that I can speak on clause 1 only and not go into how it may be related to other clauses of the bill. Members of the house will recall the television program some months ago in which part of the process of hanging was depicted, and which I understand some company refused to sponsor. However, the C.B.C. undertook to make the program available to the Canadian people, and I was impressed by it. If I recall correctly the title of the play was "The Case of the White Horse". If I may give the story briefly, a small community miles from anywhere found that a murder had been committed within the community. Someone had seen a white horse being driven through the town on the night of the murder. No one in the community owned a white horse, and as the town was without any system for the administration of justice they created their own. That is what we are trying to do in this bill and that is what preceding parliaments have tried to do, create a law whereby people can judge for themselves.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Godin: Yes.

Mr. Martineau: Is it his considered opinion that it is the role of parliament to enact the law?

Mr. Godin: I am surprised to hear such a remark by the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister. Is it the function of parliament to make the law?

Mr. Nesbitt: He asked a question. Answer it.

Mr. Godin: The hon. member has asked me whether it is the function of the government to make the laws of this country.

Mr. Martineau: This parliament.

Mr. Godin: I am surprised that such a question should be asked by an hon. member elected to this house. We know that there is only one major legislative body in Canada, and that is the parliament of Canada.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Godin: I am not answering because it is obvious to anyone walking the streets who has any brains that parliament is the only body that can make the law with regard to those matters which come within its powers under the British North America Act. Why should an hon. member, especially the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, ask me whether I feel that parliament should make the law? That is our only function; we have no other. We have nothing to do with the administration of justice or with our judiciary. It was made certain in the British North America Act that we would have nothing to do with the judiciary or with the administration of justice. I am absolutely opposed to the expression of the view by anyone that our jurisdiction goes beyond that of making the law or that we should tell our courts what they should do and what decision should be made. That is why I am speaking on this very subject. That is why I say that in amending the code so far as capital punishment is concerned we should do so in a way that will remove the function of the cabinet in this regard.

I am not saying there is no such thing as the royal prerogative to pardon. That should exist, but it should continue to exist as something to be used only in the most extraordinary circumstances. It should not be embodied in our Criminal Code by making provision, as the bill does, that a jury may ask the cabinet to exercise clemency. I say that the politicians should stay out of this matter, and our crown attorneys should do likewise. Our crown attorneys should not be able to say that this Canadian citizen will be tried on a murder charge for which the punishment is hanging while another citizen will also be tried for murder but under a charge for which the punishment is not hanging. That is what the bill sets forth.

I heard hon. members speak on second reading of the bill. I heard the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, who said he was opposed to this change if it means that we will be trying to protect the criminal rather than Canadian society. I appreciated what he said, and it is most unfortunate that he is not here today. I should like to ask him to support my views about the bill which gives extended power, in that it practically makes the cabinet a part of our judicial process. It makes the cabinet of Canada the final court of appeal for murder. It also gives crown attorneys and police officers the power to decide who will face hanging if he is found guilty and who will face life imprisonment. I am absolutely opposed to that.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Godin: After I have finished my remarks I will be prepared to answer any questions. I am convinced as to this matter as I have never been before with regard to anything else. I have a great appreciation for the way justice is administered in Canada, but to give those who administer justice the opportunity, duty and function to decide who is going to face hanging and who is going to face life imprisonment is not in my view the type of improvement in the law that the Canadian people want to see implemented. It is not the type of improvement that the legislators in this house should try to formulate.

I realize that it is most difficult to be precise in describing all crimes and the circumstances that go to constitute each crime. Our duty today is not to get up and congratulate the Minister of Justice on this wonderful bill. Our duty today and this week is to study this bill and see what results it will have in Canadian society. We have no other function but to sit here today, tomorrow and the balance of this week to study this bill, and for that reason I am pleased to take advantage of this occasion during the clause by clause study of the bill to give to the minister some of the opinions I may have. It is possible that my opinions are not the best. I realize, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Justice will not ask the Liberal opposition to create the bill which this government decides to pass.

We know that a special committee of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada studied this subject and made a report in 1955. Other members have mentioned this. The report was not favourable to a bill of this type. A study of this subject was undertaken in England in 1957, although England has no criminal code such as we have in Canada. After this study was completed the government decided to pass a homicide code which pertains to murder only, and this code contained certain sections to which the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Niagara Falls have referred. The government of the United Kingdom had reasons for placing certain things in that bill which we do not find in this bill.

If I may return to clause 1, Mr. Chairman, I must state that after reading it I was most surprised. It is especially surprising when read in conjunction with other clauses of this bill, such as clause 7 and clause 13. I realize that I should not embark on a discussion of these other clauses at this time and should limit my remarks to clause 1. However, I am sure the Minister of Justice and others will permit me to discuss clause 1 in so far as it relates to other clauses or could be complicated by other clauses which we find in this bill.

What do we find, and what is the first surprise in this clause? We know that in Canada today we have the crimes of murder, manslaughter and other forms of homicide such as infanticide. We are trying to arrive at a definition which will assist judges and juries in making a finding one way or the other in so far as capital punishment is concerned. I should like the Minister of Justice to try to follow the reasoning which I am about to advance.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That would be a devious path.

Mr. Godin: Hon. members opposite may find it very funny, but in clause 1 we find this when we are trying to ascertain whether murder is capital or non-capital:

> Murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, where—

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I were to ask anyone, "Did you hear about the murder which was committed in respect of the Minister of Justice", would that question be construed to mean that the Minister of Justice had killed someone or that the Minister of Justice had been killed? As I understand the English language, when someone refers to a murder in respect of a person he is referring to the person who has been killed and not the person who kills. Now, the problem goes further—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Godin: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a question on this point so that I may clearly understand the hon. member's thinking. I believe it is an important point. Does the hon. gentleman not think that the answer is provided in clause 2 (a), where it is clearly indicated, it seems to me, by the phrase "on the part of such person"?

Mr. Godin: I thank the hon. member for Essex East for his question, and it is a pertinent one which I am prepared to elucidate. I suggest that the second paragraph to which the hon. member has referred relates to the first one because of the use of the word "such". Paragraph (a) plainly says, "on the part of such person", and in the French translation we find the words "à l'égard de".

I shall give an illustration of the arguments that might be used by lawyers in such cases. If I deliberately plan to kill A, who is supposed to be at a certain street corner one night carrying a million dollars in a yellow envelope, and I deliberately plan to kill him for the purpose of getting this envelope, but when I go to that street corner at the precise time somebody else comes along and I kill him only to find out it is not A but B, then according to the wording of this bill I could only be found guilty of non-capital murder. You can only be found guilty of capital murder if you kill the person you intended to kill. This is the way this bill will work.

I see the hon. member for Carleton shaking his head in the negative. I realize that the intention of the Minister of Justice is to relate the offence—

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend would permit an interruption, I may say that what my hon. friend has just said is complete nonsense. If he will look at section 202, which is preserved in this bill, he will realize that what he has just said is quite wrong.

Mr. Godin: The only reason the Minister of Justice cites section 202 is because I referred to the yellow envelope.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Godin: I recall to you, Mr. Chairman, that section 202 only refers to a murder which is committed while you are trying to commit a felony. If a man kills another person because he is the lover of his wife, he does not kill him because he wants to commit a felony. He kills him because he wants to do away with him. The Minister of Justice has indicated to me that I should be very precise. Let us leave the yellow envelope out of our consideration. Let us say the man he went to meet at that corner was the lover of his wife and he wants to do away with him. He goes there for the purpose of killing him. How does section 202 come into play in that case? It seems to me that if you kill the wrong person you are not guilty of capital murder, according to this bill, and not subject to capital punishment. It may be, as the minister has mentioned, that if you apply force during the commission of a felony you fall within section 202, that is while you are trying to get the yellow envelope.

I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Justice should be distracted by the fact I used the yellow envelope as an example, and not the case of the lover. What about the person who wants to do away with the milkman and does away with the bread man by mistake? I am prepared to admit that the Minister of Justice definitely wanted to tie capital punishment to the person who committed the offence and not the person who was the victim of the homicide; there is no doubt about that. However, the words used make it clear to everyone that judges and juries will be forced to say, "It is written this way but we must find, for the purposes of equity and justice, that this pertains to the person who committed the offence". Therefore even if this person committed murder against the wrong man, they must still find him guilty because of the way the bill is worded.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I should also like to make a few remarks on the use of the adjective "deliberate", in section 2(a) of the act.

The word "deliberate", according to the dictionaries, does not have quite the same meaning in French as in English. The English word means that someone has done something "without impulse", "without deliberation", while according to the French dictionaries, the word "deliberate" rather means "voluntarily".

I recognize that the Minister of Justice, who considered the English version in the first place, just as I did, will say that if there is any difference as between the English and the French texts in Canada, the meaning of the English terminology must be accepted.

However, I fail to see why a province should always, in regard to that section, have to go by the rule requiring that the English interpretation be the criterion.

I feel we should try to find a translation involving no distinction between the two languages, such as there is now between the words "deliberate" and "délibéré".

For instance, on the basis of the French terminology, I would say that a man, finding himself betrayed in his love for his wife, might go into his garage, shed or basement, pick up a gun and kill the guilty party.

There is no doubt that on the basis of the English version, this individual would get away, because his action would have been prompted by an insult. That is what is meant by the word "deliberate".

However, on the basis of the word "délibéré", he would be guilty, because a man who goes to his shed and picks up a weapon to kill another man does so voluntarily.

Perhaps the distinction is rather fine, but I would remind hon. members that it is important to look at the wording of the bill.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, I could mention other flagrant misgivings which arise out of clause 1 of the bill. In subclause 2 (b) (i) it says that murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, who—

—by his own act caused or assisted in causing the bodily harm from which the death ensued.

Then in (ii) and (iii) we find these words. For instance, (iii) says:

—by his own act stopped or assisted in the stopping of the breath from which the death ensued.

This apparently means there were differences of opinion in the mind of the Minister of Justice or whoever drafted this bill. If a person chokes somebody, only the person who actually does the choking can be found guilty, but in subclause 2 (i) it is said:

—by his own act caused or assisted in causing—

Surely lawyers will discuss this and juries will listen to a case where perhaps someone flies somebody in his airplane 50 miles to commit a murder, or takes him to the place of the murder, and the jury will decide that person is guilty of assisting in causing bodily harm. I think the Minister of Justice should study the problem in relation to the differences in subsection 2 (i), (ii) and (iii).

I am sure that in a case where a man has no way of getting to a place where he wants to commit a robbery, and at the time the robbery is committed he is forced to shoot and kill somebody, under section 202 the crown will argue, quoting subsection 2 (i) of this bill, that the driver of the automobile should be found guilty. But with regard to the driver of the automobile in the case where somebody has been driven to choke a person to death, the driver cannot be found guilty because this specific, concrete clause is contained in the bill.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Has the hon. member the consent of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Godin: Let us take it slightly further. In other clauses these words are used "assisted in applying the force". We know that murders have been committed and will in all probability be committed in the future by people who are practically wholly unaware of what they are doing. I should like the Minister of Justice to follow this example and give consideration to this matter. Suppose a doctor wanted to do away with a certain person and prepared a lethal injection for that person without his nurse knowing anything about it. The doctor would say to the nurse. "Mr. Jones is coming in at three o'clock. Tell him I have prescribed this injection and give it to him". Then the nurse would be the one who actually applied the force, in the form of the injection, from which that man died. Under this bill she would be guilty of the offence of murder.

I realize that hon. members will say, "The question of mens rea comes into it, and she was not aware of what she was doing". I agree that this question and others enter into it, but are accused persons always capable of giving evidence that should be given to show they had no mens rea and were actually no party to the offence? I think the words "knowingly assisted" in applying the physical force whereby a person dies should be put into the bill. Even then I am not sure this would solve the problem. As I have told the committee on previous occasions—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could draw the hon. member's attention to section 201 which reads:

201. Culpable homicide is murder

(a) where the person who causes the death of a human being

(i) means to cause his death, or

(ii) means to cause him bodily harm that he knows is likely to cause his death, and is reckless whether death ensues or not;

(b) where a person meaning to cause death to a human being or meaning to cause him bodily harm that he knows is likely to cause his death, and being reckless whether death ensues or not, by accident or mistake causes death to another human being, notwithstanding that he does not mean to cause death or bodily harm to that human being; or

(c) where a person, for an unlawful object, does anything that he knows or ought to know is likely to cause death, and thereby causes death to a human being, notwithstanding that he desires to effect his object without causing death or bodily harm to any human being.

If the nurse were completely ignorant of what the syringe contained, she would be perfectly innocent and could not be charged at all.

Mr. Godin: I am just stating the problem. I realize that if the nurse could prove she had no intent that would be the case, but accused persons are not always in a position to furnish the evidence that is required for a jury to find they had no part in the offence.

I realize that the clauses of this bill do not abolish those matters which may be given in evidence by an accused person, but we are trying to establish when a person shall be judged guilty of capital murder and thereby suffer capital punishment and hang, and when a person shall be found guilty of non-capital murder and therefore will not hang. I am suggesting to the committee that this matter should be given careful consideration. I am not saying that in no way will anybody be able to obtain justice in our courts. I am giving these examples, and more specifically the last example to illustrate my point. I know that if there is absolutely no mens rea and the jury finds there is no mens rea or intent, the person accused cannot be found guilty of murder. I admit that.

However, sometimes these circumstances are not easy to prove. I feel that as we are now considering how the Criminal Code should be worded in order that proper direction shall be given to judges and juries, our consideration should be as complete as possible and the Criminal Code should be worded in a way that would meet to the fullest extent the different circumstances which may arise. I repeat that I am confident no government would be capable of formulating a statute which would satisfy the requirements of the situation 100 per cent. But it is not enough merely to congratulate the Minister of Justice. We have the duty to ensure that whatever measure we do enact will meet the situation to the best of our capacity and knowledge.

I should like to raise one question in particular concerning clause 1. I think the duty of distinguishing in the first instance between the two classes of murder should not rest in the hands of whoever is bringing the prosecution. It will be my intention to suggest later that the whole of clause 7 should disappear. It is my view that everyone committing a capital crime of the nature covered by one or other of the two classes of murder should first of all be charged with the crime of murder to find out whether he is guilty of having committed a murder at all. If a jury found that a murder had been committed by the accused, then direction would be given to them by the judge to find, further, whether that person is guilty of capital murder or not. In this way all Canadians committing capital crimes would be faced with the same murder charge. It is my view that if this proposal were adopted it would reduce possible confusion among juries. I know how long and difficult are some of the charges made by judges to juries in murder cases.

It is true there are other fields where the crown attorney can make important decisions with regard to the nature of the crime with which an accused person is charged. The most serious example which occurs to me is the case where the prosecuting officer may choose to proceed on a charge of manslaughter rather than murder. But I say that at this time when we are altering the legislation concerning capital punishment, our court officials should no longer be in a position virtually to decide which person is to face a charge involving hanging and which person is to face a charge involving imprisonment for life. I am not prepared at this time to put forward a formal resolution or amendment, but I am sure the discussion on this clause will continue for some time and I shall almost certainly find it necessary to speak further on some of the amendments which are placed before the committee.

There is another feature about this bill which I find surprising. Although the United Kingdom parliament in 1957 exempted from liability to the penalty for capital murder anyone with a certain degree of mental instability, there is a clause here which provides that any man whose birth certificate shows he was younger than 18 when he committed an offence may escape the death penalty, though he may well have the intelligence of a man of 25. But in this country if it is found that a man has the mentality of a 12 year old, which is the Christie case, he can be hung. Surely the penalty for the crime of murder should be attached not to the birth certificate he carries but to his capacity to commit murder, knowing full well what he is doing. Why should a person who has a birth certificate proving that he is younger than 18 escape, although it may be recognized in court that he has a superior intelligence, while a man whose birth certificate shows he was over 18 at the time the offence was committed but whose intelligence turns out to be that of a 12 year old, will incur the fullest rigour of the law? I think the minister should give us an explanation of this point before we proceed very much further.

I appreciate that members of the committee have given me an opportunity to continue after my time expired. I will avail myself of other opportunities later to discuss certain other phases of the bill.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask the hon. member a question? He mentioned during his address that the decision as to whether a charge of capital murder or non-capital murder should be preferred ought not to be left with the crown attorney. Can the hon. member tell me how this would differ from the present situation, where the crown attorney has the duty of deciding between a charge of murder and a charge of manslaughter?

Mr. Godin: Yes, I shall be pleased to give the hon. member my views on that. The present bill does not deal with manslaughter as it is defined in the Criminal Code. I am confining my observations to the present bill, which deals only with murder. It is true that at present a police officer may choose to charge a person with manslaughter or he may choose to charge him with murder. We are not being asked to alter that. I am not saying I fully agree with the present system, but I do not disagree with it as completely as I do with the circumstances envisaged in the present bill, where a policeman or a crown attorney will be given the responsibility of deciding whether a man is to be charged with one class of murder, which is punishable by death, or another class of murder which is punishable by imprisonment for life.

Mr. Denis: As far as I can see there is plenty in this bill to please those who are in favour of the abolition of capital punishment. Those who are against abolition may also find something to say in favour of the bill, because there are a great many contradictions contained in this measure. There is even contradiction between clause 1 and the explanatory note. I should like to draw the attention of the minister to what I think is an inconsistency arising from clause 1 subclause (2) (i), which reads:

> Murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, where—
> (b) it is within section 202 and such person
> (i) by his own act caused or assisted in causing the bodily harm from which the death ensued.

Now I shall read the explanatory note at the end of the page:

> What is provided by the new section 202A is that of all those crimes which may be murder as defined, only murder of a calculated and deliberate nature shall be capital, or murder committed in the course of carrying out any of the crimes mentioned in section 202—generally speaking a crime itself involving the use of force or stealth, thus importing the element of deliberation. Under the latter alternative, however, only the person who actually committed the act or applied the force causing death, or counselled the doing of it, would be guilty of capital murder.

That is in contradiction with the provisions of the measure itself. The law states that an individual is guilty of capital murder and liable to capital punishment if by his own act he has caused or assisted in causing the bodily harm from which the death ensued.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member will consult subparagraph (v) he will see that the individual is also guilty of capital murder if he has counselled or procured another person to do any act covered in this section.

Mr. Denis: I should like to present a hypothetical case to the minister, in respect of which I hope he will give an explanation. Suppose a group of five individuals decided to rob a bank, and two of them confronted the tellers in the bank, one watched the doorway inside, one watched the doorway outside, and one acted as driver of the getaway car, and during the course of this robbery one of the individuals killed the manager of the bank. According to this proposed legislation only the individual who shot and killed the manager would be liable to capital punishment.

Mr. Fulton: Unless—

Mr. Denis: Yes, unless he was close to an individual who told him to shoot. However, the guard behind the door, the outside lookout, and the driver of the car, all bandits of the same gang, would not be liable to capital punishment. Only the individual who shot the manager would hang, so it would take five such robberies in order to get the whole gang. Four fifths of the gang would be completely safe from hanging. In light of that interpretation of this proposed legislation, I suggest those individuals who are in favour of the abolition of capital punishment will be in favour of this bill.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, having listened to the contributions made by learned lawyers in this chamber, perhaps a few words from a layman would not be out of order at this time. I did not speak on second reading of this bill because I had not had time to study it thoroughly. However, I should like to take advantage of this general discussion on the first clause to state my position and lend support to the request put forward by my colleagues on this side of the house that this legislation be sent to a special committee for further study.

This is a very important piece of legislation, perhaps the most important to be dealt with this session. It is a very difficult piece of legislation to evaluate. Since we are not dealing with it in a partisan manner, it is important that everything should be said and done in order that the public may be fully informed in respect of what this legislation will accomplish, and as to how it compares with the legislation it will replace.

Mr. Fulton: This does not replace anything; it adds to it.

Mr. Carter: It is amending legislation.

Mr. Fulton: There is an important distinction involved. This does not replace anything, but adds a provision that there shall be two degrees of murder. There has to be murder in the first place; only then the question will arise, is it capital or not?

Mr. Carter: I agree with the minister's interpretation and thank him for his correction. I readily admit that what we are adding by this legislation is an improvement, but there are some features which are perhaps objectionable. I suggest the legislation would perhaps be more desirable if those objectionable features were left out. I suggest that is something which could be better determined by a special committee than in the way we are dealing with it here.

The wide difference of opinion which exists among various members of this house in respect of this legislation was very evident last Wednesday in the vote which took place then. The members who strongly advocated the abolition of capital punishment voted in favour of this legislation because they felt it was a step in that direction, while those members who were perhaps equally in favour of the retention of capital punishment voted against this legislation because they too felt it was a step towards abolition.

Mr. Jones: Perhaps the hon. member would tell us which parts of this legislation he feels should be left out.

Mr. Carter: If the hon. gentleman will possess his soul in patience I shall try to outline those portions.

Mr. Jones: We should like to know what they are.

Mr. Carter: They will come out in the wash.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): It will probably be dirty wash.

Mr. Carter: Editorials and press comments in respect of this legislation have generally been quite favourable. That favourable comment has been more or less based, I suggest, on the assessment that this legislation represents a step in the direction of the abolition of capital punishment. The minister has denied that assessment and, in fact, has quite properly pointed to the fact that this legislation does retain capital punishment. Last Wednesday I voted against this legislation because that vote had to do with the principle of the bill, the retention of capital punishment. I am personally opposed to capital punishment for two reasons, which I shall attempt to outline briefly.

The first reason is that in spite of all the precautions which may be taken, as well as the safeguards written into the legislation, innocent people have been hanged. We know that as a fact. In my view that fact outweighs all the deterrent value of capital punishment, which I understand is the main reason for its retention. The second reason I oppose the retention of capital punishment is that I feel society itself is to some extent responsible for the guilt of accused persons. When an individual is born into this world he is either normal or handicapped. If an individual is born handicapped and later commits murder, there is no way of knowing to what extent the murder resulted from the handicap which he inherited. On the other hand, if an individual is born normal and becomes a criminal, he does so to some extent as a result of his environment. In view of the fact that society is responsible for the environment which leads to the development of that type of individual, it is my belief that society is to some extent responsible for the crimes that person commits.

Since society is responsible for the imposition of capital punishment, that society is to me likened to Pilate washing his hands of the whole business. Furthermore, I believe in the principle that society should not take away something which cannot be restored. When the life of an innocent person is taken away by society in error, that life cannot be restored. I also oppose the retention of capital punishment for that reason.

The curious thing in respect of this legislation is that the minister states it retains capital punishment because of the evaluation of public opinion in Canada as being in favour of retaining the death penalty. I believe it is true that this legislation retains capital punishment on the basis of its deterrent value. I fully agree with that. I think that for the normal person the death penalty is a very strong deterrent, perhaps the strongest there is. But a curious thing about this legislation is that it has abolished the death penalty for all those groups of people who would be most likely to be deterred by it, and it has retained the death penalty for the professional, calculating criminal who is the least likely to be deterred by it. Therefore, on the one hand we are retaining a principle, and on the other we are lessening the deterrent value on which the principle is based.

Surely the object of our legislation should not be to classify types of murder but to deter killing, to save people's lives and to prevent killing. If a person is killed it does not make much difference whether he is killed by somebody whose crime is going to be classed non-capital or by somebody whose crime is going to be classed as capital murder. It certainly does not alter the fact that the person is dead. What we wish to do is to try to lessen the number of killings. If the deterrent value is valid at all, then we should be extending it, but in this bill we are diminishing it and reserving it only for those groups of people who are least likely to be deterred at all.

As I said, there are some good things in this bill, but I have pointed out one of the objectionable features that my hon. friend inquired about. I think the age limit and the automatic appeal are desirable features, but we are dealing with this legislation in a non-political way. I think the proper thing to do is to send it to a committee where we can get expert opinion from people versed in the practice of criminal law so that we can produce the very best piece of legislation possible. At the same time I think we should inform the people fully as to what the difference is between this legislation and the present legislation, or what we are actually adding to the legislation already in existence because actually when it is evaluated I do not think we are adding very much; in fact, we may be taking away more than we are adding to it.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I should like to pass a few comments on this legislation. I listened with interest to some hon. members who spoke this morning and this afternoon. Because of the remarks made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Niagara Falls, I thought the record might give the impression that there were not many men in the house learned in the law and well qualified to consider all the ramifications of the bill before us. I think the tenor of the remarks expressed by those three I have mentioned amounted to this, that we really should send this bill to a committee or hold it up for further study so that we could bring in some people expert in the law, some who have had considerable legal experience and who can advise us on what might be the effect of this bill.

Just for the record, Mr. Chairman, I started to look over the composition of the house and the legal talent available. While I am not acquainted with the experience and qualifications of all hon. members, I do know that on the government benches, for instance, we have some very outstanding legal talent. The Prime Minister has a reputation in this field which I think is familiar to all hon. members and indeed it is well known across the country. He is ably supported by the Minister of National Revenue who has an outstanding reputation as a barrister. The Secretary of State has a big name in the province of Quebec as a crown prosecutor and defence counsel. The Solicitor General has some 15 years' experience on the bench plus many years at the bar. Therefore, I submit, Mr. Chairman, the cabinet itself is well represented in experience by people who have had much to do with criminal law and capital cases.

The talent is not limited to the cabinet benches, however. We have such outstanding barristers as the hon. member for Parkdale who is perhaps the country's leading criminal lawyer. We have from the province of Alberta the hon. member for Peace River who has many years of outstanding service at the Alberta bar, and his trial experience includes I believe some 20 murder cases. There are other members scattered throughout the house; for instance, the hon. member for Peel has behind him, a pretty fair amount of criminal law work in the general practice field and it includes some capital cases. The hon. member for Victoria, (B.C.) has had a very wide and distinguished career at the bar, including a lot of criminal work.

I have mentioned those members whose experience and reputation are known to me. I have not attempted to make an accurate survey of the house, as I am sure there are probably a good many other lawyers in the house who have even more experience than some of those I have mentioned.

Out of my own career and experience I would mention only one case. I have had only one murder trial, but I think the committee might find it of interest because it is my considered opinion that while the man I defended was charged with murder—he was convicted of manslaughter—I am convinced that had he been charged under this legislation he would have been charged with capital murder and would have been found guilty of non-capital murder. The point I make is that for a long time we have had juries reluctant to bring in a verdict of guilty of murder where a man was going to hang for it. They have tended to bring in a verdict of manslaughter and in some cases where that has not been possible I believe that some murderers may have escaped conviction altogether because the jury just would not condemn them to death. Therefore, by this legislation I think we shall get a little more proper administration of justice in that we shall have convictions where there should be convictions without fear of too much punishment.

I should like to comment just for one minute on the remarks of the hon. member for Nickel Belt who seemed to be obsessed with the fear that it was too much of a load for the crown prosecutors to ask them to decide whether or not they should arraign a person on a charge of capital murder or non-capital murder, and who seemed not to be able to understand murder and manslaughter as we have them now.

I suggest that the burden on the crown is going to be even easier now, if it is to be changed at all. I believe that the crown prosecutors normally charge the most serious crime that can possibly be sustained by the evidence they have to consider. In that way they cannot make any mistake because if the evidence falls short of the most serious offence the jury can always find for the lesser offence, and I really fail to understand the hon. member's considerable worry on this point.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I can make no claim to any legal knowledge or legal education with respect to this matter which would justify my intervention but the matter is such an important one that I feel I should say something about the bill before us, more particularly as I was not able to take part in the debate on second reading. When the minister, whose speech I regret I was not able to hear but which I have read in Hansard, introduced the bill he said, as found on page 5220 of Hansard:

> ... only on rare occasions is this house required to consider and amend or change laws or institutions that form part of the very foundation of our society.

This, Mr. Chairman, is one of those rare occasions. Capital punishment, which is the extinguishing of an individual human life, is certainly not in my view a matter of a politically partisan character when we in this house attempt to deal with it. A bill of this kind, as I see it, deals with fundamental moral values of our society and should be and is being treated in that sense in this house. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we in the official opposition are not considering this bill in any partisan sense. It has been made clear, so far as we are concerned, that it is a matter for each of us to decide as to how he will vote and the attitude he will take in accordance with his individual conscience and his individual judgment based on considerations of conscience.

The bill has been passed in principle, and if I had been in the house I would have supported its passing. The principle, as I see it, is that capital punishment should not be eliminated but that there should be a limitation on it, through a distinction between murders for which the death penalty is provided and other types of murder. In other words, there should be a distinction between capital and non-capital murder.

In following the debate and reading Hansard I have been interested to note that there have been those who have opposed the bill for diametrically opposite reasons. In his introduction of the bill the minister stated, and I am paraphrasing what he said, that public opinion in this country was not ready for complete abolition. Perhaps he is right, but I wonder how he has managed to come to that conclusion. Whether or not that is the case, the bill indicates that in the minds of the government this country is presumably ready now to make progress toward the abolition of capital punishment by limiting the categories of murder to which the death penalty is attached.

There are however, some points of very great importance which are related to murder and capital punishment and which are not included within the bill. There is one I should like to mention. I ask myself, why did the government, seeing that it was dealing with this problem, omit reference to the manner or method of execution? In the report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on capital punishment submitted on June 27, 1956, section 91, page 21, reads in part as follows:

> The committee has concluded, after weighing these considerations, that hanging is not the most satisfactory method of execution which might be employed and, accordingly, recommends its abolition.

As hon. members know, that recommendation was made after a great deal of consideration and long and careful examination. The government has not seen fit to accept this recommendation in the legislation before us, and perhaps the minister might be able to give us some information later as to why no action was taken in this regard. It certainly would appear to me, from the study I have been able to give the matter, that there are more humane methods of execution than hanging. As I see it, there could hardly be a less humane method. I cannot understand why the government did not take advantage of this opportunity to deal with that particular problem and perhaps the minister will be able to explain why when he speaks later in this debate.

As I see it, Mr. Chairman, and this point has been dealt with by other speakers on clause 1, the provisions of the bill are defective in two ways. First, in adopting the basic principle of the bill that there has to be a distinction between murders for which there is to be the death penalty and other murders, surely it is axiomatic that that definition should be drawn as precisely as possible. In a matter of this kind nothing could be much more important than the maximum amount of precision possible when we are dealing with a question, literally, of life and death. There should be no room for doubt or uncertainty as to when the death penalty is to be imposed and in that sense, as other speakers have pointed out, it seems to me that the bill is defective and that it can be improved.

Murder in general, I admit there can be exceptions to this, requires as an element that there be an intent to kill. We ask ourselves, what additional element or what additional elements, because there may be more than one, are required to make murder planned and deliberate? The bill does contemplate such a distinction, of course, and therefore it would be up to each jury to distinguish between a merely intentional murder and one that is planned and deliberate. It seems to me that we may get into a great deal of trouble in the future in attempting to work out that definition in a way which will not create injustice.

I find it difficult myself to make up my own mind that there is a basic justification for making the imposition of the death penalty turn on that distinction. I know, of course, there can be distinctions in murder and those distinctions have been worked out in legislation in other countries, more particularly in the United Kingdom. However, the distinctions there, as I will try to point out in a moment, are not the same as those embodied in this bill.

Then, there is the effect of this bill, if it should become law, on the deterrent character of punishment. A good deal of consideration has been given to the deterrent effect of capital punishment by speakers who have taken part in this debate. I think it is generally admitted by experts who have given consideration to this matter, Mr. Chairman, and also by the minister himself in his speech, that capital punishment as a conscious deterrent against crime cannot be exactly evaluated. I have, as other members have, read a lot of statistics with regard to this. You can compare the experience of one country where there is no capital punishment with the experience of another country where there is. You can compare the experience of one country during a time when that country had capital punishment, and after it was abolished. You can compare the experience of a state in the United States which has capital punishment with the experience of one that has not. I have not, myself, been able to come to any satisfactory conclusion, merely on the basis of these statistics, because there are too many other factors that may affect those statistics and you are dealing with a question of such fundamental moral importance. So I cannot come to any final conclusion, on the basis of those statistics which I have been able to study.

As the minister himself has indicated—I am again paraphrasing his words—it is the effect of punishment in stigmatizing conduct so that the ordinary citizen does not contemplate such conduct that is probably its greatest effect; that is where, as I see it, the deterrent lies. If I may use an expression which has now become a homely one, punishment conditions the mind in the same way as Pavlov's dog was conditioned to salivate when the bell rang. We all have mental blocks created by the existence of punishment against criminal acts. I believe however, that punishment is not, itself a conscious deterrent, except in the case of the professional criminal or in one or two other instances. As the French philosopher Pascal once said, speaking in a different context, "if there were only a small probability of eternal damnation the risk of sinning would appear excessive". Well, that may be true, but it has not prevented sinners from existing in the world for a long time, nor has the existence of capital punishment prevented murder during the centuries that capital punishment has existed. Considering the number of crimes for which capital punishment once was imposed history shows that at times it has not had as much deterrent effect as the reduction in the number of capital crimes has had.

This bill seems to be founded on what I consider to be the shaky basis that a planned and deliberate murder can be deterred by capital punishment. I doubt, in practice, if this will work out. Perhaps I may give one example which was once given a great deal of attention in the press. Not long ago a young man who was crazed by jealousy went out and purchased a knife. He proceeded halfway across the city and stabbed his estranged wife. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the killing was planned and deliberate. The certainty of capital punishment did not serve as a deterrent. The individual in this case was perhaps beyond the reach, in his mind, of any deterrent. Why should the death penalty apply here, as it would I think if this man, in a momentary loss of control, killed someone yet in technical circumstances which would hardly be interpreted as otherwise than planned and deliberate?

The distinction in this bill between planned and deliberate murder and other murder appears, at least, to give effect to the view—this worries me—that these murders are worse than the others in a moral sense. This interpretation would appear to accept the former principle of retribution and vengeance, although I am sure that was not in the mind of the minister when drafting this bill.

Perhaps at this point the minister would permit me to ask him a specific question with which he might be willing to deal now. I think it is a question that has already been asked this afternoon by the hon. member for Niagara Falls while I was out of the house. If during the course of a riot in a prison a guard were killed by the prisoners, would the charge of capital murder be laid against the prisoner committing the offence? As I understand this bill, if the guard were killed under those circumstances, the murder might well not be planned and deliberate and therefore might not be subject to the death penalty. If that is a correct interpretation, does the minister not feel that this would place the prison warden and the prison guards in an intolerably dangerous situation? Would it not discriminate against them, in that sense?

The homicide act of the United Kingdom, as has been pointed out by other speakers, rests on a very different basis from that of this particular bill. The British act, by selecting certain types of killings or certain types of victims, is aimed at the professional criminal, and at the protection of policemen or prison wardens who come in contact with professional criminals; also to prisoners under life sentence who otherwise would have nothing to lose by committing another capital crime. The obvious purpose of the United Kingdom bill is to create a deterrent, and as I mentioned earlier, where a deterrent would be most likely to be effective.

In his statement the Minister of Justice suggested that there were certain murders that would be covered by this bill which would not be dealt with by the British legislation, and that of course is quite true. On the other hand, I suggest there will be murders covered by this bill for which there is no justification in applying the death penalty in one case and not in the other. In other words, I suggest there is greater uncertainty in the division of crimes in this bill than in the British measure. I know that in Great Britain at the present time there is a good deal of uneasiness because there is that uncertainty over their act and how it is working out.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the course recommended by more than one speaker in this discussion is one that should be followed. This bill would stand over so it could be submitted to a committee, where representations from experienced law enforcement agencies could be heard, where evidence could be taken bearing on the actual clauses of the bill, where organizations like the Canadian Bar Association could offer their views on the details of this bill and where provincial deputy attorneys general could be given the same opportunity. It seems to me it would be wise if this bill were submitted to a committee so that this course of action could be followed. If that were done, we in this house would have the advantage of the experience, judgment, evidence and views of those people, some of whom I ventured to mention a few moments ago.

I should also like to suggest—and I do it in a constructive way—that with a bill of this kind, with a matter of such fundamental moral character, with a matter dealing with life and death, when we are entering into new ground in this country, where the results may be very good but where, on the other hand they may not work out as we hope, it would be wise to include something in this bill which would provide for its re-examination and possible revision at the end of a certain period of years. I hope the minister will give consideration to this suggestion.

It is quite clear that organized society has been progressing now for generations in its attitude toward the death penalty. I think—and I am quite frank in saying this—this bill is a step further in that progress; yet there is certainly no reason to assume that this bill, and I am sure the minister does not make that assumption, has achieved any finality in dealing with such a complex problem.

That being the case, I have put forward two proposals. One is that this bill be given further consideration before a committee, and second, that some provision should be put in the bill to make sure its term of application is limited so it can be re-examined at the end of that time. As I have said, I feel that in some of its details this bill is defective. It is our desire on this side of the chamber, those of us who support this bill in principle, to make it more effective. In due course, when we get to the detailed consideration of the clauses, we will put forward some changes which we hope will have that result.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I know it is often said by speakers in this house that they had no intention of participating in the debate. I can assure you, sir, that on this occasion that statement is not a mere formality.

I took the attitude that in view of the tremendous amount of study that had been given to this question by the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General there was no reason why I should say anything regarding a matter in which over the years I have had more than a passing interest.

All of us in the practice of law have had from time to time the opportunity of appearing either for the crown or the defence. I belong to that group in the practice of law composed of those who have never appeared for the prosecution in a murder case. I have often said that I had an outstanding record as a crown prosecutor, for I never lost a case. However, that statement is somewhat diminished in importance when I add that from the time of my appointment until I resigned after a change in the government in Saskatchewan I had no prosecutions. However, I have been intensely interested in this problem of capital punishment and have expressed myself strongly on this subject on many occasions, the major reason for that being the possible conviction of an innocent man.

I am not going to go into the problem of the retention of capital punishment as against its abolition. The Leader of the Opposition says statistics can establish anything that the person producing them desires in that field. It will never be possible to look into man's mind and determine an answer to this question which has exercised the thinking of men in every generation, but it is of interest—and this is a fact—that in upper Canada during the first 25 or 30 years of the nineteenth century capital punishment was imposed for a variety of offences.

I remember my old grandfather telling me that he was present at an execution in upper Canada when he was a boy. It was the execution of one charged with pickpocketing. The execution was at Aurora, I think, or one of those localities immediately north of muddy York, as it then was. Everybody gathered from the surrounding countryside, and a number of Scots residents of that area had their pockets picked while witnessing the execution of one for the same offence.

Only recently I read the record of that era by one who has made a great study of punishment and I find there was justification for that penalty. However, one of my major concerns has been the danger of the execution of someone who had not committed the offence. I can do no more than say that this fear is not unjustified by actual experience in our country.

I do not think it is general, but when one innocent man is executed it shows the irrevocability of capital punishment. In order to meet that situation, a great deal of study has been given to the matter of ensuring that anyone accused of murder shall have available to him all of those defences and safeguards that would be available to anyone else.

I think in this legislation we are meeting the danger that is inherent in trials. The human factor is always present. However, we have endeavoured to meet it by certain safeguards. I am not going into the particulars, but I think the major safeguard is the automatic appeal. There are others to which reference could be made.

Nothing has caused me, as Prime Minister, more concern than the coming before cabinet of the various cases, after conviction of murdering, when the question arises as to the exercise of the royal prerogative. It is a frightening experience. Over the years in Canada the responsibility in this has rested upon the governor general in council.

I know hon. gentlemen opposite who have served in the cabinets of this country realize something of the experience it is to examine with care and attention the evidence and also the reports which are given by the officials and the recommendation by the judge. It is a responsibility which I feel should be taken from the shoulders of the entire cabinet. In the United Kingdom the home secretary exercises the royal prerogative. He recommends the course to be followed. I am informed that he does not consult other members of the cabinet though he does communicate in difficult cases, as he sees them, with the prime minister for consideration. We have built up over the years—and I am not criticizing it—a routine whereby the cabinet considers these matters, and anyone who has gone through the experience knows something of the awful weight of responsibility that is felt by those who have the duty to examine death sentences and recommend whether or not those sentences should be carried out.

I feel this legislation will go a long way to ensure that mistakes shall not take place. At the same time it will provide juries with an opportunity—one which they have so seldom realized in the past that they have possessed—to recommend mercy when an individual has been found guilty of capital murder. On many occasions I have encountered cases where members of the jury have said after a trial, "If only I had known I could have recommended mercy I would have done so". As far as recommendations of mercy are concerned, there has been no inconsistency on the part of the cabinet in accepting such recommendations. They have always been followed by this government. In the period from 1930 to 1957 there were some 30 recommendations to mercy to which effect was not given by the cabinet. I feel that responsibility for carrying out the law and maintaining the safety of the public in each area depends on the jury. Having heard the evidence and having come to the conclusion on the basis of the law as explained to them by the judge that a verdict of guilty is the only one they can bring in, a jury ought none the less to have the right to add a recommendation to mercy, and having done that, to hope that the royal prerogative will be reasonably carried out. I am not dealing with the future now; I am dealing with the period during which I have been in office as Prime Minister. In that period we have concluded that where recommendations to mercy are made, the proper weight should be given to them. How to meet the circumstances and take from the cabinet this responsibility is something to which I have always devoted my thinking. I feel we might well adopt a course analogous to that adopted in the United Kingdom today whereby the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General would make the determination and recommendation and, on the basis of the opportunity now given to juries to recommend mercy, would be able to bring their recommendation to the cabinet as a whole. That recommendation, excepting in extraordinary circumstances ought to be accepted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister a question? I want to make sure I understand what he was saying. Did I understand the right hon. gentleman to state that the act provides that this responsibility shall be left to the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. The hon. gentleman was speaking to his seatmate at the moment I was discussing that. What I said was that I feel this is the practice which might be followed. I do not expect it to be followed, but it may be considered, for many hours taken by the cabinet in consideration of these cases—and it takes hours if they are to be examined honestly and conscientiously—might well be saved, now that juries are going to be asked directly whether or not they recommend mercy. Responsibility now rests squarely upon the jury to determine in its area and on the particular facts of each case what is just and fair, what constitutes the proper course to be followed in the opinion of those who have heard all the evidence and live in the community in which they are desirous of maintaining justice and equity as between the crown and the subject.

Before the hon. gentleman asked me that question I was about to say something about the degree of recidivism among those tried for murder or convicted of murder. It is a strange thing; in almost every other type of offence the proportion of those convicted who return to the penitentiary is very high. I am not certain what the percentage is, but I think it runs up to 65 per cent and possibly even higher than that. But in the cases of those who have been tried for murder, of those who have been convicted of murder and subsequently reprieved, and of those who have been tried for murder and convicted of manslaughter, it is of interest that over the years there are very, very few cases where the offence of homicide has been repeated. Indeed, I know of only one such case in this country in my time, a case which took place in the city of Saskatoon. This man was tried for murder and the jury acquitted him of murder but convicted him of manslaughter. He served his prison term and then, in about 1945, he went over to the United Kingdom where he committed murder and was executed.

There is another case which comes to my recollection, and this was in the province of Manitoba. A man was convicted of murder, reprieved and set free. Subsequently he committed a further murder. In one case a second murder was committed in Canada and in the other a man convicted of manslaughter in Canada was executed for the crime of murder in the United Kingdom. But it is amazing to note the number of men who, having served their term in the penitentiary after being convicted of murder, have made good. If I were ever to begin discussing this I could go on indefinitely but I do think of one case, the case of a young man who was charged and found guilty of murder. He killed his father in circumstances which did not result in a recommendation to mercy. He was reprieved, and served 12 or 13 years in penitentiary. I recall so well in 1941, or 1942 speaking to the then minister of justice, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, informing him of this man who, having been educated to the extent of passing into grade 2, spent years in penitentiary as a model prisoner. While in penitentiary he took the remainder of his elementary education and finally passed grade 12 examinations. He had been an exceptionally exemplary prisoner and was in charge of the commissariat of the penitentiary. Upon his release he joined the army and became a sergeant. That man has not changed his name today, and occupies a high position relative to his ability and capacity in the business world in this country.

I can think of another individual who today, and during the years, has done a great deal to elevate a woman who, by reason of circumstances, had fallen away from the path of rectitude. That woman was charged with killing her child.

I could mention immediately six or seven other equally dramatic cases involving individuals who, having been punished, have been able to take their places in life.

I think this legislation will, in the days ahead, be looked back upon as a great forward step. Every avenue has been canvassed with a view to assuring that we shall protect law abiding citizens from what the Leader of the Opposition referred to a moment ago as, deliberate acts of those who desire to live above the law. We shall at the same time leave to juries the right which belongs to them, but which they have not had, to recommend mercy as of right. Up to the present time no judge has had the right to ask the jury whether or not it will recommend mercy. In many cases the jury would have recommended mercy if it had the right. From now on the responsibility will rest on the individual conscience of the community to preserve justice.

The Leader of the Opposition suggested that we should postpone this legislation until another session, or at least postpone it until further examination could be made. This is a matter which has received the attention of the Minister of Justice for a considerable period of time. His law officers and all those connected with the administration of justice have studied this measure. It is designed to ensure that we shall protect and preserve our people against those who would place themselves above the law while, at the same time, protecting those who, in passion or under circumstances short of deliberation, commit homicide. It has been said that most of us would, under circumstances of sufficient provocation, do that which we abhor. This legislation is designed to preserve and maintain the abiding principles that must characterize the administration of justice, while at the same time tempering justice with mercy. I cannot agree that we should postpone the consideration of this measure.

It might be said that experience will show that some further changes should be made. I think the hon. member for—

Mr. Deschatelets: Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —the hon. member made a very comprehensive speech, to which I listened with much attention, and which revealed a great deal of study on the subject. However, the hon. gentleman will realize that we cannot hope to bring about legislation in respect of a subject that has tried the souls of men since the laws of Moses were enunciated. On the basis of modern penological research, recommendations by those who have devoted themselves to a full study of criminology, the experience of the courts, of which most of us have some knowledge, and, on the basis of that body of opinion which has given study to one of the most trying types of crime, as well as on the basis of the experience of the United Kingdom, we have placed before this house a bill which I hope and trust will be regarded as a forward step, and one that, in the light of the perspective of the future, will be looked back upon as a necessary and requisite step deserving of the attention and support of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, after this statement of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), I am still not convinced that this bill is not just a roundabout way of reducing the number of hangings or death sentences in Canada. I would even say that it has practically convinced me that such was the intention of the government since the Prime Minister referred specifically to section 13 of Bill C-92 which prescribes that the judge must ask the jury whether they recommend the accused to the mercy of the Queen.

It is precisely on that point that, in my opinion, the government's action has been unfortunate. I would have been ready to accept that a judge should be compelled to say in his statement to the jurors: "You are free to recommend or not to recommend mercy." But what can the jurors do when, face to face with the accused, and with the attorney for the defence, and often friends of the accused who may have a rather fierce appearance, they are asked by the judge: "Do you or do you not recommend mercy for the accused?" Would that not place the jurors in an awkward position? Indeed, do you think ordinary people, with no legal training, and who are not familiar with things of that kind, can take a free decision in the very presence of the accused?

It is quite possible that they will be gripped by fear and say there and then: "We recommend mercy." They may even do so out of sympathy.

The Prime Minister stated a while ago that it is only logical that the cabinet should examine juries' recommendations for mercy. In my opinion, that is most dangerous. The judge should be called upon—

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. It seems to me that the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) is getting far afield from the question under consideration, namely section 1 of Bill C-92.

Clause 13 will be called in due course and at that moment the hon. member will be allowed to make the required remarks.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, I wish to state that I was dealing with the principle of the bill, more particularly with the clause dealt with by the Prime Minister.

The Chairman: I think that on the first clause of a bill, the practice is to make rather general remarks. Of course, I will admit that the hon. member for Hull was perhaps going into a somewhat detailed consideration of the jury recommendation, but I think this type of discussion is consistent with the rules.

Mr. Caron: Moreover, Mr. Chairman, I was only following the example set by the Prime Minister, who did give rather extended explanations on this recommendation to the jury. The Prime Minister is entitled to his opinion, I have no objection to that, but I think the actual section is dangerous which requires the judge to ask publicly whether the jury is prepared to recommend mercy or to refuse it.

Under the present system, following his summing up of the proceedings, the judge says to the jury: "On the basis of the evidence which has been submitted, you may recommend mercy, but it is not an obligation.

If we included in the act a section under which the judge, following his summing up of the proceedings, would have to indicate to the jury that they are entitled to recommend or not to recommend mercy, but would let them retire to the jury room and reach their decision in complete freedom from pressure, fear or false sympathy for the accused, and outside the presence of the public, the accused, the judge, the friends and the whole family of the accused—whose members would all be in tears—I think it would make things much easier and would be much more in keeping with the role of a jury.

On the other hand, I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was completely justified in suggesting a moment ago that the bill be referred to a special committee of the house, similar to the one we had in 1956.

I also note that only one of the many recommendations contained in the report of the special committee has been followed. I refer to the exemption from the death penalty for persons 18 or under.

All the other recommendations have been ignored, particularly that one.

Here is what we find, for instance, in section 69 of the report:

> In practice, the committee feels that any new definition of the crime of murder should closely conform to the present practice of commuting death sentences.

Nor should commutations of death sentences become the general rule. They should remain exceptions as they were in the past.

In the last three years, out of 49 sentences, 39 were commuted. In other words, commutation has become the general rule. I think that is a dangerous practice and that the bill is also dangerous because it is not clear.

To take the example cited by the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), suppose two armed men enter a bank, and one of them fires a shot. The one just stands there, because he has not been told to shoot. Of course, section 1 of the bill does say:

> —or assisted in causing.

And the former section 202 stated:

> —facilitating the commission of the offence—

However, there is one point that smart lawyers usually bring up before the jury; they say: do not forget the intent of the lawmakers.

I can see the contradiction that any smart lawyer will point out to the jury. He will say: The intent of the lawmakers was this:

> However, only the person who actually committed the act or applied the force causing death, or counselled the doing of it, would be guilty of capital murder.
> All other murder is made non-capital.

On that basis, smart lawyers will finally manage to secure the release of many criminals until such time as they personally commit other crimes, or until such time as five or six cashiers have been killed and five or six murderers have been arrested. Furthermore, it is stated in subsection 1:

> (1) Murder is capital murder or non-capital murder.
> (2) Murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, where
> (a) it is planned and deliberate on the—

Well, what about the incendiary who puts a house on fire, thus causing the death of one or two persons? He may plead that he had no intention to kill, but just to burn down the house. How do you expect to condemn him when this bill is passed? I think that he enjoys much too great a protection in this case.

Moreover, how would the law deal with cases of rape particularly, when a man, a sadist, gets hold of a three or four year old child, and after committing his crime mutilates her so that she dies? He may say that he had no intention to kill the child, but merely to have his way with her.

Therefore, I repeat that not only should we not attempt to reduce the number of cases which may entail capital punishment, we should rather increase it, more particularly with regard to cases of rape committed on young children and other such cases, also in respect of the drug traffic.

I also think—and in this respect I take issue with what the leader of my party said a few moments ago—that we should not think of modifying the method of execution.

We have capital punishment by hanging, and all honest people seem to be horrified at the idea. Well, it is precisely what I wish preserved: that fear, that shame, that revulsion at the idea of a hanging.

I think that if it has such a critical effect on people who want to retain capital punishment—as they maintain that this method of execution is inhuman—the means must be the right one for deterring those who, though inclined to kill, would nevertheless be afraid of risking such an ignominious fate.

For all those reasons, and many others, which I will have an opportunity to deal with later, when we examine the bill in detail, I think that, except if much stronger arguments than those that have been submitted today are brought forward, I shall be once again obliged to oppose the passing of this bill when we are asked to cast our votes.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, while some of the words of the Prime Minister are fresh in my mind I should like just briefly to intervene once again. I am sure the committee listened with considerable interest to what the Prime Minister had to say, particularly in the light of the fact that he has had some considerable experience at the criminal bar. However, I do not feel—and I say this with great respect—that his remarks today, interesting as they were, really answered the queries put on this clause by those of us who have spoken thus far. I may say I do not believe that he fully addressed himself to the clause, but I am not making that observation by way of complaint except to say that, interesting as his remarks were, I do not feel they answered some of our concerns.

The Prime Minister said he was greatly concerned, and not without reason, that we take steps to avoid the possibility of providing in the future for undeserved convictions. Indeed, he noted there have been persons hanged who were not guilty of the crime for which they were convicted. I suppose no one will deny that. We do know positively that that has happened in the United Kingdom and I suppose it is true elsewhere. I am not aware at the moment of a case in Canada where we definitely know that to be so but it may be true here as well.

But it should be noted that the bill does not avoid that danger. It will still be possible under the bill for an innocent person to be convicted and, having been found guilty of capital murder, to receive the death penalty. Therefore the bill does not remove that danger. Admittedly it minimizes the occasion. It does provide certain safeguards and I strongly approve some of the safeguards provided in the bill, but the fact is that the bill does not remove altogether or to any appreciable extent the danger of someone being convicted and hanged for a crime for which he or she may not be responsible.

The Prime Minister spoke of the exercise by the crown through the cabinet of the royal prerogative of commutation. I had misunderstood his remarks. At one point I thought he said that the cabinet should be relieved of this responsibility entirely but I gather that is not what the Prime Minister suggested because he went on to point out later that consideration might be given to assigning to the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General the responsibility for dealing with recommendations for mercy.

The Prime Minister observed that in the United Kingdom the home secretary exercises this responsibility without reference to his cabinet colleagues, and undoubtedly the precedent in the United Kingdom served to suggest to the Prime Minister that this responsibility in Canada might be left with the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General. The Prime Minister was talking about a very interesting proposal, but it is to be noted that the bill about which the Prime Minister was speaking does not provide for the delineation of the royal prerogative in that way.

There would be nothing to prevent the Minister of Justice introducing a bill to restrict and define the powers of the cabinet with regard to commutation. As a matter of fact, the royal prerogative in most particulars is now part of the statute law in one way or another. The royal prerogative exercised in regard to commutation with respect to cases of individuals charged with murder is, of course, not a part of the statute law but there would be nothing to prevent a provision in this or in any companion measure to lay down the limit or the extent or in whom in the cabinet should repose the responsibility to give consideration to recommendations of mercy. Therefore all that the Prime Minister's suggestion in this particular amounts to is that it was sort of obiter dictum on his part, one that might represent the practice in the future without giving it any foundation or authority in law.

I would think, however, that it would be wrong for the cabinet in the future, notwithstanding its preoccupations, to assign to the Minister of Justice and to the Solicitor General in the absence of some statutory direction the responsibility that now is borne by the cabinet as a whole. If the practice is to be developed of leaving this matter to a committee of the cabinet or to two members of the cabinet, the legal advisers, then I think some authority should be provided in some statute passed by the house for the assignment that is given and for the restriction that is placed on the exercise of the prerogative.

The whole matter of the exercise of the royal prerogative in this regard has, of course, become a matter of great interest since this government came into office because, as the Minister of Justice has noted on other occasions, the number of commutations since 1957 has been very great. I am not quarrelling with any decisions of the cabinet in that particular. I am sure that in the consideration of capital cases the members of the present cabinet applied themselves conscientiously and seriously in accordance with their judgment and their conscience. I am equally sure that this has been the standard of conduct of former cabinets. Certainly it was true of the cabinet of which I had the honour to be a member. I am sure it has been the practice of all cabinets in Canada regardless of political complexion to give this matter the most thorough and objective assessment. But I think it is true to say that just as the conscience of the lord chancellor has varied with the person of the particular lord chancellor so too have the standards resorted to by cabinets at various times in Canadian history in the exercise of the royal prerogative varied considerably.

I know, and I am sure the Minister of Justice will confirm this, that one distinguished minister of justice before the first world war was so concerned about the jurisprudence, as it were, which he thought should serve as a background for cabinet action in capital cases that he laid down a set of principles which he considered should be borne in mind by Canadian cabinets in the consideration of the exercise of clemency. I do not believe that the principles as conceived by that distinguished minister of justice was followed very long even by the cabinet of which he was a member, nor to the best of my knowledge has it been followed by succeeding cabinets. Each human being in the cabinet has sought to exercise his best judgment in accordance with conscience, in accordance with standards of what was thought to be just, what was extenuating, what was relevant in the circumstances.

It seems to me that so far as one can detect in principle this bill does represent the basic standards that have been laid down by the present government in the exercise of the royal prerogative with regard to capital cases. I have no right to say that this is so. I have no right nor am I attempting to ascertain what goes on in the cabinet, but I suspect that since the Minister of Justice has brought forward this bill it represents fairly generally the standards which the cabinet itself has applied in considering the various requests presented to it for clemency or commutation. In other words, since the government came into office only those have been hanged who have been guilty of capital murder. I am not quarrelling with that because each cabinet has the right to decide the standards which it feels should be employed in the exercise of the prerogative. If that is the case, I do not see any reason why the government should not say so frankly. I do not see why the government should not put in this bill, or in a companion measure, what it feels are the correct standards for delineating the extent of the exercise of the royal prerogative, a prerogative which has been defined in most instances and has been restricted in many instances. There could not be any reason why there should not be a clear definition in this particular instance.

The Prime Minister says that from now on juries will be given encouragement either to make recommendations for mercy or to refuse so to do. In the event of a refusal, in the face of such an invitation, this will serve to give some indication to the cabinet of the jury's estimate of the situation, although the Prime Minister did not add those words. As the Prime Minister readily went on to point out, while there has been no statutory authority for juries to make recommendations, in the past juries have not hesitated—

Mr. Fulton: They have.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "hesitated" and I correct that to say that juries have not refrained from making recommendations for mercy.

Mr. Jones: Some juries have.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister may correct me.

Mr. Fulton: I think an analysis of the cases would support the proposition that some juries desired to make recommendations but have refrained because they thought they had no right to do so. I believe in one or two cases juries have questioned the judge who replied that the Criminal Code made no provision for this. Although they were not told directly, the inference the juries received was that they had no right to make a recommendation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I accept that at once, and I accepted it earlier when I changed the verb. I am sure many juries have not thought they had the power and therefore did not recommend mercy. There is no doubt, however, that many juries did recommend mercy, even without invitation or without any expressed knowledge of the power. I do readily admit that clause 13 will be an encouragement, and in that case will extend the number of cases in which juries will make recommendations or refuse to do so.

The Prime Minister, I think, misunderstood the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition, a suggestion that had been made earlier by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and supported by other members of this party who spoke earlier this morning. No one was suggesting that this matter be postponed. I regret that the Prime Minister has preoccupations outside that prevent his listening to this particular portion of my remarks. What we did recommend was that, because of the importance of this matter, we should not pass this measure hastily. We should resort to the various procedures that are open to us to make sure that our final judgment is attended by the most thorough consideration.

We have pointed out that it would be desirable in a matter of this sort, where there is alleged ambiguity, to refer the matter to a committee. One former judge who has had considerable experience in criminal work in the supreme court of the province of Ontario, Mr. Justice Lebel, in a speech delivered last week in London, criticized the bill because of ambiguity. I am sure from my personal knowledge, as I said this morning, and from consultations with certain individuals who have acted as crown prosecutors and defence counsel, that they share the view there are many ambiguities and many uncertainties in the wording of this bill. The consequences of this will be to afford the best counsel a field day and for a long time to come there is going to have to be built up new jurisprudence to take care of the new phraseology in this bill.

For example, there are the words "planned and premeditated". Does planned mean premeditated? This is not defined in the bill. What the Minister of Justice says in this debate will not give substance to the matter because the court, in the interpretation of our statutes, does not look at these debates. Not only does the court not look at them but it is no allowed to do so. Then, we can ask ourselves, what does deliberate mean? I ask, does deliberate mean that the offender is in full control of his reason? Now, that is a very important element in this matter. Does deliberate mean that the offender was in full control of his reason? Unless there is a satisfactory answer to that, I am sure it will be very difficult to get a satisfactory solution. These are questions which are not answered in this bill, and the answers to which might be provided if there were a careful study made by a committee before which competent witnesses could be called to assist us in arriving at the most precise language possible.

I do regret that the Prime Minister is not here because I am sure he would have been impressed with the purpose behind this suggestion. This is not a political measure. This is a measure toward which every member is directing his most honest efforts. We have invited the use of parliamentary committees, just as we have in connection with less important measures, for the purpose of preparing the most careful legislative enactment on a matter of this importance. We should ask the best qualified people in our country for their recommendations, in the light of their experience based upon their professional skill. We are not going to have an opportunity of doing that unless the minister accepts our request.

I should have liked to suggest that not only crown prosecutors, defence counsel with criminal law experience, but also judges should be called before this parliamentary committee. I should have liked to suggest that some of the best judges we have in this country, some of those whose work has been in the criminal courts and who because of that have a special ability and a special opportunity to make a most constructive contribution, should be called before the committee just as was done in England. As I pointed out this morning, the learned Chief Justice Lord Goddard, than whom at that time there was no more distinguished criminal law judge, was called to give evidence. The minister knows better than I, I believe, that his recommendations were incorporated to a large extent in the homicide act passed in Great Britain a few years ago. We are not asking that this bill be postponed. This bill can become law this year. We are asking that in addition to our own deliberations we have the support of the Canadian Bar Association, judges, crown law officers at the federal as well as provincial level and other bodies who will give us their judgment, in the light of their competence and experience, with regard to a measure that is so vital, I repeat again, to the security of the individual and to human life in our country.

The Prime Minister himself gave some encouragement that our plea may yet be heard, because when we urged upon him that the bill of rights should be preceded by consideration in a parliamentary committee for the purpose of calling the bar association and others before that body the Prime Minister at first said he did not propose to have the bill considered by a committee. However, it is on record that as a result of further urging the Prime Minister took another look at this matter and decided it was in the interests of the bill that it should be sent to a committee for consideration.

That bill was considerably modified. It was made a better document, as everyone knows from the admission of the Prime Minister himself. If that was justified, as I believe it was in the case of the bill of rights, surely it is justified in this case because this is such an important matter. It is a matter that has such vital application to our administration of justice, an administration of justice which characterizes our form of society and of which we are justifiably so proud.

That being the case, I would think that in a matter of this sort the government would want to think twice before passing this bill through with these uncertainties and these gaps, in the absence of steps being taken to provide the best available commentary from the outside. I can only renew that plea.

When the Prime Minister spoke today I hoped that in the light of his experience he would talk about something else that is left out of this bill. I refer to the mode of punishment. In the debate we have had on this bill, and in the discussions which took place on the bill introduced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough last year, not only have we discussed whether or not it was right to punish murder by death but we have also discussed whether or not, in the event that capital punishment was maintained in some form, the mode of punishment should be by way of hanging.

Some strong views were expressed in that regard in this house and throughout the country. I for one believe that the present mode of punishment of hanging an individual is not the method we should continue to use in this country. I believe we should resort to some other more humane, more civilized method of punishment. This is a gap in the bill that was not referred to by the Prime Minister. I should have thought that with his considerable experience at the criminal bar this would have been one matter to which he would have directed his attention.

I ask the Minister of Justice to indicate at some point in our proceedings before too long whether or not he feels that even at this hour the cause of justice and the legislating of the most effective enactment will be served by seeing that this bill does not pass merely on the discussion in committee of the whole.

It is not a question of our ability; it is not a question of our sincerity. We are all anxious to do the best that can be done in this regard. However, I do feel that where we are making such a fundamental departure in the law with regard to the punishment for murder we should be able to say we have taken every step possible to determine the validity and wisdom of the course which is before us.

I for one do not feel we could answer that question in the affirmative unless the request that this matter be considered by a committee of this house, with all the advantages that affords, is granted by the government and supported by the membership of this house.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think it would perhaps be useful if at this stage I made some comments by way of reply to what has been said in debate today. I recognize that we are here discussing, in our consideration of clause 1 of this bill, what really amounts to the principle of the bill; that is, the question of whether or not murder should be divided into two categories, capital and non-capital.

For this reason I have raised no objection when on occasion I have felt, as I am sure you have also, sir, that the discussion has ranged pretty widely afield and that, indeed, rather than having a general discussion related to clause 1 we were quite frequently redebating the principle of the bill, which of course was decided when the vote on second reading took place.

However, as I say, since I suppose it might be said that the clause now before us, which will have the effect of dividing murder into capital and non-capital categories, is indeed the main substance of the bill, not too great objection should be taken. However, because of the wide ranging nature of the debate it seemed to me that the most appropriate course for me to follow at this stage would be to make some general observations in reply; to comment, as it were, on the matters raised by outlining our approach and the reasoning and logic which has led us to arrive at this principle of the division of murder into capital and non-capital categories. In doing so, of course, I will answer in a general, if not a particular way, much of what has been said by hon. members who have spoken today. Then, after that, I will go on to deal with some of the specific comments and suggestions that have been made.

In giving this general outline let me do so point by point. First I would emphasize this point. This is important, particularly in light of what in my submission, with the greatest good will in the world, I cannot regard as other than a complete misapprehension in principle on the part of the hon. member for Essex East. I refer to the hon. member's apprehension that this bill changes the jurisprudence with regard to murder.

Let me first make it abundantly clear that this bill does not change the jurisprudence or the law with regard to murder. We have been deliberately careful not to do that and we have been, as an examination of the bill will show, successful in that objective, namely to leave the existing definition of murder, and therefore the jurisprudence built up with regard to that definition, entirely unchanged.

Second, I should like to emphasize that what the bill does by virtue of clause 1 and the succeeding clauses, is to raise a new question; not a question related to the definition of murder, but a new question which arises only when and if in a prosecution murder is proven. This question that arises is one of fact for the jury.

Therefore there is no new jurisprudence and there is no change in the jurisprudence being created by this bill. The jury will still have to be satisfied that murder has or has not been proven, and in charging the jury on that point judges will rely upon the existing jurisprudence. The question which then arises as a result of the bill is: is the murder which has been proven capital murder or non-capital?

This is my third point in this connection. We have made this question, as a matter of deliberate approach, a question of fact for the jury. It is as a matter of deliberate approach that we have kept the question as simple as possible. It has been urged upon us that the bill lacks something because it does not go into great detail by way of attempting to define, as in a legal treatise, what it is that the words used should mean in law.

We have deliberately avoided that approach and have kept the question as simple as possible. We have kept it a question of simple fact for determination by the jury, and the question is this: was the killing, which the jury has found to be murder, planned and deliberate, or was it not? That is all the jury has to ask itself: was the killing planned and deliberate, or was it not? In my submission, Canadian juries are not incapable of answering that question. Of course, they will be assisted by judges in the interpretation of those words. Jurisprudence will undoubtedly be built up over the years as to what those words mean, and the interpretation given to them will form precedents for other cases. That is how our law develops. But surely this parliament is not going to shrink from establishing a foundation for new law in this field which parliament and our country have desired to be brought into closer harmony with present day concepts of crime and punishment. Surely it does not constitute criticism but, properly accepted, praise of this bill to say that it does lay the foundation for the development of a new approach.

My submission is that we have laid such a foundation on the basis of the most simple principle possible, that is, by leaving it to the jury on the basis of whether or not a murder is a planned and deliberate killing. If the answer to that question is in the affirmative, then the murder is a capital murder. If it is not, if the answer is in the negative, then murder is a non-capital murder and is punishable by imprisonment for life.

Some hon. members have raised the question—indeed they have gone further and made the suggestion—that the effect of this legislation will be that there will be no more capital punishment. Such an assumption is totally unwarranted by anything which occurs in the bill, nor can it be deduced from any of the arguments which have been advanced in support of the legislation. The bill preserves the death penalty but provides that it can only be applied in cases where a jury finds an element of deliberation, either in accordance with the words "planned and deliberate" or through the application of section 202. The death penalty is preserved and is applicable in cases where the jury answers those questions in the affirmative.

To suggest that there will be no more cases where captial punishment is imposed is to assume one of two things, neither of which in my submission can really be expected. The first is that there will never again be a planned and deliberate killing in Canada. I wish one could assume that that could be the case, but I doubt whether anyone in this committee would make that assumption. Alternatively such an argument infers that juries confronted with the clearest evidence of a planned and deliberate killing will refuse to find such a verdict. I have too much confidence in the juries of this country to believe that when evidence is presented which satisfies them that the murder has been planned or deliberate or covered by section 202, they will be so perverse as not to bring in a verdict accordingly. I do not accept such a suggestion, particularly in the light of the fact that a great forward step has been made in this bill, namely, the division of murder into capital murder and non-capital murder as a result of which juries may find a man guilty of murder of a non-capital kind in the sure knowledge that he will not automatically be sentenced to hang as a result. This, as everybody knows, has been the great difficulty encountered by juries in the past and it is one of the reasons why juries have been so reluctant on occasion to bring in verdicts of guilty even when the murder charge has been supported by the clearest evidence, and why they have so often preferred to find the accused person guilty of manslaughter.

Now juries will be placed in what, in my view, is the proper position. Where the charge is one of capital murder they will decide whether or not the murder has attached to it the element of planning and deliberation which parliament has said to be necessary in order to constitute capital murder. Then, if the jury decides that there was that element of planning and deliberation, I do not believe any hon. member opposite would go so far as to assert that in these circumstances they would not bring in a verdict of capital murder. That is, in effect, what hon. members opposite have said when they have suggested that after this bill becomes law there will be no cases where capital punishment is imposed in Canada.

The next point I should like to make by way of general observation at this stage is that in making the subdivisions and establishing categories of murder, capital and non-capital, we have avoided the rigid classifications which are found in the 1957 homicide act passed in the United Kingdom. Of course, it may well be a proper subject of debate in this committee whether or not we have erred in making that decision, but we made it after analysing all the evidence which was available for study, all the opinions of statements of authority, and after looking at the effect of the United Kingdom act and reading the evidence of deep public soul searching which is going on in Great Britain now as a result of some of the consequences of their homicide act. After this study we came to the conclusion that the type of division applicable to the crime of murder should not be made on the basis applied in the United Kingdom because a division of that kind has produced some unfortunate results, some of which I outlined previously but which will yet bear repetition. The most glaring deficiency is, of course, that when a distinction between capital and non-capital murder is made on the basis of the weapon with which the murder was committed, or the person or class of person killed, instead of the nature and circumstances of the crime itself, as we have done, a situation is produced in which the public is bound to be concerned about the results which follow. For example, if a man kills with a gun he is liable to the death penalty but if he kills with a club or by strangulation he is not liable to the death penalty.

In our view the proper course is to look at the character and circumstances of the crime itself and to ask the jury to inquire of itself whether the murder was planned and deliberate or not. The decision rests on the answer of that question. It does not seem to us that a killing with a gun is any the less reprehensible; it is still an act of supreme defiance of society's basic law, as serious as an act of killing with some other weapon. It is, surely, the act of killing which constitutes the offence and whether or not that killing was planned and deliberate rather than the means by which it was accomplished.

The other point that I wish to make of a general nature arises in connection with the suggestion that consideration of this bill be suspended or postponed and the bill itself referred to a special committee.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, before that matter is taken up by the minister, could I ask whether he has any remarks in respect of why this bill before the house uses the odd phraseology, "murder— in respect of any person—"?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I will come to that question when I deal with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just asked it. Obviously he was under a misapprehension as to the import of those words. I should point out, as I will in detail when I deal with his remarks, that the words "— in respect of any person—" taken in context with the subsequent words, "—on the part of such person—" make it clear that the person referred to is the person who commits the crime and not the person killed. I shall enlarge upon that when I come to the hon. member's criticism, which it seemed to me at the time, was made on the basis of a misapprehension as to the effect of those words.

The suggestion has been made, and repeated in several quarters, that we should interrupt our consideration and postpone our study, and that the bill be referred to a special committee of the house. Those who made this suggestion have done so on the unjustified and erroneous assumptions that this bill has been hastily and badly drafted, without proper study on the part of the government, or the government officials who drafted it, and that it has been presented to the house in circumstances, as it were, when the house has neither had previous opportunity to consider the matter, nor has a present opportunity to give it fullest study. Every one of those assumptions is, of course, completely erroneous.

Furthermore, the suggestion is made, on an equally erroneous assumption, that somehow or other, the procedure followed in the United Kingdom was different, and their homicide act, whether we agree with it or not, was produced and enacted as a result of the fullest and most detailed study of the particular proposals contained therein. Nothing could be further from the truth, nor further from the case. The British homicide act was not only not referred to a special committee of parliament, it was not before the Gowers royal commission and, indeed, in most of its particulars, it departed from the recommendations of the Gowers commission. The proposals contained in the British homicide act were never before the Gowers commission for its study or consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is agreed.

Mr. Fulton: My friend, the hon. member for Essex East, also suggested that if we did have a parliamentary committee set up to study this measure, we should call before it a number of people, including judges. I venture to suggest that is not appropriate, and would not be an appropriate course to follow. I may be wrong, but in my experience in parliament, which goes back to 1945, a judge of our courts has never been called before a parliamentary committee, and I think there is good reason for that circumstance. I do not think it is appropriate that parliament should call judges of our courts before its committees.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why?

Mr. Fulton: Judges would then, by virtue of their being here, be asked to express opinions on legislation which parliament was in the process of enacting.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We would not do that.

Mr. Fulton: They could not refrain, unless they refused to answer every question they were asked, from expressing a view which might well be in variance with what parliament decided to do. We would then have judges expressing opinions in respect of laws which they would be called upon, at a later date, in their appropriate judicial function, to interpret and apply. I think it would be entirely inappropriate, for other reasons, but mainly for the reason I have given, to call judges before a parliamentary committee. I think it might well be appropriate, and certainly was considered appropriate by the Gowers commission, to ask judges to come and give the benefit of their opinions to a royal commission, but that is quite a different thing. Royal commissions do not enact laws, parliament does. So, it is quite a different thing to have a judge give the benefit of his opinion and experience to a royal commission which is charged with making recommendations, from the situation which would arise if judges expressed their opinions in respect of proposals which were then before parliament, on the verge of being translated into law, and which would then later be before those judges for interpretation and application.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to a consideration of some of the specific points that have been made by hon. members in the course of the discussion here today. The hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere made a suggestion that the French version at least should be amended to include the word "préparé", in addition to the words "projeté" and "délibéré". I would never claim to be a sufficient scholar of French, or the meaning of the French language, to be able to say whether the two words "projeté" and "délibéré" properly and completely transport into the French language the meaning of the words "planned" and "deliberate", as they are contained in the English text. This is a matter in respect of which we are in the hands of the translators and experts in that field. That certainly was the intention of the hon. member's remarks. I would be very reluctant to say that one or the other version goes any further than the words "planned" and "deliberate", so that I can only say we will take the matter under advisement. As the hon. member knows, we have, in the ranks of my colleagues not only experts in the use of the French language, but a very real expert in criminal law in the person of my colleague the Secretary of State. We will take the matter under advisement and, if we consider the words now used in the French text do not properly carry into effect the meaning that is intended in the English text, we shall give further consideration to the matter.

This morning the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont said first that, as a result of this legislation, capital punishment, although preserved in words, would really become a museum piece. I do not think I need comment on that suggestion further than I have in the course of my general remarks made a few moments ago, when I presented, as my view, that juries would not be unable to answer the simple question as to whether or not a killing was planned and deliberate, and that if a jury came to an affirmative conclusion, it would then be unable or unwilling to bring in a verdict accordingly. The hon. member, it seemed to me, in the course of his remarks in respect of clause 1, went back to his objection to the principle of the bill, and his whole approach was based on the objection to the division of murder into capital and non-capital murder. In that regard I can only say that I am unable to satisfy him because, in our view, which is a view shared by the majority of the members of this committee including, as he knows, members of his own party, murder should be divided into capital and non-capital murder.

The hon. member went on to say, at one point in his remarks, that all changes made in the United Kingdom were made as a result of intensive study on the part of jurists and others. He was joined by the hon. member for Essex East in the suggestion that we should refer this measure to a parliamentary committee before which we should invite these experts, including jurists and others. I have already expressed my view that it would be entirely inappropriate to invite judges to come before such a committee. I have already expressed, in general terms, my satisfaction, that this bill and the subject matter with which it deals, have received the fullest and most complete study in this country, in this parliament, and by this parliament, to the point where we are now able to perform our duties in dealing with a specific proposal. I do not think there is any element of parliament being taken by surprise, or being unprepared, and we feel this bill should be proceeded with at this time in this committee.

May I point out again, however, that a comparison of what was done in the United Kingdom, with what is being done here, indicates that my hon. friends, who make the suggestion, have completely failed to understand what did happen there. They suggest that the change the United Kingdom made in the homicide act of 1957 was handled something along the lines of the suggestion they make. Bear in mind first that the United Kingdom bill, as it passed through their parliament, in its major effect rejects the recommendations of the Gowers commission. The Gowers commission was set up in 1949 and it reported in 1953. It did not have before it any specific proposal. Its terms of reference were:

> To consider and report whether liability under the criminal law in Great Britain to suffer capital punishment for murder should be limited or modified.

That is all they had before them, the question of principle, not of detailed legislation. As I say, the commission made its report in 1953. it was not until 1957 that the government of the United Kingdom introduced legislation to deal with the matter, and the legislation that was brought in was based not on the Gowers commission report or on any other long and extensive study of a specific proposal. But in so far as its division of murder into degrees or types which carry the death penalty and life imprisonment respectively is concerned, it was based almost entirely on a proposal which was made by eight private members on the government side. That bill was introduced—I am not at all being critical of what was done, I am confining my remarks to a report on the facts—and in that respect, as I say, it originated from a very small group but, however, it did carry the judgment of the House of Commons and the House of Lords. It was passed without any lengthy or extraordinarily lengthy debate. It was not referred to any special or standing committee of the House of Commons; it was treated in the ordinary way. It went through first and second readings, committee of the whole and third reading.

On the other hand, when you come to consider what has happened in Canada, what this bill deals with is the carrying into effect of a decision in principle on the question of whether murder should be divided into degrees. In Canada we have had exhaustive consideration by a parliamentary committee of both houses which sat in 1954 and 1955; in other words, for two years. It is true it also considered corporal punishment and lotteries, but it devoted extensive consideration to the question of capital punishment, whether it should be abolished and whether the law of murder should be changed. It heard a large number of experts on this question, and we have had the benefit of the evidence given before that committee, of the report of that committee and of its conclusions.

In addition, in this house for two years now this matter has been debated as well as being discussed and considered intensely by members outside this chamber. Therefore, it is completely erroneous to suggest that this subject comes as a new one to the members of the house, or that there has not been given to the subject the fullest and most ample consideration on the basis of which not only the government but the members are now in possession of every argument that could be advanced on either side, and are as fully as they will ever be in a position to make up their minds on the merits or otherwise of the specific proposal now laid before them. Therefore I can see no purpose whatsoever to be served under those circumstances, which are quite different from the circumstances surrounding the discussion of the bill of rights, in delaying the passage of this bill and referring it to a special committee.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont said that after all it is not so important, there is lots of time, it would not hurt even if it did mean delay. Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that since trials for murder and sentences arising out of conviction for murder are before the courts now, it is completely erroneous as well as inept to say there is not any urgency in passing into law those principles and provisions which parliament will from now on say should govern the law of murder.

Mr. Denis: Most of these murder sentences are commuted.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me, in a matter of this kind, the time for decision having arrived, it is desirable, without undue haste and certainly without delay, after proper consideration, to pass as soon as may properly be done our conclusions into law, and to carry them into effect.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont also said that in this clause we are proposing two types of murder, distinctions which will make inoperative the retention of capital punishment, notwithstanding the assurances that I gave in my speech on second reading that capital punishment was being retained. I think I have already dealt with that in the course of my general remarks this afternoon where I mentioned the confidence that we repose in the ability of juries to make up their minds and to bring in an answer to the question on the basis of which it will be determined whether murder is capital or non-capital.

The hon. member also said that it was a juridical distinction based on legal uncertainty. May I remind him that juries now have the responsibility of deciding the queston of guilt or innocence of murder according to the law, and we are not disturbing that jurisprudence. The law is there. The law says what murder is, and juries now have to decide whether the individual is guilty or innocent according to the law. There is no different task imposed on them now as the result of this bill, which simply asks them, in addition to deciding whether there is murder there at all, to decide was it planned and deliberate, or was it not? They will have to make that decision in accordance with jurisprudence developed with regard to those words; but there is no new or different task from that which juries have had the responsibility of performing all through the years.

My hon. friend from Essex East started his remarks this morning by pointing out that there is more jurisprudence on this question of murder than on any other subject. He went on to say we ought to be very careful about adding to our jurisprudence on it. I would simply remind him of that which I said earlier when I rose to reply, namely that we are not changing in any single respect the jurisprudence with regard to murder. It remains and will remain exactly as it is now. All we are doing is raising one further question of fact for the jury after they have been satisfied that there is murder. The question is, was this murder planned and deliberate, or was it not? Therefore there is no disturbance of the jurisprudence. For reasons which I indicated earlier I think it is not only appropriate but indeed timely and essential that we should place this additional question before juries.

The Chairman: Order. The time of the minister has expired. Does the committee agree that he should continue?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the minister continues—and I think we all agree that he should—may I say he said that I said this morning we were not adding to the jurisprudence. I think I said there was more case law on the question of murder than on almost any other subject.

Will the minister now tell us what is his definition of planned and deliberate? I asked a question with regard to that. It will be new, and there will be a real field day for the lawyers on that very essential point.

Mr. Fulton: In the final analysis the jury will have to decide whether it is planned and deliberate. As I said at the beginning, I feel it is a question which should be kept a question of fact to be determined by the jury. That is what we have done, and I am quite sure my hon. friend would not disagree with me when I say that this is the effect. It will be a question of fact to be determined by the jury in accordance with the evidence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Lawyers will argue that the word "deliberate" presupposes planning.

Mr. Fulton: Of course lawyers will argue just as my hon. friend is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And judges will so decide.

Mr. Fulton: Judges will interpret the law to juries, yes. Surely my hon. friend would not have us take that function away from them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, no.

Mr. Fulton: Judges will interpret the law and will instruct juries upon the legal effect of these words. I am not going to presume to say here exactly how I consider every judge will interpret these words but I do say that I do not think judges will have much difficulty interpreting the intent of parliament to juries when they find parliament saying that the question for the jury is whether or not the murder was planned and deliberate or whether it comes within the ambit of section 202. I really do not think that is going to be a difficult question. I realize that lawyers will argue about it but that is the function of lawyers, and the function of judges is to interpret the law and to build up precedents on the basis of which subsequent cases are decided.

Indeed, the hon. member for Essex East seemed to confine his remarks this morning to generalities and personalities. He said that he had no confidence in the bill. I point out to you, sir, that he brought forward no specific criticism of it. I could not help but ask myself: If he is so dissatisfied with it, why does he not say where it is wrong, what is the weakness or make some specific proposals as to how it should be changed? But, as I say, he confined himself to generalities and to personalities such as "I have no confidence in the bill because I do not think there is anybody in the Department of Justice really capable of drafting legislation as important as this".

I am not going to enter into any detailed refutation of that suggestion. I am simply going to point out that, so far as draftsmanship is concerned, when a decision on principle has been taken as it has been taken here the draftsmen of the Department of Justice are as capable as will be found anywhere in the world and an attack on that basis, unsupported by any specific point of weakness brought out by the hon. member for Essex East, falls by virtue of its innate and demonstrable weakness.

My hon. friend concluded this morning by saying that he supports the principle of the bill but does not have confidence in the bill as drafted for the reasons I have given. He gave no reasons aside from generalities and personalities so I am confident that no reflection and after the explanations I am now making he will find himself able to support not only the principle but the details of the proposal we have laid before parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit a question? He will remember that I said this morning that I was confining myself to the question of procedure and that I had some comments to make on the bill. I have already made some comments and I have more comments to make on the details. For instance, I ask this question: Does "deliberate" mean that the offender was in full control of his reason? The minister may feel that he does not want to answer that question but that is the very kind of matter that must be defined as precisely as possible in the bill. If the minister feels he cannot give that kind of definition, surely he must realize that that is evidence of what I have been saying, that the bill lacks the precision which I think it should have.

Mr. Fulton: I will be very glad at a later stage to come to a discussion of details. At the moment I am endeavouring to answer some general comments that have been made, and we can get into a discussion of that kind, so far as it is appropriate, in a short time. I will be glad to lay before my hon. friend some thoughts in that regard.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls also posed certain questions. Incidentally, I might remind the committee that she has had considerable experience in the field of criminal law and has acted as defence counsel or participated in murder trials in more than one instance. She asked me what would be the situation if there was a riot in a prison during which there was an unpremeditated killing and her suggestion was that there is nothing in the bill that would make this capital murder. The Leader of the Opposition asked the same question. To this I can only reply that it would be difficult, it seems to me, to envisage such a case where it did not take place either in the course of an effort to escape or to effect a rescue from prison in which case it would be covered under section 202 or, alternatively, where it would be possible to establish that on the part of the person who actually did the killing the act of killing itself was planned and deliberate. I, of course, do not attempt to lay down an answer for every conceivable case that might arise but in our view the killing of a prison officer is covered in the provisions for capital murder.

The hon. lady also asked me what the situation would be with respect to a second killing. Again, we have made our division of murder into capital and non-capital on the basis of whether or not the killing was planned and deliberate or carried out in the course of committing any of the crimes or offences covered in section 202. That is the principle which we carry forward. That is the principle which we would hope and expect that juries would apply to every case of killing that comes before them. As I say, in the drafting of the legislation we have in our view protected the situation with regard to the type of murder involved in the killing of a prison officer or a police or peace officer.

She also asked me why we had not accepted and incorporated into the bill the doctrine of diminished responsibility. I should point out to her that both the Gowers commission and our own parliamentary committee recommended against the importation into Canadian law of this doctrine of diminished responsibility.

Again, the question was asked whether or not, if a mentally retarded person was persuaded, encouraged and, indeed, led by a person in full control of his faculties into committing a robbery in a bank in the course of which he armed himself and killed, that would be capital murder. That, of course, would depend upon whether the person in full possession of his mental faculties counselled or procured the doing of the act which resulted in the death. On the basis of the general outline of the case presented by the hon. lady, I would say that the probability would be that the jury would find that the other person did so counsel or procure so as to make it capital murder, but again it would be a question to be determined on the basis of the facts.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt criticized us because he said we had no public document to substantiate the views of the government as incorporated in the bill. On an earlier occasion and again this afternoon I have endeavoured to summarize the process by which we arrived at our decision in principle. We did so after a review of the Gowers commission report, our own parliamentary committee's report, the vast volume of other writings and speeches on the subject, debates in this house and views as expressed in the country. On the basis of that study and analysis we reached our decision in principle as to what we should do, which was that we should divide murder into two categories, capital and non-capital. Accordingly we have produced a bill which carries that into effect and we now bring it before the house for the judgment of the house.

We are prepared to defend the decision we have made both in general and in detail. As I have said, surely after all these years the House of Commons is in a position now where it is appropriate that it should be asked to make up its mind on the question of how it wants to deal with murder. The hon. member's criticism also seemed to have been based on the assumption—

Mr. Godin: Before the minister proceeds, may I ask a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Godin: Does he realize that my reference was to the phraseology of clause 1 which we were discussing? I realize that the minister has derived his information from many sources in so far as the general principle of the bill is concerned, but I believe we are agreed that we have no documentation or information which indicates to us where the minister obtained his phraseology for clause 1.

Mr. Fulton: I doubt very much if you would ever find, on a subject of this kind where to some extent a new approach has been adopted, anything on which you could rest your case. It seems to me that what you have to do is decide, in principle, just what you want to do and then produce a bill which, in its drafting, will carry that principle into effect, carry into effect what was the intent when you gave instructions that the bill should be prepared. Our examination and re-examination of this bill has satisfied us it does carry into effect the decision I have endeavoured to outline to the committee as to what we should do with this difficult problem of capital punishment for murder.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt did raise a particular question with regard to the implication of the words "in respect of any person". I took it from what he said this afternoon, and from what he asked me again more recently, that he had in mind this phrase related to the person killed. May I point out to him that if he will read the clause,

> Murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, where he will find this makes it clear that the person referred to in both cases is the person committing the murder or carrying out the killing.
> (a) it is planned and deliberate on the part of such person,—

Mr. Godin: I do not like to be annoying, but the minister seems to read the phrase as though it were two phrases. He says, "in both instances". The minister knows that this is one phrase. If you have paragraph (a), it is simply for the construction of the statute and does not break the phrase. If you say that murder is capital murder in respect of any person, you may find that the reference is to the person who has been killed, and if you go on to the next phrase, "on the part of such person", you will find you are referring to the person who has been killed.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend will read the clause, I am sure he will realize that "person" there refers to the person doing the killing. It says:

> Murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, where
> (a) it is planned and deliberate on the part of such person,—

Obviously the two words "person" refer to the same person and the only person that could be contemplated or affected would be the person who does the killing. Then, paragraph (b) says:

> it is within section 202 and such person
> (i) by his own act caused or assisted in causing the bodily harm from which the death ensued,—

I can assure my hon. friend that if he would read the clause carefully he could not come to any conclusion other than that the person referred to there is the person causing the death.

Mr. Godin: Would the minister refer to the French translation of that paragraph in which the words "à l'égard de" are used?

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend has read the last line, and let me read the whole thing in French.

(Translation):

That section states:

Murder is capital murder, in respect of any person, where
(a) it is planned and deliberate on the part of such person, or
(b) it is within section 202 and such person
(i) by his own act caused or assisted in causing the bodily harm from which the death ensued.

Therefore, it is clear that in all cases, the person referred to is the person who caused the murder.

(Text):

Then, the hon. member for St. Denis—

Mr. Godin: To assist the committee, would the minister—

Mr. Fulton: —no, going back to what the hon. member for Nickel Belt said, I believe he should be satisfied now that since the planning and deliberation has to be on the part of the person causing the death that should take care of the case he brought to our attention of a possible death resulting to somebody other than the person it was planned to kill. The question is, was the murder planned and deliberate on the part of the person causing it, and that is the question for the jury.

The hon. member for St. Denis raised a question about the situation that might develop if five or more persons robbed a bank. My answer to him would be that if they planned to kill in the course of the robbery, then all would be liable for capital murder. If, on the other hand, they planned to rob only, then only the one who kills is liable for capital murder. Unless the others counselled or procured a killing, all the others would be liable to non-capital murder so they would not escape a murder charge.

The Leader of the Opposition raised a number of points, but I think I have covered a great many of them in my general remarks or in references to questions from other members. However, he did, in his criticism of the bill, appear to suggest that we retained capital punishment because in our view it had a deterrent effect. One or two other hon. members made that argument. May I remind the committee that in my introductory remarks on second reading I pointed out that while we felt there was no validity in the view that a deterrent did apply in respect of the bill, we rested it on grounds far wider than that, and that was the fact that for a deliberate killing society is entitled, and indeed the protection of society demands, the sanction of the death penalty.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that covers most of the questions that were raised. Others no doubt will be raised in the course of considering the further clauses, and I shall be glad to deal with them at that time.

Mr. Roberge: May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks I should like to state that when the Minister of Justice introduced Bill No. C-92 last Tuesday he did so in an extensive and very comprehensive manner. It is not because he has spoken today that I have made up my mind, but it has helped me somewhat to finally decide what I should do. Unfortunately on the second day of the debate last week I was unavoidably absent from the house because of circumstances beyond my control and I was not able to participate in the vote on the principle of this bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, when considering a bill as important as the one before us, it is always extremely difficult to form an opinion. Last year, we had the advantage of listening, for two days, to the discussion of the bill of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee). We also had the opportunity of studying, or at least of reading the bill proposed by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) and the legislation submitted by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale), if I am not mistaken in the name of his riding.

With the help of those three drafts and of last year's discussion, I have been able to come to a decision, though it was quite difficult, I admit.

As I said, the problem is a very complex one. Society, of course, has to be protected. But it is also important to see that innocents are not put to death.

It did happen in the past, I think—my little experience does not allow me to prove it—but I suppose it did happen in some cases that people, having been found guilty, were put to death though they were innocent. This is the sort of thing we must try to avoid.

I do not wish at this time to follow the Prime Minister of this country in the statement he made this afternoon and take up all those reasons after him to comment on them or criticize them.

Mr. Chairman, in spite of the attitude which the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice took this afternoon, I still believe, like others who spoke before me, that this bill should be submitted to a special committee. It is true that a joint committee of the house and of the other place did some work with regard to this matter in 1954 and in 1955. It is also true, as I said earlier, that the bill was discussed last year, but, here in this house, we are called upon to take the best possible decision. Notwithstanding the position taken by the minister, I think that in order to arrive at the best possible decision, we must make the best use of whatever means are afforded by the rules of this house to form our opinion.

We want opinions freely expressed and to this end we should exhaust all means of persuasion trying to drive home the merit of this bill and, for the moment, that of the first clause.

I am a lawyer myself, as are many members of this house. However, several members have not had experience in court. I am sure too that none of my colleagues have ever known what it was to be indicted or to serve as a juryman.

During my short legal career, I have had occasion to defend a person accused of murder. An attorney is always in a difficult situation in such cases whether he acts for the crown or for the defence. That is why parliament and the committee must take every possible means within the purview of the rules to arrive at a sound and logical decision.

