

NAPOLEON THE THIRD; HIS PUBLIC CAREER AND INFLUENCE UPON THE AFFAIRS OF EUROPE.

No man has ever been so generally and so justly admired as Napoleon the Third. He has been so long a ruler of France, and he has been so long a ruler of Europe, that his name has become a household word in every civilized land.

Neither time nor space will permit us to go into the history of a year's negotiations with Russia. It is enough to say that we have seen the Emperor of France, and we have seen the Emperor of Russia, and we have seen the Emperor of Austria, and we have seen the Emperor of Prussia.

This remarkable document came out with official authority and bore internal evidence that it was written or dictated by Napoleon. Indeed the London Journalists that copied it, headed it as 'Napoleon's New Map of Europe.'

We will now consider Napoleon's conduct since the commencement of the war, and the influence he will probably exercise at its termination. Very shortly after war was declared, and just about the period when France agreed to send 70,000 men, and England 30,000, to assist the Turks on the Danube, a most extraordinary document appeared in one of the Paris Journals, headed 'The New Map of Europe.'

The above is an outline of the 'map,' and it certainly displays a large amount of sagacity and foresight. It is a map of the world, and it is a map of the future. It is a map of the world, and it is a map of the future. It is a map of the world, and it is a map of the future.

The moment the Allied Commanders are relieved from the Danube again, they will be obliged to retreat to the Danube again. They will be obliged to retreat to the Danube again. They will be obliged to retreat to the Danube again.

as the Russian army in that country will be effectually cut off from all their supplies. The war in the East will then be at an end. In the Baltic the war has not yet fairly begun. It is the Baltic that has not yet fairly begun. It is the Baltic that has not yet fairly begun.

The only part of the scheme embraced by the 'New Map' that appears at all difficult of accomplishment, is the union of Russia, Poland and Prussia. The King of Prussia has been twice his brother-in-law, Nicholas, against whom he refuses to bear arms.

We must now consider our very imperfect sketch of the extraordinary career of Napoleon the Third. He has astonished the world by his greatness and wisdom. He has astonished the world by his greatness and wisdom. He has astonished the world by his greatness and wisdom.

UNITED STATES.—The country continues to suffer from the visitation of Providence in the form of tempest, fire, and pestilence. Never perhaps has the hand of God been more manifest in these devastations on our Country than during the present year.

Yellow fever still rages violently in the Southern States, and cholera continues its ravages in Pittsburgh, carrying off the citizens by scores. A packet ship from London arrived at New York on Tuesday, which had lost twenty-one of her passengers, and taken on board a few more.

I DON'T CARE IF I DO! I know you don't. But somebody else does. Everybody ought to care. Everybody don't. And you don't care, and that is what makes you so careless. In our short walk down Broadway the other night we heard that little sentence, "I don't care if I do—three times, and every time you felt that the speaker did not care, somebody that he should care for, did care. There is no harm in the words, "I don't care," in the tone, manner and meaning, and in the way they are applied. They had a meaning each time we heard them, and each time meant a different thing, and each time advanced the speaker one step nearer the point—the point of—"I don't care if I do."
