THE CRIMES OF ST. MART'S.

Russell spent a curious week. He did not care the snap of his thumb for any of his relations; he had not any very near blood, yet he danced upon them all. Some of them moved in fashionable circles, and would have liked nothing better than to have lionized him. He submitted to dinner parties and luncheons, things that he abhorred; was even inveigled into two full-dress receptions.

He hunted up one set of relations, who were poor and lived on a flat. There were three or four growing girls in the family. He took them to the theatre one night, and to the opera another, and gave them a handsome Christmas present all around. He felt intensely amused at himself. He knew that he was emulating Martin Fairburn of whom he had always made fun. "At any rate, it is better than being a bear, and I have been nothing better for three years!" he said to himself. The family who lived upon the flat felt as if they had struck a bonanza. The growing girls talked about him all the time when they were awake, and dreamed about what magnificent things he would do next, when they were asleep.

He said to himself more than fifty times a day, "I have had just one idea for three years. What a fool I have been! Yet the one idea remained. He was determined to take part in things to become one with the busy world. To step squarely out of the past into the present. Yet despite his determination he kept remembering the incredulous smile with which Imogene had hidden him goodbye. He also kept remembering how she had looked a thousand times at him. There were some things a man cannot get rid of in a day. There are some things that cling to a man to his last day.

At length, one evening, when he was in a crowded drawing-room, and one of the crowd, as he assured himself, he began oddly to speculate as to when Imogene had commenced that process of heading over to Mrs. Adrian. At the time that he began to speculate, he was promiscuous with a leading belle. "The belle was doing the talking for at best Russell was a silent man. The more intensely he thought, the more intensely he seemed to listen. There is no flattery so subtle or so powerful as that of rapt attention. The young lady mentally added another to her long list of conquests, experiencing a mild form of the same pride that the Indians used to have in their number of scalps. At length some one came to claim her for a dance, and Russell, thus released, retired to a quiet corner to continue his speculation undisturbed.

"I am always thinking of her, if not in one way then in another," he thought, angrily. There was a fascination in this new speculation. It followed him all night in his dreams. Once he imagined that he was standing with her under the stars, and in a sort of fury, denuded of her when she commenced, and in answer she looked at him with the scorn she had at him that night three years ago, and said as she said then, "Diamonds are rare, crystals are cheap and valuesless."

The speculation and the dream together resulted in a fixed purpose. The next day being the day when he packed his satchel and took the afternoon train for Chatham. He arrived in the early twilight. Fairburn's coachman was at the depot to meet him with a cutter, saying the master had directed him to bring him to West Point, where the officers and cadets were having a ball. Russell preferred going alone, so leaving his satchel with the man, and getting explicit directions as to the road, he started. He was very much confused on the way, got off the right track several times, so that it was nine o'clock when he reached his destination. As he entered, shading his eyes from the glare of light, the first person who he distinctly saw was Imogene, waiting with an officer. He remembered Fairburn's description of her as "a shaft of light," and was in full evening costume. Mrs. Adrian was also waiting; she wore a cream-white satin, and looked spiritual. After standing awhile, he discovered Mrs. Fairburn at a distance, a delighted spectator. He had been present fully fifteen minutes before he saw Fairburn, who was standing not three feet from him, silent and sad. He took no part in the gay scene; like himself, he had become a mere looker-on. Russell stepped up and placed his hand on his shoulder. He started violently.

"I declare I'm ashamed of myself; I believe I'm growing nervous," he said, apologetically; then added, "But how late you are—I have been looking for you for more than an hour."

Russell did not explain that he had lost his way, but instead, asked, "Why are you not dancing?"

Martin shrugged his shoulders. "I am getting too old, that's the plain fact."

"I am a year older than you, yet I intend to dance," said Russell, gravely. "Do, old boy! Go right in!"

Russell laughed. "Time enough," he said. Just then the widow and an officer glided by.

"Martin, I wonder what Mrs. Adrian will do when she is an old lady?" he said.

"That's easily surmised. She will sit luxuriantly in a cushioned chair and command her willing subjects," was the ready reply. Then he relapsed into the gloomy silence which his friend had disturbed. Russell seemed determined not to leave him to himself, which was evidently what he desired.

"Martin, don't get the habit of staying on the outside of life—it is the worst thing a man can do."

"What do you know about it?" demanded the other, sharply; then added more mildly, as if ashamed of his ill-humor, "You've been in the midst of gaiety for years."

This time Russell shrugged his shoulders.