I feel that the best way to make this measure as efficient as possible would be to refer the bill and clause 1 to a special committee.

Mr. Chairman, the principle of this bill is included in clause 1; it is the core of the bill, and for that reason I can now say how I would have voted had I been here last Wednesday.

Most or at least many of the members from my province on this side of the house voted against the bill. It is a matter of conscience. Their decision was dictated to them by their conscience, by the studies they made, and I certainly cannot blame them. Nor can I blame those who voted differently. As for me, I would have endorsed the principle of the bill and for the following reason.

Mr. Chairman, members of this house are legislators. This afternoon, we witnessed a short and untimely intervention on the part of the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, and, in order to help him, I should like to read into Hansard the definition of "legislator" given by the Nouveau Larousse Illustré. I quote:

Legislator: One who gives laws to the people.

Why are we here? To give laws to the people of Canada. This is our sole function. We are not here to administer the laws: that is the task of the judiciary.

Mr. Martineau: Nobody denies it.

Mr. Godin: Why ask the question then?

Mr. Martineau: You do not have the floor.

Mr. Roberge: The laws are administered by the judiciary. Therefore on the principle that those who sit in this house were chosen to draft the laws and to give them to the population, I need no other justification to make me endorse this bill. As pointed out, last week and again today, by my colleague for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), it is probably true that when applied this bill will not prove as effective as expected. But that is not our problem. Our particular responsibility is to prepare such an act as we think should be prepared.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that clause 1 in the Bill C-92 is good, since it provides for a division of murders into categories. Too often, in the past, individuals were charged with murder and convicted of murder, while they should have been convicted of manslaughter. Too often also individuals were prosecuted for manslaughter when the proper charge should have been one of murder. I think that danger is being warded off by the definition of capital murder and non-capital murder found in clause 1 of this bill. I do not mean by that that I am personally satisfied with the classes as described in clause 1. Far from that. On the contrary, quite a number of clauses of the bill do not satisfy me, and besides I shall have the opportunity of making a few remarks in connection with other sections of this bill. However, for the moment, I should like to limit myself as much as possible to section 1.

As I have just pointed out, the law now provides for cases of murder and manslaughter. Perhaps it might be useful, in making my point, to recall that murder is the intentional act of killing, of voluntarily taking the life of another person, while manslaughter or unintentional homicide is the involuntary act, although culpable, of taking the life of another person.

This bill includes capital and non-capital murders, manslaughter or unintentional culpable homicide remaining as described in our statutes.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, looking at this bill, and more particularly at section 1, as it now reads, I note one difficulty. And to better illustrate it, I will read again into Hansard what the minister had to say on May 23 last when he paraphrased clause No. 1 and gave us distinctions which are made by the bill according to him. As found at page 5223 of Hansard for May 23, he stated:

> We have accordingly started on the basis that there are two broad types of killing. The first is where the death does not result from any act of deliberation on the part of the person causing it but can be said to be impulsive or non-deliberate, in the sense of being in no way within the prior contemplation of that person. It is our view that the death penalty ought not to be the consequence in these cases, and accordingly although the crime may be murder, it is classed as non-capital and a sentence of life imprisonment only is provided.
> The other type of killing is the case where death is caused deliberately or as a result of a planned act of the person causing it. All these cases are classed as capital murder and for these cases, but for these cases only, the sentence of death will follow automatically on conviction.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize again the following words:

> —deliberately or as a result of a planned act of the person causing it.

Mr. Chairman, in the course of the discussion today, some hon. members who spoke before me dealt with that aspect of section 1, particularly the wording of that section. The hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) suggested this morning to the minister an amendment to the French version of the bill. At present the bill speaks of a murder which is "projeté et délibéré", the hon. member has suggested that it should say "projeté, préparé et délibéré".

I understand that, just a few minutes before the six o'clock recess, the minister said that he would examine that problem with the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion) and that he would make the proper correction to the French version, if necessary.

However, that is not the point I wish to make, Mr. Chairman. In fact, I do not think anyone mentioned this question.

In the course of his remarks, this afternoon, the Minister of Justice went further than he did last Tuesday. In reply to various objections, he spoke of "planned and deliberate" murder, and I noticed that every time he spoke on that point this afternoon, he stressed the words "planned and deliberate" while, last Tuesday, as reported in the French edition of Hansard, he spoke of cases where death was deliberate or ensued from a premeditated act. I feel there is a great difference there.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would permit me to say a word in explanation here. In my remarks during debate on second reading I took pains to point out that there are two circumstances which make a murder a capital murder. One is, where the killing itself was planned and deliberate. The other is where the murder is done in the course of an act which imports the element of deliberation—an act that is of such a generally deliberate or stealthy nature that we think the law should make it clear that it imports the element of deliberation. It was in the discussion of these categories of capital murder that I used the words, which the hon. gentleman has quoted this evening, as contained in Hansard for last Tuesday. I did not go into detail this afternoon in respect of those words when I said the killing must be planned and deliberate. Perhaps, to have been perfectly accurate, I should have gone on to say; or, where the killing occurs in the course of the commission of one of those crimes outlined in section 202. However, I think the bill is clear on that point.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: I wish to thank the minister for his remarks. Incidentally, I would not want to be unfair to the minister, because it is probably true that when he discussed the deliberate causing of death, he was probably referring to paragraph (a) of the bill, and when he discussed premeditation, he was probably referring to paragraph (b). While that may be true, I do not think it alters the point of my argument. Also, for the benefit of the committee and in support of the point made by my hon. colleague from Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin), I must say there is a significant difference between the meaning of the French words and that of the English words.

While it is true that the judiciary is there to interpret the law, it is also true that the lawmakers are here to make the laws as clear as possible. I therefore think that from that point of view, it is important to look into the definition of the words. I understand that in section 1(2)(a) of the bill, the word "projecté" and the word "délibéré" are used as adjectives. With respect to the word "délibéré", here is the meaning given to this word in its adjectival form by the Larousse dictionary:

> —easy, free, determined—

Then the dictionary gives an example:

By deliberate intent, with intention, purposely.

Now here is what is meant, according to the French dictionary, by the verb "délibérer":

To consult together, to reflect inwardly for the purpose of reaching a decision.

And I stress this part of the definition of the verb:

—to reflect inwardly for the purpose of reaching a decision.

Now let us look at the definition given in the Oxford dictionary for the same word used as an adjective:

(Text):

deliberate,—

The adjective.

Intentional; considered, not impulsive; slow in deciding, cautious—

And the verb:

Consider, think carefully, take counsel, consult, hold debate.

(Translation):

And now, the verb "deliberate":

In my opinion, both dictionaries do not give the same definition and I do not think we can rely on any other source of information than dictionaries for the definition or the meaning of words. Now, the English word "deliberate" seems to imply a more or less lengthy period of time which is certainly not only an instant, while the French word "délibéré" does not seem to make such a distinction. Indeed, I think it is possible to deliberate only one second and, in such a case, murder still is deliberate.

I will now go a little further. If it is true that a homicide must be deliberate to be considered as a murder under the present law, the same thing can be said about the bill under consideration.

In my opinion, the word "deliberate" in the English version implies lengthy and planned deliberation, a debate within the criminal's mind, if you wish, whereas the word "deliberation" as defined by French dictionaries could mean reflection which took only a flick of an instant.

Is it possible, however, to separate the words "planned" and "deliberate" used in the bill? That is why I was pointing out a while ago that when the minister was speaking about "planned and deliberate" murder, this afternoon, he was coupling the two words every time he used the expression.

If, after having decided to kill someone, I plan my deed and then I carry it out, it is obvious that the homicide I have committed is deliberate; however, I could have taken a decision after hasty deliberation, without any preconceived plan. In that case, is it a capital or a non-capital murder? This question has been haunting me all day long.

Nowhere have I heard an appropriate answer but it seems, at first sight, that to have a capital murder, it should be both "planned" and "deliberate", whereas if it is simply a "deliberate" and not a "planned" murder, you have non-capital murder.

Is this the right answer? Is this the true meaning of the bill? I do not know, but I am asking the minister to clear up this point. I should like him to enlighten us on this matter.

He said this afternoon that it is up to the judiciary to interpret the law. That is true, but the legislator is responsible for enacting the law. Therefore, it rests with the government or its representative, in the person of the present minister, to set forth his opinion. I therefore think the minister owes us as much clarification as possible on the bearing of the words he himself conceived and on the meaning given to them by those who drafted this bill with him.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to end these few remarks by repeating what I said at the beginning on account of the possible ambiguity, on account of the two meanings that can be given to the words "planned" and "deliberate", taken together or separately, the minister must listen to our pleas and agree to refer this bill to a special committee of the house.

According to the minister, delays might result. That might be the case. But special committees meet often enough, as often as two or three times daily, to make it possible for certain studies to be done in the special committee, by calling before it witnesses, experts, that is people with a vast experience in criminal law, who would give to members of the committee all the explanations possible.

It would also be an opportunity to meet the officer or officers who looked after the preparation of the bill or did prepare it. Obviously the person who supervised the preparation of the bill is the Minister of Justice, but he is not the one who prepared it They are the officers of the department.

In my opinion, these people should be called to appear before the select committee so that we may know what they mean exactly by that word, since it is only in this way that we will be able to decide what our position should be concerning clause 1.

(Text):

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to make one or two comments on the first clause of this bill. Since I have been interested in capital punishment I have already put my views on the record by the introduction of a bill based on the United Kingdom legislation but adapted to Canadian conditions. I agree with the minister in the adoption and the adaptation of the principles expressed in this legislation, but I feel this is the time for the committee to do the final polishing of the words placed before us which seek to put the principles into legislative expression.

In his introductory remarks on capital punishment the minister indicated that generally speaking he believed it was a deterrent to rational people. He also left the logical implication that those who find themselves in the unfortunate position of having committed capital murder are in the circle of what one could call irrational people by the very fact that they find themselves in this position. If we assume then the premise that those people who find themselves in the position of having committed capital murder are in varying degrees irrational, I think it requires an extremely close examination to find out which people within that circle are the ones the court decides shall suffer the supreme penalty. My own feeling on this particular matter, Mr. Chairman, is that I should like to approach the problem from a slightly different direction.

We have indicated positively what the crime consists of by saying that it must be planned and deliberate. In order to delineate very carefully what the words "planned and deliberate" mean we have to give consideration to some of the defences advanced, such as insanity and drunkenness. The first one I shall more particularly deal with is the defence of insanity. Under section 16 of the Criminal Code we are still operating basically under M'Naghten's rule, which described legal insanity. This rule is now some 118 years old. I am concerned with whether or not during this whole period of 118 years this rule has been entirely effective. We are faced first with the medical aspects of insanity which are far ahead of the legal understanding of the situation. I am very much concerned over this gap. It is particularly important, Mr. Chairman, because mens rea is the prime ingredient required to prove a capital murder case. In the United States in 1954, in a case called the Durham case, they attempted to define much more clearly the psychoses and neuroses of insanity which would lead to the crime being committed. I suggest that under the present criminal legislation here there is not the same degree of flexibility that they have in the United States.

My first suggestion to the minister would be—although this is perhaps not the appropriate time to do it—that consideration be given to setting up a committee to study insanity both from the juridical and medical point of view with a view to up-dating the sections which deal at present with legal insanity.

The second point that I should like to deal with, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that in a capital murder case the death penalty is prescribed in section 642 of the Criminal Code. In prescribing the death penalty, I would suggest that the penalty and the method are inextricably interwoven. I have already gone on record and suggested that a suitable method of the death penalty is the gas chamber. The hon. member for Essex East and the Leader of the Opposition both indirectly raised this matter by suggesting that perhaps there should be another form of capital punishment.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Drysdale: Yes.

Mr. McGee: Let us assume that the hon. member, as I understood him, agrees with the deterrent argument for capital punishment. Would he not agree, then, that hanging as a form of execution because, according to many hon. members, it is less humane than the gas chamber, would have a greater deterrent effect?

Mr. Drysdale: Not necessarily, no. My own opinion is that there happens to be confusion between the penalty itself and the method of carrying it out. I feel there is that confusion, as illustrated by the hon. member for Vancouver East. He was extremely moderate in this particular debate but in past instances when we have discussed capital punishment usually his first words were, "Have you ever seen a man hanged?" Then he would proceed to register the emotional aspect. I think the two things are completely severable, the death penalty and the way it is carried out.

Both the hon. member for Essex East and the Leader of the Opposition suggested that some consideration should be given to this aspect of the matter. I would suggest that this is not the time when consideration should be given to this matter, particularly when we are dealing with clause 1. I say this for the particular reason that the Criminal Code sets out what the crime shall be but it is up to the various provinces to carry out the method of execution.

I would make a second suggestion to the Minister of Justice. In June or September he is expecting to meet with the various attorneys general to discuss the British North America Act and at that particular time he might make an informal poll among the attorneys general to see what their attitude is towards the establishing of a gas chamber, for example, and whether one should be located in each province or whether there should be a central place of execution. Since the cost involved in the method of execution would have to be borne by the provincial authorities, I think it is imperative that they first be consulted.

Miss LaMarsh: Is the hon. member aware that section 642 of the Criminal Code sets out the manner in which the individual shall be sentenced, namely, that he is to be hanged by the neck until dead?

Mr. Drysdale: I thank the hon. lady. Perhaps I did not make the situation too clear. It was for that reason that I indicated there would have to be agreement between the federal and the provincial governments. Under the code the federal government sets out the method, and I have already suggested that I think the method should be changed to the gas chamber. Then I suggested that since the provincial governments would have to bear the cost of responsibility of carrying out the method of execution, whatever the method may be, the Minister of Justice might take the opportunity when he meets the provincial attorneys general to ascertain at that time whether they favour an alternative form of execution.

Miss LaMarsh: May I ask a further question? Would the hon. member agree that if it should be provided that there be one place only in Canada for the carrying out of executions this would obviate the necessity of dealing with the provincial governments who now have to provide the facilities to carry out the sentence?

Mr. Drysdale: If there were one central place of execution such as a gas chamber, for example, I think the only place it could be constructed would be in the Northwest Territories where the federal government does have jurisdiction. I think the question of whether there should be a central place of execution or whether there should be one in each province is a matter that would have to be discussed. The minister can correct me if I am wrong, but I understand the Northwest Territories is the only place where the government has responsibility in the event that hanging is necessary. Otherwise these matters come under the jurisdiction of the various provinces.

There is another point I wish to make briefly before I sit down. It seems to me, as has been indicated by other members who have spoken, that the two key words in the clause are "planned" and "deliberate". In the light of the definitions I have been able to find I am wondering about the necessity for the use of the word "planned" and whether the word "and" is likely to be judicially interpreted as "or". In trying to find a definition of the word "deliberate" the only success I had was in Black's Law Dictionary, fourth edition. The cases referred to are United States cases but I suggest that the reasoning would probably be equally as applicable to Canadian courts. I quote part of the definition of "deliberate" as found on page 513:

> By the use of this word, in describing a crime, the idea is conveyed that the perpetrator weighs the motives for the act and its consequences, the nature of the crime, or other things connected with his intentions, with a view to a decision thereon; that he carefully considers all these; and that the act is not suddenly committed. It implies that the perpetrator must be capable of the exercise of such mental powers as are called into use by deliberation and the consideration and weighing of motives and consequences.

Using that particular definition, it appears to me that the idea of planning or something having been planned is incorporated. Perhaps I might read one more definition that is given here:

> "Deliberation" and "premeditation" are of the same character of mental operations, differing only in degree. Deliberation is but prolonged premeditation. In other words, in law, deliberation is premeditation in a cool state of the blood, or, where there has been heat of passion, it is premeditation continued beyond the period within which there has been time for the blood to cool, in the given case. Deliberation is not only to think of beforehand, which may be but for an instant, but the inclination to do the act is considered, weighed, pondered upon, for such a length of time after a provocation is given as the jury may find was sufficient for the blood to cool. One in a heat of passion may premeditate without deliberating. Deliberation is only exercised in a cool state of the blood, while premeditation may be either in that state of the blood or in the heat of passion.

Incidentally, I think this might also answer the question raised by the hon. member for York-Scarborough who wanted the idea of cold-bloodedness included so that it could be said that it was a planned, deliberate and cold-blooded murder. I think this definition clearly incorporates under "deliberate" the idea of cold-bloodedness. On a very cursory examination, it does not appear to me that the word "planned" is necessary. I wonder whether the minister would give this point careful consideration because although I am making these criticisms I do so on the basis that it is our task in this committee to produce the best possible legislation covering these particular points. I think the onus is on every member to try to make valid, positive criticisms in order that we will have the best legislation possible.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, several hon. members have suggested that I should attempt to define the words "planned and deliberate" as used in this clause. I think there is very great danger in attempting such a definition precisely because, as I have said, in the final analysis the courts interpret and are the proper authorities to interpret the words of a statute. Of course, in considering the import of words it must be realized that their applications—not their meaning but their application—will vary from case to case depending upon the circumstances of that case. The evidence of what took place has to be weighed and the jury, subject to direction from the judge, will then have to apply their minds to whether or not the circumstances in that case show that there was a planned and deliberate murder.

However, I have no objection to indicating the concept that we worked out and have asked the experts to incorporate into the technical language of a bill. The purpose of using the expression "planned and deliberate" was to add something to the usual idea of intent or mens rea or malice aforethought. That something is an element of greater premeditation than the expressions I have mentioned necessarily connote. Because the words "deliberate and premeditated" in the United States have tended in some states to be equated to mere intent, we selected words which in our view would and do make plain that something more than intent formed on the spur of the moment and under a sudden passion or impulse is required to constitute capital murder. So it will be appreciated that instead of using the words "deliberate and premeditated" we have used the words "planned and deliberate" in order to give expression to the thought that something more than mere intent or mens rea or malice aforethought, as they have been interpreted, is involved.

We all know the meaning of "planned" and of "deliberate". They import the idea of the mind making and carrying out a project not thrust upon it by sudden passion or impulse. I think a time element is present but it may vary from case to case. Plans may be conceived and carried out very quickly but they must be plans and not merely impulses. When the words are applied to a specific set of facts, as they always will be in practice, I do not think a judge will have too much trouble explaining or a jury understand the definition. Finally, I suggest that "deliberate" has no direct bearing on the question of mental capacity, which remains as it is now.

[Mr. Drysdale.]

We have also, Mr. Chairman, given some consideration to the point raised first by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere and referred to recently by the hon. member for Megantic, namely, the question of whether or not the French translation, "projeté et délibéré", did carry into effective language the concept I have outlined as the concept involved in the English words, "planned and deliberate". It has been suggested to me that possibly they do not as accurately reflect the concept as those words in the English text. It will be appreciated, as I said earlier, that this is a very technical question, the determination of whether or not certain words or certain phrases in French have exactly the same meaning in that language as phrases or words in the English language. I am not in the least qualified to express an opinion on this matter, and I would normally be guided entirely by the opinion of the translators who are trained in this work.

However, after some discussion I am advised that it may well be conceded that the words "planned and deliberate" in English would be better rendered or rather the concept of that phrase would be better rendered by the French words "projeté et prémédité" rather than the words "projeté et délibéré." I am informed, too, that the French word "prémédité" used in this context does not have the rather restricted meaning of the English word "premeditated" as it has been interpreted judicially. We would be quite prepared, therefore, to consider substitution of the words "projeté et prémédité" for the words "projeté et délibéré."

There is only one other comment I should like to make in connection with this clause, in response to a suggestion made by hon. members in connection with the position of prison officers and police officers. I believe it was the hon. member for Niagara Falls who first raised the question of whether the killing of a prison officer in the course of a riot where the purpose of the riot was not directly to escape or effect rescue from the prison but was, shall we say, in the course of protest against conditions in the prison, would be considered capital murder. The hon. member suggested that an inmate acting on impulse might kill a guard, and asked would that be capital murder. I ventured the suggestion earlier this afternoon that it would probably be regarded as capital murder, one or the other of the two types of capital murder, namely as a killing committed in the course of an attempt to escape or effect a rescue, or as a planned and deliberate murder. In the case of an inmate, particularly one who may have smuggled a weapon into the prison, and then used it in the course of a riot, a killing with it would very likely result in a jury finding that the killing was planned and deliberate under those circumstances. I do, however, want to make clear that it was our intention to cover such circumstances. It is our view that by reference to those offences under section 202, plus the provision regarding a planned and deliberate carrying out of murder, such a case is covered as being capital murder. However, lest there be any doubt on the matter I will be quite prepared to consider an amendment to add a specific provision making it clear that the killing of a prison officer by an inmate in those circumstances is capital murder because that would not change the intent with which we started out in this bill. Similarly, in so far as the killing of a police officer in the course of his duty is concerned, that situation might be specifically covered also. I am not suggesting here a final drafting of such an amendment. I believe these situations are covered now because section 202 refers to a killing in the course of resisting lawful arrest. I think in most circumstances where one could envisage a person killing a police officer, the police officer would be acting in the course of his duty and the situation would, therefore, come under that general coverage.

As I have said, it is our intention that these situations should be included. However, I understand that several hon. members of experience are concerned, so I see no harm in making it perfectly clear by a special reference to both the position of the prison officer and the police officer, and we will be glad to consider the drafting of such a provision.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): While the minister is on this aspect of the matter, and since he is dealing with the meaning of "planned and deliberate", is he going to deal with the question I raised as to whether or not a person has to be in control of his reason. A man could not be in control of his reason but could plan a murder, could be deliberate in its execution, and yet he would come within the definition of "planned and deliberate". Could the minister indicate whether or not that definition presupposes the man is in control of his reason?

Mr. Fulton: I think I answered that in what I said about "planned and deliberate". I have suggested that this wording has no direct bearing on mental capacity, the definition of which remains as it is now in the law with respect to the defence of insanity. Whether a person is or is not responsible for his act, it seems to me that defence is defined in the code and that the word "deliberate" has no direct bearing on the question of mental capacity.

Mr. Deschatelets: If I understood the minister correctly, I believe he has acknowledged that the position taken by the hon. member for Niagara Falls was well taken. Do I understand that the minister will accept an amendment drafted by the hon. member for Niagara Falls to cover the point raised?

Mr. Fulton: No, I said we would be prepared to consider the matter overnight and bring in an amendment to cover the point raised by the hon. member for Niagara Falls. My answer earlier was that we think it is covered. Since, however, we intend it to be covered, we have no objection to having a provision so worded that we can all agree the situation is covered.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the minister have any objection to the hon. member for Niagara Falls moving an amendment tomorrow after it is drafted by his officers?

Mr. Fulton: I would be glad indeed to have the support of the hon. member for the appropriate amendment.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, before the Minister of Justice is influenced by any more suggestions along the line of extending the application of this bill, which some of us thought was moving in the other direction, I should like to discuss this question of "planned and deliberate". I wonder whether we can take it from what the Prime Minister said this afternoon that in effect we now have three degrees of murder, or in a sense four. If a death occurs there are four consequences. Starting from the bottom, they are manslaughter, non-capital murder, capital murder with a recommendation for mercy, which would presumably mean imprisonment for life unless a cabinet directive indicated that a different course should be taken according to a later clause of the bill, and finally capital murder punishable by hanging.

Frankly I approve of the tendency in this bill to put more responsibility into the hands of the jury. In the minister's review of the history of capital punishment and its former very broad application down to its very limited application today, he made reference to the fact that in the early days juries were reluctant to bring in verdicts of guilty in cases like the frivolous crimes of stealing a few shillings, pickpocketing, and so on. It was because of the action of juries and, as the minister pointed out, some enlightened bankers a little later on, that finally pressure was brought to bear which reduced the application of the death penalty at that time.

If through this bill we put into the hands of the jury the additional question of fact, as the minister expressed it earlier today, of determining as a matter of fact whether a murder is planned and deliberate, it seems to me we should perhaps use language which will have a more complete meaning to a jury.

I suggested last week, when the discussion in committee first began, that perhaps "cold-blooded" might be another adjective to add to the description that in my view the majority of people in this country have in mind. I have selected and discarded a number of other words since that time and have come up with two specific suggestions, that a murder to qualify as capital murder should be vicious, cold-blooded, planned and deliberate.

To support that suggestion I offer on the one hand the suggestion that words to persons who must, to qualify for jury duty, be not learned in the law will carry a different sort of weight than the rather confining language of law generally. It seems to me that juries will be able to better understand the implications of the words "vicious and cold-blooded" than the simpler words "planned and deliberate" that are proposed at the present time.

I offer as one of the few examples an editorial in the Toronto Telegram of May 16, 1961, where the caption is "Murder in cold blood". In other words, it seems to me that is what we must have in this law, if we are handing over so much more responsibility to juries. Like the hon. member for Parkdale and other hon. members, I have great confidence in the jury system and certainly the way in which this system has been responsible for various reforms in connection with capital punishment over the years.

It seems to me that the question at the top rung of the ladder, if you like, should include a more precise and generally better understood description of what I believe this parliament had in mind in describing the type of murder for which capital punishment should be the penalty and what I am very confident is in the minds of the majority of Canadians who have expressed their opinions on this matter on a continuing basis in recent years. I do not know at what point I should move this form of amendment, but perhaps now is as good a time as any.

I should like to go on to ask what is, perhaps, a layman's question about the word "or". I wonder whether the minister could answer this question before I proceed. In clause 1 (2) (a) it is said:

> it is planned and deliberate on the part of such person, or

Then you go on to subclause (b). It seems to me there might be some merit in changing that word "or" to "and", and perhaps the minister would point out the reason for the use of the word "or" rather than the word "and".

Mr. Fulton: The use of the word "or" there is appropriate because it is our intention to make these alternatives. Therefore the conjunction "or" is used rather than the conjunction "and" because if "and" were used you would have to prove that the murder had both these elements; in other words, that not only was it planned and deliberate but also that the killing took place in the course of the commission or the attempted commission of another crime. This to us is not at all appropriate.

The crime in mind may have been the crime of murder, which has no relation at all to any other crime. Therefore we do not want to provide that capital murder must have both elements. All we want to provide is that capital murder is a killing which is itself planned or deliberate, or a killing which occurs in the course of committing other crimes which by their nature import not only an element of violence and, as it were, defiance of society, but also the element of deliberation; that is, the person embarked on a course of deliberation, stealth or violence and in the course of carrying it out he killed. In our view that imports the element of deliberation which we feel should be present to constitute capital murder.

We do not intend to provide, and it would be a mistake to provide, that not only must the killing itself be planned and deliberate but it must take place in the course of the commission of another offence in order to be capital murder. That would be the effect if we used the word "and" instead of "or".

Mr. McGee: I thank the minister very much for that reply. I refer to the reply he gave earlier in connection with this question of diminishing responsibility which I raised. The minister will recall that on May 23 the hon. member for Charlevoix, in his speech on second reading, made a specific proposal to which I have not found any reply on the part of the minister.

The hon. member for Charlevoix was concerned, as are a great many hon. members of this committee, about the question of the contradiction mentioned by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. I refer to the fact that the M'Naghten rules, while they may have served a very important purpose, were in fact brought into being not in the normal course of the process of law but because of a directive brought into being in 1843 when the science of psychiatry and the knowledge of the workings of the human mind were in their earliest stages. It has been argued by some that the M'Naghten rules have been fairly successful and if one criticizes them the reply is, "If you do not like the M'Naghten rules, what have you to offer as an improvement or an alternative?"

I am not too concerned about the definition, if there is no better one available to apply, in terms of determining sanity or insanity in law, but I am most anxious that this question of sanity should not be concerned in the capital murder category. There has been much discussion of the United Kingdom homicide act of 1957 and I notice that several hon. members of the Liberal party in particular seem to be greatly enamoured of that act. I would caution them, as the minister has already pointed out, that this particular bill was subject to the most strenuous criticism at several points on its inception and in the debates in the United Kingdom parliament and that it has been under continuing fire ever since it became law. There are serious flaws in it, and, as I said on second reading, the bill put forward by the minister in an attempt to find a middle point is a far more intelligent and successful attempt to accomplish the intentions of the government than the homicide act of 1957.

I would point out, however, that one of the features of that act which has been praised and been the subject of favourable comment was, in effect, the removal from the picture of capital punishment of the application of the M'Naghten rules by specifically designating—the clause was quoted, I believe, by the hon. member for Niagara Falls—

> 2. (1) Where a person kills or is a party to the killing of another, he shall not be convicted of murder if he was suffering from such abnormality of mind (whether arising from a condition of arrested or retarded development of mind or any inherent causes or induced by disease or injury) as substantially impaired his mental responsibility for his acts and omissions in doing or being a party to the killing.

It seems to me that this would have considerable merit. It would allow the application of the M'Naghten rules to come into force with respect to non-capital murder only, and the question of sanity in terms of the law in capital cases would be determined by this definition which, I suggest, is an improvement.

As I mentioned earlier, the hon. member for Charlevoix put forward the proposal that a board of psychiatrists be established at some point in the judicial system to determine sanity outside the application of the M'Naghten rules. I may be wrong, but I do not recall the minister having offered an opinion concerning the desirability of an examining board being introduced at some point in the process of the law to determine medical sanity as opposed to legal sanity according to M'Naghten.

Mr. Drysdale: The minister has indicated he is prepared to amend the section dealing with the specific case of murders committed in the course of a prison break, murders of prison officers. If I may refer to my own bill, No. C-38, clause 2 paragraphs (b), (c), (d) and (e) I think he will find something there on which to base his amendment.

I wonder if the minister has felt that the definition of a weapon as contained in the Criminal Code is wide enough to cover death caused by an explosion whether of a bomb, dynamite or other material. The definition in the code, though intended to be general, seems to refer to a specific type of weapon such as a revolver.

Mr. Fulton: I thank the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond for the helpful work he has done on his bill. We shall certainly have a look at it. In reply to the hon. member for York-Scarborough and his reference to the question of possible statutory provision for a board of psychiatrists, we have considered that possibility. It was also discussed by the royal commission on the law of insanity as a defence in criminal cases. We came to the conclusion that there was no need to make statutory provision for such a body. We thought the situation would be more open and flexible if we left the law as it is at the moment, bearing in mind that the provinces are responsible for the enforcement of this branch of the criminal law as they are of others. It would mean imposing upon them a liability for maintaining boards of psychiatrists. Some of the provinces do, in effect, maintain them; others do not. This would introduce a degree of rigidity which it is not necessary to have in view of the essential fact that at the present time in the course of any case it is open to the crown or to the accused to raise the question of the mental competence of the accused and then to introduce psychiatric evidence in that connection.

In reply to the question raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond with regard to the definition of the weapon, we have examined that point and reached the conclusion that it would not be desirable, nor would it be necessary to be at all specific in that regard. Killing by an explosive such as a bomb is surely covered by the general provision regarding deliberate or planned murder. For example, if anyone successfully plants a bomb in a plane he surely cannot be thought to be guilty of anything other than a planned and deliberate killing. Similarly, if the accused plants a bomb somewhere on the surface of the earth that could only be a planned and deliberate killing, we felt it was not necessary to broaden the definition of "weapon" so as to take care of that case.

Mr. McGee: I appreciate the point the minister made concerning the rigidity of the system which might be imposed on the provincial authorities by the establishment of boards of psychiatrists, but I have had some experience of the problem caused by psychiatric evidence while I was acting in the capacity of a juror. I recall that during one trial the prisoner apparently went to sleep in the dock. An issue then arose which assumed the form of a trial within a trial. The defence argued to the effect that if a man could fall asleep in a courtroom when he was on trial for his life this was prima facie evidence of insanity of some sort. We heard some learned argument on both sides for and against this proposition. We then retired to the jury room in this trial within a trial, as I have said, to decide the question whether the accused was really asleep or whether he was only pretending to be asleep. This was an interesting diversion, but how can any group of persons looking at another person decide whether in fact that person is asleep or pretending to be asleep? Since there was no conclusive evidence it was virtually impossible to decide. However, we came to the conclusion that since the matter of insanity would be arising later in any event we would decide, for the time being at any rate, that there was a possibility of malingering. But after the psychiatrists had confronted the jury—and this jury was made up of persons from many walks of life with various backgrounds, degrees of education and vocabulary—by the time we had heard the psychiatric evidence presented by both sides, members of the jury quite frankly were more confused than before the presentation of this psychiatric evidence.

Having had that experience, coupled with the opinion expressed in different articles which I have read along this line, I have come to the conclusion that the hon. member for Charlevoix may be right in his suggestion regarding the establishment of such a board.

I should also like to state that the minister has not acknowledged—perhaps he does not agree—that there are findings within the application of the M'Naghten rule, which should apply, nor has he given any reason why a clause, similar to the diminished responsibility clause in the British act, should not be inserted into this proposed new legislation. He did say earlier this afternoon that a recommendation to include such a clause was not put forth by either the Gowers commission or our parliamentary committee. With great respect, however, I would submit that is not a powerful argument for its exclusion, because the principles included in this bill itself are not included either in the Gowers commission recommendations or the recommendations put forward by the Canadian parliamentary committee.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure I appreciate the point the hon. member for York-Scarborough is trying to make. I do not know whether he is referring to the desirability of having the examination of a person, who has been sentenced to death, carried out by a board of psychiatrists, or referring to the desirability of examining every person who faces a capital murder charge, carried out by a board of psychiatrists. If he is referring to the desirability of having every person examined by a psychiatrist, that person having been sentenced to death, I should remind him of the practice which has been, for many years, and is being carried out, of having a psychiatrist retained by the federal government examine persons in precisely those circumstances. The cabinet receives a full report from that psychiatrist, which is available to it in its consideration of the question of exercising clemency.

We have one psychiatrist for all English speaking Canadians who journeys around the country examining persons sentenced to death. There is another psychiatrist who examines all French speaking individuals who are similarly condemned. We obtain adequate and thorough consideration in respect of the psychiatric condition of condemned men in this way, as well as a degree of uniformity in approach, which I think is most desirable in these cases. In addition, of course, any psychiatric evidence given at the trial is available to the cabinet, and it is the practice of the federal government psychiatrists to consult, generally speaking, with others who have given psychiatric evidence, if that individual feels that consultation is helpful.

With regard to the doctrine of diminished responsibility, I realize that views vary, but I should like to refer to this question again, if for no other reason than to correct a misstatement I made this afternoon. I believe I said that both the Gowers commission, of the United Kingdom, and our own parliamentary committee had made recommendations against the adoption of that doctrine. To be completely accurate, I should have said that the Gowers commission recommended against the importation of this law into England, although it said it had no objection to its application as then incorporated in the law of Scotland. It did, however, recommend against its extension. In Canada it was not our parliamentary committee which made the recommendation against it, because it did not deal with the subject at all. The royal commission on the law of insanity recommended, as found at page 46 of their report, conclusion No. 11, against the adoption of the law of diminished responsibility in Canada.

I was asked earlier by the hon. member for York-Scarborough why we used the word "or", as against the use of the word "and", in one of the clauses of the bill. Perhaps I should have based my explanation on a simile, which I now do. There are certain events taking place across the country today, where the choice to be made is between a Liberal or Conservative candidate; one or the other must win. Therefore, we say one or the other, because they cannot both win, which would be the effect if we used the word "and". It must be either one or the other. The committee will be pleased to know that in the riding of Restigouche-Madawaska the Conservative candidate has won.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a few more remarks concerning this proposed legislation, prompted by the remarks made by the Prime Minister this afternoon, as well as by the fact that the Minister of Justice has involuntarily omitted to comment on a remark which I made concerning paragraph (i) 1, or 1 (i).

The Prime Minister made it quite clear by his remarks this afternoon that he felt something should be done in Canada to assure that no one who was convicted on circumstantial evidence of the crime of murder, or any other crime, should lose his life because of it. This feeling is shared by most hon. members of this house, as well as the majority of citizens of Canada. However, I felt the Prime Minister was blowing both hot and cold, because as clause 1 of this proposed measure now exists, there is no effort represented there, on the part of the government, to pass a law which would prevent the conviction and execution of any individual on solely circumstantial evidence. One always realizes the horror of the situation when a man is sentenced to death, because there is always the possibility that an innocent man will lose his life. In spite of this fact, and the words of the Prime Minister this afternoon, we find nowhere in this bill, as presented to us at this time, a clause representing any effort on the part of the government, to eradicate the possibility of such a thing taking place. I suggest that many people in this country, and more specifically a judge, with whom I recently spoke, have objection to the present law, which is not changed substantially by this bill, in this respect, because it does not include a high degree of security or safeguard, so that individuals in this country will not be convicted or hanged on circumstantial evidence. While I must admit there is no portion of this bill which deals with the subject, clause 1 does attempt to segregate crimes in respect of which capital punishment applies. This is one problem for which there is no solution contained in this bill.

As one reads clause 1 one sees that something is being done to try to do away with capital punishment by the back door. If clause 1 is passed in the form in which it now reads, murder in Canada will from now on be punished by life imprisonment, with certain exceptions. This may be of interest to certain hon. members who have made quite a plea for the retention of capital punishment up to a certain point. The punishment for murder in Canada from now on will be life imprisonment except for the offences enumerated in clause 1. I feel there should be two ways of referring to it, namely capital murder and non-capital murder. It seems to me we could retain the phraseology that murder is punishable by life imprisonment and upon a verdict of capital murder being found the penalty is death. This would solve the problem.

I make these remarks with the reservation that it is my opinion that clause 7 should be removed. If clause 7 disappears from this bill there would be no point in enumerating both capital murder and non-capital murder. To introduce the new terminology a verdict of capital murder would suffice.

As I have said, I rose to speak again because the minister—I know he is a busy man —did not answer my remarks on clause (2)(i). I have had occasion to discuss this question with other people learned in the law. They have indicated to me that the responsibility of the accomplice is not the same in clause (2)(i) as in clause (1)(ii) and (iii). This means that if the crime of murder is committed by hitting a person with an object the accomplice has a greater responsibility for the crime and could be found guilty of murder in such cases much more readily than in other cases such as choking or stopping a person's breath, where the act is repeated. We do not find in clause (1)(i) any reference to the stopping of a person's breath. The clause stops abruptly after the simple words "assisted in causing the bodily harm from which death ensued". This does not necessarily mean assisted in applying force which caused the bodily harm and which itself was the cause of stopping the breath. I feel sure the minister will see my point. I suggest that after the words "assisted in causing the bodily harm" in clause (1)(i), there should be added the words "assisted in applying the force causing bodily harm". The physical act of stopping the breath or administering the stupefying thing would place the accomplice under the same degree of responsibility. I feel the minister should have no objection to this.

The minister tried to answer my query about paragraph (a) which deals with a person who has been killed but not the person who has committed the offence. I realize that the intention of the minister and of parliament is undoubtedly to amend the code so that the person who commits the offence is the person who is referred to. If a murder is a capital offence if the person committing it has deliberately done so, why not say it? Why use the phrase "in respect of any person"? When the reference is to the person committing the offence, why say "in respect of any person" in an important clause such as this? For this reason alone I am still prepared to say that it is an ambiguous clause and that lawyers will debate it and will say that the murder must be deliberate as to the person who is killed. If he kills the wrong person you cannot hang the person committing the offence, particularly if he can be found guilty of committing another type of murder. I repeat, the clause is ambiguous. I say that I might construe the meaning to be the opposite of that which the minister would give to it. Why does he not use the words "the person who committed" and let us be done with it? Then it would not be "in respect of any person" who could be the person killed or the person doing the killing.

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question? This is the question I said I was going to ask this afternoon and did not. He suggested debate would take place among lawyers as to what "in respect of any person" means, and who that person is. Does the hon. member seriously think that lawyers will debate the matter as to whether you are going to hang the accused or the victim? Does it not boil down to this?

Mr. Godin: I am sorry; the hon. member does not seem to grasp the argument I am making.

Mr. Deschatelets: Don't worry; he is going to be executed at the next federal election.

Mr. Godin: The murder to be deliberate and planned must be so in respect of any person. I realize that we do not want to so amend the code that the person who is proved to have committed murder will be sentenced for capital murder. An argument must be made to show that it was deliberate as to the person who has been killed. I realize that it is a simple argument as far as phraseology is concerned; but there is no doubt that the second part and the first part, for that matter, of the clause are ambiguous.

[Mr. Godin.]

We now come to paragraph (b). I recall that a moment ago the hon. member for York-Scarborough indicated that he would like to see the word "and" included in order to couple the two subparagraphs together. When you get down to paragraph (2) (ii) you find that the person by his own act must have administered or assisted in the act. The murder refers to the guilt of the person who applies the force, but I just wonder in the first instance what gain there is in using the phraseology which does not say exactly what parliament intends. Of course, people on juries are not lawyers. As everyone knows, lawyers are barred from sitting on juries. Jurors are not versed in the law nor in the terminology of the law, and they may be affected by the argument which I am making now. I state that we have at least confused matters in this sentence and I do not think we can afford to do that.

As I have said to the Minister of Justice, there are certain amendments I should like to see introduced in clause 1 which will at the same time cover the intentions with respect to the offence as indicated by the minister. Mind you, I do not suggest that what we set forth in clause 1 will never be changed. I realize that laws of this nature can be close to perfection but not absolutely perfect. I also realize that the minister is very tired. I should like to read him my conception of clause 1 so that he can sleep on it and possibly come back tomorrow prepared to change the odd word. I am sure he can do so without changing the principle of the bill and at the same time make the meaning clearer to those ordinary Canadians who will sit on juries and to whom these clauses will be read from time to time. If he has this suggestion before him it may very well be that tomorrow he will be prepared to introduce these ordinary words which will mean something definite and will not leave jurymen in the position of having to spend some time wondering what a phrase actually does mean. I am pleased to read to the minister my version of clause 1 taking into consideration the elimination of clause 7. Clause 1 as I should like to see it worded would read as follows:

1. The Criminal Code is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 202 thereof, the following section:—

Of course, the clause I suggest could possibly fit in after other clauses but as the minister has decided to place his clause on this point immediately following I will continue with mine:

A verdict of guilty of capital murder shall be rendered where

(a) the said murder is planned and deliberate on the part of the person committing it;
(b) the said murder is within section 202 and such person
(i) by his own act caused or assisted—

Here is a change.

—in applying the force or threat of force causing the bodily harm from which the death ensued.

The rest of the section would remain as it is except that subsection 3 would disappear. With these remarks I am prepared to leave my reflections with the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: I thank the hon. member for his solicitude. I can assure him I am not tired. "Tired" is not the right word, I think, to describe my reactions as I listen to some of the things that are said. We will certainly have a look at the hon. member's draft. If we think it improves the section we will be glad to say so and to make the appropriate change. I can assure him, however, that this section was not drafted carelessly or in haste or without any consideration of the sort of point that the hon. member has raised. I do suggest to him that where we speak of a person who by his own act does these things the ordinary juryman will have no difficulty in deciding that we mean the person who caused the death and not the person who was killed.

Mr. Spencer: Mr. Chairman, sub-section 2(a) of clause 1 of the bill gives me some concern. I do not know whether this point was raised before, as I was not in the house in the early part of the evening, but I have reference to the use of the conjunction "and" between the words "planned" and "deliberate". I do not consider these two words as being synonymous. The word "planned", I think, does not admit of much doubt as to its meaning. I think any murder which is planned must be deliberate, that is, the killing must follow as a deliberate act. But I do not think that a murder which is deliberate need have been planned. I think there is a distinction. May I refer to the considered remarks of the minister when he introduced the bill. As found on page 5223 of Hansard, he said:

In carrying out the delicate but important task of bringing the law into line with our convictions in this field, we have concentrated our attention on producing a system which represents a rational and logical application of those principles of law upon which I have touched. We have accordingly started on the basis that there are two broad types of killing. The first is where the death does not result from any act of deliberation on the part of the person causing it—

At that point I wish to note that the word "planned" was not used.

—but can be said to be impulsive or non-deliberate, in the sense of being in no way within the prior contemplation of that person. It is our view that the death penalty ought not to be the consequence in these cases, and accordingly although the crime may be murder, it is classed as non-capital and a sentence of life imprisonment only is provided.

I point out, Mr. Chairman, that the view expressed there was that in order for the murder to be classed as non-capital it must be impulsive and non-deliberate and no reference is made to the fact that it must not be planned. The minister went on to say:

The other type of killing is the case where death is caused deliberately—

Then the word "or" is used.

—or as the result of a planned act of the person causing it. All these cases are classed as capital murder and for these cases, but for these cases only, the sentence of death will follow automatically on conviction.

My desire is that an explanation be given why the word "or" should not be used instead of the conjunction "and" because from the explanation given by the minister it appears to me that there are such things as murders which, in the one case, are deliberate and murders which, in the other case, are both deliberate and previously planned.

I think it might be of importance to read another paragraph which follows a little further on in which reference is made to the second type of murder. The minister said:

The second is the category in which, although a killing itself may not have been consciously and initially planned, yet the course of action embarked upon or planned had within it such an element of criminality and violence, as well as of deliberation or stealth, that the killing must properly be regarded—

Then, I emphasize these words:

—as deliberate by the person who did it or who counselled or procured the doing of the act which caused it.

These words, of course, have reference to paragraph (b) of subclause 2 which deals with murders which fall within section 202. In the case of these murders, you will note that it is capital murder where death follows the commission or the attempt to commit certain definite offences. The deaths that ensue need not be planned or deliberate. The deaths result during the commission of the offences and if death is caused by an individual, by his own act, then that killing is considered to be capital murder.

My concern is that in the explanation the planning and deliberateness were not considered to be a necessary combination. The deliberateness, in itself, would justify capital punishment, and that was the construction I took from the remarks that were made. If you used deliberateness in the commission of the murder then, that alone, would be sufficient to classify it as capital murder.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, a little earlier this evening I gave the committee an outline of the concept we had in mind which we have translated into legal terms by the use of the words "planned and deliberate". I said it was our view that what was necessary was something more than what was usually involved in intent or mens rea or malice aforethought. I pointed out also that the words "deliberate and premeditated" in the United States have tended in some states at any rate to be interpreted as meaning not much more than mens rea or intent as those words are defined in a legal sense. We wanted something more than that.

I would point out a significant passage in the Gowers commission report which draws attention to the fact that in most jurisdictions where there are degrees of murder, the division of the degrees is based on the original enactment of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania which has carried into legal form this concept that murder which is deliberate and premeditated, to use their words, should be capital and other types of murder non-capital. The actual words are that "all murder which shall be perpetrated by means of poison, by lying in wait or by any other kinds of deliberate and premeditated killings are capital murders." As I say, most jurisdictions where this kind of division has been attempted use words based on that definition, and generally the words are "deliberate and premeditated".

We felt, as I say, that while this country would not necessarily follow the pattern of the law of the United States, nevertheless they both spring from common roots and the tendency there has been to narrow the interpretation of "deliberate and premeditated". We wanted, therefore, to find another word that would import an element of something beyond mere intent or mens rea and we felt the words "planned and deliberate" best achieved that purpose. I do not think there can be much argument that something which is deliberate might well not be planned and deliberate in the legal meaning. Somebody might pull a gun and deliberately squeeze the trigger. This may well be the result of an impulse and therefore, in the sense of being a planned murder, would not fall within the definition. As I have tried to indicate, we feel that the words "planned and deliberate", not planned or deliberate, bring in this concept of something more than a mere formation of intent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was very interested in the observations of the hon. member for Essex West who, I know, is a good lawyer. I could see that he was troubled by this particular combination of words. He says that he had understood that capital murder might consist of a deliberate act that was not planned. It is now clear from what the minister has said that what is intended is a combination of two states of mind, if I may refer to "planned and deliberate" in that context, in order to constitute capital murder. If I understood the minister correctly in what he has just said, in order to constitute capital murder, the act must not only be planned but it must also be deliberate. It must not only be deliberate, but it must also be planned. I take it that is the situation? I cannot see the minister clearly.

Mr. Fulton: I will deal with my hon. friend's remarks when he has finished so I know the whole of the implication he is trying to take from these words.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I had understood the situation this way. The hon. member for Essex West had put it differently and I understood from what the minister said earlier and from what he has now said, that my judgment was confirmed, that you must have both of these states of mind present, "planned and deliberate", and if you omit one then it is not capital murder.

Mr. Fulton: I have no quarrel with that summation, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, I indicated that we would consider introducing an amendment to the clause to cover the case of prison guards and police officers, so perhaps clause 1 could stand.

Clause 1 stands.

On clause 2—Punishment for capital murder.

Mr. Drysdale: I should like to make one point in connection with clause 2, paragraph (3), which deals with the apparent age of the accused. I wonder, in the interests of clarity, if it might not be advisable to have the clause read something like this:

> Notwithstanding subsection (1), any person who is under the age of 18 years or who appears to the court to be under the age of 18 years—

The other sections of the Criminal Code appear to specify the age and it is only when there is no way of being certain of the actual age that they rely on the appearance. As the section reads, if a person appears to the court to be, for example, 19 years of age and is actually 17 years of age, under this particular section he would be guilty of capital murder and hanged, whereas I think the inference is that the actual age of the person who has the appearance of being 18 years of age should be considered.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, before the minister comments I wonder whether he would answer another question I have in mind. The wording in the subsection to which the hon. member referred is "appears to the court". I therefore conclude that this is not a question of fact to be decided by a jury but that the judge, who might well be substituted for the word "court", will have the determination of that particular issue?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman. To deal with the last question first, that is the intention, because as will be seen from reading subclause 3, it does not affect conviction but only sentence. The jury may convict of capital murder, but the provision is that no person who appears to be under the age of 18 shall be sentenced to death.

To go back to the question of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, it seems to us, and I think on good ground, that where there is certainty about the age of the accused there would be no difficulty. The case where this provision becomes applicable and important is where there is uncertainty about the age of the accused. Surely if, for instance, a birth certificate were produced there would be no uncertainty about the age of the accused, unless that birth certificate was shown to have been fraudulently acquired.

Therefore it would appear to the court from the evidence of the birth certificate that the accused is under 18 years of age and there would be no doubt about it. But supposing there were no birth certificate. In that case the matter of the evidence as to his apparent age becomes important.

In that case I think it is important to have this provision, because it may well be that a person who looks to be more than 18 years of age might be shown by other evidence to be not more than 18 or to be under 18. So I think it is important to have this provision in this way. While it is not absolutely conclusive of the matter, I would point out that this is the wording of the corresponding provision in the homicide act of 1957 in the United Kingdom. That provision reads:

> Sentence of death shall not be pronounced on or recorded against a person convicted of an offence who appears to the court to have been under the age of 18 years at the time the offence was committed,—

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I wonder attention I could just draw this matter to the atention of the minister. My only desire is for clarity and uniformity. Section 12 of the Criminal Code says:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was under the age of seven years.

They specify that. Then section 565, subsection 2 says:

> In the absence of other evidence, or by way of corroboration of other evidence, a jury, judge, justice or magistrate, as the case may be, may infer the age of a child or young person from his appearance.

All I was seeking to do was clarify what I considered to be an ambiguity. If there is the usual strict, statutory interpretation I would suggest that the statute at present permits the very situation I have suggested, because all it provides is for the judge to infer what the age is; there is no provision for using the best evidence such as a birth certificate or other evidence of that kind.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend has overlooked the very words he has read. Section 565 (2) says:

> In the absence of other evidence, or by way of corroboration of other evidence, a jury, judge, justice or magistrate, as the case may be, may infer the age of a child or young person from his appearance.

If there were no birth certificate, there would be other evidence and it seems to me the ordinary rules of best evidence would apply.

Mr. Drysdale: Yes, but that word is not contained in section 206 (3). I was referring to the fact that the two types of sections are used, the first one where the age is specified and the second one which says that if you cannot ascertain the age you infer it. All I sought to bring in was a specific reference to the age.

Mr. Fulton: Surely section 565 is one of general application. It starts by saying:

> In any proceedings to which this act applies—

That is the Criminal Code, and certainly the Criminal Code applies to proceedings here. Section 565 is one of general application, and it says that in the absence of other evidence the age may be inferred from appearance. That is why it is stated here that a person who appears to the court to have been under the age of 18 years at the time of committing the offence shall not be sentenced to death.

The court will reach its conclusion on the evidence. If there is firm evidence such as a birth certificate, there is no question. In the absence of that, the court may make an inference as to his age from the appearance of the accused.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely what is intended in subclauses 2 and 3 is that anyone who is under the age of 18 years, or appears to the court to have been under the age of 18 years at the time he committed a capital murder shall not be sentenced to death.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has suggested that section 206(3) of the Criminal Code should read:

a person who was or appears to the court to have been under the age of 18,—

Is that the language the hon. gentleman proposed?

Mr. Drysdale: I suggested, "a person who is under the age of 18 years or who appears to the court to have been under the age of 18 years."

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The phraseology I have is that section 206(3) should read:

a person who was or appears to the court to have been under the age of 18—

While our wording is slightly different, the amendment is the same. It seems to me that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond completes the subclause as I am sure the minister intends. If it is left as it is, a person who is in fact under 18 years of age and may not appear to be under 18 years of age does not come within the provision of the subclause.

Surely we want to make sure that a person who in fact is under 18 years of age or who appears to be under 18 years of age shall not be sentenced to death. The only way we can do that is by including words similar to those proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond or by accepting the words I have proposed, otherwise we are excluding from the subclause a person who is in fact under 18 years of age and who may not appear to be under 18 years of age.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all, Mr. Chairman. The word "appears" is used here and it is used, as is always the case in statutes and legal proceedings, as a term of art.

My hon. friend will be familiar with the expression used in judgments, "It appearing to the court", so and so. That means the court is satisfied upon evidence that such and such a set of circumstances exists.

The effect of this is that where it is made to appear to the court that the person was under the age of 18 years at the time he committed the offence, there shall be no sentence of death. So of course this applies to a person who was actually under the age of 18 years, although he may not look it. The best evidence to make it appear to the court that he is under the age of 18 years is, of course, a birth certificate; but if there is no birth certificate, any other relevant evidence may be admitted to establish the circumstances.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I have some remarks to make with respect to section 206 (1). I wish to first thank the minister for the graciousness of his remarks and for considering some of the proposals which I and other hon. members put forward earlier today with respect to the preceding clause. I hope the minister may greet the remarks I have to make now with as much approval.

There is in this phrase an opportunity, perhaps by an addition to it, to do something which is in the spirit of the statement made by the minister when he introduced this bill, that is to comply with the feeling which is abroad in the country and the feeling which appears to be agreed upon by most of the members of this committee. It is a simple amendment, but one with far-reaching effects. I have prepared an amendment which in a moment I shall read, and I shall send copies to the minister.

It will be recalled that a parliamentary committee which sat in 1954 and 1955, and of which the minister was a member, at least in 1954, heard several witnesses and, in particular, two, Dr. MacLean of Welland and Mr. Clinton Duffy of California in the United States, and both of them gave evidence gruesome in detail and horrible in concept of different methods of capital punishment. My amendment is to add to the words "shall be sentenced to death" which appear in section 206(1) the following words: "in a central lethal gas chamber".

It goes without saying that the amendment if approved will call for further conseqential amendments by the minister including perhaps the deletion of section 642. I believe this amendment would have the approval of most hon. members and certainly of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond who mentioned this matter an hour or two ago. If we are to retain the death penalty and to accept what the minister has said as to a feeling abroad in the country with respect to capital punishment for some crimes it would appear it is encumbent upon us to ascertain which is the most honourable way of carrying out this sentence—the most efficient way not only of destroying human life but of preserving the body for those to whom it still may have some significance, namely the family, besides being less brutalizing in its effect upon society itself.

It may be noted that I have used the word "central" as a description of the place where the executions are to be carried out. I have had some limited experience of the capital punishment carried out in the county of Welland. It was described by Dr. MacLean in his evidence at page 645 of the report of the special committee of this house and the other place which sat in 1954, and I have had the opportunity to observe the brutalizing effect on members of that community, not only members of the bar and those associated with the work of the court such as jurymen or employees of the penal system but the public generally which knew that on a certain day within the court house, which is located in the centre of the city, capital punishment would be carried out. This has a most debilitating effect on those employed by the court—

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. lady but did I understand her to say she proposed to move this amendment? If so, I think I must ask the committee to express its views as to the propriety of such an amendment because I remember that when the debate on second reading took place Mr. Speaker expressed doubt as to the propriety of discussing the question of the method of execution. Therefore, we might save time if we found out whether the committee was in agreement regarding a discussion of this amendment and whether it is within the scope of the bill.

Mr. Fulton: I was in the process of looking up the authorities which I propose to lay before you in connection with that very point, because it appears to me very doubtful indeed whether this amendment is in order. You have called to our attention the fact that Mr. Speaker has already ruled that the question of the method of execution was not relevant to the principles of the bill and therefore could not be discussed on second reading. I have been looking up the authorities in order to find the precise ruling which, if I recall it correctly, says that amendments which cannot be moved on second reading because they are not germane to the subject matter cannot be moved in committee. I have not yet been able to put my finger on that authority but I am certain the rule exists.

If this amendment were ruled to be in order we would certainly be carried into something which is far beyond the scope of this bill. The bill proposes to divide murder into two classes, capital and non-capital, and to make certain changes in the procedure as to trial and sentence. It is absolutely silent on the method of execution. The hon. member for Niagara Falls herself directed our attention earlier to the fact that this involved a different section of the act, a section not mentioned in this bill, which discusses the question of the method of execution. Therefore I think that what I have said becomes completely obvious and that to discuss the method of execution is not only outside the bill but, in particular, outside the scope of the clause presently under discussion.

I would refer Your Honour to all the authorities, particularly those appearing in Beauchesne's fourth edition at page 171 on the question of relevancy which, I submit, applies equally in committee as it does in the house.

Mr. Drysdale: The hon. lady referred to me in the course of her remarks. I did intimate in the course of the discussion that the two matters were interwoven on an emotional plane and then I went on to state the reasons why I thought this was not an appropriate matter—this question of the method of capital punishment—to be discussed on this occasion. But the minister could, I suggested, bring the matter to the attention of the various provincial attorneys general. The alteration of the method of capital punishment would require a change being made to an entirely different section of the Criminal Code. That is one aspect of this question. But there is a second aspect. An onus would rest on the various provinces to reach a decision as to the construction of a gas chamber, its cost, maintenance and so on. I felt that the two matters were separate. I merely mentioned the subject to the minister as one which might be brought up at a later date.

As far as the accused man is concerned I do not feel it makes any difference whether he goes to his death by hanging or by the gas chamber. I suggested the greatest effect would be on the people who remained, the idea suggested by a gas chamber in the minds of some people being equivalent to putting a person to sleep. I pointed out clearly at the time why I did not think we could proceed to discuss this question. I support the idea, but I do not think this is the time to put forward such an amendment as the hon. lady proposes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not know that I intend to take issue with the minister on his interpretation of the rules but the matter raised by the hon. member for Niagara Falls is one to which not only she but many in this house attach a great deal of importance.

The committee is always the master of its own rules, as the house is master of its own rules. If the committee was prepared to regard this matter as one that should be included in the bill, and if there was no objection taken, there would be no difficulties, under our procedures, in putting forward an amendment like this. Perhaps it is true that the minister must take the lead in the matter, but does he not think that, in view of the strong case put forward by the hon. member for Niagara Falls; because of the views that exist in this house in respect of the matter, and because of the strong public opinion which exists in this country in this regard, that we might well agree in this committee that this particular matter should be dealt with this way? Our rules surely are not intended to preclude us from taking a reasonable course, but are intended to guide us generally in debate. There have been occasions when the rules have been made subservient to the public interest on an expression by the committee of its desire to supplant these rules to meet a particular purpose. I suggest to the minister that this is the kind of case where that kind of plea could be made with some great justification.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have been very quiet today because I am not versed in the obscure technical definitions of the legal language in which the hon. minister and other members of the legal profession have been indulging today. However, I can understand this type of amendment as it is within my comprehension. I must compliment the hon. member for Niagara Falls for her amendment, which I think does represent a large body of public opinion in this country, which indicates a desire for something to be done to remedy the present inhuman practice. I think her arguments were logical.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to interrupt such an experienced member as my old friend from Kootenay West, but I think the question as to whether or not the amendment was in order has been raised, but not yet decided.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, come, you are just an old Tory.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest the hon. member for Kootenay West might perhaps be happier if he knew whether or not his remarks were in order before he proceeded with them.

Mr. Herridge: I was rather following the lead given by the hon. member for Essex East, who expressed some doubt in his own mind as to this being in order, but wanted to express his opinion. I intend to do so as well, very briefly.

The Chairman: Order. May I point out that the hon. member for Essex East appealed to the minister to accept the amendment, notwithstanding the rules. That is what I understood him to suggest.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, no. What I had suggested, Mr. Chairman, was that the committee was master of its rules, as the house is master of its rules, and could agree to suspend the rules, but that the lead in the matter must obviously come from the minister.

The Chairman: That is what I intended to indicate. There is a difference between that course and the course followed by the hon. member for Kootenay West, which was rather a discussion in regard to the merits of the amendment.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to conclude my very brief remarks. I think there is a difference without a distinction as between what was said by the hon. member for Essex East and what I have to say.

I should like, however, to express the wholehearted support of this group for the amendment, its intention and purpose, however it is achieved. I too think that it is quite gallant on the part of that hon. member, and in regard to this question, the member for Niagara Falls and the member for Kootenay West are two hearts beating as one.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I should just like very briefly to lend my support to the position taken by the minister. In doing so, I should draw to your attention the fact that these sections, which are now being considered to amend the Criminal Code, are sections under part (v), which deals with the enumeration of offences, and the punishment. The sections dealing with penalties and forfeitures are contained in part XX of the code. Part XX is almost a separate code in itself dealing with capital punishment. Sections 642 to 653 of the Criminal Code inclusive, deal only with the question of capital punishment; how, where, and in what manner it shall be carried out. They are quite distinct and separate matters from the enumeration and definitions of criminal offences. I do not think it would be helpful at this time to introduce arguments which deal with the method of execution, as related to the question of what shall or shall not be capital or non-capital murder.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Could I make a remark, Mr. Chairman?

The fourth line of section 2 of the bill under consideration ends with the words:

—shall be sentenced to death.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) has suggested that section 2 be amended by adding the words "in the gas chamber". I cannot think of a more appropriate amendment.

The Minister of Justice and the hon. member who has just resumed his seat are far from having convinced me that the amendment is out of order. If it is out of order, I should like to know according to what section of the standing orders so that we may discuss the point.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I can be of much more assistance to you in respect of the point of order, and perhaps I should only address myself to the rather novel suggestion made by the hon. member for Essex East, that I should take the lead in inviting the committee to go beyond what the rules authorize. I think that is a suggestion which more appropriately should be carried out by the hon. gentleman who made it, than by myself.

Quite apart from its propriety, I find myself unable to accept it for reasons which were alluded to by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. This whole question is one in which, in my view, it would be essential to have discussions with the provinces before any such change was adopted. I do not debate the merits of the proposal, but whatever the change, whether it involves the central place or the method of execution, since the provinces have that responsibility, I do not think it would be in order, nor courteous in matters of this kind, to do so without first of all discussing it with the provinces. I think that is essential to the proper administration of the law. I am therefore, not in a position to accept the suggestion that we should here embark upon a debate which is not only out of order, but which, in my view, deals with a matter in respect of which I am not at the moment in the position to properly express an opinion.

Mr. Roberge: Following those remarks of the minister, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask him a question based on section 642 of the Criminal Code, which provides that the death sentence will be carried out by hanging the condemned individual by the neck until he is dead. Could the minister tell us when this section was enacted, or the preceding similar section, whether the provinces were consulted in respect of that method?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that took place somewhat before my time, although I feel it has been included in the code for a good many years. I am afraid I cannot help my hon. friend by informing him how long it has been there. It certainly has been there as long as I have been alive, and I have escaped its effects so far. My impression is that it has been included in the code since its enactment, and feel it originally came from some pre-confederation statute. However, this does not seem to me to affect the question of relevance. I merely say that in a matter of this kind, where the provinces are charged with the responsibility of carrying out this task, it would not be appropriate to make a fundamental change in the method by which it is done, without prior consultation with the provinces. I have not said anything about veto. Although the responsibility and authority resides here, there are ways and ways of exercising authority, and I think it would be inappropirate to make such a change without having discussed the matter with the provinces on a previous occasion, at least to obtain their views.

Miss LaMarsh: I must confess I hesitate to rise on a point of order since I have not done so before. But in the first instance the minister said that the proposed amendment is not germane to the subject matter of the bill. The hon. member for Peace River made the remark that the clause which is now under discussion is one which, of course, does not enumerate any offences. They have already been enumerated in the preceding clause which is standing at the moment. This clause deals with what happens to someone who is convicted of capital murder or of non-capital murder, and what happens to someone who is convicted notwithstanding the fact that he is under the age of 18 years. The various subclauses certainly say how the body is to be disposed of in one way or another.

I would not have raised this at all on the second reading of the bill or in the general discussion of clause 1, because I agree with the opinions which have been expressed that this is not the proper place to do it. We are now discussing section 206 of the Criminal Code. Subclause 1 of section 2 of this bill which repeals section 206 of the code and the other subclauses are the ones which deal with the disposition of a human body after a certain sentence. I would therefore suggest to the members of this committee that the way in which a body is disposed of is most germane to the whole bill and to the clause which we are discussing at the moment. That being so, should the chairman rule that the amendment is in order I should like to conclude my remarks on the merits of the clause.

Mr. Fulton: One other point; if the suggestion in the amendment, if I understood it correctly, is that the federal government should set up a central place of execution, that, it seems to me, would impose a charge upon the revenues and would have to be preceded by a resolution.

The Chairman: Yes. First, I must point out to the minister that if a substantive amendment is moved I would have to deal with it then, but I do not think the amendment as it is at present would involve any expenditure.

I wish to point out first that this problem was raised by Mr. Speaker on May 23, as can be seen by referring to page 5233 of Hansard, where Mr. Speaker said:

> The hon. member may continue in this regard with the permission of the house, but it seems to me that the question of the abolition of capital punishment in certain types of murder is quite a different subject from the method of carrying out such a sentence. I am unable to find any reference in the bill itself to this subject, and I feel that by allowing the hon. member to continue I would be allowing two debates in one.

That was the first time the question was raised. I may say that I myself, either during second reading of the bill or in committee, have allowed some references to be made when I considered those references were deploring the fact that section 642 of the Criminal Code was not being amended at the same time as are other sections of the code. Of course, I agree with the hon. member for Essex East that if the committee is unanimous and willing to dispense with the rules, that can be done—

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

The Chairman: —because the committee is master of its own rules; but as long as they are not amended they must be applied.

First of all, I refer hon. members to May's Parliamentary Practice, sixteenth edition, at page 421, where we find these words which I think are very clear:

> Stated generally, no matter ought to be raised in debate on a question which would be irrelevant, if moved as an amendment, and an amendment cannot be used for importing arguments which would be irrelevant to the main question.

I may indicate that Mr. Speaker ruled that discussion of the method of capital punishment was not relevant to the main question. I may also refer hon. members to citation 203 of Beauchesne at page 171, to which the minister referred before. I do not think I need to quote anything from Beauchesne.

The purpose of clause 1 of the bill is to divide murder into two kinds, namely capital and non-capital murder. The purpose of clause 2, to which the amendment is proposed, is to set out the punishment for capital murder and non-capital murder. I think there is an essential distinction between punishment and the method of carrying out punishment, although there is some connection between the two. That is obvious, but the distinction must be made and established. It is obvious to me that these are two different problems because section 642 of the Criminal Code, which deals with the method of punishment, is not amended by the amending bill now under consideration. Therefore, it seems to me quite clear that under these circumstances and for the reasons I have given the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on clause 2. I was much impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond who had something to say concerning the use of the simple word "appears" in the clause as proposed. I realize it is a word that is very common in our courts. The word "appears" is more or less similar to or has the same significance as "finding". I would agree, if the section dealt with the problem which pertained to a finding only which does not cover the appearance of a person.

I should like to make this distinction for the benefit of the minister and state that possibly he should rephrase it to make sure that the judge and jury, who are the court in this case and who would have to make this finding of fact, would have the knowledge that they did find this after hearing the evidence. If this fact is not reasonably established they can refer to the appearance of the accused because there is a difference between appearing to a court if the theft is over $100, which is determined without any relationship whatsoever to the appearance of the person accused of that theft.

I feel in a sense it is a different proposition to place in a statute "if it appears to the court that the person was under 18 when he committed the offence", which on many occasions would have to be determined by the physical appearance of the accused, which is not necessary if the theft is over $100. For that reason I think the statute could be made clearer. I do not say that no judge or no jury could construe the words "appears to the court" in the sense that the minister has indicated they oftentimes are construed. But it seems to me that certainly some effort should be made to make that distinction clearer in this case so that no one would make an argument based solely on the fact that if the person appears to be under 18, no matter whether the crown proves that he is 18.

What would be the interpretation of a jury if the man has a certificate, or the crown produces a birth certificate indicating that he is over 18 when he looks like a 14-year-old? Surely the lawyer is entitled to say that this boy appears, and appeared at the time of the commission of the offence, to be under 18. Why should you defeat that exemption by simply saying that he is 18? If a person is in fact proven to be 18 he can be sentenced to capital punishment and if he appears to be under 18 he should be exempt. I think this is most pertinent under the circumstances and I believe the minister should pay some attention to the remarks made by the two hon. members and not create a section wherein proof by the crown of the actual fact is excluded.

I should also like to make certain remarks concerning an accused whose mental capacity can reasonably be established to the satisfaction of the jury to be that of a person under the age of 18. It seems to me that guilt does not attach to a birth certificate—the age of the accused—as much as it attaches to the capacity of the person who committed the crime. If we are going to exempt people under 18 from punishment by death, I feel that the minister should be able to find a way to exempt those people as to whom it has been reasonably established that their mental age is that of a person under the age of 18. In my view that is a better criterion of the guilt of the person who committed the crime of murder than a birth certificate is. A person with a birth certificate indicating an age of 17 might have the mental capacity of a person of 25 but he would be exempt from capital punishment whereas an accused 22 years old might have the mental capacity of a person of 12 or 14 but could not receive the exemption granted to the other accused. Therefore I think it is only fair that the minister should see fit to add after the provision respecting proof of age the words "or has the mental capacity of a person less than 18 years".

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the hon. member has introduced an entirely new concept in that he wants the law to cover the mental age of the accused which, of course, may well be related to the question of his sanity or his mental competence. What we have in mind here is purely the physical age as it is made to appear to the court, and for the reasons I have summarized adequately, I believe, in reply to the hon. member for Essex East we are convinced after reflection that the words used with reference to the age appearing to the court are the proper words to use because we realize the possibility that there may not be a birth certificate. If there is a birth certificate, that is the best evidence of what the age is and it will then follow that his age is as established by the birth certificate, but since that may not be available the other evidence may become relevant and may be required and it is such evidence that makes it appear to the court what the age is.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, my remarks at this time have to do with subsection 4 of the new section 206, which reads in part as follows:

> ...the sentence of imprisonment for life prescribed by this section is a minimum punishment.

According to my recollection and to the best of my knowledge there is nothing in the present code that prescribes imprisonment for life as a minimum punishment. The presiding judge has discretion whether to impose imprisonment for life or for a lesser term. I may not be correct in that assumption but I think I am. Would the minister advise us if he has considered whether this minimum punishment will be subject to revision either by the governor in council or by the national parole board?

Mr. Fulton: I did not quite hear the last part of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Roberge: Will it be possible for the minimum sentence of life imprisonment under that section to be revised by the national parole board or by the governor in council as the case may be?

Mr. Fulton: The question the hon. member has asked seems to me to relate to the general question of the effect of a sentence of life imprisonment for murder or the commutation of a sentence of death to life imprisonment. The regulations of the parole board now provide that in the case of a sentence of life imprisonment there shall ordinarily be no parole before seven years have been served. Similarly, they provide that when a sentence of death is commuted to life imprisonment there shall ordinarily be no parole until ten years have actually been served. I want to make it clear that there are minimum periods. It does not mean there will be parole at the end of seven or ten years respectively.

Mr. Roberge: Are these periods of seven years and ten years provided in the parole board act or the regulations?

Mr. Fulton: At the moment they are in the regulations which are approved by the governor in council. As I was saying, this does not mean that parole is automatic at the end of seven or ten years respectively. Parliament has entrusted to the parole board, however, the determination of whether or when a man is qualified and fit to be paroled. The other point that it is important to bear in mind in this discussion is that when a man is paroled who has been serving a sentence of life imprisonment, whether imposed by the court or as the result of commutation of the death sentence, that is his sentence. His sentence is life and if he is paroled he is under the supervision of the parole board for the balance of the sentence.

Therefore the impression should not be allowed to go abroad that when paroled, perhaps after the end of seven or ten years only, these persons are not subject to supervision, that they are completely free and that they would be liable therefore to go off, and fall into bad habits again and revert to those circumstances which led to their first crime. They are under the supervision of the parole board. There has to be a nice balance in these cases because, since the object of parole as well as the object of other portions of our reform program is to rehabilitate, one must be careful not to make the conditions of parole or supervision so obvious that in effect they prevent that person from ever becoming truly rehabilitated in society.

The parole board has this in mind and, of course, as a man makes progress and it becomes more and more obvious he is truly rehabilitated and re-established in society, then by progressive stages the degree of supervision is relaxed. The essential point is that there is authority in the Parole Act to supervise for the balance of the term, and here the term is life imprisonment. Again, as I have said, it should not be taken that because the regulations prescribe a minimum of seven or 10 years respectively, parole would be automatic at the end of this period. The record establishes that the average period served is appreciably longer than either of these two periods provided by the regulations before a man subject to life imprisonment is out on parole.

Mr. Drysdale: Can the minister clarify whether or not it is possible for a person sentenced to life imprisonment to be under parole for the rest of his natural life?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, this is a fact. Parliament in enacting the Parole Act two years ago approved of the principle that an independent parole board should determine whether and if or when a man is ready to be paroled.

Mr. Roberge: I agree completely with the minister in so far as the parole board is concerned. The parole board has the power to consider life termers and it may release them under certain conditions. However, the minister spoke of ordinary life termers. The point with which I am concerned here is that the bill before us specifies that imprisonment for life is to be a minimum punishment. Is there a difference between a minimum punishment of imprisonment for life and an ordinary term of imprisonment for life?

Mr. Fulton: The purpose of the provision in paragraph 4 relates to part XX of the Criminal Code. This is to ensure that a sentence of this kind, life imprisonment, cannot be changed to probation or a suspended sentence, and the sentence actually has to be served.

Mr. Roberge: If I understand correctly, then, the sentence has to be served fully and the parole board may not intervene?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, this provision relates only to part XX of the code. Its application is only with respect to the provisions of part XX. A sentence of life imprisonment cannot be suspended, changed to probation or changed to a term of years. It is a sentence of life imprisonment but the Parole Act provides that anyone serving a term of imprisonment, and this is a term of imprisonment, may be released from the institution and serve the balance of his term outside the institution on the authority of the parole board.

Mr. Drysdale: Is there any conflict with section 656 of the code, which provides for the commutation of a sentence? The section reads:

> The governor in council may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, or for any term of years not less than two years, or to imprisonment in a prison other than a penitentiary for a period of less than two years.

Does the commutation provision override the life imprisonment provision?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, because the only case in which the governor in council can commute is a sentence of death. This is a case where there has not been a sentence of life imprisonment imposed, but the sentence of the court is a sentence of death. Then, if the governor in council commutes it he may, as my hon. friend points out, commute it to any one of a number of different sentences. The universal practice, however, so far as I know is to commute it to a term of life imprisonment.

Certainly, now that we have a parole board it would always be the case that it would be made life imprisonment because then the parole board determines, in accordance with well worked out principles, where and when he is eligible for release from the institution so that he may serve the balance of his term outside under supervision.

Mr. Roberge: I have here the Parole Act of 1958, section 6, subsection (1), of which reads as follows:

> The board shall at the times prescribed by the regulations
> (a) review the case of every inmate serving a sentence of imprisonment of two years or more, whether or not an application has been made by or on behalf of the inmate,—

Now, if I am not mistaken, when this act was before this parliament, there was no such minimum sentence as imprisonment for life. Therefore this type of sentence we are now considering was not contemplated when section 6 of the Parole Act was enacted. It is for this reason I asked the minister the last question, and I am still not clear about his answer. It is true that the clause before us refers to part XX of the code in so far as it relates to imprisonment and deals with where the imprisonment will be carried out, either in a penitentiary or a common prison or part in one and part in the other. Right now, I do not see anything in sections 633, 634 or 635 of the code, apart from probation, that did exist before we enacted the Parole

Act. Right now, if a man is on probation under the Parole Act, it is, as a matter of fact, a ticket of leave and he is supervised by social workers.

May I call it 10.30, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: On Saturday the house leader announced a long list of items of legislation but said nothing about the estimates for the rest of the week. I wonder if we might get some indication of what we will take up tomorrow and Wednesday, and also the departments which we will consider during the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: The intention is to carry on with legislation tomorrow, commencing with Bill No. C-92 on which fair progress has been made. The Minister of Justice has to leave sometime in the afternoon and perhaps before his departure the house would be able to complete consideration of Bill No. C-92. However, if we have not reached the other bill, No. C-97, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and Criminal Code, and the resolution dealing with the Exchequer Court Act, we will have to postpone those; but retaining the same order that I announced on Saturday, the fourth item will be Bill No. C-77 concerning the rehabilitation of agricultural lands, etc., the fifth item will be Bill No. C-93, an act to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act, and as a sixth item we will have the bill which received first reading today, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Chevrier: May I at this point indicate to the house leader that the Minister of Transport will be engaged in the committee on the Canada Shipping Act tomorrow afternoon, where he was detained for the greater part of today. I do not know how he is going to be in that committee and deal with the Freight Rates Reduction Act as well.

Mr. Churchill: We may not reach the Freight Rates Reduction Act until the evening, after the supper hour.

The progress made tomorrow will determine what we do on Wednesday. I should like to hold open whether or not we continue with legislation. On Thursday, Friday and Saturday we will be dealing with estimates in this order, mines and technical surveys, Secretary of State, fisheries and public works.

At 10.35 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 30, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONTINUATION OF SUBVENTION

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement concerning the coal mining industry of Cape Breton. Hon. members will recall that during the past year arrangements were made between the governments of Nova Scotia and Canada on the one hand, and the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation on the other, which successfully averted the closing of three Nova Scotia coal mines last winter. At that time it was agreed that to offset losses incurred by the corporation in maintaining these mines in operation, a special subvention of $1 per ton would be paid on coal shipped by the corporation to non-subvention areas from their mines in Nova Scotia between April 1, 1960 and May 31, 1961. The province participated in the cost of this subvention.

During the past year the markets for coal here and everywhere in the world have continued to shrink, and the annual productive capacity of the corporation's various mines is now substantially greater than the possible level of annual sales. In these circumstances, if the special subvention should be allowed to terminate on May 31 and no alternative assistance be provided, the corporation would be obliged to proceed with the scheduled closures this season and many coal miners in the Cape Breton area would be laid off in the space of less than three months.

The government has discussed this difficult situation further with the corporation, the labour union and the government of Nova Scotia in an endeavour to determine the extent of the problem and the steps that might be taken at this time to alleviate it. I am now able to announce that the subvention of $1 per ton, of which 80 cents will be provided by the federal government and 20 cents by the government of Nova Scotia, up to a total sum of $300,000 per annum, will be continued for the period from June 1, 1961 to August 1, 1962, on the express understanding that the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation will provide satisfactory assurance to the governments that this assistance will be used to good advantage in maintaining as much employment as possible in the mines. Because of the shrinkage of markets the corporation will be obliged to reduce the number of miners on its payroll.

Authority for this continuing subvention is contained in order in council P.C. 1961/762 of May 25, 1961, and the required funds will be provided in the vote of the dominion coal board.

The government of Canada recognizes that subventions do not constitute a complete long term solution to the problem of employment in the Cape Breton area, and that other kinds of measures are also involved. Indeed, nationwide programs such as the vocational training assistance plan and the tax incentive arrangements included in the recent supplementary budget are already available for use in such areas.

The government considered, however, that as miners are displaced from employment with the corporation this season, other special steps should be taken at this time to assist in the provision of alternative employment. Parliament will therefore be asked to provide an amount of $1.5 million which will be set aside for approved projects to provide alternative employment this year in the Cape Breton area. Such projects will be considered on their individual merits, taking into account the degree of participation by the province in each case.

These two measures are being introduced to deal with the specific and immediate situation in the coal mining areas. The government of Canada is continuing to study the long term problems involved and the recommendations on the subject by the royal commission on coal, and further announcements will be made from time to time.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every hon. member as well as the people of the areas concerned will welcome the announcement made this morning by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. However, as the minister indicated, this is an alternative assistance to prevent the immediate closure of the mines involved, and I am sure it will be regarded as just another one of this government's crisis decisions. The house and the country know very well that as early as 1958, at the time of the first major post-war shut-down, this government was warned of the dangers inherent in the situation. At that time we were ridiculed by the government, just as we are at this very moment by some of the members concerned.

Continuation of Coal Subvention

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I should remind the hon. member for Gloucester that such a statement is made for the information of the house. It is a statement of a factual character on policy that has been adopted, and it is made by leave of the house for its information rather than having it made elsewhere. It is not made to initiate a debate. The practice of comment by a spokesman for each party has been accepted by the house and is well established, but such comment is not to be in the form of debate. As the hon. member was expressing opinions which are quite controversial, I thought I should warn him that it is not in accordance with our practice to debate the statement at this time. There will be ample opportunity to do so. Really all that is permitted is preliminary comment with a reservation of approval if that is the case.

Mr. Robichaud: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that as a member of the opposition I had the right to say that this alternative measure announced by the minister this morning will not meet the problems of the coal miners. It will only mean further delay. As we have suggested before in the house, what is really needed is a comprehensive program of scientific and industrial research to find additional uses for coal in order to help to maintain employment. This is certainly not included in the announcement made by the minister this morning.

We are also disappointed that in the announcement the minister did not take care of the situation in the Springhill area, where a number of miners have been out of work since 1958, notwithstanding the representations that have been made to the government in recent weeks by the town council of Springhill.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the measure announced by the minister will only provide temporary relief, and it does not meet the problems of the coal miners of Cape Breton.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made this morning is in large part a continuation of the situation that has existed for some time involving the payment of a subvention of $1 per ton. I was not able to understand clearly from the minister's statement whether the three coal mines scheduled to be shut down this summer will in fact be shut down or whether operations will be continued but with a very substantial reduction in the number of miners employed. I should like to have that point clarified.

As far as we are concerned, the government has not taken adequate action in this area, particularly because it is an area of very high unemployment where not long ago 18 per cent of the labour force were out of work. I think what is required here is a guaranteed income to the miners so that if they are displaced from their jobs they will have a substantial income to maintain themselves and their families. The $1.5 million for approved employment projects will be of great benefit, but I suggest that what is required is a comprehensive program to deal with the general unemployment situation in this area, and that by and large the announcement represents merely a continuation of the existing conditions.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Can the minister assure the house that, as a result of the announcement he made this morning, the three mines in Cape Breton intended to be closed early this summer will now be kept open and the miners will be kept employed until August 1, 1962?

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of my hon. friend from Gloucester, whom I am glad to see back in his chair, I must say I have nothing to do with the decision as to whether such or such a mine will be closed down. The Dominion Coal Corporation is a private industry, and it is therefore the responsibility of its management to decide which mines will be closed.

I announced this morning that we were prepared to pay a dollar a ton for coal shipped outside the subvention area, with a contribution of 20 per cent on the part of the provincial government, up to a maximum of $300,000, but my authority does not go beyond that. It rests with the company to decide which of its mines is to be closed, and to act accordingly.

(Text):

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether he can assure the house that any of these three mines will be kept open? The minister says he cannot assure the house that three will be kept open. Can he assure the house that any of these three mines will be kept open?

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, I think my reply was clear enough, and I note that the hon. member used his earphone to listen to the translation. Again I repeat—

(Text):

It is a matter for the company to decide. It is a managerial decision for the company.

DRUGS

PROVISION FOR CONTROL OF DISTRIBUTION AND SALE OF NARCOTICS

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-100, to provide for the control of narcotic drugs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister give an explanation?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, this bill relating to the control of narcotics is in part based upon a measure which was intended to implement substantially the recommendations of the special committee of the Senate which investigated the drug traffic in Canada in 1955. That bill, introduced in the Senate in 1957, was given first reading in this house before parliament was dissolved.

The present measure, which to a very great extent reflects the subject matter and content of that bill has, however, been substantially revised in the light of further experience. In addition to the provisions which relate to the legal distribution of drugs, the establishment of penalties and effective sanctions for illicit traffic in drugs, the measure also contains a new and most important feature involving the treatment of drug addiction. The Minister of Justice on January 24 last explained to this house the federal proposals in this regard which are now set forth in the measure before us for consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could inform the house when the report of the commission inquiring into the state of the automobile industry which was, I believe, submitted to the Prime Minister some weeks ago, will be tabled?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have never before heard such a reaction to a simple question. I can only say, "in due course".

Mr. Pearson: What was the answer?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In due course.

Mr. Hellyer: In the sweet bye and bye.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS—REPRESENTATIONS BY AUTOMOBILE WORKERS UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position now to answer my question of Saturday last, when I asked if he would not reconsider his decision and that of the government not to see representatives of the united automobile workers who wish to make representations with respect to the agricultural implement industry.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no further consideration has been given to that matter but I would feel that the representatives of the union in question might very profitably make their representations to the committee on agriculture, which I believe is dealing with the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that the united automobile workers and the steel workers wish to make such representations with regard to certain phases of this situation, will the government not consider meeting the representatives of the united automobile workers in order to hear the further representations they wish to make in respect of matters not now being covered by the inquiry of the parliamentary committee into the farm implement industry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I really do not know what these further representations might be. The hon. member has not chosen to acquaint me with what they might be, although he apparently is aware of them. I am sure that the committee on agriculture will be only too willing to expand its field of inquiry in order to meet the needs of this very representative labour group.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can only conclude, by way of a supplementary question, that the Prime Minister does not intend to see these workers.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Essex East has not been very successful prophetically in the past two weeks.

Mr. Argue: Is the Prime Minister aware that the united automobile workers wished to present a brief that deals in part with the farm income picture, and that they were informed that the agriculture committee was not dealing with the farm income situation but rather with farm implements and therefore their brief would be out of order?

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE TO POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and inquire if the minister is in a position to give the house any information about a report in the press this morning to the effect that a Polish-Canadian wheat agreement is under negotiation at the present time.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Assiniboia is slowly becoming aware that the government is endeavouring to sell some grain. All I can do at this time is confirm the newspaper story that negotiations are now in progress.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether the delegation is going to Winnipeg within the next few days?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that negotiations are in progress. If anything does develop the hon. member will be informed in due course.

GRAIN—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE SALE TO SPAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address another question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is he aware of the news report published in La Presse yesterday, to the effect that Spain is at present going through a severe drought which is reported to threaten her crops? Could the Minister of Agriculture inform the house whether he is considering the possibility of selling grain to that country?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, during the past year the Canadian wheat board has sent 11 missions abroad covering some 37 or 38 countries. Every week I get a report on the market and the agricultural situation in each of the countries of the world, and on that basis we try to figure where our next export drive will be. We are certainly on the ball all the time in this regard.

LIVESTOCK

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF END OF CAMPAIGN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture based upon a Canadian Department of Agriculture release, undoubtedly prepared by the minister's new public information officer, which reads in part as follows:

Subject: Bovine t.b.

Ottawa, May 30, 1961—Canada's 38-year campaign against bovine tuberculosis will end Saturday when agriculture minister Alvin Hamilton, using a gold plated syringe, injects a black and white milk cow on a small farm in the Peace river district of Alberta.

My question, Mr. Speaker, is this. What is the cost of gold plating a syringe, and has the Minister of Agriculture consulted the Minister of Finance in connection with this gold plated syringe?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know the whole country will be pleased and gratified that after nearly 40 years the long struggle of the scientists in the health of animals division of the Department of Agriculture has succeeded in virtually eliminating tuberculosis among Canadian cattle. To mark this very auspicious occasion I am being permitted to use a gold plated syringe to inoculate the last cow to receive injection. As I tenderly plunge the syringe into that cow I shall think of the hon. member for Essex East and reflect upon the fact that the cost of that syringe certainly would be less than the cost of a gold plated cow bell.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister give us the assurance that he will not shoot the bull?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows from his long experience, a politician never has to shoot the bull. It is already there.

THE CENSUS

PENALTY FOR REFUSAL TO ANSWER QUESTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) asked the following question:

Is it an offence for a person to refuse to answer certain of the questions contained in the census forms and, if so, what would be the penalty for such a refusal?

In answer I will quote to him section 35 of chapter 257 of the Statistics Act, which deals with offences and penalties connected with the taking of the census. It reads as follows:

35. Every person who, without lawful excuse,
(a) refuses or neglects to answer, or wilfully answers falsely, any question requisite for obtaining any information sought in respect of the objects of this act or any regulation, or pertinent thereto, that has been asked of him by any person employed in the execution of any duty under this act or any regulation; or

(b) refuses or neglects to furnish any information or to fill in to the best of his knowledge and belief any schedule or form that he has been required to fill in, and to return the same when and as required of him under this act or any regulation, or wilfully gives false information or practises any other deception thereunder; is, for every such refusal or neglect, or false answer or deception, guilty of an offence and is liable, upon summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him whether he has anything to report on the dispute between the crown corporation Trans-Canada Air Lines and the Canadian air lines flight attendants association?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any report on what has transpired up to this moment except what I have read in the newspaper this morning.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister given any consideration to the question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Essex East concerning the action of the crown corporation, and as to whether it was in violation of section 4 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act?

Mr. Starr: We have replied to the telegram which we received yesterday. We sent a telegram to Mr. Robert R. Smeal, business manager of the Canadian air lines flight attendants association at Vancouver acknowledging receipt of his telegram and informing him that I had asked T.C.A. for a statement of its position in the matter. I pointed out that he had not provided a copy of the instructions to which he objects and that the department was thus not in a position to comment, but that the prohibitions in section 4 of the industrial relations act appear to relate primarily to unfair labour practices directed against trade union membership or activity.

We also dispatched a telegram to Mr. G. E. Bolton, director of personnel for Trans-Canada Air Lines, informing him that we had received this telegram, which we quoted. We asked him whether he would let us have a copy of the instructions referred to together with a statement of the company's position in the matter. To date we have not received a reply.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Would the minister not agree that a copy of the instructions was sent to his colleague the Minister of Transport, and that they could easily be made available to the Minister of Labour? In view of the importance of this question, will he not advise the head of the employees association at once?

Mr. Starr: I do not know how the hon. member for Essex East has this information—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am awake, that is why.

Mr. Starr: We have not got these instructions, and I am informed by my colleague that he has not got them either, so the hon. gentleman is wrong again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They were sent by Mr. Smeal.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION IN INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance based on a statement reported by the Globe and Mail to have been made in Halifax last night by Mr. S. L. Buckwold, president of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities, that the cost of borrowing money and mounting debts are causing municipal governments to shelve essential public works programs. Can the minister say whether the government proposes any action to correct this situation?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the news article in question nor the statement attributed to this gentleman, but I think it is by now a matter of knowledge on the part of hon. members that the various chartered banks of the country are reducing the prime rate of interest on loans as of June 1 to 5½ per cent. This will apply generally to bank loans with the exception of term loans and, I believe, loans to finance companies.

The government welcomes this decision on the part of the various chartered banks and expects that this reduction in the prime bank rate will have its effect on interest rates throughout the country.

Mr. Garland: While we are, of course, glad to see this reduction even though it is only one-quarter of one per cent, I wonder if the minister could say, in view of the reluctance of the Minister of Public Works to comment on this matter, when the N.H.A. interest rates may be reduced.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman has amused himself by his constant repetition of the same question at intervals, I think, of about every 48 hours throughout the entire session. He must be aware of the factors which govern interest rates in relation to loans under the National Housing Act. He has constantly mixed up interest rates of all kinds as if they were the same thing. Interest rates depend on the nature of the loan, the length of the loan and matters of that kind. I say the hon. member has been mixing these things up constantly in the questions he has asked.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—REPORTED RESIGNATION OF BOARD MEMBER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he would comment on a report that Mr. J. T. Bryden has submitted his resignation as a member of the board of governors of the Bank of Canada and as a member of the executive committee of the board.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Oh, yes; Mr. Bryden resigned from the executive committee of the board and from the board of the Bank of Canada a month or six weeks ago. He had taken on additional responsibilities in various fields, and on advice that he was carrying a very heavy load he asked that his resignation from the board of governors be accepted.

I may say that Mr. Bryden served a term of three years on the board of directors of the Bank of Canada, of which he has been an active member, and I wrote him at the time his resignation was tendered to express my regret and the regret of the government that he had felt it necessary to retire by reason of the very heavy burdens he was carrying. Last week he was elected president of the Canadian life insurance officers association.

Mr. Pearson: That is not the only reason.

