POETRY.

THE FARMER'S HOME.

A blessing on the farmer's home, on all his grounds may yield,
The harvest of the granary, the village of the field;
A blessing on the living heads that toil before his door,
On the weary father, who toils to feed his household more.

A blessing on the peasant's home, the cottage of the poor,
The lowly roof by her churning mill, the arched at the door;
On the little group who sit on the roadside turf,
On the weary father, who toils to feed his household more.

A blessing on the noble's house, the ancient home of pride,
That hath walled in its cheerful hall, and charity beside;
From one who greets rich and poor with free ungrudging hand,
Still keeps a glowing English heart, the host of English land.

A blessing on the lord's domain, the spacious, fair, and free,
The deer that roam the waving work, the steeds that prance the lea;
But most on him whose tenants round him stand,
Of lowly rank, whose hearts are true, and kind, and true.

THE TWO BRIDALS.

[AN ADVICE TO MARRIAGE.]
There are many of glorious greeting,
In the modern's children's home;
For long sweet friends are meeting,
And with joyous hearts they come—
Come to bid the earliest ray
Of first light whose cloudless dawn
Heralds an effulgent day.

'Tis the maiden's hour of bridal!
Aged mother, hear ye this:
To a clan, then you're yet higher,
You've reared her for a sister;
Gently lose your sister's chain;
Sisters, in a loving strain,
You shall find your loss your gain.

O ye myrtle wreath of feeling!
Binding heart so close to heart—
Near your brother's strength revealing,
Till ye hear the call to part—
What avails then your resistance?
Changeless is the mandate given:
More than adamant consistence,
By that voice of fate were given.

Yet there's hope, there's consolation,
In this parting, friends, for thee—
Daughter, sister still ye'll be,
Joy, then, in the happy hour!
He who clings to you, your gem;
Tears may fall, but hope has power,
By its smiles to banish them.

Months pass on, but few and fleeting,
And again those friends are met;
Hushed are now the voices of weeping,
And each cheek with tears is wet:
On the lips the forced words fall;
Hears an inward faintest sigh—
Waits the bridegroom at the altar,
Waits the coming of his bride!

She is there—yet his no longer—
Calm in her white robes she lies;
Drawn by claim that his yet stronger,
To her bridal in the skies.
Let the veiled face wear its weep—
When the loved from sight are going,
Nature bids it to be so.

O ye myrtle wreath of feeling!
Binding heart so close to heart—
Near your hidden strength revealing,
Till you take the relief parting—
What avails then your resistance?
Changeless is the mandate given:
More than adamant consistence,
By that voice of fate were given.

Yet there's hope, there's consolation,
In this parting, friends, for thee—
He is severed no relation,
Peace then fall, but Faith has power,
Back to smiles to brighten them.

themed round the gayest officer in Bombay, who was displaying the alterations in the facings of his handsome uniform, just received from Europe, devised according to royal taste. The criticisms were various.

'I like the embroidery on the collar,' said Walter, and the pattern is pretty, but I don't see any difference there from the old—'

Clara looked at it also.

'There is a difference in the pattern for my cousin, Edward Clifford, was in the—' four years since, and I recollect his showing us all his things in the school-room, Rossington, just before he joined.'

A brother officer of Seymour's was present in the old uniform; it was appressed to, but still Courtenay did not perceive the variation in the pattern; and though judgment was universally given against him, it was only on looking very closely he perceived his mistake, and acknowledged the alteration in the facings.

Mrs. Courtenay's eyes sparkled with delight and happiness, her colour rose to still more brilliant beauty.

'I knew, Walter, you were short-sighted. I am certain you are, but short-sighted for it; I am certain I can see much farther than you can, I am so glad to be sure of it.'

'What a silly whim!' said Courtenay, and sat down on a sofa.

'Will you dance this waltz with me, Mrs. Courtenay?' said Seymour, who had admired her brilliant countenance, and scarcely knew what she was saying.

'I shall like it of all things,' said Mrs. Courtenay, her eyes still fixed upon the embroidery of his collar. 'Do not you think, Walter, very short-sighted, Major Seymour?'

'Rather,' said Major Seymour, and a slight smile curled his chiselled lips, as he whirled Mrs. Courtenay into the waltzing circle away from the sofa, where Courtenay was gazing at the wreaths of flowers around the ceiling.

Orders had been issued for the march of troops into Afghanistan, a large body of forces had already moved northwards, with the baggage, and Captain Courtenay and his devoted wife were already some days march on their road towards Cabul.

The last evening before the departure of the last detachment had arrived, and the officers who were to accompany it, twenty-two in number, were seated at a gay supper in a large tent. At the table, larded with the profuse abundance of an Indian meal, the moonlight, for it was a perfectly cloudless and most brilliant night, glanced, mixed with and overpowered the artificial light, upon the uniforms, the bright looks, and the fair complexions of the British officers, most of whom of this detachment were young men, some almost boys, contrasted with the dusky folds of their tent, and the dark forms of their Indian attendants, who moved to and fro in their service, about the doors stood motionless, and apparently engaged in listening to every word of the gay discourse of the young soldiers, all eager to take the field, ardent for honour and for excitement of any kind.