"For the last three years I have stood on the edge of the circle, a looker-on, just as you do this minute. I'm done with it. See, I'm going to dance with Miss Adrian this minute."

The officer had given her a seat, and was talking with her in very evident admiration. Russell went directly to her side. In the week he had been away he had got his self-poise past any power of hers to undo. Perhaps the woman recognized the fact. Fairburn fancied he saw her change color. The moment they passed him dancing, they waltzed about five minutes, then Russell led her to a seat. He felt thrilled to his finger tips, but was quite composed. Someone almost instantly clapped her hand, and he went back to Fairburn. He found him absorbed and silent. Presently he turned to him as if on joining the conversation they had been engaged in before the dance.

"And, Russell, what will Miss Adrian do when she is an old lady?"

Someone almost instantly clapped her hand, and he went back to Fairburn. He found him absorbed and silent. Presently he turned to him as if on joining the conversation they had been engaged in before the dance.

"And, Russell, what will Miss Adrian do when she is an old lady?"

Russell smiled.

"Like her sister-in-law, she, too, will sit in a cushioned chair, only she will take her grand-children on her knee and fondle them."

"You mean that she will be some man's wife?" said Fairburn.

"I wonder whom?" His tone was dismal.

Russell watched him much as a physician who is familiar with some dread disease watches the symptoms.

Imogene continued to dance and promenade for another hour, then again Russell sought her.

"Mrs. Adrian said you never looked bored. I think you look so to-night," he said, coolly.

"I feel as if I had been dancing a week," was her reply.

"Do you want to return to the stage?"

"Mrs. Adrian would not leave for the world. See how she is enjoying herself," glancing with a slightly contemptuous look to where her sister-in-law was receiving the homage of two or three officers.

"I am not aware that I said anything about Mrs. Adrian leaving. I came over here in a cutter. I came expressly to drive you back."

He was growing very bold. Imogene had been able to smile at him in amusement before he went away; she looked somewhat grave now.

"I will speak to Mrs. Fairburn," she said.

She manifestly wanted some excuse to remain. He coolly led her to the dressing-room door, saying he would attend to that. Martin looked surprised when he told him they were going.

A few minutes more and they were out under the stars, with nothing to break the silence of the still white world but their own voices and the tinkling of the bells on their horses. At first Russell drove rapidly and confidently. He was not at all sure that he could follow the most direct route back to the "Crag," but he knew he would strike it sooner or later, besides he trusted considerably to the charm of his conversation, talking mainly of what concerned neither of them. He had come to Clouston with the fixed purpose of asking her at what time she had begun that heading-over process. He had not in the least lost his courage, neither was he mentally coughing the question in the best form of words.

When he put it, he meant to put it bluntly. For three years he had hunched to be with her, to gaze into her face. Now for a little he determined to give himself up to the charm of her presence. But at length, suddenly, without prelude, and looking full at her in the starlight, he asked the question. She turned crimson, then pale, then crimson again, her lips curled haughtily, and did not deny it.

"Since you ask, I will tell you. I began three years ago."

"You mean that I was the first?"

"His voice was perfectly quiet; his tone had been excited, now it took his core."

"You are mistaken! I never handed you over. You went of your own will, was quite young, quite unsophisticated. I cared considerably. I supposed you were a simple and grey creature. Since then I have watched my time in what I have abundantly called testing. It has become a great hour, and I am going to cry quite. When we leave here I am going to bid my charming sister-in-law a long adieu."

distinctly in the starlight. Just then the sound of bells leaped and rung down through the mountain pass.

Hark! Listen! Those are the chimes of St. Mary's! she cried in delight. "Yes, we are on the right road at last, and not far from home," he said, and reined in the horses.

"Why do you not go on?" she asked, her voice all in a tremble.

He was looking at his watch. "It is after twelve o'clock; I am waiting for you to wish me a Happy New Year," he said.

Three more years have elapsed. The slow sail alternates between cream satin and craps and is as appealing and charming as ever.

Fairburn still remains at the "Crag" with his mother; he has recovered, devotes himself to the boys and is quite happy. Russell has bought the adjoining place. A chubby little fellow call him papa, and makes a dim future possible when Imogene may sit in a cushioned chair and fondle her grandchildren. The three or four growing girls who live on a flat, spend a part of every summer with them, and promise a prospect that sooner or later Fairburn will take the eldest to live at the "Crag."

When asked, as he frequently is, how he came to settle down among the highlands, Russell always replies with a merry twinkle in his eyes, "Because my wife is so devoted to the Chimes of St. Mary's."