Mr. Chevrier: Were regrets expressed from the other side?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I heard a comment in an undertone from the Leader of the Opposition who said, I think, "That is not the reason". Mr. Speaker, if I correctly heard the hon. gentleman his statement is untrue. The statement I made gives the reason and the entire reason for his resignation.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a question of privilege. I am the one who interrupted the minister, and I said "Were regrets expressed from the other side in the same manner as the minister expressed them"?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I heard the hon. member for Laurier make his irrelevant comment and I also heard, I am quite certain, the comment by the Leader of the Opposition on which I have made, I think, a suitable observation.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister if he will give the house an assurance that the reason he has indicated for this resignation is the only reason given?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I do give that assurance, and I repel the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition which, I think, is unworthy of any hon. member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BANK OF CANADA—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the distinguished member for York North if he is now in a position to advise the house when the banking and commerce committee will meet to hear a report from the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. C. A. Cathers (York North): As usual the hon. member for Essex East is out of order. Your Honour ruled this question out of order when he asked it in the first place and, as usual, the hon. member is out of order in asking me the same question today. I do not want to contribute to wasting the time of this house by being a party to this—

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the last time the question was asked the hon. member for York North took it as notice.

Mr. Cathers: In the first place, the hon. member for Essex East was out of order in asking that question. If Your Honour will check the question you will find there was no urgency about it, and no issue of national importance involved.

Mr. Hellyer: Half a million Canadians think it is important.

Mr. Speaker: I am not aware that such a question has been ruled out of order. I know such questions have been asked of chairmen of committees as questions relating to the business of the house. I know they have been asked; whether or not it is in accordance with our practice I should not like to declare off the cuff. However, I am not prepared to say that the question is out of order. Both hon. members might give some thought to it and I will deal with it if the question is asked again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I direct a supplementary question to the distinguished member for York North, chairman of the banking and commerce committee. In view of the fact that he is obviously not in a position now to reply to my question, will he consult with the Minister of Finance and give me an answer tomorrow?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED SIGHTING OF UNIDENTIFIED SUBMARINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo asked for information regarding the reported sighting of a submarine off the coast of Newfoundland.

The R.C.M.P. did receive information from a local fisherman in the Burgeo area that he had sighted a submarine south of Burgeo at 9.30 a.m. local time on May 24. The Royal Canadian Navy was notified and started an investigation of the report. It might be added that such reports are frequently received. We are very glad to get them, and steps are taken in each case to verify the accuracy of the information given. In nearly all cases the reported sightings are outside the territorial waters of Canada.

I should like to refer the hon. member to a similar question and the answer given by my predecessor on June 18, 1959, as reported at page 4863 of Hansard of that date. The effect of that answer is that it is not considered to be in the public interest to give any verification as to whether there actually was a submarine, or what kind it was, and so on.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PUGWASH CONFERENCES—REPORT BY U.S. SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I apologize for giving him such short notice.

My question arises from a press dispatch to the effect that the United States Senate internal security subcommittee has been investigating the series of international scientific conferences which Mr. Cyrus Eaton has held at his home in Pugwash, Nova Scotia, over the years, and has published a report condemning them as undermining United States security. I wonder whether the minister would care to comment on the propriety of a foreign government investigating meetings of distinguished Canadian and international scientists which have taken place on Canadian soil.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the minister answers the question I should indicate that I question its propriety. It seems to me to relate to a matter which is not an administrative responsibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

LAOS—REPORTED DIFFERENCES BETWEEN CO-CHAIRMEN OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs care to comment on the differences that have appeared to develop between the co-chairmen of the conference at Geneva in respect of the operation of the cease fire in Laos and the work of the international commission there?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, difficulties have arisen at the Geneva conference on Laos over questions related to the effectiveness of the cease fire in that country.

The position of the Canadian government in this matter is clear. We are doing our utmost to ensure that the commission has both the authority and the means to carry out its task of supervision and control. We are in favour of the commission investigating any serious violation or threat of violation of the cease fire.

To do this the commission must have two things. First, it must have the co-operation of the parties in Laos. Recent reports indicate agreement by the parties there to the establishment of a joint military committee to work with the international commission. We hope this will help to remove some of the difficulties which have existed so far. Second, the commission must have helicopters, airplanes and other physical facilities. It reported its logistical requirements to the co-chairmen on May 22. We hope that the earliest possible agreement will be reached among the governments principally concerned on supplying at least the most urgent of these requirements.

I might add that newspaper speculation that the Geneva conference is on the verge of collapse is in my view not warranted by any major change in the situation either in Laos or at Geneva. There has been some difference of opinion as to what topic would be discussed next, and I understand that the meeting called for yesterday did not take place. It may be that there will be an adjournment until after President Kennedy and Premier Khrushchev have met at the end of this week, but there is no suggestion that the conference will break up. As a matter of fact, I hope to be back there myself late next week.

Mr. Pearson: Has the Canadian government made any offer of air transportation, including helicopters, for the use of this commission of which Canada is a member?

Mr. Green: At the present time the position is that owing to our initiative at the conference the co-chairmen sent a wire to the chairman of the international commission asking him to outline the requirements in the way of equipment that were needed by the commission. The reply to that wire was received a few days ago, but the co-chairmen have not yet acted on the wire. We are making representations in the meantime, and Canada will certainly be prepared to do her part. We think it is essential that the commission should have adequate equipment.

CUBA—REPORTED OFFER OF CANADA TO ACT AS REFEREE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister inform the house whether the government has recently offered its good offices as a mediator with regard to some of the problems existing between Cuba and the United States?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am just wondering where the hon. member has been for the last two or three weeks.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONCTON—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a further question to the Minister of Transport concerning C.N.R. employment in the Moncton shops. Notwithstanding my question of May 25 and the minister's reply of May 26 concerning the curtailment of repairs to heavy passenger car equipment at Moncton, I am now advised that 14 employees have already received lay-off notices effective Friday, June 2. As a result of this unpopular management decision I have received telegrams of protest from the mayors of Moncton and Shediac and, without any exaggeration, hundreds of messages from C.N.R. employees.

[Mr. Green.]

Tomorrow seven union officials from the Moncton area will be visiting Ottawa to meet members of parliament to protest these lay-offs, which have created great public resentment in New Brunswick. In view of this proposed visit tomorrow, I wonder whether the minister could now instruct the Canadian National Railways management to postpone these lay-offs in order that the directors of the company, and other individuals interested in the matter, might review this policy decision.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member raised this question on May 25 I immediately contacted the management of the Canadian National Railways and was supplied with a very complete answer in respect of the circumstances. I read that answer in the house on May 26. I can assure the hon. member, however, that management, before taking such a decision, of course investigates all the avenues and possibilities of keeping these jobs open for the employees.

As the hon. member and other hon. members of this house know, this is a matter for management, and not a matter for the Minister of Transport in respect of which he instructs management. I will certainly bring these new representations to the attention of management. However, in the meantime I should remind the hon. gentleman that a committee of employees is meeting with the management of the C.N.R. to discuss the present situation, in an attempt to find some way of alleviating the very unfortunate effect of these lay-offs.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister, in view of matters such as this, when the C.N.R. management is going to appear before the House of Commons sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should raise that matter with the committee.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, the committee has not met as yet. I understand the minister has given several undertakings to announce when the C.N.R. management will be available, and he is the liaison which exists between the management of the C.N.R. and the committee, not the committee itself.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, it is up to the committee to decide when it is going to hold its meetings.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Middlesex West.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member defer his supplementary question? The hon. member for Middlesex West has been trying to ask a question for some time.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport. Has it not been the practice in the past for the minister to give some indication to the house in respect of when this committee is likely to meet?

Mr. Fisher: Absolutely.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, this is strictly a matter for committee decision. The Minister of Transport acts as liaison with the presidents of Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines. I can assure hon. members that as soon as that committee meets, both presidents will be available.

Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister find out from the presidents when they will be available, and indicate to the house when the committee is likely to meet?

AGRICULTURE

SOYBEANS—INQUIRY AS TO SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that farmers in southwestern Ontario are now planting both corn and soybeans, and in some cases it may be necessary for them to reach a decision as to which they should plant, could the minister expedite as much as possible the announcement of government policy concerning a support price for soybeans in respect of the 1961 crop?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I asked that question two weeks ago.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that I asked that question two weeks ago, could the minister now indicate when there will be a reply, and also tell us when the government will be in a position to fix a price in respect of Ontario grown wheat?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Time is going by.

OATS—WHEAT BOARD PRICES FOR FUTURE DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I regret not to have given him notice of it. However, if he cannot answer it today, he may do so later.

Since May 23, 1961, the Canadian wheat board has been refusing to sell oats to be delivered in July. It offers some to be delivered in October only, at 80½ cents a bushel, as against an initial price of 60 cents.

Since there are 15 million bushels of oats in the Fort William and rural elevators, in addition to 50 million in the hands of western farmers, why does the Canadian wheat board not authorize delivery of part of that oats in July?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seems to have several questions all of which might properly go on the order paper, although if there has been a recent change of policy perhaps the minister would like to reply.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture is frequently having to combat rumours from various sources about the actions of the Canadian wheat board. Usually these rumours are based on the hopes and wishes of people who are not friends of the producers of western Canada. I will be glad to take the hon. member's question as notice, get the facts and put him straight again.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I must inform the minister that we sympathize with western farmers and, if we ask this question, it is in order to allow—

Inquiries of the Ministry

PULPWOOD—REGULATION OF TRADE BY QUEBEC CO-OPERATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question, notice of which I have sent him. It relates to the very recent action under the federal agricultural marketing act giving the right to Quebec forest products marketing co-operatives to regulate interprovincial and extraterritorial trade in pulpwood. I should like to ask the minister what relationship these new powers of the co-operatives given by his department have to any policy of improving the price to producers of farm cut pulpwood in eastern Canada.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the past two or three years a number of producer marketing boards have been established in the province of Quebec under the Quebec agricultural marketing act with respect to the marketing of pulpwood. In so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, I understand that pulpwood is not included as an agricultural product in its farm products marketing act.

The authority granted by the federal government under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act in the three orders in council referred to in the question which the hon. member sent me are among a total of 12 such orders provided to allow provincial marketing boards in the province of Quebec to regulate and control the marketing of pulpwood in interprovincial and export trade in a manner similar to the control they have within the province. As with other provincial marketing boards throughout Canada, it is expected that such extension of powers in interprovincial and export trade will enable these boards to exercise better control of their commodity in the general interests of the producers.

Mr. Fisher: Could I ask the minister whether this trend has any relationship to the original idea of providing a floor price for pulpwood, that was advanced some time ago by certain members of the government?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): One of the ways in which producers can increase their income is by organizing themselves into producer boards on a democratic basis. This gives them the right to ask the provincial government and, so far as interprovincial trade is concerned, the federal government to give them the power to set their prices, and in this way they would in effect set their own floors.

PUBLIC WORKS

MONTREAL—USE OF ENGLISH LANGUAGE BY DEPARTMENTAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodrigue Bourdages (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works.

Could the minister indicate to the house whether the English language is imposed as the official language of communication between employees of his department at the Delorimier street office in Montreal, and whether instructions to that effect have been issued by the new head of that office, Mr. G. R. Aubut, as reported in a story published in La Presse on May 25?

(Text):

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I did read the article, and can say there is no foundation at all to the report that Mr. Aubut, a distinguished French Canadian, now head of the Montreal office of the Department of Public Works, is converting that office to the use of the English language. Such a suggestion is preposterous. In fact there is no change at all in the policies and practices now being followed from those policies that were followed when the former officers in charge of that office, Mr. Grenier and Mr. Gagnon, were there.

In this respect the department follows a very strict policy of providing French answers to letters received in French. There is no difficulty involved in this regard, Mr. Speaker, when one considers that of the 74 employees in the Montreal office, 70 are French Canadian, and very good employees. There is no ban nor even any restrictions on communications in French within the office, written, oral or otherwise. French is often used by headquarters officials in communications to the district, and a number of the senior officers of the department at headquarters in Ottawa are in fact French speaking. These include the departmental secretary, the chief engineer, harbours and rivers branch, and the executive assistant to the deputy minister, as well as my own parliamentary secretary.

The report concerning a lecture by an English speaking official of the dominion fire commissioners' branch was correct in some respects, but sufficiently incomplete as to give an entirely wrong impression. A specialist on fire prevention in government buildings did go to Montreal to speak to representatives of all government departments there, including the fire wardens of all government buildings in the area. The office of the dominion fire commissioner does not have a large staff, but its French speaking personnel includes an engineer who is completely bilingual. Unfortunately he was not available for this mission. Furthermore, the official who was sent was a specialist in this particular aspect of fire prevention. Before the lecture started the group were asked if they wanted the talk translated as it went along, and there was a unanimous response that they were satisfied to have the talk in English.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It sounds like the speech the minister made in Brockville.

Mr. Walker: I mentioned the words "pompous Paul" when I was in Brockville, and I should like to mention them again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is why you lost the election.

Mr. Walker: They were then told that if there was any point they did not understand they should raise their hands and a translation would be provided. I understand that at the end of the talk the meeting was unanimous in the feeling that the subject matter had been helpful and the lecture had been fully understood.

Mr. Denis: Is the minister aware that the Mr. Aubut is really Mr. Allbut? He does not want to be called Allbut at all; it is Aubut, and he does not speak French.

Mr. Walker: In reply to that I can say that the hon. member for St. Denis should be called "all but."

(Translation):

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order at this stage, after vainly trying to do so immediately after the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) completed his remarks.

I must inform the house that Mr. Aubut, the present director of federal buildings in Montreal, is a personal friend of mine, a resident of my constituency, and I would point out that he is perfectly bilingual.

UNITED NATIONS

ANGOLA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister give any report to the house on conditions in Angola? Has he any comment to make on the deteriorated situation in that country? Can the minister make some comment on the very large number of refugees who are leaving Angola for the Congo, and has Canada made any offer of food to prevent starvation there?

Mr. Speaker: The minister can say whether he regards this matter as his responsibility. The hon. member for Assiniboia seems to be roaming around the world in territory which is not under the jurisdiction of the government of Canada.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, first we have a Secretary of State for External Affairs. Then, Canada has a policy with regard to the very serious situations now existing in various parts of the world, and it is very much in order to ask the minister to comment on the serious situations in parts of the world which are a threat to world peace. No one has suggested that the minister for external affairs himself can remove those situations, but Canada has a policy and the minister has always been most co-operative in answering such questions.

Mr. Speaker: I leave it to the minister. As far as I am concerned the question is not one of the administrative responsibility of our Department of External Affairs. It would be in order to ask whether a policy had been developed and whether the government was implementing a policy with respect to some matter beyond the jurisdiction of our own government, but I think it would open the door to questions which were quite irrelevant to ask for opinions on questions which are not matters of administrative responsibility.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, if that ruling were rigidly enforced there would be no questions asked about external affairs. However, I should like to rephrase my question. Have any representations been made to the Canadian government about the refugee problem in the Congo? Has any request or any offer been made with respect to the provision of food to prevent starvation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are of course greatly concerned over the situation in Angola. Yesterday I received a delegation including representatives of the department of overseas missions of the Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian Baptist foreign mission board, and the executive of the general council and the board of overseas missions of the United Church of Canada.

They wished to inform me of their concern about the present situation in Angola, and I should like to say how deeply impressed I was by their presentation and by their dedication to the work which Canadian missionaries have carried on for about 80 years, and their distress at the violence in the territory. I informed them that Canada supported the recent resolution adopted by the general assembly which set up a committee to inquire into the situation in Angola because we considered that the resolution offerred a moderate and helpful approach to a complicated subject. I also told them I hoped that the committee would be able to make recommendations which would ease the situation.

The members of this committee have been named within the last few days. They are Finland, Dahomey, Sudan, Bolivia and Malaya. I informed the missionaries that we deeply sympathized with their concern over the future of Africans in Angola, and that we were as concerned about the observance of human rights and dignities in Angola as in other parts of the world. I also informed them of our willingness to consider ways in which we might usefully give help and advice in the interests and general welfare of the people of Angola.

We have had no request to help refugees as yet.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED OFFER OF EMPLOYMENT TO JEAN-LOUIS GAGNON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of National Revenue, but in his absence I should like to direct it to the acting minister.

(Translation):

Would the minister inform the house whether there is ground to the rumour that after he had resigned, Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon, formerly city editor at the newspaper La Presse, in Montreal, was offered a job with the C.B.C.?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the hon. member put his question on the order paper in the absence of the minister.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder) —Mr. Fulton—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 2—Punishment for capital murder.

Mr. Deschatelets: I understood the minister was preparing an amendment to clause 1. I wonder if he is ready to put his amendment now.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Fulton: Not at this precise moment. I thought perhaps we could carry on with one or two of the other clauses and then, at a convenient moment, revert to clause 1. I will have the amendment here shortly.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: On clause 2, Mr. Chairman, I must say that even if I voted against the principle of the bill on second reading, I am very receptive to any reasonable reform.

My mind is not set for or against the abolition of capital punishment. I am in favour of realistic reforms of the penal law concerning the death penalty and I sincerely believe that Bill C-92 is a mere compromise which after all, will lead to results which I do not want.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the greatest threat to our society comes first from organized crime. It is, therefore, against that threat that we must not show any weakness. We must see to it that we are efficiently protected against it through this bill.

In the course of my remarks when the bill was introduced, I said that we should break new grounds and liken the case of women to that of a young man under 18. Indeed if this bill provides that any young man under 18 must be exempted from capital murder, and consequently exempted from the death penalty, I fail to see why we should not, following the same line, do the same in the case of women.

I wish to state here very briefly that we cannot liken the case of women to that of the adult male as far as the death penalty is concerned.

Here is the basis of my argument. I have here the report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, and I wish to refer you, Mr. Chairman, to section 1,008:

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: May I raise a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I understand the hon. member is now suggesting the bill should provide that women would not be liable to capital punishment. It seems to me this is not relevant to the clause under discussion. I do not know whether it would have been possible, but I do suggest that the only time it might have been possible to make such a suggestion would have been on second reading, when the bill as a whole was being discussed. I am not saying the subject would have been relevant then and it might have been a matter requiring a ruling, but it seems to me the only time this kind of a suggestion might be in order would be during the debate on second reading.

We have concluded the general discussion which is allowed on clause 1 and we are now dealing with the clauses of the bill, at which time discussion must be strictly relevant to the clause itself. I suggest, therefore, that my hon. friend has not chosen the right time and is not in order in introducing this subject at this stage. I do suggest that, having completed the debate on second reading and the normally wide ranging discussion on the first clause, we should now confine ourselves to a discussion of the clauses of the bill; otherwise any hon. member would be free to introduce any idea he might have with regard to this subject generally. The time for that type of debate is over. I think, in the interests of preserving order, I should make this submission that it is not in order to discuss the question of exempting women from capital punishment.

Mr. Deschatelets: With all due respect to the minister I feel that the position he is taking now is ridiculous. The minister is suggesting that I should have introduced this amendment on second reading. He should know quite well that we were discussing the principle of the bill at that stage, and we are now dealing with clause 2. Clause 2 provides an exception to the general rule in so far as a minor of 18 or under is concerned.

I have an amendment ready, and I am going to lay the foundation for my amendment. I am going to send you a copy of my amendment, Mr. Chairman, as well as the minister. I shall be ready in due time to meet the arguments of the minister. I suggest I am quite in order in presenting a case for the exemption of women from capital punishment at a time when an exemption is already provided in clause 2. I shall be very brief.

(Translation):

I was about to read this:

When a death sentence is pronounced against a woman, she may ask that her execution be delayed on the ground that she is with child.

This simple fact shows that the case of a woman is obviously not the same as that of a man, and that, with regard to capital punishment, we should approach the situation from different angles.

On Thursday, March 4, 1954, during an investigation by the joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on capital punishment, the following questions were asked:

According to you, would it be appropriate to impose the death penalty for women?

Have you any general remarks to make with regard to imposing capital punishment for juveniles and women?

That shows that the issue existed at the time of the investigation, and that it was a matter for concern to committee members who gave the question very special consideration.

This is what the then minister of justice, Hon. Mr. Garson, had to say on the subject during the sitting of May 11, 1954:

Hon. Mr. Garson: Well, the question of the commutation of the death penalty imposed upon a woman is one which we judge, I think it is fair to say, with more leniency that we would in the case of a man. I think it is also correct to say that in most cases the moral culpability of the crime of murder as committed by a woman as a rule is less than that of a man, speaking generally.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for the last decade or so, there have been, as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, only two cases of women being executed, and in each of these cases, if I remember well, those women were only accessory to the crime, and not the main perpetrators.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that we should be realistic. Woman does not constitute the prime menace, and in her case I do not see why imprisonment for life, which is the sentence for non-capital murder, should not be provided as for a young man of under 18.

I said earlier that I proposed to submit an amendment to that section. I trust I will have the support of the hon. member for Scarborough (Mr. McGee).

Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I move that subsection 3 of section 2 of Bill No. C-92 be amended by adding, at line 9, after the words:

3. Notwithstanding subsection (1),—

The following words:

A female person or—

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, you have permitted discussion on the matter so, notwithstanding the fact that in my view it is out of order, perhaps it would be quicker to dispose of the matter on its merits than to press the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Fulton: In that connection may I say this, and I shall be quite brief. We considered this matter carefully and were unable to accept the suggestion that has been made from time to time that there should be a provision that women be not liable to capital punishment. In this connection I would point out that it seems to me that when you are making the basic distinction between capital murder and non-capital murder on the basis of the element of deliberation, if such a crime were committed by a woman the capital penalty should be exigible against her just as it is in the case of the same crime committed by a man. Furthermore, the joint parliamentary committee that considered this matter also studied it very carefully and one of their recommendations, as found at page 23 of their report is this: No special provision for women.

I know we have not accepted all the recommendations of the committee, so I am not saying that one is absolutely conclusive of any argument by any means. I am merely pointing out that our view in this case was shared by the parliamentary committee or that, if you like to put it in that way, in this case we share the view of the parliamentary committee that considered this whole matter for two years. I therefore am unable to accede to my hon. friend's suggestion with regard to this amendment.

The Chairman: I understand that the minister does not object to the amendment being put. If there is no objection I will put the amendment.

Mr. Argue: After you have put the amendment you will then hear some representations?

The Chairman: Yes. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Fisher: I just want to say that we shall support the amendment. Even though it may seem unnecessarily to favour one group, it is in the direction of total abolition which we support.

Mr. Drysdale: It is contrary to socialism.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment will please rise. All those opposed to the amendment will please rise.

And the Clerk Assistant proceeding to announce the result of the vote:

Mr. Pallett: Before the vote is recorded, Mr. Chairman, may I raise this point of order. There was an hon. member sitting in his place here today when the vote was called and he has not indicated whether he votes for or against the amendment. I think there is no provision for abstention from voting. I believe there is an obligation on the hon. member to indicate his vote.

An hon. Member: Who is the member?

Mr. Pallett: I would appreciate it, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Essex East would indicate his vote.

Mr. Argue: Before you deal with the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. I also noticed that the hon. member for Essex East did not vote. I thought a man with such strong convictions and opinions on every subject would vote. Speaking on the point of order, may I say that I think it is his right, although I doubt the wisdom of it, to remain in his seat if he so wishes, and that he is not required to vote.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, since I have been so forcefully identified from right and left—

Mr. Argue: Left and right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —may I say to the hon. member for Assiniboia that when it comes to following the course of wisdom, I am sure he will not misunderstand me if I say that I will not follow him in that regard.

Mr. Argue: That is a reflection on your members who voted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I point out that I think it is highly improper for any hon. member to comment upon what another hon. member has done with regard to a vote in this chamber. I have not voted because this matter has come up suddenly and I have not been able to give it the kind of thought which I am sure this question deserves. I doubt very much whether the whip of the Conservative party has given this matter any thought at all.

Mr. Fulton: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. The hon. member's reasons may be adequate to himself, although I doubt whether they will appeal very strongly to other members of the committee. However, now that the point has been raised it seems that we should be clear on the matter. I am under the impression that our rules provide that a member who is present in the chamber must indicate which way he votes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the authority for that statement? I should be glad to know it.

Mr. Fulton: I say I am under that impression. Since I think it is an important matter that we should decide, Mr. Chairman, I would ask that you indicate what the situation is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think it would be a good point to have cleared up. It is the first time I have ever known that point to be raised.

The Chairman: I was always under the impression that an hon. member could abstain from voting even though he was in the chamber.

Mr. Argue: That is right.

The Chairman: I may say that if such is the case, of course, any identification on a point of order of a member who abstains should not have taken place. If the committee will allow me to consider the point further I should like to do so. If I have anything to add to what I have already said, I will do so later.

Mr. Argue: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would simply add one point, Mr. Chairman. I did not indicate whether or not I was paired.

And the result of the vote having been announced:

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 8; nays, 53.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Johnson: I have a few remarks to make on this clause particularly with relation to subsection 3 of section 206 of the Criminal Code, which excludes a young person from liability to the penalty for capital murder when such person appears to be under the age of 18 at the time he committed the murder. If we turn to chapter 160 of the revised statutes of 1952, an act respecting juvenile delinquents, we find in section 2(1) (a) a definition of the term "child". The definition reads:

"child" means any boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of sixteen years, or such other age as may be directed in any province pursuant to subsection 2;

If we turn now to subsection 2 we read:

The governor in council may from time to time by proclamation

(a) direct that in any province the expression "child" in this act means any boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of eighteen years, and any such proclamation may apply either to boys only or to girls only or to both boys and girls, and (b) revoke any direction made with respect to any province by a proclamation under this section, and thereupon the expression "child" in this act in that province means any boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of sixteen years.

I wonder why we should have a provision in this bill dealing with the Criminal Code stating that the penalty for capital murder shall not be applicable to a child who appears to be under the age of 18 years, when we have on the statute books the Juvenile Delinquents Act according to which a child is defined as a person under the age of 16 years. Should we not apply the same standard to this section 206 of the Criminal Code dealing with capital murder?

Since I indicated on second reading last Wednesday that I am of the opinion that any person 18 years or over is old enough to take responsibility for committing a capital murder and old enough to be liable for the punishment set for capital murder, I draw the attention of the minister to the possibility of amending this clause of the bill now under consideration so as to amend subsection 3 of section 206, which is clause 2 of Bill No. C-92. Accordingly I move, seconded by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere:

That clause 2 be amended by substituting the world "sixteen" for the word "eighteen" in paragraph (3) of section 206.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was just about to ask the hon. member whose amendment has been put forward if he can tell us what his research has revealed in this regard as to the practice in jurisdictions outside Canada.

Mr. Johnson: Perhaps we could rely on the experience of the hon. member for Essex East for having that information given to the committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the hon. member say whether there are any other jurisdictions of which he is aware where young persons of 16 are subject to the death penalty? I am just looking for some information on the subject.

Mr. Johnson: I am sorry, but I cannot give to hon. gentlemen that information. I am really serious when I say I rely on the hon. member for Essex East to give this information. I only know that in our country we have this problem of juvenile delinquency. It may be that we should take it more seriously and say that our young people should be discouraged from taking part in the gang wars and fights of which we hear so much in the big cities of Canada, in Toronto, Winnipeg, Montreal and even here in Ottawa. My proposed amendment arises from the fact that in most provinces of Canada our young people after they reach the age of 16 are very often independent of their parents. Many of them leave home to work in the cities and separate themselves from the authority of their parents. It may be that we should consider the advisability of amending the act in such a way as to reduce the age limit from 18 to 16.

Moreover, if the hon. member had listened carefully he would remember that I quoted chapter 160 of the revised statutes dealing with juvenile delinquents and tried to establish that since that act defines a child as a person under the age of 16, we should apply the same standard all the way through in the Criminal Code except in matters other than in capital crimes where a province has decided to take advantage of section 2, subsection (2) (a) to increase the age from 16 to 18.

Let us not forget, however, that subsection (2) (b) of the same act gives power to the federal government to revoke any such proclamation. My contention is that taking into account that we have extensive juvenile delinquency in this country, we should consider reducing the age from 18 years to 16 years under clause 2 of the bill now being considered.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I should say a word at this point, because the question as to what is done in other jurisdictions is of interest and the answer might be helpful to the committee. The Gowers commission points out in paragraph 183 that with respect to the United Kingdom the children's act of 1908 provided that persons under 16 years of age at the time of the offence could not be sentenced to death but, instead, could be sentenced to be detained during His Majesty's pleasure. This provision was extended by the children and young person's act of 1933 and by the children and young person's (Scotland) act of 1937 to persons under 18 at the time of conviction. It was further extended by section 16 of the criminal justice act, 1948 and section 17 of the criminal justice (Scotland) act, 1949, to persons under 18 at the time the offence was committed. No person under 18 years of age had in fact been executed since 1887. So the law of England since 1933 has been that no one under the age of 18, generally speaking, should be hanged.

It seems to me, with respect to the argument of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, that there is some difficulty. He is basing his case on the fact that in our Juvenile Delinquents Act the age limit is stated to be 16, and I believe that is subject to variation from province to province. Assuming that it is age 16, for the purposes of his argument, it seems to me there is a very great difference between saying, on the one hand, that for the purposes of that act a person under the age 16 shall be regarded as a juvenile and shall be treated in special courts, and saying on the other hand that a person over 16 and under 18 years of age, therefore, should be subject to be hanged. One argument does not seem to follow from the other at all.

I should again like to refer to the findings of the joint parliamentary committee here in Canada, and perhaps I should read the whole paragraph from their report in this regard. The paragraph in question is No. 76, found at page 18 of that report, and reads as follows:

> 76. The committee noticed that the invariable practice has been to commute the sentence of all persons under 18 and that, since 1945, the sentence has rarely been executed against a person 20 years and under. The committee balanced the consideration, that youth must always be a mitigating factor, against the fact that some of the most callous crimes are committed by young offenders showing a total disrespect for life or property. The committee noted that the United Kingdom royal commission on capital punishment unanimously favoured the retention of the present United Kingdom law prohibiting the execution of offenders under 18 but was almost equally divided in considering whether the exemption should be raised to 21. The committee concluded that it would be proper to amend the law to provide that the death penalty should not apply to a person of the age of 18 years or less at the time of the commission of the offence and recommends strongly that, except in extraordinary cases, the present practice of commuting most death sentences passed on persons under 21 years be continued.

This is another case where we have accepted the committee's recommendation, in so far as the provision of the law is concerned, with regard to persons of less than 18 years of age, and it constitutes a recommendation for the guidance of the executive. That viewpoint of the committee is carried into their conclusions or summary of recommendations, and is recommendation No. 6 at page 23.

I recognize that we have to fix an age limit, and that there is bound to be some difficulty because there is a great differentiation made on the basis of perhaps one or two days in a person's life. The limit has to be fixed somewhere, and for the reasons indicated in the passage I have read from the committee's report it seemed appropriate to us that it should be at age 18.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I should—

Mr. Fulton: May I just say, in order that the committee will not be taken by surprise, that as the house leader announced last evening, I am unable to be here this afternoon, so at 2.30 the house will continue its discussions in respect of the bill of my colleague the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question in that connection. Is it a fact that we are not only going to adjourn at 2.30, but that the minister is going to be away for some time? I have heard that he is going to be away for some two weeks.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, no, I shall not be away for two weeks. I do not think I shall be able to be back for the balance of this week, but I certainly shall be back next week.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That being the case, I should like to point out that it is regrettable that the government cannot even now accept the proposal that while the minister is away, with the Solicitor General guiding the bill we would go into committee in order to meet the requests and objectives stated by us yesterday.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I believe we should endorse the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson), for it brings us closer to the existing law.

(Text):

For the benefit of the members of this committee I should like to cite section 13 of the Criminal Code, which reads as follows:

> 13. No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was seven years of age or more, but under the age of fourteen years, unless he was competent to know the nature and consequences of his conduct and to appreciate that it was wrong.

I think the best thing would have been to leave the law as it is, because we are now involved in a situation where there are three or four age categories in respect of which an individual can be found guilty of murder and liable to capital punishment. I support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, because it is closer to the existing criminal law regarding the age 14 limit.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to endorse the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson).

As he mentioned himself, we are faced today, especially in this country, with a juvenile crime wave and as a result, unfortunately, too many crimes are being committed by teenagers under the age of 18.

The hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) referred to section 13 of the Criminal Code. Allow me to point out the special provisions contained in section 139 of the Criminal Code, where a distinction is also made between a crime committed by a person under 14 and one over 14 years of age.

With regard to rape, before the last amendments were made to the Criminal Code, the crime of rape was punishable by death, under the law, regardless of the age of the persons who committed the crime.

If this amendment receives the approval of the house, then we may have contributed to creating more of an impression on youth who, nowadays, laugh off all forms of authority, be it executive or paternal.

If the legislator deemed appropriate, for certain crimes, to let the child of 14 years bear the consequences of the act he has committed, I am of the opinion that in every other field, and especially in the case of murder, the young man of 16 years old should be treated on an equal basis with adults.

For that reason, I readily endorse the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville.

(Text):

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I cannot see any reason for following acceptance of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville. I rather appreciated the sequitur which the minister presented regarding the inconsistencies between the age limit of the Juvenile Delinquents Act and the proposed age limit of 18. That is a very logical approach to the situation. By setting up different age groups in respect of which crimes can be recognized, such as seven years, 14 years, 16 years, and now 18 years, we are compounding a great number of difficulties which the different age limitations have created.

As a result, I am wondering how we will deal with the question of the maturity of persons in Canada, when individuals are not considered to be mature for the purpose of voting until the age of 21 years. I suggest that if there is to be a change in respect of the age when a person can be put to death, individuals should be given the full run of their immaturity, so to speak, until they reach the age of 21 years.

Actually we are confusing two things. We are confusing the possibility of finding a person guilty of murder up to a certain age with the advisability of putting that person to death. It is possible to find a person below the age of 16 guilty of murder, but the minister is now asking that he should not be put to death if he is under the age of 18. Therefore I would not support the amendment as it is presented, but on the other hand I would certainly support an amendment to raise the age to 21, to give the Canadian his full run of immaturity until the time he is permitted to vote.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I draw the committee's attention to what took place in England before the Gowers commission. Paragraph 189 of the report reads:

> The statutory exemption of persons under 18 from the capital sentence gave effect to a principle which had governed for over 40 years the practice of ministers responsible for advising on the use of the prerogative of mercy. From 1887 onwards, successive ministers recognized that the penalty of death ought not to be inflicted on persons under the age of 18, and recommended a reprieve in all such cases. The principle that a person under the age of 18 should not be put to death, however bad his crime may be, has long been accepted without question.

In the face of the experience in the United Kingdom and in Canada I think the clause should stand.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, do we not feel that we are giving enough of a chance to these poor people, as we say, who have committed murder? Yesterday, the Prime Minister was saying that, as far as a second offence is concerned, the percentage among criminals having committed murder is less than among other groups of criminals.

That seems normal, because those who have committed homicide are either hanged, which makes for a lower percentage of second offences or they have been imprisoned for life and this again helps to reduce the percentage. The third major group is the one consisting of those who have committed manslaughter; in most cases a car accident is involved and it cannot be said that they are criminals.

These people, once back to normal life, are not ready to commit new crimes, since they are good people to whom an accident has happened.

As for those who were fortunate enough to be granted mercy and were later released on parole, well they had been sentenced to life imprisonment. If they relapse into crime, they are in for another period of 25 years.

The compassion for those poor murderers expressed by the Prime Minister proceeded from a rather weak argument, I think.

A person of 14 years of age cannot be sentenced to death under the present law. The bill has increased this age level to 18 years. That is why I support the amendment submitted by the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson). It keeps closer to the present law, notwithstanding the fact that the bill under discussion gives so many chances to the murderer that it becomes practically impossible to apply the death sentence.

First of all, there is the difference established between capital and non-capital murder.

Yesterday, several examples were given of cases where murderers could not be sentenced to hanging.

Moreover, section 13 of the bill provides that the judge must ask the jury whether or not they recommend mercy for the accused. Under section 14, the judge can also recommend mercy. Section 11 gives the accused an automatic right of appeal the moment the death sentence is passed. Moreover, if he has not been successful before the appeal court, he may, under section 12, bring his case before the supreme court. Finally, if he does not succeed before the supreme court either, there is still the royal prerogative. You know the extent to which that perogative has been used during the past three years; if I am not mistaken, 39 death sentences out of 49 have been commuted to life imprisonment.

I therefore submit, Mr. Chairman, that the murderer has enough chances of avoiding the gallows without our having to set an age limit under which no man may be sentenced to death.

If the government want to abolish capital punishment, why do they not go ahead and say so instead of making a fuss and telling the people in one breath that capital punishment will be abolished and then, in another, that it will not be abolished; that they are in favour of protecting the murderer or that the latter does not have enough protection.

Never have I seen such a misleading and foggy bill aiming to please both currents of opinion. That is why I respectfully submit that we should support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson).

AGRICULTURE

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS RESPECTING MARGINAL LANDS, RURAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 22, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-77, to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada—Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle)—Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 3—Agreements for rural development projects authorized.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks in connection with section 3 of this bill. The section reads as follows:

> The minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, enter into an agreement with any province providing for
> (a) the undertaking jointly with the government of the province or any agency thereof of projects for the development of income and employment opportunities in rural agricultural areas specified in the agreement and for improving standards of living in those areas; or
> (b) the payment to the province of contributions in respect of the cost of such projects undertaken by the government of the province or any agency thereof.

Mr. Chairman, we are indeed justified in discussing legislation to increase farm income, because the booklet published by the department, entitled "ARDA", reports that out of 575,000 farms operating throughout the country, 120,242 yield only $1,200 or less to their operators. Further, analysis shows that, in 91,368 farms in eastern Canada the sale of farm products brings in only $1,200 or less. In other words, 76 per cent of all farms in eastern Canada show a cash return of less than $1,200 to their operators.

Those figures prove what I have said previously to the effect that in the maritime provinces two farmers out of every three do not have enough income to support their family decently. That is why we, in the opposition, have felt it desirable to speak up on behalf of eastern farmers.

Frequently, the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) comes back with the charge that we want to pit the eastern farmer against the western farmer. I am not laying the whole blame on the minister for the deplorable situation in which the eastern farmers find themselves, because he is not yet fully conversant with the problems of his department.

It is hard to bring back to earth a man who has been living in the clouds ever since he left his lecturing job at the University of Saskatchewan. However, his irresponsibility would soon be forgiven if we could find among his colleagues in the government, and particularly those from eastern Canada, men with backbone who could truly represent the opinion of eastern farmers.

And what have we heard from the few Quebec members on the government side who have taken part in this debate? They were content to commend the government for its policy, at a time when the farmers are leaving the land by the thousands, for lack of an income adequate to meet the needs of their families.

The farm situation in eastern Canada is pitiful, especially in the maritimes. This is something the Liberal government had recognized, and that is why the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent set up the Senate committee on land use, to seek a solution and to draft an agricultural planning program. It has been said that to govern is to foresee. Foresight had been a characteristic of the former Liberal government, and of all successive Liberal governments for a period of 22 years.

Western farmers remember that in 1935 they were in a sorry plight because of successive droughts which had caused large scale social and economic problems. That is why the Liberal government acted to apply the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which had been submitted to the house on the eve of a general election. In fact, if we consider the proportion of farms with an annual return of less than $1,200, we find that for the three provinces to which this legislation applies, only 4 per cent are in Saskatchewan, 9 per cent in Alberta and 10 per cent in Manitoba. That goes to show that the legislation passed by the Liberal government has been effective and, today, the minister has no cause to accuse the members of the opposition of being hostile to western farmers.

Instead of this, we would have expected the minister to extend the application of the P.F.R.A. to every part of Canada, something he had already said here he would do, but he did not. Hon. members on the government side have blamed the Liberals for all the farmers' troubles, but they kept silent.

It is time the government included in this act provisions that would take into account the needs of eastern farmers. I imagine the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) will accuse me again of contrariness, suggesting that I always have it in for western farmers. He does not even realize that legislation to help farmers has always been passed under a Liberal government.

Mr. Chairman, it is time to consider restoring the balance and especially to look into the situation of eastern farmers, without for all that overlooking the needs of western farmers. In the province of Quebec, an extensive study was carried on for three years by distinguished professors of Laval University; in fact they have just published a pamphlet dealing with farm improvements, and particularly—

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I think I should point out to him that we are now on clause 3, which has to do with agreements for rural development projects, research and investigation, and the fact that the minister is to make use of the services of other departments. I am just referring quickly to the explanatory notes opposite the clause. The hon. member is now making the type of address that would be more acceptable on clause 1 than on clause 3. I wonder if he could in future relate his remarks more closely to the clause under consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, I must say that we are discussing the possibilities of increasing income and employment in the agricultural and rural areas. Hence, I fail to see why my remarks should be considered irrelevant.

Out of the 120,000 farms in the eastern provinces, 91,000 do not yield an income of more than $1,200. Is it by planting Christmas trees in the province of Quebec and in other eastern provinces that the Minister of Agriculture intends to provide an answer to the problem of agriculture?

Any attempt to have farmers believe this nonsense is mere window dressing. The problem is in the soil, in the fields, in the barn of the farmer, and not up there in the clouds.

Moreover, in some parts of the province of Ontario and of Quebec and in the maritime provinces, many farms would become economical units if they were made fit for agricultural operations through the development of drainage systems, the clearing of stones, and, in some cases, by the use of fertilizers and lime.

There are many instances where submarginal lands increased in value after being sold, due to the fact that the new owner undertook essential projects to improve productivity. I know two young farmers, in the eastern townships area, who bought a 250 acre farm on which the former owner could barely eke out a living. Today, after about 15 years of operation, the farm has 75 head of cattle and the owners are happy and thriving. These young farmers loved the land, more so, I am sure, than people who are quitting the farm in eastern Canada.

There are in eastern Canada a certain number of farms and hundreds of acres of tillable land out of which the owners could make a profit if they were given the means to develop them.

There are certain responsibilities which the government must assume when it is a matter of protecting a whole category of citizens on the way to ruin. This assistance should have as its first objective, the draining of land; second, clearing the land of stones, if necessary; and finally, the fertilizing of grazing land; and crop rotation on tillable lands, and the reforestation on others. Therein lies the whole problem of marginal and submarginal farms in eastern Canada.

I realize that this situation and those difficulties that are met with in eastern Canada are not found out west. I know, having lived and worked on western farms for a year, that they do not have any drainage problem.

They don't have to worry about the problem of the clearing of stones that we have in eastern Canada. Drainage and clearing of stones are two serious disadvantages that we have to contend with. That is why I would ask that, in this new bill and in the drafting of regulations that will follow, the Minister of Agriculture give special attention to drainage and clearing of stones in eastern Canada.

Years ago, this house enacted the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and all of us have felt its beneficial results. Besides, they are outlined in the publication issued by the Minister of Agriculture. Legislation that would give special attention to drainage and to the clearing of stones would have the same results in eastern Canada as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has had in western Canada.

Of course it would cost several million dollars to apply such a scheme; but would it not be worth while spending a hundred million a year, considering that such a program would benefit six eastern provinces and would help to keep on the land some of the 91,000 farmers who, otherwise, will swell the ranks of the unemployed in the cities?

We are spending about $1,600,000,000 on national defence, to build planes and appliances of war which are obsolete even before they are put into service. Would it not be worth while to sacrifice one or two of these to the cause of agriculture, and to safeguard family farms?

I could go on speaking on this subject, Mr. Chairman, but I shall close my remarks at this point.

However, I would urge the minister to give serious consideration to the request we have placed before him on behalf of eastern farmers. And I urge fellow members from eastern Canada, if the idea I have just put forward is agreeable to them, to give it their support.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to raise a question of privilege.

At this moment, I should be attending a meeting of the steering committee of the committee on agriculture and colonization. Would it not be possible to arrange the program in such a way that we might attend the proceedings of the house when it is dealing with matters of interest to us, and also attend the meetings of the committee on agriculture and colonization, of whose steering committee I am a member, when it is sitting.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska has just indicated that he is a member of the steering committee of a committee of this house dealing with agriculture, and if I understood him aright, he wondered why this matter could not be allowed to stand so he could discharge his responsibilities there. The minister did not make any physical move that would indicate his interest in the suggestion made by the hon. member. While he is thinking about the request made by the hon. gentleman, I should like to make a few remarks on this particular clause.

Clause 3 (1) (a) provides as follows:

3. (1) The minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, enter into an agreement with any province providing for

(a) the undertaking jointly with the government of the province or any agency thereof of projects for the development of income and employment opportunities in rural agricultural areas specified in the agreement and for improving standards of living in those areas;

With regard to subclause (a) I have this comment to make. Of course no one in this chamber will fail to support any positive effort by the administration for the purpose of promoting projects that will develop income and employment opportunities in rural or other areas in our country; nor will any hon. member oppose any efforts made by the administration to improve the standard of living in those areas. I make these observations because of what I am now going to say, and I hope the minister will not suggest that my remarks now can be construed as meaning that we are not interested in seeing an improvement in the standard of living of the farmers of our country or that we are not anxious to see an improvement in their income and their employment opportunities.

However, I suggest to the minister that this kind of language in a bill is most unusual. The purposes or the objectives of a bill are generally stated in the preamble, and in the preamble of this bill the objectives of this legislation are stated, and I believe they are stated accurately, although I repeat that the bill is no more than a long term measure and does not in any way provide for any immediate improvement in agricultural economic conditions. To use the language in the first clause of the preamble, "their standard of living". The use of the phrases "development of income and employment opportunities" and "improving standards of living" in subclause (a) of clause 3 is a misuse of the form of legislative enactment traditionally resorted to in the House of Commons. The only purpose I can conceive for the inclusion of those phrases in this particular clause is in keeping with the general objective for which this minister in particular is especially noted, namely for propaganda purposes.

The clause itself does nothing to promote income and employment opportunities, nor does it do anything to improve standards of living. It simply gives the government, if it wishes to act, the authority to enter into agreements with the provinces for the promotion of projects which may have those objectives. But I say that, the objectives having been stated in the preamble, to repeat them in this way in the clause clearly reveals the immediate purpose the administration has in mind, notwithstanding whatever denial may come from the minister.

As I said before, I hope the minister will not misconstrue what I have said. Any project that will improve income and employment opportunities of the farmers in this country will be supported by every member of this committee. Any measure that will improve the standards of living of farmers will be supported by all members of this committee. But if one takes those phrases out of this clause practically nothing remains, and all that we in this committee are asked to vote on with regard to this clause is something that is already covered in the preamble, and is so general as to warrant the indictment I have made about the use of these phrases in an enactment that is supposed to create a new power for the administration pursuant to an act of parliament.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What improvement in language does the hon. gentleman suggest?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would suggest language something like this. "The minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, enter into an agreement with any province providing for the undertaking jointly with the government of the province or any agency thereof of certain projects in accordance with the purposes of this act."

An hon. Member: It is more vague.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not more vague. To repeat the language of the preamble, I say again, in a clause of a statute is a misuse of the form of enactment to which we resort in this house, and I should be greatly surprised if any draftsman in the Department of Justice initiated this language by himself. I can only conceive that the minister, with his well known technique of exaggeration and propaganda, is responsible for language of this kind.

Possibly the minister might deal later with this further query which I raise in connection with clause 3 (1) (b) where the words appear—

The payment to the province of contributions in respect of the cost of such projects undertaken by the government of the province or any agency thereof.

Can the minister tell us whether it is the intention of the government of Canada, before prorogation, to bring forward by way of a supply estimate any proposed expenditure that might embrace this particular subclause concerning the payment of contributions to a province? If the minister has a particular project in mind; if he anticipates, as he indicated when we discussed this matter on second reading that he will have at least a pilot project operating in each of the provinces, then it ought to be possible for him to say that it is his intention to bring forward a supplementary estimate providing for an amount of money to cover the payment to the provinces of contributions in respect of particular projects or pilot projects.

I suggest that the minister does not propose to bring forward any estimates, that no money is going to be voted this year. I further suggest that even next year the government will not bring forward any proposed expenditure of money pursuant to this bill, because no project can be finalized with the provinces under clause 7 of this bill unless parliament approves the spending of the money designed for that particular purpose. That would bring us away into the spring of next session unless we have some other intervening event. The probability is, therefore, that it is not an exaggeration to say that the government has no expenditure of public money in mind at all with respect to this measure in the foreseeable future.

While I am dealing with clause 3(1)(b) I might say to the minister that I doubt very much whether the words "or any agency thereof" fully meet the question put by the hon. member for Assiniboia the other day and the reply thereto by the Minister of Agriculture. The hon. member for Assiniboia wanted to know whether this bill would authorize the minister to enter into any arrangements with individual farmers or proprietors, and the minister replied, as I recall, that the bill would authorize the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces so as to enable arrangements to be made with certain delegated bodies which might be composed of groups of farmers or landowners.

Assuming that this was the reply given by the minister, and I believe it was, is the minister satisfied that the words "or any agency thereof" give him the desired kind of authority? Surely this phrase means precisely what it says, an agency of the province. It might be a research board, it might be a farm loan board, it might be a marketing board or some body of that sort, but surely an agency of the province, unless there is a more precise definition, does not mean anybody to whom the province delegates a particular function under the authority which is alleged to exist in this bill. If the minister wants to do that very thing—and I believe he should want to do it—there ought to be more precise language in this statute so it may be clear that we are authorizing the government to enter into arrangements with the provinces to provide for the delegation to non-governmental bodies of responsibility for carrying out the purposes of this bill.

The comment I made about the use in a legislative enactment of a certain form of words with respect to clause 3(1)(a) as distinguished from a preamble apply equally, of course, to clause 3(2), which says:

> For the purpose of assisting the development of income and employment opportunities in rural agricultural areas in Canada and the improvement of standards of living in those areas, the minister may cause to be prepared and undertaken with the government of any province or any agency thereof or with any university, educational institution or person, programs of research and investigation, and co-ordinate such programs with other similar programs being undertaken in Canada.

That is a very laudable objective. Once again, of course, it is an objective addressed to the long term and not designed to bring any immediate redress to the farm income situation. But why is it necessary to restate, as the minister does in the first two lines of this subclause, lines 28 and 29 of this bill, the words "for the purpose of assisting the development of income and employment opportunities in rural agricultural areas in Canada"?

Of course that is the purpose. But the place to state it, as we all know, is in the preamble of the bill, and there it is already stated. To repeat it, as is done here, in the body of the bill is to prostitute the form of legislative enactment which is designed to state the law precisely without giving the author of the measure an opportunity of parading intentions which are, in any case, already stated in the preamble to the bill. It is not necessary to pass this preamble at all if this particular language is going to appear in this clause as it does in some other clauses of the bill.

I suggest to the minister that this draftsmanship is not in accordance with our practice in this house. It is bad draftsmanship. It is draftsmanship of a kind which I am sure was not initiated by the officials of the Department of Justice.

Moreover, I regret that this clause, important as it may be for the future, does not give any relief whatsoever to the farmers of Canada at the present time. That is a fact, notwithstanding all the minister has said in this house, notwithstanding what he has said in the speeches he has made throughout the country, notwithstanding all he has said in the pamphlet which has been printed in hundreds of thousands and copies of which have gone out from one end of this country to another as representing an accomplished fact when this is nothing more than an intention; an intention to be realized in the distant future; an intention, moreover, which was born not in the mind of the Minister of Agriculture but in the mind of a former prime minister of this country who caused a study to be made of the whole question of rehabilitation, conservation and land use. I refer to Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent.

(Translation):

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a few words on section 3.

The remarks I am about to make are inspired by those which the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Meunier) made when we were considering section 2, on May 22. The hon. member implied that section 2, the wording of which is the same as that of section 3, could in a way infringe upon provincial autonomy.

I have only two brief remarks to make in that connection. First, both section 2 and section 3 provide for agreements between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. In my opinion, the hon. member should have made those remarks when section 2 was being examined, not section 3.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised by my hon. colleague, I wish to say that my comments on section 3 are relevant. I am saying that this section provides for agreements between the federal and provincial governments.

I am therefore, discussing section 3 and merely saying that it is based on the same principle as section 2. We can reply to the question as to whether or not section 3 has violated or will violate the provinces' rights, by using the same arguments as for section 2.

Now, first of all, there is to be a voluntary agreement between the federal government and the provinces. Therefore, this does not constitute an infringement upon provincial autonomy since it calls for an agreement on definite points. If a province feels that such an agreement is a violation of its autonomy, it does not have to be a party to the agreement.

Second, I should like to quote section 95 of the British North America Act:

> In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the province, and to immigration into the province; and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to agriculture in all or any of the provinces, and to immigration into all or any of the provinces; and any law of the legislature of a province relative to agriculture or to immigration shall have effect in and for the province as long and as far as it is not repugnant to any act of the parliament of Canada.

Therefore, that section of the constitution authorizes the federal government to legislate in matters pertaining to agriculture and, consequently, to make agreements with any province that wishes to do so.

Therefore, I feel that the committee has no reason to fear that this legislation violates provincial autonomy.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to say a few words about section 3. The minister makes much of this act. In fact, under this section 3, it would be possible to enter into agreements with the provincial governments about those studies that would have to be undertaken to assist in the development of rural areas.

The minister seems to have a special disposition for visions. Not so long ago—we recall it easily—he had a great vision about the Canadian north, and having failed to make that vision come true he felt the need to move to a different department in quest of some other vision. And now it turns out that his new vision is based on the outcome of a study made by the committee appointed by the St. Laurent government, by the former Liberal government. And the minister is expecting much of the possible results of this work and of this co-operation between the federal and provincial departments of agriculture.

Well, I wish to inform this house that in my constituency we did not wait for the vision of the present Minister of Agriculture to decide to do something. In fact, as soon as the Senate committee was established, the county agriculturist was able to obtain from the Ontario department of agriculture authority to set up a survey committee. I have here the complete report of a survey made in that area where farms are not adequately productive, so to speak, and do not yield a reasonable income.

For the minister's information, I wish to say that this is a complete survey. I have on hand reports of many such surveys. In addition, the report drawn up by this provincial committee clearly indicates that the bill now before us, which the minister feels is based on his new vision, is but a mere extension of the work which the St. Laurent government had undertaken through the formation of a senate committee. In short, this bill would be a mere extension of the work already undertaken by certain provincial governments who did not wait for the announcement of the new vision of the Minister of Agriculture.

Clauses 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6—Advisory committees.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, clause 6 provides for the setting up of advisory committees. I assume that these committees need not necessarily be composed of government personnel on federal-provincial account, but may be composed of non-government bodies such as farm organizations and the like. Could the minister inform us whether any such committees have been set up?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question relating to the advisory committees referred to in section 6.

Has the minister consulted any organization in the province of Quebec before this bill was drafted? Did he get in touch with Quebec farm organizations, professional farmers or any other organization before writing out the bill?

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know which Canadian organizations and specially which Quebec organizations were consulted.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, first of all consultation takes place through the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which represents all agricultural organizations in Canada; and second, with the various organizations in each of the provinces which may be interested. An example of that would be the dairy farmers of Canada. One of the directors of that organization comes from the province of Quebec. I also, of course, consult the minister and deputy minister of that province.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the minister for consulting various national organizations. But I do not think he had any consultation with the organization which really represents farmers in the province of Quebec.

I doubt that he had any conference with these farmers who won gold medals in various farming competitions. And I refer to the best hog producers of the province of Quebec and the best farmers. They are the ones who would have given him the best advice on writing a bill for the improvement of the situation of the agricultural population, particularly in the east.

We have cause to wonder, today, about the advantages we will obtain through this legislation. We can obtain a lot and again we can obtain little, depending of course upon the sincerity of the administration and the Minister of Agriculture.

This bill may mean very little, and it could mean a lot, not only because of its phraseology, but also because of its implementation.

We cannot blame the government for not acting. This is a step in the right direction, we commend them for it and we will support the measure.

However, if we go back in time a little and examine the achievements of the Conservative administration thrown out of office in 1935, we find that at that time very good legislation had been enacted. In 1935, for instance, the P.F.R.A. was adopted by a Conservative government, but was never implemented. It was enacted on the eve of the general elections and I doubt that the act we may adopt today reflects genuinely serious motives. I feel that it stems from a desire to make a little window dressing and to obtain votes.

I would hope that I am mistaken—

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. member should be allowed to make those remarks. He has imputed motives to me, and I do not think any hon. member is allowed to do this.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I am afraid I did not hear what the hon. gentleman said. Perhaps the minister would enlighten me, since he is the one who is aggrieved.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): According to the translation system, the hon. member said I did not bring in this bill with any clear-cut motive in mind; that it was brought in purely to win votes. I do not think the imputation of motives of that sort is allowed under our rules.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I did not impute wrong motives to the minister. I was merely judging from past experience when we adopted acts that were not put into force. That is why I doubt that this one is justified.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am afraid I will have to ask for a ruling from you, Mr. Chairman, on the statement in which the hon. member said I did not bring in this legislation from clear motives but to win votes.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I cannot find anything unparliamentary in what the hon. member said. Following what he did say I understood that he had to a very large extent withdrawn any wrong imputations or suggestions directed toward the minister in the short statement he just made.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to obtain a little more definite information in regard to these advisory committees, because I believe the success or failure of this legislation will depend on them. I should like to know just exactly how many committees are to be established. Is there to be one in each province? What kind of people are going to be on those committees? One of the things the minister said when he was speaking on this legislation was that the success of a part of this bill would depend, and here I quote, "almost entirely on the rapidity with which the provinces wish to push this program". Surely a large part of the success of this legislation depends upon the leadership which is given by Ottawa and, of course, by the minister himself. A great deal of the success of this legislation will depend upon the kind of committees to be set up under this particular clause of the bill.

I am wondering, for example, whether a pattern has been given to the people who are to form these committees. I notice that one particular article the minister read discussed the fact that part of this legislation was to encourage local industry, the provision of recreational facilities, technical training and so forth. Are people from all those fields going to act on those advisory committees?

I am wondering, for example, whether there will be an attempt by the advisory committee to estimate how much food Canada will need in the next 10, 15 or 20 years. Will there be an attempt to bring research into the whole area? Will there be an estimate of how much food Canada will be expected to produce in terms of world needs over the next 15 or 20 years? In other words, are those advisory committees to be strictly agricultural in their impact? Are they to be very broad committees which will attempt to deal with the whole area of marketing and the general economic needs as well as training, and various other things which are discussed? Also, as a matter of interest, I should like to know whether the farmers' union have been brought into the area of those advisory committees, and whether they will contain members representing that organization.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, in answer to the first question as to how many committees there will be, I do not think any person at this time can give a final answer to this question. It is thought that there certainly will be a dominion-provincial committee at the national level. In each province there will be a dominion-provincial committee at the provincial level which, of course, can work with local regional groups. There is another type of advisory board which will be dealing with particular subjects which we have in mind, on which there will be people who have knowledge of the matter and will be able to look into that particular subject.

The next question was who will be on the committees. I think the obvious answer to that would be the ones best suited, in the case of Canada, to give the answers to the special problems, and in the case of the joint committee as between the provinces and the federal government I imagine it would be the type of representatives of both the provincial and the federal governments who are experts on the general A.R.D.A. bill. It is more or less an administrative group.

The final subject raised was whether they will be discussing the particular implications of over-all planning of the agricultural industry in relation to other industries. The answer is yes and no; yes in the sense that before you can properly set up a new development in any particular regional area certainly you will have to know that there is a market for the products you are going to produce. There will have to be planning in relation to the over-all marketing situation in that type of problem.

The answer "no" deals with the fact that we have coming up in Canada in October of this year the resources for tomorrow conference, which has been given as its terms of reference the laying down of principles for the use of all our renewable resources as among the provinces, the federal government and private interests that control some of them. Under their terms of reference I would expect they will be coming up with a series of principles and directions along which I hope each of our joint respective jurisdictions and each of the powers concerned with the resources will travel.

To come back again to what I said on the introduction of this legislation at the resolution stage, the bill was originally timed in our thinking for the national agricultural program of 1958, to follow after the resources for tomorrow conference. Because of the inability of the expert people to get the conference ready last fall the agricultural bill has come ahead; but I pointed out at the time that I thought everything we were doing under A.R.D.A. would be in conformity with the principles of the resources for tomorrow conference. In any event, I did not think they would ever restrict our terms of reference. It is more likely that we would broaden them.

I do hope this gives an answer to the question, which I think was searching after something really sound and substantial in the efforts that we are making in this bill.

Mr. Pitman: I have one more question. I asked about the farmers' union. Possibly the minister will enlighten me on this. Will this advisory committee be integrated with the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources? Is it going to be integrated into a full-scale plan which the resources for tomorrow conference is really asking for in a long time organizational way? Is it just for the conference only, or is it projected into the next 15 or 20 years?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): To save time, I refer the hon. member to my speech at the resolution stage in which I outlined that one of the responsibilities of the Minister of Agriculture under this legislation would be to co-ordinate the activities of all the departments affected at the federal level. I listed seven departments on that occasion going through the whole range right down to citizenship and immigration because we are very concerned that the Indians be brought into the total resource picture, particularly on the agricultural side where we can give them the advantage of opportunities as we locate and discover them.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Expenditures.

Mr. Caron: Has the minister any information as to the amount that will be required from the treasury to carry this bill into effect?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will answer that question but I should like to go on to the next clause because it properly comes under that.

Mr. Caron: We are on clause 7. It is because the chairman called clause 7 that I asked the question.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am quite pleased to answer. We are on clause 7 now. I was answering the hon. member for Peterborough on clause 6. An estimate of the total cost each year is certainly impossible in the early stages. The hon. member for Essex East was quite right in pointing out that this is long term legislation. I have made an estimate that over the next 10 to 20 years our share of the expenditure will be roughly $600 million. That is an estimate of about $15 million a year on the average that I would say we could spend, but there may be a lot more or a lot less spent depending on the way the projects go forward.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this is a rather interesting observation on the part of the minister. He says that he would estimate that in 20 years there might be an expenditure of $600 million. Does that expenditure represent the federal contributions alone or does it represent the total cost provided for by the two senior levels of government? When is the first estimated amount of $15 million going to be spent? The minister said he could not say what the annual amount would be in later years but he thought that at the beginning it would be around $15 million. Will there be an estimate provided this year in the amount of $15 million or an amount approaching that figure? Will there be a similar amount next year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I think that question has been answered on several occasions in the past but I will try once again. In the experience we have had with the Conservative legislation passed in 1935, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, we found that there was a slow build-up at the beginning but after a while a certain level of expenditure developed that seemed to bring the demand for those services into relationship with the machinery we had to supply. An average annual expenditure developed which seemed to be sufficient to meet the particular demands. Based on that experience I calculated, with the help of some of the men working with me on this subject, that a reasonable level that could be expected under the bill would be an average expenditure by the federal government of approximately $15 million a year. I do not know what proportion local people, municipalities or provincial governments will be paying because the proportions will vary with each agreement in each province.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question was whether there would be a $15 million budget presented during the present fiscal year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I do not expect to do that because it is obvious I have to get the bill through first and that I have to get at least one agreement signed with one province before we can spend any money. It is also obvious that before I can spend money and make the agreement complete I have to come before parliament under this clause and secure authority to spend it. It is possible, of course, as the hon. member knows, that we might be able to work out an agreement or two under which action could go forward in so far as the province was concerned with the full understanding that before we could put up any money the expenditure would have to be agreed to by parliament.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Pitman: Can the minister tell us what his timetable is now? I understand he gave a timetable the last time this matter was before the house and said that he hoped to have some agreements with the provinces by the end of this year. What is his hope now? I think he was three months behind the last time he spoke on this subject.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am afraid the hon. member is once again a few days behind because I dealt with this matter on second reading. I said that I had proceeded with second reading about the first of May as I had promised and that I hoped by the end of this year to have at least one pilot operation in each of the provinces. I do not think there is going to be any doubt about being able to find these pilot operations. It is a question of deciding which one we will start with first. We are very anxious, as are the provinces, to make sure that before we move there is no mistake because in this type of long range program getting a good start is more important than getting a fast start. We have waited 35 years for this program and another few months will not decide its fate one way or the other.

Mr. Carter: I should like to ask one question. When the principle of the bill was being debated on second reading I believe there was some inference that the principle of rural rehabilitation would apply to fishing communities as well as to agricultural communities. Nothing is mentioned in the bill that could be construed as applying to fishing communities. Did I interpret what was said on second reading wrongly or does the minister plan to bring in further legislation?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member has asked a very important question. Under the bill I am required to deal with such projects as agricultural matters. We certainly know that in the eastern part of Prince Edward Island, on the north shore of New Brunswick and a good deal of the coast of Nova Scotia and parts of Newfoundland there is a combination of uses of land, mostly forest and farming but occasionally fishing. We have discussed this matter and other legislation such as that providing farm credits and have decided that if we can work out some combination under which the operation can be called farming this bill will cover it. I have been in conversation with the premier of Newfoundland about this matter and he agrees with me that if we can keep the basic idea of agriculture with fishing as just one of the activities such lands can be included in the rehabilitation of an area. That is one of the ways of providing income for the farmers but it is going to be classified as farm income.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? Now, by leave?

Mr. Churchill: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF BARBITURATES

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-99, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the measure in respect of which it is my privilege to move second reading is one that I am sure will be of considerable interest to the house. Hon. members are aware of the publicity which has been directed to what are referred to in the criminal underworld vernacular as goof balls. While there is no legal definition for this term, it is widely used to describe a barbiturate or an amphetamine tablet when employed for a non-medical purpose. Goof balls are frequently combined with an alcoholic beverage and are deliberately taken to provide a kick or stimulus which the user either requires or finds enjoyable.

I am advised that these substances are sometimes used by criminals to give them a feeling of confidence or courage in their commission of crime. Another use of these substances involves young people and here the practice is particularly vicious. Teenagers frequenting dance halls and other places of amusement or entertainment, will employ goof balls as a chemical crutch to get some form of stimulus, lift or kick, as the case may be. In addition, narcotic addicts when deprived of narcotics will often turn to these substances for help or support until narcotic medication becomes available. Alcoholics may also use them in a similar manner.

Barbiturates when used for medical purposes are regarded as sedatives and are principally employed for sleeplessness and for the relief of emotional stress or strain.

Under medical supervision, they are extremely beneficial and are widely used. When improperly used for the purposes I have indicated, they are not only harmful but frequently disastrous, if not tragic, in their results. They are habit forming if continually or indiscriminately used and in some respects can be said to be addictive.

Amphetamines, under medical supervision, are employed for a number of purposes. They are essentially used for appetite control to reduce overweight, and to relieve mental depression. Because of their stimulating effect on the nervous system, they are capable of helping to sustain mental or physical effort. They combat drowsiness and impede sleep. I am advised that they are often employed by persons engaged in more or less monotonous occupations requiring long hours of effort. Truck drivers on long hauls are frequently reported to use amphetamines to keep them awake and alert.

Experience has shown that persons using amphetamines may require barbiturates to counteract their effect and, conversely, persons using barbiturates may require amphetamines for the same purpose. Their association in the case of motor vehicle operators can be particularly hazardous.

Several years ago, reports were received indicating that barbiturates and amphetamines were easily procurable without a prescription in a number of retail pharmacy outlets. It was not considered, however, that there existed any form of illicit underworld traffic in these substances.

Investigations were subsequently made by inspectors of the food and drug directorate in an attempt to ascertain the extent to which these drugs could be purchased without a prescription in retail stores. As a result of a survey made some four years ago of 2,400 drug stores—or approximately half the total number in Canada—evidence was secured which warranted prosecutions being instituted against some 150 pharmacists. This evidence, however, did not indicate any widespread illicit traffic in these drugs but rather infractions of the requirements of the regulations calling for the sale only upon a prescription.

Within the past year and a half or so, however, other reports have reached us indicating that apart from some infractions of the regulations by retail pharmacists, there also existed a form of illicit underworld traffic in these drugs. This has been investigated by the R.C.M.P. and the results of their investigation clearly support the present existence of such a traffic.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

I thought it would be useful if I reviewed very briefly the development of this situation, including the steps that have been taken under the present legislation, as well as the necessity for the additional measures which are now up for consideration.

The hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque), who has discussed this matter on previous occasions in the house, will, I am sure, be glad to know that the government has been fully conscious of the situation and has for some time had under consideration possible ways by which the problem could be effectively met.

While from information gathered by the R.C.M.P. it is clear that a traffic in goof balls does exist in the major cities where there is a criminal underworld element, the situation in Montreal was considered sufficiently serious by the mayor of that city to convene a citizens' committee to deal with the problem. The committee, consisting of all interested groups and organizations, has issued a report recommending that certain steps be taken to combat it. I am pleased to inform the house that our original thinking in developing the measure which is now under consideration, included the very steps which the committee has subsequently recommended for adoption.

In view of the existence of an illicit traffic in barbiturates and amphetamines, hon. members may well wonder why it would not be simpler or preferable merely to include them with narcotics and to deal with the traffic as part of the narcotic traffic. The question is particularly relevant inasmuch as the measures which are proposed to deal with the illicit traffic in these substances are comparable in some respects with the measures which are necessary for the narcotic traffic. There are, however, differences which make it desirable that despite the similarity of enforcement measures, they should be dealt with under separate pieces of legislation.

In the first place, goof balls cannot be classed as narcotics. They are not so classed by the international agencies. Secondly, their medical use is different from that of narcotics. They are much more commonly employed by practitioners than are narcotics. Any proposal, therefore, to deal with barbiturates and amphetamines as narcotics would not receive favour or support from the medical profession. Their objection to such a course would be heightened by the additional psychological reason that it would be unfortunate to characterize barbiturates and amphetamines as narcotics and thus give them the form of stigma that is ordinarily associated with any continued need for, or use of, narcotics.

There is one further difference which of itself requires that barbiturates and amphetamines should be dealt with for legal purposes under the Food and Drugs Act and not as narcotics under that legislation. I refer to the question of possession.

Both in the narcotic act, as well as in this bill, there is established the offence of trafficking and of possession for the purpose of trafficking. Trafficking is the illegal distribution of drugs and it follows that possession for that purpose is related to trafficking but with some procedural difference in its proof. It goes without saying that in the case of a charge of possession for the purpose of trafficking, an important element would be the quantity found and the circumstances under which it was found. This has been substantially the criterion in narcotic enforcement and would be similarly applied in the case of an offence under the proposed Food and Drugs Act amendment.

In the case, however, of simple possession and not possession for the purpose of trafficking, there will be an important difference between narcotic legislation and that contained in this bill. The possession of a narcotic in any form other than as provided in the act or the regulations is a punishable offence. It is not proposed except in the case of possession for trafficking to make such possession a punishable offence under the Food and Drugs Act.

The reason for this difference is the clear distinction that can be drawn between narcotics and the drugs covered by this bill. Narcotics are not normally drugs which would be kept in the home, whereas barbiturates, and to some extent amphetamines, are quite likely to be included in the family medicine cabinet.

Narcotics as a rule would be prescribed on a very limited basis and for a particular purpose which would generally preclude any quantity or supply being on hand after the immediate need had disappeared. This, however, is not the case with barbiturates and in many households in Canada it is customary to maintain a supply of barbiturates for sleeplessness or for use by way of harmless sedation. Although these drugs can be obtained only pursuant to a prescription, which in turn is directed to a particular member of the family, they may be and frequently are used by other members of the family who are not covered by the prescription. It is not considered necessary or desirable that the use of a barbiturate by a member of the family under these circumstances should be made a crime. For this reason, the legislation does not, except as regards possession for the purpose of trafficking, make simple possession—even when not supported by legal authority—a criminal offence.

Family use under these circumstances is not the evil at which the legislation is aimed and this of itself would require a difference in the enforcement approach.

In addition to the above reasons, it is not thought necessary or desirable that the present illicit traffic in barbiturates and amphetamines should be dramatized or given the importance of the illicit traffic in narcotics and it follows that lesser penalties are considered to be sufficient under the circumstances.

I trust that this explanation will suffice to assure hon. members that this aspect has been given very careful consideration and that despite the similarity of the enforcement aspects, there is good reason for the separation. This, however, will not result in any duplication of effort or of enforcement because the R.C.M.P. will handle the illicit traffic in goof balls along with the illicit traffic in narcotics.

Apart from the suppression of the illicit traffic which will be a responsibility of the R.C.M.P. and, where necessary, other local enforcement agencies, the legal importation and distribution of these substances will be subjected to stricter control than is considered necessary in the case of other drugs which are subject to the Food and Drugs Act.

At the present time, the drugs covered by this bill can be sold only on a prescription and it is not proposed that this will be changed in any way. We do feel, however, that stricter control at the importation, manufacturing and distribution levels is required. This in no sense will impede or interfere with the legal availability of these drugs for proper medical purposes.

Unfortunately, the sources from which traffickers obtain their supplies of goof balls are not always ascertainable. It may be that they are sometimes obtained by theft or diversion from legal sources or it may be that in some cases they are illicitly manufactured. It is felt, however, that if legal sources are substantially tightened, then to the extent that goof balls are obtained by diversion, that source of supply will of itself disappear.

The tightening up of control, therefore, really involves the licensing of importers, manufacturers and wholesale distributors as well as the keeping of special records by such persons which will be subject to audit and examination. This will enable the tracing of supplies to the point of retail distribution in the course of which any unusual or improper dealings will automatically come to light.

None of these requirements will, however, impose any undue burden on those legitimately engaged in or dealing with these substances and I can assure hon. members that from discussions with the industry no difficulty is expected in bringing about full compliance with the new controls that are proposed.

Respecting the legal medical use of these drugs, there have been reports from time to time indicating dangers from a growing use of or dependence on them. The evidence which is available does not substantiate to any extent the fears so expressed. However, there is no question that in modern society a growing dependence is developing on certain chemical substances for stress, strain and other matters which perhaps were unknown to our forefathers in more leisurely times.

The legislation does not purport to interfere with the legitimate use of any drugs but merely attempts to provide such controls as may be necessary to ensure that proper safeguards accompany the manufacture, distribution and use of drugs where necessary.

The possibility of loose or indiscriminate prescribing of controlled drugs by a very few medical practitioners in Canada will be effectively met by the new measures which are proposed. I am glad, moreover, to assure the house that these proposals have in principle been discussed with representatives of organized medicine who are in agreement with their purpose.

I should like to say at this point that while authority will be provided in the law requiring the keeping of special records by all persons who deal in these substances—and this could well include members of the professions—there is no present intention that practitioners will be required to keep any special records in addition to those which are normally involved in good medical practice. Retail pharmacists will be required to keep special records but these will not be other than those normally required in good pharmaceutical practice. At the same time, authority will be included in the regulations to require a particular individual to furnish explanation as may be necessary respecting his use of these substances and to provide for such information, if necessary, being furnished to the provincial licensing authorities responsible for his right to practise.

I have attempted to set forth the problem in as factual and objective a way as possible so that hon. members will understand its extent and the necessity for the measures which are proposed for its solution. We have every reason to believe that the problem will be effectively checked by these proposals. We are convinced, however, that unless adequate measures are taken, the problem could well grow in size and importance and become increasingly difficult to remedy.

I can assure the house that the proposals which are set out in this measure are those which in the opinion of the competent authorities—including the R.C.M.P., officers of my department and others who are familiar with the problem—will be adequate and effective. It is our view that every measure needed to stamp out the illicit traffic should be taken and the legislation is designed to permit this being done. At the same time, it is not thought necessary or desirable that any undue restrictions should be placed on the legitimate employment of controlled drugs for medical purposes and the legislation will not have such an effect. Rather, it is the hope of the government that the proposed amendment will bring the matter under control so that it may never reach the proportions of the problem posed by narcotics.

In conclusion, it may be appropriate to mention that the problem which I have described as existing in Canada with regard to barbiturates and amphetamines is also one that is to be found in other countries. I am advised that many other countries at the present time are giving serious consideration to what effective measures should be taken to control the dangers resulting from the unnecessary and non-medical use of these very substances. It is, I think, fitting that Canada should be among the first nations to recognize the problem and to take appropriate action to deal with it.

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that, after all these years, the government has at last realized that there is such a thing as a goof ball problem. I hope that now when I speak of the goof ball problem hon. members will realize that it is a serious one, as is now recognized by the government. At the time when I first spoke about goof balls there were perhaps two or three hundred goof ball addicts, but unfortunately the number has grown to such an extent that I think the government is going to have a difficult time attempting to control these drugs.

At the present time these drugs can be obtained in Montreal proper. I know that because I come from Montreal. They can be obtained there in capsules. Some capsules are pink and others are of various colours. The capsules are small in size, being about half an inch in length and about one eighth of an inch in diameter. I presume that these capsules are prepared by the pushers or peddlers of the drugs. They are easily obtainable, I understand.

Hon. members may recall that last week I displayed some 1,500 or 1,800 different clippings which I have gathered over the last few years from various newspapers. They included editorials and full page articles in the weekly papers. In particular they illustrated the danger of the goof ball problem in Montreal. Hundreds of youths have been driven to crime through the use of these drugs and those hon. members who read newspaper articles on this subject only a short time ago will know that crimes have been committed in Montreal which are directly attributable to the use of goof balls, including riots in penitentiaries. One young man went into a cabaret at night and asked to be served with liquor. The bartender said he could not be served. The young man went home, got a revolver, took a goof ball and returned to the club. He waited at the door from midnight to four o'clock and when the bartender came out at four o'clock he shot his head off.

A young man or a young woman who is given goof balls will stop at nothing. Persons so affected will commit any crime, because they lose control and become completely crazy. They have no control over their senses. I am glad the government has at last realized that this is a serious problem and that measures should be taken to include this drug within the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act and allow the R.C.M.P. to handle these cases, because it is not for an amateur to handle this problem.

I wonder whether the minister has received a delegation which was formed in Montreal lately. I notice that the mayor of Montreal has written to the minister. He had arranged for meetings to be held in Montreal of a group of people including police authorities, prominent drug authorities, scientists, college professors and others who realize the danger which is caused to any city when drugs such as these can be obtained by anyone who wants to buy them. I repeat that I am indeed glad that the minister has seen fit to take up this question. Perhaps it will not be possible now to eradicate the practice of resorting to these barbiturates, but I hope the R.C.M.P. will have a better control over the situation and be placed in a better position to see that our youth is not contaminated further by pushers who will stop at nothing to put them in the way of crime.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): With respect to the bill before us, it does indicate, I think, that the government realizes that this is a serious problem. I know that it has been so, and increasingly so, in the city of Vancouver for a few years. Vancouver, of course, has the highest population of narcotics addicts in Canada and it would possess along with that, a similar interest in barbiturates as they are generally called.

I was reading the Vancouver Sun yesterday, and if I can make a brief reference to the issue of May 27, 1961 with respect to this matter I would mention an article by a Vancouver Sun reporter who visited certain places in Vancouver, bars, restaurants and the like, and purchased from people there a number of goof balls or what he identified as seconal capsules for 50 cents each. I do not want to refer to the article by reading sections from it. Generally, what he discovered was that these barbiturates were being sold somewhat secretively in the places he visited, and there was a continual reference to the need to be more secretive about it because the law was getting more tough in ferreting out those behind this trade in barbiturates or so called good balls. During the course of three hours this reporter bought 11 seconal tablets or capsules for 50 cents each from various persons. All he had to do was to make inquiries of a waiter or someone in a cafe or of some of the people who lounge around the streets in some parts of Vancouver and he had no difficulty in purchasing 11 of these tablets or vials within a period of three hours.

I think one of the reasons why there has been a larger traffic in barbiturates in Vancouver than in other parts of Canada is because of the high proportion of narcotics addicts on the west coast. Narcotics addicts sometimes use certain types of barbiturates. Narcotics addicts in the sense of those devoted to heroin or morphine or some of the more powerful narcotic drugs will take barbiturates occasionally when they are unable to get a supply of morphine or heroin or something of that kind. Barbiturates are to some degree a substitute, and taking them lessens the withdrawal symptoms which a narcotics addict experiences when he cannot obtain his normal dosage of a narcotic, or his next fix, as the expression is. The effect of barbiturates on the individual concerned is somewhat the same as the effect of morphine or heroin as far as withdrawal symptoms are concerned.

Barbiturates have an effect on the personality of the individual who takes them in somewhat the same way as alcohol affects some individuals by changing their personality and attitude from one of mildness and quietude to one of furiousness, filled with a desire to fight or destroy something. The effect of barbiturates is such that one's personality generally is changed. The effect of amphetamine is, I understand, somewhat different in this regard. There, the effect is one of producing hallucinations. I believe a number of truck drivers resort to dexedrine or stay awake pills or benzedrine in order to prevent them falling asleep while driving trucks. But, by using these tablets, or whatever they are, they report seeing all kinds of strange objects and items on the road in front of them. According to medical opinion the so-called goof balls are as insidious and dangerous, if not more so, than narcotics themselves, which are dealt with under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

There is certainly no regulation or control provided in this bill, as it exists, in respect of the use or distribution of these drugs. I have serious doubt whether it will solve the basic question in respect of the use of barbiturates. While it is true that notice of a motion appeared this morning in routine proceedings and orders of the day regarding the introduction of a bill to provide for the control of narcotic drugs, which will put into effect a policy statement made a few months ago, I expect there will be a system established involving the use of clinics, hospitals or institutions for the segregation and treatment of narcotic drug addicts. This kind of a program has been lacking in this country, as well as in other countries of the world, for many years. If the proposed policy in respect of the trafficking and addiction of individuals to barbiturates is to be similar to the program followed in respect of heroin and opium, which involves only incarceration, then I am afraid we will not solve this problem. The effect may be the emptying of our penitentiaries of narcotic addicts, by placing them in treatment centres, and filling their vacancies in the penitentiaries with addicts and traffickers of barbiturates. If that is the case, the same problem will exist, because there then will not be segregation of addicts to barbiturates and addicts to narcotics. I would hope that under the proposed bill, in respect of the control of narcotic drug trafficking, a policy will be adopted to segregate these addicts from other prisoners, and that a similar course will be followed in respect to the treatment of barbiturate addicts, and those individuals convicted of trafficking in barbiturates.

I must apologize to the minister for not being here for the whole of his opening statement. I had not expected that this bill would be reached as soon as it was. I should like to make another comment in regard to the proposed bill, and perhaps the minister will make some explanation, if he has not already done so.

I understand that when an individual is convicted summarily or on indictment, the penalty will be 18 months and 10 years' imprisonment respectively. After considering that portion of this proposed bill, I have concluded that is not the case, but that an individual convicted on indictment will be liable to imprisonment up to 10 years. That is, from one year to 10 years, depending upon the discretion of the courts. I understand the individual is also liable to a fine in addition to a term of imprisonment. I should like the minister to explain that portion of the bill, in order to clear up any misunderstanding in this regard.

There is another principle contained in this bill which I feel is rather strange and unique, considering the normal procedures of a court. The bill states that unauthorized trafficking in controlled drugs, as the bill refers to them, is illegal. However, it is my understanding that, under this bill, the possession of these controlled drugs is not illegal. If my understanding of this portion of the bill is accurate, then an individual charged with trafficking, which is the only offence in this respect, who does not plead guilty, will be tried on the same basis as an individual in possession of controlled drugs. That seems very strange to me, in view of the fact that it is not an offence to be in possession of these barbiturates. I presume there is some reason for this principle, and should like the minister to explain it for my benefit.

I understand that if a man is charged with illegal possession of drugs, the onus falls on him to establish one of two things, firstly, that he acquired the drug from a pharmacist or some authorized person; or second, that he was not in possession of the drug for the purpose of trafficking. I suggest it would perhaps be easy to prove the former; that he acquired these drugs from a pharmacist or doctor. However, for what reason could he be in possession of these drugs other than for the purpose of trafficking, unless he was a barbiturate addict? If that were the purpose of his being in possession of them, and in order to prove it, he would then have to establish his source. If he had not obtained the barbiturate from an authorized individual, he must have acquired it in an illegal manner, such as by breaking and entering a drug store, the theft of a doctor's bag, or a theft from some other place. The individual may well have purchased them from an illegal trafficker. By admitting so, he would be admitting another illegal act. I suggest this placing of the burden of proof upon the accused individual is rather an unfair approach to the problem. If the individual charged pleads not guilty to trafficking, then in all likelihood he must admit guilt in respect of another illegal act. I should like to know what benefit he will then derive from this admission?

Mr. Woolliams: Will the hon. member permit a question? I was wondering whether the hon. member had thought of the protection of the Canada Evidence Act?

Mr. Howard: Yes, I had. Since I am not a lawyer I have to take the advice of people who are lawyers. Sometimes this leads one astray, Mr. Speaker; but I have been told that the protection under the Canada Evidence Act—and I was about to come to this—applies only to protection with respect to questions asked. A person is not being asked questions under those circumstances; he is voluntarily taking action to prove his innocence. Thus I say he does not have protection under the Canada Evidence Act in this regard. When we get to this particular point what will be required will be another sort of legal fiction. We have engaged in one example of that already. The minister said that the court will proceed as if the individual had been charged with something else which is not an offence under the act. In committee we should also make an amendment bringing in another sort of legal fiction to the effect that if in the course of establishing that he had those controlled drugs not for the purpose of trafficking his responses would be deemed to be as if he had been asked such questions, and he would be given the same protection under the Canada Evidence Act as if he had been asked those particular questions.

As I say, this was the advice given to me by a member of the legal profession. I know how out of sorts those gentlemen are one with the other at times and how easy it is for them to come to a disagreement over something, particularly law, or what statute law means. I think this would be the effect of one of the principles of this legislation. If an individual were charged with an offence and attempted to prove his innocence he might incriminate himself, or might be in a position possibly to incriminate himself, depending on other circumstances, with respect to his argument of proof. I say that if this is the effect of the part of the bill dealing with the prosecution and the approach in court, then it is unique and strange and a rather dangerous way to proceed. It is something that we might deal with in detail when we get into committee on the bill. I believe it is part of the principle of the bill itself because it deals with the process used to decide whether or not an individual is guilty.

In essence, Mr. Speaker, I think the bill is commendable in the things that it seeks to do. If government policy is merely to stop at this and to take no steps in the field of segregation of those sentenced under the legislation, and no steps in the field of treatment of barbiturate addicts, as is apparently going to be done with narcotic addicts, then I think it is a failure. By this I do not mean that the bill itself is a failure, but there is failure on the part of the government to proceed fully in the direction of treatment and segregation, which is the thing that we want to get to.

If we leave the matter here, perhaps the minister will be able to clear up some of the doubts in my mind when he closes the debate, or perhaps we may have to engage in further questioning and discussion about the matter at the committee stage.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few brief words on this bill at this time. I am interested in its provisions. I shall have comments to make when we come to the various clauses. I should like to assure the minister that, as the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) has said, we join with him in his efforts to provide a satisfactory form of regulation with regard to the traffic in controlled drugs, which as he said exists in communities where there is an underworld.

First of all, I should like to say—and I had hoped that the minister would say this—we are especially grateful to the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean for being almost single-handedly responsible for the introduction of this measure. It was the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean who three or four years ago first raised this question in the House of Commons. We all recall the derision that greeted his interrogations and his remarks when he referred to this problem of the goof ball.

Oftimes individual members of parliament may feel frustrated in their efforts. They may feel they are not given an opportunity to provide constructive contributions in our deliberations and decisions. However, this is a very good example of how effective an individual member of parliament can be if he puts forward consistently a case which he sincerely believes in. I know of no finer example of achievement in this regard than the results which we see here today in the introduction by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) on behalf of the government of a measure which has been necessitated by circumstances which were first effectively demonstrated in this house by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean. I am sure I have every justification for extending to him our warmest thanks and our sincerest congratulations.

I have before me:

(Text):

"The mayor of Outremont provoked laughter in the House of Commons in 1958 when he spoke of goof balls." The hon. gentleman is the one who can now sit in his seat and laugh because a problem to which he attached great importance has now been recognized, and I think necessarily so, by the minister responsible in the government of Canada for the regulation and the prevention of this particular abuse.

The minister has given us a useful outline. With the general statement he has made I think we would be in full agreement. I had at first wondered why the bill was brought forward in this particular form. I had wondered why the subject had not been included in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, but I am satisfied that the explanation which the minister has given is one that meets the situation. He points out that the enforcement measures are the same, generally speaking, but I think there are some differences. If one will compare the enforcement provisions of the Food and Drugs Act one will find that there are some slight differences but basically, as the minister has said, the enforcement measures are the same. While this is so, the minister suggests, and I think rightly so, that since goof balls—and I prefer to use the phrase used in the bill, which is controlled drugs—are not narcotics, on that account they should be treated separately. He points out that the medical use of narcotics is different from that of controlled drugs. He indicates further that the medical profession is against the characterization of barbiturates as narcotics, and I think that the opinion of the medical profession in this regard is one that should be respected because the use of narcotics under legitimate circumstances and under the control of the skilled practitioner is altogether different from the uses which attend the employment of a barbiturate or a controlled drug.

The minister also points out that under the act dealing with narcotics the mere possession of a narcotic is a punishable offence whereas I note that in the bill, and I do not quarrel with this, the mere possession of a controlled drug is not necessarily an offence. The new section 33 (1) on page 2 of the bill deals with this aspect of the problem. That, I think, is almost in itself a good reason for the particular and special form to which the minister has resorted in this legislation.

He points out that narcotics, unlike controlled drugs or barbiturates, are not normally kept in the home, that they are under the strictest supervision of the doctor and other agencies of the public authority. He indicates as well that barbiturates are transferable from one member of a family to another, from one individual to another, in spite of the fact that the person whom the barbiturate is first given acquires it as the result of a prescription.

I am sure we are satisfied beyond doubt from what the minister has said, and particularly from the facts that have been elicited from time to time in the house by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, as to the great abuse that has flowed in recent times from these kind of controlled drugs, especially, in large communities, where the extent of criminality is so often characteristic of the large urban centres on this continent. Undoubtedly the minister and his officers have given this matter very careful attention. I am sure he has acted after the closest examination of the best way to deal with this problem. I can understand very well what some of his difficulties have been because there is a fundamental difference between a narcotic and a controlled drug within the meaning of this legislation and one would not want to do injustices in legitimate situations although one is actuated, as the minister and his officials are, by the need to see to it that the greatest supervision exists not only with regard to the illicit use of narcotic drugs but with regards to the use of barbiturates or controlled drugs.

One could go over a list of many illustrations that have appeared in the press which I have in my possession and which show the extent of the degradation that has taken place recently, particularly in some of our larger centres, as a result of the clandestine use and later the open use of barbiturates by unconscionable individuals exercising influence in particular over some of our young people. This is a necessary measure at this stage and we will examine the bill clause by clause in the hope that we will enact a measure capable of arresting this problem to the extent that it is practicable and possible to do so. Once again I am grateful to the minister and the government for bringing this measure forward. I am sure I also express the gratitude and appreciation of all members of the house for the perception and persistent interest of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the minister for bringing forward this legislation to cope with this problem and at the same time I should also like to record my appreciation of the untiring efforts of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) to keep this problem before the house and to have some action taken. As I listened to the minister opening the debate two points came to my mind which I should like to put before him for his consideration when he replies.

We have recognized that a problem exists and we are attempting in this legislation to find a solution to the problem by the indirect method, that is, by eliminating the illegal traffic in the drugs involved. The first thought that came to my mind as I considered the matter was that the illicit trade did not begin with the problem. The problem started in some other way and the illicit trade grew out of the problem. As more and more young people became addicted the demand for drugs of this kind grew and the illicit trade grew out of that demand. It is true that we are perhaps going to be very successful in cutting off the illegal sources of supply but that does not automatically cut off the demand. The demand has been created and will be there, so we are now faced with two problems, I believe.

The first problem is, what are we going to do with those people who have become addicted and can no longer get the drugs to meet the demands of their addiction? Obviously they will need some sort of special treatment, and I am wondering whether the minister has given any thought to that part of the problem and whether any research has been carried out as to what kind of treatment is necessary and how it should be provided. The second thought that came to my mind was that this problem started in a very simple way with drugs that could be acquired in a legal manner and although we are attempting, and I think we will perhaps be very successful, to eliminate the illegal sources of supply and to make it more difficult to obtain these drugs from legal sources the problem will not be entirely removed. I think it is reasonable to assume that young people who have become accustomed to this kind of addiction will experiment with other drugs which perhaps can be obtained legally.

It was my impression that this problem started first with simple aspirin and coke. I have been told that, but I do not know how valid the statement is. There are many drugs that are available over the counter without a prescription which possibly could be used as substitutes for the drugs named in this bill.

One other thought which came to my mind was whether any research had been conducted with respect to drugs that might be obtainable without a prescription which could possibly be used as substitutes for the drugs which we are now seeking to control and to eliminate, and which are being supplied from illegal sources.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief comments on this bill. First of all, I should like to say that I agree entirely with the principle of this bill. I believe that in a number of centres across this country we have had a goof ball problem among our younger people which, if allowed to go uncontrolled, would not only reach the serious proportions it has reached at this particular time but would become much more serious in areas where the problem exists now and would also spread to a number of other areas.