'I wish we knew a little of the fellows we are going to fight,' said one young soldier; 'they don't seem like any thing we have seen yet, and they say their diet is something quite different to any thing we know of here. It is too bad, after all the pains I have taken at Sandhurst and coming out, and with my moonshine here, to find all my trouble will be of no use in Afghanistan, and we shall not know, when a fellow cries out, whether he is surrendering himself, or telling you where his diamonds are hidden.'

The dark figure I have spoken of, advanced from the door of the tent to the circle of young Englishmen.

'Do not,' he said, in a solemn and thrilling tone, which immediately arrested the attention even of the gayest and most careless of his auditors, 'do not believe that the accents you will hear from the lips of an Afghan will be a prayer for mercy, or the offer of his treasure to save a life which the demons themselves watch over; but if you knew by whom the prayers of vengeance which will burst upon Afghan lips will be heard, and who will listen with delight to those accents well known to them, you would long for the power of hearing to pass from your shuddering senses. Even the name of the greatest king that ever lived, the name of earth, repaid Hiram, King of Tyre, for his cedar-trees and his gold with the princely gift of twenty cities, and they pleased not Hiram, look in the First Book of Kings in the Old Testament of the Christian Scriptures, what Hiram called the gift.'

The youngest of the party, William Howard, desirous to know what was alluded to, drew from his breast-pocket a little bible. He had faithfully kept the last promise he made to his mother, always to carry this little bible, her last gift to him, next his heart. He read in the thirteenth verse of the ninth chapter of the First Book of Kings. 'What cities are these which thou hast given me, my brother? And he called them the land of Cabul unto this day.' The bible upon Howard's mother had given him had marginal notes, in which he saw Cabul was translated, disposing of dirty.

'Even so,' and though those cities stand in Judea, yet here, in Hindostan, does the same name bear the same dark significance. Listen to me, and learn what enemies you will have to deal with, learn the true origin of the Afghan race, the children of a mighty monarch while he walked uprightly, and the dearly beloved sons of the king over Israel, because he was the most goodly and the strongest of his race, his ambition, inflamed by the prize so early obtained, soared to lofty and forbidden things, after his love for earthly power had been fully satisfied. Remember the pitch of Endor!'

The young men looked with increasing interest and attention on this strange narrative.

'The longings of Saul were gratified even here as they had been before, and he obtained power and mastery even over the demon. Night and day did his demon slaves toil at his bidding to build the palace his pride delighted in, it was to excel in riches and in workmanship, and the demon art was tasked by their unfaltering master to complete it. But long was the toil, and heavy the labour his will required, and the days of Saul drew to their close. To hasten the work, he bade his eldest born, Prince Affghan, labour with the demons, to increase their exertions; and to render him able to communicate with these slaves, he taught Prince Affghan the demon tongue. Yet was all far from completion, when the angel of death stood before Saul and demanded of him his soul. The monarch bowed his knee before a monarch more powerful than himself, and besought of him the boon to spare him yet a while, to pass away from him for a season, till his place was completed; for well Sam knew that his demon workmen would obey no presence but his own. But the Angel of Death said, 'Let to a man living have I said, thou shalt follow me, and he said yes; and thou must follow me likewise. But for thy power and thy wisdom, for it is much, and like unto mine own, will I grant thee this thing, these earthly form shall remain to the eye as though they were in it while it is away with me, and the demons shall believe thou livest and shall labour at thy palace.'

'So the dead Saul stood, night and day, propped upon his staff before his palace as the living Saul had done, and the demons believed that he lived, and laboured on. But the white ants came, and grew bold as he moved not, and they destroyed the wood of the staff on which the dead Saul leaned, and the staff crumbled and fell down, and the dead body of King Saul fell also, and the demons saw and knew that their master was dead, and they gave one loud shout of triumph, so that such a sound was never heard before, and they fled home. And Prince Affghan, drinking before a meal, perished by the hardships of the road, bleeding from many wounds; his clothes rent, burned by the sun, and blinded by the snow he had passed through, William Howard, the sole survivor of the gallant band who were cut to pieces at Juglialuk, rushed into the tent opened to receive him. The first bearer of the dreadful tidings of the fate of our arms in Afghanistan, he was eagerly questioned, but he could only assure them of the safety of four officers of his detachment, who had been given up as hostages before leaving Cabul, when the surgeon, explaining silence, commenced the examination of his wounds.

'I think none are very deep,' said poor Howard; 'the last ball I received from an Afghan would have shot through my heart, but something hard in my breast-pocket here, deadened it.'

'How providential!' cried the surgeon, as he drew out the Afghan's ball from the singed and blackened leaves of a little red morocco book next Howard's heart.

It was the Bible his mother had given him. He sank on his knees in prayer as he kissed its pages.