I suppose that before the minister introduced this bill, most of us thought the use of these barbiturates could be controlled by adding these particular drugs to the narcotics act. The explanation the minister has given is one which I appreciate, and I think we can easily understand that this problem could be better handled and better solved by having a separate bill, as the minister has done. Over the years we have heard the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) complaining about the use of goof balls in the area from which he comes as well as in other areas. It was quite evident he took a much more serious view of the problem at that time than many other people. As a result of his experience with the problem and because of his interest in young people, he persisted and we have before us today a bill which I hope will control the use of these drugs by all people, particularly by the young people.

It is felt that we shall be able to effectively control the use of these drugs by having control of importation, distribution and retail centres. It will be necessary for people in these three different branches of the drug business to keep the necessary records which the bill will demand of them. I hope that this, in some way, will control release of these drugs. I would hope too, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will receive examination in the committee when the different items will be examined, and I would hope that it would be given speedy passage through the house so that its effect will be felt across this country as soon as possible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I shall be very brief at this moment. I should like to say I am very pleased at the response of hon. members generally to the bill. As we go through the various clauses of the bill, I shall be happy to deal with the requests for information as they arise.

I would point out to the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) that he said he was pleased to see these goof balls would now be taken out of the act. Actually, this is a separate section of the same act. Our own inspectors will continue to ensure compliance with the terms of the act, and this will be done in conjunction with the R.C.M.P. It is hoped that this bill will bring a stop to such instances as were mentioned by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) when he was talking about the article in the Vancouver Sun. I emphasize that this bill makes trafficking and possession for trafficking an offence, but does not make possession of the drug itself an offence. I do not believe there is much more I need to say at this moment, Mr. Speaker.

Before I resume my seat let me say I noticed that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) asked a couple of questions concerning research. I would point out that it is felt at the moment that only these three groups of drugs listed in the schedule are the dangerous ones for this purpose. The regulations will provide that, as time goes on, if other types of drugs are found which should be under the same type of control, then this will be done.

As I say, I am very pleased indeed at the response of hon. members to the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Exports.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This clause, Mr. Chairman, of course incorporates, so far as my present question is concerned, the existing provisions of the Food and Drugs Act, together with the amendment that is provided for in line seven. The section of the act as it is, and as it is now amended, does not apply to exported products where certain conditions are complied with, namely the overprinting of the word "export".

Does the minister feel that we should be satisfied with the export of a product from Canada without requiring the same conditions in relation to that product when it is manufactured for consumption and sale in Canada?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Well, Mr. Chairman, all we are doing here is bringing in part III of the act. Under what will be section 30 of the act, as will be noted, the new words are "other than a drug defined as a controlled drug by part III". The Food and Drugs Act is going to carry on in exactly the same way except that these controlled drugs are dealt with in a separate part. There is no change whatever in the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. That is what I said in putting my question. However, my question went further than that. Why do we not require with regard to export products the same rigorous standards that we require with regard to products that are manufactured for consumption in Canada?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We require that the exported article comply with the law of the country to which it is being exported. This may conflict with our law. In the case of controlled drugs this could be a leakage.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It could be a leakage? Is that what the minister said? I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There could be a leakage from the legal manufacturer to the illicit traffic if we did not have these companies under licence. We are licensing the manufacturer and the distributor in an effort to control the manufacture and the distribution of these substances so that we shall be in a position to know where the product goes, and so that we can keep control of it or of the records.

Mr. Caron: Will manufacturers be obliged to keep records of what they have and what they sell?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes.

Mr. Howard: My question is only on a procedural point. I notice that clause 1 runs for a number of pages and that really clause 2 and clause 3 are relatively minor ones. In clause 1 there are six or seven separate sections that are proposed to be added. For the purpose of orderly discussion I wonder whether we might not proceed with discussion on the basis of the proposed sections contained within clause 1 rather than wander all over the field.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes. I should be very happy to adopt that suggestion.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we should proceed on clause 1 by calling each new section?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall section 30 in clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall section 31 in clause 1 carry?

Mr. Howard: I am sorry that this bill was not introduced yesterday. I wonder whether the minister would mind relating to the committee the definition of "possession" as contained in the Criminal Code so that we shall know what it means in respect of this bill.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We are making the Criminal Code definition of "possession" applicable in this bill. This is the same definition as that in the narcotic drugs legislation. It is a rather lengthy description. According to the Criminal Code, "possession" is defined as follows:

3. (4) For the purposes of this act,

(a) a person has anything in possession when he has it in his personal possession or knowingly

(i) has it in the actual possession or custody of another person, or

(ii) has it in any place, whether or not that place belongs to or is occupied by him, for the use or benefit of himself or of another person; and

(b) where one of two or more persons, with the knowledge and consent of the rest has anything in his custody or possession it shall be deemed to be in the custody and possession of each and all of them.

It results in uniformity.

Mr. Howard: Yes. I think perhaps the minister said that this is also the definition used in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. This answer clarifies the point I was getting at.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, section 31 of Bill No. C-99 gives the definition of "controlled drug". I will take the liberty to make a suggestion here.

We are dealing with a bill aiming to solve a problem that we think serious.

Last Saturday, I believe, the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Hicks) asked what is it that we are now calling controlled drugs, or commonly "goof balls"?

I hope the minister, in order to give this legislation all the effect we want it to have, will initiate in co-operation with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), an education compaign to make the public aware of this drug which constitutes a real problem.

I hope also that an R.C.M.P. officer will then be able to give the public all necessary information on the harmful effects of this drug.

I suggest that it is not enough merely to pass legislation; the public must be made aware of the dangers of the use of that drug.

So, I hope the minister will carry out this suggestion as soon as this bill is adopted, to organize television programs to emphasize the dangers of those drugs, as well as the control facilities provided by this legislation, and the cures.

I believe it is much easier to cure those who use these drugs than those who are addicted to ordinary drugs.

Mr. Chairman, I now close my remarks. I hope the minister will give them consideration.

(Text):

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-17, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock) I should like to thank all members of this house for their forbearance and for the privilege of moving the second reading of Bill No. S-17, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The purpose of this bill is to authorize Canadian Pacific Railway Company to construct a branch line of railway off its Brocket southerly branch in the province of Alberta to a gas-processing plant being constructed by Shell Oil Company of Canada Limited. Parliamentary authority is necessary because the power of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to authorize the construction of branch lines under the Railway Act, section 183, is limited to lines not exceeding six miles in length.

The length of this particular branch line is 10.8 miles, and it will start about 1.5 miles north of Drywood which is the present site of the British American Oil Company plant south and east of Pincher Creek, about 17 miles.

To those who are not familiar with the area, let me say that the new Shell plant which is contemplated and on which construction has started is approximately 14 miles south of Pincher Creek and eight to ten miles west of the present British American Oil Company plant. This British American Oil Company plant supplies the methane gas which to a large extent is transported by Trans-Canada Pipe Line to Ontario to warm Ontario homes. In other words, this is the area from which the gas going to Ontario, or a large part of it, originates. This new Shell Oil plant will also be processing various types of hydrocarbons, and for the benefit of those who are not altogether familiar with the petrochemical industry, allow me to spend a moment or two dealing with the chemical products which are derived from natural gas. Let me say first of all that if you take the total gas produced in the province of Alberta, about 10 per cent is dry natural gas or methane. It comes out of the ground that way. Ninety per cent is wet natural gas and this has to go through a scrubbing plant and be processed. In that processing, methane is taken off, and it is methane which is put through the pipe line to Ontario. This is the gas which goes into our homes as fuel.

Then there is ethane, propane, butane and hydrogen sulphide, just to give hon. members some idea of the end-products which are derived from these gases. Take methane, for example. From methane are produced rubber additives, carbon black, nitrogen fertilizer, antifreeze, plastics, synthetic fibres such as dynel and orlon, explosives, soil conditioners and so on.

Let us look at some of the end-products of ethane. There is first of all, polyethylene plastic, so important to the building trade, synthetic fibres such as dacron, synthetic rubber and detergents, antifreeze and so on.

Now we come to propane. The end-products derived from propane include explosives such as t.n.t., synthetic detergents, films for cameras and for the motion picture industry, lacquers, and so forth. Turning now to butane we have synthetic rubber, nylon, oil additives, synthetic resins and so forth. Lastly, just to touch on some of the products derived from hydrogen sulphide may I say that this new Shell plant which is to be built will produce in the neighbourhood of 1,000 tons per day of sulphur. This is equivalent to about 17 carloads of 60 tons per car, or roughly a small 17-car trainload of sulphur a day. In addition, this plant will produce 350 tons of liquid gases which will be transported largely by pipe line. This petrochemical plant and the hydrocarbons which are produced there will provide a raw material source for over 10,000 end-products. I wanted to mention these few things about the petrochemical industry in the west to indicate the necessity for the construction of a railroad line to serve this particular plant. I might add that about 23 per cent of our sulphur requirements are produced in Canada. One petrochemical plant at Medicine Hat uses 135 tons of sulphur a day to make sulphuric acid and, finally, to produce fertilizers with an ammonium base.

This railroad spur line 10.8 miles long is needed to operate the Shell plant economically. Transportation by highway is not practicable because during the winter in that part of the country the snow is deep, and in the spring when the frost is coming out of the ground there is a tendency for roads to heave. There would be a considerable loss of time in consequence and, in addition, any road which might be expected to stand up to the heavy traffic would be very expensive to construct and maintain. The railroad will help the C.P.R. to produce revenue and it will help the Shell Oil Company of Canada by providing transportation for its products and also in getting building material on to the site to build the plant. The Canadian Pacific Railroad has right of way options already completed. The Shell company has sufficient raw material to last approximately 50 years. Considerable employment will be provided by the building of this line, and it will be available as soon as this house can pass the present measure which is the green light needed for the company to go ahead with construction work.

I want to say one word about the urgency of getting this railroad under construction. There is nothing controversial about the bill, but it has been delayed and delayed by the procedures of this house. What is happening is that these people who have only a short period in the summer in which to construct this railroad are being denied the full opportunity to take advantage of the open season of the year during which construction can go forward. Delays in the house are holding it up.

Mr. McIlraith: There were no delays.

Mr. Kindt: I may say it is not the fault of the C.P.R. that this bill is delayed in reaching the floor of this house. Let me clarify that situation. The energy board which was set up by the parliament of Canada and which has done an excellent job in determining the export of gas had to go through all its processes of deciding whether or not the gas could be exported. This had to be done before the Shell oil company could decide to build a plant south of Pincher Creek. The Shell company had to obtain a decision from the energy board before they could set up plans for this $20 million plant south of Pincher Creek. How could the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any other group, come before this house making an application for the passage of a bill authorizing the building of a railway line in this respect until the Shell oil company had made its decision? If you follow my line of reasoning, you will see that the C.P.R. was held up by the decision of the Shell oil company and that the Shell oil company was held up by the decision of the national energy board. The national energy board, of course is an agent of the government of Canada and although I do not wish to attach blame to anyone I certainly feel that neither the C.P.R. nor the Shell oil company is to blame for any delay.

All I am suggesting is that we have here a bill that is urgent, and which should be passed immediately, but which has been held up for three weeks to a month by the procedures of this house. Since this bill is not controversial, I hope that this house will deal with it expeditiously. If the project involved the construction of only six miles of line, construction could have proceeded under the authorization contained in section 183 of the Railway Act. All that is involved here is the construction of a 10.8 mile spur to be built by the Canadian Pacific Railway under the authorization of the board of transport commissioners. The construction of this line cannot begin until this bill receives third reading. I should hope that this house, with its usual sound judgment, will expedite the passage of this bill, which I am sure will be appreciated.

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, we in this group are very interested in this bill and can assure the member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt) that we have no desire whatever to hold it up.

I should like to thank the hon. member for Macleod for the information he gave this afternoon. It has been of particular value to those members who represent ridings in eastern Canada. We are always interested in receiving information in respect of the production of gas in the Alberta region, and the information given in this regard by that hon. member has certainly underlined the sense of urgency which he has indicated.

I was somewhat concerned regarding his meaning when he said that it was delayed by the procedure of this house. I understand the bill was introduced in the other place on April 27, and has progressed at a speed which I imagine is normal. Perhaps the hon. member for Macleod would indicate further what he meant by the delays he suggests have taken place.

The purpose of this bill is quite clear. It is simply to construct an 11 mile spur line from a C.P.R. spur line, which already exists, from a gas well property of the British American Oil Company to the Shell Oil Company. We are very interested in this project because it involves a railway line leading to a field of natural resuorce in this nation. As will be appreciated, we in this group are very interested in natural resources, and are very pleased that this line will run to a gas processing plant, and that this natural resource of Canada is to be processed in Canada by Canadians for Canadians. That is one of the reasons why we greet this particular bill with considerable enthusiasm.

We note that, unless this kind of transportation is provided, it is almost impossible to get these by-products to market. It is quite evident that road conditions in Alberta, during winter months, make highway transport impossible, and air transportation for this purpose is far too expensive. We sincerely hope this railway line will play an important part in the development of the province of Alberta.

We note also, especially after the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod, that there is a tremendous need for the by-products which this company will proceed to process as soon as the plant is built, and the railway spur constructed. It is our understanding that this company will eventually produce many thousands of tons of sulphur. We hope, moreover, that this will be a paying line.

We are about to take a new look at the whole spectrum of Canadian transportation, with special consideration regarding the national problem in respect of railway transportation. The suggestion has been put forward that railway transportation must begin to cut down, and we must concern ourselves only with trunk lines. I am sure all members of this group expect the railway companies in Canada to continue to build lines to the locations of national resources in this country, and that this will be one of the major concerns of the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as it is of the directors of the Canadian National Railways. As long as this reaching out for resources continues, we can be assured that employment opportunities will continue to increase.

The fact that this bill has reached the floor of this house indicates the complexity of our economic system, in that even the Canadian Pacific Railway, a so-called private enterprise company, must bring its plans before this house for approval. We realize, however, that the resources of this nation are being marshalled in support of this railway line, and in support of all others.

The hon. member mentioned that employment would be created through the construction of this line. We must question this statement, however, because we noted from both the speech he made this afternoon, and the explanation given previously in respect of the bill, that employment will be provided by the construction of this line for only 25 individuals, which indicates to us the extent to which machinery is replacing manpower in the construction of projects such as railway lines. However, we hope that employment will result in yet another way, as a result of the processing plant being constructed, and through the long term transportation of these materials to areas where they will be of use to the citizens of Alberta and to the nation as a whole. We hope this will provide employment in some measure, and a boost to the economic growth of our society.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up any extra time in this house, although I should like, by way of emphasis, to reiterate some of the things mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt).

The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) suggested that the construction of this line would employ only 25 men. In this regard I should like to remind him that the construction of that line represents only one stage of the project. I understand one other stage of construction will employ 100 men, and when the whole project is in operation, many more men than that will be employed. As a matter of fact, the laying of the road is to be done by contract and will provide work for approximately 25 men, but the construction of the road itself will employ 100 men for approximately six months. Of course, an additional number of men will be employed by the Shell oil company.

By way of emphasis, I should also point out the great and immediate need of the nitrochemical plant at Medicine Hat for sulphur in particular, in the production of a fertilizer with an ammonium base, as well as the immediate need in respect of those other things previously mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod. I suggest that everything that can be done to speed the passage of this bill authorizing the construction of this line should be done, particularly because of the very short season involved.

I do not have much experience in this house and certainly I am not greatly familiar with its proceedings, but I am sure there is a general feeling of co-operation in respect of the passage of this bill, for which I express my appreciation to all hon. members. I should like to join with other members in urging that this bill be dealt with, and put on its way, as quickly as possible, so that the construction of this line may commence at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word or two in regard to this bill. I am sure all hon. members appreciate very much the explanations given by the hon. members for Macleod (Mr. Kindt) and for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock) in respect of its purpose, and their emphasis regarding the need of speedily dealing with the bill. I hope I am incorrect in thinking that the hon. member for Macleod made reference, on at least one occasion, to delays caused by the proceedings of this house. If that hon. member actually used those words, I hope he did not do so in a sense of criticism of this house itself.

Mr. Kindt: May I correct the statement which the hon. member has just made. What I had reference to in the matter of delays was the fact that private bills come up only once a week. They are dealt with for one hour once a week. I was not referring to any delays on the part of any group or any individuals in this house. I was referring to the order of business under which such a bill proceeds before it can become law.

Mr. Howard: That is fine; I was sure that this is what was meant, Mr. Speaker. The bill was introduced in the house on May 5, having come over from the Senate. That was a Friday. On the following Tuesday, May 9, we dealt with a supply motion. There was a supply motion before the house which overrode the private members' hour from five to six, and it was not possible for the bill to come up at that time. This is the third private members' hour on a Tuesday that we have had since the particular bill was introduced, and there were other matters before it. I can appreciate, when only one hour is given to a discussion of those bills, that it is somewhat difficult to proceed with everything that hon. members wish to have proceeded with, and to do it within that one hour.

The request of the hon. member that we waive the rules, following second reading which require that such bills go automatically to a committee and then proceed in committee of the whole and following that give unanimous consent to third reading is a somewhat far reaching request. Perhaps it should not be done at this stage, but I think one should express objection because not much is known about the bill at the present time. I think we should express some concern about following this particular course with respect to a private bill dealing with a private company. We know the reason for the rule, Mr. Speaker. The rule which states that a private bill goes automatically to an appropriate committee is one which recognizes that private citizens who are not members of parliament and are not able to appear before parliament or before the committee of the whole, can go to one of the standing committees of the house and present their ideas to hon. members in a formal way. It would seem to me that to give consent out of hand, as it were, to waive the rules is something that would not be correct. I think it requires very careful examination. There is one way in which we might even help in that regard in getting the opinions of the railway officials themselves and perhaps of the Shell oil company. At this time I am not saying that the hon. member for Macleod did not adequately perform his function as sponsor of the bill. I think he did a commendable job and gave a thorough explanation of what would occur once this bill was passed.

The bill was referred to the Senate standing committee on transport and communications. I assume that the railway officials appeared before that committee and answered questions, as is done on other occasions with respect to other bills. They perhaps answered questions which were in the minds of the members of the Senate when the bill was given second reading. Sometimes we in this house, Mr. Speaker, look to the proceedings of the other place and of the committees of the other place for explanations and information. In this instance we are prevented from doing that because no evidence was taken down and transcribed and printed by the standing committee of the other place on transport and communications which dealt with this particular bill. I am not saying this by way of criticism of the other place or of the committees of the other place; I am merely saying that normally we might look to the proceedings there and get some explanation and some answers to some of the questions that might be in our minds. But we are not able to do this because evidence was not taken down and transcribed in the committee of the other place.

There are one or two questions in my mind which the hon. member for Macleod may be able to clear up when he closes the debate. I believe I am correct in saying that he said that about 10 per cent of the gas was dry, and I gather from this that 90 per cent of the gas in that part of the province is considered to be wet gas. I do not know whether he was talking about the whole province. I understand that by this particular legislation the Shell company will be serviced by this proposed railway spur, and the company will be processing wet gas from that general area. In this wet gas there are large quantities of sulphur, propane, butane and the like. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that when we get into the field of propane and butane we have in mind another private bill dealing with a pipe line company which is before the committee at the present time. I do not want to enter into a discussion of it because it is another subject of debate. I merely say there is a similarity between the two in that one has to do with exporting certain products and this one, as I understand it, has to do with a rail line to a plant which will be processing these wet gases and producing some useable commodities in Canada rather than exporting raw material.

I understand that the plant mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod which is to be built will have a production capacity of 1,000 tons of sulphur a day. In 1956, when we did not have sufficient production facilities, apparently, we imported some 270,000 tons of sulphur. If this Shell plant, which is to be serviced by the proposed rail spur, should produce 1,000 tons a day and operate on a seven day week basis the full 12 months of the year its total annual production would be 365,000 tons, which is a bit more than the amount we imported into Canada in 1956, and a bit more than our present consumption, judging by what we imported in 1956. At that time we had an annual consumption of about 350,000 tons of sulphur. This plant which is apparently going to produce 1,000 tons a day, will be, I gather, the largest sulphur production plant in Canada. Apparently our past production in Canada was 23 per cent of our consumption but there is nothing with which to equate 1956.

I would hope that the Shell Oil company has some contracts or other companies have options for the purchase of sulphur. If we are going to process this wet gas and produce sulphur from it in the amount of 1,000 tons per day, which on a yearly basis is more than our annual consumption and far more than our current annual production, I would hope that the sulphur will be sold and used in Canada by other manufacturers rather than being exported in its raw state, as it were, from our country to other places for other purposes as happens with other commodities we produce.

When the hon. member for Macleod closes the debate on second reading I would appreciate it very much if he would clear up the point as to just what markets Shell Oil has. I realize that this matter is something apart from the bill before us in which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company seeks permission to build 10.8 miles of rail line, but the hon. member for Macleod mentioned the Shell Oil company, its prospective production and so on and if he has that information I think it would certainly be helpful to the house.

Along the same lines, I think it would be helpful if the hon. member could indicate what existing markets Shell Oil has for the other by-products, I believe they might be called, developed in the processing of the wet gas. He mentioned the propanes and butanes that could be developed. If he has the information, I should also like the hon. member to indicate where the market is that Shell Oil has for the gas that will be produced if in fact Shell Oil is going to be the distributing firm.

I think these are all important matters in the light of our ideas and concepts with regard to the development of industry in Canada and the using of our raw materials in Canada for Canadian production and consumption. Because I think everyone in the house feels the same way, I think it is important that we understand just what Shell Oil intends to do with these products once the C.P.R. has constructed the rail line to the plant and Shell Oil is able to ship out the products. What markets will Shell Oil have? I think this is a very important question and I should like to see it cleared up in as much detail as possible before we consider whether or not we should waive the rules and proceed with the other stages of the bill in the house without referring it to a standing committee.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the committee is by itself a very simple one in that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is merely asking for authority to build a railway line approximately 11 miles in length. A bill is necessary because of the provision in the Railway Act that the authority of parliament is required for the construction of any branch railway line more than six miles in length.

But the bill is an interesting one in that it appears to be an integral part of a development in the west, one that I think should commend itself to all hon. members. I was quite sympathetic to the hon. member in his request, as I understood him, that the house concur in moving the bill forward through all stages today and if he wishes to put that proposition to the house in a formal way at a later stage I for my part am quite agreeable to such a suggestion.

I took the trouble to try to inform myself as best I could with respect to the development that will be consequential upon the C.P.R. being granted authority to build this branch line and upon the completion of the line, and while this matter may not be strictly relevant to the discussion of whether or not the bill should be approved it certainly is interesting. We have here a recently discovered natural resource in this country where the proven reserves of gas are estimated to be sufficient to supply the needs of the company proposing to develop them for 50 years at the contemplated rate of development. We have the assurance that the company proposes to commence development immediately the railway line is built.

It seems to me that all in all this is exactly what is needed at this time when all hon. members are concerned about the necessity of developing our country, providing employment for our manpower and using our resources in such a way that we will terminate the existing unemployment. Therefore this development is wholly desirable. I content myself simply by indicating concurrence in the bill on my own behalf and on behalf of those immediately around me.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member for Macleod speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (MacLeod): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank hon. members who have spoken to the bill for their sympathetic understanding of the situation in which we find ourselves. I was particularly interested in the questions asked by the hon. member for Skeena concerning wet gas and dry gas. I mentioned that 10 per cent of the gas in the province of Alberta generally was dry gas, but in the field south of Pincher Creek where the Shell plant is located, it is 100 per cent wet gas and the gas processed there will be wet gas.

As to the markets for sulphur, let me say that sulphur is exported to world markets through the bulk loading facilities at Vancouver to some extent. It is shipped to Italy and other countries of the world where it is one of the principal ingredients in the production of synthetic fibres. In other words, it is impossible to produce synthetic fibres without the use of sulphuric acid. A great deal of sulphur is shipped into the Canadian shield region of our north country where sulphuric acid is needed to separate certain minerals from the rock formation. It is also used, as I have mentioned, in the production of ammonium-base fertilizer at the plant at Medicine Hat. It is also shipped to other parts of the world where there are other fertilizer plants. It is used in the production of storage batteries.

We are dealing with an extremely complicated situation in that most of the various products to be shipped such as ethane, propane, butane and hydrogen sulphide, when in the form of liquid gases, are shipped by pipe line.

Now, these gases are a drug on the market. It is difficult to get rid of them. It is felt that there is a market in the United States for some. We have an abundant supply. In fact, we have such a supply of these particular by-products that it is impossible to utilize them in Canada for petrochemical purposes. In other words, if we were to set up petrochemical plants we would have an untold number of years ahead of us of utilization of these by-products. In addition, these by-products which I have mentioned, ethane, propane and butane as well as certain other hydrocarbons, can be obtained from the petroleum industry. They can also be obtained from coal, and we have over seven per cent of the coal supply of the world in southwestern Alberta.

What I wish to emphasize is that these particular hydrocarbons are in surplus supply. They are usually conveyed to market by pipe line, and the Aurora pipe line was one of the means by which it was hoped a certain amount of them would be transported across the line. I am not going to get into a discussion of Aurora pipe line. I want to avoid that. But I do want to say, in so far as the market situation is concerned, that where there is such an abundant supply, the practice in the industry is to apply to the conservation board of the province of Alberta to have certain of the gases flared. We do not want that if we can possibly find markets. Let us therefore find markets and utilize these products.

In closing the debate, I should like to urge upon you the thought that there is a precedent for this particular bill. I should like to see it given passage here today. I have already impressed upon hon. members the urgency of moving the bill through the house as quickly as possible. The bill has been cleared by the Senate and we have a record of the evidence given there. I have tried to give hon. members every bit of detail. There is nothing to cover up, there is nothing to hide. The bill relates simply to the construction of 10.8 miles of a branch line off another branch line to allow this company to go ahead with its plans. There is no great, deep principle involved, simply common, ordinary horse sense in order to get this project under way and to get things moving in that part of the country.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I understand that a few years ago the British-American Oil Company received consideration similar to that which I am going to request. I should like to move that, notwithstanding standing order 105, unanimous consent be given to referring this Bill No. S-17, to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will require unanimous consent before such a motion can be entertained. Standing order 105 requires that every private bill, when read a second time, be referred to one of the standing committees. This particular bill would be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Standing order 102 reads:

> No motion for the suspension or modification of any provision of part II of the standing orders applying to private bills or to petitions for private bills shall be entertained by the house until after reference is made to the committee on standing orders, or to one of the committees charged with the consideration of private bills,—

There are, therefore, two standing orders standing in the way of the motion. However, as everyone knows, the house is master of its own procedure. If unanimous consent were given to the hon. member to move the appropriate motion, then the bill could be advanced.

The question is whether the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt) has unanimous consent of the house to move the suspension of the two standing orders in question in order to advance this bill to committee of the whole house.

Mr. Howard: Before it is agreed, I think it should be clearly understood this is in no way to be considered as any sort of precedent of which advantage can be taken in future proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the hon. member is consenting, subject to this caveat.

Is it agreed that the hon. member has unanimous consent to move this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps an appropriate motion would be as follows:

> Mr. Kindt, seconded by Mr. Gundlock, moves that the said bill be considered forthwith in committee of the whole house.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Line of railway authorized.

Mr. Herridge: I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill. I listened with great interest to the eloquent appeal for the building of 11 miles of steel. I want to come back to the railroad now. Will this 11 miles of siding, as it is called, serve other shippers if it should happen that other natural resources are discovered or agricultural products are available for shipment? Will this railroad be a public utility, in other words? Or will it only be a siding? There is a difference between the two in so far as restrictions are concerned. Will there be any passenger service on this approximately 11 miles of railroad? Have easements been obtained and settled with all those persons whose land this railway crosses and have the crossings of rights of way been sanctioned by the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Kindt: With regard to the last question, I understand that the crossings have been cleared with the municipalities and with the board of transport commissioners as well as with the provincial highways department. In so far as the highway south of Pincher Creek is concerned, there is to be an overhead bridge and not a level crossing.

With reference to passenger service on the line, I may say it is only a spur line. I understand that there was a passenger train run down there on an excursion trip carrying a number of the officials of the B-A plant. Perhaps a similar use will be made of the railroad from time to time. I do not believe that passenger service up to Brocket would be a matter for consideration.

In so far as the public utility aspect is concerned, I can assure the hon. member after discussion with the Canadian Pacific Railway officials that if they can make a dollar out of transporting any products over that line they are going to do so.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Time for completion.

Mr. Herridge: Can the hon. member explain the reason for this clause? It says:

> If the construction of the said line of railway is not commenced within a period of two years or is not completed and put in operation within a period of five years after the passing of this act, the powers of construction hereby conferred upon the company shall cease and be null and void as regards so much of the said line of railway as shall then remain uncompleted.

Why is that clause included? It seems rather unusual.

Mr. Kindt: That is the standard clause that is put in all bills of this type coming before parliament. While that clause is put in there, the only thing it amounts to is this. The C.P.R. has the intention of getting this railroad built this summer or before the snow flies this fall. But this is one of the clauses that are put in bills of this type, as will be seen by the hon. member if he looks at other bills. That is standard procedure.

Mr. Howard: I understood the hon. member to say that this is the standard clause that goes into any bill of this nature for the building of a railway line. But is this so with regard to all lengths of line? Suppose the proposed railway line were intended to take 10 years to construct. Are the times different?

Mr. Kindt: It is possible that those drafting the bill might vary the time mentioned in this clause to fit the circumstances. But as I have said this is a 10.8 mile railroad spur line and it is to be built very soon. I checked with the board of transport commissioners on the point raised by the hon. member and the answer they gave me is what I have transmitted to the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Clause agreed to.

[Mr. Kindt.]

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: Now, by unanimous consent.

Mr. Kindt moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL MORTGAGE CORPORATION OF CANADA

On the order:

> Second reading of Bill S-16, an act to incorporate National Mortgage Corporation of Canada.—Mr. Morton.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, a number of hon. members have asked that they have the opportunity to discuss this bill and have indicated that they would like me to ask that it stand with the consent of the government so that we would have a full hour at the next period at which these bills come up for consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this item stand at the request of the government?

Mr. Churchill: Agreed.

Order stands.

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-2, to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company—Mr. Woolliams—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Howard: This is one of those bills that you lose track of once in a while because other proceedings intervene. Questions are raised and some two or three weeks later you get an opportunity to see whether or not the particular questions have been answered. At an earlier stage in the discussion of this particular bill I raised a number of points which have not yet been clarified, to my mind. I think they should be clarified and explained and that adequate information should be given before we proceed further with this bill.

There has been a great deal of discussion about the ownership of this company and letters have been written by Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited officials about the ownership of this company and the distribution of the shares as between Canadian citizens and non-Canadian citizens. The question is what is Continental Oil's position with respect to its ownership of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas. It will be recalled that Continental Oil is a United States company and that it holds, or at least did so at the time this matter was discussed earlier—there may have been some slight change since that time—67.77 per cent of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company. Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas submitted some information with respect to Canadian ownership which, if I recall it correctly, amounted to some 2.96 per cent; I refer to individual Canadian ownership in Hudson's Bay. What I should very much like to know is this. I should like to have some confirmation of it from Continental Oil or from someone who can obtain the information from them or from Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company. Has any information been given to that company by its parent owner? As to Continental Oil which now owns 67.77 per cent of Hudson's Bay which owns Aurora Pipe Line Company which is seeking permission to build this pipe line under the bill, is it the intention of Continental Oil to dispose of its ownership of these shares or its percentage of shares in Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company? If we can get some information with regard to that matter, I think it may help a great deal in resolving this question of foreign ownership of a company which will own Aurora or Canadian ownership.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that it is six o'clock.

Mr. Howard: So soon?

Progress reported.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF BARBITURATES

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-99, to amend the Food and Drugs Act—Mr. Monteith (Perth)—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

On clause 1—Exports.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister what his reaction is to the suggestion that in section 31(c) after the word "import" should be added—I am suggesting for the purpose of argument—the word "export".

Mr. Drysdale: While the minister is considering that point I thought he might wish to examine at the same time the relevant position of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act which deals in great detail with the definition of traffic and trafficking. I was wondering why that definition was not incorporated into the Food and Drugs Act because as the hon. member for Essex East has pointed out, the word "export" has been omitted from this clause. I presume that is because these barbiturates are not manufactured in Canada at the present time. However, I think we might reach the stage where they could be manufactured here. I also was wondering why the word "distribution" which is also contained in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act was not included. I thought the very wide definition of traffic and trafficking would be invaluable, besides presenting a degree of legislative uniformity.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I do not think I would have any objection to the word "export" being added there, but I do not believe we need go beyond that at this stage, because this is a new clause dealing with a product which is not a narcotic. A narcotic is a different substance. Under the narcotics act possession is, of course, an offence, whereas it is not an offence under section 3 of the Food and Drugs Act covering so-called goof balls or controlled drugs. The present definition would seem to me to meet the situation and I do not think we need go beyond it. I have not got the definition provided in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act before me with respect to trafficking, but I feel that this one will suffice.

Mr. Drysdale: The definition in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act reads:

> Traffic or trafficking means the importation, exportation, manufacture, sale, giving, administering, transportation, delivery or distribution by any person of a drug or any substance represented or held out by such person to be a drug, or the making of any offer in respect thereof, but does not include
> (i) the importation or exportation of any drug by or on behalf of any person who has a licence therefor under section 3, or
> (ii) the manufacture, sale, giving, administering, transportation, delivery or distribution of a drug, or the making of any offer in respect thereof, by or on behalf of any person who has a licence therefor under section 3, or by or on behalf of a physician, dentist, veterinary surgeon or retail druggist for a medicinal purpose.

I should think the delivery aspect is one of great importance and I agree with the hon. member for Essex East that the word "export" should be included in the section.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think the hon. member has been looking at the old act. There was a new bill introduced today entitled "an act to provide for the control of narcotic drugs". I think if the hon. member examines that he will find that the definition is more or less that which is used in the proposed new act. As far as the inclusion of the word "export" is concerned, there is no reason why this should not be done. The reason it is included in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act is because of the international consequences which might arise. At the moment this international situation has not arisen as far as controlled drugs are concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister move accordingly?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I will ask my colleague the Solicitor General to move that the word "export" be added after the word "sell" in line 21.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I so move.

Mr. Drysdale: I now have Bill No. C-100 before me. I did not have it when I made my earlier remarks. There, the definition of "traffic" reads:

To manufacture, sell, give, administer, transport, deliver or distribute.

I do not believe the word "distribute" is included in the definition we are at present considering. My only desire, Mr. Chairman, is to reflect the concern we feel in British Columbia where the narcotics problem is an extremely serious one. I wish to make sure that all the loopholes in the act are blocked.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I certainly appreciate the hon. member's concern in this respect, and know he is fully aware of the situation in British Columbia. Perhaps I should give him the definition of the word "sell", as it appears in the Food and Drugs Act, of which this is a part. The word "sell" is described there as including "sell, offer for sale, expose for sale, be in possession for sale, and distribute."

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That covers it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Is it the committee's wish that I now put the proposed amendment to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): The hon. member for St. John's West moves:

That section 31 (c) of clause 1 of Bill No. C-99 be amended by inserting after the word "sell" in line 21, the word "export".

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Is section 32 of clause 1 agreed to?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise two points in respect of this section, one in the form of a question, and the other as an expression of opinion. I understand that the ten years' sentence provided upon conviction on indictment is not an automatic sentence?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Oh, no, that is the maximum sentence.

Mr. Howard: I understand in addition to a jail sentence there can be a fine?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The Criminal Code provides that it is within the court's discretion to provide both a term of imprisonment and a fine.

Mr. Howard: The other point I wish to raise has to do with a program to be carried out in respect of Bill No. C-100, a copy of which I have not as yet been able to obtain. I understand that the program, as provided by that bill, has regard to the treatment and segregation of addicts and traffickers in narcotic drugs. I should like to suggest at this time, while we are dealing with this bill in respect of the addiction and trafficking in barbiturates, that a similar approach be taken to individuals convicted under the law, as it will be when this bill becomes legislation. It is my understanding that an individual can become addicted to barbiturates and suffer the same withdrawal symptoms, with the same physical and mental state, as individuals who are addicted to opium and heroin. If that is the case, it seems to me that similar steps should be taken to ensure that individuals who are addicted to this controlled class of drugs are also subjected to the same treatment and segregation program that is proposed to be provided in respect of those individuals addicted to opium and heroin, and their derivatives. I wonder whether the minister could indicate to this committee whether a similar program is anticipated under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There is no provision for specific treatment provided under this bill. The hon. member is entirely right in that respect. This is a new venture and we do not feel there is the need for specific separated treatment in this regard. It is my understanding that the addiction involved in respect of these controlled drugs is not of the same type or degree as in the case of opium or heroin. It has not been felt at this stage that we should provide such specific treatment.

As the hon. member is no doubt aware, there is a new bill—I refer to Bill No. C-100—in respect of narcotic control, and I think we are heartily in accord with the treatment steps in it. However, in regard to the bill presently before the committee, I feel we should acquire some experience in this regard, so that we will then have a better appreciation of what is required before taking that step.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this aspect of the problem is of great interest. I had a thought similar to that of the hon. member for Skeena, but suspected the situation might be as the minister has indicated. The minister should not misunderstand me. This is a highly technical aspect of the problem. The minister has at his disposal very well informed professional individuals. I would be very interested in knowing if it is their judgment that the degree of addiction is, as he said, not the same, and that there is no experience which suggests that victims of controlled drugs can be treated in the way in which it is proposed to treat drug addicts, in institutions like the one at Lexington, Kentucky. Is the minister in a position to say whether in Lexington they do or do not treat victims of addiction to controlled drugs, or are only narcotic addicts being treated there? I have the impression there has been a change in that regard, and that the officials of that institution are now attempting to treat, in an experimental way, individuals who are addicted to these so-called controlled drugs. If that is the situation, and as we are about to embark upon a different experimental measure, seeking to provide rehabilitation through detention and hospitalization, it seems to me that, if what is being attempted in Lexington is of any value, we ought to do the same.

Am I right in saying that in California, in the last year or so, there has been created a new institution in an attempt to deal with addicts to controlled drugs, or barbiturates? I am not sure about that suggestion, but it seems that I have read something quite recently in that regard. However, I shall be guided by the minister's final statement on this matter, and I do think the point raised by the hon. member for Skeena is one that we should explore.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two comments in regard to this particular section, dealing with the trafficking of barbiturates, which I consider is perhaps the most nefarious aspect of the whole problem of the illegal use of narcotics. It is my understanding that the trafficker is invariably an individual who does not use the drug himself, but passes it on to other people. It is also my understanding that there is a tendency for younger people to experiment with the use of these barbiturates and narcotic drugs.

The thing that concerns me about this particular clause is the punishment. On summary conviction the term of imprisonment is 18 months. Under indictment the term of imprisonment may be 10 years. Under the present Opium and Narcotic Drug Act imprisonment is for a term not exceeding 14 years for trafficking, and there is also a provision for whipping. Under the new Bill No. C-100 a person who is guilty of trafficking is liable to be imprisoned for life. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we should give very serious consideration to incorporating this more extensive term in this particular clause because I think the experience of the law enforcing agencies has been that the stiffer the term the more likelihood there is that the people who are in this particular business will get out of it.

I think this has been the experience in the United States, particularly with Mafia, which was extremely well organized in the narcotic aspect of the business. As the sentences toughened up this very well organized group tended to get out of the business. With these goof balls which can be added to soft drinks as well as alcohol to produce the effect desired I think there is perhaps even a more serious situation than we have in narcotics. Could the minister indicate the reasoning behind the length of the sentence indicated in this legislation and would he consider making it uniform with the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act and provide imprisonment for life?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Before the minister replies I wonder whether the committee would give unanimous consent to improving a slight discrepancy or possibly making an improvement in the wording of the amendment to section 31, which was carried a short time ago? The effect of the amendment was to add to paragraph (c) the word "export" following the word "sell". This would mean that the paragraph would then read:

(c) "traffic" means to manufacture, sell, export, import into Canada—

And so on. The suggestion that I am offering to the committee is that we might add the words "from, or" after the word "export". The paragraph would then read:

(c) "traffic" means to manufacture, sell, export from, or import into Canada, transport or deliver, otherwise—

And so on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Agreed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): May I have the permission of the hon. member for St. John's West to add these words to the amendment?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, Mr. Chairman. Thank you very much for pointing it out.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Is it unanimously agreed that the amendment which has been carried to section 31 shall have the words "from, or" added to it?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): The paragraph will now read:

(c) "traffic" means to manufacture, sell, export from, or import into Canada, transport or deliver, otherwise than under the authority of this part or the regulations.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member for Essex East mentioned possible experiments conducted at Lexington. This is so, so far as barbiturates are concerned. They are individual experiments.

While we are not actually discussing Bill No. C-100, it is realized that in that bill there is provision for special treatment. We feel that this is a new venture, a new step, and that in the case of barbiturates or controlled drugs the situation is not as serious at the moment. We certainly will continue to study it, and if there is a need in the future to provide specific treatment, a specialized sort of treatment, we shall certainly be very pleased to act.

I should like to point out that actually we are dealing with and making punishable only trafficking and possession for the purposes of trafficking. It is not actually possession that we are dealing with; it is just those two things, trafficking or possession for trafficking purposes. This is to quite a degree at the moment being done on the advice of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and their advice, of course, is given after having had considerable experience and making quite a study of the matter over the last several months.

The hon. member for Essex East also mentioned something that was going on in California. I am afraid that at the moment I am unaware of what this might be, but I would mention that in California they have had an experiment concerning free drugs to addicts.

With respect to the comments of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, here again I would point out that we are acting on the advice of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We do not feel that those penalties should be as severe as they are under the new suggested narcotic control act. First of all, we do not believe for a moment that the courts would impose the type of sentence included in Bill No. C-100 in cases under this particular bill. We realize that it is a serious problem. We are taking a new step to try to deal with it and we hope we can deal with it. If further steps have to be taken then, of course, we shall take them.

Mr. Howard: Before I proceed with my main remarks, may I ask the minister whether the drug known as marijuana is included in the schedule to the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, it is.

Mr. Howard: I think it will be discovered, or it is probably well known in medical circles anyway, that marijuana is not an addictive drug. It certainly produces a euphoric effect similar to other narcotic drugs. It is an addictive one as we think of the other narcotic drugs as being addictive, and yet a person convicted under the other act for possession, for argument's sake, of marijuana would be liable to be sentenced to a term and the like as would a person convicted for possession of morphine. I just merely say this in opposition, as it were, to the reasoning of the minister with respect to barbiturate addicts when he said that this is not as serious as a person being addicted to other narcotic drugs. As far as marijuana is concerned, it could be far more serious and far more damaging to the individual, according to medical opinion.

Another point which must be considered is that one of the ways in which younger people come in contact with narcotic drugs—and a similar situation will develop with respect to barbiturates or controlled drugs—is that a younger person who has no previous association with narcotics or narcotic addiction may be sentenced for some other offence to a penitentiary or a provincial jail. While there, because of the lack of segregation, he comes into contact with narcotic addicts. The general day to day discussion among narcotic addicts in penitentiary is pointed toward that day when they can get out and get down town and get their first fix, as they call it, or a shot of morphine, or whatever they can get. With many narcotic addicts their sole thought is to get out of prison in order to make use of narcotics again. The process of day-to-day talk and discussion does raise the idea in the minds of younger people that there must be something delightful about the use of narcotics to make these addicts so enamoured of them that this is the first thing they are going to do when they get out. From association in prison with addicts or people who know about narcotics younger people do have a tendency to some extent to try narcotics themselves when they get out of prison if they circulate in the same walk of life.

The same thing will be true with respect to association with barbituric addicts by younger people who are not addicts. Even though this is initial legislation in this field, unless the minister is willing at this time to place barbituric addicts or traffickers in the same class as narcotic addicts so far as treatment and segregation are concerned, I am very much afraid that we will have a growing problem and a few years from now the minister or another minister will come back again and say that something has got to be done with regard to the treatment of persons using barbiturates. I am quite sure that is what is going to occur.

To my mind it would be much better to have some foresight in regard to the treatment of barbituric addicts and to establish facilities so that individuals can be segregated and treated. The type of treatment may vary. Quite frankly, I think all the psychiatrists in the world will not be of much help to a narcotic addict if the addict desires to use narcotics unless he may be unhappy with his present situation and realizes it is resulting in more difficulty for him than happiness. While we are at the job of establishing machinery for the treatment of narcotic addiction I think we should also establish facilities at the same time for the treatment of barbituric addicts. It may be that the type of treatment will be different and that medical treatment of some kind will be of advantage. It may be some other form of treatment, but at least we should establish facilities for the treatment of barbituric addicts in such a way that they will be segregated from prison inmates convicted of other crimes.

The minister says that he wants to try out this legislation to see how it works but with all due respect I think he will agree without hesitation that it is far better to have some machinery in existence that can be used to overcome a problem which may arise with regard to barbituric addicts than it is to wait until the problem does arise and then say that something must be done after the problem has become greater than it is now.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I might say a few words in reply to the statements by the hon. member for Skeena. First of all, while marijuana is in the schedule of the new narcotic control legislation it is regarded internationally as a narcotic and the controlled drugs with which we are dealing in this bill are not. I think it might be pointed out that in our humble opinion this is the most forward step we know of that has been taken in this respect in any country.

In this bill we are not dealing with addicts who use barbiturates or amphetamines or other controlled drugs. We are dealing primarily with the trafficker and those found in possession for trafficking purposes. On the basis of the best advice we have been able to obtain it is our feeling that we should develop the control of these drugs and licence all those who handle them with a view to stopping the illicit trade in them. We are also certainly far from convinced that this problem is as serious as narcotic addiction. We are convinced it is not as serious. I am afraid I cannot go along with the hon. member at this stage. After all, narcotic addiction and its serious consequences have been well known for many, many years and the amendment being brought forward in Bill No. C-100 represents actually the first time that this type of approach has been taken toward treatment. In our humble estimation barbiturates do not represent as serious a problem and consequently I am afraid we will have to leave what the hon. member has suggested for another time.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly, the new section 32 covers two types of infractions. The first is trafficking and the second is possession for the purpose of trafficking. If that is so, it means that if a man is caught by the police in possession of a controlled drug such a case is not covered under the new section 32. Am I right in my assumption?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If a man is in possession—

Mr. Deschatelets: I mean sole possession without any idea of trafficking.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Oh, no, it is not covered. We are not after the users of barbiturates or amphetamines at the moment. These are household drugs in every sense of the word and in most houses practically every medicine cabinet contains some drug of this type. We are not dealing with these people. What we are after is the trafficker in controlled drugs or those found guilty of possession for purposes of trafficking.

Mr. Deschatelets: If that is so, would the minister not agree that in the enforcement of the narcotics act with regard to the use of heroin, for example, we are in the main controlling the users because it is not very often we are able to catch the trafficker. If the question of controlled drugs is serious enough to warrant an amendment to the Food and Drugs Act, I think there should be a clause in the bill to cover the person who is in possession even if such possession were only punished by a nominal fine. I think that enforcement would be much easier if that were done.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am afraid I cannot agree with the hon. member. As I mentioned earlier, these drugs are in common everyday use on doctor's prescriptions in practically every household. For argument's sake, let us say that an epileptic is out on the street and has a drug of this type in his pocket which he finds it necessary to use upon certain occasions. We do not feel that at this stage we can possibly include straight possession as an offence under the bill. If we can charge a man with possession for trafficking that, of course, is a very different matter. It is the trafficker we are after.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister to look at subsection 1 of the new section 32. Surely that is a rather anomalous situation. The section provides that no person shall traffic in a controlled drug and "controlled drug" is defined in section 31. Then subsection 1 of section 32 goes on to say, so far as trafficking is concerned:

—or any substance represented or held out by him to be a controlled drug.

It, in fact, might not be a controlled drug. Let us assume a person is selling aspirin. He says, this is a controlled drug. If he were brought to trial his only offence would have been the statement he made that this was a controlled drug. In fact, it is not a controlled drug. How then could he be found guilty of trafficking in something which is not a controlled drug, such as aspirin or a bottle of Coca-Cola? By themselves, they are not controlled drugs.

This section of the bill certainly contains a provision that would not stand up before any court. If the person were trafficking in a controlled drug he could be found guilty. If the evidence shows it is not a controlled drug, you cannot ask for a conviction.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, this phrase, "any substance represented or held out by him to be a controlled drug", may require a word of explanation. In view of the fact that this offence involves a criminal underworld transaction, it is necessary that undercover activities be employed to reveal the source of the trafficking. This provision is also contained in the narcotics legislation. It is not to be expected that honesty and fair dealing will prevail in illicit underworld trafficking. Someone may be selling sugar, but if he represents it to be a controlled drug, we feel he is part of the underworld and should be charged as such.

Mr. Bourque: I may say that we are dealing now with a well organized group of traffickers. I point out to the minister, for instance, that the head traffickers will call up a drug store, or perhaps even 12 drug stores, and order 100 aspirin tablets from each drug store, while ordering 100 tranquilizers from 12 other stores. He says, in the first place, deliver these to me at 45 Monterey street, apartment 25. He goes to the doorway of apartment 25 and waits in the entrance hall. When the boy brings the tablets, this man meets him at the door. He does not live there. He takes the 100 aspirin tablets and pays the 98 cents or $1 to the messenger. He then gets in his car and delivers the tablets to another pusher. You cannot catch him because he moves on to another place and does the same thing. He may do this 12 or 15 times in one evening. You can never catch him with the goods because he has only 100 aspirin tablets or 100 tranquilizers, and he passes them on to another fellow. This fellow goes on and distributes these pills. How are you ever going to catch the trafficker who handles goods in that way? He never has 200 pills of any kind at one time.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I do not quite understand, Mr. Chairman, what the hon. member is getting at. We are not dealing with aspirin tablets, we are dealing with the drugs outlined in the schedule which are dangerous drugs and which sometimes lead to tragic results. I do not know to what he is referring when he says that one man goes here or there with 100 aspirin tablets.

We do intend now to have all those who handle these three controlled drugs keep records and have them available for inspection. Then we may, upon inspection, determine whether or not there has been any illicit trafficking.

Mr. Bourque: I take it the minister's studies have not gone far enough because I am telling him now what occurs. Anyone knows that you do not need to make these drugs into capsules. All you need to do is mix the two together and you have a goof ball. A goof ball may lead to murder or any other offence if it contaminates any young person. These goof balls enable people to lose all sense of responsibility. If the procedure I have outlined is repeated 12 times, you could never convict a person who dealt with these drugs because he never buys all the products at the same time. If you arrest him you will find him with 100 aspirin tablets. You cannot charge a man for having 100 aspirin tablets. However, if he repeats the transaction 12 or 15 times in one day, he has accumulated enough ingredients to make 1,000 goof balls. You cannot convict him because you never find him with the goods, but only with ordinary drugs.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): First of all, may I say I am sure the hon. member realizes that tranquilizers are obtained by prescription. You cannot go into a drug store today and buy tranquilizers without a prescription. I do not want to belittle the problem. The R.C.M.P. certainly are worried about catching traffickers, and they are thinking of this problem of the addict.

I should like to reiterate what I said earlier, that tranquilizers are not the easiest thing to obtain because they are obtained on prescription.

Mr. Crestohl: When I drew the minister's attention to subsection 1, I did so in an effort to close an escape hatch. If the section were to provide that anyone found in possession of a controlled drug or ingredients which could be converted into a controlled drug, it would be much more effective than saying "any substance represented or held out to be a controlled drug". What trafficker is going to say, I am selling you aspirin or tranquilizers which, in themselves, are not controlled drugs but which I tell you are controlled drugs. You cannot convict him unless you have evidence that he represented or held them out to be controlled drugs. No trafficker is going to be so stupid as to admit that what he is selling is not a controlled drug but that he represents it to be a controlled drug.

I therefore, draw the minister's attention to the fact that this clause provides an excellent avenue of escape for anyone who is trafficking in ingredients which could be part of a goof ball, and that such language would be much more effective if it were to say a man could be found guilty if he were in possession of ingredients which could be converted into a controlled drug. I would put it this way. If I were defence counsel I would have a much more difficult time having a man acquitted if he were charged with being in possession of ingredients which could be part of a controlled drug than attempting to prove that what he was selling was not a controlled drug but that he held it out to be a controlled drug. This would be a fairly easy avenue of escape for defence counsel.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think I understand what the hon. member is trying to get at. He said that any substance could be represented or held out by him to be a controlled drug. As we see this situation, the action will involve underworld characters or they would not be representing themselves to be a pusher or a trafficker, whatever they are called. As a consequence, if he sells something, completes a transaction with a buyer and is found to do this and is charged, he can be charged and found guilty even though the article he has sold is not an actual controlled drug but only was represented by him to be so. In other words, no buyer would buy a capsule, or however these things come, from a trafficker unless it had been represented by the trafficker to be a controlled drug. That is only sensible to me.

Mr. Crestohl: It would be a straight misrepresentation.

Mr. Howard: I realize that this is perhaps a bit out of order, although I think there is a connection and we have made reference to it previously. In the schedule to Bill No. C-100 there are some 90 substances which I understand fall into a prohibited class and are classified as narcotics. Can the minister tell us how many of these are not addictive?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am afraid that I cannot get into a detailed discussion of Bill No. C-100. That is another bill. In the schedule to Bill C-99 we have three drugs which we are now calling controlled drugs for the purposes of this bill. There are these three, as I have indicated. Incidentally, I presume we would be coming to that section of the bill later on. However, there are these three particular drugs and the salts and derivatives of them. For instance, I have a list of several things that might be considered to be in the barbiturate group. There is verinol, nytol, luminol.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are they in the narcotic drug act?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No; these are barbiturates.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Skeena is asking about those 100 substances that are in the narcotic drug act and that might be in the category of marijuana.

Mr. Howard: Or having the same effect; that is, being classified as non-addictive.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am told that under Bill C-100, to provide for the control of the narcotic drug act these are synthetic drugs which can only be named as such. The three in the schedule to Bill No. C-99 have many derivatives and salts from these family groups. As I say, there are many trade names which different companies call them in the barbiturate group. Different companies call their products by different names. Ciba has a product in the barbiturate group. There is nembutal for Abbott Laboratories, seconal for Eli Lilly and Company, and so on. These are trade names primarily. There are only these three family groups and then there are the salts and derivatives.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I should ask the question again. How many of the approximately 90 drugs—and I use the round figure—listed in the schedule to Bill No. C-100 are of the type of drugs that fall into the same class as marijuana which I said was non-addictive and as to which, as the minister said, "yes, even though it is non-addictive it is internationally known"? How many of these are considered to be non-addictive type of drugs similar to marijuana?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Actually I think we are quite out of order because we are discussing another bill. However, I should like to point out that all the items on the schedule to Bill No. C-100 are under international control or jurisdiction.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Shall section 32 carry?

Mr. Howard: Before it carries may I say this. It seems strange to me—and I am thinking about the argument of the minister—that it is not necessary to engage in or establish any treatment facilities and the like because these controlled drugs under Bill No. C-99 are not considered to be as serious, yet they are serious enough that we are thinking in terms of a 10 year sentence plus a fine and on failure to pay the fine perhaps another five years maximum. We are therefore thinking in terms of a maximum 15 years in prison for a person trafficking in what is considered to be a drug which is not very serious. In his remarks the minister also made reference to the R.C.M.P. being worried about this matter and said that these are dangerous drugs with tragic results and so on. It seems to me that the minister's comments and expressions and the remedies sought in the bill do not equate with his argument that it is not a serious drug and that it is not a serious matter.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I presume that is a matter of opinion. I tried to explain our position on this matter earlier. We feel that we are going far enough in this bill. As I said earlier, this is the most forward looking legislation, of this type, of any country in the world to our knowledge. We think it is a step in the right direction. If, of course, as time goes on, we find that further steps must be taken we shall be very happy to consider them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have listened to this discussion between the hon. member for Skeena and the Minister of National Health and Welfare with sympathetic interest. From the point of view of logic, I think that what has been said by the hon. member for Skeena is incontestable. It may be that the minister has not fully understood the point of view expressed by the hon. member for Skeena and on that account there has been this malentente. Perhaps the misunderstanding is not only on the side of the minister, because the minister has something on his side in that these treatment centres for addicts have not been proven to be wholly without their defects.

Mr. Howard: It is not my assumption.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, I said that the assumption that they have proven to be fully successful is quite erroneous. They are still very much in the experimental stage. The difficulties that attend the administration of just one—I refer to the one in Lexington—are so great, I am sure, as to have caused the greatest consideration before adopting them in this country. Yet I think adopting the technique and the experiment is well worth while because it is only by trying that one really ascertains whether or not the experiment is valuable. Undoubtedly in many instances constructive results flow. But, it would seem to me that the minister is on sound ground in this sense in saying that since there is some doubt about the all inclusive character of the experiment that is resorted to for the treatment of drug addicts, and as this is a pioneer measure, one should not be expected to do something which is not going to yield, according to the best human standards, substantial and desirable results. I think the way to answer that question would be for the minister to explain to the committee, and the answer is certainly not clear to me, what is the result of treatment in the case of an addict who suffers from the use of controlled drugs. We have a general idea of what is the result in terms of effect in the case of those who suffer from the use of drugs. But what kind of treatment can be provided to a person who is a victim of a barbiturate? Is it not something which is in control of the physician? Is it not something that has the same deep habit formation quality? If the minister can give us some definite information in this regard, I think he might go a long way in meeting the concern of the hon. member for Skeena. Since this is a technical problem, I hope the minister will not misunderstand me if I say I wonder why he does not have sitting at the table in front of him in addition to eminent counsel, those in his department who have special technical knowledge in this matter.

Mr. Drysdale: Before the minister answers perhaps I might supplement some of the observations which have been made by the hon. member for Essex East. On quickly looking over the bill, there appears to be no provision regarding a person who is a barbiturate user and there does not appear to be any consideration given to whether or not a person engaged in trafficking is also a user. The situation often arises in narcotic trafficking where a person doing the trafficking is himself a user. I was concerned as to whether this indicates a view that barbiturate addiction is not too serious a practice. In the new measure to control narcotic drugs provision is made for treatment and I think we have for the first time recognized the problem involved in the use of narcotics. Even under the old act, as I understand it, the key question was whether a person was in possession of drugs or trafficking in them. There was nothing wrong with being a person who used a particular drug. I was wondering if the minister could comment on this point.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am very happy to comment on all these things to the extent to which I am capable of doing so. I might mention however, with all due respect, that I think you are being lenient, Mr. Chairman, in that we seem to be discussing Bill No. C-100 every bit as much as Bill No. C-99. In this bill we are dealing with traffickers or those found in possession for the purpose of trafficking in controlled drugs.

I am happy to try to answer some of the questions which have been put to me such as those concerning the treatment of barbiturate addicts. We are informed—indeed, we are convinced—that withdrawal from any addiction there may be to those controlled drugs is not as difficult as is withdrawal, for example, from addiction to heroin. We do not feel that these controlled drugs have the same habit forming quality as narcotics. Frankly, in this present legislation we are after the trafficker; we are not legislating against those found in possession at all, except traffickers. It may develop that there is some loophole in this measure, but I should like to reiterate the statement I made earlier, twice, I think, this evening, to the effect that we feel this is the most forward looking legislation of any country in the world in this particular field. It is the first time to our knowledge that this step has been taken in any country. We feel that we are taking the correct step. We do not feel that treatment at the moment is as necessary as it is under the narcotics legislation. This is not a treatment measure. We are simply after those who traffic in these particular controlled drugs.

Mr. Bourque: I am sure the minister is well intentioned but evidently he has not travelled "the main" where the flotsam and jetsam of the world can be found.

I have here a copy of the Montreal Star dated May 13, 1961. The heading reads: "Child Court Judge Says Ban 'Main' ". It reads in part:

> "I hope the city passes an ordinance forbidding children from frequenting the Main," Judge Penverne said yesterday as he sent Eugene Servant, 47, to penitentiary for selling goof balls to a child.

Everyone knows that in Montreal anybody, man, woman or child can go on the Main and purchase goof balls at practically every door. I have a clipping here from the Montreal Star of Saturday, April 22 headed: "Criminal Code Changes Sought—City Acts to Stem Goof Ball Scourge". Here is one from the same paper of March 28: "Warning Given Youth Centre—Goof Ball Menace Stressed". The report goes on to stress the growing menace of the goof ball. Here is another item from the Montreal Star of Friday, March 10, 1961: "Dr. Roussel Reports, 'Goof Balls' Blamed for Sharp Increase in Violent Crimes". Again, in the Gazette of Tuesday, February 14 we read: "Goof Balls —New and Tougher Laws Believed to be Answer". And in the Gazette of Wednesday, February 15 there is another headline: "Trafficking Reduced but not Eliminated—Fulton".

Mr. Herridge: Fulton?

Mr. Bourque: Yes, sir. —"Trafficking Reduced but not Eliminated—Fulton". It reads:

> Traffic in "goof balls" (barbiturate and amphetamine drugs) at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is reduced but not yet eliminated, justice minister E. Davie Fulton said yesterday.

These things have been the subject of traffic in the penitentiaries everywhere, and they can be obtained at practically every doorway on the Main.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): This is exactly what we are trying to cure.

Mr. Bourque: I know, but you are not going about it in the right way. Possibly the hon. gentleman has made a good beginning, but I am trying to explain that traffic in these things is so widespread in Montreal that today anyone can continue trafficking in these drugs without much risk of being caught. This is from the Montreal Star of March 4, 1961: "Enlightened Action on Goof Ball Menace Needed". Here is an article which appeared in the Montreal Star on Wednesday, February 28 entitled "Bribes, Goof Balls and the Law". Another, which appeared in the Gazette on February 14 is entitled: "The 'Goof Ball' Menace". Again in the Gazette of April 7, is a further article called: "Those who Peddle Goof Balls". These are all editorials.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I have read most of them.

Mr. Bourque: Another, from the Gazette of May 25 is headed: "Narcotic Laws and 'Goof Balls'." I have a stack several feet high upstairs.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): So have I.

Mr. Bourque: The newspapers, as is obvious from what I have been reading, consider this problem to present a real menace, but we are not being sincere in our approach. I am alarmed when I draw the attention of the committee to this. I have been telling this house about it for three years but only now is action being taken, and it is action which is mild in character. This involves the contamination of our youth, yet we are only taking mild measures to deal with it.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think I must say a few words on the observations to which we have just listened. The hon. member claims the action we are taking is not sufficiently severe. At the moment the penalty for trafficking in narcotics is, I believe, 14 years. This legislation provides a penalty of ten years for trafficking in controlled drugs. I think that is a serious penalty, myself. This bill is designed to prevent precisely the type of thing to which the hon. member has been calling attention. It implements the recommendations of the citizens' committee. Incidentally, the hon. member indicated that I had probably heard from the mayor of Montreal about the meeting of that committee. No delegation has approached me so far. I am not sure whether or not any other member of the government has been approached but I have had no word from the citizens' committee of Montreal concerning this matter. I have the report, and I may say that practically all its recommendations have been implemented in this present bill.

(Translation):

Mr. English: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended participating in this debate because I am not of the medical profession, nor am I a druggist. However, I followed every remark made in this chamber on the subject of goof balls such as those of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque). He talked about goof balls for 30 minutes and—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And rightly so.

Mr. English: I will tell you in a moment if he was so right. The hon. member talked on that matter for 30 minutes—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. English: —then, he made another speech during the examination of the estimates of the Minister of Justice, when he kept the floor on the same subject for another fifteen minutes. Nobody in this house would deny the nefarious effects of goof balls in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Are there goof balls in the constituency of Gaspe?

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

Mr. English: No. Come over to Gaspe, and you will find that I have no need to fight the use of goof balls, because there are none. However, there are some in your constituency.

Mr. Chairman, I have been listening closely to my colleagues, and I wonder whether we are not a bit responsible for the situation. While we all recognize that goof balls have caused great harm to our young people, I wonder whether the way to settle the problem is to publicize this drug and to suggest all kinds of recipes to our young people.

Really, Mr. Chairman, instead of teaching bad things to our young people, we in this house who all recognize that goof balls are bad for them should try to remedy the situation; however, I do not think that can be achieved by indulging in petty politics.

Mr. Chairman, we have actually provided recipes to our young people. We have discussed goof balls, we have discussed aspirins and coca-cola, and now I am wondering whether in fact we should not have awaited the bill which was introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith)—

Mr. Bourque: There would never have been a bill if we had stopped discussing the matter.

Mr. English: —who, I am sure, will apply the appropriate remedy to the situation.

Mr. Chairman, as I was saying a moment ago, I wish to discuss this bill not as a doctor or as a pharmacist, but I think I am entitled to discuss it as a former teacher who has always aimed at inculcating to our youth ideas that would be beneficial to the nation as a whole.

Therefore, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, this is not the place to say too much about goof balls. Anyhow, it is certainly not here that one should get the recipe for them.

We are here, on the contrary, to remedy the situation and to protect our young people.

(Text):

Mr. Bourque: The hon. member would like to fiddle, like Nero, while Rome burns. He wants to be like an ostrich with his head in the sand while the storm is raging.

The minister said a moment ago that he had not received anything from Montreal regarding this subject. I should just like to quote from an editorial which appeared—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I did not say that I had not received anything from Montreal. I said I had not received a request in this regard from the mayor of Montreal.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I should like to inform the hon. minister, in that event, what the recommendation is which is put forward by the mayor of Montreal.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I have the report here in front of me.

Mr. Bourque: In view of what the minister said a moment ago, I should like to read a few lines appearing in an editorial in La Presse of Saturday, April 22, 1961, which are as follows:

(Translation):

War on barbiturates.

The report of the subcommittee which was set up by Montreal's executive committee and which is headed by the mayor—

The report reads as follows:

To summarize the situation even very briefly, is to summarize the recommendations of the municipal subcommittee. The Criminal Code and the federal Food and Drugs Act must be amended so as to include barbiturates and narcotics and so as to apply to the latter the same control, regulations and penalties. The investigation which has just been completed, hasty and incomplete as it may be, should be enough to alert federal authorities and for the latter to adopt the necessary legislation and penalties immediately.

(Text):

That, translated roughly into English, means that we should have the same punitive sanction in respect of goof balls as we have in respect of narcotics.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I have the report of the committee before me. As a matter of fact, an officer of the inspection and enforcement services branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare was in attendance at that committee meeting. As I have said before, we have incorporated most of the ideas contained in the report of that committee in this bill. I said in reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member this afternoon regarding my being approached in respect of this subject, that I had not as yet been approached, and that is the situation. I have not been approached as yet in regard to an appointment in respect of this matter.

The Chairman: Before I recognize another hon. member, I should like to point out that the committee is presently considering section 32, which has nothing to do with the principle of the bill, but relates to the punishment to be meted out to individuals convicted of being in possession of controlled drugs for the purpose of trafficking.

Shall section 32 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall section 33 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this section is important because of the means taken to provide an effective sanction, but it deserves comment for another reason altogether, in that it touches, the heart of the alleged basic attitude of the policy of this government as to the position of the individual in relation to the state. I think it is important for us to look at the section to see exactly what is intended.

Section 33 (1) provides that if an accused does not plead guilty, the trial shall proceed as if the issue to be tried is whether the accused was in possession of a controlled drug. Subsection 2 (a) and (b) are the parts of this section which should be underlined. They read as follows:

(2) If, pursuant to subsection (1), the court finds that the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be acquitted, but, if the court finds that the accused was in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be given an opportunity of establishing

(a) that he acquired the controlled drug from a person authorized under the regulations to sell or deal with controlled drugs; or

(b) that he was not in possession of the controlled drug for the purposes of trafficking, and thereafter the prosecutor shall be given an opportunity of adducing evidence to the contrary.

Mr. Chairman, I fully concur in the objective that the minister has, throughout the basic concept of this bill, in trying to restrict the illicit use of controlled drugs. But what does this section which I have just read out do? It violates one of the acts introduced by this government and which sets out the basic freedoms and fundamental human rights which are allegedly guaranteed by the bill of rights. I refer the minister to section 2 of the bill of rights in the statutes of Canada, 1960. Section 2, paragraph (f) reads:

2. Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an act of the parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian bill of rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to

(f) deprive a person charged with a criminal offence of the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal,—

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont will remember the history of this particular section, because it was as a result of efforts made by Liberal members in the bill of rights committee that the presumption of innocence clause was put in the legislation. This was accepted by the Minister of Justice and later by the Prime Minister and the house. Therefore it is rather unusual that a minister of the same government should come forward with a bill which violates this very provision. The violation is to be found not only in section 33 but also in another section, and I do no more than refer to it now because it is not before us. I simply mention that section 34 (2) violates the same principle incorporated in the bill of rights.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Keep to section 33.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I am going to keep to section 33; I just mention 34 (2) as we go along.

Under section 33, an individual in possession of a controlled drug is called upon to explain the circumstances of that possession and if he cannot there is a presumption of guilt. I say that under the bill of rights, notwithstanding the meritorious features of this bill and of its objectives, the onus should rest on the crown; otherwise the bill of rights is meaningless. I am surprised that this arises so soon after the passage of the bill of rights, particularly when we have just had it enshrined on pig skin and distributed all over this country, together with a monumental statement by the right hon. gentleman, the Prime Minister of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen opposite, including the minister, say, "hear, hear". I hope they will strongly back up the indictment which I am making on this particular section in relation to the bill of rights. But not only that, Mr. Chairman. Under section 3 of the bill of rights there is an obligation on the Minister of Justice "to scrutinize every proposed regulation submitted in draft form to the clerk of the privy council and also every bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of section 3 of the bill of rights". Unless the procedure for the preparation of bills has changed, a draft of this bill must have gone through the hands of the Solicitor General or of the Minister of Justice and to a committee of cabinet before it was considered and approved in principle by the cabinet as a whole.

Did the Minister of Justice see this bill? If he did see it, what comment did he make about this provision in section 33 (2), which clearly puts the onus on the possessor of the so-called controlled drug? I am sure we can get at individuals in this country who are trafficking in controlled drugs without violating the basic provisions of the bill of rights, without violating one of the essential human freedoms, one of the essential elements in our common law system and in our civil law system. I hope that the minister, backed up by the skill of the Solicitor General, will be able to explain the dilemma into which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been plunged as a result of the failure of the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice to be fully vigilant in this matter as they must be under section 3 of the bill of rights.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not know whether I can satisfy the hon. member for Essex East, but I will do the best I can. He speaks of section 33. He read out section 33 (1) which reads:

> (1) In any prosecution for a violation of subsection (2) of section 32,—

Subsection (2) of section 32 reads:

> No person shall have in his possession any controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking.

If in a prosecution the accused does not plead guilty, if when he is before the magistrate, he does not say "I am guilty", the section goes on to say:

> —the trial shall proceed as if the issue to be tried is whether the accused was in possession of a controlled drug.
> (2) If, pursuant to subsection (1), the court finds that the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be acquitted,—

The magistrate says "The case is dismissed" and the individual goes away. I continue:

> —but if the court finds that the accused was in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be given an opportunity of establishing—

The magistrate says "I find that you have been in possession of a controlled drug. You have the right to show that this controlled drug which you had in your possession was acquired by you from a person authorized under the regulations to sell or deal with controlled drugs", or that he was not in possession of the controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking, and thereafter the prosecutor shall be given an opportunity of adducing evidence to the contrary. In other words, if the man lies, perjures himself, if he gives evidence or makes a statement which the prosecutor knows to be false and can prove to be false, the prosecutor is given that opportunity of rebuttal.

The hon. member for Essex East also knows that even where a man has been acquitted the attorney general can appeal from one court to another and have the case heard again. Therefore, in this instance, it is only a question of the prosecutor being given the right to rebut statements which he can show to be false.

I go on with paragraph (3):

> If the accused established the facts set forth in paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (2)—

That is, that he acquired the controlled drug from a person lawfully licensed to sell or deal with it or that he was not in possession of it for the purpose of trafficking. I continue:

—he shall be acquitted of the offence as charged;—

In other words, if he shows that he was not in possession of the controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking, then the case shall be dismissed. The man is acquitted. The magistrate says "Case dismissed". I continue with the quotation:

—and if the accused fails to so establish he shall be convicted of the offence as charged and sentenced accordingly.

In other words, if he does not satisfy the magistrate that the controlled drug which he had in his possession and for which he has been charged wth trafficking came into his hands innocently, then he has to be convicted.

In regard to the statement made by the hon. member who just spoke concerning the bill of rights, the Minister of Justice examines every bill that comes in here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under the statute he must.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, he must do it under the statute. He does it and he has done it in regard to this one and he has certified that he has satisfied himself that this does not interfere with the provisions of the bill of rights.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say only a few words to support the important point which has been raised by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin).

The hon. member has repeated the well known legal saying that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty. I should like to add to the point that has been made.

We are presently dealing with criminal law. Now, it is obvious that under section 33, the accused will have to take the stand to overthrow the presumption of guilt which that section sets on him. Since when is an accused compelled to take the stand in a criminal case? It is up to the crown to make a case and if it does not succeed, the judge must dismiss the charge without the accused having to appear on the witness stand.

That, I feel, is one of the most important points. Under section 33, the accused has to take the stand to dismiss the presumption of guilt which hangs over his head.

I feel that the point raised by the hon. member for Essex East is of momentous importance, and I would suggest to the minister that we should postpone the examination of section 33 until the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has had a chance to consider that section in relation to the bill of rights we adopted last year.

Mr. Martineau: I should like to say a word following the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets). The only thing I see when I look at section 33 is that it provides for a procedure in the matter of evidence. In other words, the onus has merely been shifted. The crown must first prove possession and once that is done, the trial follows the normal principles of justice according to which the accused is presumed—

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member allow me to ask a question?

Mr. Martineau: Just a moment, let me finish my argument and then the hon. member may ask his question.

Once this first step in the hearing is completed, and assuming evidence as to possession has been established, then the accused is called upon to prove that he was innocent of such possession.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont seemed to think that an innovation in criminal law was involved. Well, I am quite sure he must remember that such procedure regarding the burden of the proof already exists in the Criminal Code. I am thinking specifically of the indictment of receiving and concealing where the crown must establish possession of goods recently stolen, and then the accused has to establish that he was innocent of such possession.

Such provision has been part of our penal law for many years. Nobody ever suggested that the accused was deprived of a fundamental right because he had to establish his innocence as far as possession of stolen goods was concerned. Therefore, there is no inconsistency between this provision and the bill of rights.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I shall not put my remarks in question form. I only want to add this: could the minister tell me whether the point I am going to raise is well taken or not?

Here is the case of a man who is brought before the courts under the charge of being in possession of controlled drugs under this amendment. The crown proves the fact of possession. Now under this section, the accused must stand in the witness box to deny this legal presumption created by possession. The hon. member who has just spoken—

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Deschatelets: —is well aware that under this act, possession is not illegal in every case, mere possession is not illegal. Possession is illegal only for traffic purposes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is correct.

Mr. Deschatelets: Then how can these things go together?

Mr. Martineau: Is it not also true that possession of stolen goods is not illegal in every case?

Mr. Deschatelets: I do not want to drag in another problem. The problem we now have to settle is quite serious, and I would like the minister to explain this. We require the accused to go into the witness box to disprove a legal presumption under this act, when mere possession is not controlled under this amendment.

Mr. Martineau: There is one thing I should like to point out with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. He says we require the accused to go into the witness box to prove the nature of his possession. However, he need not necessarily go into the witness box to prove it; he can prove his innocence in a number of ways, and if he chooses to enter the witness box, he does so of his own free will.

Under this act, no obligation is placed on the accused to go into the witness box. If there were such an obligation, I would entirely agree with the hon. member that there is a violation of one of the basic principles of our criminal law.

(Text):

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with section 33 which refers us back to section 32. We are really back to the discussion we had on subsection 1 of section 32. Subsection 2 of section 33 provides in part as follows:

> If, pursuant to subsection 1, the court finds that the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be acquitted—

Section 32, subsection 1, does not speak of possession at all. If the minister's previous explanation had to do with the possession or sale of a controlled drug and if in fact it was not a controlled drug and the person only made a representation he must be acquitted under section 33. If he must be acquitted when he merely makes a representation about something that is not a controlled drug by saying that it is, what is the purpose of setting up a straw man in section 32 which you knock down in section 33? Would it not have been wiser, and I repeat what I said before, to refer in section 32 to the person being in possession of something that might be an ingredient of a controlled drug and then section 33 would follow logically?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I point out to the hon. member that we are dealing with the offence under section 32, subsection 2, which provides that no person shall have in his possession any controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking. That is what we are dealing with and not the other point to which he has referred.

Mr. Crestohl: Subsection 2 of section 33 says:

> If, pursuant to subsection 1, the court finds that the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It refers to subsection 1 of section 33.

Mr. Crestohl: Subsection 1 of section 33 speaks of section 32.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It speaks of subsection 2 of section 32.

Mr. Crestohl: If that is the case, I am probably in error but I would point out that it certainly is very confusing. It is certainly far from clear. I think ordinarily one cannot see the matter with the clarity with which the minister sees it. At this point, I should like to say that the mere fact a draftsman writes a document which is brought before the house does not make it sacrosanct. Surely, when suggestions are made for changes, they should not be rejected out of hand.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Just a minute, Mr. Chairman; that is entirely unfair. We have already accepted an amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That being the case, I hope the minister will accede to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont or an amendment which he may propose himself to deal with the situation I have indicated and which has been confirmed by my two colleagues.

Subsection 1 points out that if the accused does not plead guilty—that is the controlling situation—then the trial proceeds as if the issue to be determined were whether or not the accused was in possession of a controlled drug. Now, these are the governing words. Once the accused fails to plead guilty, then the trial proceeds as if the only issue were whether or not the accused was in possession of a controlled drug. This provision is a clear violation of the bill of rights because it imposes a presumption of guilt, which is contrary to the bill of rights.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. member a question? He says it imposes a presumption of guilt, and I do not follow that at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the hon. member will just listen to the rest of my argument, I would point out that the controlling provision is subsection 1 of section 33. If the accused refuses to plead guilty, then the issue to be tried is whether or not he was in possession or is in possession of controlled drugs. From that moment on, under subsection 2 an obligation is imposed upon him to indicate that he was not in possession of a controlled drug within the meaning of this section.

Then, if you look at subsection 3, you find that if the accused satisfies the court that he was not in improper possession of the drugs, he will be acquitted of the offence. This only happens if he establishes the fact himself that he has not been in possession of controlled drugs.

We come back to the beginning. I repeat, where he refuses to plead guilty the issue is whether or not he was in possession of a controlled drug. Only when he can satisfy the court that he was not in possession of a controlled drug will he be regarded as not having come within the mischief of this section. Now, if that is not imposing upon the accused an onus which normally resides with the crown, then I will be very greatly surprised. This is done in an indirect way, and that makes the situation all the more serious because it is only by a careful reading of the provision that one sees there is no doubt that the presumption of establishing his innocence when he refuses to plead guilty is imposed upon the accused. This is contrary to the bill of rights. I ask the minister to either allow the section to stand or to move an amendment which will remove the government from any stigma of having introduced a measure itself which is clearly contrary to the bill of rights.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, I have a lot of respect for the hon. member for Essex East. I know he is an experienced lawyer, and I have a lot of respect for his opinions. However, I certainly do not agree with his interpretation of this section. He has misread it. If a man does not plead guilty, the onus is still on the crown. First, the onus is on the crown to show that the man was in possession. Then, the onus may shift and he may explain it as the trial goes on. Now, that is not putting any unfair obligation upon the accused. He explains it, and he is found not guilty. If he cannot explain it, then the crown must go on to show that he has the drug for illegal purposes. Unless the accused can explain why he has it, then he is guilty. I do not read the provision the way the hon. member does. I do not think the man is put in jeopardy. I do not see that the provision can be changed in any way. We have many statutes containing such provisions where the man himself is caught with the goods and he is the only person who can really explain why he has them. I do not see how the suggested amendment would help. I do not see the provision the way the hon. member does, and I do not think the man is put in jeopardy.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments on what the hon. member has just said, because he does not seem to understand.

(Text):

Mr. Montgomery: I understand quite well.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: With his permission, I shall give him some explanation about our stand with regard to section 33.

The hon. member will remember that the minister clearly stated earlier that possession only does not constitute an offence under this amendment. Therefore, if a person is indicted, it will necessarily be for drug trafficking. The charge made, it will be quite easy for the crown to prove possession, of course, since the individual has been found in possession of the drug. After the crown has proved possession, which is not illegal in itself, under this bill, we throw upon the accused the necessity of testifying in order to prove that he is not guilty as presumed, by saying what he intended to do with that drug. If the accused is able to prove that he is in possession of this drug for his personal use only, then I understand he will be acquitted. But, if the accused refuses to testify, under section 33(3), the judge must convict him of the offence, whereas possession only, under this bill, does not constitute an offence. This is our opinion on the matter.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister going to accept the suggestion that we allow the section to stand and go on with the other sections?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, I am content to let it stand, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall section 33 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall section 34 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would suggest that section 34 (1) be allowed to pass. Subsection 2, however, reads in part:

In any prosecution under this part the burden of proving that an exception, exemption, excuse or qualification prescribed by law operates in favour of the accused is on the accused,—

Perhaps the minister would allow this subsection to stand as well, then the minister could give it consideration and we could discuss it at the next stage.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall section 34 (1) carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall section 34 (2) stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall section 35 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall section 36 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have a question on section 36 (3). Will the minister explain to me why, in section 36 (2), there is mentioned a warrant to search a dwelling house to be issued by a magistrate and then in section 3 there is the provision that a writ of assistance may be obtained from the judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada? Why is it necessarily or exclusively the Exchequer Court of Canada?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): This is a special authority. The writ of assistance is a special authority for which provision is made in the narcotic act and the Excise Act. In effect, this clothes the person named therein with the general powers to search dwelling houses as well as other places. The writ of assistance in this legislation will be issued only on application of the Minister of National Health and Welfare in accordance with the prevailing practice under the narcotics act. The writ will be issued only to members of the R.C.M.P. at the request of the commissioner of that force; and here it will be limited to the persons who are actually engaged in the specific duties connected with the suppression of the traffic in controlled drugs. There will certainly be no abuse of this authority. It is simply a writ of assistance to permit search by peace officers, that is members of the R.C.M.P. squad connected with this particular work.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for his reply. I know the purpose of the writ and I know what a writ of assistance is, but my question was this. Why must this necessarily be given on application by the minister only to an exchequer court judge? Suppose this situation exists, for example, in Vancouver. Suppose a situation arises such as that which prevails in Montreal and quick action may be required. What we are looking for, of course, is the most effective enforcement of this measure.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If I might just interrupt the hon. member at this point I should like to say this. This is a standing order or permit to search. It is entirely different from section 36 (2). It is a general authority to search, for these particular people who are attached to this particular type of work.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister mean that the writ of assistance gives them the right, apart from any particular case covered in a particular application, to go in at any time? I do not think so.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It means the individual.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely. But only with respect to a particular situation. It is not a blank cheque. It is not an authorization by the exchequer court to Mr. X to go in and examine the premises of anyone, anywhere, in any part of Canada, at any time.

Mr. Drysdale: It states "any dwelling house".

Mr. Monteith (Perth): This same procedure is provided for in the Customs Act and in the Excise Act and it has been in the narcotics act for many years. It is the same procedure that is devised here, word for word.

The Chairman: Shall section 36 carry?

Mr. Crestohl: Section 36 (3) contains these words: "A judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada shall upon application by the minister,". Does the minister now mean to inform the committee that an application will be made just once for a writ that will provide a blanket authority or does the section mean that whenever a case arises an application can be made to the minister for the issue of such authority? What do the words "upon application" mean?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If I may, I shall put it in this way. Suppose a certain member of the R.C.M.P. is appointed to the squad, shall we say, to investigate this type of case. The commissioner of the R.C.M.P. requests me to apply to the Exchequer Court of Canada for a writ of assistance for this particular police officer in charge of the squad. Then while he is holding that particular position this one writ of assistance will cover him in his duties covering more than one case. But this has been common practice for many years. The moment this particular officer moves on to another position or leaves the squad and that sort of thing, of course the writ of assistance is moved from his possession. He no longer has it. On somebody new taking over this position, he obtains one as a consequence of the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. asking me to apply to the exchequer court.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister explain section 36 (6) wherein it is provided that the applicant will be entitled to possession of the controlled drug upon the hearing of an application made under subsection 5 and the magistrate is satisfied as to the circumstances. If I may, I should like to refer just briefly to section 33, subsections 1, 2 and 3. What are the circumstances in which an individual is entitled under this act to be in possession of a controlled drug? Is it only where the court has been satisfied that he is not trafficking? If he can satisfy the court that he is not trafficking, is there any qualification of his right of possession of a controlled drug?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If he is not found guilty of trafficking he is entitled to the return of the controlled drug or if no charge is laid he is entitled to the return of the controlled drug.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what I thought.

The Chairman: Shall section 36 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will you allow me to go back to section 37(1)(f).

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This paragraph has to do with the sanction against persons covered in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) (d) and (e) and they include those who are manufacturing, selling, importing, transporting, delivering and so on. One of the important ways by which this measure will become effective is by trying to get at the source of import or importation and the source of manufacture. Assuming guilt on the part of the manufacturer or on the part of the importer, does the minister consider the sanction provided here of a fine of five hundred dollars or a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months to be sufficient? Does he not think that it is wholly unrelated to the punishment provided for in section 32(2)?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, Mr. Chairman; I think so, for this reason. Actually, if in the search of records and so on, we find that somebody has actually been violating the law, he will probably be found guilty of trafficking and then he will be subject to the other sentence under the other section. This probably might be a procedural error or some technical mistake. We feel, as a consequence, that these fines or these penalties are sufficient for violation of the regulations. But, as I say, if as a result of searching the records, he is found to have been trafficking he will then be guilty of an offence under the other section.

The Chairman: Shall clause 37 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Shall clause 38 carry?

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry, including all sections? Oh, no. We have allowed section 33 to stand.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. We allowed section 33 and section 34(2) to stand.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. Section 34(2) stands.

The Chairman: Yes, but shall clause 2 of the bill carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

The Chairman: We are going back to section 33, clause 1.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All of section 33 stands.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I wonder if the committee could rise at this stage and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Churchill: We have other business to proceed with in committee. I think the minister had indicated simply that we would move the adjournment of proceedings on this bill in committee.

The Chairman: Yes, but the committee has to report, because it has no other purpose than to consider this particular bill.

Progress reported.

FREIGHT RATES REDUCTION ACT

AMENDMENT EXTENDING APPLICATION OF REVISED RATES

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-93, to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Freight Rates Reduction Act

On clause 1—Extension of time.

Mr. Chevrier: Has the minister any statement to make?

Mr. Balcer: No.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to get some information in connection with this clause. This clause does two things. It extends the Freight Rates Reduction Act which was passed previously for a year, that is, until April 30, 1962. It also purports to make retroactive the payments which are authorized by the former act so that during the period of time between April 30, 1961 and the date when this act is proclaimed there may be no loss of revenue to the railway companies. I do not think the bill does that, and I will tell the minister why. As far as the reduction of freight rates is concerned, I think that is provided for effectively. I think this bill does reduce the rate to the shipper. But I do not think that the way in which it is worded here gives the railways the moneys which they would be entitled to receive between April 30 and the date when the act will be proclaimed. My reason for thinking so is this: the board of transport commissioners may reduce a rate or it may increase a rate, but it cannot make a rate retroactive and therefore it cannot make a payment retroactive. The decision has been made as far as the shipper is concerned by the railways filing a tariff reducing the rate as on May 1, 1961, but in so far as the railways themselves are concerned, since the board of transport commissioners cannot make the payment retroactive it seems to me that there is a weakness in this clause. I may be wrong and if that is the case I should like to be corrected.

Mr. Balcer: I should like to direct the attention of the hon. member for Laurier to clause 1 itself. I think we have discussed this in the committee—

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Balcer: I went over the whole matter. The hon. member put the same question to the experts who appeared as witnesses before the committee. All I can do is to refer the hon. gentleman to the bill itself.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister permit me to interrupt? I did not ask that question. I did take part in the discussion the first day but when this clause came up for discussion I was, unfortunately, not present or I would have raised the matter in the committee.

Mr. Balcer: I am sorry. It was raised by the hon. member for Essex East. The only difference between this bill and the previous bill lies in precisely the last few lines of clause 1 where we say:

> —and in such cases diminution in the gross revenue of a company resulting from the continuation in effect after the 30th day of April, 1961, and before the day on which the extension became effective of the revised rates set forth in the order shall for the purposes of the Freight Rates Reduction Act be deemed to have resulted from an order made by the board under that act.

I think it is quite clear that this bill gives power to the board of transport commissioners to pay the railroads with exactly the same effect as if an order had been made by the board under the act. As the hon. member said, the shippers will not lose anything because both railway presidents wrote a letter a few days before April 30 stating that they did not intend to file tariffs to bring this increase to 17 per cent back into force. Thus, the shippers carried on business and continued shipping at rates which were the same as the rates which had been reduced to 8 per cent by the previous bill amending the Freight Rates Reduction Act. The reason why the railways will be in a position to recover the amount which might be lost to them on account of the delay in the passage of the bill is because after the end of each month there is a time lag of two or three months before the companies are able to process and submit their bills for that month's traffic. Consequently, bills for March and April, for instance, have not yet been received. The same applies to the month of May. Once the board receives the bills and issues an order, then they can be paid.

I suggest that is exactly what will happen. The period between April 30, and the day that this bill receives royal assent, is covered, because the railway companies will produce bills covering that period of perhaps two months, and will receive payment once the board has issued an order under the appropriate section of the act. It is my opinion, therefore, that the shippers and the railway companies will be looked after.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the shippers will be looked after, and am quite satisfied that their case is covered. However, the minister has suggested that the last part of the clause, which is intended to cover the making of retroactive payments to the railways authorizes the board of transport commissioners to do so, and I suggest that is the weakness. If I understand the situation correctly, the board of transport commissioners has no authority at all to pay the railways, and the only person who can do so is the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Chevrier: The board has no authority to pay the railways under this section, and that is why I feel some further amendment should be included to authorize the Minister of Finance, after the board has decided what the amount is, to pay that amount to the railways. I suggest the last part does not cover that situation.

Mr. Balcer: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I disagree with the hon. member. Section 4 of the present act reads as follows:

4. (1) The Minister of Finance may, with the approval of the governor in council and on the recommendation of the board, pay to a company out of the consolidated revenue fund, an amount that in the opinion of the board is equal to the diminution in the gross revenue of the company resulting from an order made by the board under this act.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the order mentioned in this bill is that order which is deemed to have resulted from an order made by the board under the act. I think that premise is found in the last few lines of clause 1 of this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to pursue this unduly, and if the minister is satisfied that the situation to which I have referred is covered by the present bill, I shall not hold up the legislation. However, the minister did say that this clause authorizes the board to pay the railway. Am I correct in that statement.

Mr. Balcer: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Chevrier: Did the minister say that the last part of this clause authorized the board to pay the railways?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the railways are to be paid by the Minister of Finance, not by the board. I quite agree that I made a mistake in that regard. Under section 4 of the act, the Minister of Finance is authorized to pay the railways.

Mr. Chevrier: In view of that statement, the minister and I are apparently in accord, in that it is not the board of transport commissioners that pay the railways, but the Minister of Finance. That being the case, and in the light of the amendment submitted, is the minister satisfied, that there is sufficient authority to make the payments retroactive to April 30 from the time this act is proclaimed, as the clause is now worded?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, line 5 of section 4 states that:

—in the opinion of the board is equal to the diminution in the gross revenue of the company resulting from an order made by the board under this act.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the minister reading from?

Mr. Balcer: From the act itself.

Mr. Chevrier: From the original act?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, section 4 of the original act. The portion of this bill which amends the original act reads as follows:

—the revised rates set forth in the order shall, for the purposes of the Freight Rates Reduction Act, be deemed to have resulted from an order made by the board under that act.

I think that wording in the bill means exactly the same as the wording in the original act. This bill provides that the period be covered, because the diminution shall be deemed to have resulted from an order made under the act. I think that covers the situation, because there is a clear relationship between the two.

Mr. Chevrier: I raised the question because I thought it was ambiguous. Had I been present at the committee meeting, when the discussion took place in respect of that clause, I should have raised the question in the same manner I have raised it here, because I am not satisfied with the wording. However, if the minister tells us that his officers feel that the wording is sufficient, I shall not hold up the bill any further.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Limit.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, could the minister explain the background to this increase of $20 million in the amount provided by this bill in respect of freight rates reduction?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I think I explained that quite fully both at the resolution stage and in discussion on the bill during second reading. This legislation is what is termed "roll-back legislation", and is provided to make sure that the reduction of 7 per cent in freight rates, resulting from the roll-back from 17 per cent to 10 per cent, will be covered. For that purpose, an amount of $20 million is set aside to pay the railways, through the Minister of Finance, on the order of the board of transport commissioners. The railways send their bills to the board of transport commissioners at the end of each month for the recommendation of that board, in order that the Minister of Finance can make payment. The board of transport commissioners, as a result of this procedure, have recommended that $20 million will cover the roll-back resulting from the 2 per cent reduction in the change from 10 per cent to 8 per cent.

It will be recalled that last year, when a similar bill was presented to the house by my predecessor, at the same time he announced the creation of the royal commission on transportation, he indicated that while the royal commission was making a complete study in respect of the problems of transportation in Canada, this act should be extended for another year so as to eliminate the possibility of any discrimination occurring to shippers during that period. That is why the government put forward an amendment to the Freight Rates Reduction Act at that time, in respect of the $15 million increase.

The report of the MacPherson commission was received by the government very recently, and until legislation based on this report can be implemented in the house the government felt that this roll-back legislation should carry on for another period. This is why we have extended it for a period not exceeding one year. We have also substituted for $35 million the amount of $55 million. Actually, all that this legislation does is to carry on the roll-back legislation which was introduced in the house two years ago.

When the government brings forward legislation based on the MacPherson report it will then consider whether or not it will carry on with this program. The provision is for one year which actually ends on April 30, 1962.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his brief explanation. The $55 million is an estimate; that is, it is the outside total. It will not necessarily all be used.

Mr. Balcer: That is right. If the situation remains as it is until April 30, 1962, it will be used because the $20 million covers the roll-back on the freight rate from 17 per cent to 8 per cent. The original increase of 17 per cent has been rolled back to an increase of 8 per cent, and the difference of 9 per cent is covered by the $20 million mentioned in clause 2 of the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Why is the amount fixed at $20 million? Is it because it takes that amount of money to provide for a continuation of the reduction?

Mr. Balcer: Yes; it is based on the experience of the first year, Mr. Chairman. The original act was for $20 million and it was intended to cover the roll-back of 7 per cent, but the experience of the first year has shown that this amount covers more than the 7 per cent. Actually it produced a reduction of 9 per cent instead of 7 per cent.

Mr. Chevrier: What was the amount of the subsidy in the second year?

Mr. Balcer: It was $15 million.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Balcer.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I suggest that at this stage we might take item No. 10 on today's order paper, which is the resolution dealing with the War Veterans Allowance Act. We debated this at some length on May 16. If the resolution passes tonight the bill will be distributed in the morning and be available for second reading tomorrow. After second reading it will be sent to the standing committee on veterans affairs. If this is agreeable, then we can consider tonight item No. 1 on today's order paper which is Bill No. C-88 to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act. This is a small bill which has already been examined by the standing committee on veterans affairs and has come back to the house.

Mr. Chevrier: We have no objection.

Mr. Churchill: If the house finishes these two items in good time I do not think anybody would object to rising early.

Mr. Chevrier: This is not the order in which the business was given last night but there is certainly no objection, so far as we are concerned, to taking item No. 10. As the house leader says, it has been discussed on a number of occasions and it can be taken now.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF ALLOWANCES AND INCOME CEILINGS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday May 16, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Churchill—Mr. Flynn in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952, to increase the monthly rates of allowances and permissible income ceilings; to allow for further exemptions in property and income; to modify certain conditions of service eligibility; to allow for administrative and organizational changes within the board and to provide for certain further changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Churchill thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-101, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the intention that this bill be given second reading now?

Mr. Churchill: Second reading at the next sitting, sir.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF INTEREST, PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. C-88, to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act—Mr. Churchill—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Interest.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, this bill has been considered very carefully in the Veterans Affairs Committee. Many items were discussed in the committee which I think settled some of the problems that were raised in the house when the bill was before us on an earlier occasion. A request had been made to extend the provisions of the fund to Newfoundland veterans but that was dealt with in the committee by pointing out that those who contributed to this fund were the only ones who were entitled to share in the fund.

The fund arose as a result of various activities of the Canadian army in the second world war and it is those veterans of that particular army who are entitled to the benefits of the fund. R.C.A.F. veterans, for example, cannot make use of this fund. Neither can navy veterans use the fund nor army veterans of the first world war. As I pointed out when this matter was before the house on a former occasion, the moneys in the fund were derived from the regimental funds of army units, from auxiliary services, from Bronco, from the navy, army and air force institutes and from various miscellaneous sources, all of which funds resulted, as I have mentioned, from the sale of comforts and so on to the soldiers of the Canadian army.

There are certain Canadian funds in existence from the first world war. To my knowledge only three are left now, those in Ontario, Manitoba and New Brunswick. Originally such funds existed, I believe, in nearly every province in the country but as the moneys in these funds were used up the administrations closed their doors and the funds ceased to exist.

There is still a good deal of money left in the fund we are considering now and the purpose of the bill is explained fairly adequately in the explanatory notes accompanying the bill. Without going into a clause by clause discussion of the bill at the moment, I might point out that it has been thought that the interest rates should be increased as set forth in the bill to bring them in line with interest rates paid on similar funds held by the government of Canada.

Second, the purpose of the bill is to make an adjustment in the way the salary of the secretary is fixed in order that this matter may be removed from the statute and the salary fixed by the board itself. I understand the secretary has not received any increase in salary for a number of years and it is thought that to have his salary made statutory is not a convenient way to deal with it.

In the standing committee it was suggested by the Canadian Legion that the interest rates should be increased still further than is set forth in the bill. When you increase interest rates on this or any other fund, I suppose it is always possible to suggest that the rate should be increased still further but the figure that has been selected in this case has been chosen on the basis of the principles which have existed for the setting of the interest rate on this fund in times past, particularly in 1952 and also in 1947 when the fund was originally established. Therefore I think we had better stick to the original principles for the setting of these interest rates, and the activities of the fund, will, of course, be tailored in accordance with the amount of money available.

I think that is all I can usefully say at the present time. As I mentioned, the bill was discussed very thoroughly in the standing committee and we are bringing it forward now for consideration in committee of the whole house.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, as the parliamentary secretary has said, this matter was discussed very thoroughly before the veterans affairs committee and the only subject of controversy at the present time is the rate of interest to be paid on the fund. The fund does not belong to the taxpayers of Canada or to the government but rather to the army veterans of world war II, and the same careful consideration should be given to the investment of these funds as the government or any other organization gives to the investment of funds. Before the veterans affairs committee the parliamentary secretary said, as found on page 313 of the proceedings of the committee:

> The amendment to the act is a straightforward operation to increase the interest rate by one half per cent on each of the two categories mentioned in the bill. This increase brings it in line with the general type of interest paid by the government to funds of a similar character. I think that is all that needs to be said about the interest factor.

With that statement I do not agree because if the parliamentary secretary will refer to page 326 of the proceedings of the veterans affairs committee—

Mr. Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think it is not customary to read from the proceedings of committees of this house when we are dealing with a matter in the house itself.

The Chairman: Do I understand that the committee has reported? The committee has reported the bill and therefore I do not see how this rule would apply in the present case. It seems to me that the discussion in the standing committee with respect to this bill would be relevant to the discussion in this committee.

Mr. Herridge: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that is quite correct. The committee dealt with the bill and reported it back to the house and in the past we have followed this practice when the work of the standing committee has been concluded.

Mr. Forgie: I want to bring into focus the question of the interest rate payable on the fund. I think there are two courses open. One is for the fund administered by the army benevolent fund committee to be invested by them. The other is that the government should pay the same rate of interest on the fund that they paid to borrow money in the conversion loan which falls due in 1983. At the present time the prevailing rate of yield on conversion loan bonds is 5.14 per cent. If these moneys were invested at 5.14 per cent the fund would be able to carry on, as was originally planned when the act was passed in 1947, for a period of 50 years at which time the fund would be exhausted.

The Canadian Legion made the following recommendations before the veterans affairs committee:

> The Canadian Legion, therefore, believes the government must accept that the minimum rate at which money can be obtained in the open market is somewhere between 4½ per cent and 5 per cent, and that this should be acknowledged by establishing a rate such as 4¾ per cent as the minimum to be paid by the receiver general to the army benevolent fund in respect of the balance which is available to the government at all times. We believe that by increasing the rate to 4¾ per cent per annum it would mean that the fund would have available more adequate means with which to meet the original intent of this legislation.

There is no doubt about it, Mr. Chairman. If the 4¾ per cent rate were to prevail across the board in relation to these moneys, there would be a considerable increase in the return on the moneys but it would not be adequate to take care of this fund for the full period of 50 years. I am suggesting, therefore, that the yield that should be obtained from this army benevolent fund should be the same as that obtained from the conversion bonds which are yielding about 5.14 per cent. These were the last figures I had, and they may have changed fractionally since then.

Let us look at the remarks of Mr. Chadderton, as they are recorded on page 314 of the evidence of the veterans affairs committee. He had this to say:

> We started with $9,200,000. Today we have left $6,500,000. So we have spent in cold cash from the fund, we have depleted the fund, in other words, in the amount of $2,700,000. In addition, we have had revenue through interest of $3,500,000. So the total amount now spent is $6,200,000. We operate this fund on an actuarial plan, which envisaged 30 years of full operation from 1947. The act states that we must remain in business for 50 years. The actuarial plan provides for a full period of operation of 30 years with a small residue to take care of the remaining 20 years. This, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, offers a very serious problem to the army benevolent fund. I have already noted that we have left today only $6,500,000, but in accordance with this actuarial plan, we should have $7 million. So we have had to overspend to the tune of $500,000.
> We had a new actuarial plan drafted at the end of the last fiscal year. The figures which the department of insurance gave us were such that we would have to reduce our expenditure for welfare grants and administration to $450,000 a year. Even with the proposed increase in interest in the bill before the parliamentary committee today, we can increase our expenditure to only $470,000 a year, even if we should get this increase in interest. The actual expenditures have averaged over the past 10 years $530,000 a year. We are facing a very serious problem, and our board sees one of two alternatives; either they must cut down on the amount that we spend each year and leave deserving cases out in the cold, or secondly, we must reduce the remaining 17 years of operation of the fund. Our board would not wish to do either of these things, because we have operated from the start on the principle that the veteran who is in trouble today is just as much entitled to assistance as the veteran who was in trouble at the start of the fund. And by the same token, if a veteran is in trouble 17 years from now, he should still have the availability of the army benevolent fund.

I asked Mr. Chadderton the following question as recorded on page 319 of the evidence:

> Let me ask you another question: Do you feel that a higher rate of interest could be obtained if this fund were placed in the hands of a committee of the army benevolent fund, and that they should be allowed to invest this fund as they saw fit? You recall that it is not government money. You have already stated it. This money belongs to the veterans. Would it not be advisable to transfer to that committee from the government, or the receiver general, or the consolidated revenue fund, or whoever does the investing of the army benevolent fund?
> Mr. Chadderton: Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to correct one figure. Mr. Forgie's figures are exactly correct except that we have 17 years left, not 18. The question of investing this fund privately has been under consideration with our board from the commencement of the fund. We have had advice from independent investment counsellors who are connected with our fund, and they have told us at various times that we could certainly expect a higher yield than we are receiving under the act. The last such investment advice we had was in September of 1960 at which time we were told we could expect, through private investment—bearing in mind the outcome from the fund, something in excess of 4½ per cent.

As I have stated, today we could get through the purchase of conversion bonds, 4¾ per cent conversion bonds, a yield on the basis of 5.14 per cent. If the government is desirous of investing this fund, in which they have no pecuniary interest, then I suggest they buy conversion loan bonds which are selling at a discount today. They could, thereby, put this fund in a position to carry on for the period of 50 years as contemplated at the time the act was passed in 1947.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, to you that the recommendation of the Canadian Legion, while worth while, is not adequate. If the government intends to invest this fund, then the minimum yield should be about 5.14 per cent or the bid price of conversion bonds at the present time.

Mr. Herridge: I am rather hurt, Mr. Chairman, to see the parliamentary assistant rising to close the debate on this clause.

Mr. Jones: The debate is not closed when I rise to reply to an hon. member.

Mr. Herridge: I was just going to congratulate him on his first opportunity to pilot a bill in the house.

This bill did receive very careful consideration by the standing committee on veterans affairs. It is a rather simple bill and is only concerned with interest rates. It was surprising, therefore, the interest which was shown in the administration of the fund. We received an excellent explanation of the administration of the fund from Mr. Chadderton, the secretary. He explained the various aspects of the fund, the forms of expenditure and things of that sort. I think it is quite fair to say that all members of the committee, regardless of party, were impressed by his explanation of the administration of the fund over the years. He explained the way grants were made to veterans. We found that there were even lady veterans now getting assistance on occasion from the fund for the purpose of assisting them in coping with circumstances over which, in the majority of cases, they had little control.

I think it is safe to say we were all convinced that the administration of the fund was sound, humane and in the interests of the veterans it was intended to serve. The trustees of this fund certainly should be commended for the work they have carried on throughout these years. We also heard some interesting representations from the Canadian Legion. Their brief showed a good knowledge of the administration of the fund and the financial aspects of the fund, as explained by the previous speaker. I am not going to take the time of the committee to deal with the interest question in full because he covered the situation quite fully in his remarks, and in his quotations from the record and from Mr. Chadderton's explanation to members of the committee.

After hearing the representations from a representative of the Canadian Legion and after hearing Mr. Chadderton's explanation of the financial condition of the fund, the intended life of the fund and the responsibilities there were in connection with the years ahead, I made a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Lanark; and the committee recommended that the government give consideration to the recommendations of the Canadian Legion in this respect which were, in brief, to provide for an interest rate of 4¾ per cent in order to ensure that the fund would last over the period of 50 years and meet the circumstances it was expected would have to be met during that period. That motion was adopted by the committee after some discussion, although I must say that I agree with the hon. member who spoke previously. During the debate on second reading I think I suggested that the interest rate should be 5 per cent and I think the hon. member suggested a similar figure, in order to meet this situation. These funds belonged to the veterans whom they are intended to serve and for whom they are intended to provide grants under certain circumstances.

I must say that I am very sorry that the government has not seen fit to accept the recommendation of the committee which sprang from the recommendations of representatives of the Canadian Legion which we considered were sound, responsible and in the interests of the veterans whom the fund was intended to serve. As members of the opposition we are not in a position to move an amendment to this clause when it comes before the committee, but in this case we think that the government should have responded more favourably to the recommendation of the standing committee on veterans affairs in this respect.

Mr. Jones: I should like to thank both of the hon. members for the contributions they have made to the discussion on this matter. I might say that serious consideration was given to the views that they and other hon. members expressed in the committee and also to the views of the Canadian Legion with regard to this matter of interest rates. The arguments that were advanced then and have been advanced here are, of course, the same arguments that could have been advanced in 1947 or 1952 when this bill was originally introduced and then amended. On those occasions it is always possible, just as it is possible now, to pick out a type of security and say that this security yields a higher rate than does the security on which interest is being paid by the government under this legislation. However, after the most careful consideration of the point raised it was thought that we should stick to the original principle which was involved in the setting of the rates of this fund so that continuity could be carried on. That is not the only reason, of course. But the rates as set bear a relation to rates on funds held by the government from other sources and on which the government pays interest rates. I think perhaps it might be useful to recall to the members of this committee that this fund came first, and then the uses of this fund came second. It was not the other way around. When this fund was originally set up, a plan for assisting veterans was not envisaged and then money supplied for that purpose. It happened in a contrary way. The fund existed, drawn from the sources that I have already referred to; and because those funds existed, it was then determined that those funds should be used for the purposes developed by the army benevolent fund.

Mr. Forgie: May I ask a question? Who determined how this money should be spent?

Mr. Jones: It was determined by parliament in 1947. It was determined by the parliament of Canada, by this House of Commons.

Mr. Forgie: Not by the veterans?

Mr. Jones: The purposes are quite similar to the purposes of the R.C.A.F. benevolent fund and of the navy fund also. The purposes came second; the fund came first.

Again I thank hon. members for their contributions both in committee and here to the discussion of this matter. However, I wish to assure them that, after very careful consideration, we feel that a fair and equitable rate of interest is one that is based on the policy which has been carried forward from the time of the inception of the army benevolent fund. Accordingly, I hope the increase which is recommended by the bill will receive the support of the members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Batten: I must say that I am particularly disappointed that the government has not seen fit to accede to the recommendation and suggestion made by the Canadian Legion. This money does not belong to the government. It is money that has been provided by the veterans over a period of time and for particular purposes. It has been provided for the aid which this fund can give to veterans. Because the money is not government money and because it is being held by the government, it seems to me that the government should give to this fund an interest rate which would normally be given to money which is borrowed by the government.

I think the suggestion made by the Canadian Legion was a reasonable one. At this particular time when the fund is having just a little bit of trouble in following the actuarial plan which was set up for it, I feel that this is one way of helping the fund to carry on with the good work being done. I feel that this recommendation should have been accepted. I agreed wholeheartedly with the recommendation in committee; and even at this late stage I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that maybe it is not too late to give some active and favourable consideration to this suggestion.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Carter: May I call it 10.30, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what legislation, if any, will be discussed tomorrow and what the estimates are for the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will take third reading of Bill No. C-77, dealing with agricultural development and then second reading of the bill dealing with the War Veterans Allowance Act, which bill will be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs. Then I think perhaps we should finish the matter we were debating tonight, namely Bill No. C-88, to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act. After those items are completed, we will then take up the estimates of the Secretary of State. For Thursday, Friday and Saturday I have already announced the departments that we shall be considering. On Thursday we start, by arrangement, with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Then, if we have not finished with the estimates of the Secretary of State tomorrow, I would suggest that we take the estimates of the Secretary of State after those of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. The third one will be fisheries and then will come public works.

At ten thirty o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MEDICAL AND WELFARE PROFESSIONS—SHORTAGE OF PERSONNEL

Question No. 187—Mr. Regier:

What is the estimated shortage in Canada of each of the following: (a) doctors (b) dentists (c) graduate social welfare workers (d) graduate nurses?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

It is not possible with any assurance of accuracy to give an estimate of present shortages in Canada of health and welfare workers in the categories listed. There are many factors which have a bearing on the utilization of such workers in this country, including geographical distribution, trends in methods of providing care, economic conditions, the development of prepayment plans, etc.

(a) With respect to doctors, it has been estimated that, as of September 1, 1960, the ratio of active physicians to population averaged 1 physician per 909 persons. This is one of the most favourable physician-population ratios in the world. The provincial distribution varies from 1 physician per 2,000 to 1 per 784 persons.

(b) The present dentist-population ratio in Canada is approximately 1 to 3,000. On a provincial basis, the distribution varies from 1 to 2,000 in the most favourably situated provinces to 1 to 11,000 in those having the lowest proportion of dentists.

(c) An acute shortage of social workers exists across Canada but its extent has not been measured since 1951 when a survey of welfare positions was conducted by the research and statistics division of the Department of National Health and Welfare. At that time there were some 4,500 welfare positions established in Canada. Approximately 30 per cent of the employed staff had graduate degrees in social work. Welfare agencies were asked in 1951 what percentage of graduate social workers they would employ if they were available. The replies indicated that graduate social workers were wanted in between 60 and 85 per cent of welfare positions. On the basis of projections of the survey of 1951 and other data, it is estimated that there are now some 7,000 welfare positions. It is reported by the Canadian association of social workers that some 2,500 of these are filled by graduate social workers while the remainder are filled by persons with different types of background and training. If the agencies' preferences for graduate social workers were of the same order in 1961 as in 1951 the shortage would range between 1,700 and 3,500 social workers.

(d) The ratio of registered nurses to population in 1958 was estimated at 1 per 275 population, varying between provinces from 1 to 202 to 1 to 562 persons. Although the over-all supply of nurses is relatively high, there are shortages of nursing personnel in rural areas, both in hospitals and in public health services. Shortages also exist in mental hospitals and of highly trained nurses able to serve as supervisors, teachers and administrators, both in hospitals and in public health services.

2. If so, what was the amount of the profit?
3. If not, what was the loss in the year?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

R.C.A.F. "GOLDEN HAWKS" TEAM

Question No. 229—Mr. Argue:

1. What is the complete cost per annum of the Royal Canadian Air Force air acrobatic team, the Golden Hawks, including pay, per diem allowances, and training of aircrew; aircraft depreciation, replacement, maintenance and fuel, etc.?

2. What is the relationship between air acrobatics and modern air combat?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. The annual cost of maintaining the R.C.A.F. aerobatic team, the Golden Hawks, is $727,373. This figure includes pay and allowances, aircraft maintenance, spares, overhaul, fuel and special training costs. Aircraft replacement is not considered as a factor in annual costs.

2. There is no relation since acrobatics are not performed by aircraft. However, all R.C.A.F. pilots undergo training in aerobatics as this is one of the most effective methods of teaching air crew to become proficient in precision flying and teamwork which are essential in present day operational flying.

6. (a) Have any other centres applied for such designation beyond the 28 centres already given? (b) if so, what are the names of these centres?

R.C.A.F.—FLYING PAY

1. On May 1 of each year from 1950 to 1961 inclusive, how many persons, by ranks, in the Royal Canadian Air Force were drawing flying pay (a) as pilots (b) as non-pilots (c) while on squadron duty (d) while not on squadron duty?

2. How many squadrons of aircraft did the R.C.A.F. have on each date given in question 1?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SERVICE, SCHEDULE AND EQUIPMENT REDUCTIONS, PASSENGER RAILWAY LINES

Motion No. 134—Mr. Deschatelets:

For a copy of the complete list of passenger railway lines, where reductions have taken place since July 1, 1957, as to service, schedules, and equipment, by the Canadian National Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

(Translation):

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this motion with the hon. member and have explained to him that the railway companies are required to notify the board of transport commissioners when actual discontinuance of train service is proposed, but that the railways are not required to advise the board when only reductions in service or changes in schedules or equipment are proposed. The information called for in the motion not being on record with the board, I believe the hon. member is prepared to drop his motion.

I might add that I shall be tabling today or tomorrow the return to the order of the house which was passed recently on motion of the hon. member having to do with train services that have been discontinued since July 1, 1957.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): The answer is satisfactory, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Order discharged and motion dropped.

URBAN REHABILITATION STUDY, MONTREAL

Motion No. 135—Mr. Valade:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the authorities of the city of Montreal and the federal government with respect to a contemplated study of an urban rehabilitation project in the city of Montreal.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

COLUMBIA RIVER—CONSIDERATION OF TREATY BY STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is giving consideration to referring the Columbia river treaty between Canada and the United States to the standing committee on external affairs for examination, pending the completion of negotiations between the government of British Columbia and the federal government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has given no consideration to this suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition. Indeed, while negotiations are going on I think it would be most improper to have this matter considered by a committee.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In view of reports to the effect that the Minister of Justice is proceeding to British Columbia, could the Prime Minister tell the house whether the minister intends to have another meeting with the premier of British Coulmbia with respect to this question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Balcer.]

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the international wheat agreement will expire next year and some discussions have been going on among agricultural organizations of many countries, I wonder whether the minister could inform the house whether the Canadian government has as yet taken part in any preliminary discussions on a new international wheat agreement, and whether Canada is supporting such an agreement if it is satisfactory.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a signatory to the international wheat agreement and as such is a member of the international wheat council. Members of the civil service of the government of Canada are on the continuing committees of the international wheat council. Frequent meetings of these committees are being held. It may interest the hon. member to know that the international wheat council itself meets in London at the end of June. Canada certainly has every reason to continue its support of the international wheat agreement.

CHINA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CANADIAN MISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of a report that two Canadian trade commissioners, a Mr. Forsythe Smith and a Mr. Small, have been on a mission and have made quite a tour of China. I wonder whether the minister could tell us whether this was a regular visit, or part of the increased efforts of the minister and his department to increase Canadian trade with various countries.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this involves an increased effort carried out in a regular way.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I am aware that it is an increased effort, but could the minister report any concrete results from this mission, or have any been obtained?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have not received that information as yet.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance based on today's daily bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics, which indicates that for the first quarter of the present calendar year the sale of new passenger and commercial vehicles had declined by over 10 per cent.

My question is, in view of this will the minister table at the earliest possible date the Bladen report covering the inquiry into conditions in the automobile industry? At the same time, in view of the possibility of our having a budget before the end of this year, 1961, will the minister give us an assurance that among the things he will recommend will be the elimination—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —of the excise tax on automobiles?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the latter part of the question relating to fiscal policy is not one that is ordinarily entertained, but the other part might be dealt with.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first part of the observations of the hon. gentleman, which of course is the only part that is proper, as he well knows, I may say the Prime Minister has already made it clear to the house, in reply to repeated questions of the hon. member and others, that the Bladen report will be made available at the earliest appropriate time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You have had it a long time now. Is it not about time we had it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You had a lot of things for 22 years and you did nothing useful. You imposed this tax.

Mr. Pearson: Don't be so touchy.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION IN INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the government aware that the Kennedy administration has reduced the F.H.A. ceiling to 5¼ per cent—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member would start again. There was a certain amount of conversation and I regret that I was unable to hear his question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was a monologue by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Garland: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the government aware that the Kennedy administration has reduced the F.H.A. ceiling to 5¼ per cent effective Monday, and will the minister indicate whether any reduction is planned in our N.H.A. ceiling of 6¾ per cent before the end of this session of parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question has an air of familiarity. Is it not the same question the hon. member asked on a previous occasion?

Mr. Garland: No, Mr. Speaker, it is based on a recent news release.

Mr. Speaker: It is the same interest rate that the hon. member is inquiring about. May I say that it is in order to ask a question which suggests that action be taken by the government, but I suggest to the hon. member that it would not be in order to repeat the same suggestion every day, or even every other day; there should at least be an interval.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, do you not think one ought to be allowed to pursue this matter until the government does take some action?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is an opportunity to debate these matters; that is when the house normally presents its views to the government.

As I have said, an occasional reminder is not out of order, but the time of the house at this period should not be used or abused by repetition.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS

HULL, QUE.—MEETING FAVOURING SEPARATION OF PORTION OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister received the invitation, which seems to have been widely circulated among members of parliament in the last 24 hours, to hear one of his employees, Dr. Marcel Chaput, address a meeting to be held in Hull tonight in favour of secession or separation for a portion of the Canadian nation?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any such invitation.

Mr. Fisher: Does the minister approve of such political activities on the part of a civil servant?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now asking the minister to express an opinion in regard to something which is not within his departmental responsibility.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I think I should perhaps answer that question by saying that I disapprove of political activity on the part of civil servants, period.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NORTH BAY—REPORTED LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, following a question asked on Thursday last on orders of the day concerning lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways at Moncton, the hon. member for Essex East asked a supplementary question regarding a cut in railway employment at North Bay.

I inquired of the management of the Canadian National Railways in this respect, and they are unable to identify those reports of lay-offs at North Bay as relating to the Canadian National Railways. As the hon. member knows, there is another railway serving North Bay and the reports may have concerned that railway; but as it is a private company, my hon. friend will appreciate that it is not within my jurisdiction.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

STONEY CREEK, ONT.—PRESERVATION OF BATTLEFIELD PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the particular interest of this group in the preservation of national historic sites which represent our struggle for independence, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of the Prime Minister's assurance, given to the house on January 25, 1960 that the preservation of Battlefield park in Stoney Creek as a national historic site would receive immediate attention and consideration, and in view of the imminent despoilation of this site by the erection of a housing development, could the Prime Minister assure the house that immediate action will be taken by the federal government to acquire the land about to fall into the hands of a subdivision contractor, and thus preserve the historic site for posterity?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for Northern Affairs and National Resources, under whose jurisdiction the subject matter falls, might comment in response to the hon. member's rather lengthy question.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to inform the hon. member for Kootenay West that the government has been very active in this matter. I have been kept closely informed by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who has a particular interest in this site, as well as by the hon. member for Wentworth. Actually the Stoney Creek battle site is a national historic site. It was declared to be such in 1913, at which time the federal government erected a monument, and has since been maintaining that monument. The Wentworth historical society has also been very active in maintaining the site, and has made a particularly worth-while contribution in the maintenance of Gage House.

In view of the pending encroachment referred to by the hon. member, the chief of the historic sites division, Mr. Herbert, met with a local group last fall and a specific offer to purchase was made. Unfortunately there is an option held by a subdivider to purchase the land concerned. It is not the policy of the historic sites division to compete with subdividers' prices. This problem is recognized by the local people, with the result that a local committee has now been formed under the chairmanship of the mayor of Hamilton, and it hopes to resolve all these local difficulties so as to be in a position to make specific proposals to the historic sites division.

Mr. Herridge: I hope the minister realizes that there are members of other parties who would be willing to subscribe to any fund to retain this site.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR PROHIBITION ON USE OF TRAWLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on May 29, the hon. member for Trinity-Conception asked if I had received a petition from fishermen of certain parts of Newfoundland, and I should like at this time to inform him that no formal petition has yet been received by the Department of Fisheries in respect of the areas referred to in the question. However, we are fully aware of the situation in the area, as a result of correspondence, and we have been attempting to resolve the problem on an equitable basis.

The fact of the matter is that there are two groups of fishermen involved. One group represents strongly that fishermen should be permitted to fish with cod trawlers and draggers, or more modern gear, while the other group represents that the area should be reserved exclusively for hand lining. The officials of the department have made several proposals to adjust the situation on the basis of reservation of smaller areas for hand lining. So far these suggestions have not met with the complete approval of all fishermen. Efforts are being conducted to find a satisfactory solution to the problem.

There is no prohibition contained in the fisheries regulations for Newfoundland under the Fisheries Act against fishing in these areas with gear other than that used by large trawlers. Present regulations in this regard were made effective with the full support of many of the fishermen in the areas, in order to permit full exploitation of the fisheries in the locality.

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Am I correct in assuming that the minister has authority, under the present Fisheries Act, to deal with this problem?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SALK VACCINE—REPORTED COMPLAINTS ON SHIPMENTS TO AUSTRALIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of reported criticism in Australia in respect to 200,000 doses of Salk vaccine which were shipped by the Connaught laboratories to that country a month ago. Could the minister say whether or not batches of these 200,000 doses were tested in the laboratory of hygiene here in Ottawa as well as at Connaught laboratories?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I might say that I saw mention of this situation in an article appearing in the newspaper. I am having my officials look into the situation to see if every precaution was taken in this case, as is taken in every other case, and I am sure the results will show that every precaution was taken.

FLOODS

NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a report regarding the serious flood damage in New Brunswick which has occurred in the last three or four days, and which still exists? Will the Prime Minister give serious consideration to the provision of some measure of financial assistance to those individuals who have suffered serious damage and, in many cases, have lost all their worldly goods?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has supplemented what appears in the press regarding this catastrophe which struck the area in New Brunswick to which he refers. I am sure I speak for all Canadians when I express the deepest sympathy.

With regard to the second portion of his question, there have been certain principles generally followed throughout the years with reference to federal assistance in matters such as this. They are: The damage done must be beyond the competence of the provincial government or the municipal authorities to handle. In other words the financial loss must be of such a magnitude as to be beyond their financial resources. Furthermore, an application must be made by the provincial government for assistance. No such application has been made, and I presume that the loss suffered is regarded as being of such a nature as can be readily met by the provincial government. However, the matter will be looked into and the hon. gentleman may rest assured that where it is established there is federal responsibility, it will naturally be followed by action.

The Minister of National Defence points out that assistance has been asked from that department and that the army is putting up a bridge as a result of the request.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO QUOTA POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Minister of Agriculture gave the house some statistics on grain quotas in western Canada. Since the crop year has only another two months to go, I wonder whether the minister can inform the house in a general way what the quota objective will be after July 31, and whether in his opinion a general equitable quota can be reached so that all producers may have an opportunity to deliver an equal amount of grain; and I am thinking particularly of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the question of quotas is constantly in the minds of all farmers in western Canada. A week ago we had a meeting of the wheat board with the advisory board representing the farm organizations present, at which quotas for this year were discussed. It was agreed unanimously by the advisory board that the first objective was to accelerate the sales of wheat from western Canada. The second objective was to equalize the quotas as far as it was humanly possible to do so. Last year, for the first time in the history of quotas, we were able to equalize all the quotas in western Canada at 7 bushels with the exception of 43 points. With the amount of grain now sold and available for export, I think it can be accepted that this year certainly the figure of 7 bushels would not be impossible to meet.

I should like to warn the hon. member that the difficulties we now face with respect to box cars and shipping are still causing a great deal of trouble. I give this assurance to the hon. member and to all western farmers; that just as we equalized the quotas very successfully last year, every effort will be made this year to see that each shipping point gets a real 7 bushel quota.

AGRICULTURE

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS RESPECTING MARGINAL LANDS, RURAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES, ETC.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-77, to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I know it is not too usual in the history of the Canadian parliament for a minister to speak on his own bill on third reading. There are special reasons why I chose this course today.

I am sure that day must be a happy one for the Prime Minister, because it was he who in the days when he was in opposition enunciated the policy that in Canada there should be a national development program of which agriculture should be the basic cornerstone. This bill, the third reading of which I have just moved, is one of a series of five major steps by the present government over the past four years to put into legislative effect the ideas expressed by the Prime Minister when he was in opposition. Those ideas are not the product of just one person; they are the results of years of representations by farm organizations and farmers themselves; they are the results of years of study and discussion by intellectuals among the farm movement in trying to grapple with what was always pending, namely a very serious difficulty in the industry of agriculture.

I am very pleased that so many members of the house participated in the debate which started with the introduction of the legislation in December and dragged on until now, the last day of May, 1961. I am pleased because it indicates to me as the minister that many members realize just how this bill will beneficially affect not only their ridings but the regions in which they live, and eventually will affect the whole country. As I mentioned on second reading, I am pleased that the reaction across the country has been so good because, as I said in reply to the hon. member for Greenwood, the essence of the success of this legislation will depend on its educational aspects. I am going to quote for the records of the house a report dated May 26. It is taken from the "Ottawa report on agriculture", which is a weekly news analysis, featuring farm policy. This report goes out to all editors and leaders of farm thought in Canada:

In closing the debate this week, on second reading of the A.R.D.A. bill, agriculture minister Hamilton indicated that he is ready to take action under the legislation as soon as it is approved. He reported holding discussions with the farm—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but it is not regular to quote from dispatches or reports which reflect on or deal with what has taken place in this house. Even though the report is favourable the same rule applies.

Mr. Argue: Skip the propaganda.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Thank you very much. I will simply say that the interruption of the hon. member for Assiniboia is really the reason I am making this speech on third reading, together with the type of opposition we have had.

Mr. Argue: There is no opposition to this bill.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In the debate on this A.R.D.A. bill, Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to be able to rouse a discussion in the House of Commons similar to that which we have had across the country in the farm organizations.

I have said here I am pleased with the evidence that many individual farmers have realized what this can do for their particular regions. What I am not pleased about is that the opposition has failed in its function to criticize this bill constructively as to principle and objectives. When we were at the resolution stage I joined with the two opposition parties in asking the chairman to let us discuss the measure within the framework of the whole agricultural policy, because only by discussing this bill in relation to the other measures of the government under its national agricultural program can the purpose of this bill be understood.

I do not pose as a person who thinks he knows more about everything than everybody else. I am quite conscious of the fact that at great moments in our history it is sometimes very difficult to lift up legislative bodies in this and other countries to the significance of what is being done. I well remember reading of the historic occasion when the British North America Act was being discussed in the House of Commons in Great Britain. The bill went through in a matter of seven minutes, I believe, but following its passage there was a two-day debate on dog licences. Sometimes this seems to be the type of thing in which opposition members take a real interest.

So far as this very important bill is concerned, I say to the opposition that they have failed to criticize the bill constructively and I am put in the position where I have to stand up and point out what are the real dangers in this legislation and the risks that must be taken by the government of Canada and the provincial governments in meeting these dangers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Don't be so modest.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The opposition have failed to realize that today not only in Canada and the United States but all through the western world and in some parts of the Asiatic world the growth of technology is so rapid and so effective that countries which were once in a deficit position with respect to food production can now look forward, if they have not already reached this point, to being surplus food producing countries.

This was the real heart of the bill, which was part of the four or five point program to get at this fundamental difficulty. We have had discussions with the secretaries in the United States, and they agree with us that our fundamental approach to this bill is sound and right. They are following an intermediate course under a new policy of raising prices on fewer units of production from each farm. In other words, they are trying to bring an end to the intensive cultivation brought about as a result of previous support policies by putting forward different policies that will reward the farmers if they produce fewer units; or in plain terms, instead of paying subsidies on the basis of acreage reduction they are now giving subsidies on the basis of unit reduction of production.

Here is the challenge before us. Can we as a nation in this twentieth century face up to a fact which has been made clear to us over the last 25 or 35 years, that technology has now outpaced the demand for food for domestic consumption and for export to such a degree that the level of income of farmers is being forced downward and downward, no matter how efficient they become both in production and in organizing their distribution to meet this challenge. We are in this race between technology and the finding of proper uses for land. The agricultural rehabilitation and development bill in my opinion hits at the core of this problem better than any other legislation of which I am aware, not only on this continent but in western Europe.

The bill is tied in not only with the government's accelerated marketing program, which has not only brought about greater distribution of our goods within the country but also abroad, and with some success, I might say; it is also tied in with our policy of stabilization of prices, with our policy of encouraging the organization of groups of farmers to enter into crop insurance schemes on a voluntary basis not only for cereal crops but for special crops as well. It is tied in with the main gun in our arsenal, the farm credit corporation program which will provide farmers who are on reasonably good land with the opportunity to get capital in order to make full use of that land in traditional agriculture. It is tied in with the resources for tomorrow program coming forward this fall.

I had hoped that the opposition would take this bill, discuss it in the light of these other things we are doing and ask questions as to how it would fill the gap. At the resolution stage I did my best to point out that according to the 1956 census, 120,000 farmers had incomes of less than $1,200 a year, and that this was a challenge to us to try to do something that would not only help them increase their incomes but at the same time would give an opportunity to the other 70 per cent of the farmers of Canada who are on land that can return a good living.

This is the challenge that I put before the House of Commons. I had hoped that it would inspire not only from members of the opposition but from all members a thorough discussion of what the government was trying to do and whether this was the right way to go about it. So far, Mr. Speaker, no one has mentioned—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been following the minister with a good deal of attention, and I am asking myself whether his remarks are appropriate on third reading. The subject matter before the house on third reading is the bill itself as it has come out of the committee, and not the debate which would take place on second reading, when the principles of the bill and other possibilities were under consideration. We have now reached the point where we have a bill that has been approved in committee, and the terms of the bill itself are the only appropriate subject of discussion.

I do not like to interrupt the minister or circumscribe his speech, but in listening to what he has been saying I thought perhaps he was overlooking that limitation.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If I have failed to make it clear that I am discussing the bill I accept that failure as due to my own inability. The question that must be in the minds of farmers throughout the country is whether this three-fold program, the alternative land use program described in clause 2, the rural development program described in clause 3 and the soil and water conservation program described in clause 4, meets the over-all problem of making the best use of our land and at the same time fits in with the actual marketing situation as we see it in the world. If the bill does not meet these problems, then it is subject to proper criticism. My main point today is that I had hoped that during the long weeks of discussion members would take the bill and give me their thoroughly considered opinions whether the alternative land use concept related to marketing and I believe this is the first time such a concept has ever appeared in any legislation, certainly in the western hemisphere—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about Ontario?

Mr. Argue: What about P.F.R.A.?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about P.F.A.A.? Such propaganda.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The interuptions of the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Essex East indicate the depth of their ignorance as to what this bill is doing. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, that great piece of legislation, was brought in in 1934 and passed in 1935, and has done a great deal to rehabilitate the prairies over the last 25 years. As part of the concept of this bill we are transferring the principles of P.F.R.A. to the whole country under clause 4 of the bill.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether I might ask the minister a question. When he says they are transferring some of the principles or the principle of P.F.R.A. to this legislation, does it follow that the provisions of P.F.R.A. will not be maintained and that by this means the federal government will try to foist the larger part of the financial responsibility on the provinces?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member knows that I have answered this question on two occasions during the previous debate. I repeat that in the concept in clause 4, which relates to agreements for soil and water conservation projects, we seek to establish in all parts of Canada the same type of operation we have had under P.F.R.A. We are endeavouring to establish equality between what may be received by farmers in all parts of Canada and what has been received by those on the prairies in the last 25 years. The principles of financing will certainly follow the precedent of P.F.R.A. Under P.F.R.A. during the last two years we have been moving increasingly in the direction of joint operations between the federal and provincial governments on a 50-50 basis. This is supported by the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, who gave evidence before the Senate land use committee.

We have introduced what we consider is an important bill. All that hon. members of the opposition can do is snipe and ask if I have not heard of P.F.R.A. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that I witnessed the birth of P.F.R.A. when it was planned by a committee composed of western members. I saw its commencement and am aware of what it can do. That legislation was endorsed and supported by hon. members who were familiar with the unfortunate circumstance of drought. It is a valuable act. If there is anything that can be said to be to the credit of the previous government in 22 years of administration it is the action taken in broadening the scope of that act. We are simply attempting to apply those broad principles all across Canada; but that is only a small portion of the value of this legislation.

There has been no discussion of the theory of alternative land use as related to markets. I have exchanged ideas on this subject with businessmen and farmers in small towns across the country. I am aware that in small towns throughout Canada groups of businessmen, professional people and farmers have gathered together to plan programs to raise the income level of farmers in those areas.

The big question confronting the government is this. Can we as a government, supported by provincial governments across Canada, move fast enough under alternative land use programs to shift that land into uses that will provide a greater return to the farmer; and, in so doing, can we move quickly enough to stay ahead of the technological process that is taking place in building up production on farms which are not marginal? That is the key issue.

If I could venture a prediction I would say that the speed with which we move will be the $64 question in terms of whether or not the program envisaged by this legislation will be successful. The question is, can governments working in co-operation gather together sufficient information quickly enough and draft programs of alternative land use that will provide increased returns, and also keep ahead of the rising production of the good land areas and give the farmer on the good land a market for his product at a reasonable price? This has been the fundamental weakness of the price structure in agriculture for the last 20 years. To my knowledge this is the first time an effort of this kind has been made by a government in this part of the world in going out on a limb, as it were, by putting its full weight behind a program of alternative land use related to markets.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nonsense. What about the province of Ontario?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): An alternative land use program is altogether different from P.F.R.A., which has as its objective, the drainage and storage of water to increase productivity. Alternative land use involves taking land presently in use but not providing the farmer a good living and discovering an alternative use for it that will provide a better living to the farmer.

I could proceed to discuss this bill at great length. I simply wished to take the opportunity on third reading to say to the men and women all across Canada with whom I have discussed this program during the last few months that I appreciate their support for this bill. I appreciate their understanding of the tremendous effort we are expending under the alternative land use program. I appreciate their promise of support in assisting in rural development projects in communities. I wish to let them know that the understanding we reached did not fall on barren ground.

I had hoped to bring this measure before the house and inspire hon. members to the same intensity, sincerity and depth of discussion that I encountered all across Canada. Naturally I may be impatient that there has been little discussion in this chamber of the broad fundamentals. I know that as an ordinary member of parliament one must be interested in moving stones and stumps on a farm to improve conditions in a local area. I know there has to be an individual approach to this question at the constituency level on the part of hon. members. I had hoped, however, that among the leaders of the opposition parties there would have been an appreciation of what this program is aimed at accomplishing. I do not suppose I had any right to expect hon. gentlemen opposite to view it as part of a broad national agricultural program, as an important foundation stone of our national development policy.

Without the support of foundation stones at the four corners of this agricultural program we are building, the structure would not sit squarely. We believe that in A.R.D.A. we are providing an important foundation stone in Canadian agricultural policy. It is my feeling and hope that this measure will go down in the history of Canadian agricultural legislation as one of the most significant measures passed by this House of Commons.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to further delay the passage of this bill which would have passed by now if it had not been for the quite extraordinary performance on the part of the minister to which we have just been subjected. During most of the time the minister spoke the hon. gentleman was out of order, as Your Honour pointed out, and I assume I will be given the same latitude in dealing with some of the matters the hon. gentleman raised.

The minister began by pointing out that it was only in special circumstances that a minister would speak on third reading of a bill, and he said he felt there were special circumstances in this case. So far as I can gather from the minister's remarks the special circumstance in this instance is that the minister thought this was a great opportunity to glorify himself and the Prime Minister. I think it can be said of the minister, without offence, that with him modesty is not a deformity. I would have thought that the minister would have been satisfied with the glorification he has received in the debate on this bill from his colleagues in the Conservative party. We recall, of course, that one use this bill has already served was to fill a blank day in the House of Commons by enabling Conservative members to get up, one after another, and tell the minister how wonderful he was in the introduction of this legislation.

The minister also said that this was a great day for the Prime Minister because it represents the realization of the agricultural objectives the right hon. gentleman held for so many years in opposition. The agricultural objectives of the Prime Minister in opposition and during election campaigns may be summed up in two famous statements made by the hon. gentleman, neither of which is carried out in this bill in any way, shape or form. One statement was "Parity, not charity" and the other was "Elimination of the cost-price squeeze". It would indeed be a great day for the Prime Minister if those two objectives could be realized in legislation introduced by him or by the Minister of Agriculture. But of course this particular bill, useful as it is—and we have testified to its value—has no relationship whatever to these two agricultural objectives so often put forward in this house by the Prime Minister when in opposition and during election campaigns, but about which very little has been done to carry them out.

In the passion for propaganda of the Minister of Agriculture which extends even to the provision of gold plated syringes, the minister has made some exaggerated, misleading and, as Your Honour pointed out, quite inappropriate statements about this bill. I made a note of some of the hon. gentleman's words. He went so far as to say that the alternative land use concept is now, for the first time in the western hemisphere, being embodied in legislation. Quite apart from P.F.R.A. and what has been done in this country, the minister must know very little about agricultural policy in the United States in the last 15 or 20 years to make the extraordinary statement, which will be received with some interest in Washington, that for the first time in the western hemisphere—it is really a wonder he did not say "in the world" because the minister has a world embracing concept in his speeches—the alternative land use concept is being embodied in legislation.

The minister also said that we in the opposition were so remiss in our duty in our consideration of this bill that it was necessary for him to rise in his place and not only glorify the bill but point out these things because the opposition took no action in that regard. All the minister needs to do is read Hansard, even that of yesterday. If he did so he would soon find out that many questions were addressed to the minister pointing out some of the deficiencies in this bill which we approved in principle. Indeed, that is something that was done prior to yesterday. The opposition has discharged its duty in connection with this bill in supporting the principle of it and in trying to make it a better bill.

We understand the implications of this bill, and we understand the principles involved. We should do so, Mr. Speaker, because the initiation of this bill goes back to a time prior to the coming into office of this government, and the principles involved have been studied in the Senate committee over the years. We know all about the bill, and we know all about its origin.

One of the questions asked of the minister about this bill was what its immediate effect would be on the farm situation today. The minister has admitted that this is a long term proposition. Of course it is a long term proposition. It may have very considerable long range value in this country, and we hope it will. But the minister also has admitted that for the first year or two there will be no concrete and practical effect. Indeed, in one of his more exuberant statements, perhaps in order to cover up the lack of immediate effect and perhaps also to obscure the failure of the government to carry out its promised agricultural objectives, the minister said he expected that ultimately $600 million would be spent under this bill over the years, perhaps during the rest of this century. All this kind of loose, windy and exuberant talk does not mean anything.

This is an important bill. It has been supported in principle by the opposition. The opposition has tried to make it a better bill. We think the best thing we can do now is to get the bill passed, get it into action and see how it will work out. That would have been done days ago if it had not been for the policy of the government in putting up members one after another to speak in support of this bill, on one occasion indeed, merely to conceal the fact that there was no other business on the order paper.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The performance by the Minister of Agriculture this morning, Mr. Speaker, is extraordinary in many ways. It is an almost unheard of thing for a minister of the crown to initiate a debate on third reading of a bill that has had the unanimous approval of this house at every single stage. I suggest that this is an irresponsible attitude on the part of a government that says it is trying to facilitate the discussion of the business before the house this session.

The government says it wants to get out of here by the end of June. The Prime Minister has wielded the club and said "If you have not passed the legislation before the end of June, we will adjourn the house". Yet lo and behold, the Minister of Agriculture comes along and, on a third reading motion, initiates another discussion. It would seem that the government members were not content with a filibuster which they themselves conducted on second reading of the bill, but that they apparently want to start another filibuster today.

I have not a clue as to why the Minister of Agriculture would come in with this speech of his. There was nothing in it. It was just more hot air. He criticized the opposition. He said we had not discussed the bill and that we had not asked the right questions. Perhaps he should send us some questions, if he does not like ours, and we will ask them. But we cannot get any answers. There is nothing wrong with the questions.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Argue: The minister has made his speech. How many projects will be in operation next year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I gave the hon. member a chance to let me ask a question.

Mr. Argue: How many projects will be in operation next year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Will the hon. member tell me of one question, outside of that of the hon. member for Peterborough, which was asked by the C.C.F. party and which dealt with the essential principles of this bill?

Mr. Argue: I have been asking how many projects will be in operation under the bill. I have been asking the government what proportion of the financial cost it will pay, section by section. Until the minister gave this kind of general hint this morning that the provinces will have to pay 50 per cent, I have not known. I do not know what the government has in mind. However, I know that under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act the federal government pays the total cost of stock watering dugouts and so on and the farmer pays any balance, if there is a balance. Sometimes there is not a balance. However, the minister said this morning that these projects will be on a 50-50 basis with the provinces. I say that is going backwards, and that the federal government should be paying much more than 50 per cent of the cost.

This is the kind of bill that we have had before us on so many occasions in recent years. It is couched in general terms and fine-sounding phrases, and has resulted in windy speeches. The minister said he did not know why we did not discuss the other aspects of the government's farm program so that we would have an understanding of this tremendous program in all its particulars. The trouble is that we know the rest of the program. Under Bill No. 237 most of the so-called protection by way of support prices has been a hoax. There has been no solid floor. It has been just more window dressing and more guesswork.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appreciate the fact that there is some latitude beyond what might be normal by reason of the introductory speech, but it seems to me that the hon. member is going quite out of order in discussing another piece of legislation and its results.

Mr. Argue: I agree with you, Mr. Speaker, and I do so particularly because you called the minister to order when he was doing the same thing. But since the minister had been out of order for a time I thought that I might get out of order for a sufficient length of time to reply to this sweeping generality of his that we were not prepared to discuss the rest of the mess in the Department of Agriculture and that we wanted to confine our remarks only to this bill.

Some good things can come from this bill if there is a good administration. The minister can pay 99 per cent of the cost under this co-operative scheme with the provinces, if the government wishes to do so. But there is no certainty. What the minister is asking parliament to do is to give him a blank cheque or a green light without any definition as to what kind of projects will be undertaken, and without any idea of how costs will be apportioned, as to the timetable or as to any definition of the kind of projects that are going to add to farm income.

It is easy for the Minister of Agriculture to rise in his place and say he is most anxious that the program be brought in at a sufficiently rapid rate to enable land to be taken out of uses that are now being made of it and put into more productive uses. I have heard this kind of advice given to agricultural producers for a long time. May I say that I have a great deal of faith in the ordinary individual farmer. When he goes out to seed his crops I believe it is a fair bet that he is going to seed the kinds of crops that are likely to bring him the greatest income. I suggest he does not very often need all these windy insults that he does not know what he is doing with his land; that he has it in the wrong use; that if somebody could just come along and give him some free advice and a little direction he would stop all these terrible errors he is making and get his land into the right kind of use.

The good wheat land in western Canada is producing wheat and by and large very poor land for wheat production is producing grass. The farmers have shown themselves adaptable to growing such new products as mustard seed and rapeseed. It has been said to us in the House of Commons that the vast majority of farmers on the prairies do not know enough to produce livestock; they produce grain; they are all off to California or Florida for the winter.

An hon. Member: Or Ottawa.

Mr. Argue: The fact of the matter is that the vast majority of farmers who are today in the grain business are in the beef business, and they were in the beef business before this government came into power. They are producing beef because they find it gives them a moderate income which is comparable with the income they would expect from other products.

We have had a lot of advice from the minister. He says there are people on farms moving stumps and stones. If the minister were on a farm I doubt that he would be engaged in moving stumps and stones; I think I can understand the work the minister would be doing. He would be spreading; in some places thick, in some places thin. He was in good liquid form this morning; he was really spreading it. He did not mind getting some of it on himself, either, because he is the most enthusiastic supporter that the Minister of Agriculture has anywhere in Canada. He is really convinced that the legislation he has brought in, because it is worded a little differently, perhaps, than acts in some other countries, makes this the greatest government in the world with the greatest program in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear; it is the greatest.

Mr. Argue: It makes the Minister of Agriculture a flop as far as dealing with the main problems of agriculture is concerned. These are not the inability of the farmer to decide the crop or the use of his soil. The minister may want to give him all the advice in the world. He can make loose, insulting statements that the farmers have to have this kind of guidance, but I suggest to him that the greatest problem is in the field of prices for farm products, and this the government has yet to touch.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I just had to respond to the challenge of the Minister of Agriculture. One should never be ashamed, I suppose, or modest when within the aura or atmosphere that he casts, and I should like to tell the minister that I think he is full of nonsense when he says this is the first time the alternative land use concept has been put into legislation. I wonder whether the minister has ever heard of that great and good Progressive Conservative in the province of Ontario, (Hon.) Leslie Frost. I wonder whether he knows that Mr. Frost's government, I believe supported by the other parties in the legislature, has introduced a number of bills to which the alternative land use concept is central. I should like to send the minister some time some of the conservation authority reports. We have had one for the Neebing river valley, for instance, that affects the lakehead area. This sets out an analysis by agronomists, foresters and other land use experts, and deals with just what use should be made of the valley; its soils, drainage, ecology, as problems and prospects.

[Mr. Argue.]

The minister may not know it, but the legislation brings the municipal authorities into co-operative work. There has been developed an authority for us embracing several government agencies and voluntary groups. There have been arrangements for giving advice to farmers for terracing and reforestation in the area. There is even an authority forest. There are even provisions in township budgets for certain funds to do this. Right here within the little microcosm that I know, the minister is just wrong.

I wonder whether the minister ever reads the aspects of this matter which have been dramatized most, perhaps, by books such as "The Grapes of Wrath", the old story of the "Okies", and the things that were developed by the United States new deal. I wonder whether I could refer the minister to some of the books that cover the new deal in the agricultural recovery program and what it did in states like Iowa, Arkansas and others like them where the drought, overcultivation and grasshoppers had wrought destruction. I wonder whether the minister has driven through some of these areas recently and seen the developments. I should like to ask him whether he does not agree that the United States forestry development in Minnesota, for example, and the other lake states, where they had volunteers out in tents, was an excellent thing. This was all set up, I suggest, by legislation, and it involves alternative land use concepts. The lake states have reconverted thousands of acres from farm to forest land.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does not my hon. friend realize that the minister antedates F.D.R.?

Mr. Fisher: My hon. friend says the minister antedates F.D.R. He is certainly throwing a very wide loop, and I cannot follow the claims he has made at all. As a reader, Mr. Speaker, at times I have read over the reports of the Senate committee on land use. I was going to mention this in one of the earlier debates. I have never really felt that committee came to grips with the problem of land use in Canada at all.

I think most of the evidence given by experts was good. I have been interested in evidence given by people such as the greatest soils expert in Canada, Angus Hills, and some of the great forestry authorities. Some of these people put forward what I think is the crucial problem that I hope this bill affects, and that is what agricultural men call rivalry for land in the conturbations of growth such as we have all the way from Welland around to Oshawa. To me this is the greatest agricultural redevelopment problem we have. It is a matter of stopping the growth of the kind of suburbs that we have and the intermixture we are getting which is taking some of the best land out of agriculture and has destroyed the whole aesthetic sense of a region and much of its aesthetic possibility.

I did not think it proper to raise these things on a piece of legislation which largely depends upon the whims, energies and tax resources of at least ten other authorities in addition to the Department of Agriculture. I did not want to mention my own experience in trying to get the officials of the Department of Agriculture interested in the rather minor agricultural problems that we have in our area. They are not minor to the men who are involved, but we have very few farmers. My experience is that there is about as much enthusiasm amongst the Department of Agriculture officials for any kind of survey work or analysis of the problems of a region as there is with hon. members in a party caucus, where people can put forward ideas in a fleeting way but usually without the time or the response to do something about them or carry them out.

I did not want to raise these doubts because the minister and the Conservative supporters were so enthusiastic. I have almost begun to think this is a bill that has a brilliant future behind it because of the exaggeration of the minister about what it can do, but when it is set against the practical difficulties that we are all aware of in legislation that is not unlike it, the comparison is very sobering. I should like to ask the minister, does he not agree that the legislation in the Canada Forestry Act, for example, which has been on the statute books for some time and was put in by a previous administration, contains remarkable parallels in its purposes, objects and structure to this A.R.D.A. bill?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Do you want me to answer that question?

Mr. Fisher: I hope the minister will answer it. I think the similarities are marked. No one who is interested in forestry in Canada will really claim that this bill has worked well, that it has worked evenly or that it has done a great deal for the standards of forestry in this country. It has made its main impact at the fire prevention level and not in the field of silviculture. I think if the minister is honest he will acknowledge that.

It seems to me the reason this does so poorly in the field of silviculture is that there is a great deal of controversy over the handling of silvicultural programs. Silviculture is an approach to or search for an ideal. Anyone can think pragmatically in terms of putting out a forest fire, but when the problem concerns the envisaging of the situation existing 50, 75 or 100 years ahead it involves another kind of land use concept, another type of thought. When there are ten provincial authorities and a federal authority attempting to give leadership, using varying kinds of carrots, which are not too definite, the results are not exciting.

I have not changed my opinion in regard to this bill, and probably should have retained my seat, as I intended to from the start, to allow the hon. members of this house who are interested in the farming industry to deal with it. In my opinion this is an imaginative bill, but it is an abstraction rather than a concrete measure. When hon. members begin to holler in excitement about an abstraction such as this before it has even begun to jell or fill in, as being a new basis for our agricultural industry and economy, that seems to me to be nothing more than a political exaggeration.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to what has been said this morning regarding this bill, because there is a great deal of concern in my constituency regarding the construction of projects which might well be carried out under this proposed legislation.

I am particularly interested in the cost sharing arrangements for projects of this type. I realize that the minister has previously stated that the cost sharing arrangements under this legislation will be similar to the cost sharing arrangements under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I believe I am safe in saying that the federal government has on most occasions in the past paid for the construction of dams, and that the provinces have taken over the provision and distribution of power and the distribution of water for irrigation or stock watering. I believe that has been the situation in regard to dams built in western Canada, such as the St. Mary's river dam in southern Alberta, and the South Saskatchewan dam.

I realize there is a great deal of difficulty in arriving at a formula in respect of cost sharing arrangements, because of the many types of cost sharing arrangements that have been entered into in respect of forestry, community pastures, dams and the distribution of water, but could the minister indicate whether irrigation and stock watering projects, such as those which have been carried out under the P.F.R.A., will involve cost sharing arrangements under the scheme similar to those arrangements made under the P.F.R.A.

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two in respect of this proposed legislation.

Mr. Hellyer: Another farmer.

Mr. Pitman: We have seen today the strong pressure which has been brought to bear in this house in respect of this measure. I am sure this day will go down in history as being the day a minister initiated debate on third reading having already provided his own opposition. I think that represents the final step in this peculiar procedure which has taken place in respect of this bill.

I must say that we have already received as an act pamphlets advertising the minister's proposal, and in view of that fact, what has gone on here has been rather surprising to me. As a student of government I was under the impression that the wealth of the country was controlled by responsible government. In spite of the fact that this proposed bill is in the legislative process in this house, and has been introduced by the minister today for third reading, the minister has gone around the country to find opposition to it. If the minister finds no opposition in the country he can, of course, come back to this house with 200 members on the government side, and with the executives of practically all the farm organizations in existence arrayed behind him, and say there is virtually no critcism to the proposal except that expressed by members on this side of the house, which the minister can refute by saying that all farm organizations are in favour of it. I wonder, as a student of government, whether that is a legitimate form of pressure to be placed on those of us who are on the opposition side.

The minister also reminded us that we did not bring in this business regarding alternative land uses, but I think he must remember that he has given a great deal more information to the individuals with whom he spoke across the country, so far as this bill is concerned, than he has given us. He has not given us much information, or anything specific about its purposes whatsoever. I must agree with the Leader of the Opposition that we should be informed as to what is happening. Let us find out what will take place when the provinces do come into this scheme; how much money will be paid out by the federal government and how much money the provinces will have to contribute to this proposal, which is supposed to solve all of the problems of the farmers. I asked a couple of questions yesterday in respect of the farmers' union regarding this proposed bill, but as yet have not received any answers. I shall have to place questions on the order paper, hoping that in that way I will obtain some information.

The minister must have been reading different books and articles than I have read in regard to the problems of world technological food production, because he gave a picture which indicated that the world is virtually being drowned and buried in its own food as the result of modern technology. Surely that is not a truthful position at all. I am under the impression that there are a tremendous number of people in this world who go to bed hungry every night. When I listened to the minister I began to get the impression that there is no problem, although it has been my understanding that this world food problem has not been solved at all because of a lack of imagination on the part of countries of the west, including Canada.

The area of this problem, which has not been solved, involves the devising of a means to put the food presently being produced into the mouths of the hungry peoples of the world. The problem does not involve the existence of statistical tables which show that there is an overproduction of food, but has regard to the ever increasing number of starving people in different countries of the world. There are more hungry people in this world today than there were ten years ago, and that number is increasing every year. The problem involving the destruction of world food markets by modern technological methods is a small one in terms of the world situation.

The minister suggests that great efforts must be made to increase the incomes of the many individuals on the farms who are now receiving in the neighbourhood of $1,200 per year. I admit there is a challenge in regard to raising the standard of living of those individuals, but I see no answer to that challenge in this proposed legislation. I suggest the minister should realize that those individuals are now paying, in effect, retail prices for all their needs when they should actually be paying wholesale prices. Farming is an industry, and should be entitled to wholesale prices. Perhaps the difficulty arises in many cases because the farmers are not sufficiently organized in a co-operative way to demand the privilege of purchasing at wholesale prices, but I do not find anything in this legislation in that regard.

I am sure all hon. members realize that many farms in eastern Ontario contain a great number of trees, but how can we be assured that under this legislation farmers will be able to market these trees at a better price than they are receiving today?

I fail to understand the minister's answer to the criticisms expressed by members of the opposition in respect of this legislation.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Hamilton, Qu'Appelle), which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the third time and passed.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF ALLOWANCES AND INCOME CEILINGS, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-101, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not know of anybody in the house who would prefer to second this bill more than the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who has been interested in veterans affairs throughout his life, particularly during all the years he has been in this House of Commons. He has consistently, year in and year out, whether in opposition or as leader of the government, pressed for attention to the veterans, and scarcely a week goes by that he does not draw to my attention some individual among our veterans population who requires special care and attention. The government generally takes the same attitude as the Prime Minister does in these matters.

I now have pleasure in bringing before the house the bill about which we talked on May 16 when we discussed at some length the resolution introducing this bill. I do not intend to repeat what I said on that occasion. I took some time then to outline the background of the war veterans allowance legislation, and to indicate the extent to which it affects veterans across this country as well as the benefits it is bringing to people who so richly deserve the thanks of their countrymen.

It is rather difficult to discuss the general principle of the bill because it contains a number of wide ranging amendments dealing with certain matters of administration and other factors. The most important aspect of the bill is, of course, the increases that are suggested in the rates and ceilings to compensate for the recognized changes that have taken place in the cost of living, and to provide for the continuation of the general relationship which has existed between the rates and ceilings under this act and pensions payable under the Pension Act.

When I was speaking on the resolution on May 16, I referred to the fact that pensions had been increased across the board by 20 per cent this year, except for the somewhat greater increase of 33⅓ per cent for orphaned children who had not been included in previous increases which had been made to the pensions. In giving consideration to the amount by which the rates and ceilings under the War Veterans Allowance Act should be increased, the government has concluded that the same percentage should be applied across the board as was recently granted pensioners, namely 20 per cent and that orphan children likewise should be granted an increase commensurate with those given to pension orphans. Accordingly, this bill sets forth revised schedules A and B which provide for a 20 per cent increase both in the maximum monthly rates of allowance and in the maximum total annual incomes applicable to the various classes of recipients.

I might draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, particularly to the allowances and the ceilings applicable to orphans as proposed in the schedules. The allowances are now the same as the pensions payable to one, two or three orphans respectively. The other improvement that would be proposed in the schedules is that where a recipient or his spouse is blind the income ceiling which applies is in each instance $120 a year greater than the ceiling which applies where blindness is not present. The schedules under the present act recognize the difficulty experienced by the blind to the extent of allowing a comparable increase in the income ceiling where the recipient's spouse is blind. We have thought it desirable to extend this advantage where a single recipient or a married recipient or his spouse has been thus afflicted.

The rather substantial increase in the rates and income ceilings is expected at the present time to cost about $17 million on an annual basis. This is a considerably greater increase than that which has been provided in some other years when the war veterans allowance rates were raised. In the year 1948 an increase was provided of about $3,500,000, in round numbers. In 1952, the increase was $7 million. In 1955, the increase provided was slightly over $8 million and in 1957 it was slightly over $4 million. On this occasion we are proposing to provide an increase of $17 million. That will raise the annual liability or at least it will make the annual liability quite a bit larger than it has been in the past. Just by way of comparison I might point out that the annual liability or the annual expenditure by the dominion government on war veterans allowances in the fiscal year 1956-57—and again these figures are in round numbers—was $41 million. In 1957-58, it was just under $48 million. In the fiscal year 1958-59, it was over $54 million. In 1959-60, it rose to slightly over $57 million. In the fiscal year 1960-61 it rose to slightly over $58 million, although there was a rather substantial decrease in the number of pensioners from the earlier wars. The present proposed increase—and of course, it is an estimate—of $17 million will provide for the 20 per cent increase across the board that I have mentioned.

I shall touch on just two or three of the highlights in the bill rather than deal with it clause by clause because the intention, of course, is to do with this bill as was done with other bills dealing with veterans matters, namely to refer the bill for intensive study to the standing committee on veterans affairs. That committee will go through the bill clause by clause. Officials will be present to provide any additional information that is required by the members. Then when the bill comes back to the house, in committee of the whole house we shall again have the opportunity of discussing it clause by clause. So all that I shall do now is to touch briefly on some of the highlights in the bill beyond the ones that I have already mentioned.

Last year, as you may recall, Mr. Speaker, when the War Veterans Allowance Act was amended provision was made for the payment of an allowance outside of Canada to a qualified veteran who had resided here for at least 12 months and had left Canada as a recipient subsequent to the amendment. That has been found to be a desirable change in the act. We now propose that similar provision be made for a recipient's widow. As the act stands at the present moment, in order to qualify she would have to return to Canada if she were living abroad, and this might be a considerable hardship on a number of widows for whom return to Canada would be impractical or impossible for various reasons. We are therefore proposing that the requirement of return to Canada be withdrawn under certain conditions and therefore a widow who left Canada at about the same time as did her husband recipient in order to live with him elsewhere, if she is otherwise eligible and if she applies within one year after his death, may become a recipient. Similar action is proposed with regard to the orphan children of the recipient so that they too will not be obliged to return to Canada in order to establish qualification.

Another highlight which affects a small but very important group of our citizens is one which has reference to South African veterans. Under this act the allowance may be given to Canadian veterans of the South African war if they require assistance. However, the deadline for service in South Africa in the present act is May 31, 1902, as that was the date on which the South African war was declared to be officially at an end. We have knowledge that late in that month there were a number of Canadian soldiers who were on board ship but who had not landed in South Africa prior to the end of the conflict. We propose granting eligibility on the service basis to soldiers who had embarked for service in South Africa prior to the deadline. There are very few survivors in this group and they are all in the 80-year or 90-year age group, so I am sure that no one would object to that type of benefit being provided.

With regard to first world war veterans, an amendment was brought before the house—I am not sure whether it was last year or the year previous—permitting them to get allowances under this act if they had been in the United Kingdom during the first world war for a period of 365 days. Similarly there were veterans of that war who were on board ship and who consequently did not get in the full quota of 365 days in the United Kingdom prior to the terminal date which was set at November 12, 1918. So we are proposing to recognize the fact that these members of the forces, in proceeding to and from the United Kingdom prior to that date, underwent hazards at sea and therefore that the time they spent on the high seas could reasonably be included in the calculation of the length of their service in the United Kingdom. If the house approves, that amendment is in the bill for consideration and I hope it will be passed.

There are other items in the bill which as far as individuals are concerned are of equal importance to the ones I have mentioned, but it is not appropriate on second reading to go into too great detail with regard to the various clauses.

The members of the war veterans allowance board, other officials of the department, my parliamentary secretary and myself and, interested hon. members in the house have put a great deal of time and attention into considering problems concerning amending the War Veterans Allowance Act. We have drawn heavily upon the useful suggestions that have been put before us by the Canadian Legion and other veterans organizations.

We have accepted most of the suggestions that have come from these organized bodies. I think the amendments we are now proposing will give recognition to changing conditions which affect veterans and their dependents and I hope the amendments we are proposing will be agreeably accepted by the great body of Canada's veterans and their dependents as well as by the people generally in our country.

The War Veterans Allowance Act, as I mentioned at the resolution stage, is designed to assist bona fide veterans who volunteered for service, in many instances endured a great deal of hardship overseas, who were lucky enough not to be wounded during the course of that service and some of whom, unfortunately, after their return to Canada, for a dozen different reasons found it rather difficult to become firmly established in civilian life and to make provision for all the hazards to which everyone is subject during the course of life.

Some of them have, through economic distress, illness within the family or for other reasons, found the going a bit difficult. To these veterans, as to the disability pensioners, there is a debt owed by the people of Canada. Once again, as with the disability pensioners, we are proposing to pay in part that debt to these men who were quite prepared, when you think about it seriously, to make the supreme sacrifice during wartime.

We hope the house will receive this bill and consider it very carefully. In committee I am prepared to give careful consideration to any suggestions which might improve the drafting which we have done here. This again, as with the Pension Act, is a subject matter to which the house can give serious attention without some of the disturbances to which we subject ourselves from time to time. My experience in the House of Commons is that when the cause of the veteran is before it, the house is quite prepared to deal with it at its best. The House of Commons, in the study of veterans legislation during the time I have been here, has always shown itself to be at its best. It is in that spirit and that mood that I present to the house this bill suggesting amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this bill has already been discussed at considerable length in the resolution stage and I have no intention of detaining the house for more than a very few minutes at the present time.

As the minister has already indicated, this has never been a partisan matter in the house. We have all desired to do the right thing by the veterans ever since I have sat in this house. The veterans are fortunate, of course, at the present time in their minister. There are not many among my friends who managed to get into the front line in both wars. I do not know how the minister did it. I suppose he played up his age in the first war and played down his age in the second war. At any rate he managed to get into both, and if the veterans ever had a sympathetic friend, it is he.

I have no intention of dealing with the details of this bill. I am sure they will receive the sympathetic consideration that the minister mentioned. But I thought I should like, for just a moment or two, to carry the mind back and picture these men, many of them now old, who are receiving these benefits and whose minds will no doubt be carried back to the days when they made the efforts and sacrifices by which we are now seeking to deal justly.

I should like just for a moment to refer to the South African war, of which there are a few survivors left, and to recall that they were the pioneers. This was the first time we had ever sent troops overseas, and I should like to recognize their service and the example they have been ever since to others.

Then I should like to go on to the first great war. There are somewhere between 35,000 and 40,000 veterans of that war who will receive the benefits of this bill. I should like to recall the summer of 1914 and read quite briefly from the speeches of Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the special session of 1914 after war had been declared.

I will do this very briefly, but I have been moved by what I read here as showing the spirit of co-operation which I am sure will be most pleasant to us all. I will now read very briefly from what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said on August 19, 1914. I would ask the house to bear in mind that in 1914 we did not have to declare war ourselves; it was declared for us; but there was no hesitation on the part of the government of that day in stepping right in and taking vigorous steps to make our participation real. I am glad now to read from what Sir Wilfrid said, and I think the house will be glad to hear it:

> It is our duty, more pressing upon us than all other duties, at once, on this first day of this extraordinary session of the Canadian parliament, to let Great Britain know, and to let the friends and foes of Great Britain know, that there is in Canada but one mind and one heart, and that all Canadians stand behind the mother country, conscious and proud that she has engaged in this war, not from any selfish motive, for any purpose of aggrandisement, but to maintain untarnished the honour of her name, to fulfil her obligations to her allies, to maintain her treaty obligations, and to save civilization from the unbridled lust of conquest and domination.

> We are British subjects, and today we are face to face with the consequences which are involved in that proud fact. Long we have enjoyed the benefits of our British citizenship; today it is our duty to accept its responsibilities and its sacrifices.

Sir Robert Borden, in reply, said:

> I have listened, . . ., with the utmost interest and profound admiration to the patriotic speech which has just fallen from my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. Already, even before parliament had been called, he had announced to his friends and to the country that his meetings were discontinued, that the voice of party strife was hushed for the time being, and that he and his friends would co-operate in every way with those upon whom falls the duty, the very responsible duty at this moment, of administering the affairs of this country—

I read that with feeling because I thought perhaps others might be interested to have that recalled to mind, and would take pleasure in the fact that at that moment we had such unanimity in a common cause.

I look back to the war of 1914, and the rather happy go lucky way, perhaps, many people went to war. I like to think of one boy who had joined up and received his first pay. In those days pay was handed out in legal tender. When this boy was handed his first pay he said, "What is this for?" He was informed that it was his pay. "My God, do we get paid to fight?" was his comment.

I remember the first big action in 1915 in which Canadians took part and distinguished themselves. Then comes that ghastly period from 1915 to 1917 when we were involved in trench warfare where men had to cross flat fields in the face of machine guns, suffering fearful casualties.

I recall the first appearance of tanks in September of 1916. One can always find a certain amount of humour even in war, and it is a fact that when these ungainly creatures, which looked liked prehistoric monsters, lurched and rolled across the battlefield, they were greeted with roars of laughter.

The battles of the Somme, Vimy Ridge and Passchendaele belong to those days. Then came the early days of 1918 when we nearly lost the whole thing and then the 100 days from August 8 to November 11, and the steady relentless march to victory.

With victory we thought we had—God forgive us—saved the world for democracy. If we had been told in 1918 that in something less than 20 years we would be faced with a much worse situation we should not have believed it. Then came the second world war and the terrible days of Dunkirk, the march across Africa, the days of El Alamein, D-day and the march through France, Italy, Belgium and finally Germany.

I should just like to assure those pensioners who will receive the benefits of this bill that we do not forget them nor their efforts and sacrifices, that we realize civilian life has not dealt with them perhaps as gently as it might have dealt with them, and that we will pass this bill in an attempt to help make life somewhat more palatable to those who have played a great part which meant so much to this country.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, we of the official opposition welcome and support this bill, as we welcomed and supported the resolution which preceded it.

We are very pleased to see the 20 per cent increase in the monthly rates and income ceilings for war veterans allowance recipients. We are particularly pleased to see the increase in the rates for surviving spouses, for orphans, and the revision in the income ceiling regarding blind veterans. We are also pleased because of the change in the allowable property value exemption, which has been increased by 25 per cent, and the allowable real estate equity, which has been increased from $8,000 to $9,000.

All of these changes have been advocated on many occasions by the Canadian Legion, and by other veterans organizations, as well as by many hon. members on both sides of this house. It must be a source of great satisfaction not only to veterans, but to the public at large, to have these measures brought forward in this bill today.

I should like to bring the minister's attention to one case which I feel has been overlooked. The minister himself, referring back to the debate on the resolution, mentioned the 133,000 veterans who had lost their war veterans allowance benefits because of the increase in their pensions.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order; I think it is convenient at this time to correct that statement. There were not 133,000 in that category, but 13,000, with some overlapping.

Mr. Carter: Yes.

Mr. Jones: Of course they did not lose their benefits; they merely did not receive the full advantage of the increase.

Mr. Carter: Those veterans were not able to receive any benefit from the increase in pensions because their war veterans allowance was reduced by the same amount.

In order to bring these veterans back to the footing where they were prior to the pension increases, it would have been necessary to make the effective date of this bill, the same date the pension increases became effective. This bill will come into effect on June 1, as I read it, and veterans will, in a sense, lose two or three months' increase, which they otherwise would have enjoyed.

We on this side are also very pleased to see that the act has been extended to cover three additional groups of recipients. Those groups are: children of unmarried parents, who are war veteran allowance recipients; the dependents of war veterans allowance recipients, who died outside Canada; and the dependents of deceased allied veterans who have been declared eligible after death.

In view of the fact that this coverage has been extended, I should like to record my disappointment because of the fact the government has not seen fit to extend the coverage under this bill to members of the merchant navy, to members of rescue services, and fire fighters. As a resident of Newfoundland, I am especially disappointed that nothing has been done to bring the Newfoundland foresters of world war II within the compass of the War Veterans Allowance Act. However, I suppose we cannot expect everything at once. I should like to ask the minister to keep this in mind, and to bring forward the necessary changes at the earliest possible date.

I am a little disappointed also because the minister has not seen fit to eliminate the 365 day requirement in respect of veterans of world war I. He has taken a short step in that direction by the inclusion of the number of days spent by veterans on the voyage between Canada and the United Kingdom. There does seem to be, however, little reason for retaining this qualification at all, because naval veterans who cruised in home waters have been regarded as serving in a theatre of war. If members of the navy serving in home waters are entitled to these benefits, while members of the army and other armed forces are not entitled to the benefits in respect of the time spent in other than territorial waters, that does not sound logical to me.

In view of the fact that our old veterans are fading away quite rapidly, if we do not make the changes I suggest very soon there will not be many of them alive to benefit. I suggest that the few extra dollars required to date this legislation back, so as to make it conform with the recent amendment to the Pension Act, and to extend coverage to the groups I have mentioned, would be insignificant when compared with the $17 million required for the extra benefits envisaged in this bill.

We were very happy to hear the minister say that the bill would be sent to the standing committee on veterans affairs. We know it will be given thorough study and examination in the committee, and in the course of that examination we can have the benefit of the opinions of the departmental officials and also of whatever representations any veterans organization may care to bring before us. We are very happy to have this legislation before us and we shall do everything possible to expedite its passage.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we have just witnessed a precedent shattering occasion rarely seen in Canadian parliamentary history in that the Prime Minister of Canada seconded the motion for the section reading of a bill. I thought it was worth bringing particularly to the attention of hon. members.

We in this group are very happy that the government has responded favourably to the representations of the Canadian Legion, of a number of other veterans organizations in Canada and of members of this house who are supporters of all the parties represented here, and in so doing has recognized the need—and it has been an urgent one for some time—for an increase in the rates of war veterans allowance to compensate the recipients for the increase in the cost of living. It has been very necessary for some time and because it will meet a particular need of those veterans and their dependents we are very pleased to see this amendment in the bill.

We are also very pleased to see that there is a provision in the bill which, after the bill becomes law, will make it unnecessary for the widows of veterans overseas in receipt of war veterans allowance to return to Canada in order to qualify. I suppose the numbers are not large, but it does remove what many of us considered a quite unnecessary inconvenience to those widows, and I am sure they will be very grateful for this amendment.

The amendment that now makes it possible for South African veterans who were aboard ship going to South Africa or returning to Canada, prior to June 1, 1902, to qualify will be welcomed by the very few survivors of that campaign. They are few in number, but I am sure we all rejoice in the fact that this amendment will bring some happiness to them.

Also the amendment in the bill, after it becomes law, which will make it possible to include in the 365 days required as service in Great Britain the time spent going to Great Britain or returning from there will meet the circumstances of quite a number of veterans. I know several who were denied the opportunity to receive the allowance because they were short a few days or a week or so. However, like the hon. member who preceded me, I am sorry that the government has not seen fit to withdraw the 365 days of service in Great Britain or now on the seas required to qualify for war veterans allowance.

There is another amendment that I am particularly interested in because it affects one or two cases in my own constituency; in fact, one most unfortunate case, because the veteran in question with whom I had a close acquaintance served in my battalion and I have a particular knowledge of the facts. For that reason and for the benefit of widows generally, I now am pleased to see that a widow who has lived as a wife with a veteran for seven years or more prior to his death can qualify as a war veterans recipient. I am not going to go into the details at the present time but there can occur some most unfortunate circumstances which are not the responsibility of the veteran or the wife concerned. In this case the lady in question received misinformation from the war office in London that her first husband had been killed, and he turned up 40 years later. As far as I can understand he simply disappeared for that time. He lost his memory and turned up 40 years later. The lady in question had married a second time. On this account—until the amendment becomes law—this circumstance has unfortunately affected her right to the war veterans allowance and I am very pleased to see this amendment included. I am sure it does not affect very many widows but it does remedy some injustice that has been suffered by a few; not intentional injustice, because legislation is amended as a result of experience. I am sure this amendment has been included in the legislation because of a few unfortunate circumstances somewhat like the type I have described. We amend legislation because of experience but in so doing we often remedy a quite unintentional injustice which even members of the veterans affairs committee who study this legislation throughout the years fail to see until a case is brought to their attention.

I am also glad to see the increase from $25 to $50, in the amount of interest on bank deposits, and so forth, and the increase in the exemption on property from $8,000 to $9,000. These are in a sense, in relation to the increase in rates, minor amendments but they do produce some benefits for a minority of persons who are otherwise qualified for the allowance.

I am glad to hear that the bill is to be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs. The committee will hear the representations of the Canadian Legion and other veterans organizations. It will obtain the opinions of the members of the committee and the bill will be reported back to the house where there will be opportunity to discuss it again. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that we will not be too long winded about this because I am sure those persons who will profit from these benefits are anxious to receive them as soon as possible.

I was quite interested in what my hon. friend from Greenwood had to say. We are of a similar generation. We are a couple of old soldiers who are beginning to fade away, as far as I can see. I was interested in his reference to the South African war and to world war I. I remember as a boy being taken to Portsmouth to see Lord French's army disembark at Portsmouth and march to the camps in Hampshire, and other places.

Mr. Macdonnell: We were not in the South African war.

Mr. Herridge: I do not want to mislead the house in that respect; we were not at the South African war in person but we were of an age to understand what was going on during the South African war. I was one of those who listened to Sir Robert Borden in Belgium and I also had the opportunity to listen to Sir Sam Hughes in France. We gave a bombing demonstration at his request. I was then a sergeant of bombers, and the boys were so annoyed at something he had said prior to coming to this demonstration that as we used square sandbags as dummy bombs, one chap lodged one right on Sir Sam's hat, and we all enjoyed the thud, and his surprise but that is all in the past.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I must not detain the house. However when one gets to my age one is inclined to reminisce. Because of Canada's gratitude to those who defended our shores during various wars, because of our recognition of the responsibility of the Canadian people to veterans and their dependents and because of our recognition of their needs, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) was quite correct when he made reference to the fact that partisan strife is hushed temporarily, and, I trust, to their advantage.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Canadian Legion I was indeed very proud a few minutes ago when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) seconded the motion of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) for second reading of this bill. As I am the son of a veteran of the South African war and also of the first great war and as I have personally witnessed the suffering and hardships endured by many of our veterans, may I say that 1961 will be a memorable year in the minds of all veterans. This bill is the third piece of legislation we have dealt with this year for the purpose of aiding our veterans. I think it is needless to say that the minister is the right man in the right place, and I am sure that all veterans in Canada will wish me to congratulate him.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the principle of the bill. I recognize that it is a little difficult to define the principle of the bill briefly because the bill contains a number of amendments. However, I think we can say that the principle of the bill is to improve the War Veterans Allowance Act, and as far as that is concerned I wholeheartedly agree. I think it is wise that the legislation governing war veterans allowances should be brought into line with previous legislation dealing with an increase in pensions. In my view it is a good thing that these two pieces of legislation should be brought into balance.

I am also happy that the bill is going to be sent to the standing committee on veterans affairs where its various clauses will receive the attention they deserve and where we will be able to receive from the officials the explanations that will be required. I have always believed that the 365-day clause in the legislation has been a little rigid. I am pleased that the minister has now been able to bring in a bill to provide for the inclusion not only of days spent in the United Kingdom but also days spent in travelling to and from that country. I believe that a fair number of veterans who heretofore were excluded will now be able to come under the act.

There is one question I should like to ask. In the past some veterans have applied for the war veterans allowance and have not been eligible because of falling a few days short of meeting the 365-day requirement. If the days now to be added because of travelling to and from the United Kingdom will make them eligible, will those who have already applied be notified or will they have to re-apply after the bill has been passed? When the minister replies I hope he will be able to give an answer to that question.

I cannot refrain from saying that if the days travelling to and from the United Kingdom are to be included in the number of days which will make a veteran eligible for the war veterans allowance it must then be conceded that days spent on the high seas were days spent in a theatre of war. That, of course, brings me back to the merchant navy. One thing that I regret about the bill is that members of the merchant marine are not made eligible for the benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act. On an earlier occasion this year and also last year I brought to the attention of the house the plea of the Newfoundland foresters. I gave the history of this group of men some time ago in the house. Again I must say that I had hoped these people would have been covered in any amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. Not only would I like to see included the veterans who belonged to the merchant marine and the Newfoundland foresters but also those who belonged to the fire fighting service and the tug rescue service. However, Mr. Speaker, in general I agree wholeheartedly with the principle of the bill. I do not want to make extended remarks because I hope the bill will receive speedy passage through the house. I know it will be given careful examination in the standing committee. I hope that the bill will be passed quickly by the house so that our veterans will be able to receive the increase in benefits which I think they rightly deserve.

(Translation):

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to say a few words about this legislation. I need not tell the house that I heartily approve this bill.

Once again, these measures prove to those who served in the three armed forces during both world wars and the Korean war, that the Canadian government in fully conscious of its responsibilities towards those who, when the hour of danger struck, did not hesitate to go abroad to face the enemy, in order to preserve the principles in which they believed and an ideal which was so worth defending.

Mr. Speaker, most particularly, I should like to refer to the remarkable services rendered by our Canadian soldiers during both world wars. One thing which adds value to the heroic deeds of our Canadian soldiers in the war is the fact that this country, either in the first world war or in the second world war was never as directly threatened as France the beautiful, or even Great Britain, despite the natural barrier of the English channel in the case of the latter.

On the contrary, this country's frontiers were such that no other country was better protected from the horrors of war than Canada.

Why was it, then, that so many of our people, both in 1914-18 and in 1939-45, freely accepted to don the uniform and to go abroad to fight an enemy that did not even seem to threaten them in any direct or precise manner?

Perhaps the true reason lies in the fact that some Canadians had enough love for their respective mother countries, namely Great Britain and France, to feel compelled to lend a hand to those who had to fight for their own survival.

But, in my opinion, if so many Canadians joined the armed forces of their own free will, it is mostly because we, in Canada, are conscious of our responsibility towards democracy. We know how good it is to live freely in a free land. We also appreciate all the advantages of this extraordinary freedom we enjoy thanks to our way of life and especially to our system of government. We realize that freedom must be defended at all costs and that the ideals of truth, law and justice must be the formal rule of all of man's actions.

Moreover, I am of the opinion that the soldiers of the first world war, just like the ones of the next generation to which I belonged, namely those of the second world war, and those who fought in Korea, felt, when they signed up, that since they had the privilege of living in a free country, it was their duty to go and defend freedom on a foreign soil and to check the tide of barbarism which was threatening the whole of humanity.

I believe that the fact that Canadian soldiers volunteered to fight for this ideal makes their services even more commendable than those of the soldiers of other countries, who were fighting for their own survival. Thus I feel that we are justified to pay a special tribute to our veterans who, being the victims of their own sacrifice, must now suffer from the serious wounds sustained on the field of honour.

I feel that we have a duty to recognize and reward the services of those men by introducing, as is being done today, legislation to make their old age more bearable.

There is a second reason why our veterans deserve to be recognized in a very special way. If there is today unity between the two races forming our country, the basis of this unity can be found in the fact that Canadians of various extractions, French, English, Irish, Scottish and others, were willing in times of danger to join hands, to combine their efforts toward the same goal, the same ideal. Through their valiant deeds, they have achieved glory, but they have also made possible, for times of peace, the national unity that we are enjoying today.

This national unity that our veterans have forged in war years, at the cost of much suffering, is well worth mentioning today and time and again so as to maintain it and strengthen it in times of peace.

This bill acknowledges the merit of those soldiers of truth, justice and law who, during the critical years of the first and second world wars, fought for the survival of the ideals of democracy and liberty.

I feel the government and indeed all parties deserve special commendation for giving unanimous support to the bill now before the house.

I would not want to take more of the time of the house but I think hon. members will understand that it is because I am a veteran that, once in a while, I like to pay homage to my comrades in arms who fought with such distinction on the battlefields, to pay homage especially to those who must now carry the burden of serious wounds because they were true to their duty, and who have to rely on state assistance for a moderately comfortable existence.

Mr. Speaker, it is on their behalf that I thank all the members of this house for their support of this bill which, I am sure, will carry unanimously.

(Text):

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): I should like to express my support for this bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, the result of which is to increase the benefits by 20 per cent. I know this bill is going to bring a measure of better living to a number of Canadians who are required to live on the war veterans allowance. These men are deserving of this increased support which the Canadian government is giving them and I am sure it is a bill that is going to be well received by the public.

I am sorry the minister was not able to include in the act the small group of British imperials who served on the Afghanistan front during the first world war to which group I referred in the house on several previous occasions. However, since there is such a small number of them, perhaps he will find some other way of taking care of them. There is a great deal of credit to be given to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) this year because he has certainly brought forward a very full program of benefits to our war veterans and I am sure the people of Canada will appreciate this.

Mr. H. F. Jones (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thought I would say a few words to deal with some of the questions that have been raised during the course of this discussion. I thought it was very fitting that the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) should bring to the attention of the house the fact that this bill was moved by a minister, who himself is a veteran, and seconded by another veteran in the person of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). I believe everyone who has taken part in this debate has been a veteran of either the first or second world wars.

The bill, as now laid before the House of Commons, represents in some respects greater increases than those contained in certain proposals made to the government and to the department in relation to the monthly rates of allowance and the income ceilings. Some of the proposals which have been made from time to time by various veterans organizations, as well as by members of the house, have not been acceded to by the government, but I think one can tell from the discussion of this bill that, by and large, the measure has received a favourable response from hon. members and I believe it will receive the same response from the country as a whole.

I think hon. members will recall that in the speech from the throne this year the item dealing with the veterans charter which was mentioned for an increase was the disability pension under which an increase was granted a few weeks ago in the house of 20 per cent for adults and 33⅓ per cent for the children and orphans of the veterans. Not mentioned in the speech from the throne were the amendments that are now before the house. I think this represents that, by pressing forward in the department this year, the Minister of Veterans Affairs has been able to advance consideration of this measure to the extent that it is before the house a year before it might otherwise have been possible to bring forth this measure. I think probably that will answer some of the points made by those who would have liked the bill to be even further backdated.

Mention was made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) of that particular point. Again I say that it has been owing to the energy and the efforts of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the cabinet that it has been possible to bring forward and advance the stage of consideration of the War Veterans Allowance Act to this date.

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's wanted to know the position with regard to those veterans who were denied eligibility under this act because they did not qualify for the 365 days' service overseas under the previous provision. He wanted to know whether or not those veterans would be notified of the addition under this bill of the sailing time between this country and England and return. We will certainly take into account the suggestion and will see whether or not this can be accomplished. At the same time I hope all hon. members in this house will give as wide publicity as possible to this bill in order that all those veterans who will be drawn in under no matter what additional category, may be alerted in order to see whether or not they are eligible if previously they were not eligible.

Mr. Batten: Will the hon. member allow me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. Jones: Yes.

Mr. Batten: My question dealt particularly with those veterans who had heretofore applied for war veterans allowance. These were the people whom I was hoping the department would be able to notify if they were now to become eligible under these amendments. I recognize the fact that, as to those who have not already applied, that matter will be up to them; they will have to apply. My question referred particularly to those who had applied previously for the war veterans allowance.

Mr. Jones: Yes, of course, Mr. Speaker; the department will make every effort in order to see whether or not that is something that can be done. I myself am hopeful that it can be done and that those veterans who have made applications in the past will be able to be notified by the department of the change in the bill or to have that change brought to their attention so that they may renew their applications. However, I do not want to pass over the point which I understood the hon. member to have made and, may I say, the proper point, namely that all of these veterans who are now included in the act by reason of the various amendments made as a result of the various suggestions which have been made will not become aware of these changes in general unless we and the service organizations—I refer to the Legion and the other veterans organizations—do our jobs in bringing these amendments to their attention.