Reader, more than double four months had elapsed, when in a stately drawing-room, looking out to such a landscape as only England can offer to the gratified eye, which is luxury in itself after the glare of India, a young man, as it is by the way, of a very tall and beautiful, still in the prime of his life, and scarcely past that of his beauty, folded on her maternal bosom, with inexpressible fondness, the sinking and fragile form of her lovely daughter, who lay half in her mother's arms, half on a stool of Indian ivory at her feet. Her black, soft hair covered her features, and fell around her on her morning robe, in the same luxuriance as the locks of Rossington, as Walter Courtenay had so often turned into a thousand graceful curls in her hair some in India.

The shades of evening began to fall, Lady Clifford bore her child into an oval window, to smother with the beauty of the landscape of the park for a few minutes, she had given the one deep-sigh, and the stars began to glow brightly in the summer sky. As they moved, Clara's copy of Walter's miniature fell from her bosom.

As they stood in the oval, Lady Clifford said, 'Look over the north avenue, dearest, how exquisitely bright the stars are.'

'Clara placed her hand on me, she saw the 'Star of Destiny,' and an instant afterwards she fainted upon her mother's neck.

Reader, for the truth of the tale I have related with designed names, I appeal confidently to the recollection of many officers who have served in India in the Affghanian war, and elsewhere, and whose death is commemorated. The tradition of the origin of the Afghan race and language is from their own lips; and the Indian belief in the 'Star of Destiny,' is known from the natives by many Europeans, though I purposely forbore giving any further clue to it. The party of twenty-two officers who agreed to cast the truth of the matter upon their own persons, eighteen of whom failed to do it, just before being called upon active service, and four distinctly saw it, the writing down of their names, death of those officers, led by the sword, and eight by illness, the survival of their lost companions—all these are true.

THE LOVE OF A VIRTUOUS WIFE.—WELL I AM AND had the fortune to win a heart, with what particular merit I use my advantage, as Walter Courtenay would I ought to pass through successfully and slowly? How many delicate pleasures, unknown to the generally of men would I, as it were, I create to myself? Like the miser, would I incessantly contemplate my treasure; rejoice in the richness of it; be conscious that I command my highest treasure; that my whole science of happiness in the possession of it, in looking upon it as my own peculiar property, in being the absolute proprietor of it; and that I am not to be troubled to read in the eyes of a lovely woman the dominion you have over her; to see her smile, to see her relate to you a more tender tale; to see her speak to you; to view her blushes, even upon a compliment of mine; to see her smile, to see her smile upon any particular story. Can there be a situation on earth more flattering than that of a lover, conscious of a reciprocal flame? And what sweet proof can be required than instances like those? How charming! It is exposed with an impudent confidence, and a confidence that is to be received with a welcome which shows the more by the endeavours which she makes in part to hide her transports, and she is content to see her smile, to see her smile upon any particular story. Extraordinary Case.—William Stephenson, of the Fingh public house, on the road from Caistor to Lincoln, has not had any sleep since the latter end of August last, so that for five months he has been deprived of that great necessity of life, and he is now a young man of twenty years of age, and was considered one of the best ploughmen on the very extensive woods about Caistor. One of our correspondents writes daily, and speaks with him, and he has been taken to Caistor and about his cottage grounds much as usual, and appears active, but looks rather sickly. He is a very careful man, and eats moderately of plain but good food. He has a small family of healthy children.—Stanford Mercury. ON DRINKING AT MEALS.—It is injurious to drink much at meals. Those who are generally not more than those who take less. The sensation of thirst depends upon the quantity of aqueous fluid circulating in the blood. It has been found by physicians that the most severe thirst of animals is appeased by injecting a quantity of liquid into the blood. A moderate quantity of liquid should be taken at dinner; two large portions are injuriously by diluting the gastric fluid.—Persons whose diet is more animal than vegetable, require more liquid during their meals, drinking before a meal, perishes by the hardships of the road, bleeding from many wounds; his clothes rent, burned by the sun, and blinded by the snow he had passed through, William Howard, the sole survivor of the gallant band who were cut to pieces at Juglialuk, rushed into the tent opened to receive him. The first bearer of the dreadful tidings of the fate of our arms in Afghanistan, he was eagerly questioned, but he could only assure them of the safety of four officers of his detachment, who had been given up as hostages before leaving Cabul, when the surgeon, explaining silence, commenced the examination of his wounds. ### Rowland's Odonto, or, Peat Dentifrice.

A WHITE POWDER of Oriental Herb, of the most delightful fragrance. It eradicates Tartar and decayed spots from the Teeth, preserves the Enamel, and fixes the Teeth firm in their sockets, rendering them delicately white. Being an Anti-Scorbutic, it eradicates the Scourvy from the Gums, strengthens, braces, and renders them of a healthy red; it removes unpleasant tastes from the mouth, which often remain after fevers, taking medicine, &c., and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath.

Price 2s. 9d. per box, duty included.

NOTICE.—The name and Address of the Proprietors, A. ROWLAND & SON, 20, HATTON GARDEN, LONDON.