In connection with this matter of the amendment which permits the sailing time between here and the United Kingdom and back to be added to the days spent in the United Kingdom in the first world war before November 12, 1918, I think we should pay tribute to those members in the house who have raised that problem as well as to the various veterans organizations. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae) comes to my mind as well as other hon. members who have been assiduous in promoting that amendment. Some mention was made of the Newfoundland foresters and the fire fighters. That, of course, is a matter which, because of a personal association, has been made known to me since I first came into the house. As hon. members will recall, when I first came here in 1957, I shared a room with the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). We had not been in association very long before he was telling me about all of the problems of Newfoundlanders, including this particular problem of the foresters and the fire fighters. I think perhaps it is sufficient to say at this time that there are other acts under the administration of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and that perhaps it would be more appropriate to consider that matter under some of the other acts, particularly the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

These are just a few remarks in summing up some of the questions that have been raised by various members. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Smith) has always been assiduous in his promotion of the welfare of the Afghanistan veterans. Other hon. members have raised various points which I hope we shall be able to go into more thoroughly in the veterans affairs committee when this bill is referred to it. The increases of 20 per cent for single and married recipients, with larger ones for orphans and higher exemptions for personal assets and some adjustments in eligibility requirements that are represented in this measure now before us in my opinion, will meet with the general approval not only of the members of this house and the veterans across the country but, most of all, I think of the general public as a whole. These veterans and their brother veterans made it possible for us to be in this chamber now discussing this matter. If it has not been for their stand in the defence of freedom, having regard to the attitude that Hitler was taking at the time of the last war, there certainly would not have been a Canadian House of Commons in session at this time. That is a debt that this measure and the other measures under the veterans charter can only inadequately repay to those veterans who placed their lives on the block for freedom.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just before the question is put all I want to do—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Churchill: All I want to do is thank the house very much for accepting this bill so readily and with such unanimity. I should like to congratulate the hon. members who spoke for exercising so much restraint in making their remarks very brief. I think the mood of the house is that we should get on with this legislation as rapidly as possible, and consequently I will end my remarks at this point.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF INTEREST, PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-88, to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act—Mr. Churchill—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Interest.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the requests for a further increase in the interest rates which were made by my colleagues on this side of the chamber, and also to reply to some of the arguments made by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs last evening.

The parliamentary secretary said, as reported in yesterday's Hansard at the top of page 5634, that we should stick to the original principle. I believe the original principle was that the interest rates paid by the government on this fund should be in accord with the prevailing rates in the country as a whole.

Even if an error has been committed in the past and we have departed from that principle in the past, I see no reason why we should perpetuate that error and compound it again at this time.

The important fact is that this money is veterans' money. It belongs to the veteran and the government has had the use of it. In fact, the government has had the use of it for a number of years now at a much lower rate than the prevailing commercial rates in the country as a whole. I feel we ought not to take advantage of the veterans in this way. If the government is not prepared to pay the prevailing rates, I think they should relinquish the administration of this fund and hand it over to a special committee of veterans set up for this purpose.

Last evening the parliamentary secretary said that the fund came first and the use came second. What difference does that make? The fact is that parliament—with the support of all parties of this house, I believe—determined that this fund should be used in this particular way. Evidence has been produced in committee that this fund is being depleted too rapidly to perform the function that parliament assigned to it, and because of that the fund will have to be revised on an actuarial basis which will give it a shorter period of usefulness, or else the yearly benefits of the fund will have to be curtailed.

Neither of these courses would be necessary if the fund was permitted to earn revenue at the prevailing commercial interest rates. The purpose of the bill which we now have before us is to remedy this situation, but we are providing only a partial remedy. It is true that we are raising the interest rates, but the increase in revenue from these higher interest rates will still leave the fund $60,000 per year short of what it requires to carry out the normal services that it has been providing down through the years.

Surely if we are going to remedy this situation we must remedy it completely, and not half do it. I believe that was the consensus of the standing committee on veterans affairs, or at least it was the opinion of the majority of that committee. Therefore I urge the government again to reconsider this matter and bring in the necessary amendment to complete the job that this bill sets out to do.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, as I said last evening, this money does not belong to the government and it does not belong to the taxpayer of Canada. Therefore the government, in assuming responsibility as trustee for this fund, should exert its utmost endeavour to procure the best possible return on this fund which is compatible with safety. If this were a situation in civil life and the trustee failed to do that, he would probably be faced with an action by the cestui que trust for failing to carry out his obligations as trustee.

Before the committee on veterans affairs Mr. Chadderton had this to say:

> Even with the proposed increase in interest in the bill before the parliamentary committee today, we can increase our expenditure to only $470,000 a year, even if we should get this increase in interest. The actual expenditures have averaged over the past ten years $530,000 a year. We are facing a very serious problem, and our board sees one of two alternatives; either they must cut down on the amount that we spend each year and leave deserving cases out in the cold, or second, we must reduce the remaining 17 years of operation of the fund.

At the present time the fund stands at $6½ million. This bill provides as follows:

> The receiver general shall credit to the fund semi-annually interest on the minimum balance to the credit of the fund in each month, at the following rates:
> (a) four per cent per annum, to the extent that the minimum balance does not exceed $5 million, and
> (b) three per cent per annum, to the extent that the minimum balance exceeds $5 million.

If we take the fund on that basis we find that the interest obtainable on this $6½ million would amount to $245,000. If the 4½ per cent 1983 conversion loan bonds were bought it would mean that the interest obtained on this amount of money, provided that the whole $6½ million were invested in these conversion bonds, would yield a return of $334,000. This is a difference of $89,000, which is sufficient to carry this fund to the completion contemplated in 1947, at the time this legislation was passed by the government then in power. I urge the minister to give this matter further consideration, because it is perfectly obvious that the return being paid over to this fund by the government is not sufficient to carry on. I maintain that the government is the trustee for these funds and should exercise the greatest discretion in seeing that the highest possible return is made, compatible with safety.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Audit.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary a question in respect to clause 3 of this bill. In the explanatory notes I read the following statement:

> When the act was first enacted it was anticipated that disbursements for grants would be made and accounted for directly by the various provincial committees. Subsequently arrangements were made for the disbursements to be made by the comptroller of the treasury and for the accounting to be centralized at the head office of the board in Ottawa. The requirement contained in subsection (1) of section 11 that the Auditor General examine accounts of committees quarterly is, therefore, unnecessary and it is considered desirable that it be deleted.

Mr. Chairman, my questions are the following. Will the Auditor General examine the accounts of the board annually in so far as these disbursements are concerned, and will the disbursements then be made by the treasury board? I understood that interest funds were paid directly to the board and that the board disbursed them. Could the minister advise the house if the Auditor General examines the accounts of the board with the right to criticize the grants made, in a similar manner to his examination and criticism of departmental estimates? Will the Auditor General be able to say, for instance, that a particular grant is not within the regulations?

The second question I have to ask is in regard to the words "for the disbursements to be made by the comptroller of the treasury". Does that mean interest disbursement to the board, or disbursements generally?

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, the amendment has a rather interesting historical background in that apparently the original clause in the bill envisaged auditing in the provincial commands. This was, and has never been done, and it has been eliminated in this bill because it has been inoperative since the inception of the fund.

As far as the hon. member's question is concerned in regard to payments being made by the comptroller of the treasury, this involves payments out of the fund to the board, and the Auditor General has the right to fully examine the accounts of the board to ensure that the handling of the fund is in accordance with the purposes of the act. The hon. member for Kootenay West will realize that the purposes of the act are broad, and that the board is not hampered in making these grants, as envisaged in this program, by this restriction. Nevertheless, I think the hon. member will agree that it is useful to have an independent person, such as the Auditor General, keep track of the activities of the board in order that, as the phrase states, not only may justice be done, it may seem to be done as well.

When I discussed this particular matter with the secretary of the board, he certainly was satisfied with the thoroughness with which the Auditor General has pursued his task in this regard.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this point is rather interesting to me, and I have one further question to ask in respect to the explanatory notes which say that disbursements are to be made by the comptroller of the treasury. Does the board make application to the comptroller of the treasury for certain lump sums required to meet obligations in respect to grants, or are the disbursements made by the comptroller of the treasury to the recipient of the grant? That is the point in which I am particularly interested.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, it is my impression that the board requisition for funds, and those funds are paid, in some cases, to the creditors concerned. I think the hon. member for Kootenay West raised a question in the standing committee regarding the method followed by the board in dealing with actual crises with which veterans are faced. If I recall correctly, the hon. member directed a question, on that occasion, to the secretary of the fund, as to whether the board paid the recipient his money directly, or whether he paid the creditors directly.

Mr. Herridge: That is not quite the answer to my question. I should like to know if the treasury board, or the trustees, pay these funds directly to the recipients or to the recipients' creditors.

Mr. Jones: I think the hon. member for Kootenay West has his answer. I have stated that requisition is made by the board. The hon. member received an answer in detail regarding the actual disbursements of the fund when the secretary of the fund appeared before the committee. I am sure if the hon. member checks back in the committee reports he will find an answer to that half of his question, and I suggest I have given the answer to the other half.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Benidickson: At the next sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister wishes, he may put the motion now because the bill was considered yesterday in committee of the whole.

Mr. Churchill moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

387. Departmental administration, $332,439.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, does the minister intend to make a statement in respect of his department?

(Translation):

Mr. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, I need hardly say that it is always with some misgivings that a newly appointed minister is faced with the responsibility of introducing his estimates in the house. I shall discharge this responsibility with all the co-operation expected by the house. I know I can count on the co-operation of the house and I feel sure that co-operation will also be helpful to all those who are interested in knowing about these estimates and their use.

(Text):

I should like to make a few brief remarks with respect to the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State. This is one of the oldest departments and I feel that most hon. members are sufficiently familiar with the operations carried on within it that it is not necessary for me to take the time of the committee to outline them.

The expenditure of the department is, as hon. members will note, just over $5 million annually. The estimated amount required to operate in the period 1961-62 is $94,117 more than that which was estimated for 1960-61, an increase of 1.8 per cent.

This department is also a revenue producing department, and I might say that the revenue for the year 1960-61 was $2,726,550, which represents a small increase, namely $28,535, or slightly more than 1 per cent over that collected in 1959-60.

I should like to indicate briefly the reasons why I am asking the committee to approve an amount of $94,417 more than the amount estimated for last year. In some areas the increase is more substantial but in others we have been able to effect certain economies, and thus the total additional amount required is relatively small.

Our salary item is up $149,167 over last year. This is almost entirely due to salary revisions, statutory increases and reclassifications, since the net increase in the department's establishment is only one position. There is also an increase of $15,000 in the amount required to provide for translation done outside the bureau for translations, and an increase of $18,000 for supplies and equipment in the nature of special types of filing and storage equipment in the companies division and the patent office.

Thus we estimate a total gross increase in our requirements for certain operations of $182,167. Against this figure we balance the economies to which I alluded earlier. The large item here is a decrease in the costs of printing patents and the Patent Office Record. We show a total decrease under our publications object of $75,800. In addition there is a decrease under other items of $12,250 which, when added to the decrease under publications, gives us a total figure of $88,050 less than we estimated that we required for these objects last year.

We therefore need $182,167 more than we estimated for last year for certain of our operations, and $88,050 less for others, giving us a net requirement of $94,117.

Having delivered myself of these statistics I am prepared to attempt to deal with such questions and to accept in a co-operative spirit such suggestions as hon. members may care to make as the appropriate votes are called. I would point out that the order in which it is proposed that my estimates will be dealt with is, first, the Department of the Secretary of State, then the chief electoral officer, followed by the civil service commission and finally the Department of Public Printing and Stationery. In the interest of orderly discussion I would suggest that this order be carefully followed, disposing of each branch and likewise of each vote of each branch, before passing on to the next.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, the committee is happy to welcome the new minister presenting his estimates to the committee for the first time and we wish him well in his new office. I hope—and I have repeated this for many years since 1945—that the new occupant of the post of Secretary of State will stay long enough in this post to become acquainted with this very complicated department and so that we may be in a position at a future time to be a little more difficult with him and to expect that he will be an expert in each of the branches of his department. That has been "lacune", as we say in French, in the past. As soon as the minister has been long enough in the department for hon. members to feel that they should be questioning him closely he disappears to another department or to the Senate. I do not know why the Secretary of State is picked for that particular function although if my hon. friend feels he should go to the Senate I have no objection, of course, and I would wish him well there, too.

Mr. Dorion: Thank you.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): As the minister has said, the Department of the Secretary of State has a number of important functions to perform. However, at this time I wish to make only a few general remarks relating to the branch dealing with patents, trade marks, copyrights and designs in a general way because I will come back to these items for questioning more specifically during the discussion of the particular estimate.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, it has been a little bit difficult to get ready to question the minister on these estimates this afternoon because the last report which we have from this department covers the year ended March 31, 1960, and of course that is hardly useful at this late date. I do not blame the minister for this, and I was assured that if the estimates had been taken up a little later we could have had more information. However, I will try to proceed by the slower process of questioning.

As I was saying, one of the important branches of the Secretary of State's department is that which relates to patents, trade marks, copyrights and designs. It is quite some time since we received the royal commission's reports on patents, industrial designs and copyrights. One of the first questions I ask the Secretary of State is whether it is the intention of the government at this time or in the very near future to implement the reports of the royal commission or at least to take some of the suggestions from them and include them immediately in the existing acts by way of amendment.

There are two ways to proceed, of course. The first is to introduce a new patent act, a new industrial designs act and a new copyright act. The second is to take some of the suggestions in the reports already presented by the royal commission and bring them forward as amendments to the existing acts. As the house knows, these very important pieces of legislation, the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act, the Copyright Act and the industrial designs act bring about, in a way, monopolies in favour of a particular person or company, and the departmental report has shown in the past and would show now if it were available that the owners of these so-called privileges are not in the main Canadian subjects.

In 1959-60 Canadians obtained approximately 1,500 patents out of 21,000 granted by our patent office, and the same thing can be said about trade marks, industrial designs and copyrights. In the light of the desire of the government to see that the rights of Canadians are protected, possibly something might be found in the royal commission reports on patents, industrial designs and copyrights which might be helpful.

I know, for example, that only recently in the course of the investigation into drugs being conducted by the combines investigation branch it was found that the prices of drugs are greatly affected by patents, by the exclusive right of a certain person or company, mostly foreign, of course, which owns a patent and can dictate the price of a particular drug because they are the exclusive manufacturers and owners of the right to make that drug. It is true that there are some provisions in our Patent Act which permit licensing but these are very difficult provisions. The royal commission suggested some broadening of the licensing features with respect to patents to allow Canadian industry and the public to benefit from these inventions whether they concern drugs or other things.

In connection with the industrial design and copyright legislation there is one feature that comes to my mind. The revenue of these two branches is very low and one reason why it is so low is that the acts are not operative. We require as soon as possible a new copyright act and a new industrial designs act. They are antiquated and almost useless in their present form. If the minister will look at the figures for 1959-60, and they must be similar for 1960-61, the revenue of the industrial design branch from filing fees was $4,000 and I believe the revenue in the case of copyrights was $17,000, hardly sufficient to pay half of the cost of the salaries involved in these two branches.

But that is not the one and only reason for amending these acts. The real reason is that the acts are not operative. We need a new copyright act, one that will protect the rights of Canadians. Again, this act is being used by people who are foreign to this country to exact very high fees or royalties without any control being exercised through our own legislation except by so-called international agreements which are really designed to protect the rights of people in other countries because they are the ones who have the greatest number of copyrights.

I am simply making general remarks. I ask the minister to take a look at the legislation in the light of the three reports on patents, copyrights and industrial designs. I have not said much about industrial designs because the subject is rather technical but, as the minister knows, the present act is very faulty. It is only supposed to cover the shape, appearance and configuration of an article like a Coca-Cola bottle because it has ribs on the side or in the case of other articles the round shape or hollow shape or whatever the case may be. The act does not cover any mechanical features, and the real purpose of an industrial design patent is to cover the mechanical features which are not the subject matter of a patent of invention. I do not intend to say more at this time. I think I have said enough of a general nature and I will question the minister on the particular items of his estimates as they come before us.

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the words of the hon. member and his constructive manner of discussing these questions.

(Translation):

As to the legislation suggested by the Ilsley commission, I have already stated in the house, following a question put to me by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), that the officials of my department were preparing legislation according to the order of the recommendations submitted by the commission.

Looking at the order in which the recommendations were made, we find that the first suggestion had to do with the Copyright Act. On that point, as the hon. member is surely aware, Canada in 1952 ratified, or rather signed the universal copyright convention.

The next step is to ratify it and make it effective in Canada.

The question arose as to whether we should await the complete revision of the copyright, or whether at this stage we should just ratify the convention without awaiting the revision. I think on the basis of the steps already taken, I can reassure the hon. member on that point, because the last steps required before ratification are nearly completed. It is important that ratification be approved, either by parliament or by the governor in council, according to the advice we shall get from our legal advisers.

With regard to the other pieces of legislation, as I indicated a moment ago, we are preparing a complete revision. Unfortunately, I do not think it will be possible to place them before the house during this session.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I hope the minister will realize that I am not as anxious as he is—perhaps he misunderstood me—to ratify the international convention, unless I can be assured that it will in no way affect our rights under the new copyright act, and that the new act will give greater protection to Canadians than the present act.

Mr. Dorion: That point I would answer as follows. If the effective acceptance of our convention under the existing law, can in no way affect the legislation which will eventually be adopted, the period of time already set down in the convention and our existing law will have to be respected.

Here is the problem: In the light of the Ilsley report, would it be better to adapt our law to American legislation or should we keep the provisions of our Copyright Act which stipulates that copyrights are good for a period of 25 or 50 years after the writer's death? If we can thus ratify the universal convention immediately without having to amend the existing legislation, we will have the protection we need against certain provisions of American legislation which, at present, are prejudicial to some of our writers.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a proposal which would benefit national unity and which, if adopted, would at the same time represent a substantial saving for the government.

I would like to say a few words especially about the publication in French, of certain documents issued by parliament or the government.

Section 133 of the British North America Act, 1867, reads as follows:

Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

The last paragraph of the British North America Act does not suggest any procedure, but it certainly does not recommend an English original and a French translation. It is clearly stated in the first part:

and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses.

It would therefore seem that the legislator intended both languages to be used equally, and not separately, by producing an original text of which a translation would be made later.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend this Canadian government which, for some time now, has had some of its publications printed in both languages under the same cover. I have here a bilingual report entitled:

Report of the special committee responsible for considering the proceedings of the House of Commons, jointly with the Speaker, submitted by the Hon. Roland Michener, Q.C., Speaker of the House of Commons.

which was published on July 25, 1960.

I might also point out that Votes and Proceedings, bills and all documents of the Quebec legislature are printed in both languages.

Every paper there is printed in this way. The cover is printed in both languages, i.e. French and English, and the text inside is also bilingual, that is French on one side and English on the other. The order paper of the Quebec legislature follows the same pattern.

By printing first of all the English text and then the French text, we may sometimes experience delays of several days, weeks or even months, for instance in the case of minutes and proceedings of committees of this house and of the Senate. And what about annual reports of some departments?

I have here some French editions which were published two months after the English ones. In such cases, the French version is so outdated that its value is greatly reduced.

French speaking members of the house and people who wish to carry out research will rather use the English version which is available, than wait for a French translation which does not come. Those people will not go to the trouble of reading the French version when it comes, after weeks, perhaps even months, of delay, a situation which makes it practically useless.

To facilitate the consideration of this problem, let us take as an example Hansard for the House of Commons and for the Senate, bills, committee, board and departmental reports and, finally, the Canada Year Book.

I wish to point out that, as I said a while ago, there has been great improvement in that respect under the present administration. Indeed, instead of getting the minutes and proceedings of the committees of the house two, three, six and even eight months after the English version of the reports, we get them only a few days or a few weeks late.

The English and French versions of Hansard of the house and of the Senate could be printed side by side in the same edition; thus we would have only one edition with both versions, instead of two different editions.

The same thing could be done for bills by printing both versions of amendments side by side, and the explanatory notes, at the bottom of corresponding pages.

That is the system which has been followed since confederation, in the legislature of the province of Quebec. As I said before, it was even tried here once, as an experiment, under the present government, with a report of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

The same thing could be done for committee reports as for bills; the English and French versions could be printed side by side. Naturally, the translation of the minutes and proceedings would have to be hurried up by giving stenographers' transcripts to the translators instead of letting them wait for the printed version. If you calculate the amount of time it takes to transcribe the stenographic reports, to revise them properly, to set them up, to print them and to prepare and distribute the booklets, then translation can easily be delayed for several weeks. If translation were done from the transcript of the shorthand notes, the French version would be available as soon as the English edition.

As for commission or departmental reports those publications are of the utmost interest to the public of both languages, and therefore they should be published not only simultaneously but in side-by-side editions.

The Canada Year Book is obviously quite extensive. It could be subdivided into several volumes with French and English pages side by side.

Mr. Chairman, coming back to reports of committees, I learned during a personal investigation, that when a Senate or House of Commons committee sits in the morning, it could be possible, like it is for Hansard in both houses, to translate and edit the text and send it to the printers within 24 hours. This would obviously involve a fast process which would require co-operation on the part of the committees, the reporters and the secretary, the translators, the editors and the printing bureau.

If the sitting of the committee ended around one o'clock, for instance, the reporter could make his copy available bit by bit as it was transcribed, instead of waiting until the whole sitting was completed. In that way, the translators could, in the afternoon, start working on the proceedings of the morning sitting, and by maintaining this rate of production, translation and revision, it would probably be possible to send the copy to the printer the following day.

This is, of course, a matter of probability, but the margin of error, even if it reached 24 hours in some cases, would be nothing as compared to the present time lag. Under present conditions, apparently, the translation is started only after the original copy has been printed and stitched. Even at that, it would certainly be possible to publish a report of committee proceedings within seven to 10 days. At the present time, the French copy may well be published only several weeks and even months, as in previous years, after the English booklet has been made available to the public.

Delegates to the last federal-provincial conference of November 1957 recall that it was possible to distribute the French text to the delegates at the same time as the English text. Of course, that was an exceptional case, but work was first sent to the translators in the afternoon; they worked until late in the night, and at nine o'clock in the morning, the French mimeographed copy was in the hands of the delegates at the same time as the English copy. This was mimeographed copy, but at the previous conference, the copy had not only been mimeographed, but printed. This shows that in the matter of translation, the French version can, if necessary, be ready a few hours after the English copy. If we want to save money and time, the next step would be to publish both versions together under the same cover, thus requiring only one setting of the type and one team working in both languages.

Mr. Chairman, there is of course the fact that a large number of committees may be sitting at the same time, both in the Senate and in the house.

One of the many problems that arise is the matter of the availability of translators. In view of that, consideration might be given to increasing the number of translators working on committee proceedings, or to having several shifts so that the work would go on without interruption.

It goes without saying that use should be made of the quickest translation facilities, and that as far as possible, the most efficient and modern methods of translation should be promoted.

Several thousand dollars would certainly be saved if there was only one printing instead of two; once the material is collected, there is only the page setting to be done, so that the French text will face the English text, and then it is ready for the press. Otherwise, there must be two type settings and two printings and everything else involved in two operations. It would also result in a saving of paper because it often happens, both in French and in English publications, that many pages are left blank. This applies not only to the official reports of the house and the Senate, but also to all committee and commission reports.

Mr. Chairman, if we examine, for instance, the figures showing expenditures incurred by the government for printing certain documents pertaining to the operation of the house and Senate, we note that in 1955-56 the English edition of Hansard cost $240,708.28 and the French edition $151,364.60, or a total of $392,072.88.

In 1956-57, the printing costs of the same documents reached $254,493.82 for the English edition, and $161,940.29 for the French edition, or a total of $416,434.11. It should be realized that those are considerable sums of money—nearly half a million dollars.

Moreover, the printing costs of the Votes and Proceedings of the house, for the same two years, amounted in 1955-56 to $13,790.66 in English, and $9,129.12 in French, or a total of $22,919.78; in 1956-57, those amounts were $16,820.20 in English, and $11,394.23 in French or a total of $28,214.43.

We could also quote similar statistics for the order paper and other documents concerning the business of the Senate and the house.

As to the minutes and proceedings and records of the various parliamentary committees, we unfortunately do not have before us separate figures for the French and English printing costs, but we have an expert's opinion on this matter, to the effect that the proportion of expenses is about 75 per cent for the English edition and 25 per cent for the French edition.

Therefore, when we say that, in 1956-57, the printing costs of the proceedings of the committee on banking and commerce amounted to $18,920.95 we may be assured that 75 per cent were spent for the publication of English text and 25 per cent in respect of the French translation. Similarly, in 1956-57, the external affairs committee asked for $10,891.02 to print its proceedings, the same proportion prevailing for the English and French editions.

Therefore those are considerable expenses representing a heavy burden on the public budget. If there is any possibility of reducing those expenses, I think we should not hesitate to do so. Indeed, printers will tell you that the main expense factor in printing is the lay-out and the time required for that operation.

Once a page, or eight, or 16 pages are all set up the press does the work. Costs are mostly made up of lay-out work. If there could be only one typesetting operation for the English and French versions instead of two separate ones, it would result in considerable savings, in view of the large number of Hansards, proceedings and reports of committees published both by the Senate and the house in one single session. Within a few years, the savings would offset the annual cost of printing those documents.

Bearing in mind that in 1955-56, the total cost of printing committee proceedings and other documents of the house and Senate amounted to $764,429.06, including $92,607.86 for committee reports, and that in 1956-57, the same costs were $698,563.97, including $109,120.74 for the committees, one realizes the tremendous savings that would result if printing costs could be reduced perhaps 25 per cent or even more. It is not a matter of complicating the work, but on the contrary, of simplifying and reorganizing it and giving recognition to the truly bilingual character of our official documents.

Government publications are filled with tables and statistics requiring an equal number of forms in each language; in publishing a single bilingual edition, duplication of that work would be avoided.

I am only expressing a wish, but I do hope that in view of the importance of the matter from the angle of national unity, and in view of the possible savings involved, a committee of officials will soon be set up to this effect. The committee might include official representatives of the printing bureau, the bureau for translations, the editors of the various departments, as well as the secretaries of the house committees, who could jointly consider the practicality of this scheme.

The importance of publishing English and French simultaneously and side by side comes from the fact that as long as those documents are published separately, English speaking Canadians will never see the French version and vice versa, which is contrary to the spirit and the letter of our constitution. Under the present system, English texts enjoy an undeniable priority, because of the circumstances in favour of such an anomaly.

In brief, the important thing is to make sure that the French language has in fact the same rights as the English language and to see that French publications are printed at the same time as the English ones, while saving money. By publishing them side by side and under the same cover, we would avoid this delay and we would assert the true bilingual character that is guaranteed to us by the British North America Act.

Mr. Chairman, I have here two comparative tables showing the expenditures incurred by the government during the years 1955-56 and 1956-57 for the publication of certain documents dealing with the proper functioning of the Senate and the House of Commons. It would be too long to quote all those figures in detail here, but I ask your permission to table them for their publication in Hansard to supplement my argument.

So, Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to have printed in the record, at this point, these two comparative tables. They are official documents and besides, they are quite short and will help to support what I have just said.

The Deputy Chairman: Before I give this permission to the hon. member, he will have to obtain leave from the house. Has the hon. member the consent of the house to have those tables printed in Hansard?

Mr. Roberge: What is the source of that information?

Mr. Pigeon: They are comparative tables indicating the cost for printing parliamentary documents, that is the debates of the House of Commons, committee reports and so on, for the years 1955-56 and 1956-57. They are official documents.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the answer given by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm satisfactory?

Mr. Roberge: I feel that the answer is rather vague. We need a more specific answer as to the source of that information so that we can make a comparison later on.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I got those figures from the Clerk of the House of Commons, and they are official figures.

Mr. Roberge: Oh, very well.

The Deputy Chairman: Then has the hon. member consent to print those documents in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Tables referred to at p. 5672.]

Mr. Pigeon: In conclusion, I should like to congratulate the Secretary of State in charge of that department for his excellent work. I am very happy—

Mr. Meunier: Would the hon. member please not read so fast?

Mr. Pigeon: I am quite willing to accede to the request of the hon. member, but I am not reading. I will speak more slowly and ask the hon. member to correct what he has just implied.

As I was saying I commend the Secretary of State in charge of the department for the services rendered. He has done excellent work. He has done a lot towards national unity.

I hope that he will rise to make a few remarks on that matter or rather on what I just said. I hope that the minister will have something to say concerning the printing and publishing of documents since he has assumed responsibility for this department which he so ably administers.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I must say, first of all, that I readily endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm about bilingualism.

However, a slight correction is in order. He claimed that under the present government it was suggested for the first time to print the official report of the house in French and in English under the same cover.

I have here the standing orders of the house of 1955 published in French and in English under the same cover. Therefore, there is nothing new about this. I admit, however, that those are about the only documents that are published both in French and in English.

The House of Commons has always published its standing orders in both languages under the same cover. This is an old practice that has been maintained. I am pleased to congratulate those responsible for it at present.

But I fully agree with the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm that there is plenty of room for improvement.

For instance, I note that since his appointment, the new Queen's printer has applied himself to hasten the printing of French reports. But, up to now, his efforts have not been completely successful, and it is alleged that this is due to a shortage of translators.

Well, I believe that the department should strive to recruit more translators, if they are to be found. I know there must be some somewhere, for when we decided to establish a simultaneous translation system in the house, it was possible to secure the services of expert interpreters who perform a remarkable job all day long.

(Translation):

I wonder whether the Secretary of State should not make a serious effort to recruit translators.

On the other hand, if it is true that the translators in the employment of the government get a lower salary than those who work for private companies, I am of the opinion that the Secretary of State should immediately put a request to the government to raise the salary of those who are particularly qualified to translate efficiently in English or in French. I support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to intensify the efforts in that area.

[Mr. Caron.]

I know that everybody wishes to secure the services of qualified translators, but it seems to me that someone is being lazy. They do not seem to realize the problem, and that is why I completely agree with the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

I hope that the present Secretary of State will do all he can and that he will hold his office long enough to enable him to complete the business undertaken, because, as the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) said earlier, the secretaries of state succeed each other so rapidly, these last few years, that they do not have time to complete whatever work they have undertaken. The Secretary of State would have to stay in his present position long enough, at least till the next general election. Then another one could be appointed who would prove himself very capable, and in this way such work could be continued and even increased.

Moreover, like the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and other hon. members both French and English, I would like to see implemented in this house the system used at Quebec. The bills there are printed in two columns, one in English and one in French, which allows anyone not too familiar with the other language to follow on the translation and thus be able to better understand the legislation.

If such a system were implemented here, it could be indicated that in the event of inconsistencies the English or the French as the case may be has precedence.

Whenever there appears to be any ambiguity due perhaps to translation in either of the two official languages, it would be easy to state at the end of the bill, that the original text will have precedence over the translated version before the courts, parliament and elsewhere.

Anyhow, I am sure that the actual Secretary of State is acting in good faith and good will. As a patriot, he intends to improve the situation whenever opportunity arises. Therefore, I do not blame him in the least for the conditions which existed in the past, but I hope he will also share the views expressed by the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and myself.

Moreover, I have already advocated more complete bilingualism in this country. In my view, the best way would be to follow the method now in use in Quebec, that is, to print the two texts side by side so that everyone could better understand the meaning of the other.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope that the Secretary of State will kindly speed up the work in order to improve the situation.

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank very sincerely the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) and the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) for what they said about me, and especially for their really practical and appropriate suggestions, which I shall not fail, indeed, to take into account in carrying out my duties.

However, I should like, at the very start, to say that I wish to reply particularly to those remarks, because the problem seems to me of capital importance. For instance, I simply wish to point out, to begin with, that the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State is somewhat limited by paragraph 3 of chapter 270, dealing with the bureau for translations:

> —the duties and function of which are to collaborate with and act for all departments of the public service, and both houses of the parliament of Canada and all bureaus, branches, commissions and agencies created or appointed by act of parliament, or by order of the governor in council, in making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports, documents, debates, bills, acts, proceedings and correspondence.

In other words, the point is that for all branches, departments and particular agencies, those branches, departments or agencies ask the bureau for translations to do such and such a task, such and such translation work; it is therefore the responsibility of the authorities of each branch or department to determine the work they want to be performed by the bureau for translations.

I must say there is, it seems to me, a constant improvement and that, more and more, instead of using at times the English language, and at other times the French language in those documents, at least in the very simple ones, such as letter and envelope headings, etc., the tendency is increasing to use both languages simultaneously. And I feel that even from a practical point of view much success has been achieved and that, in my opinion, is more in accordance with clause 133 of our constitution.

On the other hand, as far as the translation services are concerned, I think we have recently recommended to the civil service commission to raise the translators' salaries and the hon. member for Hull is quite right when he says we should do more along these lines in order not only to add to the number of our translators but also to increase their qualifications.

I must say that the bureau for translations has a staff of highly qualified men who perfectly discharge their duties, but we often ask quite a lot of them, more than they can do, with the net result that those requirements cause delays which are not due to the bureau of translations or to the translators but rather to the fact that there are not enough translators.

On the other hand, I must say that we now experience lots of difficulties when recruiting translators. I understand that about twenty positions remain open, despite all efforts to create an interest among translators who come to the rescue of those already with the bureau who, in my opinion, do their duty perfectly well.

Now, about the department itself, and this, I think, covers the third part of the remarks made by the hon. member for Hull and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm—I am most happy to see that cooperation as between members of the opposition and government members is achieved on such a sore point as that—I must say that we have most successfully tried to establish the idea of bilingualism at most levels of the administration of the printing bureau.

Recently we opened a shop in Toronto which, of course, comes under the Queen's printer, and the experiment has proved most fruitful, as French and English publications are found there side by side. As a matter of fact, the last report I received was astounding. It is remarkable to note the increase in the sales of French publications, simply because the French issue was put immediately beside the English one.

This might be an incentive for the citizen who wants to improve his French or English. He can buy both the French and the English editions.

Moreover, we intend to open another establishment of this kind in the very near future in Montreal, and we will proceed exactly the same way.

I must indeed say that the sales manager is perfectly bilingual.

As to the other things we have done, I might mention a few. Notices to tenderers are now completely bilingual. There is no need to change the form according to whether we are dealing with a French speaking or English speaking tenderer, because the same form is sent in both languages to all parts of Canada.

This also applies to calls for tenders, to calls for a description of machinery, to general circulars, to instructions to employees and even to ball-point pens or pencils, which previously had only an English inscription.

I should also mention some improvements for which I can take no credit, since they were brought in before I took this office, perhaps under the former administration, I do not know, and I do not want to take credit that is not mine. However, to the list I have just given, we could add the following documents: printed specification documents, printed specification forms, business forms, slogans on stationery items, various posters for boards, directions inside as well as outside the buildings, parking signs, press releases and the samples which are now under press.

As for the secretary of state department itself, we have moved to other quarters quite recently, and that was an opportunity to see that everything be entirely bilingual, in order to respect the principle so eloquently upheld by the hon. members for Hull and for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

(Text):

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I hope that I will be forgiven if I speak in respect of a particular element of the responsibilities of the Secretary of State which has already been touched on briefly by one of my colleagues, and I refer to the matter of an amendment to the Canadian Copyright Act or, as I should like to be able to refer to it, the repeal of the present act and the institution of a completely new, modern act, as recommended by the report of the Ilsley commission and, in addition, of course, the ratification of the universal copyright convention.

I was somewhat astonished this afternoon to hear that consideration has been given by the department to the ratification of the convention prior to an amendment to the Copyright Act. Since excellent legal authority has looked at the problem and, in fact, the Ilsley commission was set up and assisted by the best authorities regarding the subject, I should like to refer to a statement made in section 6, page 16 of the report.

That statement is, that Canada, as a signatory to the convention, has a right to ratify it, but before it does so, it must be in a position, under its domestic law, to give effect to the terms of the universal copyright convention, article 10, and, therefore, it is of prime necessity that an amendment to our domestic legislation should be made first, in point of time, and, thereafter, we may ratify this convention.

That statement appears to be unopposed by anyone who appeared before the commission, and they seem to have had the best reasons for making it. In fact, the minister has been quoted earlier this year, after he received an extensive brief from the Canadian Authors

Association which recommended a new copyright act and ratification of the convention, in the Toronto Globe and Mail, as having told the president of that association that the amendment to the Copyright Act was under way now, and that it might be expected not this year, but next, but that parliament would not be asked to pass upon it at that time, and that a further year's delay might be expected while those interested individuals in Canada had the opportunity of studying it.

I should like to refer to that article appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail of March 8, 1961, where the minister is reported as follows:

> "I hope that it will be possible to introduce a bill to revise the Copyright Act at the next session of parliament," Mr. Dorion wrote. However, following the introduction of the bill, parliament may decide to stand it over to the next session, so as to afford those interested a better opportunity of studying it and expressing their views on it.

The minister then goes on to deal with the universal copyright convention.

I became interested in this subject, which is a fairly erudite one, not through my practice of law, because I have not had the opportunity, but because of a situation which arose in my own constituency. In that constituency there is a young professional man who is the author of a book, and who intended to publish that book in Canada in an effort partly to create employment for Canadians. I do not think there is any point here for me to beat a dead horse, by saying that there is considerable unemployment in Canada and has been for the past three years, but let me say that the printing and publishing industry of Canada is in pretty sad shape.

There is a provision existing in the United States copyright act providing that books must be printed and published in the United States, and, if printed here in Canada and sold in the United States, after the sale of 1,500 copies, the author loses his copyright. The effect of that provision is that any book printed and published in Canada, and sold in the United States, may be pirated after 1,500 copies have been sold.

The author to which I refer wrote his book with the anticipation of selling a considerably larger number than 1,500 copies in the United States. I expect every author has that same anticipation. Although that individual consulted several Canadian publishers both in the Niagara riding and outside, he was advised not to publish in Canada for his own sake, but to publish his book in the United States. He, accordingly, did so.

It is impossible to say, in terms of dollars and cents, how much was lost to the Canadian publishing industry as a result of that one book being printed in the United States, but if we multiply the amount involved in respect of that one book, by the number of books written by Canadian authors and published in the United States, I suggest to the minister there is a very large amount lost annually, and we are not doing what is necessary to assist that industry, which is already in bad trouble. By the mere fact of assisting the publishing industry I would suggest that the minister's immediate response, when he has such a small department and only $5 million to expend, should have been as follows. One of the first things he should have done on coming to office was to insist that his departmental officials place before him and before the house for discussion a copyright act.

Because of the situation which arose in Niagara, I began to look into the situation and I found that ratification of the universal copyright convention, which was a convention mainly instigated by the United States, would have the effect that the printing requirements of the United States domestic legislation would no longer take effect and therefore Canadian authors would not be in jeopardy if they printed in Canada.

Canada was a signatory of the Berne convention and of the Rome convention. These things were discussed as well as the possibility of ratifying what had been signed at the universal copyright convention. The Ilsley commission spent a great deal of time on this matter and heard a great number of interested groups and individuals in this country. They produced the first report in 1957 which dealt only with copyright and, of course, not merely copyright in literature, music, works of art and things of that kind. It went much further and covered a much broader field than the present legislation, which I think was last amended or enacted in 1924. Surely, all hon. members will agree that since 1924 the world has changed drastically and in this time little protection has been given to authors, artists, architects and those individuals who produce musical works in this country, certainly not the protection which should have been given to them. The report which was produced by the Ilsley commission is one which starts with a new act in force and that is the copyright act introduced in the United Kingdom in 1956. It is a radical departure from our old Canadian Copyright Act. It is an easily readable act. It is a long act, and it establishes quite a few new rights.

The commission which sat in Canada had before it not only the new United Kingdom act but in addition the reports of the committee in the mother of parliaments, and the report of the commission out of which the act arose. It looked into this and felt that some of those rights were not ones which should be in effect in Canada. If one spends sufficient time to read the report of the Ilsley commission on copyright one will find that in fact it is a simple document. It is one which almost goes so far as to draft the legislation.

Now, I cannot believe that in the minister's department in the past four years there could not have been found at least one person who could sit down and draw a draft act at least fully in conformity with the Ilsley report. Had this been done there then would have been an opportunity to circulate it around the country and give authors, artists and composers the opportunity to comment on something which was concrete. So far there has been no indication from this government as to whether it intends to adopt the principles of the Ilsley report, whether in fact it intends to adopt the various provisions which it recommends, or whether it intends to go off on another frolic of its own.

I think there are a lot of unpopular things which are recommended by the commission but the commission took a very bold view in order to try to produce legislation which is the right thing. I think there is a concept in the public mind that anything which is printed or published is by the common law protected and that it is an infringement of the common law to copy any such thing. Well, it does not take too much study of the subject to find that this is arrant nonsense. In the absence of a copyright act there is no natural law against using the product of any man's hands or his brains. This is the reason why jurisdictions around the world have brought in copyright acts, and have tried to keep them up to date.

Obviously, because of the nature of copyright because it is in a piece of music, a painting, a book, a scientific article, plans for a house or dwelling of some kind, because of the nature of the article, in which copyright may exist, because they are interchangeable all across the world, it therefore makes it most important that whatever our legislation be, it be something which is workable not only in Canada but around the world.

The universal copyright convention is the most modern of the agreements signed by individual countries. I believe only Russia and China did not sign. Most of the countries of the world that signed the convention have ratified it. Some of the countries, including the United Kingdom which had entered into the Berne agreement and the Rome agreement on Canada's behalf have become members of the universal copyright convention and were able to do this only after they amended their domestic copyright legislation.

I say to the minister that if his department or his officials are of the opinion that they should ratify the convention without first bringing in a new copyright act, under the authority of the Ilsley commission's report, it would appear that we shall be pretty well stuck with the provisions of the present copyright act. The Copyright Act in force at the present time does not cover modern situations such as television, the right to televise certain material which is in copyright, the right to make records, the right to sell these. It does not cover juke boxes and the records used in them; it does not cover the type of literature which is now available but which was not available in the 1920's. It makes no provision for the changes that have occurred in the last 35 years. There has been a tremendous change in trade and a tremendous change in the speed with which these articles may be passed across the world. Television, of course, can show us now instantaneously something that is occurring elsewhere and I am told that before very long we shall have instantaneous television coverage of what is occurring on the other side of the world.

Copyright is becoming of increasing importance. There are authors, artists, architects and musicians who believe that copyright should be a right in perpetuity. Of course, it cannot be that because there must be a necessary balance between what is right for the protection to a man of the fruits of his labour or of his intellect or of his skill and what is good for the body politic. At some time the ideas, the designs or the music must pass into the public domain.

We in this country are now in an unfortunate position because we do not give the necessary assistance. We not ony do not attempt to assist those creative elements in our community, we in fact depress them. We force publication in England or in the United States. In failing to protect designs, in failing to protect art and creative things of this nature we do not create a climate in which they can properly grow as they should in Canada.

I think Canada is proud of its design council. Recently the Minister of Trade and Commerce brought in a new act with respect to this. Design, of course, is not copyright but the two are interrelated because if there is a copyright in an article which is an artistic article and which can be applied to an industrial design, then it is necessary to take away some of the copyright protections and leave them under the Industrial Designs and Union Label Act, or similar legislation.

Copyright is the first and most important of the modern legislation in the commercial and artistic fields which must come before the house. Canada cannot proceed into the 1960's in a 1920 vehicle. I would suggest to the minister that the first thing that is necessary is a crash program. I would also say to the minister that if he hears from the officials of his department that it is not possible to produce an act this year I will tell him that I as a private member in the last six weeks have almost completed producing an act. It will not be a perfect one but I have produced a draft copyright act which I will have on the order paper before the end of the session. The minister has a department where $5 million a year is spent and yet since 1957 he has not been able to produce such an act, one of the most important measures in assisting our creative people.

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I believe that this question is so important that I should like to answer the hon. member for Niagara Falls now. I thank her very much for her suggestion. I should like to note that the report on copyrights does not attempt to draft a new statute. Furthermore, the recommendations in the report have to be studied carefully before we can decide whether or not to adopt them and, if we adopt them, how to implement them.

The subject is highly complex. It took over four years in the United Kingdom following the report of their committee on copyrights before a new copyright act was adopted. I should add that we are also working on the revision of the industrial design legislation. May I add to what I said a few moments ago. Although the matter has not been decided by the cabinet yet, on the basis of legal advice we have secured I do not believe it is necessary to change our own Copyright Act in order to protect the rights of our authors. The protection to be provided in the proposed new copyright law depends on what decision is made as to the duration of the term for which protection of the copyright is afforded. I know that in the Ilsley report there is a suggestion that the period of time be changed and if we have to change the period of time it would be necessary to have a new act, but if we do not change the period of time it would be possible to adopt the last convention and protect the rights of our authors without a new act.

If the government decides to retain the present term, namely, the life of the author plus 50 years, our legal advice is that the universal copyright convention can be ratified without changing our legislation. This matter is now before the government and I hope it will not be long before we will have a decision of the government in order to protect as much as possible the rights of our authors against foreign legislation which now creates a very difficult situation for them.

Miss LaMarsh: Would the minister answer a question? There was an article by Miss Judith Robinson in the Toronto Telegram of January 24, 1961 in which she alleges that the minister, in attempting to protect Canadian authors, publishers and printers from American exploitation, wants it done by diplomatic representation at the international level. Her report is based on a meeting which the Secretary of State had with Ottawa printers a week before the appearance of this article in which she alleges that the minister aspires to persuade Washington at the international level to change its copyright laws to suit Canadians. This is a pretty scathing report, not unusual for the lady who wrote the article, but can the minister advise the committee whether in fact there has been some sort of consultation between his department and the appropriate authorities in the United States from the point of view of asking them to change their laws to protect Canadians?

Mr. Dorion: I might answer that this is a question which is within the authority of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but what I said on that occasion was absolutely true. I do not know whether it is possible for me to answer for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but the hon. member can be certain that we made every effort possible by diplomatic means in order to have that change made by the government of the United States. Even if we did not succeed, I believe it would be easier for us to follow the procedure indicated a few moments ago without being obliged to have recourse to new legislation. Surely it would be sufficient for the protection of our authors if we ratified the convention but did not accept the period of time suggested. The commission's suggestion was in conformity with the American law and we have only to establish our own law now in respect of the duration of the period of time. I believe that if we act in that way it will be possible to protect our authors.

Miss LaMarsh: Does the minister agree that if there is ratification of the universal copyright convention first it will then be absolutely impossible for Canada, without being in breach of the convention, subsequently to change the period during which the copyright exists?

Mr. Dorion: Yes, we fully realize that. If we ratify the convention it implies that we accept the actual period of time mentioned in our law. This is the only difficulty to my mind, but I do not believe it is necessary to refer to the American legislation to protect our own authors. I believe that the method now in existence in Canada would be sufficient in respect of the period of time for the protection of authors.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I think we should congratulate the hon. member for Niagara Falls on her clear exposé with respect to the matter of copyrights. I think this whole discussion clearly raises the point that there is a conflict of opinion with respect to whether we should ratify the international convention before a new act has been adopted. The United Kingdom did pass a new act before ratifying the international convention, and I cannot see why it should be so difficult to draft an act, say for the next session of parliament, when we have had the advantage of all the work that has been done in other countries and also the work of the Ilsley commission. We have waited for a very long time for a new copyright act.

I am one of those people who is absolutely nationalist when it comes to international conventions. I know that some people in government departments are ready to seize on every international convention there is in the world and make us a party to every agreement they can make with other countries. However, we always get the poor end of the cut of beef in these matters. I have never seen us get anything very good out of an international convention. We have everything to offer others and they have nothing to offer us. This is one of those conventions where we will not get anything out of it. Others want us to agree to it because they will get something out of it. We get the short end of the stick. My point is that there is a conflict of opinion. For years, I have been asking for a new copyright act. I think we have enough material at hand now to enable us to draft a new act. It is not a question of waiting four or five years more, especially if there has been the study made during the past four years by the department as suggested by the minister.

Now, of course, the matter is rather simplified if it is true, as stated a few minutes ago, that the government has agreed the new copyright act will adopt the terms of the old act. Apparently this has been decided because it could not be changed once we adopt the international convention. Starting from there, then, the provision of the new act ought to be a rather simple matter. I think the whole discussion has centred around the question of the term. I doubt very much that we should adopt the term in the old act without some closer study, in the light of modern conditions.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, before item 387 carries, I should like to ask for some information. I do not have anything to say on that item but I would like to talk about the estimates of the department of public printing and stationery. As those items come under the Secretary of State, would I have leave to discuss them when you call that item?

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I apologize for being a little late, but I should like to put a question to the hon. Secretary of State as a result of the remarks he made a few moments ago concerning bilingualism.

The minister told us that his department has for some time supplied bilingual bid forms. Does that apply only to the Secretary of State department or to all departments?

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I think I have given a moment ago an opinion based on the legislation concerning what goes on in other departments. The Secretary of State has no authority whatsoever in that field. Now, I am not in a position to say whether or not the other departments do the same.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, before the item passes I should like to ask the minister a technical question. I am wondering how the department functions, and how effective it is in its relations with all its branches. There is the electoral office, the civil service commission, the printing bureau and the secretary of state department, all of which appear to me to be separate and not in any way related to the office of the Secretary of State. I am wondering how these matters are handled, in a physical sense. How do you handle each one of these departments? Is there a set-up under which a deputy minister heads each one of these departments or is this a field in which we should revise the procedure for dealing with these branches? These branches, for instance, appear to me to have very little relationship to the printing bureau or to each other.

Is it now time for some reform of these branches to facilitate the handling of them within the department? Is there something that could be done to make it easier? It seems to me they are not related, and I am wondering if this produces some difficulty for the department?

Mr. Dorion: The answer to the hon. member's question is that there are two principal branches within the Department of Secretary of State under the provisions setting up that department. One is the secretary of state proper, and the other is the printing bureau. In so far as the chief electoral officer and the civil service commission are concerned, the Secretary of State is only the spokesman in the house for them.

Mr. Peters: Has each one of these different branches a deputy minister? I know where the printing bureau headquarters are and the electoral officer—I am not sure about the civil service commission—but does the fact these headquarters are widely separated present any physical difficulty in getting around? If there is such a problem, is there any way that this can be overcome by parliament?

Mr. Dorion: There is one deputy minister or the equivalent for each of these four departments. If there is something which is not precisely correct, then I am at the disposal of the hon. member to give him all the information he desires.

Item agreed to.

390. Bureau for translations, $1,811,686.

Mr. Peters: What is the function of this bureau? Does its functions include translations that may be directed to it from the House of Commons? If so, how extensive are the facilities available in that division?

Mr. Dorion: The functions of the translation bureau are provided by law. They are to translate from French to English or from English to French, as well as foreign languages, for all departments, parliamentary reports, documents, debates, bills, acts, proceedings and correspondence. Then too, the division is responsible for the simultaneous interpretation of speeches in the House of Commons and the publication of terminological bulletins.

Mr. Peters: Are these facilities available to members of parliament? Quite often members who are not bilingual require translations of letters that are written in languages other than French or English. Is it part of the function of this bureau to supply this service to members of the House of Commons? If so, is there any specific way in which this service is obtained?

The problem, as I understand it, has been that translations have been done by several branches for members of parliament. This service is on a request basis and at the discretion of the bureau. If they wish to do it, they do so and if they do not wish to do it they do not have to do so. It seems to me that the system we have now of asking the various agencies to do this work could be greatly improved. Members should be instructed as to where this work can be done, not only in so far as the French and English languages are concerned but other languages as well. At various times, the problem is rather acute, especially when we receive letters in Croatian or some of the Scandinavian languages. It is very difficult to have those letters translated here. I am wondering if this service is available to members?

Mr. Dorion: The members of the house can have translations made by the bureau, but the bureau has to communicate with the Clerk of the house. It is to the house that the bureau is responsible, and not to each member. If there is some complaint about it, these complaints are supposed to be made to the Speaker of the House. We depend on representations from the Speaker or from the house and not from individual members of the house. Generally speaking, the translators are always ready to do whatever they are asked to do for every hon. member, even if we are not proceeding strictly in conformity with the rules and the law. The law is that we are responsible to the house and that we are obliged to give our services to the House of Commons.

Mr. Peters: Does this mean that if we wish translations to be done, we should send them through the Clerk of the house or is there an office to which we can send them? It seems to me that this procedure will be giving the Clerk of the house some unnecessary work as he would immediately be obliged to dispatch them anyway. I am not asking that this be done right now. However, I think this matter could be taken up with the Secretary of State and the Clerk of the house so that an arrangement that is understood by everyone could be worked out.

As the situation stands now, the problem is this and I am quite sure that every hon. member is aware of it. Everybody gets translations done in a different department. One hon. member finds a friend in one department, and can send his letters there for translation; another hon. member finds a friend in another department. I would suggest that there is not any formal method now by which this work can be done. If this bureau is charged with doing this work on behalf of the Clerk, possibly a better arrangement can be arrived at so that a more suitable way can be found of doing this work than is at present in operation. I am not suggesting that I be told about this matter now. However, I am suggesting that the minister give consideration to discussing it with the Clerk so that study can be given to the matter with a view to working out a method which will make it a little bit easier for those of us who are not bilingual to handle some of the correspondence that is of that nature.

Mr. Dorion: Every department has its own officer to deal with the translations bureau. The hon. member can well understand how difficult it would be to proceed otherwise. However, if there is any procedure suggested properly, the hon. member can be sure that we will make every possible effort to give full consideration to the suggestion.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourque: Would the Secretary of State tell us whether the salaries of translators of the House of Commons, both English and French, are covered by item 390 amounting to $1,811,686?

Mr. Dorion: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Office of the chief electoral officer—
46. Salaries and expenses of office, $83,685.

Mr. Peters: Would the minister care to comment on this department? I am particularly concerned with the changes that have been made recently on, I would suggest, a partisan basis. I will use the example of my own riding where the returning officer over a period of years has been one person. He has established a very good record. I am not sure what his politics were and I do not really care. However, he did an exceptionally good job in two elections with which I had something to do. In one of those elections we had, as I suggest to any hon. member who may not have gone through this experience, a very unfortunate occurrence that happens occasionally. I refer to a recount. A recount is very tough on the people involved having regard to the fact that it takes some time. However, it gives one the opportunity to examine the work the electoral officer has done or the returning officer has done in that area, as you have the opportunity to see the results of the instruction that was given to the deputy returning officers under his control as well as to the clerks and other officials of the returning officer.

In this particular case, to use my own vote as an example, in 1957 before the recount I had a majority of 46. After 21,000 votes had been counted I had a majority of 40. This result would strike me as being an exceptionally good recommendation for the work of that returning officer, having regard to the fact that he was able to conduct, through the people he appointed, an election as to which, after a judicial inquiry and personal examination of every ballot in the ballot box and of the work and the reports in those ballot boxes, out of over 20,000 votes the recount resulted in a change of only six votes.

In this particular case I fail to see why that man should be replaced by somebody else, as I suggest, possibly on a patronage basis. The other gentleman in this case had been doing this type of work in a provincial field and had been very unsuccessful in it. His record was not nearly as good in the provincial field and terrific complaints were made of the enumeration and some of the other things under his jurisdiction. Now we find that, for no particular reason, unless it would be a political one, this gentleman of whom I certainly have no knowledge politically, is removed and replaced by somebody else.

It seems to me that this is one field that is of the utmost importance to us. No matter what political party one may come from, I think this statement applies to the politicians involved. However, it reflects much more on the general public and on the success that may attend our desire to see that democracy works to its full extent by having as large a vote as possible. This result hinges partly on the returning officer and the ability he shows in choosing people who will see to it that the largest number possible are enumerated, particularly in an urban area and that all citizens have an opportunity to exercise their right to vote.

We know that in rural areas a person who is not on the enumerator's list, can be put on it very easily on election day. But I agree with many of the people in my riding who will say that they will not be sworn in on election day in an area in which they have lived for 40 or 50 years. Many of them have held municipal office and have lived all their lives in that particular area. To be left off the voters' list on election day is, to them, an insult. In my particular case, the experience I have had in the elections is greater than my years in parliament would indicate. I have been closely connected with the election machinery since 1947. I have had the opportunity to observe the work of various returning officers. I have found some to be conscientious and follow the book to the letter. These people do an excellent job; I am sure they have not become mixed up in politics and politics have not been used in their cases. I would not say that politics were not used in their appointments in the first place, but this is not indicated in their operation of this office.

On the other hand, I have seen other returning officers who in my opinion have done a very poor job. They have hired people who will go down a block and not do the job properly. I remember one particular case where a boarding house was concerned. This boarding house had 66 people in it and the deputy returning officer only obtained the names of the man and woman who owned the boarding house because he believed the rest of the people did not vote the same way as they did.

In my opinion this does not do anything for the democratic process and I should like an explanation of this from the minister. I think other hon. members may be interested in this question also. In the case of men who have proven their ability and knowledge in relation to the whole of the Canada Elections Act and the operation of it—and certainly in the case where a man has proven before a judicial investigation that he has this ability and where I think it would be safe to say that no political complaint has been made of his impartiality—why should they be replaced and somebody else put in the job where the charge of it being a political appointment could be made against that person?

As I have said on other occasions where this has been done, it seems to me it does little to advance the interests of a particular political party. I say this because one man is appointed and there may be 20 who think they should have been appointed. Only one man will be grateful for the appointment and 19 will be rather upset. It does seem to me this does not do a great deal toward accomplishing the end which is intended.

I think the average Canadian citizen is more interested in honesty, integrity and the utmost attention by people concerned so that they may exercise their democratic right, be on the voters' list and may get out on election day and exercise their franchise. They would rather have this than the old, narrow concept of getting people out to the polls to vote a particular way. We, as politicians, will I am sure look after that aspect of the matter. We will be interested in getting those people to the polls whom we want to get there. Each one of us will be doing that for his political party.

It seems to me this is not the function or even part of the function of the returning officer. I am curious about this. Out of the 265 ridings in Canada, how many have been changed since the last election, and what are the reasons for any changes that have been made?

Specifically I should like to know why the change has been made in my own riding, where I think it would be very difficult for anybody to accuse the previous returning officer of having been political in any sense of the word. His job is that of clerk of a large municipality. He has the staff, the facilities and the knowledge to carry out this job and it seems to me rather foolish to change that set-up when it has worked satisfactorily.

I am curious to know how many changes there have been. Of course, none of them has been changed for political reasons; we all know that. However, I should like to know how many have been changed because of unsatisfactory service, and why has the one in my riding been changed?

Mr. Dorion: First of all, Mr. Chairman, the answer to the question of the hon. member is this. Under section 8 of the Canada Elections Act, which section I believe was adopted without alteration after careful discussion in committee before coming before the house, these men are appointed on this basis:

> The offices of all returning officers appointed prior to the passing of this act shall be deemed to be vacant and the governor in council may appoint—

The governor in council has the responsibility:

> —to such offices either the same persons as now hold them, any of such persons or any other persons; he may also thereafter appoint from time to time a returning officer for any new electoral district and a new returning officer for any electoral district in which the office of returning officer becomes vacant, within the meaning of subsection (2).

This is the law, and I believe this section was adopted without discussion on third reading of the bill. If a complaint is to be made against a returning officer, section 58 (2) of the act applies. This section says:

> Every candidate at any election and every official agent of any candidate has the right to send to the chief electoral officer in writing any complaint he may have to make with respect to the conduct of the election or of any election officer, and to suggest any such changes or improvements in the law as he may consider desirable; every such complaint or statement shall be included by the chief electoral officer in his next following report to the Speaker of the House of Commons, with such recommendations, if any, as he may see fit to make thereon.

In reply to the question put at the end of the observations of the hon. member, of all the persons appointed to date as returning officers, 81 acted as such at the 1958 general election; of this number 36 had also acted as such at the 1957 general election.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming and the reply given by the minister. I have no personal complaints in this matter because in Kootenay West everyone, regardless of party, recognizes the excellent service that has been rendered by the returning officer in a number of elections.

I am very glad to note in the list of reappointments that he has been reappointed. A number of persons in my party have indicated their satisfaction in his reappointment. However, would the minister inform the committee who is consulted with respect to the reappointment of returning officers, because I wish to refer to a letter after I receive the minister's reply.

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult to reply to the hon. member because circumstances are different in every case. But I can assure the hon. member that in respect of each person we have a report of his morality. This applies to all persons who are suggested or recommended to the governor in council for appointment, and in the final analysis the governor in council is solely responsible for the appointment.

Mr. Herridge: I am very interested to hear that there is an inquiry made as to the morals of returning officers. Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock because I have a very interesting letter to refer to later.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house leader will tell us what the business will be for tomorrow and Friday.

Mr. Churchill: We will carry on with the estimates, and will deal first tomorrow with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. On the completion of those estimates, we will resume consideration of the estimates of the Department of Secretary of State, which I hope will be followed by the completion of the estimates of the Department of Fisheries on which we spent some time earlier. If all goes well, and the house continues to be in a co-operative mood, as it has today, we will then take up the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 1, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

STANDING ORDERS

Twelfth report of standing committee on standing orders—Miss Aitken.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INDIA—REPORTED INCREASE IN FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could comment on the reports that have appeared in the press this morning that Canada has decided to increase its financial assistance to India.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those articles that appear from time to time as the expression of a wish, no doubt, on the part of those who write them. As I said the other day in answer to a similar inquiry regarding the question of aid, when full consideration has been given to all the implications the house will be made aware of the result thereof. There has been no decision made.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS CF-100 PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production arising out of a rather fantastic report to the effect that a scrap dealer in Winnipeg has some 11 CF-100's in flying condition that he has purchased from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. I wonder whether the minister could give the house some information about this transaction. Can the minister say whether tenders were called on this disposal, and can he assure the house that there will be no trafficking in war materials?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I had better answer that question. I did reply to a question in connection with the disposal of CF-100's on May 9. The answer is to be found at page 4543 of Hansard of that date. The policy which has been followed in connection with the disposal of these aircraft is as follows.

There is a program of removing all usable parts where it is economically practicable to do so, and the declaration of the residual hulk as scrap. The residual hulks, as a consequence of the salvage program, would not be in a flyable condition.

In the case of the particular aircraft mentioned in the report referred to by the hon. member, the articles salvaged from them comprised all the military and purely classified items such as armaments, etc. In addition there were salvaged the bulk of the instruments, electrical accessories, telecommunications, hydraulic and certain key airframe components which are essential to the operation of the aircraft.

There is no question but that the removal of these parts would render the 11 aircraft referred to in the report unfit for flying. I am assured by the Royal Canadian Air Force that it is incorrect to assume that these aircraft could be flown and could therefore be sold. As a matter of fact I am told that it would require an expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars to put each plane in flying condition.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister say whether tenders were called, and could he inform the house of the purchase price of these aircraft?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, tenders were called in the regular way by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and four bids were received. I do not have the prices at which these planes were sold as scrap for resale. We generally do not divulge confidential information of that nature. However, I may say that tenders were called and four bids were received.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister obtain that information and give it to the house?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Speaker, I shall consult with the authorities of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and the regular procedure will be followed. If it is possible to divulge that information I shall do so, but if it is improper I shall be required to treat it as confidential information.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did I understand the minister to say in his answer that these aircraft were sold for resale?

Mr. O'Hurley: No, Mr. Speaker, not as aircraft. They were sold as contaminated scrap. For the information of the hon. member let me say that the 11 planes represented 220,000 pounds of scrap.

Mr. McIlraith: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Defence Production explain the use of the words "for resale" in his initial answer?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Speaker, the Westbourne Supply Company purchases scrap for resale, as does any other scrap dealer.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SASKATCHEWAN—USE OF UNEMPLOYED TO FIGHT FIRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour which in his absence I shall direct to his parliamentary secretary. From reports received apparently there is a forest and bush fire northeast of Kelvington in Saskatchewan and farmers have been asked to leave their seeding to assist in fighting the fire. It is also reported that consideration has been given to taking grades XI and XII students out of school for the same purpose.

Would the minister check with the nearest employment office in the area to determine whether there are any unemployed listed who could be used for such purposes as fighting fires to avoid taking farmers off their fields at such a critical time and to avoid taking children out of school at a time when they are preparing for their final examinations, and thus provide employment to those who are apparently willing, according to some reports, to take on jobs such as enumeration in the forthcoming census?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall take that question as notice.

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION AND INCREASED FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour and, in his absence, to his parliamentary secretary. Has the minister any comment to make on the resolution passed by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities requesting that the winter works program be extended to cover the whole year, and that the federal contribution to the program be increased?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—REPORTED DANGER OF COLLAPSE OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he would care to comment on the statement of the head of the United States delegation at the Geneva conference on Laos yesterday, when he warned that the conference is in danger of collapse if pro-communist Pathet Lao forces continue to violate the cease fire.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are concerned about the effectiveness of the cease fire in Laos. Without the equipment, and also without co-operation from the various parties in Laos, it is very difficult for the commission to make sure that the cease fire is actually in full effect.

I can understand why the United States representative has raised this complaint in the conference. At the moment I am not sure just what will develop. The British delegation suggested that more detailed instructions be given to the commission and also, of course, that they be given more equipment. This is along the line of what Canada has been requesting from the start. If the activities of the truce commission in Laos are to be effective, I think it must be given this assistance.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

COMPLIANCE WITH SECTION 30 OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Postmaster General. Can the minister assure the house that section 30 of the Weights and Measures Act, which provides that all weights, measures, weighing machines and measuring machines authorized by or under this act for use in trade shall be inspected, verified, and stamped at least once every year, is being obeyed by his department?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FORTIN—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "LE SOLEIL"

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I should like to raise a question of privilege in connection with an article published recently in Le Soleil, of Quebec city. The article commented on in great detail my remarks in this house during the discussion of certain amendments to sections of the Criminal Code dealing with capital punishment. The author of the article quoted me as saying something along these lines:

If we were asked today to vote for the total abolition of the death penalty, I would vote in favour of such a measure.

Mr. Speaker, the opinion I expressed at the time was quite to the contrary. My statement is recorded on page 5301 of Hansard for May 24, 1961, and I quote:

I shall be pleased to vote for this bill, but if I had to express my opinion right now on the possibility of abolishing the death penalty altogether, I would vote against the bill—

Mr. Speaker, without casting any doubt as to the sincerity of the author of that article, I thought I should make this correction out of respect for the truth and for freedom of opinion.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Departmental administration—

202. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,087,947.

The Chairman: This item will be found at page 42 of the blue book and the details at page 284.

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Chairman, before I give an outline of the work done by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and of the requirements for the current fiscal year, I should like to say a few words about our country's mining industry.

In 1960, the keynote was not vast explorations or major mineral discoveries but the sustained and general development of known mineral deposits. Everybody agrees that 1960 was a year of arduous problems; the situation had to be re-examined closely in certain sectors of the industry. However, it is very gratifying to notice that mining is still playing a great supporting role in our national economy in general and in our export trade.

In 1960, our mineral output reached a record high of $2,480 million, that is approximately 2 per cent more than the figure of $2,410 million reached in 1959. In each of the three sectors of the industry—metallic minerals, industrial minerals and mineral fuels—production showed a moderate increase.

(Text):

Among individual mineral commodities, copper, nickel and zinc of the metallics; asbestos, sulphur and titanium dioxide of industrial minerals, and natural gas of fuels all registered significant advances in value of output. However, appreciable decreases in the value of production of iron ore and uranium of the metallics and in some of the structural materials of the industrial minerals sector nearly balanced out production gains of other mineral commodities. Nickel, copper, uranium, iron ore, gold, zinc, lead and silver, in that order, were the leading metallic minerals in output value and accounted for about 97 per cent of the total value of metallic output.

Nickel production at 427 million pounds valued at $313 million established a new high. The development of the nickel deposits at Thompson, Manitoba, proceeded on schedule, and official opening of this operation with its 75 million pounds a year production capacity took place on April 25 of this year. Canada's nearly 500 million pounds a year of nickel capacity represents about 80 per cent of total world capacity and assures an ample and continuing supply of this metal for growing free world needs.

Although Canadian copper production increased in 1960 to reach a new record level of nearly 440,000 tons, there was apparent oversupply in world markets with a resultant lowering trend in prices toward the end of the year. Canada improved its already strong comparative position as the fourth largest contributor to the western world's copper supply. Important developments are under way for opening up new copper producing areas in Canada; a railroad and a road the latter under the government's roads to resources program, are being built to the zinc-copper Mattagami lake area of northwestern Quebec to serve new mines being developed there; significant tonnages of copper ore are being developed for production in the Highland valley area of British Columbia; and copper developments in that province, it is hoped, will eventually lead to the construction of a smelter there to treat provincial ores.

Iron ore shipments in 1960 declined about 12 per cent to 19.2 million long tons from those of the previous year. The decline was due mainly to the relatively low steel operating rates in the United States during the latter half of the year. Shipments to the United Kingdom and western Europe increased both in tonnage and in value in 1960 over those of the previous year. There are several iron ore deposits of large tonnage being developed for production in Quebec-Labrador with the first of these—Quebec Cartier Mining Company's eight million ton a year capacity operation in Quebec—expected to begin shipments from Port Cartier in June. Market patterns for iron ore are changing each year, with increasing competition from South American and African iron ores on a price-quality basis. It is of interest to note that shipments to Japan from British Columbia deposits passed the one million tons a year mark for the first time in 1960. The potential market for iron ore in Japan is large, and shipments from western Canada are expected to increase steadily.

The continuing lead and zinc import quotas imposed by the United States government on September 22, 1958 tend to have a restraining influence on the production of these commodities both in Canada and other major producing countries. Canada is well represented on the international lead and zinc study group which held its third meeting at Mexico City from March 20-24. Several major projects to develop substantial deposits of lead-zinc ores are progressing. The government is surveying a railway route from Grimshaw, Alberta, to Pine Point, Northwest Territories, where large lead-zinc deposits await development. Mention has already been made of a railroad nearing completion to the Mattagami lake area of Quebec, where several properties are nearing the production stage. There has also been renewed interest in the deposits in the Bathurst area of New Brunswick. It is hoped that an announcement will soon be made that an electrolytic zinc refinery will be built in Quebec to treat zinc concentrates from mines in eastern Canada.

Since 1953 crude petroleum has been the largest single contributor to Canada's mineral output, with production in 1960 being valued at nearly $433 million. The highlight of this segment of the mineral industry was the recent announcement of the government's national oil policy, which called for oil production to reach 625,000 barrels a day by June, 1961, with an average production of 640,000 barrels a day for the whole year. It appears that average daily production for the first six months of the year will be about 594,000 barrels with a monthly high in May or June of about 640,000 barrels a day.

[Mr. Comtois.]

For comparison, the average daily production in 1960 was 535,000 barrels. I am certain hon. members will agree this is a commendable increase, and it appears that the petroleum industry will reach the government's goal. Proven reserves of petroleum in Canada reached a peak of over 4.2 billion barrels at the end of 1960 despite a record year's production.

In the natural gas industry the highlight of the past year was the approval by government agencies in Canada and United States of large scale exports of natural gas from western Canada to the growing markets of the United States west coast and mid-west. This, of course, precipitated an extensive program of building transmission pipe lines to carry the gas. This, in turn resulted in a considerably increased tempo of activity by manufacturers of steel pipe. Natural gas production in 1960 increased 20.5 per cent over that of 1959 to more than 500 billion cubic feet valued at over $48 million. Despite this record production, proven reserves of natural gas at the end of 1960 had increased over 15 per cent from a year earlier to more than 30 trillion cubic feet.

The combined total value of crude petroleum, natural gas and liquid hydrocarbons showed a growth for 1960 of 5.4 per cent over the 1959 value of production, a most gratifying rate of growth for an industry which is undergoing a rationalization period subsequent to a growth of productive capacity in the 1950's far in excess of the ability of the domestic and export markets to consume. In a world of energy minerals oversupply, both industry and governments will be faced in the 1960's with the necessity of bringing exploration, development, production and conservation programs more in line with market availability and consumption growth.

The situation in respect to that other important energy mineral, coal, is well known. Suffice it to say that the present difficulties the industry is facing are largely the result of competition from petroleum, natural gas, and surplus hydroelectric power. In Nova Scotia, coal's difficulties are compounded by high production costs and the ageing condition of the mines. However, more will be said of this matter when I present the estimates of the dominion coal board.

Uranium registered a 21 per cent drop in both quantity and value compared with 1959. Production in 1960 was valued at nearly $263 million. During the year the industry passed through an intensive period of consolidation through mine closures, transfer of government sales contracts and company amalgamations. At the end of the year there were only 10 producing uranium mines compared with 23 during the industry's peak period in 1959. There was an intensive research program under way to lower production costs and develop new industrial applications for uranium. My department investigated, and continues to investigate, the use of uranium as an additive agent in the development of higher strength low carbon steels.

Gold production increased slightly to 4.6 million troy ounces valued at $156 million. Some interest in new gold properties was revived owing to the return to near parity of the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar toward the end of the year. The problems that plagued the industry and its dependent communities during the 1950's will continue and increase in intensity as ore reserves become depleted. The government in 1960 extended the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act a further three years to the end of 1963.

(Translation):

As for industrial minerals, it is of interest to note that our shipments of asbestos for 1960 are about 10 per cent higher than in 1959, at 140,538 tons, for an estimated value of almost $119 million. Representatives of that industry who visited the U.S.S.R. in 1959 have gathered information according to which that country can now produce as much asbestos as we can. Should the U.S.S.R. production keep on increasing, we would be faced with keen competition on the European market.

Canada is slowly becoming a producer of basic sulphur, a by-product of the natural gas of western Canada, and we presently occupy the fourth rank among countries of the free world which produce sulphur in one form or another. Our daily production capacity will reach 5,770 long tons when two new processing plants are built. In 1960 the electrical titanic ore smelter at Sorel, Quebec, also produced for $300,000 worth of titanic dioxide cinders and for about $11 million worth of remelting iron.

(Text):

I shall not dwell further on developments in the individual mineral fields, but should like to briefly outline some developments of the immediate future. They are quite encouraging. Crude petroleum production is expected to register an average annual increase of about 8 per cent over the next several years. Natural gas production and export will probably register the largest gains of any of the mineral commodities in the years ahead. This year the new nickel producing area at Thompson, Manitoba, will register its first full year's operation which, coupled with increasing nickel demand and the loss of Cuba's potential nickel supply to the United States market, places Canada in an even more dominant position as a major supplier of this vital commodity. Quebec Cartier Mining Company will begin shipments of iron ore concentrates from Port Cartier, Quebec, in 1961. Iron Ore Company of Canada and Wabush Iron Company Limited are also developing concentrating grade iron ore bodies in the Wabush lake area of Labrador.

Further strengthening and broadening of the mineral industry is assured through the development of production of zinc-copper ore bodies in the Mattagami area of Quebec; of asbestos deposits in the Baie Verte region of northern Newfoundland; of tungsten in the Northwest Territories; of iron ore deposits in Labrador, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia; of oil and gas fields in the western provinces and Yukon territory, and of renewed production from the potash deposits of Saskatchewan, which are the largest and highest grade in the world.

Mining developments in Canada are widespread and diversified. The continuing development of this country's mineral resources is of paramount importance to many other sectors of the Canadian industrial economy. New railroads, towns, docks, pipe lines, processing plants and hydroelectric power plants that are wholly attributable to and dependent upon mining developments have been built. Many service and ancillary operations have been established or enlarged to serve the industry. Much direct and indirect employment results from the continuing development of our mineral resources.

The practice followed over the years by my department of assisting the mineral industry by laboratory research projects in the mines branch has been accelerated during the past two or three years. The projects are carried on at the specific request of companies as well as in line with fundamental research plans directed toward greater development and utilization of Canada's mineral resources.

In this latter connection it is encouraging to note that the major portion of domestic base metal ore production is smelted and refined in Canada. This is a considerable achievement when it is realized that foreign smelting industries, based on countries whose ore reserves are becoming depleted or whose sources of concentrate are uncertain, require large amounts of concentrate to maintain operations. In spite of the demand of foreign smelters for ores and concentrates, over 90 per cent of our copper, over 60 per cent of our nickel and zinc and about 75 per cent of our lead is smelted and refined in Canada and sold in the domestic and export markets in pig or ingot form.

However, this high degree of processing before export does not hold true for iron ore. This is because the high degree of integration of the primary iron and steel industry throughout the world and especially in North America places emphasis on processing iron ore in the importing country. Processing of iron ore into pig iron, then into crude steel and rolling mill products is normally done at the site of an integrated operation, a location which is usually close to a source of fuel and almost always close to highly industrialized centres of large population.

The increasing world supply of minerals and metals, which in some cases amounts to abundance, is bringing about an increasing degree of protectionism in the free world's two largest consuming areas, the United States and Europe. This has been manifested in the United States by restricting imports of lead and zinc by quotas, by open hearings by the United States tariff commission to study the effect of iron ore imports on the domestic industry, and by the introduction in congress of bills to restrict the imports of various other mineral commodities including crude petroleum, fluorspar and tungsten. The development of protectionism in western Europe is evidenced by the formation of trading blocs such as the European common market or E.C.M. and the European free trade association or E.F.T.A. Canada has many competitors for these mineral markets. There is no scarcity of mineral raw materials in the world, and it appears that competition for world markets will become even keener over the next decade.

The phenomenal growth of our mining and smelting industries has resulted from foreign demand for metals in the form of ore, concentrates or virgin metal. The industrial nations of the free world have developed their smelting, refining and manufacturing industries to a high degree. Their need is for mineral raw materials such as ore, concentrate and prime metal rather than in the rolled or more fully processed forms. These countries protect their processing industries by placing tariffs of increasing severity on imports in direct proportion to the amount of processing that has been done on the particular commodity. In the mineral industry minor tariffs are set on imported ores or concentrates, higher tariffs are imposed on metal in ingot or prime forms, and progressively higher tariffs are usually in effect on semi-fabricated and fully manufactured products.

(Translation):

The minerals and the industrial products obtained from minerals are becoming increasingly important for the Canadian export trade. The export value of those products exceeds that of products of any other industry. In 1960, that value, including the manufactured goods of mineral origin, accounted for 41.6 per cent of the total national exports. From 1950 to 1960, the export value of minerals and industrial products obtained from minerals increased by 124 per cent, while the value of the total exports increased by 40 per cent in the same period.

(Text):

From a mineral resources and supply point of view, Canada gives every indication of becoming increasingly important. This country will continue to be a major contributor to the world's mineral requirements. Our mineral resources are ample both to support a much larger industrial output in this country and to provide minerals and primary metals to satisfy any foreseeable demand by countries of the free world. However, to maximize the use of our labour force and to improve our trade balance it will be necessary to enlarge and diversify our secondary manufacturing industries, particularly those based on minerals. To maximize the value of our mineral output it will be necessary to attain the highest possible degree of mineral processing and metal fabrication before export. A first step in moving toward this objective appears to be the growth and further diversification of our secondary manufacturing industries to supply a larger portion of our own domestic requirements for finished products than at present. It will only be through continued close cooperation and consultation among all levels of government with industry that the desired results will be attained to the greatest benefit of our total economy.

(Translation):

I should like now, Mr. Chairman, to say a few words on my departmental estimates and give an outline of some of the projects in progress.

As hon. members will see on page 44 of the blue book, the department is requesting for 1961-62 appropriations to the amount of $44,600,358, an increase of a little over $4 million from the previous year. Salary adjustments account for 40 per cent of that increase and the remainder is mostly due to the development of field work and to the increased cost of these field undertakings, as we are progressing northward. Moreover, we have accepted to carry oceanographic projects in a much more extensive way, and we are assuming the cost of a third expedition, which will be the most elaborate one ever undertaken on the polar continental shelf. In the field as well as in laboratories, we have speeded up research in order to find solutions to the new and urgent problems raised by several aspects of our national development program.

(Text):

In our departmental administration we plan to provide additional services vital to these intensified programs. We will make more use of electronic data processing equipment to handle the countless repetitive computations that are necessarily a part of survey and scientific work. I might add that thanks to our computer programming an increasing number of projects can now be speeded or channelled into promising new avenues of research.

We have also allowed in our administrative vote for the purchase of camp and field equipment and other items commonly used by our branches. These have been pooled in one central vote to simplify their purchase, handling and maintenance and thereby effect savings in costs. In our mineral resources division more funds are needed for the publication of reports. During the fiscal year its officers will be engaged in a number of valuable fact-gathering projects and will take part in several conferences of utmost concern to our mineral industry.

For the surveys and mapping branch, Mr. Chairman, we are asking $19,047,454. This is to carry forward an intense survey program calling for geodetic work in almost every province and the territories, topographical surveys aimed at completing the initial medium scale map coverage of Canada by 1966, and hydrographic charting and related projects involving large segments of our coastal and inland waterways.

Time does not permit further analysis of the branch's current field projects, but I should mention that a number of parties will be working in the Yukon, the district of Mackenzie and the Arctic islands, and the cost of fielding personnel in northern or remote regions is necessarily high.

Let me stress, however, that our technical men are constantly testing, developing and making use of new instruments and methods that will do much to speed the work and, in the long run, will bring about considerable savings. At this point I am pleased to announce that the surveys and mapping branch has completed the move to its new building on Booth street and has the additional space and improved facilities it so badly needs. The official opening will probably take place early next year, at which time I will be pleased to welcome my honourable colleagues. With the addition of this new building our Booth street science centre, if I may call it such, is now virtually complete, but the estimates provide for a number of equipment items which could not be purchased until the buildings were ready.

This brings me to our oceanographic polar continental shelf programs, and here I repeat what I have said on a number of occasions. These are projects of far-reaching significance, affecting our economic and scientific progress and, to some extent, our national sovereignty.

The 1961-62 estimates call for a program of ship construction including the C.G.S. Hudson which will be, in essence, a floating laboratory for hydrographic and oceanographic research; and for the replacement of three vessels of the Canadian hydrographic service. It is our hope that the Hudson will be commissioned next year. I am pleased to report that construction of the Bedford institute of oceanography near Halifax is going ahead on schedule. The docking facilities and depot will be in operation by September, and the laboratory building will probably be ready by July of next year. When fully staffed the institute will have a working force of 300 oceanographers, hydrographers, marine biologists, submarine geologists and other specialists. I should add, however, that people trained in these fields are very scarce, and we are conducting a vigorous recruiting and training program in conjunction with three universities and various federal agencies.

This summer we will be undertaking a broad oceanographic survey of Hudson bay with special emphasis on submarine geology, bottom sampling and photography, gravity, magnetic and seismic measurements and other related scientific observations. In the polar basin 70 men, supported by three fixed wing aircraft, four helicopters and 700 tons of equipment are working on the polar icecap over a large area of the polar continental shelf. They are conducting investigations in submarine geology, seismology, gravity, magnetism, geography, hydrography and other fields. In these projects we have drawn on the experience and knowledge of men in all corners of our department and from other federal agencies and Canadian universities. Our oceanographic program is co-ordinated and planned by the Canadian committee on oceanography under the chairmanship of our director general of scientific services.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think I need dwell on the importance of this work, beyond saying that in our oceanographic and polar projects we are laying the foundation for the development of our resources in these relatively unknown areas; we are paving the way for transportation and travel in Arctic waterways, both below and on the surface; and we are gathering information essential to the defence of this country. We are also making an important contribution to the progress of science.

The 1961-62 estimates also reflect the intensified task of the geological survey of Canada, which this year is sending to the field the largest work force of its 119 year history. One hundred and two parties—a total of 400 geologists, technical officers and supporting staff—will be spotted in all 10 provinces and the territories. They will work in all physiographic regions and in all types of terrain. Some, as in the case of the Hudson bay project in submarine geology, will even work over water.

For the geological survey, Mr. Chairman, we have requested $5,303,834. Specifically, it will provide for major reconnaissance surveys requiring the using of Piper Cubs and helicopters over the district of Franklin, the Yukon, British Columbia, Alberta, Quebec and Labrador. It calls for geochemical studies in the Northwest Territories, Alberta, and New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and seismic, magnetic and palaeomagnetic observations in many places. Ground water surveys will be carried out in seven of our 10 provinces, with special emphasis on the prairies where homes, factories and farms are dependent on underground water. We have been urged to intensify our program in this field and are making every effort to do so as trained men become available.

My department will also be fulfilling its commitments under the roads to resources program, and will send five geological field parties to northwestern Ontario at a cost of $101,800 of which $23,000 will be for the charter of aircraft. We also have made provision for a series of aeromagnetic surveys over large parts of the Canadian shield, the beginning of a 12 year project which we are undertaking in co-operation with the provinces. When completed it will cost $18 million, two thirds of which is to be paid by the federal government.

I might also mention operation Leaf river, calling for the mapping of large pre-Cambrian areas in northern Quebec, and operation Ogilvie involving about 15,000 square miles of mountainous terrain in central Yukon. It is interesting to note that by the end of the 1962 field season we will have mapped on a reconnaissance scale all sedimentary formations of our northern areas, which are conducive to the occurrence of oil.

Mr. Chairman, an expanding field program of this kind, imposes a great responsibility on the laboratory staff, who must not only conduct many types of supporting investigations and analyses, but who must develop new techniques and tools that will further the work both in the field and at home. Accordingly—and the estimates reflect this—the survey is gearing itself to meet a sharp rise in the demand for rock and mineral analyses, X-ray identifications and other laboratory research and services. It has asked for several highly specialized pieces of equipment including the apparatus required for radiocarbon dating. This will be used for determining the ages of deposits not more than 35,000 years old by measuring the carbon-14 content of organic remains. I might add that the survey's radio-carbon laboratory will also be of service to archaeologists in their study of prehistoric cultures here in Canada. This is a good example of how progress in one discipline can benefit another.

To finance the work of the mines branch we have asked for $4,808,095, a sum that can be regarded as a good investment in the future growth of our mineral industry, for although Canada has been endowed with a handsome share of mineral deposits, comparatively few of these can be regarded as high grade and many of them are difficult to process. Developing commercially feasible techniques by which these can be made marketable is a research problem of major proportions. At the same time other nations of the world are giving our traditional mineral products strong competition, and it is essential that we explore every avenue by which present processing costs can be reduced; and we must find new uses for those minerals of which we have an overabundance.

You will not expect me, Mr. Chairman, to explain all the projects under way in the mines branch. In the physical metallurgy division alone there are over 100. But I should like to be specific about one or two.

Our work on uranium we regard as a matter of utmost urgency. We are seeking to improve the extraction processes currently in use at uranium mining camps, and we are seeking new non-atomic uses for the metal. As I announced last December, we have had promising success with uranium as an alloying element in commercial steels. Uranium can be added at very little cost and will bring about improvements in corrosion resistance, fatigue strength and behaviour at high temperatures. The branch is also experimenting with additions of uranium to non-ferrous metals such as copper, aluminum, zinc and lead and, while much work remains, I can at least say that results so far have been encouraging. It is my hope that these projects will lead to a better market for Canadian uranium.

The mines branch is stepping up its work on iron ores, investigating the possibilities offered by direct reduction and other processes. Our scientists are also seeking means of beneficiating Canadian niobium and manganese ores, of which we have large low grade deposits, and they are investigating a great variety of metallic and non-metallic materials. In one way or another the branch is dealing with just about every known mineral commodity.

(Translation):

Concerned with the distress of the maritime coal mines, our mines branch undertook a whole series of projects aimed at finding new outlets for coal. The fuel division has developed a specially designed power fire-grate for the economic use of maritime coal. According to our estimates, those works should continue in 1961-62. We intend also to provide money for an analysis of the problems involved in underground stresses. This is of course a long term program for certain Canadian mines. I hope that it will result in safer and more effective mining practices.

Mr. Chairman, time does not permit me to go into those matters at more length. But I think I have said enough about those projects to give you an idea of their worth. Many of them are of the utmost importance for the mining industry and many are long-term programs. But the common purpose there is to place our country in a better position, through technological advance, to develop its mineral resources.

(Text):

The geographical branch of my department is also making important contributions to our progress. In the fiscal year 1961-62 it will continue its land use surveys which provide what I might describe as a blueprint for agricultural planning, forestry and many other projects related to the effective use of our land and our resources. The branch will continue its ice studies, its terrain analyses and will update and revise portions of the now famous atlas of Canada. The current estimates provide $500,626 for the geographical branch including the administration of the Canadian board on geographical names.

Regarding the board I should like to make one observation. The Canadian board on geographical names serves as a federal-provincial authority in the naming of geographical and other features of this country. I believe, however, that too little is known of its work, and that it is not consulted often enough in these matters. A town, a lake or a mountain may look the same regardless of what we decide to call it. But many of our geographical names are both childish and inappropriate; others lead to confusion and misunderstanding. I believe that a little education and publicity in the right direction would prevent many an eyesore in nomenclature on our maps.

In our estimates we have provided $2,428,838 for the dominion observatory which is engaged in what is undoubtedly the most far-reaching program of its distinguished history. Less than a year ago I had the pleasure of opening the observatory's radio telescope near Penticton, and I can now report that its performance in the observation of hydrogen clouds has exceeded all expectations. Meanwhile the branch will soon bring into operation at Victoria, B.C. a new 48-inch telescope for complex investigations of the physical nature of stars and the interstellar gases. The building to house it has been completed and the instrument will probbably go into action sometime in November.

Getting back to earth, the observatories will carry out an extended gravity survey over Baffin island—a project of importance to national defence—and others over northern Quebec and Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and the prairie provinces. As part of its studies of the earth's magnetism the branch will continue its ground observations and will conduct a series of aeromagnetic flights over the Arctic islands and large areas of the Arctic ocean. Continuous records of magnetic variations will be provided from stations in the Northwest Territories, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

In the field of seismology the branch will record earthquakes from its eleven stations stretching from Halifax to Victoria and will make special observations for the department's polar continental shelf project. The current estimates provide for building new seismic and magnetic observatories and the enlargement of the present seismic vault at Ottawa.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I have just outlined only a few of the projects undertaken by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Besides, I could not, in such a brief period, give our research workers and technicians the credit they deserve for their valuable help to the development of our country and for their well-known achievements. Surely, Mr. Chairman, I have said enough to bring out the essential part those people are playing toward a continued development of Canada and to indicate that in the near future, new and very promising avenues of research will be open to us all.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I should like, first of all, to congratulate the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) for the fine statement he made on the activities of his department. At this point, I feel there is no need for extensive remarks and therefore, I shall only make general comments. Later on, we shall have every opportunity to put questions to the minister on the various items as they are called.

Mr. Chairman, the minister dealt briefly with the coal industry and he mentioned that he would have a certain statement to make when the items relating to the dominion coal board are under discussion.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, allow me to say a few words on this matter, since the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) just mentioned it. It was agreed, I believe, with those who are usually called upon to deal with the coal question, when my departmental estimates are under consideration—and I conferred with a few of them—

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, I think the committee should delay any discussion on coal until we reach the item of the dominion coal board.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, we entirely agree with the minister as far as procedure is concerned and, as I understand it, it is agreed that we shall take up items 202 to 228 first. I understand that when items 229 and following are called, particularly item 229, those who wish to deal with the coal industry more specifically may then do so.

(Text):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I will have another statement to make when we arrive at this item.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: In this way, we are proving that we are ready to co-operate as far as possible, and that we have no intention of delaying the votes which are necessary to the good administration of the department.

Mr. Chairman, all members recognize the importance of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and the influence it can have in terms of the prospecting, exploration and development of the vast mineral resources which are to be found in the Canadian underground.

It is gratifying to note that many members take a particular interest in basic and applied research that is continually being carried out in the different laboratories of the department. Others are also interested in the various geological, topographical and hydrographic surveys and other types of surveys carried out each year in different parts of the country. Finally, there are those in this house who represent constituencies where mining industries prevail, and who consider this department as an essential government service for the development of our country's economy, for the development of their own areas and for the welfare of the people.

We all agree that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has done excellent work in years past. We feel that the department should push even further its research activities in the fields of geology and geography as well as its geodetic, topographical, hydrographic and oceanographical surveys. We realize also that the various branches of the department must have the most modern equipment and, of still greater importance, that the minister must have at his disposal the best qualified scientists.

It is obvious that to reach the goals I have just mentioned, we shall have to give more and more importance to that department and to put at its disposal the funds it may need.

It is imperative for the economic growth of Canada that nothing be neglected or done in a haphazard way when the development of our natural resources is involved.

The minister mentioned some of this department's estimates and he hastily added that all those expenditures are good investments. I agree wholeheartedly with that statement and I would be remiss if I did not say a good word here concerning the civil servants who are responsible for properly achieving the work entrusted to them.

Mr. Chairman, this country is fortunate that the various branches of this department are staffed with very capable scientists and highly qualified professional men who are devoted and conscientious employees. They deserve our gratitude and congratulations.

Last year, the year before last and three years ago, I think I mentioned that unfortunately when discussing the estimates of mines and technical surveys we had no complete report of the department's activities during the year just ended. I must make a similar remark this year. However, I should like to point out that in 1960 and early 1961, the information branch of the department published a series of memorandums, pamphlets and reports on the activities of some branches, and I extend my congratulations to the people who have prepared those reports or pamphlets.

If my colleagues in the committee have seen memorandum No. 49 which contains a preliminary study of the situation in the mining industry in 1960—I think a similar study was made in 1959 and maybe also in previous years—they certainly found there extremely useful information. Moreover, when one reads it, one finds that the various chapters have been prepared by specialists with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. We find there immensely useful information which can represent a basic knowledge for those who want to take a more active interest in the mining industry.

In order to realize fully the importance of our mining industry and the influence it may have on this country's economy, we only have to look up the relevant statistics to see how rapidly it has progressed, more particularly since the last world war. Besides, that progress was mentioned by the minister in his speech.

The total value of Canada's mining production has risen from $503 million in 1946 to $2,085 million in 1956, an increase of over 300 per cent in ten years or, in other terms, an average annual increase of 15 per cent for that period.

During the last four years, the annual increase has been somewhat slower.

Nevertheless, in 1960, the total value of our mining production amounted to $2,480 million, as the minister said earlier—I had here $476 million, but those figures are revised from time to time—anyhow, $2,480 million, which means an increase of 2.7 per cent over 1959. From 1956 to 1960, the average annual increase has been about 4 per cent.

The total value of the metallic minerals production rose from $1,371 million in 1959 to $1,404 million, or so, in 1960.

The total value of our nickel production for 1960 increased by $55.7 million, a new high; copper production went up $31.2 million for the same period.

In 1960, the production of uranium registered a drop in value of nearly $33 million, and the iron ore production, a drop of $21 million.

While in 1960, the total value of mining production in Canada reached a new high, the annual average rate of increase during the last four years was considerably lower than for the years 1946 to 1956. That slowing down had a somewhat cooling effect on various sections of the industry.

It is also generally admitted—and the minister said a few words on the matter—that 1960 was a rather difficult year for our mining industry, a year during which Canadian producers have been forced to make a most judicious and careful review of anything connected directly or indirectly with this industry.

Competition on the world markets is still very sharp. We still find it very difficult to keep our cost prices in line with those of several other ore producing countries, where the wage scale and production costs are only a fraction of our own.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, the United States is still our best customer. However, they are not without causing us some difficulties, because the entry into that country of some mining products, such as lead and zinc, is still subject to a quota system, and that is a source of trouble for Canadian producers of those metals.

Protectionist tendencies in some states south of the border are always cropping up. That is, at present, a serious problem which our producers must face. Naturally, time cures many evils, and the day will come when our American friends will realize that the sacrifices they have to make to protect a dwindling industry which cannot meet their own needs any more are too onerous, and then, necessarily, they will have to come back to better sentiments. Meanwhile, the problem remains and it must be taken into account.

Our uranium industry is facing a difficult situation. The minister referred to it. It is far from having found a solution to its problems.

However, we must not look only at the dark side. That industry will certainly be faced with great difficulties in the next decade, but we hope it will get over the hump when new uses are found for its products.

Steel production was slow last year in the United States, and naturally this has affected iron ore producers. There now seems to be an upswing in that industry. There is no doubt that if such an upswing is really felt, it will benefit our iron ore industry.

All those problems, Mr. Chairman, are of course a cause for concern to those interested in the mining industry. However, the picture of that industry is not entirely dark. Personally, I think the mining industry, despite its many current difficulties, will eventually find a way out, and in the not too distant future will enjoy even greater prosperity than in the years 1946 to 1956. The proof of that, Mr. Chairman, is that even this year when the industry is faced with difficulties, we find that its leaders are optimistic and are planning capital expenditures of over one billion dollars in 1961.

The minister has dealt with this subject, and I need not say more. Those capital expenditures will be spread out across the country, including particularly British Columbia, where the industry is enjoying great activity. Indeed, a market has been found for its copper and iron ore in Japan a country which is friendly to Canada.

In western Canada, the oil industry is also very active. We are also optimistic for that area. Unless impossible restrictions are applied by our neighbours to the south, we really expect, that Alberta and Saskatchewan will enjoy very prosperous years thanks to their oil.

In Ontario and Quebec, and I might add Newfoundland with regard to the base metal industries, the iron mining industries will continue their progress unless, again, restrictions are applied.

That is why I say, Mr. Chairman, that the outlook in the mining industry is not wholly dark.

Consumption of metals is rising steadily. In the U.S., we have a market which, in the next 25 years, will be able to absorb the many kinds of metals we will be producing, in quantities even larger than we probably can supply.

The future prospects of the Canadian mining industry are therefore good, indeed excellent.

According to an old saying:

God helps those who help themselves.

The industry itself has responsibilities. Labour organizations have responsibilities. Federal and provincial governments also have responsibilities.

Altogether they must give the impulse required for the growth of this most important Canadian mining industry.

If you allow me, Mr. Chairman, I should now like to say a few words about our gold mining industry.

Even though the output of our gold mines increased somewhat during 1960, this industry is becoming increasingly unsteady.

It is true that during the past year, our gold mines have benefited from the amendments to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, and also, of late, from a lower premium on the Canadian dollar. Nevertheless, many things are hidden under these improvements, for the gold mining industry is now going through a difficult period.

Last year, three more mines had to close down, although it is true that a new mine was put into operation. None the less, Mr. Chairman, we believe that in 1961 and in 1962, several gold mines will be compelled to close down, unless there is a radical change in the sale price of that metal.

Under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, which came into effect in 1948, the Canadian government has greatly contributed towards this industry. We have to admit that were it not for that legislation, very few gold mines would still be operating today.

However, this form of assistance to our gold mines is not adequate today. It maintains mines in operation, and that is a very important factor, but we must bring further help to this industry. For the survival of certain municipalities, which otherwise would become ghost towns, depends on the sustained development of certain mines.

This kind of help, however, does not meet all the requirements, unless the government has decided to abandon this industry, and this, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it has.

Something will have to be done to rehabilitate this industry because it is essential to Canada's economic development.

In the past, it has been essential to the great development we have experienced. During the difficult 30's, the gold mining industry played a vital role.

And then too, this industry has been responsible for much of the discovery of base metal mines which are now in operation all across the country, and because of which our mining output value now reaches the fabulous amount of $2.5 billion.

During the last war, its role was of such importance that the Canadian government urged the industry's leaders to boost their production.

Mr. Comtois: May I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Dumas: Certainly.

Mr. Comtois: Since the hon. member is talking about gold mines, could he tell us if our gold production is found to fall off, if our gold reserves and our gold potential are on the decline, what he would suggest as a remedy?

Mr. Dumas: If the hon. minister would wait for a few moments, I will offer suggestions. I may not give very explicit directives, this being a very difficult problem, but I could make suggestions to him.

We have experienced difficulties in the past, and the former government introduced the gold mining assistance act that this government has continued to apply and has even amended.

This act is certainly beneficial to the gold mining industry.

However, I suggest this is not enough, since the only purpose of the application of this act is to keep in operation certain mines which, of course, are the livelihood of a great many people who live in the municipalities where gold mining is the sole industry.

This industry then is proving most useful. The law, however, does not for instance, encourage prospectors to go out into mining areas in an effort to discover gold deposits. That is the point I want to make.

If our mines get depleted, as is indeed the case, the first thing we will know is that we will no longer have a gold mining industry, even if the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is still in force.

I think therefore I am right in saying that the government should take the necessary steps to bring effective help to gold mines. Later on, during my speech, I hope to say a few words about that matter.

Mr. Chairman, if there has been such big developments in our mining industry these last 30 years, it was due largely to our gold mining industry. Today our country is experiencing difficulties. We should recognize that our economy has slowed down. We have to find jobs for hundreds of thousands of workers who would like nothing better than to be able to do their daily share in order to put our country back again on the high road to prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, some time ago our southern neighbours, who have more gold in their coffers than we might ever possess, quietly decided to subsidize gold mining prospection. And on this subject, I should like to read an excerpt taken from the Financial Post for April 15, 1961. I shall read it in the original, that is to say in English:

(Text):

U.S. Offering Half of Exploration for Gold Finds
The United States government will pay up to half of exploration costs in finding a gold mine.

In a move to help its mining industry, the United States department of interior is broadening its exploration assistance program to include precious metals gold and silver.

Previously, it restricted its aid to minerals now vital to industry.

The United States is also willing to pay part of the cost of finding iron ore in the United States as well as bismuth, sulphur and tellurium. And it is increasing the maximum share it will pay to 75 per cent of exploration cost for asbestos, beryllium, chromite and mica discoveries.

We have often heard it said that the United States is not interested in gold, although that country is willing to keep on buying the metal at $35 an ounce. However, Mr. Chairman, you can see from this article, which appeared in a very responsible paper—and it has been checked—that the United States is willing now under the Kennedy administration to pay 50 per cent of the exploration costs to find gold mines in that country.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the present position of the Canadian gold mining industry and the chief trends which are now affecting the industry are of major concern to the principal gold producing provinces of Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia, Manitoba, the Yukon territory and the Northwest Territories; but in a more general way the survival of an industry which has played so great a part in opening up northern Canada and in building up our national economy surely must be a matter of interest and concern to all Canadians and to all Canadian provinces whether or not they are major gold producers. For many years now, little or no exploration has been carried on—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Fortin): Order, I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired, unless he has the unanimous consent of the committee to continue his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dumas: I wish to thank the committee for its kindness, and I shall take only a few minutes more.

As I said, for many years now little or no exploration has been carried on in the development of new gold mines in Canada. It must be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that gold mines like any other mines are a wasting asset. Because of increasing costs much ore has of necessity been discarded as waste rock. Furthermore, as present ore reserves are exhausted and with no new producers being developed, Canadian gold production is declining and will continue to decline more rapidly in the near future unless we do something about it. In the face of the evidence it is not an exaggerated conclusion to state that Canada is in grave danger of losing her gold mining industry.

It is my firm belief that a broad revival in the search for new gold mines could be the key that will continue to uncover our latent mineral resources, not only of gold but of numerous other metals. There is no doubt that greatly increased exploration activity generated through a renewed search for gold would more than duplicate the great successes of the past.

I should like to mention here the past records of our Canadian gold mining industry. The number of ounces of gold mined in Canada as of the end of 1960 totals 157,383,670. The total value of this production to the end of that year stood at $4.964 billion. We certainly must have topped the $5 billion mark by now. This is a record which outstrips by a considerable margin that of any other metal produced in this country, the next being copper with an aggregate of about $3.47 billion and nickel with an aggregate of approximately $3.46 billion.

Of the $5 billion earned through the production of this precious metal by our Canadian gold mines during the past 100 years, the best part was paid out in wages, materials and services. Some was paid in dividends. I am proud to say that Canadian gold mines must have paid close to $1 billion in dividends, and also plowed back more than $1 billion into the industry. In addition, Mr. Chairman, in producing gold to the value of over $5 billion our gold mining industry has spearheaded the development of northern Canada and the discovery of our huge and varied treasure chest of mineral resources, the value of which has been estimated at $2.5 billion for the year 1960 alone.

Before I conclude my remarks I should like to quote two or three short paragraphs from an address made last winter by Mr. V. C. Wansbrough, vice president and managing director of the Canadian Metal Mining Association, to the Prospectors and Developers Association at their meeting in Toronto. It is entitled, "One Hundred Years of Gold Mining in Canada", and I quote in part as follows:

> Gold and problems related to gold have been more in the public eye and the public mind of recent months than at any time during the last 25 years. The drain of gold away from the United States treasury has given enough concern to cause the Eisenhower administration to take drastic steps, which the Kennedy administration has followed up by further measures, to protect the integrity of the United States dollar and stem the outflow of gold.
> As part of the pattern we saw the sudden and dramatic flare-up of the gold price last October on the free gold markets of Zurich, London and Toronto, reaching at one point a peak of $41 an ounce. I mention this only in passing as an indication of current interest.

That is true. Mr. Wansbrough further said:

> For our purpose it is enough to say that interest in gold is greater than we have known for years. We cannot foresee with any assurance what the future will bring. But we can salute the wonderful record of Canada's gold mining industry upon its centennial.

I come now to my final words. I really believe that something should be done for the gold mining industry. I think the Canadian government should study most seriously the feasibility of increasing the price of gold. I mentioned that matter when the previous administration was in power, I mentioned it two years ago and I am proud to be here today to mention it again. I know there are certain difficulties, but if the government should increase the price of gold to $42 or $44 an ounce, let us say, it would be understood, of course, that this would be only for Canadian gold produced by Canadian gold mines. The government might have to spend a large amount of money to do this. However, if the government were to take such action it could be restricted to a certain number of years.

I am convinced that if something like that is done we will see the greatest rush in northern Canada that we have ever had, and not only in my own province. We do not produce the most gold. The province of Ontario produces the greatest quantity of gold. If this action is taken you will see activity across the country in the northern parts of the provinces, and the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon, with the possible exception of the maritimes. People will be looking for gold. Money will be spent, employment will be provided, materials will be bought, ore will be found, mines will be built and employment will be provided for all those who would like to work.

I will tell the minister why. In the extensive search for this precious metal, all kinds of base metals would also be discovered. The minister has said there is a surplus of certain metals at the present time, but let me tell him that 25 years from now there will be no surplus. Consumption is increasing all the time, and when that day comes our neighbours to the south in particular will be glad to buy their base metals in this country, because they will be short of all of them in their own country. I am not trying to give an order to the government, but am simply telling them that they should study the feasibility of increasing the price of gold. If the government do so there may be a chance of their great vision coming true.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in discussing the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys again we would like to say that we are very pleased with the report the minister made this morning. His experience in the department has greatly increased his knowledge of the problems of mining, and in the light of this knowledge I am quite sure that much better service can be provided to the industry than has been the case in the past.

I was interested in the comments of the minister relating to our mineral reserves and the benefit these have brought and will bring to the Canadian people. Before making my general remarks I wish to ask the minister a few questions relating to my own area.

In Kirkland Lake, Dane and Cochrane we have large iron ore deposits. The potentiality and the grade have been proven. We have allowed large United States companies to obtain vast limits but have made no stipulation concerning the amount of development they must undertake. They do no more than is done by small local companies. To my knowledge no shaft or open pit mining is done in these areas at this time.

Much interest has been expressed in the developments taking place at Timagami. If United States companies are involved there, nothing more will take place in terms of development than occurred in the Dane and Cochrane areas. We should impose some stipulations on these companies. Where they have undertaken initial development and have proved the reserve and the grade of ore we should require that they undertake further developments leading to mining operations. The people in the local areas affected are plagued by the fact that large United States companies, particularly steel companies, have control of the claims and the industry and have no intention of developing the proven reserves.

I understand that we are holding in Canada large reserves of cobalt ore on which storage and handling charges are paid. I am curious to know why we store ore under this arrangement, and what is going to be done about it. I am also curious about the relationship between the government and Deloro Smelting and Refining Company Limited. Why have not contracts been pursued by the government in relation to this valuable metal, cobalt? In the event of an emergency such as arose during the last war reserves of this ore will be difficult to assess and develop unless we give leadership to the industry at this time.

I agree with the previous speaker that the gold mining industry is confronted with difficult problems which must be solved. I represent two important gold mining areas, Kirkland Lake and Matachewan. The government should do more for the gold mining industry than is presently done under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. The assistance given under the act serves a good purpose in enabling some producers to continue operations, but it really only serves to postpone the day when these mines will have to close down. The end has already come for some operators in Matachewan. Each year in Kirkland Lake one or two gold mines close down, and the situation is not improving. Very few new mines are being developed. The future of the industry in that area hangs in the balance.

I do not know why gold has always been the carrot, as it were, that has been held out to the mining industry. An examination of the history of mining on this continent reveals that the initial impetus always resulted from the discovery and development of gold reserves. This appears to be true of northern Ontario, the Yukon, California and other places where rushes have taken place. If the gold mining industry today were to receive the required assistance, it might very well serve as an impetus to development which would be reflected in the entire mining industry in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Before the lunch hour, Mr. Chairman, I was making a plea for some consideration for the gold mining industry. As I left the chamber one of the members asked me whether I was making a pitch for the re-establishment of gold as the basis for our currency. This is not my desire. However, I believe there is a relationship between gold and the price that is paid for gold and our Canadian currency. I should just like to read a short paragraph from a publication put out by the Canadian Metal Mining Association entitled "Why Mine Gold?" In a paragraph entitled "Gold in Canada's Money System" they say this:

> It requires a little probing below the surface to discover what role gold now plays in Canada's money system.
> When the Bank of Canada began operations in 1935, it became the sole holder of the country's gold reserves. The gold reserves, held up to that time by the chartered banks, were turned over to the Bank of Canada.
>
> For the next few years the Bank of Canada was required by law to keep in its vaults an amount of gold equal to 25 per cent of its total liabilities in notes and deposits.
> The war brought a change. In April 1940 the exchange fund order was passed; under it the gold reserves of the Bank of Canada were transferred to the foreign exchange control board, and the 25 per cent stipulation was suspended.

This situation, brought about by the financial emergencies of the war, remains unchanged. There is no law currently in effect in Canada which calls for a percentage gold backing for our currency. The link between the Canadian dollar and gold is no longer direct.

Nevertheless the link is there. First, Canada, by subscribing to the Bretton Woods agreements, became a member of the international monetary fund, through which all currencies of member countries are related to gold. And secondly, in July 1946, the Canadian dollar was pegged at parity with the United States dollar, which in turn is very definitely linked to gold.

I am not suggesting that on the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys we should discuss these financial arrangements with respect to our country's currency. However, as the Canadian Metal Mining Association states, I believe there is some relationship and that the relationship, if it is desirable, would or should tend to direct consideration to the inflation that has taken place over the years in that industry so that the industry can continue to expand.

I think there are a few people in the chamber this afternoon who will agree with the statement that gold mining throughout the history of our nation has always supplied more than a small share of impetus to the development of new areas and new communities. These communities and areas that are dependent on the gold mining industry are now in a serious plight. It has become obvious to many of us, particularly those who represent areas that depend on mining, that the gold mining industry is a good example of what can happen but should not happen to an industry over which the government maintains such extensive control.

I think of municipalities like Matachewan. I have here a publication entitled "The Gold Mining Community", a study of the problems of economic growth in northern Ontario, put out by William Lougheed Associates, consulting economists, Toronto. They use as one of their examples the township of Matachewan. At page 21 of their brief they say this:

Matachewan lies about 30 miles southwest of Kirkland Lake and 50 miles southeast of Timmins. The community was launched on the wave of gold expansion in the thirties, experienced its greatest growth in the latter part of that decade, was incorporated in 1947, and has been hard hit by the gold slump of the last few years.

At one time the township had a population of two thousand, when the Young-Davidson and Matachewan Consolidated gold mines were operating. These closed between 1954 and 1956, and at the present time only Min-Ore Mines is operating.

This mine is also now closed, Mr. Chairman.

Population has decreased since the early war years by over one half, is now about 800. A quarter of Matachewan's 300-odd dwellings are unoccupied, and pressure of costs on marginal mining operations has made the municipality exceedingly poor in comparison to its condition before the war.

An estimated 25 per cent of the population remains tied to the remnants of gold mining, and an effort is being made to develop forest industries and tourism to take its place.

I think this is an example of a small town entirely dependent on gold. This is also true and will apply in the next few years to Kirkland Lake, Timmins and many of the other communities that have only gold mining as their principal industry. I think some consideration should be given to increasing the price the mines receive for their product. This industry is and will continue to be, as it has always been, a large importer of United States dollars to Canada, something which is of greater benefit at some times than at others but which at all times is advantageous. I think this industry should be given some further assistance, whether under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys or some other branch of government that is designated to see that the future is brighter for this industry.

Canada needs the gold mining industry, and the communities which depend on it need the gold mining industry. But it will only grow if there is an increase in the return to the mines which will allow for the development of other areas. This will be spearheaded, and has always been spearheaded, by the prospecting and boom that take place following the discovery of gold in an area. Little prospecting is possible at the present time because of the price of gold. I think this is a matter of grave concern and should be given very serious consideration by the government.

I should like to ask a number of questions about the uranium industry. We have learned some very interesting things about this industry in the last few weeks. I am very anxious to read the conclusions which will be arrived at by the research committee of the house when they report on their deliberations. For this reason perhaps I should not go into the particulars of this situation. However, it seems to me that the charges made some time ago by some of the miners in Elliot Lake have substance. They feared that something was happening in the industry which was allowing Rio Tinto enterprises, in particular, to obtain a monopoly in that area. Of course some of the things we have heard in this house in the last few weeks would indicate that this is true.

It seems doubly surprising that the Leader of the Opposition should not be involved in this matter, because his area in particular is hard hit by this situation and any encouragement that can be held out to the miners and mining community of Elliot Lake is something to which he should give very close attention. I am sure he is doing this. How bad the situation is can be understood fairly easily by looking at the number of mortgages that are being turned in by the home owners of Elliot Lake. On January 24 of this year the Leader of the Opposition asked a question of the Minister of Public Works on this matter and the minister replied, as reported at page 1348 of Hansard:

The mortgages relating to 264 N.H.A. houses are currently in default and the approved lenders have advised C.M.H.C. of their intention to claim on the mortgage insurance fund. Two hundred and forty of the houses with mortgages in default are owned by the housing companies sponsored by the mines and have been acquired as a result of buy-back agreements between the housing companies and the mine employees who have left Elliot Lake. These houses are vacant. The remaining 24 mortgages in default relate to houses owned by individual home owners.

This interests me particularly because of the fact that many of my friends, men with whom I worked in the mines and who were neighbours and close acquaintances of mine, went into the Elliot Lake area and bought homes on the understanding that the enthusiasm of the provincial and federal governments and their agencies would mean there would be a continuous uranium operation for many years to come.

We need not go into the details of what happened, but it is surprising to me that an agreement which the Minister of Trade and Commerce called a firm commitment was made as far back as 1957, before the present government came into power. I am quite sure that if this is true, it is also true that the present president of Rio Tinto corporation was aware of that fact, though he may argue that he was not. I think this is not something which would escape his attention. I am referring, of course, to the new contracts which, if realized, will mean some 24 million pounds of uranium will be sold to Great Britain.

It seems to me that there is substance in the charges which were being made at the time the Rio Tinto corporation was trying to buy some of the smaller companies. They were making the case with Eldorado that they should be the only ones left in this field, because by enlarging their operations they would be able to operate at a much lower cost. They were saying this should be approved by Eldorado and they should have the sales contracts that were in existence. I think the provincial and federal governments were not fair. I say these governments were not fair because they knew about this and did not tell the miners and the women who came to Ottawa, and others, that the potential was going to increase after a certain period of time with the opportunity of operating the mines because of these large sales. If I remember, the whole operation was considered in relation to sales to the United Sales and the fact that these contracts would be concluded in 1964, and it looked as though there would be no uranium industry at all after 1964. I would say that very few of the miners would agree with this had they known there was a possibility of a sale of 24 million pounds of uranium with the consequent employment which would be created.

No doubt other hon. members will have more to say about this. I just want to say that I think it is a disgrace that people are not told these things. When they are living in a community like Elliot Lake, where their very jobs depend upon the mines; when they have invested $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 in homes after having worked for many years to save this money, which they are going to lose, all governments and all politicians should refrain from playing politics with this kind of information. It should be made available so that each and every miner and householder in the community can make his decision whether to stay in Elliot Lake or go somewhere else.

Complete information on this matter seems to have been available not only to the Leader of the Opposition but to the government and the former minister of trade and commerce. now the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Some hon. members were not fair to those people who were faced with having to make a decision, and who had to make that decision not knowing all the facts. I believe this was originally the responsibility of the Leader of the Opposition, because he was in the cabinet at that time and later represented this area. He certainly should have had some knowledge of this situation prior to the 1958 election.

There is another problem with which I wish to deal. I should like to read a press clipping that appeared a few days ago, on May 29, in the Ottawa Citizen. It is something I have thought about, and I think about it in terms of other industrial occupational diseases. The article is headed:

Uranium mine cancer rate above normal

It is an Associated Press report from Washington, and reads:

The U.S. public health service said Saturday deaths from lung cancer are greater than normal among western uranium miners but an active program of controls has been set up by federal and state governments to curb the rate.

A spokesman said the rate is about ten deaths among 2,000 miners, compared to the normal rate of three in 2,000. Mostly, he added, the deaths are among men who have worked long in the uranium mines rather than from any short exposure to high radioactivity.

He said the rate of cancer deaths has picked up in recent years because it takes time for cancer to develop and uranium mining is a relatively young industry.

I think it would be unwise to spread fear among the miners in the uranium industry, but it would also be very dishonest if the miners in the uranium industry did not know this was a hazard of their employment. I can remember working with miners in the gold mining industry and the silica chrome industry. They entered that industry not knowing that they could get silicosis through working in the mines. Over the years controls have been developed. The use of X-rays has been made mandatory, and though there is still some complaint that the results of such X-rays are not brought to the attention of miners early enough, it is generally conceded that there has been some advance made in the control and prevention of silicosis.

When I was in the uranium producing area a year or two ago I attended a conference arranged by management and labour to consider this subject. The position taken by management was that this was their field; that the government should not legislate, but that the industry itself should take whatever measures are possible to prevent health problems developing from exposure to uranium. At that time there was some difference even among management itself as to whether employees could demand a urinalysis which would give an indication of whether radiation had produced any significant harm to an individual.

It is my opinion that the government itself will have to take a lead in this respect. Failing that, we shall find enlightened management arranging for workers in exposed areas to be given a weekly urinalysis while other management will say "We do not think these tests are necessary; the radiation is not strong enough to hurt anybody". As I understand it, arrangements for tests were to be made by the mines themselves and not by a government agency which would permit employees to undergo tests at any time they felt to be necessary.

I believe the federal government has a duty to conduct an immediate survey into the results of uranium mining on the health of workers in the industry. We have been mining uranium in Eldorado for 15 or 20 years, and there are miners who have worked for that length of time in the industry. There are others who, while they have been employed in the industry for a shorter period, have undergone a more concentrated exposure. The federal government never did undertake as much work in the development of silicosis control as it should have. We have been puttering along with the research which was done at McIntyre, aluminum dust therapy which many miners believe is ineffective and even harmful, because when you add any foreign substance to the lungs an additional risk is created since the lungs were not designed to handle foreign substances.

It seems to me that this is a national problem. I believe the minister is sympathetic, and if he wishes to give direction there is a great deal which can be done. In Germany research is still being carried out in the problem of silicosis in the mines. They are also continuing to pay pensions to those who have been exposed to an overdose of aluminum dust. We in this country may be guilty of behaving unscrupulously toward our miners when we arrange for aluminum dust to be pumped into their lungs. It is not taken voluntarily; it is compulsory, because the miners have to pass through the dryer where this dust is used. I suggest this practice is only as common as it is in Canada because the federal government has not carried out the work which it should have done in order to ascertain whether the use of this dust is advantageous.

I will agree that the incidence of silicosis has greatly decreased in the mining industry in Canada, but I think we must look at these figures not only in the light of the use of aluminum powder as a prophylactic treatment but in the light of increased ventilation in the mines and the increased use of water to keep down the dust. I suggest it is the duty of the minister in the light of all the facts now available to take another look at this question, because while it is true that fewer people are dying of silicosis there has been a great increase in death through heart diseases and other forms of diseases of the lungs. All these factors may be covering up the apparent decrease in the importance of the silicosis problem.

For these reasons I should like to ask the minister to comment on the work his department is doing with respect to the risks to health involved in uranium mining and, particularly, on the incidence of lung cancer which now appears to be forming an important part of this problem in the United States. The article to which I have referred says that in the United States both federal and state governments have set up controls to curb the rate of cancer among uranium miners. I wonder whether the minister has done any similar work in his department. The problem will be worse in Canada than it is in the United States since the concentration of uranium oxides is greater here than it is in the United States.

The Chairman: May I interrupt the hon. member at this point. He has probably said practically everything he wanted to say on these industrial diseases in relation to the operation of the mines, but I doubt whether the subject has anything to do with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I think this aspect of mine operations will probably fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces. With regard to research, that might come within the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare, but it seems to me the hon. member has not been discussing a question which is relevant to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Peters: You are probably right, Mr. Chairman, in indicating that this is not part of the responsibility of the department of mines. It is probably safe to say it is not the function of any other branch of any other department of government, either. My suggestion is that this matter be brought under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I have complained in the past that this department is more of a mapping service than anything else.

Mining is a very important subject, and in this particular context it is also a federal responsibility. We cannot say it belongs to the provinces, because the major jurisdiction in the uranium mining field has been brought under the federal authority. The sale of uranium is under federal control. Industrial relations with respect to uranium mines are under federal control. They have been brought under this jurisdiction and certified under federal government jurisdiction. Because of some of the wording of the security regulations the unions have been certified federally rather than provincially.

I make the suggestion, and the minister can reply. I believe it is safe to say that research in this field is not being done any place else. It should be done in this department, as I believe it is being done in the United States. We certainly think it is important enough to warrant some consideration by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

(Translation):

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, before adoption of the first item of the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, I should like to make a few remarks, as this item concerns a field that is of particular concern to me and one with which my area has been closely connected ever since the Abitibi area was opened up, around 1912 or 1913.

Of course, I have no intention of repeating everything that previous speakers said. I shall therefore limit my remarks to some matters of particular concern to my area, then I shall deal with a general problem, referred to this morning by previous speakers, and which, in my opinion, offers the key to a northward expansion such as we have not known for some years. I shall come back to this in a few moments.

Just now, I should like merely to deal with a problem which greatly concerns my area. It affects mining developments which are about to come more in the open, if I may be permitted this expression, developments which the minister underlined this morning when speaking about the Mattagami lake area.

To briefly sum up what is happening in this area, which was the subject of lengthy discussions in this house when we considered the bill concerning the construction of a railway branch, allow me to give a summary of the discussions that then took place here, as well as in the railway committee which made a detailed examination of the project.

In the Mattagami lake area there are considerable zinc deposits. There are also lesser deposits of copper, gold and silver, in addition to valuable metals contained in most of those deposits. The construction of a plant which will cost the Mattagami Lake Mines about $20 million is being contemplated. In addition to that manufacture, there is talk of the possible building of a zinc refinery at an estimated cost of $30 million.

As far as employment itself is concerned, that is the number of persons directly employed by the mine, it has been indicated that, at the start, the Mattagami Lake Mines will take on about 400 men. And if the zinc refinery is also erected there, this plant would give employment to 475 or 500 more men.

As a matter of fact, the company has already predicted that less than five years after the beginnings of the lake Mattagami area development, a town of some 5,000 would develop there. The village is still non-existent, but plans are already drawn for a town on Bell river, five miles east of the mine, that is five miles east of the place where mineral deposits were found a few years back.

The exploratory work performed in this new mining area brought about interesting results: less than five years ago, the area was almost unknown, but these discoveries have drawn the attention, not only of prospectors, but also of mining companies which are trying to establish themselves there.

I feel it my duty to emphasize that people in my district are keenly interested in the setting up of the zinc refinery to which I referred earlier.

I understand that the federal government may not have the last say in the granting of licences, and that, in fact, it does not deal directly with the development of natural resources which, according to our constitution, come under the jurisdiction of the provinces; nevertheless, it is surely in the interest of the federal government that the northern areas be developed, and that the ore be processed on the spot, which means that a refinery be set up where the ore is to be found, for this will also help to bring about industrial decentralization.

To give you an idea of what I have in mind, here is an example. A campaign is being waged to convince the authorities of the mining company that the construction of a zinc refinery in our area would be not only justifiable but most advantageous from all points of view.

Let us remember what happened a few years ago when the Quebec Lithium Corporation decided to build a lithium refinery at Rouses Point, in the state of New York. Later on, after having considered the matter thoroughly from the economic point of view, the corporation decided to build the plant on its mining property in the township of La Corne, in the vicinity of Barraute and Landrienne, two communities of my constituency. The corporation had therefore decided to build its refinery on its mining property in the township of La Corne rather than in Rouses Point. Now, the main reasons which led Quebec Lithium Corporation to take that decision was that the transportation of ore concentrates had become too expensive because of the great distance and also because a great proportion of the loads consisted of waste or just simply rock. Consequently, the money the company could have made by selling its by-products in the United States and in the more heavily industrialized centres like Montreal, could not compare with the savings it could make by processing its ore on the spot and by building its refinery on its mining property, in the township of La Corne.

I think that example is appropriate in view of the problem raised by the construction of a zinc refinery in my area. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys stated this morning that a large proportion of our ore except iron ore, of course, is already being processed on the spot in Canada before being exported. We should not remain idle and rest on our laurels, however, because a lot remains to be done yet. Even if 60 per cent of our zinc is already being refined in Canada, that is certainly no reason to stop there.

If that project were carried out, following the example set by Quebec Lithium Corporation in northern Quebec, it would be advantageous for eastern Canada, not to mention the fact that the processing of our ore in Canada would be a step in the right direction. Of course, I would rather have that industry set up in Abitibi. I could give you other examples since a high percentage of other metals such as copper and nickel are refined in Canada, a situation which is beneficial to our economy. The construction of a nickel refinery at Thompson lake in northern Manitoba is also a striking example of what should be done to develop our natural resources in the north.

Before passing on to another subject, I should like to make a brief reference to an editorial published the other day in L'Echo Abitibien. It called the public's attention to this zinc refinery project, indicating that certain mining magnates were perhaps preparing to pull a fast one on the people in Abitibi.

Well, we do not want to let this pass unnoticed and we refuse to be done in. Therefore, I feel bound to point out this important matter so that our area may benefit from the setting up of this refinery.

I do not think I need insist in order to prove that it would be profitable economically to build this plant in our area. It has been mentioned time and again in the press, and in the railway committee when the building of a branch line through that area was being considered. It was pointed out then that it was essential to settle first the matter of selling the by-products. Of course, I have no figures here and I have not figured out the returns, but local, departmental and mining company economists could surely do it. Anyway, I do not believe that the profits from by-products would be enough to offset the cost of bringing over long distances to the refineries an ore made up mostly of waste. Besides, I believe that the Federation of Abitibi chambers of commerce has figured out the costs involved and will submit a report to provincial authorities.

Allow me to make a point on this subject. I wonder what would be the reaction of industrial towns located along the St. Lawrence seaway or any waterway in our country, if we, in Abitibi, would call for the building of ironworks in our area. It is quite natural that those plants should be built on the seaway, in those very towns located along this country's waterways. Or rather, since zinc is being mined in our district, I do not see why it should be sent out of the area to be processed.

It would benefit this country and it would certainly be better than sending it to the United States, as has been done for several years. It would be well to have a refining plant in this country for metal produced in Canada. It would be ideal for our district and the whole northern area. To my mind, it would be an excellent thing to set up such a refining plant in Abitibi.

I shall now go on to something else which was mentioned by previous speakers, that is, assistance to the gold mines. Such assistance is essential. I believe that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys did admit that the gold mining assistance act should be retained. Indeed, I commend him for having renewed that assistance. We may thus keep those industries working, not only in northern Quebec, but also in northern Ontario.

As suggested by one hon. member who spoke before, most parts of this country would benefit. In fact, several mining towns in northern Canada would again know an undescribable depression, they would become ghost towns, if that assistance were discontinued. This morning I heard an hon. member say that a policy of subsidies had been suggested in the United States to help discover new gold fields from the prospecting stage onward.

To my mind, it would also be a good and helpful thing for the gold mines to raise the price of gold. Such a step would have worldwide repercussions.

It is, indeed, a very complex issue. It has been mentioned that the price of gold was raised once before, but there has been no increase since 1933, whereas the prices of all other metals increased in proportion to the supply and demand. In the case of gold, the price was established by the American government and has remained at the same level ever since.

As hon. members who spoke before me pointed out this morning and this afternoon, the problem is becoming more and more acute, and even the United States have reached the point where they have to put gold on the list of the most wanted metals and even offer grants in view of discovering and developing new gold mines. Obviously, it all goes together.

Just a word now on the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. Today, the dollar does not have the same value as it had before the second world war, when for the last time, in 1933, the price of gold was raised. We all agree on that.

A short time ago, we learned that the rouble had been devaluated, as of January, 1961. Such a decision on the part of the U.S.S.R. places our U.S. neighbours in an impossible situation, as they will have to do the same if they want to compete with Russia on world markets. Having devaluated its currency, the U.S.S.R. can compete at ridiculously low prices with every western country, including Canada which is a great producer of raw materials. They can sell their products at giveaway prices.

Just this morning, in fact, the minister referred to a large production of asbestos in Russia and indicated that Canada would be faced with keen competition.

The efforts being made by Russia to capture world markets, particularly with regard to such raw materials as we produce, are a threat to the economy of North American democracies, and particularly Canada.

Reference was made this morning to raising the price of gold. It will be recalled there have been several raises in the past. Indeed, that was what prompted prospectors to search for gold in the Yukon and in Alaska in 1900, and before that in California and along the U.S. Pacific coast.

There was a readjustment in the price of gold in 1933, and it resulted in the opening up of northern Quebec, particularly in my own area of Malartic-Val d'Or-Cadillac-Rouyn. At that time there was a tremendous surge of activity. After the price of gold was readjusted, its value remained the same, both before and after the war and on until today, and this has had the effect of a devaluation. That is what the Americans are trying to avoid, but they will soon have to reach a decision on the problem.

I have just received a very interesting suggestion on that subject from a mining engineer. In view of its importance and for the information of the members of this house, I hope you will allow me, Mr. Chairman, to read it into the record. Perhaps it does not give every detail, but it does give a general idea of the problem and shows how attention should be paid to the price of gold. This mining engineer suggests that the price of gold be raised from its present level. That, I am sure, would stimulate this mining industry, as it did in 1933 when the price of gold was raised from $20 to $35. Here is the suggestion made to me:

(Text):

Re—Gold Situation

The price of gold in relation to currency is not important to the United States, as they do not produce gold, but is of utmost importance to Canada which is one of the three largest gold producing countries in the world.

Strange as it may sound, for every one dollar's worth of gold we produce, government takes in three dollars in taxes. This is better understood when it is realized that every one dollar's worth of gold produced means $12 to the economy of this country.

Thus, when we consider that we now produce $150 million per year, the taxes add up to $450 million per year.

If the gold mines were forced to close down, the government would not only lose this revenue but unemployment would increase far beyond the labour force directly employed by the mines.

Assuming that the dollar price of gold were doubled, on present production the taxes would also double.

Mr. Davies, who is a mining engineer and one of the pioneers of the northern district, says this in his letter:

But, an increase in the price of gold would more than double ounce production, thereby quadruplicating the present dollar production.

Further down in his letter he makes this suggestion:

The suggestion is that the Canadian government take the initiative by buying freshly mined gold at $70 per ounce and hold it until the world price is adjusted to this level.

The government would not only gain in increased revenue but would wind up owning the gold as well.

(Translation):

This suggestion was made to me by Mr. J. Fred Davies, mining engineer. He is anxious that northern areas be favoured in this connection. As happened in 1933, he believes this would be one of the ways to open up northern areas. Canadians would go out there in great numbers. We must not forget that with increased activity in the north there would be a rush to the north such as we have experienced in the past. No doubt that the rest of this country's economy would benefit by this initiative.

Mr. Chairman, before closing, I wish to raise another point. I mentioned it to the minister a few years ago, while his department's estimates were being discussed in the house. At that time, I asked him to have more surveys made by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys in our province.

I must say however, that we have to take into account the fact that the province of Quebec has its own department which also makes geological surveys across the province. However, in the last few years, several other areas have become accessible because of the preliminary geological surveys that have been made but, because of the information obtained by new mine developments, I believe it would be a good thing if the federal government, through its Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, studied and revised its geological surveys in the north, particularly in the areas which in these last few years have become accessible through the Chibougamau railway, which connects the Abitibi and Lake St. John regions, as well as in those areas connected by the new roads to natural resources of the area that the provincial government is building under the federal government program in this field.

Those new roads cover new territories where initial geological surveys were made some 20 or 30 years ago, and preliminary reports of which have been published. Since then, considerable work has been done. Several companies have already gathered additional information. The provincial government has probably some too.

The new department of resources of the province of Quebec, as it is called, is carrying on the work in those areas. However, I think it would be advantageous for the central government to make other geological surveys in those areas which are now more accessible and where prospectors and mining companies could attempt to make other discoveries.

In those northern areas, especially in my constituency, aeromagnetic surveys have already been done. I think it would be interesting to complete those aeromagnetic surveys, more commonly known in mining sectors as "airborne magnetic surveys".

I think, as I said, that those surveys should be supplemented by geological surveys on the spot, in order, first of all, to confirm the information obtained by air surveys, and then to give additional information to prospectors and mining companies. Such a service would help them open up northern areas, and, furthermore, would be very useful to the people of those areas. Those operations would also allow the settlement of the surplus population in the south of our country.

It takes a couple of years before the results of these technical surveys are put at the disposal of the prospectors.

I firmly believe that these surveys will be of a great help to prospection. In the north of the Abitibi area, towards James bay, there is a vast territory with infinite possibilities if, naturally, the increase in the price of gold, to which I referred earlier, becomes a reality. This area has hardly been prospected by a few prospectors, surveyors or mining engineers.

Therefore, there is no doubt that these technical surveys will have greatly contributed towards the development of those areas. (Text):

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to other hon. members who have spoken on the estimates of this department with regard to gold mining, and so forth. I shall, of course, reserve any remarks I have to make about coal mining until the dominion coal board item is before the committee. There is a matter which I should like to again bring briefly to the attention of the minister. He is well aware of this matter, because I have mentioned it to him outside of the house and in this house in other sessions. I refer to the retention and continuance of Pictou, Nova Scotia, which is in my constituency, as the base for hydrographic ships.

These two ships, presently the C.G.S. Cartier and the C.G.S. Acadia, have been based there for the last number of years. They have become an important part of the economy of the town and indeed of the area. Among other things, they provide work for the local shipyard during the winter season. Local suppliers have an opportunity to tender for supplies for the ships, and a large number of the crew of these two ships live in Pictou with their families and make an important contribution to the community. These people would suffer great hardship if they were forced to move because there is adequate housing in the town and they, of course, wish to remain there. In addition, there are repairs to some of the launches carried out on the ships as well as repairs to other equipment carried out in the town.

As I have said, these ships have actually become an industry for the town, and their removal would be a serious matter for the community. I realize that the department, and I commend them for it, are establishing an oceanographic institute at Bedford basin in Halifax county. I am glad to see that work on this institute is being carried out, because the institute will mean much to that area. I understand that upon completion of the institute, many specialists from the minister's department will be located there and will work within that area.

I believe it is the intention of the department to carry out oceanographic studies. Indeed, oceanography today is a study extremely important to many departments of our government. The oceanographic work will be carried out year around whereas hydrography is for a limited season. With regard to the hydrographic services which are, of course, carried out on a smaller basis, I believe that the two ships at present in operation will be replaced by two other ships as they are getting older, one which is being constructed at this time at Halifax and another one, which as I understand it, is on the drawing board in the department but it is a smaller ship and can easily be based on the port of Pictou as are the Acadia and the Cartier. The hydrographic studies are carried out normally from May to October in each year and although the port of Pictou is usually icebound during the winter period, when the harbour opens up these ships would be available, whether the present ones or the ones to replace them, during the necessary months, for years to come.

As far as facilities are concerned, it perhaps will be pointed out also that because of the disastrous fire in 1959 the complete waterfront facilities in this place were wiped out by fire. That is true. But working through the Department of Public Works they have gone ahead and accelerated plans for restoring the facilities and I am glad to report that the quay wall in the area has been almost completely restored. I was there last week. It is a fine structure and one of the ships, the Acadia is alongside the quay wall at this time ready to go out on the service. There are adequate facilities in existence there to look after these ships. On the quay wall there is a new shed being constructed which could be easily used by the department. A contract in the amount of some $543,000 was let last week for the reconstruction of pier "C." This pier will provide many more facilities including a freight shed. There will be adequate facilities to look after these operations.

As I have said, the minister is well aware of these matters. However, I cannot repeat them too often in view of the extreme importance of retaining this hydrographic base in the port of Pictou. Based on the set-up and on the period needed for the studies and the facilities available and all the other matters which go beyond the normal scope, I would again reiterate and submit to the minister that this base be retained in that locality.

Mr. Herridge: I just wish to say a few words on this first item of these estimates, as one who has always been interested in conservation of our natural resources, whether renewable or non-renewable. When one looks at the estimates of this department one realizes that this is the department of national health and welfare, so to speak, so far as the mining industry is concerned and that the minister is, shall I say, the apex or the Santa Claus of the mining industry. This department represents very clearly free enterprise supported by public funds.

Mr. Comtois: I wish to tell the hon. member that I am awake.

Mr. Herridge: The minister refers to an incident earlier this session when I accused him of sleeping in the house. I apologize most sincerely. I did not realize that he was enjoying contemplation because he appeared to be completely inert.

I must bring to the attention of the committee the fact that this is a demonsration of, shall I say, the insincerities of the system under which we live and which is always preaching free enterprise. Here we find free enterprise bolstered to the hilt with public funds, and we are not opposing them under certain circumstances. However, I cannot resist bringing to the minister's attention that he is actually administering a form of socialist enterprise in some sections of the mining industry.

I now want to refer to the question of renewable natural resources or non-renewable natural resources and ask a few questions. An extremely interesting document came to my hand recently. It is entitled "Canada, A Nation of Economic Liars" by C. M. Campbell, mining engineer, Vancouver, B.C. I have read it with great interest. I am going to quote two paragraphs and then ask the minister a few questions because I think there is some truth in these paragraphs, particularly when one reads the history of the mining industry and the sort of buoyant statements made at the beginning of this century with respect to our resources of ore, coal and things of that sort and the actual situation that developed in certain areas. We now have ghost towns in British Columbia and other provinces where at one time we were told there was going to be unending prosperity. I read from page 14 of this booklet: under the heading "Is British Columbia against the Coyne Report?":

> The immediate reaction in B.C. is against the Coyne report. One university of British Columbia economist says, "B.C. should back primary industry." Another says, "Primary industry could be Canada's salvation." Then why, after a century of primary industry, are we not saved?

I think that is a very pertinent remark.

> A third says: "There has never been a country in the world that was not developed by an older country." As far as this province and Canada are concerned it has been a case mainly of depletion by the U.S., and not development at all, and it has been done with our co-operation which, apparently will continue. We are, also, no younger than the three Pacific states to the south, in aggregate area smaller than this province,—

[Mr. Herridge.]

That is British Columbia.

> —yet, based on primary and secondary industry, largely on their own initiative, they have a population, higher paid and more prosperous than ours, ten times as large as ours and as large as that of all Canada.
>
> In the editorial column of a daily paper the statement is made that efforts to change the tide are "reminiscent of King Canute's futile gesture." "U.S. investment," we are also told, "has been the spark plug of our post-war prosperity... These are circumstances to which we have adapted ourselves and we should at times kneel in thanksgiving that they have been such pleasant circumstances." For any nation to be thankful when its prosperity is based on the depletion of its talents with no replacement, is hard to understand.
> Needless to say we are appalled at this justification of the sell-out. That our students, 10,000 at the university alone, and our young men should become indoctrinated with these ideas is hard to believe. This dominion was founded as a member of the British empire, with a vision of a great future in it or its changing forms. Instead, as the preceding indicates, we seem content with the menial position of a Gibeonite in the American entourage.

I think there is some truth in the writer's analysis of the situation, although I think in some spots it is an exaggeration. However, he goes on to deal with these natural resources and at page 15 has this to say about the need for a realistic inventory of our mineral resources:

> As far as minerals are concerned, and they are the basis of our modern civilization, it is imperative that we know just what we have and what are the probabilities and possibilities for more. But, before any tabulation is made, we must have a code of rules agreed to by the universities, the mining institute, professional engineers, and the government mining departments and—it must be followed. In this we are 50 years behind. It is essential that the atrocities that have brought disaster be eliminated. This will be a difficult task for trafficking in plausible lies is all about us.

In that connection he is referring to the mining industry. As far as the forest industry is concerned, the government of Canada in co-operation with the provincial government has undertaken a survey or an inventory of the forest resources of Canada. This survey has proved to be of great value and has provided information upon which can be based a logical and long term development of that industry. As far as I understand it, nothing has been attempted in that direction with respect to our mineral resources. I am one of those who believe something should be attempted in that direction. We are leaving it entirely to the big corporations, who in many cases get a monopoly of the ore in certain industries. They divide the country up among themselves and as far as governments and the people are concerned there is no, shall I say, elementary knowledge even as to our total resources of minerals and the period for which we may expect them to exist. We are always being told of the limitless resources in this and that field, and so on.

Having outlined my point of view in a few brief remarks, and the point of view of the gentleman who wrote this brief, I wish to ask the minister a few questions. I trust he will answer them when he replies to the remarks made on this item.

First, of all, has anything been attempted with respect to an inventory of mineral assets in Canada under the jurisdiction of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys? Has any effort been made to establish a code of rules or procedure with a view to taking an inventory of our mineral resources? Has the department undertaken an inventory of mineral resources even on a limited scale anywhere in Canada, either under its own steam, shall I say, or in co-operation with any province? If so, where were these inventories taken. If any inventories have been taken, does the minister consider them reliable? Would the minister say that he stands behind information given in documents published by the federal government as to the reserves of minerals in Canada at this time? In minerals I also include coal. Does the minister think this information can be taken as reliable by the Canadian people?

I hope the minister will give the committee any other information he can with respect to any consideration his department has given this question of getting reliable information regarding our total natural resources. That is the only basis upon which I think we can plan the development of these resources in the future. The minister knows that the forestry inventory has been a great help to the forest industry, and it will be a continuing inventory. It will be the basis for the planning and policies of provincial governments and private industry.

I am very interested to know whether there has been any discussion on this subject or any moves in this direction under the leadership of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys or on the part of any provincial government, to his knowledge.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to say a few words on this extremely important topic about which several hon. members have already spoken. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches of those who have preceded me on this subject.

I was particularly interested this morning in listening to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys giving statistics showing the natural resources which are available in this country. One of the figures which impressed me particularly was the 15 per cent increase in the proven reserves of oil and gas in western Canada. In addition to the resources which we already have in this field this is a tremendous and astounding increase. It naturally leads me to raise the question as to the speed with which private industry with government assistance is developing and taking full advantage of these natural resources.

First of all I look at markets. With regard to the question of markets for these mineral resources—and after all one is inseparable from the other—if we discover these resources we must certainly find some way in which to manufacture them into finished products and then to market the manufactured product. We must either manufacture the raw material in Canada or, if we cannot do that, find markets for the raw material elsewhere.

I for one favour the proposition of manufacturing and starting industry in Canada as far as possible. I do not wish to deal with the various aspects of markets for raw material in Canada or abroad. That may be a subject which can be discussed at greater length on some future occasion. However, at this time I do wish to say a word or two about industrialization, because industrialization in western Canada is near to my heart. It is one of the things to which I have given a tremendous amount of attention. As an economist I have assisted in the location of a number of industries in western Canada for the purpose of developing the natural resources there. Therefore I feel that what we need is industry in western Canada to develop our natural resources.

In other words, we all know that private industry is doing a good job in the development of these natural resources, but I say that in relation to the tremendous quantities that are there to be developed, private industry is developing them at a snails' pace. The time is not far in the future when we should look critically at the rate at which these natural resources are being developed. With regard to government assistance in the form of capital to assist the development of these resources, I believe the time has come when this type of assistance should be given. We need more corporations such as Polymer corporation in the west.

When I suggest that social capital should be used for the development of industry the boys over in the corner may say, "That is socialization". Certainly it is one form of socialization, but it has been indulged in for years by governments of this country and other countries. It did not make them socialist. These hon. members have no prior claim on the words "socialism" or "social". As a matter of fact, if you take socialism as it is taught by the orthodox socialist, I agree with Stephen Leacock who once said:

Socialism would work only in heaven, where they don't need it, and in hell, where they have it already.

What we want in Canada is co-operation between governments and private enterprise to the end that industry can achieve maximum development, and we want socialism wherever it will work best. That is the very pattern under which we have been developing our resources for years. I only need to refer to Polymer corporation, and I could name many other crown corporations which have been set up for the development of our resources. We need more of them. There is nothing new about that; it is simply a step forward and a method of achieving what is perhaps too risky as far as private capital is concerned and what private enterprise will not undertake.

I firmly believe that in the west we need decentralization of industry. I should like to see industries in some of the small towns, for example, in southern Alberta there is an abundance of natural gas, coal, iron and other resources waiting to be developed. These towns could support industries.

I would rather see development of industry take place in 50 good rural towns in Alberta than a high concentration of development in two big cities. I should like to see in southern Alberta towns like High River, Nanton, Vulcan, Pincher Creek, Fort Macleod and towns in the Crowsnest pass obtain industries appropriate to their areas instead of having all these industries concentrated in Calgary or Edmonton. I feel that with proper consideration, decentralization and a certain amount of guidance, this development could take place. It is within our grasp. It is surely coming. All I am saying is that we should speed it up and give to the people in western Canada the quick development of natural resources for which they have the potential in terms of hydrocarbons and other raw materials.

I do not plan to speak at greater length on the general topic of minerals and their development at this time. I shall speak again on the coal board item when that subject comes up. So, for now, I place the floor at the disposal of the chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I should like now to answer the various questions put to me since I made my opening remarks this morning.

First, I wish to thank the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) for his praise of the employees of my department. I wish to assure him that we do our utmost to speed up the publication of our reports, particularly the annual report on our activities. However, there are sometimes unavoidable delays because, as we all know, there is a lot of compilation to do, with the result that there are those delays which are beyond our control. However, we do our utmost to prevent what might become an abnormal delay.

I am also aware, as the hon. member for Villeneuve indicated, that the gold mining assistance, under its present form, is not sufficient to assure the adequate protection of this industry in the future.

It is evident that in amending the legislation we do not claim to cure the problem definitely.

Since the hon. member for Villeneuve mentioned it, I might add a few words on the United States policy concerning assistance to gold mines. I have here an explanation of the system developed in the United States. It reads as follows:

(Text):

The United States minerals exploration agency which makes assistance available for exploration for certain strategic minerals in addition, recently, to gold and silver, provides for the advance of small sums of money under certain conditions. One of these conditions defines the amount of exploration which must be done before an advance is granted. Another provides for the submission of evidence that traditional methods of finance are not available for the project. Another provides for the return of the sums advanced upon the attainment of production. The agency does not finance general exploration.

In Canada, prospectors who meet the conditions of the minerals exploration act have generally little difficulty in obtaining funds for further exploration and development. Our Income Tax Act provides very good incentives to the mineral industry, incentives which surpass those of any other country in the world, including the United States. I know the hon. member will agree with my comment regarding the usefulness of the minerals exploration act.

(Translation):

I wish to thank the hon. member for his remarks and suggestions, and to tell him that all his proposals will be studied carefully by the officials of my department.

(Text):

The hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned the apparent discrepancy between the potential represented by our deposits of iron ore and the resources which are being exploited at the present time. I should like to make it clear that Canada is now in a highly competitive situation in international iron ore markets, and for some years to come we must expect that only such of our deposits as are most economically situated and easily workable will be put into production.

The hon. member also referred to cobalt. I say with regard to that subject that the government has no program of mineral stockpiling. It does, however, have small stockpiles of tin, cobalt and antimony built up during the Korea emergency in the early fifties. The stockpiles of these three metals are the responsibility of my colleague the Minister of Defence Production. My department acts only in a technical advisory capacity to that department.

The hon. member for Timiskaming also mentioned the matter of uranium. The only concern of my department with regard to that subject is with research and the sharing of economic studies with other departments or agencies of the government. I would suggest to the hon. member that he direct his questions to my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce when his estimates are before the committee. He would be able to supply information in greater detail with regard to uranium.

The hon. member for Chapleau also spoke.

(Translation):

And, as he made his speech in French, I will reply in that language.

First of all, I can assure him that the government will be pleased to see a zinc refinery being set up in the province of Quebec. If my department or the government can help in any way in the carrying out of that project, we will certainly be glad to do so, for this is fully in accordance with the policy of this government for the processing of ore within our frontiers.

(Text):

The hon. member for Pictou said something about his own district, particularly about his own constituency, and said he would like to see our ships anchored at Pictou. I assure the hon. member that I will give serious consideration to his request that we should continue to berth some of our ships there. However, as the hon. member knows, we are planning to berth all our ships at the site of the Bedford institute. This was part of our project two years ago, as was explained last year. This project is now in the process of realization. As I mentioned this morning, the Bedford institute of oceanography will be a great improvement as far as my department is concerned. At the outset about 300 or 400 members of our staff of scientists, clerks and so forth will be transferred to permanent quarters there. The Bedford institute will be situated in Dartmouth. Our planning is dictated by the economic aspect of our operation. We think it will be much more efficient to start with this system and in centralizing our operations and by having our ships on the east coast, and so forth.

However, I assure the hon. member that we will give our most sympathetic consideration to his request. We will do everything we can in that regard.

The hon. member for Kootenay West—

Mr. Herridge: I am awake.

Mr. Comtois: —will listen to Santa Claus.

Mr. Herridge: Willingly.

Mr. Comtois: I am not Santa Claus; I am not old enough for that. In some quarters, sometimes in the gold mining districts and in other places where not gold but other minerals are subsidized, our money is very well received.

In reply to the question of the hon. member, I wish to say that the mineral resources division of my department has under constant compilation and revision a catalogue of all our mineral deposits in Canada. I do not know whether the hon. member is aware of this, but the catalogue is available and he can have it at any time. It is not published, but we have the information on cards and the hon. member and everybody else can get full information from our department.

Mr. Herridge: Excuse me; does the minister mean by "catalogue" that there is an estimate of the reserves of mineral resources?

Mr. Comtois: I will inform the hon. member, but I must remind him that whereas it is very easy to count the trees in the Kootenays or in the province of British Columbia, it is not easy to find out how many billion tons of every kind of mineral we have in Canada. It is not an easy job and I am sure the hon. member understands that. This is not an easy program to undertake but nevertheless we are cataloguing the findings of the companies and of the industry. I agree, if it could be done in a practical way it would be a good thing, but once again I say it is much easier to count the fir trees of British Columbia than it is to assess the potential minerals of this country such as iron ore, gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc and so forth. It is not easy to find out what is underground even with our very capable staff, our surveyors, our inspectors and our geologists. It is not very easy to find out precisely in accurate figures the potential mineral wealth of this country. As I said a minute ago, we have an inventory of our known resources, but so far as the unknown resources are concerned we have no knowledge at all.

As my last words on the subject may I say one might assess the mineral potential of an area, but one cannot assess the mineral reserves until they are proven by exploration or development. The suggestion of the hon. member is not a bad one, but as far as its being practical, or something that can be undertaken in a short time, that is quite a different proposition. It would represent a considerable undertaking. That is all I have to say on the questions raised.

Mr. Herridge: I want to thank the minister for the information. I am glad to know that a catalogue is being undertaken of known reserves. I am a very practical person, sir. I realize the difference between counting trees and assessing reserves under the ground, but I should be very glad to get a copy of that catalogue of known mineral reserves in Canada.

Mr. Comtois: May I remind the hon. member that this cataloguing of our mineral reserves was started in 1917 under a Tory government.

204. Explosives Act administration, $111,648.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, on item 204—

(Translation):

—could the minister tell the committee whether individuals or companies have asked his department to increase the load of explosives that trucks are allowed to carry under the Explosives Act?

Mr. Comtois: Could the hon. member repeat his question as I was disturbed by the messenger?

Mr. Dumas: Could the minister tell the committee whether individuals or companies have made representations to him or to his department in order to get an increase in the permissible load for trucks with a special permit to carry explosives?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I looked into that question, some time ago. During the year representations have come from various regions of the country but particularly from regions where explosives are hauled long distances.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, the present load limit is ten thousand pounds, that is five tons, and we were asked to raise it. We received all kinds of representations on that matter. No need to say that those representations came from transport companies and not from companies which buy the explosives. Of course, the transport companies would like to save time and money, by increasing their truck loads of dynamite or explosives. We know that our present roads can carry very heavy loads and that there is no limit to the ambitions of some owners of those huge vans that can haul about the same load as a freight car. Unfortunately, we have to resist such requests because, everything being considered, it would be extremely dangerous to allow an increase, since it cannot be known exactly where the trucks will pass. As a matter of fact, a reckless driver might go through a village and an explosion might happen. It is easy to imagine the damage that could follow and how we would be blamed for having allowed a truck to be overloaded. For example last year—I think it was on highway No. 8—a Montreal truck driver was carrying explosives and, doing so, was violating the regulations since his vehicle was not a suitable one for such a load. While on the road, the truck caught fire. Fortunately the driver was warned in time. He jumped off his truck, and immediately the explosion occurred, but without killing anyone. However, the nearest house, two acres away, and the farmer's barn were moved about two feet by the blast. One can therefore imagine what would happen should such an explosion occur in a village.

However, we realize that in some circumstances—in western Canada, for example, in the area of the hon. member for Villeneuve, in the Abitibi area—there might be some special cases which could be considered where an increase could eventually be permitted.

However, this is a matter which comes more properly under provincial jurisdiction.

I understand that a statute was adopted many years ago by the federal government and was never questioned.

I do not know whether the provinces are reluctant to take up such an explosive subject, but in any case the statute has remained unchanged. Therefore, if it involves legislation which normally comes under the provinces, it could not be amended without an agreement with the provinces, which is quite a complicated process, particularly if the provinces, while letting the legislation operate as it does, are prepared to recommend the increase of the permissible load. But I feel the matter could be settled to the satisfaction of those who are asking for changes in the legislation.

Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. Dumas: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

(Text):

I understand it is a question of security and the minister is satisfied that the department cannot very well permit an increase in the permissible load on trucks transporting explosives.

Mr. Comtois: That is right.

Mr. Dumas: I understand that, and we know that the question of security is very important. However, in my district there are long distances to be travelled and I suggest that in order to make it economical special permits should sometimes be granted. However, I am not going to insist on that. As the minister has said, if a province feels that something should be done it can get in touch with the department and ask that the permissible load be increased.

Mr. Comtois: I should say that certain provinces would like the federal government to continue to control security. Other provinces, like the province of Alberta, would like to pass an act giving them authority over this matter. Alberta has contested the validity of the federal act regarding this matter. As you can see, Mr. Chairman, this is a very delicate problem, but the initiative so far as amendments are concerned should come from the provinces and there should be some cooperation or understanding between the provinces and the federal government.

Mr. Aiken: I should like to ask the minister two questions on this subject. First, has there been any change in the policy since the affairs of the department were examined by the standing committee on mines, forests and waters some two years ago? Second, is there any authority in the act to grant a special permit in special cases or is the limit absolute?

Mr. Comtois: The answer to the first question is that there has been no change. As far as the second question is concerned, we can amend the regulations provided sound reasons and facts are presented to us for doing so. The regulations can be amended at any time if serious reasons are advanced that justify doing so.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and mapping branch—

207. Branch administration including a grant of $1,000 to the Canadian institute of surveying and photogrammetry, $171,588.

Mr. Herridge: This item has to do with surveys and mapping. Because of the increased traffic of pleasure craft and tugs for towing on the Columbia river between the international boundary and Revelstoke and because of the number of boats that have lost propellers or have become stranded on sand bars, particularly between Arrowhead and Revelstoke and in the narrows between the upper and lower Arrow lakes, I suggested some three years ago that it would be a good idea for the department to draw up a simple chart that could be sold to persons at the customs office at Trail for $1 to cover the cost so that they would have a chart to use in proceeding in Canadian waters as far north as Revelstoke. At the time the minister informed me that his department was very busy but that they would give the matter consideration.

I urge the minister to see what can be done in that connection because this traffic is increasing very rapidly. Such boats now come from Portland and the mouth of the Columbia. They are transported around Grand Coulee and Bonneville dams on low beds. To indicate the extent of the traffic, may I point out that 27 of these pleasure craft called at my son-in-law's home over one week end last year and over 100 came by during that period. The local people know the waters but quite a number of these boat owners run into minor difficulties because of their lack of knowledge of the channels and so on.

Mr. Comtois: I will certainly look into the matter and give the hon. member some information privately as soon as I can.

Item agreed to.

208. Geodetic survey of Canada, $935,434.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: With regard to the geodetic surveys carried out under the supervision of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, could the minister tell the committee how many teams and men will be employed in the summer of 1961?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, in the year 1961-1962, nine groups will be employed at triangulation work, four at astronomy and basic lines, and five at accuracy surveying work.

In all, the geodetic service includes 79 persons.

(Text):

Canadian hydrographic service—

212. Administration, operation and maintenance including Canada's fee for membership in the international hydrographic bureau, $5,370,081.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether the minister told us this morning that a new ship, the Maxwell, was in operation at present or would be during the summer.

Mr. Comtois: I believe that we will have this ship in operation at the end of the season. It is now being built. We hope it will be ready to operate in the fall.

Since we are dealing with ships I must say that the Hudson, for which a contract of about $7 million was awarded last year, is now under construction in the shipyard of the St. John Dry Dock Company, St. John, N.B., which was the lowest tenderer.

There were delays caused by a strike. I hope that it will be settled in the near future, if it is not already.

I am told that work has resumed. I see now that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) is telling me that the work has resumed. I am very happy to know that, especially since the department, on account of the delay brought about the strike, could not have carried out the same plans next year, had the strike lasted.

This vessel will probably be completed by the end of 1962.

We already have the Baffin, one of the finest hydrographic ships that can be found anywhere in the world.

However, I believe that the Hudson, being a more modern vessel, will be even more efficient than the Baffin.

Mr. Dumas: I understood the minister to say this morning that the Hudson would be put into operation in 1962.

I should now like to know whether other vessels are under construction at the present time.

Mr. Comtois: We do not have any other vessel under construction, but we plan to replace three vessels—and ship designers are presently working on this project—which are not necessarily out of use, but which are not adequate any more for the growing needs of the department.

Mr. Dumas: And will these vessels be used for hydrographic purposes?

Mr. Comtois: Certainly.

Geological survey of Canada—

218. Administration, operation and maintenance including Canada's share of the cost of the geological liaison office, British commonwealth scientific conference, London, England, and $75,000 for grants in aid of geological research in Canadian universities, $4,937,624.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, on February 21, 1961, the minister had a news release published announcing that the federal and provincial governments were to undertake extended aeromagnetic work programs.

I understand these projects are to be spread over a number of years and their cost will be shared by the federal and provincial governments.

I am told that $12 million have been earmarked for such surveys in the provinces, and $6 million in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Could the minister tell the committee what amount will be spent this year and how it will be divided as between the federal government and the provinces?

What is the amount the department expects to spend in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Comtois: As far as these aeromagnetic projects are concerned, we have signed agreements with two provinces, Ontario and Saskatchewan.

We are going to spend $300,000 in Ontario this year, on a sharing basis with the provincial government.

We have recently entered an agreement with Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact, it was yesterday I think that I put my signature to a document to be submitted to the minister of mines in Saskatchewan, Mr. Brockelbank. It provides for an expenditure of $300,000 to be shared on an equal basis by the federal and the provincial governments.

In the Yukon, we are going to spend $150,000 to this effect this year. Of course, the whole amount will be supported by the department, since there is no possibility of agreement with a non-existent province.

Mr. Dumas: And the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Comtois: That is for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Dumas: Is the minister negotiating with other provinces in order to come to some agreement with regard to the carrying out of projects throughout the country, in all provinces concerned?

Mr. Comtois: I must say, Mr. Chairman, that all provinces where the pre-Cambrian is found have let us know that they favoured the project.

As a matter of fact, the province of Ontario is ready to provide a certain sum in its estimates, and so is Saskatchewan.

The other provinces which are interested in coming into the project assured us that next year, they would earmark the necessary amount of money for carrying out the program.

This year, there are two provinces, as well as the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Next year, we expect that other provinces will join the first group and take part in this project.

It has been pointed out to me that I spoke of the pre-Cambrian. The hon. member for Villeneuve knows that I made a mistake. I meant the Canadian shield.

(Text):

Mr. Dumas: I do not want to delay the item, Mr. Chairman, but I noticed the subventions to universities have been increased from $50,000 to $75,000. This is a very good thing. Perhaps the minister can tell us how the amount is being spent this year. Is it $50,000 or $75,000 this year?

Mr. Comtois: It is $75,000, and we are now in the new fiscal year.

Mr. Dumas: I wonder if it would be much trouble for the minister to tell us the amount for each university? I believe these amounts are distributed between various universities. Has the minister these figures available?

Mr. Comtois: I can give only the figures for last year. The figures for this year are under preparation and I do not have them now.

Mr. Dumas: Well, I have the figures for last year, so I am not going to impose on the minister by asking him to repeat them.

Mr. Comtois: I do not have the figures for this year because we are at the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. Dumas: That is what I wanted to know. I believe the department deserves credit for this scheme because through these studies that are done by the different universities we are gaining much at very little cost. I am certainly happy to see that the amount has been increased from $50,000 to $75,000.

Can the minister tell the committee if Laval University have made application for a grant and whether or not they have qualified to obtain a grant under this provision?

Mr. Comtois: Yes. They are qualified and they have applied.

Mr. Dumas: Was any amount granted to Laval University last year?

Mr. Comtois: No. No amount was granted last year. It is for this year.

Mr. Dumas: Would that be the first year Laval have made application for such a grant?

Mr. Comtois: I think they had something previously, but I am not sure. I could give the hon. member an answer when I have the information.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister inform the committee how many parties will be in the field in British Columbia this year and where they will be or what areas they will be working in under this vote?

Mr. Comtois: My department yesterday issued a press release giving full details about the various parties we have in the field. If the hon. member wishes to have the details right now, I can read them. However, this release is available. I will send him a copy right away.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister and I shall be glad to receive a copy.

Mr. Comtois: I may say that the first province mentioned in the list is British Columbia.

Mr. Herridge: That is quite normal.

Mr. Tucker: May I ask the minister whether the release covers all provinces?

Mr. Comtois: Yes. We have 102 field parties. The release covers all provinces. Any hon. member can have a copy of the press release. Everything concerning each province is indicated there.

Mr. Dumas: I understand that last year the department carried out a special survey here in the city of Ottawa and that, after having completed the survey, it published a geological map showing the formation of the ground beneath the city of Ottawa. I have looked at the map and I can say that it is a very interesting one. There is no doubt that it will be extremely useful to a great number of people here in the city of Ottawa. I am just wondering whether the department intends to carry out the same work in the city of Hull, for instance. Hull is close to Ottawa; it is part of the national capital; and it might be a good idea if the department would carry out a survey beneath the city of Hull and the neighbouring villages.

Mr. Comtois: Yes. We will extend this work to the city of Hull and the district across the river in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Dumas: I am very pleased to hear that. I am told that the survey is going to be tremendously useful here in Ottawa. There is no doubt that our friends in Hull will be glad to hear that the department will do the same kind of work there so that contractors will be on the same basis in both cities, having regard to the fact that this territory is included in the national capital.

Mr. Fisher: On the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources I tried to get from the minister some information about one of those roads that had been plotted and designed by his predecessor. I refer to one that ran from somewhere north of lake Nipigon—there is a dotted line on several maps indicating it was provisional—all the way up to northern Manitoba near Hudson bay.

According to the information that was filed showing the correspondence between the provincial government of Ontario and the federal government the actual site or route of the road was in abeyance until a number of surveys, including aeromagnetic and geologic surveys, had taken place. I wonder whether the minister can give me any indication as to what activity is being carried on in his department in that particular stretch that bears upon this whole road idea?

I know that the two departments co-operate and have an intimate liaison. We in that part of the country would like to know when it is likely that some kind of road site will be arrived at between the provincial government and these two government agencies, one of which the minister represents. If he could fill me in as to how the surveys are going, when they are likely to be completed and whether there is any indication yet as to what recommendations his department is going to make as to the best site of the road in order to take advantage of the mineral possibilities in that great stretch, I should be glad if he would do so. I repeat again that I have reference to this projected road that would run from north of lake Nipigon slashing northwest across the Patricia district and touching up near Hudson bay over the border of Manitoba or just about the border of Manitoba. It is an area which at the present time has almost no road facilities at all.

Mr. Comtois: It is not very easy to answer that question right now. Could that question be asked at some other time by the hon. member? The information must be obtained within my department and through the department of northern affairs. We give advice but the real information he wishes to secure could be obtained more easily and more accurately through the northern affairs department.

Mr. Fisher: I am little bit fed up with the fact that the department of northern affairs which is part of the vision has kept projecting this road as a dotted line. It looks good when you have a map of Canada in front of you and there right across the centre of it you have this dotted line of this projected road that would have a mileage of something between 600 and 800. All I can determine about the road is that plans for it are completely up in the air unless this minister's department reports and gives some indication as to where the road should go. If the minister would assure me that he will send me the information relating to his department's activities in connection with this project so that I can turn to the minister of northern affairs and say, "Look, take the dotted lines off" or "Let us put this away in the sack for four or five years", I would appreciate it very much. I am quite willing to forget about the matter now if the minister will give me the assurance that he will provide information as to what his department is actually doing. I know the minister appreciates the fact that, when it comes to projects for the future, people can get very woolly. I should like to have something to tell the people in my area about this great dream.

Mr. Comtois: I must repeat that my department gives advice to the department of northern affairs. They may or may not accept our recommendation. They may make use of it. But we have no other authority than that. I can assure the hon. member that I will do my best to give him the information he requires and whatever further details are available. Also, we will communicate with the other department.

Item agreed to.

Mines branch—

220. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,480,543.

Mr. Best: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make some brief remarks on item 220, which covers an amount of some $4\frac{1}{2}$ million for administration, operation and maintenance of the mines branch of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

I want to confine my remarks solely to studies carried on at present in the department and in its mines branch on uranium, uranium ores, extractive methods applied to such ores and new studies now going on into the problem of alternative uses of uranium in Canada.

We all know the problems faced by our uranium mines and their workers in this regard. As the demand for this mineral for defence purposes has diminished it has become increasingly important to search for other uses for uranium. Its use in nuclear power reactors for electricity production is now beginning in Canada, but some years will pass before large quantities are utilized here. In the annual report of the department for the calendar year 1958 we note that on page 62, under the heading "Radioactivity", there are references to problems in uranium ore treatment. In the 1959 annual report of the department, on pages 42 and 43, there are considerably more extensive references to uranium, but still largely confined to the treatment of ores in co-operation with private mining companies.

While this work is indeed important in order to make these companies in the years ahead more economic and competitive with uranium producers in other countries, I feel we are nevertheless interested in Canada—there has been some indication of this in the evidence given before the research committee of the house—that further stimulus should be given to research into finding completely different uses of uranium itself.

In the last paragraph on page 44 of the annual report of the department for 1959 there is a reference to the liaison between the mines branch of the department and the uranium industry, largely through the Canadian uranium producers metallurgical committee, as it is called, and also with the representatives of Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited.

Conventional procedures of uranium recovery and their study by the mines branch are indeed important, but Dr. John Convey, the director of this branch, has pointed out on various occasions that additional personnel could be used by this branch for a study of alternative uses of uranium. Such a study could take place in various fields, and more technical experts are urgently needed to carry out this work.

We gather that perhaps half a dozen individuals are at present working in the mines branch in co-operation with Chalk river and Atomic Energy of Canada in the development of reactor materials, for instance. This is one field. It has been pointed out in the past that various officials and members of the mines branch have worked in the field of uranium and radioactivity in developing methods of safely handling radioactive materials. There are possibly some 18 people in this group at present in the mines branch.

Nevertheless there does appear to be a lack of assistance, whether it be in terms of finance, or availability of personnel, for looking into other uses of uranium, and the government should examine this in detail. There have been indications of many useful fields here. There is the combining of uranium with such elements as sulphur, carbon, hydrogen and nitrogen present in steel, which can then impart to steel qualities of strength and wearing ability which are most useful.

This has been called the scavenging use or activity of uranium in steel and it is one which has been coming to the fore very much in recent months and years. This was tried some 30 or more years ago, I understand, by our mines branch; I refer to the addition of uranium to iron and steel. But I would think much further work could now be done in this area in co-operation with private companies in the steel industry across Canada. The qualities of steel, its fatigue strength and other such properties, could very possibly be improved. If it came about that an appreciable percentage of our steel production in Canada could incorporate one, two or more pounds of uranium per ton it could go a definite distance toward solving some of the problems of our uranium mining production and would provide employment in various areas of Canada.

The use of uranium in alloy steels for withstanding high pressure and high temperature in jet engines, and in various types of pipe, have been pointed out and could be examined in considerably greater detail. In addition, I imagine the mines branch is examining the addition of uranium to non-ferrous metals, and presumably additional personnel could be used here. More basic research should be done, and co-operative work extended testing uranium for catalytic work, shielding, underplating, and so on.

In sum total, Mr. Chairman, while we have seen in Canada in recent months a definite increase in activity in solving our problems in the uranium industry through the creation of such bodies as the Canadian uranium research foundation, and the Canadian nuclear association just a week or so ago, I do feel that our government can assist, through the mines branch and through its able director, Dr. Convey, in placing additional personnel and additional funds, perhaps as research grants to universities across Canada or directly in the branch itself, into the solving of this problem of uranium costs, and second, alternative uses of this mineral in the very wide field of possible applications which now lie before us. Uranium mines and the people they employ are a vital sector of our economy, and it is to be hoped that increased efforts by the companies themselves, and the governments involved, will continually improve the prospects for the peaceful use of this mineral.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire about several matters that we have discussed in the past, and raise one or two new ones. One question is this: are there now engineers in this department who are qualified to check the books, and particularly the physical conditions of gold mines, to see that the mines are complying with the requirements of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act?

I hope that this year the minister will be in a position to tell us that there is at least one qualified official of the mines branch who can do this and his department does not have to rely upon some other department to provide people for this work. We are spending considerable money in this field and I think something should be done to ensure that we are getting an honest report from the mines. This can be done only if a physical examination is undertaken by the department.

I was interested in the remarks of the previous speaker with regard to the research carried on in the uranium industry. I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration is being given to increasing the amount of research in order to make it possible for the silver industry in northern Ontario to establish mills. They would like this to be under impartial auspices, if possible.

Has any consideration been given to carrying out research which will enable the silver industry in Ontario to establish plants which would make it possible to process the metal in this country instead of being sent to the United States for processing? Under the present system Canadian silver is smelted in the United States and, when, as sometimes happens, those in a silver producing area wish to buy the finished product they must pay the high rate charged in respect of the refining operation. If some research were carried out as the result of which it were possible to establish a mill to refine these concentrates in the Cobalt area—I have in mind a process which would prove economic in operation bearing in mind the volume of metal to be dealt with—there would be obvious advantages, not only in the lower price of the finished product but in employment. I should like to know what work is being done in this connection, bearing in mind the obvious advantage which would attach to the Canadian mint being able to acquire its refined silver from a Canadian source instead of having to buy the processed metal elsewhere.

Mr. Comtois: The federal and provincial governments have been jointly studying the possibility of a silver refinery being established in the Cobalt area. Both governments have discussed the matter with the industry but up to the present no conclusion or solution has been reached. However, I understand that studies are still going on and I hope that one day some decision may be reached. I am sorry that I cannot give the hon. member more detail.

Mr. Peters: I understand that the Deloro smelting company has closed down its operations and that the smelter previously operated just south of Cobalt could, with a small addition, be converted into a refinery which would be able to process silver. I wonder if the federal government would consider giving some technical and engineering advice to the industry so that a smelting operation could be undertaken in this area. I have talked with one or two of the mine owners and with one or two consulting engineers who are interested in this project. They have a fear—one which I think is well grounded—that such a plant should not be developed by one of the mining companies alone, for the simple reason that none of these companies trust each other implicitly. They would like the mill to be operated on an impartial basis. One or two of the firms are almost large enough to undertake a development of this type without assistance from others in the industry, but the companies would much prefer to see it established under independent auspices.

I believe the processing of nickel and uranium is carried out under licence. Most of the gold mines operate refineries of their own, I believe the final steps in refining are carried out in the mint itself. I was wondering if the department had any technical advice which it could give these mining companies in the Cobalt area which would assist them if they were willing to set up an independent company using the refinery which is already in existence in Cobalt. Up to the present we have no such refinery in Canada. The project would mean the employment of between 20 to 30 people and it would also mean that the Canadian mint, or the mine, whichever it might be, would get the advantage of the two or three dollars an ounce which now has to be paid on account of the refining being done in the United States.

Mr. Comtois: I can assure the hon. member that my department is ready at any time to give technical information and economic advice to anyone who has a project in mind for the processing of silver, cobalt or other minerals. I am sure that if the studies and advice offer some possibility of success the industry will jump at the opportunity presented. We are ready to do anything that may be required or asked for.

Mr. Peters: Can the minister say if the department now has engineers reponsible for checking the physical requirements which are specified in the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in so far as responsibility falls under the jurisdiction of the mines branch?

Mr. Comtois: Once again I wish to tell the hon. member that the inspection of gold mines is undertaken by the mineral resources division, not by the mines branch. This has been found the best way of doing things. It is just as efficient as any other system. We have two engineers who visit the mines every year. We give every possible attention to this matter and, once again, I repeat that this inspection system comes under the mineral resources division. No change has therefore been made.

Mr. Peters: I knew last year that this was the case, but I had hoped the system would eventually be changed. I do not know how these divisions got named, or how these officials got there in the first place, but it would seem to me that the officials concerned with mining in the department should be in the mining division rather than in some other branch. The minister may remember that two or three other departments were involved in this question when we discussed it last year.

I am pleased that we now have two people in the other division, even though I think it is the wrong division, who are capable of carrying out supervision underground. I should like to know how long they have been doing the job of investigation. I say this because in my 15 years of working underground I never met a federal inspector, and I personally do not know of anyone who has ever met a federal mines inspector underground. We did know that the treasury sent in inspectors to check the books but I, personally, never heard of one of these inspectors, in all the years I was working in the mines, doing a physical inspection underground.

Mr. Comtois: These engineers make their underground inspections when the department feels they are necessary. The department determines when the underground inspection is required and it is then done. Otherwise the engineers do not go underground.

If the hon. member wishes advance advice of the date and the time that the inspectors will be there I can arrange to have him informed, but it is not the usual practice to inform hon. members of inspector's visits.

The hon. member has said that he never met an inspector there. This does not necessarily prove that the inspector was not there.

Mr. Peters: I worked on only one shift. He might have come to the mine on the other shift. That is perfectly true. It would seem funny to me if in the 15 years of which I have knowledge the inspector always came on the opposite shift to that on which I was working.

As a member of parliament, I do not want to know whether the inspector is in the gold mines because I am not in a position to make any contribution if I did know when he was going to be there. Charges have been made, and I have no intention of making them again.

This is a very large department and a very wealthy one as well. The jurisdiction of the minister is not a small one. It is true that you could go to some of the mines and not find any of these things taking place, but I think I could tell you of some mines where perhaps low grading or high grading is taking place. I think in other ones you could say it would be a speculative thing to suggest that. All I am suggesting is that on occasion inspectors should be called in or should be available to do this underground inspection.

I would suggest to the minister that the only real indication that this would be of some value is when the miners themselves or their representatives in their unions make a charge and are willing to document it. When that is done, there should be somebody capable of examining into the matter. I did receive such a charge from one of the organization. I communicated it to the minister and I have been informed by the people who brought it to my attention that nothing was ever done about it. I think the reason is that we really do not have the facilities or the people capable of inspecting the book work that has been done.

When the minister says that inspections have been made, I say nothing has been done in a physical way to verify this. It could only be done by an underground inspection. I am inclined to the belief that the inspectors are not trained for that type of work.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I did not think we would be back on this particular chestnut that we have dragged in several times in past years. I think the minister will remember one such occasion. Several years ago there was a very clear indication that the inspectors had not been underground and for some reason it was not considered very important. I remember the minister indicating at the time, and certainly in the mining press there were indications, that in raising this particular issue I was both venally suspicious and rather stupid to have brought it up. After all, the mine was a commercial organization or a commercial enterprise. It certainly would not be in the moral framework of an enterprise such as this to allow any practice such as low grading to go on.

I am not going to make any comments other than these. I would ask the minister to look at the performance of many business corporations in the past year and what has been revealed about them not only in his home province of Quebec before the Salvas commission where there have been indications of kick-backs, and so on, but also the situation with General Electric Company in the United States and many of those other indications that the business morality—perhaps it is associated with another kind of morality—is not what it should be, to underline to the minister that my colleague and I still feel that so far as this huge amount of money that is dispensed by his department under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, with which we do not quarrel, is concerned, there is every reason to make a very complete and thorough check of the underground workings of these mines.

I had hoped that on the first item of this department I would be able to draw to the attention of the memebrs of the committee something I have drawn to their attention in discussing the estimates of several other departments. I refer to the fact that the Prime Minister has announced that he stands for a free enterprise party and that he is going to fight the next election on the issue of free enterprise versus socialism.

I want to point out to the minister that the largest votes in this department—and they are substantial, running up to $27 million—go to support private enterprise, a true indication of a mixed economy, a peculiar form of socialism. I just wanted to draw to the attention of government members that within this department again we have an example of how difficult it is to make the issue one between free enterprise and socialism. If I were to go on in this vein, Mr. Chairman, I would be definitely out of order. Therefore I should like to turn to something a little more particular, relating to the mines branch.

I think the minister is aware that the Department of Defence Production has stockpiles of certain minerals that were considered strategic. It has stockpiles of tin, antimony and cobalt. All are metals produced in Canada. As I understand it, these stockpiles were acquired as long as 10 years ago.

At the present time the Department of Defence Production is trying to sell those metals on the market. It is making disposals of tin. It is trying to make disposal of antimony and cobalt. I should like to know what liaison took place between the mines branch of this department and the Department of Defence Production when those purchases were made. What liaison is taking place now between the Department of Defence Production and this department as the stockpiles are being disposed of? Perhaps I am assuming that liaison took place when it did not take place at all. If it did not, I can only think that this would be peculiar. If this is the branch that has the special knowledge of what goes on in the mining field, and must have some knowledge of the market, I would presume that it would be no less capable of advising when stockpiles should be put on the market. I should be very interested in hearing from the minister on this particular point.

There is one other matter that I should like to ask about. The hon. member who speaks for the Liberal party may have brought it up but I doubt whether he did. Earlier this session a proposal was brought before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines dealing with the location of a railroad development up in the minister's area of Quebec. There was much discussion in that committee about the location of the smelter and the refinery which would process the ore from this big new field that has been opened up. Can the minister indicate whether his department, and specifically this branch, has given any advice as to the best location of this particular development namely, the smelter or the refinery. I understand there is considerable competition between different localities in Quebec particularly with respect to the location of the refinery. I should like to find out just what role the minister's branch would play in a field such as this in making sure that the wisest possible decision is taken.

Before the minister tells me that this is a decision that would be taken by private enterprise, may I say that I am sure there are government considerations involved. I imagine that the Quebec government has some views in the matter and I would also imagine that the federal government would have some views with regard to location. I think the minister is aware that the people in the actual area of the mines would be very pleased if the refinery were established there. I know that the argument against the establishment of the refinery there is that the quantities of hydro power required and the location of the market are such that the refinery should be at tidewater. These are all economic and market factors that enter into the matter of location.

What I should like from the minister is some indication as to his views as a minister from Quebec who is interested in this field with respect to where the refinery is going to be established. I should like to know whether he has any views on the matter and what his department is doing with regard to it.

I come to the last point on which I want to touch relating to this branch. Last year on the estimates I made some remarks about the views of the Canadian Metal Mining Association with regard to research. I expressed the opinion that as I interpreted a press release I had seen in the newspapers the Canadian Metal Mining Association felt that the industry could take care of its own research in this particular field. Subsequently I had a letter from the managing director of the Canadian Metal Mining Association, Mr. V. C. Wansbrough, setting me straight.

There was a very interesting part in the letter in which he advised me that one should not put too much credence in the newspapers for, as he said, "We are bound to confess that their reports act sometimes as a distorting medium". It was that very lucid, apt and correct comment that made me feel he was quite correct in the point he made to me that at no time has the Canadian Metal Mining Association made representations to the government that they did not want the department to be active in research in the particular field of metal mining. My remarks are not in the nature of an apology but just to put the record straight by indicating that as a result of a press report I misinterpreted their position.

With respect to research I should like to ask the minister if he can tell us how the mines branch is coming along in carrying out the recommendations that were made two years ago by the mines, forests and waters committee about expansion of its activities. These sum up fairly well the questions I want to put to the minister. I hope he is in a position to answer several of them now. If he is not, I would appreciate a reply by letter.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I will begin by going back to the question of inspectors. The hon. member for Timiskaming referred to the experience of the inspectors. I can tell him that one of them has 17 years' experience in mining, five of which were in gold mining. The other inspector has about 25 years' operating experience in mining; previous inspectors have also had long experience in the mining industry. We are very careful to have experienced men for inspection purposes. There would be no point in doing otherwise. It is perfectly useless to have inexperienced inspectors going into mines and to expect that such inspectors would make an accurate report.

Mr. Peters: May I ask a question? Approximately how many working days did they spend in underground operations last year?

Mr. Comtois: We do not have that information available here but I will provide the hon. member with the answer as soon as I can get it. The hon. member for Port Arthur referred to stockpiling and the matter of liaison between my department and the Department of Defence Production. He referred to liaison on the part of my department with regard to the question of timeliness in the disposal of stockpiles having regard to current prices and marketing opportunities. Our advice is sought at the time but the decision is taken by the Department of Defence Production. We do not have to look after that matter. It comes under the authority of my colleague. As far as we are concerned, we give advice. We give the information that is required but the sale or disposal of these materials is not our concern and does not come under our authority.

The hon. member referred to the zinc refinery in Quebec. I will not deal with what the hon. member said about my province. There is no point in bringing provincial politics into the matter. I know that the hon. member likes to do that. He likes to play in muddy waters. It has become more or less a habit for him, and all members of the house know how he likes that. He is not going to drag me into it because it is not my business. The same principle applies to the question of the zinc refinery in northern Quebec. When a company decides to proceed with the building of a refinery the only thing it has to get is a permit from the province. We do not have to interfere. It is a provincial matter and at my age I know how to mind my own business.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have three or four simple questions to ask the minister on this item because I have always been interested in the relationship between mines branch research and private industry. Can he tell the committee who decides what projects will be undertaken? Are they a matter of decision for the mines branch officials alone or do they take advice or suggestions from private industry? Do employees of private industry spend some time in the research section of the mines branch and, if so, under what arrangements? Are the results of research provided gratis to private industry wherever it may be? Does the department ever obtain any patents based upon the results of research that is undertaken?

Mr. Comtois: Before answering this last point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to the question about inspectors asked by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I did not have the information when he asked his question. I wish to inform him that our gold mines inspectors made spot investigations this year amounting to 13 underground inspections out of 40 mines inspected to date. Each underground inspection takes about half a day. I hope this answers the question raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Peters: We are very glad to hear this, Mr. Chairman, and I presume the record is better than it has been in the past. We are grateful to the minister for what has been done. I think those mines that need this assistance badly are interested in seeing that it is given on an honest basis. I think they will appreciate these inspections.

Mr. Comtois: In order to complete my answer, I might add that two inspectors go underground at the same time, not one inspector alone.

Mr. Dumas: In view of the fact the hon. member for Port Arthur mentioned my name in respect of the zinc refinery in northwestern Quebec, I think I should say a few words. I did not intend to speak on this subject today. First of all, the refinery is not in my constituency. I knew the hon. member for Chapleau would mention it because it is in his district. The people of my district know my stand on this question. I am one of those who wish sincerely that this refinery could be established in northwestern Quebec. There are few people who know why this refinery many not be built in northwestern Quebec.

First of all, there is the question of hydroelectric power. People who know the situation realize that it takes a large amount of hydroelectric power to operate a zinc refinery. Unfortunately, very unfortunately indeed, hydroelectric power could have been developed in northwestern Quebec some years ago but it was not developed. This is water under the bridge, and it is no use crying now. I am sure the present government in Quebec will see that hydroelectric power is developed in the near future, and I think there will be enough power to permit such installation as a zinc refinery. We know that this will take perhaps five years' work on the Nottaway river.

Then, there is the question of by-products. Are we going to let these by-products go to waste or are we going to try to use them? These are very important questions. I still hope that a refinery can be built in northwestern Quebec. However, I do not believe it is the business of the federal government to try to influence the provincial government on this question. This is not the business of the federal government, it is the business of the provincial government. If the refinery were to be built, let us say, south of the border in the United States, then the federal government would have something to say. If the refinery were to be built to refine Quebec zinc in the maritimes, perhaps the federal government should say something about that and perhaps should insist the refinery be built in Quebec. But under the circumstances, there is no reason at all for the federal government to interfere with something which is really a provincial matter.

Now, a refinery will be built in Quebec. We are sure of that. However, people with knowledge of the situation realize that there are circumstances which sometimes prevent us from going ahead with a project. This is the case. In view of the fact that we do not have enough hydroelectric power in northwestern Quebec, and we will not have enough for the next four or five years for such a project, we cannot go ahead with it now. This is the situation.

[Mr. Dumas.]

Mr. Comtois: I should like to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West in relation to how we make the decisions about our research projects. I can say that there are two types of research projects: short term and long term. The short term projects are generally undertaken at the request of the industry. The long term projects are generally undertaken on our own decision.

In so far as patents are concerned, I may say that we do apply for them when we feel an invention might be useful to Canadian industry. Does that answer the question?

Mr. Fisher: I just wanted to say that I do not know whether I should be hurt by the minister's reference that I was trying to muddy the waters. I was trying to appeal to him, as one of the four or five lions of Quebec, in order to ascertain whether or not he had any views on this particular matter. I take it he has none, and he is not really interested in where this particular refinery is located. This is really all I was trying to ascertain.

Mr. Comtois: May I interrupt the hon. member, Mr. Chairman? Evidently he did not hear me this morning when I answered the hon. member for Villeneuve or he would have known that I gave my opinion on that question. I said that I would be very pleased if we had a refinery in the province of Quebec. However, so far as influencing the choice of a site is concerned, I said that it was not my business.

Mr. Fisher: I am sorry I forced the minister into being redundant through my absence. I wonder if he would answer my question about the extent to which the mines branch has gone toward achieving compliance with the recommendations made two years ago by the mines, forests and waters committee concerning an extension of its operations?

Mr. Comtois: I must say that in that respect the department has not achieved compliance with the full recommendations of the committee. That is what he is referring to, I think. The staff has been increased but not to the extent recommended by the committee. I could give some figures which the hon. member will find on page 43.

Mr. Fisher: I will not ask the minister for figures. I wonder whether he can tell me what difficulties there have been in connection with implementing the committee's report? It is really not the details with which I am concerned. As a member of the committee, I am interested in knowing how departments manage to move or not move along to the recommended goals. I should like to know about it from that point of view rather than with regard to specific numbers.

Mr. Comtois: I think I understand now what the question is. The difficulty is this. We are prepared to extend our staff and wish to improve our efficiency but there is a problem of space. We are looking for space. I know that some of my executives are making a study of the matter and are trying to find out where we could place the extra staff we need and intend to recruit. It is not only a matter of hiring them. We must find accommodation for them so that we could get added efficiency. Part of the mines branch will soon be moved into the green belt area. Once this move is made, space will be available in the mines branch building on Booth street so that more people could be accommodated and follow the recommendation of the committee two years ago. It is not always realized what our problems are. Many factors contribute preventing us from going as fast as we would like to go.

Mr. Carter: I have one question. I am not sure whether the minister has any responsibility in this matter. However, I wonder whether he can give the committee any information about the steps that were taken, I think a year ago, to offset the radiation hazard in the fluorspar mine in St. Lawrence and, if so, how these arrangements are working out.

Mr. Comtois: I presume that the question is in connection with the fluorspar mines in Nova Scotia—

Mr. Carter: No. The fluorspar mines in Newfoundland.

Mr. Comtois: There are some fluorspar mines in Nova Scotia. The hon. member refers to those in Newfoundland?

Mr. Carter: Yes. The trouble was that a very severe radiation hazard was discovered in those mines and they were closed down for some time because the miners refused to work there. Then some arrangement was worked out to make those mines safe. I understand some system of monitoring was to be set up whereby the miners themselves would have some way of knowing whether or not those mines were safe. I just wondered what had taken place.

Mr. Comtois: As far as my department is concerned, we have nothing to do with the matter. It might concern the health and welfare department or, as far as radiation is concerned the atomic energy control board. However, we cannot deal with that problem directly.

Geographical branch—

222. Administration, operation and maintenance including the expenses of the Canadian board on geographical names (formerly under surveys and mapping branch administration) and a grant of $500 to the Canadian association of geographers, $500,626.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, could the minister indicate how many geographers will actually be employed during the summer on the systematic study of land uses in Canada?

Mr. Comtois: About ten, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a few words with regard to an editorial published in Le Devoir on Monday, July 6, 1959, over the signature of Pierre Vigeant, in which reference was made to a brief presented by the «Conseil de vie française», and I quote:

—in the brief of the «Conseil de vie française», we find the following paragraphs:

"We note with regret that (a) the hydrographic maps published by the hydrographic service of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are published only in English;

(b) the topographic maps published by the topographic survey section of the same department are also in English only. Up to 1950, the legends of those maps were bilingual, at least for Quebec;

(c) the geological reports of that department are published in English only. Bilingual editions were published until 1916. From then on to 1950, they were publicized in both languages in Quebec only. Since 1950, they are exclusively written in English."

May I ask the minister whether he is considering the possibility of publishing hydrographic maps, topographical maps and geological reports in both languages?

Mr. Comtois: In reply to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, I might say that topographical maps, are now printed with bilingual legends. I wonder whether the hon. member is aware of the nature of a topographical map. He will find that there are very few indications on the map itself. The important thing is to have bilingual legends. The legends of all our topographical maps are now bilingual.

With regard to hydrographic maps, the work, is already under way, but the problem is slightly different.

Some time ago, a Quebec newspaper reproduced part of a map of Pointe-au-Père, Quebec. It is a map for the use of pilots. I was criticized for not having published this map in both languages and without bilingual captions, and the paper said in particular as an example that "Father's Point" was mentioned instead of Pointe-au-Père, complaining that in the province of Quebec, the department published only one map for the pilots and that it was printed in English only.

They had not taken the trouble to inquire about it, otherwise they would have realized that those shipping maps are used not only by the Quebec-Pointe-au-Père pilots, but by the pilots of all the shipping companies of the world which do business here and have to use those maps.

Before changing anything in the names on those maps, we must first make some arrangement both with the British admiralty and with the shipping companies, or with the navy departments of the various countries. We must make sure there is uniformity between the Canadian map and the others.

One must realize that it takes time and that, though we try our best, we cannot print bilingual maps and make the necessary changes on the existing maps before notifying the various countries that do business in Canada.

That article had bitter criticism for the department and myself in particular, for it said that I did not care about bilingualism. It is quite unfair to me. They say those things without going to the trouble of checking the situation. It would be easier and more plausible and fair to inquire first on what seems to be an anomaly.

I can assure the hon. member that our topographical maps have bilingual legends and that our geological reports that are of general interest for the country are published in both languages. As for our reports that are of interest for the province of Quebec, they are always published in both languages, and are issued simultaneously. To sum it up, there has been considerable progress in that field.

Item agreed to.

224. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $493,050.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister has anything to add to what was said last year about what the government has been doing in this field in relation to the study of sun spots and the aurora borealis. What work are our laboratories doing in this field? Are we increasing our observatory equipment? Is there any contemplation of installing new equipment this year?

Mr. Comtois: The aurora borealis is studied by the defence research board. If we are called upon for advice or information, we are pleased to co-operate, but this matter concerns the defence research board.

Mr. Peters: The statement was made not very long ago by the head of the largest observatory in England that the equipment they were using was not of sufficient strength to pick up some of the objects which should now be under observation. He said they were in dire need of new equipment; the only way they could keep these objects, satellites for example, under observation was by being told what the course was going to be from time to time.

The head of the observatory said they were in great need of further equipment and, as far as they knew, at that time they had the best equipment in the world. I am wondering whether we are in any way trying to keep up with the needs of the day as expressed by the head of the British observatory. If so, are we contemplating building any large, electronic telescopes and other equipment for this purpose?

At one time it was reported that Canada had a fairly up to date and competent observatory. I am wondering whether improvements are being made so that we stay in this position in this field.

Mr. Comtois: We are always trying to improve the equipment we have. We are not in competition with Great Britain, but we are trying to keep our equipment up to date.

Every year we ask for new equipment to be built and improvements are made every year, but it improves not as fast as we would like to see it improve. Last year we built the radio telescope in Penticton and as I mentioned earlier, we have another 48-inch telescope in Victoria. In Ottawa we are improving our facilities in the observatory by installing electronic and other devices.

Mr. Peters: Do we carry out regular tracking of satellites and other phenomena? Do we do this from the dominion observatory and correlate the reports that are submitted from other observatories on the continent and across the world? Do we now have facilities for communication between these observatories in order to maintain our share of a world-wide observatory system?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, we do track satellites; we do as much as we can in this field. We collect and compute all the information which is obtained from other observatories in the world. We gather up this information. Dr. Petrie in Ottawa gathers the information and publishes reports.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister how this particular observatory in its tracking system in so far as satellites are concerned is working with the defence department. I am interested in the whole question of defence from missiles of various kinds.

I know this may sound fantastic, but there is speculation that space platforms may be built, or that satellites from which attacks may be made, may be sent into space. I am wondering if there is any intention of building up the dominion observatory so that in time it can be part of the whole space study program with defence research aspects to it?

It is quite apparent that if the Russians can put a man into space and have him circle around the earth, and if observatories are involved in the tracking, and if they can land that man from space within a very small designated area, this is one form of possible attack that we may face.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morton in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

224. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $493,050.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall vote 224 carry?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, when the knock came on the door I was in the process of asking the minister about the role the dominion observatory plays now in terms of matters of space and the role it might conceivably come to play as part of our defence tracking system. I wondered whether the minister had any information on that point.

Mr. Comtois: In answer to the question of the hon. member for Port Arthur, I would like to say that our department has no direct responsibility in this matter but in areas where we can be useful we do undertake work or projects to assist in defence endeavours. With respect to gravity, for example, if some particular information is required by the defence department we produce the figures and provide the department with the knowledge we already have or we get the information needed.

Mr. Fisher: I want to draw the minister's attention to a correspondent of the department and particularly of the observatory, a Mr. James Hills of R.R. 2, Allenford. I do not know whether he has communicated with all members of parliament but I have certainly had several communications from him with relation to some doubts he has about certain drawings provided him by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. It would seem to me from the reply I received from the public relations officer of the observatory that the observatory had assumed that it was most difficult to put over the facts of the case with Mr. Hills. Perhaps I can give hon. members an idea of how difficult it may be to get information across to Mr. Hills. I read from one of his publications in which he says:

> I think there is a way of making the moon come down. None of those theories by scholars about momentum, gravity or centrifugal force will stand up to much study.

This is a sample of his approach to things, but this is the question I want to ask the minister. When people in the scientific field take objection to the information that is supplied to them, how far does the agency go in trying to provide an answer or do they just write off the whole matter? It seems to me that the replies that have gone out from the observatory are perhaps extremely brief when you consider the lack of knowledge that this man seems to have. Does the minister get many queries such as this from people who cast doubts upon the accuracy of the scientific information of the department? How far does the minister go in replying to them?

Mr. Comtois: We receive many inquiries, of course, about different matters relating to the observatories. Many inquiries are received but it is not always easy to answer. In replying we cannot give a course on gravity or seismology or disciplines of that kind. It is not very easy to answer when scientific matters are involved. I am sure the hon. member will agree. If a straight question is asked on a specific matter we give the information forthright. I see the hon. member is laughing. Possibly he wants to have a laugh at my expense, but I take it in the same way as he has put the question.

Item agree to.

General—

228. Polar continental shelf project, $1,553,595.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, some time in March 1961, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys made a statement concerning the expedition to the polar shelf and he then said that certain officials of his department were making arrangements to go there.

I wonder if the whole group is now in the polar shelf with a view to conducting the survey to be made.

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the whole group has been there for several weeks. Some 70 men are there and have undertaken their survey.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Some may have come back since then and others may have joined the party. Every so often, changes have to be made. It may happen that when an employee or an official specialized in one branch or another has completed his work and collected all the information he needs, he is replaced by another specialist to do a different work for the same survey project, at the same place. So there is a certain amount of rotation of personnel. However, I might say that the team has been there since the end of March.

Mr. Dumas: Could the minister give us the approximate date when the 1961 work program will be completed?

Mr. Comtois: At the end of August or early September. The last men on our team over there will come back, I think, in early September because that is when winter almost sets in over there.

I do not know if this may be of interest to the house, but I should say that I received tonight from Dr. Beal, who is in charge of an expedition, a report concerning the activities of his team. I then learned that one of his men has been attacked by a polar bear inside the camp; part of his arm—I do not know exactly what term to use—was gnawed away, so to speak, by a polar bear. He is now in hospital. I wanted to report this to the house in order to inform you of the dangers facing those men. In fact they are armed and they carry with them all the necessary equipment to meet any contingency. That goes to say that those expeditions in the Arctic require well trained men who can occasionally take a risk for the progress of science and for the efficiency of the service to which they belong.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister could tell us whether or not his particular friends, the Autair company are still engaged in activities on the polar shelf?

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I would certainly answer the member for Bonavista-Twillingate by saying that the Autair Company was awarded that contract. I could not say whether those reports are accurate; therefore I would not be able to appreciate their efficiency because there are so many factors involved.

(Text):

There are so many questions that may be involved; so many things may happen in the course of the work, that it is not the easiest thing to arrive at any conclusion. The reports we have are satisfactory.

(Translation):

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that I should bring a correction to some statements made in this house quite recently concerning our helicopter contract for the continental polar shelf exploration project. I refer to what the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) said about our contract awarding system.

Serious criticisms were levelled against us. The hon. member for Laurier took me to task, as a minister, to reprove the policy we have followed—that is not to call tenders for such contracts.

We invite quotations from the air transport board which comes under the Department of Transport. We establish the cost of the operation for each firm, or the cost of transportation of material, from the point of departure to distribution. Aircraft such as the Bell and the Sikorsky must be dismantled before being shipped to site on heavy cargo planes and re-assembled once they have reached destination.

Our policy is not to call tenders, and it is the same as that which was established seven years ago, that is before I took over and before the present administration came to office.

Therefore there have been no changes.

I regret that the hon. member for Laurier is not at his place now, but on the other hand I was not here when he made his remarks and my answer is not any more severe than the attack he levelled at me. As a matter of fact, I am surprised at the attitude of the hon. member. He stated that the procedure I have followed is entirely inadequate and that he disapproves of the system of not calling tenders for such work.

I just said that we followed the practice introduced in 1954 and I am surprised that he said in this chamber that the method was inadequate, because when he was minister of transport in 1954, he preached an entirely different doctrine. He was against the principles of calling for tenders, and that year—

Mr. Pickersgill: What date?

Mr. Comtois: I will give it to the hon. member. The hon. member for Laurier made his statement here on March 28—

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: The date I wanted from the minister was the date in 1954 when these contracts were given without asking for tenders.

Mr. Comtois: I think it was in February, 1954. I can check on that; I have some means of checking the exact time.

(Translation):

At that time the then minister of transport, Mr. Lionel Chevrier, complained to the minister of mines, the Hon. George Prudham, for having called tenders. He was blaming him for having disregarded the instructions given by the government, and for not following the procedure, which we have since then been following. The proof—I have to give proof, for the hon. member has reproved that practice which was the exact opposite of what he was preaching—is that on February 25, 1954 he wrote the following letter to the then minister of mines, Mr. Prudham:

(Text):

Honourable G. Prudham, Minister,
Department of Mines and Technical Surveys,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear colleague:

A number of instances have recently arisen where departments have called for and received tenders for commercial air services which were not in accord with air carriers' licences or with their publicly filed tariffs. This is creating considerable embarrassment for the air transport board and is raising difficulties within the industry itself.

This situation is, no doubt, due to the usual changes in personnel of government departments.

The public filing of air carriers' rates have been incorporated in the Aeronautics Act to ensure fair treatment of the public and to avoid the unethical rate-cutting that injured Canadian aviation in the 1930's. The Post Office is the only exception since by statute it may set its own rate of payment.

Some years ago it was found that a number of government departments did not understand this legal position and were calling for tenders for air transportation from commercial air carriers within Canada. This encouraged the air carriers to tender on services which they were not licensed to perform or at rates which were not in their filed tariffs and, therefore, not valid rates.

To correct this situation, the attached cabinet directive No. 12 was issued to all departments in 1949 pointing out that any department wishing to purchase commercial air services could obtain full information regarding air carriers licensed to perform the services required and the legal rates of such air carriers from the air transport board. The cabinet directive established that the tender procedure should not be followed by government departments in this field, except in specialized cases such as aerial photography and surveying or other types of specialty service where the provision of transportation is not involved and where air carriers have not been required by the air transport board to file tariffs.

Because of the situation that has developed, it would be appreciated if your deputies would draw the cabinet directive to the attention of your purchasing staff and other appropriate departmental personnel.

I have a copy of the instruction or the cabinet directive.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is fine.

Mr. Comtois: So my department has followed exactly this cabinet directive.

(Translation):

I fail to understand why the hon. member for Laurier blames me for following the instructions issued by the cabinet at that time when he urged his colleague to comply with them in 1954 and then criticized him for not doing so.

There is something wrong here. There is a lack of understanding, an oversight. I do not know. Is it because the then minister of transport, now the member for Laurier, is taking a different view of the matter since he has been on the other side of the house? Maybe.

Well, here are the facts, and there can be no mistake about that. We have acted on the instructions of the cabinet on every point and they have not been changed since that time. We are proceeding in exactly the same way as last year, and two years ago, and I have no reason to believe that a change will be effected in the future. This is the usual procedure followed in the department.

The hon. member for Laurier also criticized our attitude saying that we had failed to award the contract to the lowest bidder. Now, this is just not so, because we have worked out the price of the contract. This is what the hon. member said in his speech of March 28:

(Text):

I state that it—

That is the contract.

—was given without the calling of tenders... In this case the minister, for some unknown reason,—

(Translation):

You will note, Mr. Chairman, the words chosen by the hon. member.

(Text):

—decided not to call for tenders... and simply awarded the contract on the basis of information obtained through the filing of tariff rates.

(Translation):

What comments on my part is the house expecting? The explanation is there. I gave the reason, and I have no other to offer. The contract was awarded to the company which had filed its scale of charges and duly submitted them and which according to the estimates of the officials of the department, was offering to do the work for the lowest price. As a matter of fact, according to our estimates, the price represented, for the scale of charges only, a difference of $25,000, in favour of the Autair Company, as compared with the other tenderers.

Consequently, I feel the explanation I have given justifies to a degree my attitude, and I wanted to correct unfair statements made about me by the hon. member for Laurier.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, what the minister has said is, of course, very interesting and perhaps we should not blame the minister for the fact that he was not here prior to 1957, and that he did not know that his present colleagues, when they were over here on this side of the chamber, advocated a policy of competition in this field instead of the policy that was followed by the previous Liberal government and promised to bring that policy of competition into effect. In some respects they brought that policy of competition into effect and have done great harm to the air industry in doing so. I think the present Minister of Transport is trying to correct some of the mistakes that were made in this regard by his predecessor who is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What the minister is saying is that he followed the old Liberal policy and that he did not follow the policy of his colleague the Minister of Transport. That is what he is saying.

That is very interesting, because at the very time these contracts were being let the minister will recall that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was then the minister of transport, was creating chaos in the air industry by this new policy of competition in this field. It is hard to understand why this new policy of competition which was applied everywhere else should not have been applied to the polar shelf. This was the Tory policy that was going to correct the mistakes that had been made by the Liberals. The minister boasts that he did not follow it but rather stuck to the old Liberal policy because it was the better policy. We are flattered that he should say that. However, it is very odd that he should be saying that when his colleague, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce; was boasting about how he was introducing competition into this field.

There is another aspect of the minister's explanation that strikes me as being a little bit odd. The minister says that the reason why there was no sense in calling for tenders was that they had to file tariffs and the tariffs had to be fair. But then he also told us that Autair's submission which was not a submission—if you understand what that means, Mr. Chairman; it is like "Alice in Wonderland", a submission which was not a submission—of $25,000, if I remember the minister's statement correctly, was lower than anyone else's figure. How could it have been lower if the tariffs were the same for all of them and the minister was merely selecting the firm that could do the job best? How could one be cheaper than the other? It is hard to understand that. If there were not tenders, how does the minister explain this so-called saving of $25,000? His explanation, to a simple person like myself, does not make any kind of sense at all.

First of all the minister says he did not follow the new policy of his government; he followed the old policy laid down by my hon. friend from Laurier, which we think was a better policy, of course. But then the minister says, notwithstanding the fact that he followed the old Liberal policy and did not ask for tenders, he still got a cheaper price from Autair than he would have got from any other company.

I do not see how that would have been possible if they all had to charge the same price and adhere to the tariffs. Surely the minister will have to explain to us where this saving of $25,000 came in, because from the explanation the minister has given, it does not seem to me to make any kind of sense at all.

We know of course, from information the minister gave us last year, that certain tariffs were filed and the minister reached a conclusion that this company was the best company to do this job. We have also got information—I am sorry to say I have not had time to look it up—given in answer to questions, that this company has the worse accident rate of any company in the industry.

Is that the basis on which the minister chose this company as the most competent one to do this job? It seems to me that if all of them charge the same price it is odd that the company that has the worst accident rate, the company that had its insurance cut off on more than one occasion, should have been selected by the government as its chosen instrument. Perhaps the minister would explain that.

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, nothing is easier than to explain what has been going on and what we have done, unless I have to deal with someone who refuses to understand or rejects beforehand what I have to say.

First of all, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys has nothing to do with rates. Those come under the jurisdiction of the A.T.B. and, therefore, of the Department of Transport.

What we insist in knowing is whether a company had its rates approved and those rates are liable to change.

A company submits its rates to the A.T.B. in order to have them approved. Another company might submit other rates. They also have to be approved.

All those companies are class 4 companies, which means that they have to submit their prices and rates for approval.

It is not the duty of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to ascertain whether such a company has filed new rates, whether those were approved, whether objections were raised or not, whether the company is insured or not. That is not our job.

What we must know from the air transport board is whether this company is in good standing or not, whether it carries insurance, and whether, according to the board, it offers the required guarantees for carrying out the contract.

If we have these guarantees, our responsibility is all the more reduced.

We then compute the costs based on the rates and on the costs of transporting the equipment, what we call "positioning" and "depositioning", that is the dismantling of the aircraft before the transport operation and the reassembling of it when it has reached its destination.

There are instances—and of this the hon. member is not aware and I fully understand his ignorance in the matter—there are instances where a company may have an opportunity to have its transportation done (what we call positioning and depositioning) in the Arctic at a better price than another company.

As anyone knows, at least anyone familiar with the procedures followed in such work, Sikorsky or Bell planes are used for such conveyance. And it is known also that in that field the competition among the different companies is keen. It is for them a matter of prestige, of competition and of getting contracts.

They make their bids, watching one another closely. Sometimes they even wait until the last minute to file new rates with the board to prevent a competitor from knowing beforehand what rates they submitted.

With regard to transportation, a company may have opportunities to go there and return at the end of the season for a better price than a competitor. This accounts for its lower operating costs.

I have already answered a question on this matter put to me by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier).

This procedure makes it possible to arrive at the operating cost which is most economical.

First of all we want to be assured by the air transport board that the company is in good standing.

We figure out the most economical rates for us making sure that the company is in a position to provide us with the required aircraft.

If, at the end of the year, we get a bad report on the company—if, for instance, the work has not been done properly and the service has been bad, we just have to discontinue our dealings with the company.

Now, the Autair Company did an excellent job last year. We had a good report on its efficiency.

Consequently, we had no reason to ignore it this spring, and to dismiss its quotation.

The hon. member is free to think whatever he wants but that is the procedure we followed and we acted honestly.

We took the department's interests by making as much savings as possible and we hope that this year's results will be up to our expectations.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I do not find the minister's explanation very convincing. After all, I do recall that some years ago when I was a member of the government there was a question of two companies seeking to get the business of the Department of Fisheries. It was drawn to the attention of the department—I remember this very well—at the time that there was this 1949 directive that a certain tariff must be established and must be adhered to. There was no difference in the cost as between selecting one company or the other as far as the Department of Fisheries was concerned, because the air transport board insisted that they should both charge the same tariff.

Therefore I cannot understand the explanation the minister gives at all, that they can file their tariff a little later than somebody else, file a different tariff. The only argument for having this system of filing tariffs—and it is a very powerful one—instead of having tenders is that we do not encourage people to bid below the cost or below the cost plus a reasonable profit for what they can do, and thereby neglect safety and other factors of that sort and bring chaos into the air industry. That is the only argument for having this regulatory system, which was the system that existed when there was a Liberal government.

The minister now says they file different tariffs, that the tariffs are not the same. What is the difference between that and asking for tenders? If the tariffs are different, you should ask for tenders and they should all be submitted on the same day, in sealed envelopes, so that one company does not know what the other is doing. If the tariffs are going to be established at a uniform rate, the question of service or something of that sort would be decisive. But the minister seems to suggest that different companies can submit different tariffs at the same times; that one can submit it first and the other can then find out, in some clandestine way, what the other has submitted and then submit a slightly lower one. That is having the worst of both possible worlds.

[Mr. Comtois.]

I suggest you should either have the system which existed in 1954 which the minister described, where the rates are fixed and where all you decide is which company can perform the service best for a fixed price, or the system of calling for tenders. But this sort of mixed up system the minister has described does not seem to me to make any sense at all.

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member does not yet understand.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is obvious.

Mr. Comtois: Yes, it is obvious.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it is obvious that I do not understand.

Mr. Comtois: I am at a loss to explain the situation to the hon. member, and to make him realize that the rates sumbitted to the air transport board are not all the same.

There is a date set by the board for the filing of rates. Firms may file rates, but they need not do so on a particular date. The submissions need not be received the same day. There is no set date or time as in the case of public tenders. The department informs them that rates will be accepted up to a certain date—I think that is the procedure—and that after that date, rates will not be accepted, and the companies act accordingly.

The hon. member apparently believes the air transport board sets one single tariff for all the Sikorskys, for all the Bell 47-G2's, for all the Cessnas and for any other type of aircraft. That is not the procedure followed by the board.

If the hon. member wants further information, he may, when the estimates of the Department of Transport come up, ask for and obtain all the information he wants. I do not have that information available, and it is outside my jurisdiction.

Furthermore, it is not for me to discuss the procedure followed by the air transport board. We receive the scale of charges as submitted and we proceed as I have just explained, after consulting with the air transport board.

Perhaps Autair did not have all the required aircraft. It often happens that companies quote prices or submit tenders when they do not at the time have all the required aircraft. However, exchanges can be made; one company borrows from another. Such exchanges are quite common.

If, for instance, one company tenders for a particular contract requiring the use of five Sikorskys and three Bell G-47's, it may happen that this company does not at the time have the five Sikorskys and the three Bells required. However, it can make arrangements with another firm to rent the aircraft, or it may buy new ones, as frequently happens.

It must be realized that the companies are not going to keep an unlimited number of aircraft in case they might get contracts; that would involve too great a liability risk.

As I have just said, this procedure is followed daily and is familiar to the air industry.

For that type of contracts, the companies exchange and borrow aircraft from one another. This is nothing to be ashamed of, because it is perfectly proper. Such arrangements are only natural in business and industry.

Once again, the important thing for the department is that the work be done on schedule, under favourable conditions, and that at the end of the season the program be completed.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that the minister's further explanation seems to make the situation even worse, because the procedure now being followed, according to the minister, contains the worst of both worlds. The hon. gentleman says different companies can file different tariffs with the air transport board at varying times. They can file them when they like, provided they do so before a certain date. Then, after these different submissions have been filed, the Department of Transport says "eeny, meeny, miny, mo", or on a similarly arbitrary basis picks out the one it intends to take. The minister referred to the tariffs as they were in 1954. The tariffs then were uniform and the air transport board decided what tariff was proper for a particular kind of service. I know whereof I speak, because I was in the government at that time and I have some experience of these particular matters.

Once you admit that various people can file different tariffs it is obvious that the person who files first, so that the details become known, is at a distinct disadvantage compared with a person who comes along at the eleventh hour and files his tariff. This is exactly what my hon. friend from Laurier was complaining about when he said, as reported in Hansard on March 28, at page 3437:

> Here is my criticism of the manner in which this is being done, and I say this without any fear of contradiction. The minister may contradict it but I have it on reliable information. It is well known in the trade that notwithstanding the fact that tariffs had been filed, Autair was not the lowest of those who filed tariffs in accordance wih this policy of the minister which merits only condemnation.

It was this to which my hon. friend from Laurier was objecting, not the fact that the minister followed a system which was in existence under the previous regime. It was the fact that we have this mixed up system, if I may call it that, not tenders, but not fixed prices, which gives opportunity for just what seems to have happened in this particular case. It is notorious that this company—and this was well known to the air transport board because parliament had been told about it—has a bad accident record. This company is a fly by night outfit—I do not mean that they fly helicopters by night, because, of course, they have the midnight sun up there—but some of its operations would not have stood the light of day and it is odd that the government should have chosen this particular outfit for this job.

Mr. Dumas: Earlier this afternoon I mentioned the fact that it was encouraging to note that members of the committee are aware of the importance of this department and realize, as was evident, that the services of this government department are of great value not only to the constituencies and areas which they represent but also to the development of Canadian natural resources as a whole.

I was very sorry to learn from a newspaper dispatch of the death of a former member of this house, Mr. Walter Little, who was a member from 1935 to 1953. Mr. Little represented the constituency of Timiskaming and he was a real friend of the mining industry, of the miners and of all those interested in this important work. He worked very hard for his constituency and I can only say that we are very sorry to hear of his death and extend our sincere sympathy to Mrs. Little and to her family in their sad bereavement.

Mr. Peters: I should like to join with the hon. member who has just spoken in offering my sympathy to the family of Mr. Walter Little who represented the riding which I now represent. He was, indeed, a good friend of the mining industry. He went into the industry very early and built up a large trucking operation. His sons are now active in enterprises in that area. I wish to associate myself with the words of condolence we have just heard.

Item agreed to.

Dominion coal board—

229. Adminisration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $126,345.

Mr. Robichaud: Is the minister going to make a statement on the dominion coal board?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman. In presenting these estimates to this committee, I regret to report that the coal situation in Canada in the past year has grown more and more difficult as the competition from other fuels has intensified. It is becoming clear that the long established policy of providing assistance in the amount necessary to enable Canadian coal to meet the competition of imported coal in the markets of central Canada is no longer sufficient. The chief competition in these central markets and also in the home markets is no longer imported coal but other fuels.

It is open to question whether under the present rapidly changing competitive conditions a sound basis can be found for a long range basic policy. The royal commission appointed to investigate the industry and develop basic lines of policy has presented a report. This report has received wide comment both pro and con and, in view of this, was referred to an interdepartmental committee for study and report upon the probable effect of the specific recommendations. This committee has concluded its work and the report is now in my hands for consideration by the government. I need not tell the committee that it will be given as rapid and thorough consideration as other pressing matters will permit and I can assure hon. members that a formal statement will be issued as soon as it is possible to do so. That statement will, however, deal with long range matters, and there have been other immediate problems that have required consideration and action.

In this field, there has been the problem of closure of collieries in Cape Breton and the consequent unemployment. We have taken action on this matter as I have already reported to the house and are confident that the results will serve to avert the hardship that was facing many of our coal miners in this area.

The other immediate aspect is, of course, the continuation of support to the industry until a new and satisfactory long range policy can be worked out and applied. These estimates now before us are designed and intended to furnish this support.

Essentially, these estimates are the same as those approved last year. They continue the same high level of emergency assistance which resulted in the sale of a substantially increased tonnage of Nova Scotia coal in Ontario last year. They have been calculated on the basis of assisting to market every last ton of Canadian coal that can reasonably be sold with subvention help. This applied not only to Nova Scotia coal but also to the coal from New Brunswick, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

Hon. members will note that the total amount estimated for subvention assistance in 1961-62 for all the coal regions of Canada is $13,244,900. This is a decrease of $1,843,050 by comparison with the more than $15 million provided in last year's estimates.

This decrease in the estimated requirements is not, I must emphasize, the result of any reduction in the effective rates of subvention assistance themselves. The sum of $13,244,900 represents our best estimate of the amount that will be required to move from Canadian mines all the coal that can find a market. If this amount is insufficient, and with the recent provision of further assistance to maintain employment in Cape Breton, it may well be so, the house will be asked to provide a further sum in supplementary estimates.

Statements have been made referring to the amount of imported coal still coming into Ontario and Quebec. I must again point out the fact mentioned by my predecessor in 1955 as reported in Hansard for July 25 at page 6737, that the idea that all coal is about the same and can be used without difficulty in any plant is a basic fallacy. A plant designed to operate economically on coal with certain characteristics will not necessarily perform with satisfaction on other coals. I am informed that practically every consumer within the subvention area of Quebec and Ontario has been canvassed and that there is no large consumer in this area whose equipment can efficiently use maritime coal who is not doing so. The imports of coal into this area are largely of sizes that cannot be supplied by the Nova Scotia mines or else are of different analytical qualities or combustion characteristics and are not replaceable by the high volatile low ash fusion coals of medium to high sulphur content that are produced in our maritime mines.

In spite of these restricting conditions we have had some success in our recent efforts to assist the sale of more Nova Scotia coal in Ontario to compensate for losses in the maritimes and in Quebec. In 1957-58, only 137,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal moved to Ontario while in 1959-60, this had increased to 734,000 tons. This level was maintained in the fiscal year just ended and it is hoped that with the recently announced order from the Ontario hydro, it can be increased in the present year. The competition from natural gas is becoming more and more severe and as coal burning equipment is replaced by gas, the opportunities to promote the movement of Canadian coal continue to decrease.

The estimates before us provide for a slight decrease in the funds for subventions for Saskatchewan lignite. This is because lignite has lost certain industrial markets to natural gas in the far western section of Ontario.

The Saskatchewan lignite industry, as a whole, is in a comparatively healthy condition. It is even optimistic of recovering in the future some of the markets it is now losing to gas; but it appears unlikely to do so, to any great extent during the 1961-62 fiscal year.

In the case of Alberta and British Columbia coal, the same assistance is provided this year as last on coal moving into subvention areas for domestic and industrial use. There has been a substantial reduction in the amount provided to assist coal moving into these same areas for railway consumption but this, of course, merely reflects the displacement of the coal burning locomotive by the diesel.

The same amount is included as was provided last year to assist the export movement of Alberta and British Columbia coal. The effort to develop a market in Japan for the coking coals of western Canada is still in the experimental stage but the developments to date have been sufficiently satisfactory to warrant continuation for another year.

There is no doubt that there is a large potential market in the steel mills of Japan for coking coal. The trials of Canadian coals to date have been satisfactory and it appears possible that our coals will be acceptable to the consumers as replacements, in part, of premium coals at present imported from other countries.

There is a very serious question, however, whether the Japanese market is one that we can afford to develop to its possible potential. It may well be too expensive to continue the present high experimental rates of subvention assistance for any lengthy period. A vigorous effort is being made at the present time to reduce costs in three directions, mining costs, costs of transportation from the mines and handling and loading costs at the shipping piers. If these costs can be reduced and if the users can be convinced that the quality of our coal justifies a higher purchase price, the present subvention rate would be substantially reduced. In view of all these uncertainties, we can only continue the experiment on a year to year basis with an open mind as to the future.

Returning for a moment to the maritimes, some increase in funds has been included in this year's estimates for subventions for New Brunswick coal from the Minto field. Generally speaking, the New Brunswick coal industry is in a healthy condition and has resumed its steady although unspectacular expansion which was interrupted by business conditions two or three years ago. The increase in subvention funds required is in line with this healthy development and will cover an expected small increase in tonnage shipped to subvention areas.

Although the Canadian coal situation is relatively healthy in New Brunswick and Saskatchewan, and although there may be some prospects for the coal industry five, 10 or 15 years from now, it would be foolish to hide from ourselves the seriousness of the present situation and the extent of the general decline of the industry over the past ten years. Let me place before you, Mr. Chairman, just a few comparisons.

In 1949 railway locomotives in western Canada consumed nearly 3½ million tons of Canadian coal. Last year they consumed 2,000 tons. The 3½ million tons burned by locomotives in 1949 provided three quarters of a million man-days of employment for the bituminous coal miners of Alberta and British Columbia. In 1960 coal production in the west for locomotive use provided 400 man-days of employment for miners, not quite enough to keep two miners busy during the year.

In 1949 and 1950 the Canadian production of coal was more than 19 million tons a year. In 1959 and 1960 Canadian coal production was less than 11 million tons a year. In 1950 Canada imported 22,660,000 tons of bituminous coal and 4,286,000 tons of American and British anthracite. In 1960 our bituminous coal imports were 11,090,000 tons or only half as much as we imported ten years ago. Last year our anthracite imports were 1,200,000 tons or just a little more than a quarter of the anthracite tonnage imported ten years ago.

In 1950 Canadian coal production of more than 19 million tons gave some 23,500 coal mine employees work for an average of 232 days during the year. To show the decline, in 1957 output of slightly over 13 million tons employed some 14,600 miners for an average of 227 days, while in 1959 the production of 10,600,000 tons provided work for only 11,500 miners for some 216 days.

Almost the only pleasant thing from the Canadian viewpoint that can be said about the reduction in employment from 23,000 to 11,500 in ten years is that the Canadian miners who did have work had more working days in their year than did coal miners in the United States. For example, the 11,500 coal mine employees in Canada in 1959 averaged 216 days of work each. In the United States in that year employed coal miners averaged 185 days.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that hon. members would not wish me to close this statement without paying a sincere and heartfelt tribute to Mr. Wilbur Uren who served this country so well as chairman of the dominion coal board since its establishment in 1947 until his retirement on April 1 of the present year. It is probably a measure of the value of his services, especially in these past few years of crisis in the coal industry, that some sort of record was established in the number of extensions he received beyond the normal retirement age of 65. The first extensions were authorized by the previous government and the remainder by the present government. I know I can tender to him the thanks of all of us for his fine service and our best wishes in his well earned retirement.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the minister for the statement he has just made to the committee in the presentation of he first item having to do with the dominion coal board. I noticed from his statement that the minister has realized the seriousness of the coal situation and he has admitted that the actions taken by the government so far by way of subventions are not sufficient to take care of the coal problems of the day. The minister has also referred to the royal commission on coal under Mr. Justice Rand which presented its report some time last fall. He has stated that the interdepartmental committee which was appointed by the government last fall to make a study and report on the recommendations of the Rand commission has now concluded its work and the report is now in the minister's hands. I feel that it is an injustice to members of the house, whether on the government side or in the opposition, to have to discuss the estimates of the dominion coal board when a report which would be very important in such discussions is being held up until the estimates are passed.

On February 14 I asked the minister the following question, as found on page 2016 of Hansard:

> Can the minister advise the house whether the interdepartmental committee set up to advise the government on the Rand report has completed its study. If so, is the minister in a position to report to the house on the recommendations made by the said committee?

In the latter part of his reply the minister said that the committee was progressing with its study and he expected that the recommendations to the cabinet would be made within a few weeks. That is almost four months ago, and it is only tonight that we have learned from the minister that the report has been completed and has been handed to the cabinet. We are called upon to discuss the estimates of the dominion coal board for the fiscal year 1961-62 and the latest information available to most hon. members is the annual report of the dominion coal board for the year 1958-59. We are not in a position to compare the estimates for the coming fiscal year with the report of the coal board for the previous year.

I notice that in his statement the minister used figures and made references to the dominion coal board annual report for the year 1959-60. I happen to have in my hands a copy of this report which was handed to me this morning. I say again that it is not fair to members of this committee that they have to discuss the estimates of the department at a time when they have to go back three years to get some information on the division of the department that is under discussion. The minister should be in a position to give us further details with regard to the information which is contained in the annual report of the dominion coal board for the year 1959-60 and which I repeat is not in the hands of most of the members of this committee.

On page 4 of this report, I find the following statement:

> Over the past decade, the decline of Canadian coal production has been nearly 50 per cent, and the decline of coal mine employment slightly more than 50 per cent, the difference representing a small increase in ability to produce more coal per man shift.

I should like the minister to inform this committee if this statement is also true with regard to the production of coal in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

The minister has quoted certain figures which he has taken from page 5 of this report and which are based on the calendar year instead of the fiscal year. I should like to get from the minister the number of employees in each year, and also the average days worked per year, in the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coal mines from 1950 to 1960. The minister must have this information for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick because he has quoted from this report similar information relating to Canadian production.

There is a reference on page 4 of this report, as I have said, to the fact that the decline in Canadian coal production has been nearly 50 per cent. The facts are that from the year 1949 to 1957 the decrease in production in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coal mines was less than 500,000 tons, approximately 55,000 tons per year. In the last two years, the decrease in production in the same area, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, has been over 500,000 tons per year.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he mind repeating the figures on reduction in production?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes, I said that in the last two years, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the reduction has been approximately 500,000 tons per year. These figures are confirmed on page 39 of the annual report, a copy of which the hon. member probably does not have in his hands, although he should have it because he is keenly interested in the coal problem and the latest information should be made available to him.

Mr. MacInnis: I asked for the figures on production for the years before that.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Robichaud: One at a time.

Mr. Woolliams: No, I want to ask a question. Is it not a fact that between 15 million and 20 million tons of coal about which the hon. member is talking came in from the United States during the time the Liberals were in power in this country?

Mr. Pickersgill: What has that got to do with production?

Mr. Robichaud: The figures I have quoted have nothing to do with imports into Canada. I have quoted the production figures.

On page 6 of this report, it is stated:

> In the year under review, 1959-60, total coal consumption in Canada suffered a further decline to 24,414,000 tons—the lowest consumption figure since 1933.

Further on, it says:

> It is perhaps noteworthy that the only category of coal consumption which did not show a decline during 1959-60 was the requirements of coking plants. In this case, there was a million ton increase in consumption, attributable to the high level of activity in Canadian steel plants during the year. There will almost certainly continue to be a need, probably a growing need, for metallurgical coal.

This report states there will be a growing need for metallurgical coal. The minister should give this committee further details on the expectations for an increased market for this particular coal. On what is this statement based? What is the reason for arriving at such a conclusion? The minister should inform this committee what proportion of the increase, if there was a million ton increase in the consumption of this coal in 1959-60, was met by coal produced in the maritime provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. We should also like to know from the minister, if he has this information, what quantity of Nova Scotia coal was sold in Ontario during the year ending March 31, 1961.

I noted that the report to which I have referred states that the amount sold in Ontario in 1960 was about the limit that could be reached. If I recall correctly, the minister referred to this fact in his statement. The minister has said, in this house and outside, on numerous occasions that his main hope for an increase in the sale of coal remained in the province of Ontario. I think the minister should take advantage of this opportunity to clarify this statement.

Further on in this report, on page 11, it is stated:

> In the maritime provinces there was also a sharp increase in 1959 in residual oil consumption and imports.

The minister and the dominion coal board should have information as to the quantity of residual oil which was imported into the maritime provinces in 1959. We should like to know also if the minister has the same figures for 1960.

No doubt the minister is aware of a request that was presented to the government by the United Mine Workers of America asking for a one cent per gallon increase in the tariff on imports of oil. The amount so collected could be used to protect the coal industry. We would appreciate knowing from the minister what the position of the government is with regard to this request.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it was on August 20, 1959, that the Prime Minister made an announcement appointing a royal commission to study the coal problem. In referring to the appointment of this commission, here is what the 1959-60 report of the dominion coal board has to say:

> The announcement said "the government feels the coal problem is a special one and so urgent as to require a special inquiry rather than consideration to be given as part of the general problem relating to sources of energy which is the field of investigation of the Borden commission on energy". After reviewing the additional subvention assistance provided both for maritime coal and the expansion of export shipments of western coal, the statement expressed the view that subsidies can do no more than temporarily meet the problem and indicated that recommendations to assure a long term solution would be expected of the new royal commission. Detailed terms of reference and the personnel of the royal commission would be announced at a later date.

That announcement was made on October 6 of the same year. It is very clear that the subventions have only been introduced to meet temporarily the problems indicated in the recommendations. The minister has admitted this fact in his statement this evening and he said that following the receipt of the report of the interdepartmental committee he will soon make long term recommendations with regard to a long term policy. I hope that the recommendations to be made by the minister in the name of the government will not be delayed further. We know that as from yesterday one mine in Cape Breton has closed its doors, that another one will close on July 1, and that a third one will close on August 31 next year. It was made very clear in the Rand commission recommendation that if closures had to take place, action should be taken by the government in order to take care of the miners who were displaced by such closures. I am not 100 per cent in favour of the recommendations of the Rand report. I agree that this is not the first time that coal mines have been closed. The dominion bureau of statistics weekly bulletin for March 10, 1961 has this to say:

> Number of coal mines in operation in 1959 dropped to 133 from 158 in 1958,—

A drop of 25 in one year.

> —employees to 11,485 from 13,162—

A drop of almost 2,000 in one year.

> —and salaries and wages to $37,123,000 from $42,250,000.

A drop of almost $5 million in the period of one year.

But the fact remains, Mr. Chairman, that some action should be taken to protect these miners who are being displaced and will be displaced by the closing of the coal mine. The position of the Liberal party was made clear in this house as early as July 1, 1958, by our leader when he recommended, as found at page 1807 of Hansard of that date:

> (1) An intensive and comprehensive program of scientific and industrial research to find more uses for coal and help bring about expanded employment;
> (2) Further measures to encourage greater production and marketing including more flexible uses of subventions to move coal to markets within and without the maritime area;—

The last recommendation was as follows:

> (4) A specific and immediate plan of co-operation with the provincial governments to promote industrial enterprises to diversify the economy and increase employment opportunities.

This is a "must" if the areas affected by the closing of these coal mines are to be looked after. The government has received a number of recommendations. I have here a resolution from the Catholic clergy in the industrial area of Cape Breton with regard to the proposed closure of the coal mines. This was presented to the Prime Minister and to the premier of Nova Scotia. May I be allowed to quote just a few of the recommendations included in this resolution. The first reads:

> In view of the particular economic situation in this area and of the general economic condition throughout Canada, it is imperative that if three mine closures must come, they should be staggered over a five or ten year period.

This is in line with the recommendation of the Rand commission and with the policies which we have been advocating in this chamber since 1958. Further on the resolution states:

> Because of the relationship between scientific resource development and industrial progress in this region, we strongly recommend the establishment of permanent research facilities for the three important industries of coal, forestry and fishing.

This again is in line with what we have been urging in this chamber for the last three years. Further on we find this recommendation:

> Long term incentive legislation, to be established by the federal government for attracting secondary industry in the Atlantic region should receive determined support at all government levels.
> Similarly, support should be given to the setting up of a capital projects commission for hte Atlantic region.

The position of the Liberal party on this particular recommendation is well known. The last recommendation is as follows:

> The improvement of our economic situation demands the utmost co-operation between labour, industry, the various levels of government and the public generally. To this end we pledge our entire resources and good-will. We strongly feel that there is hope for the future of this area, if these recommendations are implemented forthwith, but we also emphasize that this hope is seriously endangered by a policy of premature and drastic closures.

I have here the Halifax Chronicle-Herald—

Mr. MacEwan: Will the hon. member permit one short question at this point?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes.

Mr. MacEwan: Can he advise the committee of the names of those who signed the resolution or the petition to which he referred?

Mr. Robichaud: I do not have here the signatures on the resolution, but a copy bearing signatures was presented to the Prime Minister and I think it has been referred to in this house in questions which were addressed to the Prime Minister asking if such a resolution had been received.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What date was it?

Mr. Robichaud: I have not the date here but I know I can get it. The resolution has been presented and questions have been asked in the house. When I take my seat I think I can find out and give the minister the information.

I have the Halifax Chronicle-Herald for Wednesday, May 31, in which we find the unfortunate news: "Displaced Miners Register with Unemployment Insurance Commission Tomorrow". That is the subheading which appears under the main heading: "Curtains for Caledonia". I will not refer to that part of the news but further down we find this. I mentioned the resolution which was presented by the Catholic clergy from the Cape Breton area. This item has as its title: "Bishop Urges Churchmen Remember Miners Plight". It is dated from Sydney and it reads in part as follows:

Deep concern for the people affected in the coal mine closures and a call to the church to recognize its responsibilities to its people in their need, was sounded Tuesday by Rt. Rev. R. H. Waterman, Bishop of Nova Scotia, in his charge to clergy and laity meeting in the shadow of the province's economic crisis for their annual synod.

"We cannot remain indifferent or unconcerned about the welfare of our brothers in this populous area of our province and our diocese," Bishop Waterman said, "Our deepest concern, in this and other areas is lest people should be forgotten in a concern for profits."

There is set out, then, the recommendation which I will not take the time of this committee to read. It shows the grave concern of the areas which are affected following the closure of these mines.

I have here a copy of a telegram which was addressed to the Prime Minister under date of May 24, 1961. This telegram is signed by mayor R. F. Gilroy and A. J. Mason, chairman of the citizens' committee of the town of Springhill. I think it should be placed on record because it has to do with the displacement of coal miners. It reads as follows:

Sir, according to press reports, you and your government are prepared to take immediate action to alleviate the economic depression which is bound to occur in Cape Breton as a result of the proposed closures of mines by the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. Such action on your part is commendable indeed. Evidence of the priority which you are prepared to give to this important matter is the fact that the special committee appointed by you consists of no less than five ministers of cabinet rank. This committee is working in conjunction with Charles Vaughan who has been specifically appointed by premier Robert Stanfield to deal with the same matter. In view of the fact that a special delegation from Springhill recently presented a brief to some of those same cabinet ministers regarding the deplorable situation existing in Springhill also resulting from Dosco's closing of all our mines here over four years ago, our citizens in Springhill are disappointed that you did not see fit to take similar action during 1958 and 1959 on behalf of the then 900 unemployed miners of this community. We respectfully submit that a first priority for economic relief of distressed communities in Nova Scotia should be given the Springhill area in order to fulfil the assurances regarding the economic rehabilitation of this community and its brave people made by your government and the government of the province of Nova Scotia immediately following the mine disasters of 1956 and 1958. Respectfully submitted on behalf of the town council, the citizens' industrial committee, the board of trade, the Lions club, the local union No. 4514, and citizens, following a meeting held Tuesday, May 23, 1961.

There is certain proof of a plea to the government from the citizens of the areas concerned to take some definite action to remedy this most unfortunate situation. In his announcement on Tuesday, May 30, as reported at page 5567 of Hansard, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys mentioned two measures which were being introduced to partly take care of the situation. As a result I am glad to hear that one of the mines will extend its operations for a period of one year, but unfortunately the other two mines will probably close as scheduled.

In making this announcement the minister stated:

These two measures are being introduced to deal with the specific and immediate situation in the coal mining areas. The government of Canada is continuing to study the long term problems involved and the recommendations on the subject by the royal commission on coal, and further announcements will be made from time to time.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister not to delay these announcements; not to wait a period of four or five months, as he has done, to notify the house that he has received the report of the interdepartmental committee which was appointed to study the recommendations of the Rand report.

As I said before, I do not entirely agree with the recommendations of the Rand report. They would seriously affect the coal mines of New Brunswick. It appears that should the recommendations be implemented as such, the New Brunswick coal producers would be at a disadvantage compared with the Nova Scotia producers. The spread in subsidy payments between the two provinces is too apparent and will certainly be discriminating against the New Brunswick coal producers.

Furthermore, there is another recommendation in the Rand report to which there is objection. That is the restriction of subsidy payments to operators producing over 50,000 tons per year and the freezing in connection with existing operators to the maximum tonnage of the past three years. This will in effect prevent the modernization of present-day mining methods in the New Brunswick coal fields.

I may have further remarks to make on this matter, Mr. Chairman, but I feel I should resume my seat at this time. Again I wish to thank the minister for his statement and I urge the government to take definite action, not next year but at once, and evolve a long term policy which will take care of the displaced miners and will not only have the effect of further delaying closures of the Cape Breton mines.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the remarks made in favour of assistance to the coal mines and the coal miners of Nova Scotia. I think hon. members from all parts of the country recognize that there is a serious situation affecting the coal mines in Nova Scotia. I think all of us support the vote that is being requested, and if there is criticism of the vote it will be that the amount is not adequate to deal with the conditions in that area.

In outlining in a very detailed way the purposes of the vote and the conditions in coal mines generally across the country, I think the minister held out very little hope for the future of the coal mining industry or coal miners themselves. When you take the minister's statement of this evening in conjunction with earlier announcements, it appears to me that the government, far from evolving a long term coal policy that would maintain the production of the coal industry in an efficient manner, is damning and condemning this industry to complete disaster and a final and complete shutting down. I do not think there is any other interpretation that hon. members can place upon the remarks made by the minister.

The minister says the government is working on a long term program; that the government is working on long term solutions; but as the government works on these so-called long term solutions it is allowing one mine after another to be closed down, the industry wrapped up and in very large part terminated.

I think it is difficult for anyone to argue in favour of maintaining an industry that is uneconomic and inefficient; but even if one should put this industry in that category I think there are particular reasons why the suffering that comes from a further shutdown in the mines should not be allowed.

I can see no economic advantage to the nation in closing down the Caledonia mine, putting the miners on relief and allowing suffering among the unemployed. The only way you can deal with the coal mining situation in a fair and equitable manner is in a full employment economy, and as long as there is widespread unemployment in the maritime provinces, and in Nova Scotia in particular, all the government's policy does is compound the misery that now exists.

As strongly as I can I want to tell the government that its policy is a failure as far as Nova Scotia is concerned. It is a failure as far as parliament is concerned. It is an admission of failure to keep on postponing this so-called long term policy while step by step the government allows the mines to be shut down, the industry wrapped up and the unemployed coal miners to suffer.

Many studies have been made of the coal mining industry in the past; many reports have been brought forward. One would expect that the government would take the information contained in these reports, come to some conclusions, announce a policy and go forward with that policy.

I tried on an earlier occasion this session by way of a motion to have the Vissac report made available to the house. This, the government refused to do. It buried the report. It concealed another report. It made this a secret document on the grounds that it was interdepartmental or had been prepared by a member of the coal board. I should like to know from the minister if he will tell me some of the recommendations contained in the Vissac report and why the government has felt it wise to cover up or conceal the recommendations which it contained. I understand that while that report has not been disclosed in the House of Commons, in the areas affected it has been in circulation and is relatively well known at least to some people who are closely connected with the industry.

I have in my hand a report of the royal commission on coal, 1959, and I could deal with it in various stages. I have been informed that this is the Vissac report. Looking through it I see nothing which would warrant the government concealing it. I cannot myself vouch that it is the Vissac report, but someone sent it to me through the mail and said that is what it is. The minister can deny, if he likes, that it is the report. There are some important recommendations in this document. The authors say that deep shafts must be put down near the water's edge if the mines are to be efficient. This, they say, is the way to cut down costs in the industry and enable it to carry on efficiently.

The proposals are contained in part 3 and they appear on page 27 of this document. The first item is headed "Subventions". This, I imagine, would give the minister sufficient information for him to be able to confirm or deny, if he wishes to do so, that this is the Vissac report. I think a report of this kind should be made available to all members of the house when the coal industry is being considered. I think we should be in possession of all the information that is available. I see nothing here which would suggest to me that the government is warranted in having concealed this document. My motion having been turned down in the House of Commons I am pleased that someone—I do not know who—should have put this in the mail and sent it to me with a note saying, this is the Vissac report.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question? In reviewing the so-called Vissac report has he found in it any solution to the problem faced by the Nova Scotia miners?

Mr. Argue: I would say there are some suggestions—

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Argue: I think some of the suggestions as to increasing the efficiency of the industry are important. But that is an appropriate question for the hon. member to address to the minister. The minister is the person responsible. He has the report. He would not give it to us. He has it, so ask the minister what he thinks is wrong with the Vissac report. Apparently he does think something is wrong because he has not brought in a policy. To one who is not an expert on the coal industry this report does seem to contain some suggestions which warrant consideration and which call for a statement from the minister.

I think the government has adopted the worst possible attitude. The attitude taken by the government is to drift, to postpone, to procrastinate, to allow, as it did yesterday, one of the coal mines to end its operations, putting miners out of work. The only concrete policy the government has as far as I know is the establishment of a scheduled date for the closing of two more mines. If the government is going to need time—it may need time; it may need more time than it has got—in order to formulate a policy I say that during that time coal miners should not be put out on the street. When the government says it intends to formulate a long range policy to deal with this situation I contend that in the meantime the mines should be kept in operation and the miners should be kept in employment. They should not be put out of work while the government continues to procrastinate and postpone.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit a question? Coming from a coal mining constituency in Alberta I have listened with great interest to the hon. member for Assiniboia. Would he say that the strip miners who can produce at 50 per cent less cost than the coal miners who work in the mines, should be prevented from stripping coal and doing it at 50 per cent of the cost? I am interested in the hon. member's answer.

Mr. Argue: Only a man with legal training could take a question like that with real seriousness.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order. I would say on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, that if the leader or the hopeful leader of the C.C.F. party does not know the answer to that question it is clear he knows nothing about coal mining in western Canada.

Mr. Argue: I did not think even the hon. member for Bow River would support so strongly the statement I made a moment ago, namely that only a legal mind such as his could concoct a question like that. Then he rose on a phony point of order, as even he is aware. This is the same old question. The hon. member says that if we are going to help the coal mniers of Nova Scotia we are bound to do damage to coal miners who are stripping coal instead of mining deep coal. That is the answer of the Tory party. It is the nearest thing to a policy I have heard tonight. Evidently there is no unity in the Tory party on this question. It is obvious that the hon. gentleman is not expressing support for an improvement of the disastrous conditions which affect the coal miners of Nova Scotia.

On other occasions this session I have asked the minister whether the government was making any progress in discussions with the Ontario hydro commission for the further use of coal in new plants which are being constructed. I should like to repeat that question tonight for the record. I should like to have a report from the minister on what progress is being made to develop a larger market with the Ontario hydro for Nova Scotia coal.

It has already been said that a capital development commission is necessary for the maritimes. I suggest that one way the government could deal with this whole situation would be to provide a large sum of money for a maritime development commission. This money could be used to assist the mines, to assist in the development of new industries, to improve economic conditions in Nova Scotia and the maritimes generally so that unnecessary hardship of this kind could be avoided.

I criticize the government not for what it is doing, but for what it is not doing, for its lack of policy and its failure to tell parliament what its policy will be, and its failure in the meantime to prevent suffering, loss of employment and loss of income among the miners until such time as the government has formulated a long term policy.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. He has taken his seat but will he answer one question. What will he do about the Alberta soft coal in the bituminous areas which is in competition with natural gas and petroleum. Natural gas is now being used to heat the farms and the homes in urban centres where coal was used for this purpose. What would the hon. member do about this situation?

Mr. Argue: I can tell the hon. member that if it were my responsibility there would be a policy in very short order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why not ask the hon. member what he would do?

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member for Assiniboia is an hon. gentleman who has been brought to the attention of hon. members as the potential leader of this so-called New party. I call to his attention the fact that according to the C.B.C. the other evening the other potential leader of the party announced that he had no intention of running in the riding of the hon. member for Assiniboia, and that he is not going to shoulder the hon. member aside. The hon. member can rest assured that he will have a riding to run in. He is not going to be shouldered aside.

The hon. member has indicated that if he had the opportunity to bring it about a policy would be announced in a very short time. I call his attention to the fact that the other potential leader has already announced his views on the coal situation. At a seminar in Montreal very recently he said he considered that coal was obsolete. This makes him very popular with the Cape Breton miners.

Mention was made of the Vissac report. I should like to take a few moments to say a few words on that report. Mr. Rand was considered an outstanding man in the labour field. He was appointed as chairman of the royal commission on coal. Everybody was in agreement on that. His reputation was such that we believed we could expect a very fine report from this gentleman. Of course, in all fairness, let it be said that the Prime Minister could not be accused of being politically partisan about the choice. We all know the political affiliations of Mr. Rand.

Following the presentation of the report, an interdepartmental committee was set up to study it. Is it any wonder that the committee has taken as long as it has to come to a decision on a report such as this? I passed my opinion on the Rand report 2½ hours after I saw it for the first time. I had made up my mind that it was not what we could rightfully expect. I call the committee's attention for a moment to page 15 of the report. This is what we find:

> What are left to these three modes of energy, apart from metallurgy and the chemical field, are large space heating, fuel for light and heavy industry, and thermal power. On the assumptions mentioned, if not at the moment, then within ten or fifteen years, in these there will probably be a field of competition into which coal may more effectively enter.

Anybody who studies the report can turn to pages 24 and 25 where this will be found:

> Within a period of say 15 years, supporting alternative sources of economic activity may be at a level permitting such a reduction without severe dislocation of men or community.

This is a direct contradiction of what the commissioner said 9 or 10 pages previously. If we turn to page 42 we shall find a further contradiction. Here the commissioner goes on to say:

> What may be suggested is that beyond 10 or 15 years—

The same number of years as mentioned previously in which he stated that coal could more effectively enter the market. I continue:

> What may be suggested is that beyond 10 or 15 years coal may be pushed still further into the background of fuels.

This is only a very slight indication of the number of contradictions that are to be found in this report. Is it any wonder that an interdepartmental committee had to take so much time to decipher what is meant? I should like to point out for the benefit of hon. members that the interdepartmental committee was set up to study the financial recommendations of the report and nothing else. The terms of reference of the committee did not contain anything whatsoever with respect to the closing of any collieries. They were specifically directed to study the financial recommendations of Mr. Rand.

Now the Vissac report comes into the picture. What happened was that the coal board was studying the Rand report. They found that it was not an easy task for a group of men sitting around a table to exchange ideas and put them across in that type of meeting. Therefore it was decided that each individual would take it upon himself to make a finding on the report and then exchange their findings among the group. This so-called Vissac report seemed to have everything.

I corresponded with the chairman of the dominion coal board and was advised by the then chairman, Mr. Uren, that this report was not to circulate outside the confines of the coal board itself. It was a departmental document and was not available to me at that time as a member of parliament. I had serious doubts as to whether or not it was confined within the board or department. In fact, I might go so far as to say I was quite sure it was circulated in Nova Scotia. Following upon the receipt of the correspondence from Mr. Uren I sent forward this information. That is the only thing I could have done. I was instructed that the report was circulated nowhere outside the board and was not available to me. I passed on this information to different locals. After I had done so it was brought to my attention by the executive of the united mine workers that they would send the report on to me in order to bring me up to date on what was going on in Ottawa.

The minister of mines in the Nova Scotia legislature had a copy of this report. He was asked to table it but he did not do so. He informed the Nova Scotia legislature that it was given to him as a confidential document and therefore he could not table it. I therefore suspect that everybody else who had it, had it under a confidential arrangement.

I have asked the hon. member for Assiniboia whether he found anything in the Vissac report pertaining to the situation in Nova Scotia that would give him any satisfaction. He said he found certain recommendations in the report which he felt would be of assistance if they were implemented. I would call to his attention the fact that he is not in agreement with the executive of the united mine workers because they made it quite clear as of November of last year that they had the report available and did not circulate it among the miners to whom they were supposed to be directing their assistance. At no time did they bring it to the attention of the local unions. They could not have been of the opinion that the Vissac report—

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. It has been said I made the statement that this report contained solutions to the coal mining industry problem. This question was asked of me when I was speaking and I said I thought there were sufficient recommendations in the report to warrant—

Some hon. Members: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Argue: —this question being directed to the minister. I wanted to know from the minister if he thought it contained any valuable recommendations.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member is confused and the committee realizes he is by his own confession no expert on coal. Therefore I think he would depend on the information fed to him by the party supporters who are also among the executive directors of the united mine workers who have sat on that report since last November. They had it in their possession and if there was anything in it of any value to the miners of Cape Breton it was their solemn duty to circulate it among the men locally so they could have had the benefit of anything that Mr. Vissac saw fit to write. They failed to do that. I was ridiculed for not being able to get hold of the Vissac report in order to make it available to the members of the united mine workers but the same executive officers who saw fit to ridicule me admitted later that the report was available in their own executive offices last November. If it was as valuable as they claimed it was, why did they not use it among the miners?

I should like to come back to the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester. Again we have had the rendition of a speech written by someone else.

Mr. Robichaud: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I had no written speech.

Mr. MacInnis: I will have to apologize to the hon. member. However, in lieu of more appropriate words may I say I am greatly surprised that one person should put together such a mess of inaccuracy. There was nothing accurate about anything he had to say other than the resolutions and correspondence he read which had been sent to him from Nova Scotia.

The hon. member made reference to production. He quoted some figures and he pointed out to the committee how the mining industry was backsliding. I should like to quote from Tuesday's Hansard certain statements with respect to conditions in the Nova Scotia mines. I should like first of all to call attention to the fact that not only did this member set himself up as an expert on coal mines but this self-advertised, self-appointed coal critic for the official opposition has made but one visit to Cape Breton, has seen the operations in Cape Breton on only one occasion and to my knowledge has never returned. Yet he has advertised himself and set himself up as the coal critic for the official opposition. I should like to call attention to page 5567 of Hansard and what the hon. member said following the minister's announcement last Tuesday. The hon. member said in part:

> However, as the minister indicated, this is an alternative assistance to prevent the immediate closure of the mines involved—

It is clearly indicated here, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. gentleman has no interest whatsoever because the minister's announcement in no way contained any assurance that the mines involved were going to be saved. If he had any interest in this particular matter he would have known that over a week ago the local papers carried the story that the Caledonia colliery would close not today, as he indicated this evening, but yesterday. If he had any personal interest in the Cape Breton mines he would have been aware of the fact that it was carried in the public press last week that the mines would be closed. The hon. member also said last Tuesday:

> The house and the country know very well that as early as 1958, at the time of the first major post-war shutdown—

He has tried to indicate to the house and to the country, Mr. Chairman, that the first major post-war shutdown took place in 1958 after the present government had taken office. I should like to bring him up to date on what has gone on. I have a list here that will show clearly not only to the house and the country but especially to the hon. member for Gloucester just when these shutdowns started and what was done about the matter or, to put it more accurately, what was not done about it. The list covers a total of 34 mines in the province of Nova Scotia which were closed between 1946 and 1956 under a Liberal administration that did not even see fit to call a coal conference.

I might even go further and say that when the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, decided to call the premiers to Ottawa for a dominion-provincial conference Mr. Henry Hicks, the then premier of Nova Scotia, did not even attend the conference for the purpose of discussing coal problems or any other problems. He saw fit to go to a Liberal rally at Lunenburg. When the miners were faced with a problem in 1956 the same Mr. Hicks referred to them as wildcatters and told the miners at a meeting the following day that they could not expect him to forgo his election commitments to meet with them. That is the type of treatment we got from the Liberals between 1946 and 1956. The hon. member for Gloucester likes to refer to 1958 but I will bring him up to date with respect to what happened during that period.

Broughton mine closed in December, 1949. Dominion No. 1B closed in July, 1955, Dominion No. 2 in December, 1949, Dominion No. 11 in November, 1949, Dominion No. 24 in October, 1953. I might say that among these were some of the biggest producers in the coal fields. Lloyds No. 7 closed in April, 1956, Sullivan closed in March, 1946, Bras d'Or No. 5 in February, 1946, Franklin in May, 1957, Springhill No. 1 in July, 1954, Springhill No. 4 in November, 1956. May I say here that I am not referring to the Springhill closures in the same sense as other closures primarily because these mines were forced to close as the result of very serious and sorrowful disasters. Hillcrest closed in March, 1947, Filor in March, 1955, Jubilee in October, 1951, River Hebert in October, 1948, Riverside in August, 1951, Strathcona No. 2 in March, 1947, Waddell in November, 1952, Chignecto in May, 1948, Acadia No. 7 in October, 1947, Albion and McGregor in January, 1957, Allan in June, 1951, Wadden in January, 1953, Milford No. 2 in February, 1957, Campbell No. 1 in January, 1958, Chimney Corner in October, 1952, Inverness in September, 1951, Macdonald No. 1 in March, 1952, Macdonald No. 2 in January, 1953, Macdonald No. 3 in April, 1955, Macdonald No. 5 in March, 1953, MacEachern in December, 1953, Mabou in October, 1951, McLellan in December, 1957, Rosebank No. 1 in May, 1946, Rosebank No. 2 in April, 1957, Rosebank No. 5 in March, 1957, McDonald (Chestico) in March, 1949 and Kemptown in November, 1947.

That list clearly answers the reference of the hon. member for Gloucester to closures in 1958 and proves once and for all that the Liberals were the ones who laid down on the job and did nothing whatsoever to prevent any of those mines closing. I apologize for repetition but perhaps I might say something about the coal policies of the former administration. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate likes to take exception to this but he was asked to apologize publicly in a front-page editorial. On a number of occasions he asked for the reference to this editorial and I gave it to him some time ago. He can clearly see for himself that he has been asked to apologize publicly for taking exception to the remarks of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member a question. He has just said that he gave me that editorial. Can he tell me when he gave it to me?

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member has quite purposely misinterpreted what I said. I did not say I gave him the editorial. I said that I gave him an indication of where the editorial was to be found, the reference.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was in a newspaper.

Mr. MacInnis: I gave him the date. I might point out to the hon. member that it cost me approximately $2.50 to get it for myself and he has the same opportunity. I was interested enough to get it in the form of a wire.

Mr. Pickersgill: I got mine free.

Mr. MacInnis: I notice you got it the cheap way. I was going to refer to the former prime minister's policy on coal. He wanted to leave it in the ground for future generations in order to manufacture synthetic materials.

Mr. Pickersgill: That statement is false.

Mr. MacInnis: He said to leave it in the ground. I might also point out to the hon. member something that was carried in the public press, that the former minister of fisheries received threats that he would be ridden out of a Nova Scotia town on a rail because of his remarks about the coal industry. I should like to hear the hon. member defend that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I realize what I have said here this evening has not done anything on behalf of the Nova Scotia miners. However, I am quite sure hon. members opposite would not dare go down to Cape Breton and tell the miners what they did because the miners are well aware of what they did not do. These remarks I have made have done nothing to alleviate the situation.

I am very sorry to hear that the colliery in which I worked prior to coming to Ottawa has been closed down. I should like to say that at all times I have put forth every effort to prevent the collieries from closing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: I might say that in January of this year I made a remark for which I was severely criticized. No doubt the opposition has been made aware of this situation. I made the remark that I did not think the 800 miners at Caledonia were getting the support from their executive officers which they could rightly expect. There has been a rumour circulating at home within the last month or so that one colliery was going to be saved. I am very grateful to the minister and to this government for the efforts they have made to save this colliery. There is no doubt that it is the largest producer of the group, and if this mine were to close it would have a most disastrous effect. I am most grateful to the government for the efforts expended on behalf of this one mine.

I was severely criticized for saying the union executive was not giving the men the support they could rightly expect. The rumour which was spread throughout Cape Breton in recent weeks has become a fact. There is no doubt in my mind that arrangements were made between the union executive and the Dominion Coal Company in order to bring about a local preference. Once again, I want to mention the saving of one colliery because it is my belief that the union executive acted in bad faith when they did not continue to press for the continued operation of the three collieries. The executive should not have made any arrangement of any kind until the last shot was fired. They have indicated, by a local preference, that they were willing to give up on the other two collieries that were in danger. This is the type of representation we can expect from anybody who would support the New party.

I have continually pressed for the operation of these three collieries. So far as I am concerned, I have complete knowledge of the arrangement that has been made between the executive officers and the Dominion Coal Company. Now, the opposition may jump with glee, both the Liberals and the C.C.F., and say, "There is MacInnis making a statement that is going to be political suicide". I want to tell this committee, here and now, that my seat in this house does not mean as much to me as the operation of the mines in Cape Breton. If it takes political suicide on my part to bring out the truth in connection with this matter, I will bring it out. I would be doing a disservice to the miners and the different locals throughout Cape Breton if I did not make them aware of the fact they are not getting the representation from their union executive that they deserve.

What will come after this, Mr. Chairman? The remarks I have just made will be used over and over again during the election campaign. However, so far as I am concerned, I say again that the seat in the House of Commons does not mean as much to me as the welfare of these miners. I will bring out the truth now and any other time in respect of these conditions whenever I have an opportunity to do so; that is what I am doing now. The union executive failed the miners by not making representations down the line.

The hon. member for Gloucester referred to certain recommendations made by the union, namely the one cent tariff on imported oil. If anyone wishes to give this proposal consideration for a moment, he will realize that a tariff on oil imported into this country will do only one thing. It will increase the competition with which the coal industry is faced. This proposal will not do anything for the Canadian coal producer. If the tariff is such that it is going to knock off Canadian competition, it will only bring about an opportunity for the United States producers.

This leads me to the consideration of another point, Mr. Chairman. As early as 1952 and 1953, I advocated, in our own local union, that if Nova Scotia miners wanted to clear up the problems in respect of coal imported from the United States it was a matter of inter-union policy. At that time John L. Lewis in the United States had put himself into a position of co-operating with the coal mine owners by exporting coal and buying into the U.S. mothball fleet. My contention was that this made John L. Lewis a partner of the operators. If we wanted to avoid the importation of United States coal we could do it by working in our own backyard and getting after the president of our own international union.

This suggestion was ridiculed because there were those who put forward the argument, for their own purposes, that John L. Lewis was not an exporter of coal. I believe my opinion was confirmed within the last couple of weeks when John L. Lewis was found guilty by a United States court. This is a clear indication that his policies were in the interests of the large operators. I have made statements also to the effect that our own local union executive would be happy to see Mr. Lewis' policies inaugurated in Cape Breton; that is, fewer contented miners rather than a large number of discontented miners. I have been accused of being immoral and dishonest for making this statement, and yet these same union leaders went to the international convention but never thought about getting on their feet and telling Mr. Lewis that these same policies he had put into effect in the United States were immoral and dishonest. They never thought about that, yet they referred to my statement as immoral and dishonest.

There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, that a lot of these statements are going to be repeated. I hope they are, because I think it is about time the air was cleared in so far as the activities of the executive officers of the union in Cape Breton are concerned. I have been accused in the press of many things since the January 10 meeting. They have accused me of being immoral and dishonest. One executive member, the vice president, has taken it upon himself to refer to me as a non-thinker. He said I had often called him a thief and a liar publicly. For the benefit of this committee I am saying that I have never called this man a thief and a liar. I am only repeating here what I have said at local union meetings; I have never called him a thief and a liar. I did, however, on a number of occasions refer to him as a scab and a liar. I have repeated this publicly before union meetings, and I can substantiate that by written evidence.

There is no doubt that the opposition think I am digging a grave. This may be so. However, in digging that grave I hope to bring to the attention of the miners in Cape Breton that their executive have let them down and it is time the miners cleared them out. I thought we were going to hear from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate tonight.

An hon. Member: He is a fisherman.

Mr. MacInnis: Somebody says he is a fisherman. That may be true because all he spoke about down there was the tides that are running. They are running. Regardless of how he sees it, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate knows that they are not running strong enough. His party will possibly come to the same grief as did his ship not too many years ago.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Chairman, I should like once again to express my appreciation of the fact that at least this larger operation in Cape Breton has been salvaged for another year. It is my hope that developments will be such that in this year or possibly within a shorter time something may occur not only to save No. 16 colliery but Florence. Every effort on my part will continue, although the hon. member for Assiniboia seems to take objection to the fact that I have put forward certain efforts. He has denied the existence of certain correspondence. I invited other members of his party to rise in their places and deny that they had received this correspondence but they did not answer. After all, their preachments about and their interest in the coal mine situation is for one reason only and we are fully aware of what it is.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no desire to enter into the private quarrel between the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the officers of the U.M.W. in his riding. I will leave that matter to them. Nor have I any particular interest in traversing the history from the years 1946 to 1956—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I will not permit a question until—

An hon. Member: You cannot answer it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will not permit a question until I have finished my sentence. I say I have no particular interest in traversing the period from 1946 to 1956. However, if the hon. gentleman wishes it, I shall be very happy to do so before these estimates are passed. The situation with which we are faced today in Cape Breton ought to be talked about, not the situation existing between 1946 and 1956.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; if the hon. gentleman wishes to ask one.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate not agree that it was not I who started to traverse history but rather the hon. member for Gloucester?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not interested in arguing about that matter. What I am interested in is the fact that yesterday when I was in Sydney and Glace Bay a mine was closed. On August 1 another mine is going to be closed and hundreds of men are going to be thrown out of work with no alternative jobs. That is the situation in 1961.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: We in this committee cannot do anything about 1946 or 1956.

An hon. Member: You could have done something at one time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; and in 1946 and in 1956 a miner, if he lost a job in Cape Breton, could get a job in another mine, either in Cape Breton or somewhere else, and he did so because we had full employment in those days.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has just made a statement which is so far removed from the truth—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Another hon. Member: There is no point of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. If the hon. member for Cape Breton South alleges that there has been misrepresentation of his own remarks he may rise on a point of order and correct it. However, I do not see any point of order. It sounded more like a speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, as I say, I am interested in talking about a situation that ought to be regarded by the government of this country as a national emergency because here is an industry—I refer to the historic and basic industry of Nova Scotia—that is dying.

An hon. Member: You have killed it.

Another hon. Member: The Liberal party is dying, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hon. gentlemen are determined to have the history. May I say that I will give them the history. I will give it to them in two words. In 1957, the present Prime Minister of this country went about the province of Nova Scotia, led by the hand by the present premier of Nova Scotia—I refer to Mr. Stanfield—and promised the people of that province that he would increase coal production. He went all over the province and did that. He deceived those people and got their votes by his deception. That is the history. Because the then prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, was honest and truthful enough to say that he would not seek to increase coal production but that he would maintain it, he was misrepresented all over that area.

Mr. Pallett: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Will the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate take his seat?

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought I had the floor.

Mr. Pallett: I rose on a point of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): The parliamentary secretary has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member is so full of his own verbosity that he cannot hear. I rose on a point of order. It has been a long-established rule of the House of Commons that no allegation of deception shall be made against any hon. member. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should have enough experience to know that. I call upon him to withdraw that allegation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not regard that as being a point of order and I intend to continue. It does not seem to me that these interruptions we are getting from the other side are called for. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite do not want their conduct in the last four years to be exposed. They do not want their lack of policy to be exposed. They do not want their deception to be exposed.

Mr. Pallett: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that this point of order has not been disposed of.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not even understand what the hon. gentleman is alleging.

An hon. Member: We did not expect you to do so.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Denis: Withdraw the point of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I think perhaps the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate went a little bit further than he would normally go, judging by my knowledge of him as a member of this House of Commons. Perhaps he could modify his language in that regard in his remarks now and withdraw the rather pointed use of the words "deception" and "deceive".

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): May I continue? It appears that these other members think it was done with malice aforethought, so to speak, at the time. That imputation is not one that I should like to take from it. Possibly I misunderstood the hon. member. I know that he would want to withdraw the remarks if that is what he had in mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: If you, Mr. Chairman, think that I was suggesting that when the Prime Minister went about Nova Scotia promising to increase coal production, he deliberately did not intend to do it, may I say that I did not mean any such thing.

An hon. Member: You meant he had good intentions?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; we know the place that is paved with good intentions.

An hon. Member: And visions.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that the Prime Minister, led about the province of Nova Scotia by the present premier, promised to increase coal production. He did that. I have dozens of references to those promises all over the provinces. I said that in doing so he deceived the people into voting for him. That statement is a statement of fact.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: There has not been any increase in production. There has been a steady and increasing reduction of production which has followed. That is what I said. Of course, I do not think the Prime Minister knew enough about coal mining to have the faintest idea whether or not he could increase production. To quote one of the Prime Minister's colleagues, it was just another election promise. But my right hon. friend Mr. St. Laurent was also pilloried by both those gentlemen all over Nova Scotia—

Mr. Pallett: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —because he was honest enough and truthful enough to say—

Mr. Pallett: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member still has not withdrawn the remark about deception, and in fact he reiterated it. Your Honour has ruled that the hon. member has to withdraw the remark about obtaining votes by the use of deception, which is what the hon. member said and repeated. He knows this offends the rules. His emotions may be a little close to the surface because of the events of the last few days, but still he should act as a parliamentarian.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I still take the view that, as provided in Beauchesne's fourth edition, the applicable rule under citation 155 is as follows:

> It will be useful to give examples here of expressions which are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference. These may be classified as follows:
> 1. The imputation of false or unavowed motives.
> 2. The misrepresentation of the language of another and the accusation of misrepresentation.
> 3. Charges of uttering a deliberate falsehood.

The word "deliberate" was used by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Robichaud: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I never used the word "deliberate".

Mr. Robichaud: No; the hon. member said he did not use it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I thought I heard the hon. member use the words "deliberately deceived". However, the word "deceived" itself implies to the Chair that there was some knowledge, or that the promise was made knowingly as one that could not be fulfilled. I think the language could be modified and I would ask the hon. member if he would do that, as is his custom in this chamber.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want to waste any further time, sir, and therefore I will say, particularly as Your Honour helped me a bit by using the word "knowledge", that I do not think the Prime Minister had any knowledge of the subject when he made those promises. I think it was simply an irresponsible promise. I put it this way: The promise was that coal production would be increased; the fact is that it has steadily and increasingly gone down. I will accept whatever Your Honour likes to call that. You can substitute any word you like, and I should like to go on with my speech. The fact of the matter is that because the Tory party promised, and got votes by promising, to increase coal production, they have never dared to face the facts of this problem.

Mr. Pallett: Would the hon. member be good enough to give the reference of that particular statement to which he now refers.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman wants a few of them, I will give him lots of them and I will give them tomorrow in my own time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I refuse to be diverted by these—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —questions from the point I am seeking to make. The point I am seeking to make is that anybody has been able to see ever since that slow down, to which my hon. friend from Gloucester referred, in 1958—

Mr. Henderson: He was in the oil business.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, no doubt—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order.

Mr. Henderson: He was in the oil business; he wasn't interested in coal.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I think the hon. member who has the floor should be given a little more adequate hearing and I would ask the committee to refrain from these persistent interjections and hear him out.

Mr. Pickersgill: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I think it is really rather astounding, when you realize that the closing yesterday of this old mine that has been going for so many years and has provided a livelihood for so many of our fellow citizens leaving people with no alternative employment, seems to be a laughing matter to hon. gentlemen opposite. I can tell them it is no laughing matter in Cape Breton. I am anxious to speak about this matter seriously and about what should be done now, and hon. gentlemen seem much more interested in going into the past than in considering what ought to be done about it now.

Mr. Sevigny: What do you suggest?

Mr. Pickersgill: Allow me to make the suggestions, instead of constantly interrupting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: The plain fact is that this government does not want any suggestions about this or anything else. They got suggestions from Mr. Rand last October and immediately appointed another committee to consider his suggestions; and now they have appointed a third committee to consider the report of that committee, and they are going to postpone that until after these estimates are over so that parliament cannot discuss the problem.

They got some other committee to provide another report, which the hon. member for Cape Breton South properly said was concealed by this government from parliament but distributed to everybody else. I agree with the hon. member in protesting against the conduct of the government and its disrespect of parliament in that regard. The plain fact is the government do not want this subject debated. They do not want attention drawn to it; they emphatically do not want to do anything about it because they have not the foggiest idea what to do.

Mr. Sevigny: What do you suggest?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that if hon. gentlemen opposite had kept some of the promises they made in Moncton in 1957—

An hon. Member: We did.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and if they had set up the capital grants commission that they promised; if they had undertaken the program for the decentralization of industry that they promised—

An hon. Member: We did.

Mr. Pickersgill: —if they had arranged for the adjustment of freight rates that they promised; if they had given a preference in defence expenditures to that area which they promised, all those things could have helped the economy of Cape Breton over the last four years. But all those promises have been disregarded.

Mr. Sevigny: What about your own suggestions?

An hon. Member: They gave three-ring circuses.

Mr. Crouse: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has just made a statement that has no basis in fact. He said that none of these promises that were made in Moncton had been implemented—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not a point of order. Am I to be interrupted constantly?

Mr. Crouse: Practically all the Atlantic resolutions have been implemented and I have in my hands the Atlantic resolutions as advertised at that time.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. If the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has a question to ask the hon. member, that is in order; but he has not raised a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wish to go on.

Mr. Crouse: Practically all these resolutions have been implemented—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman has finished his babbling, may I go on? When I was interrupted I had cited four of the promises that were made at Moncton which have not been kept and which, if they had been kept, would have helped to stimulate the economy of the whole Cape Breton region. It is perfectly evident, and it has been perfectly evident, as the minister was honest enough to admit this evening,—

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: —that because of technological advances of one kind and another the demand for coal is decreasing—

Mr. Sevigny: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and it is not going to increase, but that is not what was said when hon. gentlemen opposite were trying to get themselves elected. They said it would increase. They deceived the people by telling them they would increase it.

Mr. Sevigny: What about your suggestions; we have not heard them?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: It is perfectly obvious, it seems to me—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has just made a statement that we made certain promises to get ourselves elected. I defy him or any other hon. member of this committee to pick out any such promises that I made. I made no election promises on coal or anything else.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Apparently the hon. member, who was at Moncton at that meeting—at least, his picture was there—did not read the resolutions that he—

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I thought this evening we were going to listen to something about coal, and all we have had is a lot of fishy information. I wonder whether we could get back to the subject matter.

An hon. Member: That is no point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, this is a new form of closure. We first have the mines closed and then, when a member gets up to speak about the closing of the mines, supporters of the government try to shut his mouth. That is the way the Tory party respects the rights of parliament.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): The hon. member talks about the closing of mines. I want to ask him—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Would the hon. member take his seat, please?

An hon. Member: Name him. Throw him out.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I shall have to ask hon. members to refrain from rising on excuses, fictitious or otherwise, to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor. I do not feel he has received a fair hearing and I would ask hon. members to refrain from rising on anything other than genuine points of order and also to refrain from making continuous interruptions which make it impossible for even the Chair to hear what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has to say.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I was saying—

Mr. Pallett: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. As I was saying, it has been known by the present government since 1958 that there was not available through any of the ordinary existing commercial channels a market for even the amount of coal which was then being produced. The government agreed, therefore, to a holiday in 1958 and production in one way or another has been decreasing ever since. It is true that some expedients have been used and the government has always had our support in these expedients, to lengthen the time of the operation and to lengthen the period during which this matter could be considered. Because the government asked for time, first by appointing a royal commission and then because certain other measures were being pursued, in order to find a solution to this problem, the opposition, I think, showed a great deal of patience. The government have known for 15 months that they were faced with the closing of two or three mines this spring. They have allowed one of them to close and they intend to allow another to close without having taken a single step to provide alternative employment of any kind for the men who are being displaced.

Mr. Sevigny: What do you suggest?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that the people elected to govern this country should govern it instead of asking the Liberals to do so. I suggest it was their duty many months ago to provide alternative employment and not to come here the day before the first mine is closed and say "Here is $1,500,000 to help these people but we do not know how to spend it; we invite suggestions."

Mr. Woolliams: Is this on coal?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it was in the minister's statement on coal but no doubt the hon. member was not here, or if he was here he was not listening. It is set out at page 5567 of Hansard.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You were not here.

Mr. Pickersgill: True, I was not here. I was down at the coal mines.

Mr. Pallett: Is the hon. member objecting to that expenditure?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I would just like to know exactly what the money is going to be spent on.

These are the minister's words as reported on page 5567:

> Parliament will therefore be asked to provide an amount of $1.5 million which will be set aside for approved projects to provide alternative employment this year in the Cape Breton area. Such projects will be considered on their individual merits taking into account the degree of participation by the province in each case.

Good Lord. They let the mine close, and the day before, they say, "We shall ask parliament to appropriate $1.5 million but we have not the faintest idea what will be done with it; we hope someone will come along with a few suggestions." That is the policy of this government. That is what they are asking us to support. That was all they could bring up the day before these men were thrown out of work.

There are all kinds of things that could be done in that area. Why do members opposite not carry out their promise to decentralize industry? They came in with the baby budget with its silly suggestion that if some places would call themselves distressed areas, and if the government were to agree that they were, and then if some company would come along and say it would build a plant there it would get double depreciation allowance for one year. They think that is going to result in the decentralization of industry.

Mr. Pallett: Tell us about the Gordon report.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Gordon report gave hon. gentlemen opposite one of the few good ideas they have ever had, the idea of a capital grants commission. If that capital grants commission had been established and put to work in the Atlantic provinces there would be jobs in Cape Breton now waiting to be done.

Mr. Pallett: There would be nobody left there at all.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at this moment. Everybody knows that the province of Nova Scotia has not proceeded nearly as fast as was hoped with the construction of the trans-Canada highway across Cape Breton.

Mr. Woolliams: What has this to do with coal?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member would only listen he would find out. That project is being held up because the government of Nova Scotia has not enough money to pay its 50 per cent. But if the suggestion put forward by members on this side every time the trans-Canada highway has been discussed in this house had been accepted, namely that in the Atlantic provinces 90 per cent of the cost should be borne by the federal government, that road would be well under way and there would be some work there.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): On a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely we are not going to have any more of this closure by phony points of order.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): It is not phony at all. The hon. member has been talking about the trans-Canada highway. I understand we are talking about coal. The hon. member has not mentioned in all this time the ten mines and the 10,000 people who were put out of work in the time of his regime in my constituency and I suggest he get back to the coal mining problem if he wants to talk on this subject.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I have heard the point of order but I think the hon. gentleman, under considerable difficulty, has been relating his oration reasonably well to the item under consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will relate it very directly. We have the Assoicate Minister of National Defence asking for suggestions as to what is to be done for these displaced miners, yet when one makes suggestions phony points of order are raised. The relationship is this—

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): There is no point of order. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Yes. I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has suggested that his remarks with regard to the trans-Canada highway were not out of order. What I am suggesting to him is that I have a number of coal miners—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I have heard the hon. member's question of privilege. I think it is unfair to the member who has the floor in that he has been interrupted on numerous occasions on points I have ruled on or points I could not have ruled on because they were neither points of order nor questions of privilege. I want the hon. gentleman to remain in his seat please because there is very little time left for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and I think he should be allowed to complete his speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: In his opening speech on the coal board this afternoon the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys told us frankly and straightforwardly—and I think it is the first time a spokesman for the government has ever done this—that the coal industry was going down hill, and it was going to continue to go down hill, and that there was going to be less and less employment in the coal industry. He indicated that the problem was to try to slow down this decline, with which we agree, of course, and also to try to find jobs for the people who were going to lose their jobs as miners. Surely nothing could be more important; surely nothing could be more relevant to this item, and surely no hon. member should try to prevent from speaking any member who is trying to suggest some solution of that problem. This I find hard to understand.

I say that if that highway were being built now there would be work. I say that if some of these suggestions Mr. Justice Rand made had been implemented at once they would have provided work. This government cannot make up their minds to do anything about those problems. They cannot decide even to do something that would do them great credit if they would only do it.

I say, sir, that while we should seek in every possible way, by the diversion of government purchases, by assistance in any kind of useful works to provide a stopgap, I do not think any of us, having in mind the history of Nova Scotia, and having in mind the position of Cape Breton island, can placidly contemplate the steady decay of that old industrial complex there. Surely we have enough energy and enough public initiative, if there is not enough private initiative for it, to get some secondary industry established there and provide some real incentives to do it.

Mr. MacInnis: You never did.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman says that we never did. We made a proposal in 1957, and if it had been carried out in the form in which it was made it would have provided for the consumption of a very considerable quantity of coal which is now being consumed in the dominion, because our proposal was that those thermal plants should be owned by the federal government and not by the provincial governments or power companies, and the federal government could have afforded for a number of years to bear the carrying charges to operate them if necessary at a loss in order to give a stimulus to the region. But what happened? For reasons which I have never been able to understand, the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick first accepted that proposal enthusiastically and then changed their minds and said they did not want it that way. They wanted those plants to be provincially owned. What happened in New Brunswick? The thermal plant does not use coal at all. The Minister of Forestry, who was then the premier of that province, notwithstanding this great coal problem, allowed them to use oil instead. This is what this government has contributed to the solution of this problem in that particular respect. It is true the Trenton plant has been completed but nothing more has been done.

The hon. gentleman asked for suggestions. I have another suggestion. I suggest that for a period of years the federal government should agree to provide electricity at no cost for a number of secondary industries in Cape Breton.

Mr. MacInnis: Walter Gordon would not go for it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am suggesting—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. He will have another opportunity at another time.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I have been very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and particularly in the remarks of the aspiring leader of the C.C.F.-New party group or whatever they wish to call themselves, because I could take both of them down into the constituency of Bow River and show them a graveyard in which they erected the stones in reference to the coal mining industry. If they had listened on July 25, 1955 to the then leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Drew, the coal mines of western Canada might not be in the mess they are in today.

I should like to have had the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate campaigning in the Bow River constituency in 1957. The Liberal party had an outstanding candidate, a man of integrity, from Acme, Alberta, campaigning in that riding and he was not able to collect together enough people in the coal mining areas to fill a clothes closet because they were entirely deserted by the former administration. The reason he was unable to get together a small group was that the former government did nothing for the coal mining industry in western Canada. As early as—

Mr. Pickersgill: What have you done about it?

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member did not leave me much time, but if he will just bear with me I will tell him. I hope he will attend the House of Commons tomorrow because he will then see that we were able to get a market for 500,000 tons of coal—this is my answer to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—in Japan, a great new market, to give men and women in the province of Alberta jobs which they did not have when this government took office.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the house leader could confirm the business for tomorrow and Saturday and give us any indication he is able to for next week.

Mr. Churchill: The indication of the business for next week will be given, I hope, tomorrow night. For tomorrow we will carry on with the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, followed by secretary of state, followed by fisheries. If these three are concluded, then the Department of Public Works.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.
